ARBITRATION.
1. Appeal—Case started by arbitrator—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 7 and 19.—Where an arbitrator states a special case for the opinion of the court without indicating whether he is acting under sect. 7 or sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889, it is necessary to consider, in order to ascertain under which section such special case is stated, whether the arbitrator intended to part with the matter for good and all, so far as his jurisdiction over it was concerned or whether, whilst retaining his jurisdiction, he merely sought the direction of the court upon some point which had arisen before him. If the language used indicates that the arbitrator desires the case to go back to him in order that he may give his final award after the court has expressed its opinion, then the special case is stated under sect. 19 and no appeal will lie to the Court of Appeal. When stating a special case arbitrators should state under which section of the Act it is intended to be stated. (Court of Appeal.) Cogstad and Co. and H. Newsum, Sons, and Co. Limited, Re 134
2. Practice—Amendment of award—" Error arising from any accidental slip or omission "—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 7 (c).—S. and Co. were the charterers and H. and Co. were the sub-charterers of a steamship. At the termination of the charter-party questions arose with regard to the balance of hire and of insurance premiums. The owners claimed against the charterers, and the charterers claimed against the sub-charterers. Both disputes were referred to arbitration. As the arbitrators disagreed, the disputes came before the same umpire, who, in the first case, namely, that between the owners and the charterers, awarded that the costs of the arbitration, which he assessed at 130*l.*, and taxed costs should be paid by the charterers. In the second case, that between the charterers and the sub-charterers, the umpire awarded that the sub-charterers should pay to the charterers for hire and insurance, and proceeded: " I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration, which I assess at 130*l.*

PAGE

and taxed costs, as well as costs of the arbitration between the owners and Sutherland and Co. (the charterers) on the same subject, except taxed costs of the sitting of the 27th June 1919, shall be paid by the charterers" [i.e., the sub-charterers in the second arbitration]. As the parties were not clear as to what costs were payable by the sub-charterers under the umpire's award, correspondence ensued between the solicitors for S. and Co. and the solicitors for H. and Co., and a letter was written to the umpire suggesting that a clerical mistake or error arising from an accidental slip had been made in the award. The umpire being under the impression that he had made an error in writing his award delivered a further award which he said he had amended so that it should read as he had originally intended to state it. The amended award was as follows: "I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration, which I assess at 130*l.* and taxed costs, as well as costs of the arbitration and the taxed costs of the owners against Sutherland and Co. and Sutherland and Co.'s own costs of the arbitration . . . shall be paid by the charterers (i.e., the sub-charterers in the second arbitration) . . ." Held, that the amended award must be set aside because the umpire had no power to expound what he had purposely written in his original award. The arbitrator had written down everything which he intended, and nothing which he had not intended, to write down; he had therefore no jurisdiction to alter his award. There was no "error arising from an accidental slip or omission" within the meaning of sect. 7 (c) of the Arbitration Act 1889, which enacts that an arbitrator had power "to correct in an award any clerical mistake or error arising from an accidental slip or omission." (K. B. Div. Ct.) (Rowlatt and McCardie, J.J.) Re Sutherland and Co. and Hannevig Brothers 203

3. Practice—Appeal—Case stated by arbitrator—Arbitrator desiring case may go back in certain events—Consultative jurisdiction of court—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 7 and 19. —An award stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the High Court is not a final award stated in accordance with sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889, if on the face of the award it is apparent that in the exercise of the duties originally undertaken by him the arbitrator desires that in a certain event further opportunity should be afforded for the final exercise of his authority. Such an award is an award stated for the consultative opinion of the court under sect. 19 of the Act. An umpire in stating a special case after stating certain findings of fact and conclusions of law proceeded, "The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party and the facts as stated by me the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in point of law. If they be correct, my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particular, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court." Held, (Lord Parmoor and Lord Carson dissenting) that the award was not final and no appeal lay from the decision of the judge at the hearing of the award. Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134; 124 L. T. Rep. 204; (1921) 1 K. B. 87) affirmed. (House of Lords) Re an arbitration between C. T. Cogstad and Co. and H. Newsum, Sons and Co. Limited 369

BOTTOMRY.

Bottomry bond—Maritime risk—Voyage undefined in the bond—Validity of the bond—Co-ownership—Writ of fi. fa.—Seizure of the ship by the sheriff—Action in rem*—Arrest by the Marshal of the Admiralty—Sale by the Marshal—Necessaries men—Execution creditors—Priorities.*—A bottomry bond must define the voyage of which the lender undertakes the maritime risk. An instrument is not a bottomry bond, notwithstanding that the parties to it describe it as such, if its terms provide nothing to prevent the lender demanding repayment at any time, even before the ship has sailed from the port where the bond was given, or if, by leaving undefined the time when repayment shall become due, it enables the lender to maintain a secret maritime lien on the ship at his pleasure. In determining priorities between necessaries men and execution creditors for whom the sheriff has seized a ship under a writ of fi. fa., the execution creditors will be preferred to the necessaries men, since the former are secured creditors from the time of seizure, whilst the latter have only acquired a security for such sums as they may become entitled to under a subsequent judgment. An American ship, which was jointly owned by two sets of American owners, was seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. in execution of a judgment recovered in the King's Bench Division against one set of owners. Soon afterwards she was arrested by the Marshal of the Admiralty at the suit of parties suing in rem for necessaries. Other necessaries men subsequently commenced proceedings, and either effected arrest or entered caveats. The ship was then sold by the Marshal acting with the consent of all parties. An action was then commenced against her by parties claiming to be holders of a bottomry bond. The bond had been given by the master some months previously in order to provide funds to free his vessel from arrest under which she then lay. By the terms of the bond, which described itself as a bottomry bond, the master agreed "to bond and lien the ship" in the amount advanced, the lenders "to have absolute lien upon the vessel until the said loan is repaid," and undertook to draw no other bond on the ship without the consent of the lenders. In an action on this bond the execution creditors under the judgment in the King's Bench Division intervened. Held, that this bond was void. No time was fixed for repayment. The loan was therefore repayable on demand, and there was nothing in the documents to prevent the plaintiffs demanding repayment before the ship sailed from the port where the bond was given. Nor was there anything to prevent them from allowing the loan to run on indefinitely and maintaining a maritime lien on the ship all the time. The execution creditors and the necessaries men who had established their right in rem were, therefore, entitled to the proceeds of the sale. As between these claimants, held that the sheriff could effectually seize the shares in a foreign ship, to which no statutory restriction to the contrary applied, in the same way that he could seize an undivided share in any other chattel; but that, on the other hand, seizure by the sheriff did not deprive the Marshal of his power to arrest the ship, since both were alike the servants of the court. It followed that the execution creditors were secured creditors from the moment of seizure; as such they ought to enjoy priority to the necessaries men who had only obtained a security for sums to which they might become entitled under a subsequent judgment. The rule of the Admiralty Court that necessaries men shared in the proceeds of a sale pari passu without regard to the dates of arrest and judgment should not be extended to include execution creditors. The shares held by those owners against whom judgment had been signed in the King's Bench Division were, therefore, ordered to be paid out to the execution creditors. The shares held by the other owners were ordered to be paid out to the necessaries men, ranking pari passu. (Hill, J.) The James W. Elwell 418

PAGE

CANADA.

1. Quebec Harbour—Corporation of pilots—Legislative authority—British North America Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 3), ss. 91-92—Canada Shipping Act (Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, s. 123—4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48, ss. 1, 2, 3 (Stat. of Can.).—The respondent corporation, which consists of licensed pilots of the Harbour of Quebec and below, sued the first appellant, a pilot and a member of the corporation, to recover a sum earned by him for services of a pilot of the harbour during the season of navigation of 1917. The defendant pleaded that under 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48 (Stat. of Can.), he was entitled to retain for his own use and benefit the amount of his earnings over and above such sum as might be required for the pilots' pension fund. Held, that the power conferred on the corporation by 23 Vict. c. 123 (Stat. of Can.), to demand pilot dues and to call on pilots to hand over their earnings as received was extinguished by 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48, ss. 1, 2, 3 (Stat. of Can.). The Dominion Legislature had power under the British North America Act 1867, s. 91, Head 10 (Navigation and Shipping), to enact laws with regard to pilotage, although they trenched upon the property and civil rights in a province. On the question whether the corporation was still entitled to demand from a pilot a contribution to the pilots' pension fund their Lordships expressed no opinion. Judgment of the Court of King's Bench, reported Q. Rep. 27 K. B. 409, reversed. 2. British master's certificate—Suspension of certificate—Wreck Commissioner's Court—Canadian procedure—Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Rehearing Rules 1907, rr. 22, 3, 12—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 470—Canada Shipping Act 1908 (7 & 8 Edw. 7, c. 65), s. 36.—The certificate of a British master was suspended by a Wreck Commissioner's Court sitting at Montreal. The master appealed on the ground (inter alia) that the procedure under the Canada Shipping Act 1908, s. 36, was not consistent with the rights to which a British master is entitled under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 470, sub-s. 4, and the Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Rehearing Rules 1907, rr. 3 and 12. Held, that the rights of British shipmasters in a Canadian Wreck Commissioner's Court are to be determined by considering whether the Canadian statutes diminish the rights assured to them by British legislation. The safeguards provided for the interests of shipmasters by the Merchant Shipping Act and the rules made thereunder are in no way diminished by sect. 36 of the Canada Shipping Act 1908. But as in this case the Wreck Commissioner's Court had not complied with the provisions of sect. 36, the decision must be quashed and the master's certificate restored to him. (Adm. Divisional Court, Sir Henry Duke, P. and Hill, J.) The Chelston 158

CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Charter-party—Prescribed route—Refusal of master to follow—Error of judgment—Breach of charter-party.—By a charter-party dated the 8th April 1916, for a voyage from Liverpool to Archangel, it was provided by clause 9 that the master was to prosecute his voyage with the utmost dispatch, and by clause 14, that all losses and damages occasioned by "negligence, default or error of judgment of the pilot, master, or crew, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the steamer" were to be absolutely excepted. The vessel sailed from Liverpool on the 26th Sept. 1916 and arrived at Honningsvaag, in the north of Norway. From there, owing to the danger of German submarines, a special route to Archangel was prescribed by the British Admiralty and the Norwegian War Insurance Association; the master, however, after waiting some days, decided to proceed by another route and reached Vardoe on the 11th Oct. 1916. Subsequently the crew refused to continue the voyage to Archangel owing to reports as to the presence of a hostile submarine, and, in spite of the charterers' protests, the voyage was abandoned and the cargo discharged. The claim of the owners for the hire and of the charterers for damages for breach of the charter-party were referred to arbitration. The umpire found that the master in refusing to follow the prescribed route was guilty of a grave error of judgment, and that in failing to sail he had committed a breach of clause 9 of the charter-party, and he awarded the charterers damages for this breach. Held, that the decision of the master not to follow the prescribed route was an error of judgment as to route, and not an error of judgment "in the management or navigation" of the steamer, and that consequently the owners were not protected by the exceptions in clause 14 of the charter-party. Award upheld. (Bailhache, J.) Owners of the Steamship Lord v. Newsum 19

2. Charter-party—Demurrage—Exception in cases of "accidents or other hindrances beyond charterers' control"—Martial law—Ejusdem generis rule.—In Sept. 1914 the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel for a voyage to Port Nolloth, in Cape Colony. The vessel duly arrived at Port Nolloth and made ready to discharge. Owing, however, to the fact that, on her arrival, the port was under Government control and was being used for disembarking troops and war material for an expeditionary force which was being sent to German South-West Africa, the charterers were unable to discharge her until eighty-six days' demurrage had expired. The charter-party contained three "exception" clauses. The first dealt with the charterers' obligation to load; the second was the usual exception clause containing, inter alia, "the King's enemies" and "restraint of princes and rulers"; the third, which was directed to the unloading of the cargo, excepted the charterer from his liability to pay demurrage "in cases of strikes, riots, lock-outs, labour disturbances, trade disputes, accidents, and other hindrances beyond the charterer's control." The defendants relied upon the exceptions contained in the second and third clauses. Held, that the second clause, from its position in the charter-party, from its express words, and from the fact that the obligations on the charterers were specifically limited by the other two clauses, did not apply to the charterers' obligation to unload the vessel; as to the third clause, the Government control could not be said to be an accident, and the "other hindrances beyond the charterers' control" must be construed ejusdem generis with the named "exceptions." The defendants therefore failed. (Greer, J.) Aktieselskabet Frank v. Namaqua Copper Company Limited 20

3. Charter-party—English contract—Freight payable in Spain—Payment of part of freight illegal by Spanish law—Implied condition—Mutual inability to perform—Conflict of laws—"Restraint of princes"—Mutual exception.—An English firm chartered a Spanish vessel from Spanish owners to carry a cargo of jute to Spain. The charter-party, which was in English, made in London in charterer's usual form, provided that part of the freight should be paid by the charterers in London when the vessel sailed, and the balance at the port of discharge in Spain, by the receivers of the cargo, who were Spaniards. It contained clauses terminating the liability of the charterer on shipment of cargo, except for the payment of freight, and excepting (inter alia) "restraints of princes." There was also a clause submitting disputes to arbitration in London. When the vessel arrived at the port of discharge the balance of freight payable was, owing to fluctuations in the rates of exchange, in excess of the amount fixed by a decree of the Spanish Commission of Supplies. The decree was issued on the day previous to that on which the charter-party was dated. The decree, which was shortly afterwards confirmed by Royal Proclamation, subjected to penalties persons paying or receiving freight for jute in excess of the specified rate. The receivers refused payment in excess of the rate fixed by the decree. The shipowners sued the charterers for the balance. Held, that the charter-party was an English contract and that the charterers were liable for the balance of the freight; but that there was an implied condition excusing the parties from obligations which neither was able legally to fulfil. The Spanish decree made illegal the payment or receipt of freight in excess of a certain figure at the place where the material part of the contract was to be performed, and the charterers were therefore excused from paying any higher rate. The mutual application of the exception "restraint of princes," upon which Bailhache, J. had in part based his decision, not considered by the Court of Appeal. Appeal dismissed. Ford v. Cotesworth (23 L. T. Rep. 165; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544) and Cunningham v. Dunn (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; 38 L. T. Rep. 631; 3 C. P. Div. 443) approved and followed. 4. Charter-party—Termination of hire—Implied rights—Breach of charter-party—Requisition—Termination—"Restraint of princes"—Measure of damages.—A charter-party provided, inter alia, for the hire of a chartered vessel for one calendar month from the date at which it was placed at the disposal of the charterers, and that thereafter hire was to continue at the same rate of payment until determined by fourteen days' notice given by the charterers. Some months later the shipowners withdrew the vessel from the service of the charterers, claiming an implied right to terminate the charter-party by reasonable notice, which they said that they had given. The tug was then requisitioned by the Government, and the shipowners contended further that the charter-party, if it was in existence at the time, was put an end to by the requisition; if it was not put an end to by the requisition, they relied upon the exception of "restraint of princes" in respect of the period under requisition. The charterers replied that the charter was still in existence, but that the ship was deviating when the requisition took place; her owners were not, therefore, entitled to rely upon the exceptions. Held, that the charter-party was to continue in existence until terminated by the charterers, and that the shipowners had no implied right to put an end to it by notice or otherwise. Nor was it ended by the Government requisition, but, as the requisition was wholly unconnected with the wrongful act of the shipowners, the question of the application of the exceptions contained in the charter did not arise. On general grounds damages were not awarded for the period during which the vessel was under requisition. Davis v. Garrett (1830, 6 Bing. 716) distinguished. Dictum of Tindal, C.J., at p. 724, held not to apply. (Rowlatt, J.) Elliott Steam Tug Company Limited v. John Payne and Co. 78

5. Carrier—Perishable goods—Delay in transit—Strike of railway employees—Sale by necessity—Duty of carrier to communicate with owner of goods.—In Sept. 1918 the defendants contracted with the plaintiff to carry tomatoes from Jersey to London. There was no fixed period for delivery. The tomatoes were duly loaded on board the steamship C. at St. Helier, but the vessel was weatherbound there for about three days. By the time she arrived at Weymouth a strike had broken out among the defendants' employees, in consequence of which considerable delay occurred in unloading the vessel, and it became impossible to dispatch the goods to London by rail for an indefinite time. The cargo was already in bad condition. No attempt was made by the defendants to communicate with the owners and inform them of the state of things at Weymouth and of the condition of the cargo. The defendants decided that the best thing to do in the circumstances was to endeavour to sell the cargo as a whole forthwith, and that was done. Salter, J. (following Sims v. Midland Railway Company, 107 L. T. Rep. 700; (1913) 1 K. B. 103) held that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was a breach of contract to carry the goods unless the defendants could satisfy the court that it was commercially impracticable to communicate with the plaintiff and that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was really necessary. Whether communication with the owner is commercially practicable or not must depend on the facts of each case, but if communication is physically possible without disproportionate expense, and if there is reason to expect that instructions can be obtained before a final decision is made, then the carrier must at least attempt to obtain such instructions before he deals with the goods otherwise than under the express terms of the contract of carriage. He held on the facts that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was a breach of the contract of carriage and a wrongful conversion of the goods. Held, on appeal, that the judgment of Salter, J. (infrâ) was right. (Court of Appeal.) Springer v. Great Western Railway Company.... 85

6. Shipping agents—Obligations—Loss of goods—Pilferage — Insurance — Liability of the forwarding agent.—In July 1918 the plaintiff forwarded to the defendants, who were shipping agents, eight bales of cloth to be shipped to a French port and thence by rail to Lyons. The defendants undertook to have the goods insured against pilferage during transit from warehouse to warehouse. They held an open policy of insurance under which they were able to declare the goods in question and obtain the protection of the underwriters' undertaking. The defendants made the usual and proper arrangements with steamships and railways for the carriage of the goods in question to their destination, and also made proper arrangements with the underwriters for the insurance of the goods during transit. While the goods were in the custody of the French Customs authorities two bales were lost, and only six bales reached their destination. It was thought that the two bales were stolen. There was no evidence of any negligence or default on the part of the defendants having caused the loss of the goods. Held, that the obligation imposed upon the defendants was, not to carry the goods, but to make arrangements with the carriers, and to make such arrangements as might be necessary for the intermediate steps in the journey between the different sets of carriers and others who had successive possession of the goods. As to the contract to insure, the defendants were only obliged to place the plaintiff's risk with the underwriters, for whose subsequent actions they were not responsible. In discharging these obligations the defendants had shown no negligence. (Rowlatt, J.) Jones v. European and General Express Company..... 138

7. Cesser of hire during grounding of ship and consequent repairs—Construction of words "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer"—Ejusdem generis rule.—A charter-party contained a clause providing "that in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men, or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull, or other accident preventing the working of the steamer, and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or from any accident to the cargo or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." The steamer forming the subject of the award was chartered in Aug. 1916 to load at Sunderland and to discharge at a French port. The steamer was ordered by the French Government to discharge at Marans, which was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. She arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916 and went aground on soft clay while going up the river. She remained aground till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct., and was damaged in consequence. The work of repairing began on the 8th Nov. and lasted for some time. The harbour contained no bar which would cause detention through grounding or otherwise. The arbitrator awarded that hire ceased (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916 till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916 and (b) during the time occupied while the damage to the steamer consequent upon such grounding was being repaired. Held that the ejusdem generis rule did not apply so as to restrict the meaning of the words "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer," in the clause in question, there being no common or dominating feature in the specific words contained in such clause, and that therefore the award of the arbitrator must be upheld. (McCardie, J.) Steamship Magnhild, Owners of, v. McIntyre Brothers and Co. 107

8. Requisition — Charter-party — Accident — Liability for continuous hire.—A ship was requisitioned under charter-party T. 99, by which the Shipping Controller was entitled to make certain deductions from the freight in the event of the voyage being protracted by the deficiencies of the steamer. The concluding subsection of the clause allowing these deductions provided as follows: "If through any accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and reloading same to be deducted from the hire." In the course of the voyage time was lost in discharging and reloading on account of a fire which broke out in the cargo. The fire could not be attributed to any particular cause. The Shipping Controller claimed the right to make the deductions. Held, that the meaning of "accident" depends upon the circumstances and intentions of the parties concerned. An accident may or may not arise from negligent or wilful acts or from causes unconnected with negligence or wrongdoing. In this case there was no accident in the sense contemplated by the parties. Even if the fire had been an accident, the Shipping Controller must still have failed, since it would have been accident to the cargo, not to the ship. In any event the Shipping Controller could not succeed, since hire runs continuously in favour of the shipowner in the absence of clear provisions to the contrary. The provisions relied upon in this case were ambiguous. (McCardie, J.) Denholm Limited v. Shipping Controller..... 141

9. "Always afloat"—Alongside as customary—Custom of Port of Yarmouth—Custom inconsistent with terms of charter.—A charter-party provided for a vessel to deliver timber at Yarmouth "always afloat," the cargo to be taken from alongside at the charterer's risk as customary. She could not float within 13ft. of the side of the quay, and it was accordingly necessary to erect staging between the ship and the wharf. The cargo was then carried from the ship's side across this staging and stacked 12ft. from the edge of the quay. This method of unloading follows the custom of the port. In an action by the shipowner in the County Court to recover the cost of carrying the timber from the ship's side to the quay, and of erecting the staging over which it was carried, it was held that the custom of the port was not consistent with the terms of the charter. Held, that this judgment was right. Although a custom may be admitted to show that delivery from "alongside" need not mean delivery over the ship's rail, it did not follow that the place of delivery was the place indicated by the custom. Judgment of the Court of Appeal in Holman v. Wade (Times Newspaper, May 11, 1877, supplemented by further particulars from the Public Record Office) followed. (Adm. Divisional Court, Sir Henry Duke, P. and Hill, J.) The Turid 155

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

PAGE

the 1st. Oct. 1914 it was agreed between the plaintiffs, the owners, and the defendants, the charterers, that the steamship T. should load a cargo of timber at Soroka for carriage to Yarmouth and deliver there "as ordered, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat"; and that the cargo should be taken "from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense as customary." The T. was ordered to discharge at a part of the quay occupied by the charterers, to which she was always afloat unable to get nearer than about 13ft., and the cargo was there discharged by stagings slung from the ship's side to the quay, the stevedore's men working in two gangs, one carrying the timber to the ship's rail and the other carrying it ashore. It was proved that there was a custom at the port of Yarmouth that the whole of this work should be done by and at the cost of the ship. The shipowners objected that the alleged custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and sued the charterers to recover the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail. Held, that the case was indistinguishable from Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1877) and that the court were bound by that case to hold that the custom was inconsistent with the charter-party; and that the shipowners were entitled to recover from the charterers the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail. Decision of the Divisional Court (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 155; 123 L. T. Rep. 587) affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) The Turid 184

11. Charter-party — Discharge of cargo — "As customary" — "Arrived ship" — Commencement of discharge—Time fixed by charter-party —Delay in finding berth—Discharge with customary dispatch—Presence of other ships.—In July 1920 the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship N., chartered the steamship to the defendants to proceed to the port of N., and, after loading a cargo, to proceed to Q., and there deliver the cargo. A clause in the charter-party provided that the cargo was to be discharged "as customary," and that the time for discharge should be counted from the first high water on or after the arrival of the steamship at or off a discharging berth. The steamship arrived at the port of Q. and was off her discharging berth at ten o'clock on the morning of the 5th July 1920, and the first high water after her arrival was at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. There were a number of other ships in the port, which had arrived before the steamship N., and were therefore entitled to priority over the steamship N. Consequently the steamship N. did not begin to discharge until about the 9th July. She was then discharged within forty-eight hours. The plaintiff claimed 150*l.* demurrage as being the amount due at 2*s.* per gross ton per day for the period between the 7th July and the 11th July, according to the tonnage of the vessel, under a provision in the charter-party to that effect. Held, that the effect of the charter-party was to determine when the N. became an "arrived ship." Thereafter the defendants were only bound to do what was reasonable under existing circumstances, such as the presence of other ships in the port. The defendants, having discharged with customary dispatch after securing a suitable berth, were not liable for demurrage. 12. Charter-party — Dead-weight — Permanent ballast of cement—"Whole reach and lawful burthen of ship"—Carrying capacity—"Carrying about 600 tons dead-weight without guarantee" —Rate of hire.—The steamship T. was described in a charter-party dated the 24th April 1917 as being "supposed to carry about 600 tons, but no guarantee given dead-weight on Board of Trade summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers." The charterers on the same day sub-chartered the vessel by a sub-charter, describing her therein as "carrying about 600 tons dead-weight on Board of Trade summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers without guarantee." At the time when the vessel was delivered under the terms of the charter and the sub-charter she had some 100 to 150 tons of hard cement fixed in her holds, which reduced her total dead-weight capacity to about 497 tons. Held, (1) that in giving the whole reach and burthen of the ship as it existed at the time of the charter, the owners had performed their covenant that the whole reach and lawful burthen of the ship should be at the charterers' disposal; and (2) that the words "without guarantee" protected the owners from liability in respect of the dead-weight capacity being short of 600 tons. 13. Shipping and forwarding Agents—Casual transaction—Contract to collect and lighter goods—No express terms—Usual terms—Loss of goods by pilferage—Lighterman's liability—Common carrier. —The plaintiffs employed the defendants, who were shipping and forwarding agents, in Oct. 1919, to collect and carry a quantity of goods, including tin, from certain wharves where they were lying to a ship on the Thames. The defendants were not lightermen having wharves and barges of their own, and nothing was said about the terms on which this lighterage was to be done, except that the defendants were to be paid a flat rate for their services. The defendants employed carters to cart the goods from the wharves where the goods were lying to a wharf which they used under an arrangement with the wharf owners, and which they described in their correspondence with the plaintiff as "our wharf." They then employed a firm of lightermen to lighter the goods from the wharf to the ship in the river. Owing to the watchman's negligence a quantity of the tin was stolen. The plaintiffs claimed to recover the value of the stolen goods. The defendants relied on a custom that all contracts for lightering goods in the Port of London were subject to the terms of the London Lighterage clause, which exempted lightermen from liability for any loss in any circumstances whatever, howsoever, whensoever any such loss might be caused, and whether caused by negligence or the wrongful act or default of the servants or agents of the lightermen, or other persons for whose acts the lightermen would otherwise be liable. The transaction was of a casual nature, and the defendants did not act strictly as shipping agents, but were contractors to employ carriers at a rate which included their own remuneration. Held, that no express terms with regard to lighterage having been arranged, the defendants must be taken to have been employed on the usual forms. They were, therefore, exempt from liability for loss by pilferage, and the plaintiffs could not recover. (Rowlatt, J.) Lynch Brothers Limited v. Edwards and Fase.... 208

14. Charter-party—Cesser of hire—"Or other accident preventing the working of the steamer"— Ejusdem generis rule—"Shallow harbours, rivers, or ports, where there are bars"—Liability of charterers for hire.—A steamer was chartered to load at Sunderland and to discharge at a French port. The French Government ordered the steamer to discharge at Marans, which was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. She arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, and got aground on soft clay while going up the river. She remained aground till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. and was damaged in consequence of the grounding. Repairs began about the 8th Nov. and took a considerable time. There was no bar in the harbour, river or port. By clause 12 the charter-party provided: "That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service ; but should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." The umpire found that hire ceased (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916 till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. ; (b) during the time occupied for repairing the damage done to the steamer. (McCardie, J. affirmed the award.) Held, that the ejusdem generis rule was not applicable to the words " or other accident " in the first part of clause 12, and that those words included any accident to the vessel preventing her from working for more than twenty-four consecutive hours. (Judgment of McCardie. J. affirmed on this point. But held that the words " where there are bars " in the latter part of clause 12 applied only to ports, and not to shallow harbours or rivers, and that as the grounding which caused the detention occurred when the vessel was trading to a river, the time lost was for charterers' account. Judgment of McCardie, J. (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 107 ; 124 L. T. Rep. 160 ; (1920) 3 K. B. 321) reversed. (Court of Appeal.) Owners of Steamship Magnhild v. McIntyre Brothers and Co. 230

15. Failure to deliver goods—Bills of lading—" Received for shipment "—Indorsees of the bills of lading—Several indorsees join in one writ—Arrest of ship—Procedure—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c 10), s. 6—Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 77), s. 2, sub-s. 2.—A document which acknowledges that goods have been received for shipment by a named vessel, or by some vessel belonging to named shipowners, does not on that ground fail to be a bill of lading w'thin the meaning of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). The sailing ship M. H. loaded at New York a cargo of general merchandise for carriage to Sydney. F. E. and Co., of New York, as agents for the charterers, received for shipment certain packages consigned to, among other persons in Sydney, the various respondents. To each consignor there was issued a document which acknowledged the receipt of the goods " for shipment by the sailing ship M.H. or by some other ship owned or operated by " certain lines of vessels, to be transported to Sydney, and there delivered to shipper's order. The document contained references to itself as a " bill of lading " and was signed F. E. and Co. " for the master." The goods, not being delivered upon the arrival of the M. H. at Sydney, the respondents, who were each indorsees of one of the documents, issued a writ in rem against the ship, claiming severally to recover damages in an action for non-delivery of goods under bills of lading, and the ship was arrested. The appellants thereupon took out a summons to set aside the writ and by order a special case was stated for the opinion of the full court to have decided (1) whether the Supreme Court in its Admiralty Jurisdiction had jurisdiction to hear the action, and (2) whether the plaintiffs were properly joined. Held that the documents were bills of lading within the meaning of sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 ; and that the joinder of plaintiffs, an obviously convenient course in the present case, depended upon rule 29 of the Supreme Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction), and, that being a matter of procedure, their Lordships were not disposed to differ from the decision of the Supreme Court, and the case should proceed to trial. Accordingly the appeal would be dismissed. (Privy Council). The Ship Marlborough Hill v. Alex. Cowan and Sons Limited and others 163

16. Charter-Party—War risks—Stranding of ship—Sailing in convoy—" Consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."—The steamship I. was at all material times under requisition by the Admiralty under the terms of the charter-party T. 99. Under this charter-party the Admiralty were not liable for ordinary risks at sea but undertook to be liable for risks from all " consequences of hostilities or warlike operations." The I. was under orders to sail and did sail from Salonica to Taranto in Italy. She had on board hospital stores for the British Government and carried a few British troops and officers. When nearing Taranto she was navigated without lights, being then in the war zone. She was escorted by a British destroyer. No lights on shore were visible and she was ordered by the commander of the destroyer to follow a pilot escort which had come out of Taranto. This order she complied with, although without such an order the master would not have attempted to enter the port. Almost immediately after being ordered to follow the pilot escort the I. lost sight of her lights and was stranded on the rocks just outside the port of Taranto. Held, following the decision of the House of Lords in Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company (The Matiana) (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58 ; 123 L. T. Rep. 721 ; (1921) A. C. 104) that though the stranding of the I. took place while she was being navigated under war conditions the damage done to her did not arise in consequence of warlike operations, and the Admiralty were not liable. The British Steamship Company v. The King (The Petersham) (15 Asp. 17. Charter-party — Requisitioned ship — T. 99 (clause 25)—Cargo of coal—Fire in cargo—" Accident "—Whether " accident " limited to ship or includes cargo.—The concluding lines of clause 25 (b) of the charter-party T. 99 which provides that " if through any accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and reloading the same is to be deducted from the hire " are not limited to an accident to the ship but include an accident to the cargo. So held by Bankes and Atkin L.JJ. (Scrutton L.J. doubting). Judgment of McCardie J. (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141 ; 124 L. T. Rep 378) reversed. (Court of Appeal.) Denholm Limited v. Shipping Controller 277

18. Bill of lading—Short delivery—Claim against shipowner—Mistake—Onus of proof—How discharged.—The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants, who were shipowners, damages for short delivery of a cargo of linseed from Argentina. The plaintiffs said that they delivered on board the defendants' ship at Buenos Ayres 17,104 bags of Plate linseed for carriage to London. The defendants by their bill of lading and mate's receipts admitted that they received that number of bags on board. The defendants only delivered 16,948 bags in London. The bags delivered on board at Buenos Ayres were tallied by tallymen on behalf of both the plaintiffs and the defendants ; and as to 2,085 bags by three tallymen. The tallymen all agreed as to the number of bags delivered to the ship, but an error appeared in one tally-book and an alteration in another. The total amount arrived at by the tallymen was accepted by the mate for the purpose of the mate's receipt and was accepted as correct for the purpose of insertion in the bill of lading signed by the master. It was clear on the evidence that there was no possibility of loss by theft or otherwise during the voyage. The learned judge therefore found that it was proved beyond a reasonable doubt that all the bags and their contents that were received by the ship from the plaintiffs at Buenos Ayres were delivered by the ship to the plaintiffs in London and he held that all cases of short delivery turned on inferences of fact. A plaintiff claiming damages for short delivery must prove his case and it was prima facie enough to entitle him to succeed if he proved the delivery of a less number or weight or measure of goods than that admitted in the bill of lading. That proof placed the onus on the shipowner to establish that the number, weight, or measure admitted by the bill of lading was wrong. The shipowner might discharge that onus by direct evidence that a mistake was made by the tallymen from whose tallies the bill of lading was made out or by indirect evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt that none of the goods were lost or stolen after receipt and that he delivered all that he received. In this case the defendants, the shipowners, had proved beyond all reasonable doubt that they had delivered all that they received and that there must have been a mistake in the tally at Buenos Ayres and in the bill of lading figures which were the result of that tally. Held on appeal that the learned judge had fully appreciated the question of law which governed the matter and that there was no ground for setting aside his findings of fact. 19. Charter-party—Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter (Clause 16)—Icebound port—Port kept open by icebreakers—Damage by forcing ice—"Nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice"—Manchester Ship Canal—Ship unable to leave Manchester in light draft—"Good and safe port."—A safe port is a port to which a ship can safely get and from which she can safely return. By a charter-party dated the 25th Nov. 1919 and made on the Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter 1912 form the plaintiffs' steamer was chartered and it was provided that the steamer should be delivered to the charterers and should be employed between good and safe ports or places within the limits of one Baltic round where she could always safely lie afloat, as the charterers or their agents should direct. Clause 16 of the charter-party provided that "the steamer shall not be ordered to . . . any icebound port" or any port "where there is risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer will not be able on account of ice to enter the port or get after loading or discharging nor shall the steamer be obliged to force ice"; should the steamer be detained by any of the above causes such detention should be for charterers' account but nevertheless "if on account of ice the captain should consider it dangerous to remain at port of loading for fear of steamer being frozen in and (or) damaged he shall have liberty (but not be obliged) to sail to a convenient open port and await charterers' fresh instructions." The charterers ordered the steamer to proceed to the port of Abo, which port was kept open in the winter by means of ice-breakers. While proceeding to Abo the steamer encountered ice. Sometimes she was able to force her way through without the aid of an ice-breaker, sometimes she tried and failed; but eventually with the aid of an ice-breaker she got through and arrived at Abo. In the course of her voyage to and from Abo she was very seriously damaged by the ice. After loading a cargo at Abo the charterers ordered the steamer to proceed to Manchester. To reach the port of Manchester the steamer had to proceed up the Manchester Ship Canal. She was able to pass through the canal loaded on her way to Manchester but after she had discharged her cargo at Manchester her draft was such that she could not proceed down the canal and clear the bridges without cutting her masts. In a claim by the plaintiffs against the charterers for breach of charter-party Bailhache J. held (1) that the charterers had committed no breach of the charter-party in ordering the steamer to proceed to Abo because that port being kept open by means of ice-breakers was not an ice-bound port within the meaning of the charter-party; (2) that on the true construction of clause 16 of the charter-party the steamer was not bound to force her way through ice; whether she attempted to do so rested in the master's discretion; therefore the charterers were not liable for the damage suffered by the steamer through encountering ice on the way to Abo; (3) that Manchester was not a good and safe port within the meaning of the charter-party because a safe port meant a port to which a ship could safely get and from which she could safely return. The charterers therefore committed a breach of the charter-party in ordering the steamer to Manchester and were accordingly liable for the expense of cutting the masts to enable her to return under the bridges of the Manchester Ship Canal. Held on appeal (1) that Abo was not an ice-bound port within the meaning of the charter-party; and (2) (Atkin L.J. doubting) that the charterers had not ordered the ship to a port on her way to which she was obliged to force ice; and that there had not been a breach of the charter-party in either respect. 20. Bill of lading—"Shipped in good order and condition"—"Weight quality condition unknown"—Cargo damaged on shipment—Clean bill of lading—Estoppel—Skipper acting as agent of the consignee—Undertaking to indemnify the master.—The description "shipped in good order and condition" when it appears in a bill of lading refers to the outward condition and appearance of the goods. The subsequent description "weight quality condition unknown" refers to the internal condition of the goods not visible to the person who signs the bill. A bill of lading which contains both these expressions is not thereby contradictory in terms. The plaintiffs agreed to purchase through A. and the B. agency in Sweden potatoes f.o.b. Gothenburg, payment to be made on signing clean bills of lading. A. chartered the Dutch sailing vessel T. to carry some of the potatoes to Hull. The plaintiffs subsequently ratified the chartering of the T., and the potatoes were loaded under the supervision of A., whom the plaintiffs authorised to act for them in certain matters connected with the stowage of the cargo. The bags of potatoes were brought to the ship in a wet condition, and the full number described in the bills of lading was not loaded. The master of the T. accordingly refused to sign clean bills of lading. On the undertaking of the B. agency, given with the knowledge and approval of A., to indemnify him against liabilities which he might incur thereby, and acting upon the advice and with the approval of the owners' agents, he ultimately signed clean bills of lading which described the cargo as "shipped in good order and condition . . . weight quality condition unknown." Thereupon payment was made by the plaintiffs in Gothenburg in accordance with the terms of sale. On the arrival of the T. at Hull the whole of the cargo was found to be damaged. The plaintiffs accordingly arrested the T. in an action for damage to cargo and short delivery, contending that they were indorsees of the bills of lading without notice of the condition of the cargo, and that the defendants were estopped by the admissions contained in the bills from denying that the cargo was shipped in good order and condition. The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were indorsees without notice, saying that A. was the agent of the plaintiffs and that the property in the goods passed to the plaintiffs before shipment. Held, that A. was not the agent of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were therefore indorsees of the bills of lading without notice, and the property in the potatoes therefore passed to them on the signing of the bills. The defendants were therefore estopped from denying as against them that the potatoes were shipped in good order and condition. The description "shipped in good order and condition" applied to the external condition of the bags which was visible to the master, and was not in contradiction with the subsequent words "weight quality condition unknown." The defendants were liable for the injury to and loss of the potatoes. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Tromp 338

21. Time charter-party — Construction — Payment monthly in advance—Extension of charter beyond stipulated period—Frustration of adventure—Effect on payment of hire.—The appellants chartered from the respondents a steamer for four calendar months under a charter-party, which provided that the charterers should pay as hire a fixed sum per month, and pro rata for any fractional part of a month until re-delivery of the steamer to owners as therein stipulated, payment of hire to be made monthly in advance. Provision was also made for re-delivery of the steamer at a United Kingdom coal port. Should the steamer be on a voyage at the expiration of the period fixed by the charter, the charterers were to have the use of the steamer at the rate and on the conditions therein stipulated to enable them to complete the voyage, provided always that the voyage was reasonably calculated to be completed about the time fixed for the termination of the charter. In the event of a breakdown of machinery or other accident preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, the charter-party provided for the cesser of hire until she was again in an effective state to resume her services; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, and in certain other events the time so lost and expenses incurred were to be for the charterers' account, and in the event of the vessel being lost, the hire paid in advance or not earned was to be returned to the charterers, who were to have a lien on the steamer for all moneys paid in advance and not earned. The period fixed by the charter-party expired on the 10th Aug. 1919. In the previous July the charterers had loaded the steamer at Antwerp with a cargo of coal for Toulon, intending that she should return to Great Britain with a cargo of mineral, but on the 14th July the Shipping Controller notified that after the completion of her discharge at Toulon the steamer was required to go to Australia. The steamer proceeded to Toulon, but the discharge of her cargo was not completed until the 16th Aug., on which day the owners took delivery of their steamer at Toulon without prejudice to their rights, and under the requisition she was sent to Australia. The charterers claimed that they were only entitled to pay a fractional portion of a month's hire, namely, from the 10th to the 16th Aug., when the steamer was delivered, and the question was referred to arbitration. Held, (1) that the provision for payment in advance applied to the case of an extension of the charter-party beyond the stipulated period, and that, on the 10th Aug. a full month's hire was payable by the charterers; and (2) (Lord Finlay and Lord Wrenbury dissenting on this point) that there having been no re-delivery as prescribed by the charter, the charterers were not entitled to a pro rata adjustment by reason of the frustration of the adventure. 22. Bill of lading—Clause requiring claims to be made within seven days—Refrigerating apparatus—Obligation to maintain imposed by statute on shipowner—Whether "weakened, lessened, or avoided" by the bill of lading—Fiji Ordinance No. XIV. of 1906, s. 4. The Fiji Ordinance, No. XIV. of 1906, relating to the sea carriage of goods (which is in substance identical with the Sea Carriage of Goods Act 1904 of Australia) enacts by sect. 4 that where any bill of lading or document contains any clause whereby the obligation of a shipowner (inter alia) to make and keep the ship's refrigerating chambers fit for the carriage and preservation of the goods should in any way be weakened, lessened, or avoided, that clause shall be illegal and void. By sect. 5 the parties to a bill of lading are to be deemed to have intended to contract according to the laws in force at the place of shipment, and by sect. 7 (1) a warranty shall be implied that the ship shall be at the beginning of the voyage seaworthy in all respects. The respondent shipped at Fiji bananas on board a vessel belonging to the appellants. The bill of lading provided that no claim for loss or damage should be enforecable unless made within seven days from the date at which the cargo was or should have been landed. The refrigerating chambers were defective and the fruit was damaged on the voyage. The shipper sued to recover the loss so caused him, contending that the shipowners were liable in that the ship was unseaworthy, but he failed to claim within seven days. Held, that as the clause in the bill of lading weakened or lessened the shipowner's obligation, it was void under sect. 4 of the Ordinance, and consequently the shipper was not barred by his delay in claiming from recovering damages. Judgment of the Supreme Court of Fiji affirmed. (Privy Council.) Australasian United Steam Navigation Company Limited v. Hunt 367

23. Shipping and forwarding agents—Through bill of lading—Prepayment of lump sum freight—Consignee voluntarily taking delivery of goods at place short of original destination—Freight for unperformed portion of transit unexpended—Principal or agent—Obligation to account.—The plaintiff delivered to the defendants in Liverpool a large quantity of cigars and cigarettes for carriage to Petrograd via Vladivostock at the rates (previously quoted by the defendants) of 4*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton for the sea portion of the carriage to Vladivostock, and 99*l.* 10*s.* per ton for the land portion from Vladivostock to Petrograd, and on the terms of a document in the form of a bill of lading, which stated that "Goods are forwarded on the basis of the present existing tariff and in accordance with the exceptions and (or) conditions of the railway companies, steamship lines, or other transport media concerned in the carriage, and we only act in our capacity as shipping and forwarding agents without responsibility on our part for other transport media concerned in the transport," and "Freight on above goods payable in Liverpool." The plaintiff duly prepaid at Liverpool the amount of the freight, which was 125*l.* for the sea portion of the carriage, and 928*l.* for the land portion, and it was assumed by the plaintiff that the rates which the defendants had quoted to the plaintiff were intended to cover the defendants' remuneration. The consignee of the goods, owing to the internal troubles in Russia, voluntarily elected to take delivery of the goods at Vladivostock. The defendants had not paid the railway company any sum of money in respect of carriage from Vladivostock to Petrograd. The plaintiff claimed to recover back the sum of 928*l.* as money received by the defendants as the plaintiff's agents and not expended by them. Rowlatt, J. held, that as the sum paid to the defendants by the plaintiff in Liverpool was a lump sum for procuring the carriage, and included the defendants' remuneration, they were under the obligation to account to the plaintiff for any portion of the money which was not expended by reason of the consignee electing to take delivery at a place short of the original destination of the goods. Held, that on the facts the defendants were in this transaction acting, not as forwarding agents, but as principals, and that the judgment of Rowlatt, J. was right. Cuba with a cargo of sugar, which, under the bills of lading, was to be carried to Queenstown for orders and to be delivered at the port of destination to certain consignees. The bills of lading provided that general average should be payable according to York-Antwerp Rules. During the voyage the ship incurred general average expenses at a port of refuge, and soon after resuming her voyage she and her cargo were totally lost at sea by fire. The shipowner claimed general average contribution from the consignees of the cargo. Held, that, under the York-Antwerp Rules which were incorporated in the contract, the claim failed, because at the termination of the adventure, namely, on the total loss of the ship and cargo, the cargo had no value. Quaere, whether the claim would have succeeded at common law, apart from the York-Antwerp Rules. 25. Charter-party — Exceptions — "Fire . . . always mutually excepted"—Fire caused by negligence of charterers' servants—Damages which could not reasonably have been anticipated—Liability of charterers—Negligence — Remoteness — "Natural and probable cause."—In a time charter-party "fire" was "always mutually excepted." Fire broke out in the ship, which was totally destroyed. Arbitrators found that the fire arose from a spark igniting petrol vapour in the hold ; that the spark was caused by a board, knocked into the hold by the charterers' servants, coming into contact with some substance in the hold ; and that the causing of the spark could not reasonably have been anticipated, though some damage to the ship might reasonably have been anticipated. The charterers contended : (1) That the exception of "fire," in the charter-party protected them from liability ; and (2) that the damages were too remote as it could not reasonably have been anticipated that the falling of the board would have caused a spark. Held, (1) that the exception of "fire" did not relieve the charterers from loss by fire caused by the negligence of their servants as there was no express term to that effect in the exceptions clause ; and (2) that the fall of the board being due to the negligence of the charterers' servants, the charterers were liable for all the direct consequences of the negligence, notwithstanding that the consequences could not reasonably have been anticipated. The question whether the damage that ensues can reasonably be anticipated is material only on the question whether an act is negligent or not. 26. Charter-party—Ship's name—Implied warranty of nationality—Breach—Shipowner selling vessel to foreign subject—Change of nationality of vessel—Change of flag—Implied term—Damages.—By a charter-party a British ship was chartered by her owners to the plaintiffs for twelve months in direct continuation of an earlier time charter. During the currency of the charter-party the owners sold the ship to a Greek subject, thereby causing her to change her flag. The charterers did not attempt to avoid the charter, but kept the services of the ship until it expired. By the contract of sale the owners reserved the right, and it was agreed that they should retain the right of satisfying any requirement of the charterers with regard to the personal performance of any obligations of the charter-party. Held, that although there was no implied warranty in the charter-party that the ship was a British ship because she was called by a British name, the owners had committed a breach of the charter-party in selling the ship to a foreign subject and causing her to change her flag, and the charterers were entitled to such a sum in damages as would represent the increased difficulty of getting suitable and remunerative employment in consequence of the change of flag. 27. Time charter—Monthly hire—Right of owners to withdraw steamer from services of charterers in default of payment.—Measure of damages.—Under a time charter-party hire was to be paid monthly in advance, and in default of such payment the owners were to have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers. The charterers did not pay the hire, and the owners withdrew the steamer from their service. Held, that the owners were entitled to recover damages for the chartered period remaining after the withdrawal of the steamer from the charterers' service. The measure of such damages is the difference between the rate of hire provided in the charter-party and the market rate at the date of withdrawal. (Greer, J.) Leslie Shipping Company v. Welstead 413

28. Bill of lading—Special form—Reasonableness—"On deck" clause—Duty of shipowner to give notice to shipper of intention to carry on deck—Booking slip.—The plaintiffs shipped a quantity of candles on board the defendants' steamer for carriage from London to Antwerp, on the terms of a booking slip which the defendants had given to the plaintiffs, and which was approved of by the plaintiffs. The booking slip was as follows (inter alia) : "We beg to confirm freight engagement. . . . All engagements are made subject to the conditions, terms, and (or) exceptions of our bills of lading and also to the conditions and (or) regulations of any steamboat, railway, or canal company by whom the goods may be conveyed and all goods are at the risk of senders or owners thereof until actually shipped on board the steamer. No insurances of any description are booked without special instructions. No cargo shipped unless Walford Line's Bills of Lading are used ; no other bills of lading accepted." The goods were shipped on the 18th March 1919, and a bill of lading, dated the 19th March, was given to the plaintiffs. By clause 11 of the bill of lading it was provided that : "The company has the right to carry the goods below deck and (or) on deck, and in branch steamers, coasting or river steamers or vessels and (or) lighters, launches, or boats, and to land or store goods for the purpose of transhipment, re-shipment, or further carriage, and shall have the right to sub-contract in respect of any such carriage or part thereof, and shall not be liable for any loss, damage, or injury within the exceptions in this bill of lading whether due to negligence or not, but such exceptions shall apply to carriage by such sub-contractors as if such sub-contractors were specifically mentioned in the said exceptions." The goods were stowed on the deck of the defendants' vessel, and there was no suggestion of any carelessness in the way they were arranged and protected. No notice was given to the plaintiffs by the defendants that the goods were, or would be, carried on deck. While on the voyage from London to Antwerp the goods were damaged by sea-water through the ordinary perils of the sea. The plaintiffs claimed damages for alleged breach of contract by the defendants in relation to the carriage of the goods. Held, (1) that the plaintiffs were bound by clause 11 of the bill of lading, notwithstanding its unusual character, because they had accepted the booking slip, which provided that the goods were to be shipped under the defendants' special form of bill of lading and clause 11 applied to the goods actually named in the bill of lading ; (2) the defendants were entitled to tow the candles on deck ; (3) there was no implied condition that the defendants should give the plaintiffs notice that the goods in question would be carried on deck and (4) the defendants were therefore not liable for damages. 29. Charter-party—Signature by charterers—"As agents" — Effect of signature — Liability of charterers.—A charter-party stated as follows : "It is this day agreed between Thomas H. Seed and Co. was signed "By authority of owners, for Thomas H. Seed and Co. Limited, A. D. Cadogan, as agents" and "For and on behalf of James McKelvie and Co., as agents, J. A. McKelvie." The plaintiffs as owners sued the defendants as charterers for demurrage which by the charter-party was to be paid by the charterers. Held (Scrutton, L.J. dissenting), that upon the true construction of the charter-party the defendants by their signature had deliberately expressed their intention to exclude any personal liability. 30. Charter-party—Requisitioned ship—Charter T. 99—War risks undertaken by Admiralty—Collision—Negligence—Marine risk—Hospital ship conveying wounded—"Warlike operation." The suppliants were an Australian steamship company carrying on business in Australia. In Aug. 1915 the suppliants' ship W. was requisitioned by the Australian Government for transport service. In the following year, the suppliants' same ship was taken over by the British Admiralty for use as a hospital ship. The British Admiralty took her over on the terms of the well-known charter T. 99, whereby the British Government accepted liability for all war risks, and the suppliants took all the marine risks. In March 1918, while the steamship W. was still under requisition to the British Admiralty, she was carrying wounded soldiers from Havre to Southampton. While so doing on a dark and hazy night, and being navigated without masthead lights, and with dimmed sidelights, by order of the British Admiralty, the suppliants' steamer came into collision with another steamer (the steamship P.), and both steamers suffered much damage. The suppliants claimed damages from the Crown, on the ground that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations. An action had been brought by the owners of the steamship P. against the suppliants, and in that action the collision was held to be due to the negligence of the suppliants' vessel. Held, (1) that the suppliants' vessel was not engaged in a warlike operation, and was not a warship at the time of the collision; and (2) if she were held to be engaged in a warlike operation the loss was due to the suppliants' vessel's own negligence, and the question of negligence being, on the authorities, material, the suppliants could not succeed, and there must be judgment for the Crown. 31. Charter-party—Expense of unloading timber—"Cargo to be taken from alongside at charterers' expense as customary"—Custom of port—Custom inconsistent with term of charter-party. By a charter-party of the 1st Oct. 1914, it was agreed between the plaintiffs the owners, and the defendants the charterers, that the steamship T. should load a cargo of timber at Soroka for carriage to Yarmouth, and delivered there "as ordered, or so near thereunto as he may safely get, always afloat"; and that the cargo should be "taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." The T. was ordered to discharge at a part of the quay occupied by the charterers, to which she was "always afloat" unable to get nearer than about 13ft., and the cargo was there discharged by stagings slung from the ship's side to the quay, the stevedore's men working in two gangs, one carrying the timber to the ship's rail, and the other carrying it ashore. It was proved that there was a custom of the port of Yarmouth that the whole of this work should be done by and at the cost of the ship. The shipowners objected that the alleged custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party; and sued the charterers to recover the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail. Held, that the custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and that the shipowners were entitled to recover from the charterers the cost of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail.

32. Charter-party—Broker—Commission on hire paid and earned—Sale of ship during currency of charter by shipowner to charterer—Claim for commission for whole period.—The appellants carried on the business of shipbrokers, and the respondents were shipowners. By a charter-party made between the respondents and J. H. and Co. as charterers, it was provided that a commission of 2½ per cent. on the hire paid and earned under the charter, and on any continuation thereof, should be payable to the shipbrokers, the present appellants. The charter was a time charter for the period of eighteen months. After four months had expired the owners sold the vessel to the charterers, with the result that the charter came to an end. In an action by the shipbrokers against the shipowners to recover commission in respect of the period subsequent to the sale of the vessel, Held, that if it had been intended on the part of the shipbrokers to provide for the continuance of their commission in any event, they could and ought to have arranged for that in express terms. There was no evidence that the shipowners had sold the ship for the express purpose of relieving themselves from liability for payment of any further commission. The action therefore failed. Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed. White v. Turnbull, Martin, and Co. (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406, 78 L. T. Rep. 726) approved and followed. (House of Lords.) *L. French and Co. 33. Bill of lading—C.i.f. contract—"Through" bill of lading—Goods shipped from Norway to Japan—Transhipment at Hamburg—Tendering "through" bills of lading issued at Hamburg—Rejection by buyer.—The appellant in Sweden sold to the respondents in London 600 tons of cod guano to be shipped from Norway to Japan c.i.f. Kobe or Yokohama, payment net cash against documents in London. The guano was shipped in April 1920 from three Norwegian ports, and was carried by a local steamer to Hamburg under a bill of lading of the 22nd April 1920, and was there transhipped to a Japanese steamer, the A.M., which carried it to Japan. L., the agent of the A.M., at Hamburg, issued through bills of lading as soon as the goods came into his possession in the following form: "Through bill of lading from Braatvag according to bill of lading on the 22nd April 1920. Shipped in apparent good order and condition by Messrs. Hamel and Horley Limited, on board the steamship Kiev lying in or off the port of Braatvag, and bound to Hamburg for transhipment into the . . . Atlas Maru 1500 bags cod guano . . . to be delivered . . . at . . . Yokohama unto order." The respondents refused to accept these bills of lading as not fulfilling the conditions of a c.i.f. contract. The Court of Appeal (reversing Bailhache, J.) held without deciding whether the bill of lading would have been a through bill of lading or not had it been issued at the proper time, the fact that it was not issued at a proper time entitled the defendants to refuse to accept it in satisfaction of their c.i.f. contract. Held, that the bills of lading were not a good tender. They were the contract of the subsequent carrier without any complementary promises to bind the prior carrier in the through transit; the buyer being left with a considerable lacuna in the documentary cover to which the contract entitled him. Further, a bill of lading issued thirteen days after the original shipment at a port in another country many hundreds of miles away was not duly procured "on shipment"; and the so-called through bills of lading were too late in point of time. Judgment of the Court of Appeal (infrà) affirmed. (House of Lords.) Hansson v. Hamel and Horley Limited..... 546

34. Charter-party—Reference of disputes to arbitration—Unseaworthiness at commencement of voyage—Claim for damage to cargo—Time limit for appointing arbitrator—Effect of arbitration clause.—By a charter-party it was provided that "all disputes from time to time arising out of this contract shall, unless the parties agree forthwith on a single arbitrator, be referred to the final arbitrament of two arbitrators . . . one to be appointed by each of the parties, with power to such arbitrators to appoint an umpire. . . . Any claim must be made in writing and claimant's arbitrator appointed within three months of final discharge, and, where this provision is not complied with, the claim shall be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred." Held, that that provision did not exclude the cargo owner from such recourse to the courts as was always open, by virtue of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, to a party who had agreed to arbitrate, but that it was unavailable to the shipowner as an answer to a claim for damage caused by unseaworthiness. Tattersall v. National Steamship Company Limited (5 Asp. 35. Requisition — Charter-party — Loss by enemy action—Compensation—Petition of right—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), ss. 1 and 2.—In March 1915 a ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty and taken under a charter-party which fixed the rate of hire, gave to the Admiralty the right of purchase at a certain price, and rendered them liable for all risks and expenses of the ship. In Feb. 1916 the ship while so requisitioned was sunk by enemy action. Accordingly the owners, by petition of right, claimed damages against the Admiralty. Before the petition was heard the Indemnity Act received the Royal Assent on the 16th Aug. 1920. The Crown having claimed that by virtue of the Act the petition was discharged, the point of law was set down for hearing. The Indemnity Act 1920 provides by sect. 1 (1) that no action or legal proceeding (including a petition of right) shall be taken in respect of any act done during the war before the passing of the Act, if done in good faith or in the public interest by or under the authority of an official in the service of the Crown, and that if any such proceeding has been instituted before the passing of the Act it shall be discharged and made void: "Provided that, except in cases where the claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of this Act, this section shall not prevent (b) the institution of proceedings in respect of any rights under, or alleged breaches of, contract," if the proceedings are brought within the specified time. Sect. 2 (1) provides that "Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing section restricting the right of taking legal proceedings, any person (a) being the owner of a ship or vessel which has been requisitioned shall be entitled to payment or compensation for the use of the same and for services rendered during the employment of the same in Government service, and compensation for loss or damage thereby occasioned. Held (Lord Parmoor dissenting), that the case fell within sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a), of the Act, the general words of which included claims for breach of contract, and that as there was no agreement as to the amount to be paid for total loss compensation must be assessed in the manner provided by that section. The petition of right was therefore discharged under the Act. Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed. (House of Lords.) Attorney-General v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company 574

36. Carriage of goods—Vessel chartered by sellers—"Expected ready to load late September"—Grounds for expectation—Absence of reasonable grounds—Delay—Frustration of contract.—Sellers, who had chartered a steamship which had left Norfolk, Virginia, for Rio de Janeiro, with coal, and was to go on to the River Plate in ballast, contracted on the 20th Sept. 1920 to sell to K. M. and Co. 1000 tons of clipped La Plata oats for shipment from the River Plate. The contract contained the following clause: "Shipment in good condition per first-class steamer I., expected ready to load late September." The steamer experienced engine trouble, and had not arrived at Rio at the date of the contract. She left Rio on the 29th Oct., and the sellers stated that she would arrive in the River Plate about the 12th Nov. The buyers claimed that the delay had frustrated the contract. The matter was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators found that the statement "expected ready to load late September" was not justified, and that the delay was so great as to frustrate the contract. Held, that the finding of the arbitrators must be taken to mean that the sellers could not have had an honest expectation founded on reasonable grounds that the vessel would be ready to load by late September. The arbitrators were justified in that finding, and their award must be upheld. Decision of McCardie, J. (38 Times L. Rep. 273) affirmed. 37. Charter-party—Exceptions clause—Construction—General followed by particular words—"Et cetera"—Ejusdem generis rule.—Where general words in an exceptions clause in a charter-party are followed by particular words, the ejusdem generis rule should not be applied. A charter-party contained the following exceptions clause: "Should the vessel be detained by causes over which the charterers have no control, viz., ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo has been taken over, &c., no demurrage is to be charged and lay-days not to count." The chartered vessel was detained for a number of days beyond the lay-days by a strike of dock labourers at the port of discharge. Upon a claim for demurrage, Held, that the governing words of the clause were "causes over which the charterers have no control," the particular causes mentioned being merely instances to which, as they followed the general words, the ejusdem generis rule ought not to be applied, and that the words "et cetera" only meant "and so on," and had not the effect of getting rid of the preceding general words. Decision of McCardie, J. reversed. Herman v. Morris (35 Times L. Rep. 574) not followed. (Court of Appeal.) Ambatielos v. Anton Jurgens Margarine Works 598

NOTE.—Since upheld in the House of Lords.—ED.

38. Charter-party—Defence of the Realm—Coal Strike—Detention of ship loading coal—Admiralty orders—Claim by charterers for compensation—Claim against the Crown—Reg. 39BBB Defence of the Realm Regulations—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), s. 2.—In 1920 the suppliants were engaged in carrying coal from South Wales for the French railways. By a time charter-party they had hired the steamship N., the rate of hire being 279*l.* a day. In Oct. 1920 the steamship N. was at Cardiff loading coal for Nantes. She had nearly finished loading when the coal strike broke out. The naval transport officer, acting under Admiralty instructions given by virtue of their powers under Emergency Regulation 39BBB, ordered the N. to go out to Barry Roads and lie there and wait for further orders. The vessel was detained in Barry Roads for eighteen days, and was then allowed to proceed on her voyage to France. The suppliants then applied to the shipping controller for compensation for the detention, for bunker coal burnt while waiting for orders, extra wages, and other expenses arising by reason of the detention. The shipping controller replied that, as the vessel had not been actually under requisition, he could not pay any compensation. The suppliants thereupon brought a petition of right claiming from the Crown damages for the detention of their vessel. They alleged that they were requested by the Admiralty to let the N. lie in Barry Roads and that they assented, and that from such request and assent there arose an implied promise by the Admiralty to indemnify them against loss. On behalf of the Crown it was contended that there was no contract whatever between the Crown and the suppliants. Reg. 39BBB provides for the payment of compensation for a requisitioned ship but not for a ship under orders or detained as the N. was. The suppliants were not in possession of the vessel nor had they a lien on her. They had only a contractual right to order her master to perform voyages with her for their benefit and profit. Held, (1) that there was no implied contract with regard to the payment of compensation for the loss due to the detention of the ship; (2) that the suppliants had no right of compensation under reg. 39BBB or at common law, and (3) that if the suppliants were entitled to any compensation under the Indemnity Act 1920 their only tribunal was the one set up by that Act, namely, the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission. Upon an application by them for a charging order under sect. 28 of the Solicitors Act 1860, upon the damages recovered by them against the English owners of the vessel on behalf of the German clients: Held, that "assets" in art. 297 (h) of the Treaty of Versailles means "net assets," that is, the assets after deducting the expenses of collection and realisation; that there was nothing in the Treaty of Peace or the Treaty of Peace Order in Council to prevent the making of a solicitor's charging order upon the damages. COLLISION.

1. Damage—Demurrage—Claim for period beyond that needed to effect repairs—Remoteness of damage.—The plaintiffs' vessel put into port to repair damage sustained in collision. Whilst she was there her Government issued an order requiring all vessels to be fitted with a gun platform and other apparatus. In assessing damages against the defendants the registrar allowed a claim for demurrage not only for the period occupied in carrying out the repairs, but also for the additional period occupied in fitting the gun platform. The defendants moved that the report be referred back. Held, that the claim for demurrage, whilst the gun platform was being fitted was bad, because the delay was not a result following naturally from the collision, but arose from circumstances unconnected with it. The London (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; (1914) P. 72) distinguished. (Hill, J.) The Kafue 48

2. Proceedings not commenced within two years—Motion to set aside writ—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8—In an action brought in 1916 by the plaintiffs to recover collision damage sustained by their vessel, the defendants in that action pleaded (inter alia) that the collision was caused by the negligence of the P. L. M. 8 (then the Virginia), against which vessel they instituted proceedings in Jan. 1918. At the trial of both actions in March 1920 the P. L. M. 8 was found alone to blame. The plaintiffs at once instituted the present action to recover damages from the owners of the P. L. M. 8. The plaintiffs had had ample opportunities of commencing proceedings against the P. L. M. 8 within two years of the collision. The defendants moved to set aside the writ. Held, that the action was not maintainable. Held, also, that in the circumstances the court ought not to exercise the discretion given to it by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 for an extension of time. (Hill, J.) The P. L. M. 8 51

3. Collision in a river estuary—Conflict of Rules—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, preliminary note and arts. 16 and 30 — Tyne By-laws 13 and 39. — "Where there is a certain rule which deals with the whole scope of the subject, to add parts of the provisions of the sea rules would be to interfere with the operation of the river rules." In a fog a steam vessel, when inside the piers at the Tyne entrance, heard a long blast right ahead. She did not stop her engines, but continued to navigate at a moderate speed; whilst doing so she came into collision. Held, that the collision occurred at a place where both the Collision Regulations and the Tyne By-laws applied. But that by art. 30 of the former the Collision Regulations were not to interfere with the operation of any local rules, and, as in this case the Tyne By-Laws 18 and 39 prescribed the whole duty of a vessel navigating in fog, the Collision Regulations were entirely inapplicable. The Carlotta (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; (80 L. T. Rep. 664; (1899) P. 223) followed. (Hill, J.) The Ceylon 100

4. Compulsory pilotage—Duty of master and crew to assist pilot—Negligence.—They who seek to establish the defence of compulsory pilotage, which is of statutory origin, must show that the collision was due solely to the fault of the pilot, and if there is neglect on the part of the master and crew of the ship of which the pilot is in charge which cannot be shown to be unconnected with the collision they do not discharge that onus. A pilot is entitled to the assistance of a look-out and timely reports of material incidents, and if this assistance is not given, it cannot be said that the pilot ought to have known of incidents without being told of them, and therefore that the blame is his alone. Where a pilot was navigating a ship at full speed in narrow waters among a large number of vessels and the course taken was such that it must have been obvious to the master either that the pilot did not know of a risk, or that, if he did know, he was undertaking an unwarrantable risk, it was held that the master owed a duty to his owners and to the pilot to call the pilot's attention to the risk, and was not justified in doing nothing. Per Lord Moulton: "A ship guilty of initial negligence is bound to do everything she can to prevent the consequences of the negligence and the burden upon her is to show that she has done so before she can claim that the negligence of the other ship is the sole cause of the accident." 5. Tug and tow — Towage contract — Collision between tow and third vessel—Tug to blame—Indemnity due from tow.—A Dutch shipmaster signed a contract of towage containing conditions which he was unable to read or understand, though he was aware of their existence. One of these conditions cast upon the tow owners responsibility for the acts of the tug. Relying upon this condition, the tug owners claimed in third party proceedings to be indemnified by the owners of the tow for the damages recovered against them in an action by the owners of a third vessel which had been in collision with the tow through the sole fault of their tug. Held, that the tow owners were bound by the contract to indemnify the tug owners. (Hill, J.) The Luna 152

6. A ship guilty of initial negligence is bound to do everything she can to prevent the consequences of that negligence, and the burden upon her is to show that she has done so before she can claim that the negligence of another ship is the sole cause of an accident. 7. "Not under command"—Keeping course and speed—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, Arts. 4, 21—Concurrent findings—A cruiser not under normal effective control, and with a useless whistle, exhibited two black shapes to indicate that she was from an accident "not under command." She collided with a steamship approaching at a speed of about ten knots on a crossing course, whose duty under ordinary circumstances of navigation would have been to keep course and speed. The steamship saw the cruiser's signal. If the cruiser had been under effective control it would have been her duty to keep out of the way of the steamship. Held (Lord Wrenbury and Lord Phillimore dissenting), that the steamship should have kept out of the way as the cruiser was in fact in such a condition owing to an accident that she could only get out of the way of the steamship after great and unusual delay, and that she was "not under command" within the meaning of art. 4 of the Regulations for Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and that the duty cast upon the officer navigating the cruiser was no more than a common law duty to navigate with such care, caution, and skill as was reasonable under the circumstances. Held also (Lord Wrenbury and Lord Phillimore dissenting), that even though the question whether the cruiser was guilty of negligence leading to the collision was one of extreme difficulty, the facts were not clear enough to justify the House in disregarding the advice of their nautical assessors and setting aside the concurrent judgments of two courts which had each of them the assistance of nautical assessors. 8. Both to blame in equal degree—Right of contribution of English shipowners against a French shipowner in respect of life claims by French crew's representative — French law as to shipowners' liability for life claims— French laws of the 29th Dec. 1905 and the 15th July 1915—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), ss. 1, 3,—The Y. O. (French owner) and the C. (British owners) were held equally to blame for a collision in which the Y. O. was sunk and certain of her crew drowned. The registrar found 7131*l.* due from the C. to the Y. O. The representatives of the said deceased seamen had brought life claims against the C., who admitted liability. The owners of the C. claimed a declaration that they were entitled to recover half the amount of the life claims from the Y. O. and to set off the same against the 7131*l.* Held (1) that under the law of France, which was admitted to apply, shipowners were not liable to pay life claims except in case of their own personal negligence; (2) that under the law of England the French owner would not be liable under Lord Campbell's Act (the defence of common employment being open to him); (3) that the owners of the C. had no right of contribution from the owner of the Y. O. in respect of payment by the C. on the life claims; and (4) that sect. 1 and 3 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 by their provisos did not impose any liability upon any person who is exempted by any provision of law. The owners of the C. were therefore not entitled to the declaration asked for. (Hill, J.) The Cedric 285

9. Damage for detention during repairs—Date at which the rate of exchange must be taken for conversion into English currency.—Where loss has been suffered by the detention of a ship during repairs owing to collision, the damages must be assessed with reference to the actual period of detention. And if those damages are proved in a foreign currency, the tribunal must convert them into English money at the rate of exchange ruling at that time. (Hill, J.) The Volturno. [Since affirmed by House of Lords.—See infrà No. 13.—ED.] ... 288

10. Fog—Speed—Signals—Ferry traffic—Local practice as to ferry signals—Breach of art. 15 (a) of Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.—A tug with a flotilla in tow of the length of about 500ft. was proceeding up the River Mersey on her wrong side. She collided with the ferry boat Tranmere. Both vessels were held equally to blame, the tug for being on her wrong side, the ferry boat for proceeding at excessive speed in fog. Hill, J. found that both the tug and the ferry boat were sounding inappropriate fog signals, and that neither were justified in so doing under the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. Hill, J. also considered The Lancashire (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 202; 29 L. T. Rep. 927; L. Rep 4 A. & E. 198) and refused to lay down any rule of law as to the duty of ferry boats in the Mersey to cease running in dense fog. (Hill, J.) The Tranmere .. 290

11. Navigation of entrance to Montevideo Harbour—Rounding the whistling buoy—"Keeping course and speed"—Whistle signals—Apportionment of blame—Discretion of Court of Appeal to review apportionment—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 19, 21, 25, 27, and 28—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57) s. 1.—When the judge of the Admiralty Court has apportioned blame under sect. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), and the Court of Appeal agree with him on the facts and in his conclusions as to the actions of the ships, they will not lightly interfere with his apportionment, though they have the power to do so. But if the court differs from the judge in these respects the court will review his decision as to the proportions of blame. The K., when outward bound from Montevideo, sighted the green light of the H. on her port bow when the K. was nearing the whistling buoy at the entrance to the harbour. The vessels were on crossing courses. When the K. had the buoy abeam on her starboard she starboarded to make the turn for the sea, the turn being usually made at the buoy. The H., when first sighting the K. at a distance of two miles, ported slightly but did not blow her helm signal, although she was altering not only for the buoy but also in order to manœuvre for the K., nor did she at once open her red light. After the K. starboarded, the H. hard-a-ported to avoid a collision, but did not reverse her engines, and a collision occurred. Hill, J. held that the K. was three-fourths and the H. one-fourth to blame. Both vessels appealed. Held, that under art. 21 of the Regulation for Preventing Collisions at Sea it was the duty of the K. to keep her course and speed; and there were no special circumstances to relieve the K. from obeying the rule; and that under art. 19 it was the duty of the H. to keep out of the way of the K. The H. was to blame not only for failing to reverse her engines, but also for not blowing her whistle when she originally ported, as it might have been heard by those on the K., and have acted as a warning to them not to starboard. Art. 28 requires a vessel to sound helm signals when in sight of another vessel; she is only relieved from this obligation under the article when the other vessel is so far distant that she cannot be affected by the manœuvres which the signal indicates. The H. and the K. held to blame in equal degrees. Judgment of Hill, J. (infrâ) (1920) (P. 314) varied. (Court of Appeal.) The Karamea. [Since affirmed by House of Lords. —See infrâ No. 14.—Ed.] 318

12. Collision—Steamship coming out of dock—Crossing rule—Porting to counteract ebb tide—Misleading signals—Other vessel not misled—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 19, 21, and 28.—The G., leaving the Albert Dock on the Birkenhead side of the Mersey, intended to cross straight to the east side of mid-river and then turn down stream. The G. S. was proceeding up river to the west of mid-river, having the G. on her starboard bow. The vessels sighted one another at a distance of about half a mile, at the time when the G. was leaving the dock entrance; and they came into collision some 700ft. from the Liverpool side. The G., on leaving the dock, ported a little to counteract the effect of the ebb tide on her head, and gave a short blast, and subsequently a second short blast. After the first slight porting to counteract the tide, the helm was steadied, and the second short blast was given, and she continued on straight across the river. The question was whether in the circumstances the crossing rule (art. 19) applied. Held, that the question depended on the distance at which the vessels sighted one another, and that they were just sufficiently far apart for the crossing rule to apply. The G. S. was held to blame for not reversing when the G. was seen to be continuing to head across the river. In the Admiralty Court the G. was also held to blame on the ground that she sounded port helm signals when she was not, in fact, "directing her course to starboard" (art. 28). Held, by the Court of Appeal, that, as she did not, in fact, mislead those on board the G. S., who saw that she was not altering her course to starboard, she ought not to be held to blame. Expressions in The Albano (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; 96 L. T. Rep. 335; (1907) A. C. 193), The Huntsman (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 606; 104 L. T. Rep. 464), and The Ranza (19 L. T. Rep. 21n) cited and approved. Judgment of Hill, J. varied, the G. S. being held alone to blame. (Court of Appeal.) The Gulf of Suez 328

13. Collision—Damage—Loss agreed in foreign currency—Rate of exchange—Date of conversion.—Held (Lord Carson dissenting), that in an action of negligence causing collision and damage to a ship and consequent loss of the use of the ship during detention for repairs, the damages must be assessed with reference to the actual period of detention. And if those damages are agreed in a foreign currency the tribunal must convert them into English currency at the rate of exchange ruling at the time the detention occurred. 14. Navigation of entrance to Montevideo Harbour—Rounding the whistling buoy—"Keeping course and speed"—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 19, 21, 27, and 28.—The K., when outward bound from Montevideo, sighted the green light of the H. on her port bow when the K. was nearing the whistling buoy at the entrance to the harbour. The vessels were on crossing courses. When the K. had the buoy abeam on her starboard she starboarded to make the turn for the sea, the turn being usually made at the buoy. The H. when first sighting the K. at a distance of two miles, ported slightly but did not blow her helm signal although she was altering not only for the buoy but also in order to manœuvre for the K., nor did she at once open her red light. After the K. starboarded, the H. hard-a-ported to avoid a collision, but did not reverse her engines, and a collision occurred. Hill, J. held that the K. was three-fourths and the H. one-fourth to blame. Both vessels appealed. Held, by the Court of Appeal varying the decision of Hill, J., that under art. 21 of the Regulation for Preventing Collisions at Sea it was the duty of the K. to keep her course and speed; and there were no special circumstances to relieve the K. from obeying the rule; and that under art. 19 it was the duty of the H. to keep out of the way of the K. The H. was to blame not only for failing to reverse her engines, but also for not blowing her whistle when she originally ported, as it might have been heard by those on the K. and have acted as a warning to them not to starboard. Art. 28 requires a vessel to sound helm signals when in sight of another vessel; she is only relieved from this obligation under the article when the other vessel is so far distant that she cannot be affected by the manœuvres which the signal indicates. The H. and the K. held to blame in equal degrees. Held, that the vessels must be held to have been equally to blame. Judgment of the Court of Appeal (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318; 124 L. T. Rep. 653; (1921) P. 76) affirmed. (House of Lords.) The Karamea 403

15. Collision with submerged wreck—Damage to the wreck—Salvage contractor—Contractor working on the wreck—Possession of the wreck—Bailment of the wreck—Right of contractor as bailee to sue the wrongdoing ship for damage to the wreck.—By a contract between a firm of salvage contractors and the agents for the underwriters of the M., then lying sunk in Barry Roads, it was agreed that the salvage contractors should endeavour to salve the M. on terms of "no cure, no pay." In performance of the contract the salvage contractors used pumps, opened holes, employed divers, fixed apparatus, attended with a salvage steamer on the M., and dealt generally with her as they thought fit. The authorities of the Trinity House, however, continued to light the wreck for some time after the salvage operations began, but by a later agreement between the contractors and the Trinity House the contractors undertook the responsibility for lighting the wreck, the Trinity House reserving the right to retake possession of the wreck if the lighting was not properly performed. In these circumstances the steamer Z. negligently collided with the wreck of the M., which was destroyed. No servant of the salvage contractors was present at the M. at the time of the collision, nor was the salvage steamer of the contractors present on that night. In an action by the salvage contractors against the owners of the Z., held that the control which the salvage contractors exercised over the M. was such as to enable them as bailees in possession to maintain an action against the owners of the Z. for damage done to the M. The Okehampton (110 L. 16. Collision at night—Insufficient lights on sailing ship—Failure of steamship to see loom of sailing ship until about 300ft. away—Look-out—Negligence. A steamer, making sixteen knots, collided with a sailing vessel at night. The night was "fine, clear, dark, and overcast." The sailer's lights were defective. Those on board the steamship did not see the loom of the sailer until they were within about 300ft. of her. The President found, on the advice of the Elder Brethren, that the loom of the sailer ought to have been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile. He held, that, although the lights of the sailer were grossly improper, the steamship was alone to blame, because if she had seen the loom of the sailer at a distance of a quarter of a mile, as, he found, she ought to have done, the collision might and ought to have been avoided. The owners of the steamship appealed. On appeal the assessors expressed the opinion that in the circumstances it was very doubtful whether the loom of the sailer could have been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile, or at a distance appreciably greater than that at which it was first seen by those on the steamship. Held, that the sailer was to blame for carrying improper light, and that she was alone to blame for the collision, as it had not been proved that the look-out on the steamship was in any way defective. Decision of Duke, P. reversed. (Court of Appeal). The Cumberland Queen 483

17. Collision — Contributory negligence — Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 1 (a) (b). The question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it. In establishing liability for collision at sea, if a clear line can be drawn between the acts of negligence of two vessels, the subsequent act of negligence is the only one to look to. There are cases where the two acts of negligence come so closely together and the second act of negligence is so mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act that the party secondly negligent, while not held free from blame under the rule in The Bywell Castle, might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution. A collision occurred between the V., an oil tank vessel, the leading vessel of a convoy, and the R., a destroyer, the escort on the starboard hand. If the V. had signalled as she should have done before she ported, there would have been no collision; if the R. had not gone full speed ahead after the position of danger brought about by the action of the V. arose there would have been no collision. Held, that there was not a sufficient separation of time, place, or circumstance between the negligent navigation of the R. and that of the V. to make it right to treat the negligence of the R. as the whole cause of the collision and that both ships must be held to have been equally to blame. The law of contributory negligence at sea reviewed and applied. Judgment of the Court of Appeal, holding the R. alone to blame, and affirming the judgment of the President, reversed. Appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming the judgment of Duke, P., who found the Radstock alone to blame (House of Lords). Admiralty Commissioners v. Owners of the Steamship Volute; The Volute..... 530

18. Action by the Crown—Writ issued after the expiration of period provided by statute of limitation—Crown not expressly included in the statute—Statute of limitation, whether binding on the Crown—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.—Sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 provides: "No action shall be maintainable to enforce any claim or lien against a vessel or her owners in respect of any damage or loss to another vessel, her cargo or freight . . . caused by the fault of the former vessel, whether such vessel be wholly or partly in fault, or in respect of any salvage services, unless proceedings are commenced within two years from the date when the damage or loss or injury was caused or the salvage services were rendered. . . . Provided always that any court, having jurisdiction to deal with an action to which this section relates may, in accordance with the rules of court, extend any such period, to such extent, and on such conditions as it thinks fit, and shall, if satisfied that there has not during such period been any reasonable opportunity of arresting the defendant vessel within the jurisdiction of the court, or within the territorial waters of the country to which the plaintiff's ship belongs . . . extend any such period. . . . " Held, that this section is not binding on the Crown in an action in which the Crown is plaintiff. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Loredano.. 565

Government ownership—Damage caused to ship owing to an alleged misleading buoy—Petition of Right.—A steamship belonging to the appellants was proceeding to enter a Government floating dock under a contract for repairs. She had to pass a shoal where buoys had been placed, and in avoiding it struck a concealed rock. The appellants by a Petition of Right claimed damages, alleging that the Government authorities were under contractual liability to afford safe access to the dock, and were liable for the misleading character of the buoys. Held, that the petition failed as there was no warranty of the safety of the particular part of the channel where the rock was situated. Trinidad — Freight — Agreement to pay rebates on freight—Illegality by foreign law—Performance of contract of carriage—Liability to pay rebates.— Till 1917 the appellants, with other companies trading between Trinidad and the United States, allowed rebates on freights to traders exclusively shipping by their steamers. The appellants' chief office was in London, and they had branch offices in Trinidad and New York. After 1917 they discontinued the rebates, alleging that rebates had been declared illegal by an Act of Congress of the United States. Held, that the agreement to allow rebates could not be repudiated after the goods had been carried and the freight paid, since the lex loci contractus was British, and by British law there was no illegality in the rebate agreement, and the refusal to grant the rebate could not be supported even if the rebate

LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

1. Practice—Limitation of liability—Right to limit—Amount of bail—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.—In a collision action the defendants gave bail for the amount of their statutory liability under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, and affirmed that the collision occurred without their actual fault or privity. The plaintiffs filed a counter affidavit alleging privity. Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to bail to the full value of the defendants' vessel. (Hill, J.) The Charlotte 98

2. Reference — Claim statute-barred — Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503–504 —Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.—In a reference following a limitation suit, in which the decree was pronounced more than two years after the collision which gave rise to the suit had taken place, a claim was properly filed, but the claimant had issued no writ. Another claimant objected that the claim was statute-barred. Held, following The Bellcairn (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503, 582; 53 L. T. Rep. 686; 10 Prob. Div. 161), that the claimants had against each other the same rights which they had against the limiting shipowner and the same rights which he had against them. One claimant was, therefore, entitled to object that the claim of another was statute-barred, but, if the objection was based on sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, it was open to the court to exercise the discretion vested in it by that Act, and to allow a writ to issue. Observations on the exercise of this discretion where a writ had been withheld because limitation proceedings were pending. (Hill, J.) The Disperser 112

3. Dock owners—Dock owners also ship-repairers—Damage to ship under repair in dock—Dock not owned by ship repairers—Limitation claimed on repairers' dock—Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32), s. 2.—The plaintiffs were ship repairers and also owned a dock at Garston. The defendants were the owners of the steamship C. and of her cargo, and all other persons claiming to have sustained damage by reason of a fire which occurred on the C. on the 27th June 1918, owing to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants. The fire occurred while the C. was lying in a Liverpool dock not belonging to the plaintiffs, and was being fitted by the plaintiffs with mine-defence apparatus. The plaintiffs brought this limitation of liability action under sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, which provides that: "The owners of any dock or canal or a harbour authority or a conservatory authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any vessel or vessels, be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which such dock or canal owner . . . performs any duty or exercises any power." The plaintiffs sought to limit their liability to 30,281*l.*, which was the aggregate amount of 8*l.* a ton on the tonnage of the B., which was the largest registered British ship which within the period mentioned in the section had been within the area over which they performed any duty or exercised any power. Hill, J. held that the plaintiffs had incurred liability as ship repairers and not as dock owners, and not within any dock over which they exercised any power, and that they were not protected by the section merely because they owned a dock elsewhere. The plaintiffs appealed. Held, that, as the plaintiffs' liability was not connected with the fact that they were dock owners, they were not entitled to a decree of limitation of liability. (Judgment of Hill, J. affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) The City of Edinburgh 234

4. Fund—Claims by cargo owners and others—No claim by owners of the damaged ship—Proceedings pending abroad—Unliquidated claims—Rights of plaintiffs against limitation fund—Time for bringing in claims—Discretion—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503, 504.—Early in 1917, after a collision between two Norwegian vessels, the C. and K., the C.

PAGE

sank. In March 1917 the owners of the C.'s cargo began an action against the owners of the K. in the Admiralty Court. In May 1919 both vessels were pronounced to blame, and it was adjudged that the plaintiffs should recover half of the amount of their damage from the defendants. Thereupon the owners of the K. commenced a limitation action against the owners of the C., the owners of her cargo, and all persons claiming to have received damage by reason of the collision; and in Feb. 1920 a decree was pronounced limiting the liability of the owners of the K. to 8*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of the K., calculated in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894; and it was ordered that all claims be brought in within three months, and that claims not so brought in would be excluded from sharing in the limitation fund. Claims were filed by the owners of the C.'s cargo. The owners of the C. entered an appearance, but took no further steps in the limitation proceedings. In Feb. 1919 the owners of the C. had commenced an action in Norway against the owners of the K., and in June 1920, when the registrar made his report, the trial of the Norwegian action was still pending. The owners of the K. subsequently took out a summons asking that the report be not confirmed, and that they might have leave to file a claim against the fund in respect of any liability they might incur under the Norwegian proceedings. Hill, J. dismissed the summons. The plaintiffs appealed. Before their appeal was heard the Norwegian court had pronounced the K. two-thirds to blame, but had not assessed the damages. Held by Bankes and Atkin, L.JJ. (Younger, L.J. concurring on different grounds) (1) that the plaintiffs were not entitled under the limitation sections of the Merchant Shipping Act to have the distribution of the fund stayed; (2) that limitation proceedings do not contemplate claims by plaintiffs, and that the owners of the K. could not file a claim against the fund in their own right; (3) (Atkin, L.J. doubting) that if an application had been made in proper form the court would have had a discretion to extend the time before distributing the fund, in order to allow the plaintiffs to ascertain their liability under the pending Norwegian judgment and to apply to the court to adjust the distribution of the fund so that the plaintiffs might obtain credit for the amount to be paid under the Norwegian judgment; (4) but that, having regard to the lapse of time since the collision, the court had rightly exercised its discretion in refusing to postpone the distribution of the fund. Judgment of Hill, J. affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) The Kronprinz Olav 312

5. Tug and tow—Towage contract—Rope cast off by tug during performance of contract—Damage to tow—Breach of towage contract—"Improper navigation or management" of the tug—Limitation of tug owners' liability—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503—Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Shipowners' and Others' Liability) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32).—If a vessel which is being towed under a contract of towage is damaged by reason of the transfer of the towing rope from the engaged tug to another tug, the damage is caused by the improper navigation of the engaged tug, and not by a breach of the contract of towage. The owners of the engaged tug are therefore entitled to limit their liability in accordance with sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Vigilant 337

6. Vessel not equipped with proper ground tackle—Collision — Unseaworthiness — "Actual fault or privity" of owners—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.—Sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 casts the onus upon plaintiffs in limitation actions of showing that what happened occurred without their fault or privity. The B. C. was an unfurnished vessel not fully equipped with ground tackle, and not supplied with engine power. The builders (representing her owners) gave instructions that she should be towed from Cardiff to Bristol by two tugs. One tug was late in arriving, and the marine superintendent in charge started the towage with one tug only. The weather, which was not good, became unexpectedly worse, and the tow rope, which was rotten, broke. The B. C., only one anchor on board, and about forty-eight fathoms rope of wire, no cables, no windlass, and no hawse pipes. This equipment failed to hold her and she drifted across the bows of the J. E., a sailing vessel at anchor, doing her much damage. The owners of the B. C. claimed, under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, to limit their liability. Held, upon the advice of the nautical assessors, that the B. C. ought to have been furnished with at least two anchors and proper ground tackle, and that she was not seaworthy, that the collision was due to the lack of equipment, and that the builders (who were also owners of vessels) being aware of the facts as regards the equipment of the vessel, could not establish that the collision took place without their "actual fault or privity," within the meaning of the section, and were not, therefore, entitled to a limitation decree. Judgment of Duke, P. affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) The Bristol City 390

7. Tug and tows — Unregistered lighters — "Not recognised as a British ship"—"Ship"—"Every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars" — Right to limit liability —Tug towing five lighters—Common owner—Damage by tug and one lighter—Negligence—Liability, whether limited on tonnages of tug or her tows, or which of them—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 60), ss. 503, 508, 742—Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44), s. 1—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 85, sched. 2.—The owner of an unregistered ship is not deprived of the right to limit his liability under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 by reason of the fact that his ship has not been registered. The right to limit liability extended by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1898 as amended by sect. 85, sched. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 to the owners, builders and other parties interested in any ship built within His Majesty's dominions is an unqualified right, and is not restricted to such period after launching as may be necessary to effect registration. Lighters used for navigation in the transport of goods on the Thames, in tow of tugs and upon the tides, fitted with rudders and managed by their own crews, are ships within the meaning of sect. 742 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 The Mac (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555; 46 L. T. Rep. 907; 7 Prob. Div. 126) considered. Where damage is done jointly by several vessels belonging to the same owner—e.g., a tug and her tows, by the negligence of those on board some or one of them, the owner of these vessels is only entitled to limit his liability to an aggregate amount calculated upon the several tonnages of each of the vessels which might have been proceeded against in rem in respect of the damage done, since as the employer of all the negligent persons he might be held liable for all the damage, not only in each action in rem but in proceedings in personam. The Grayjarth, infrâ p. 517 (126 L. T. Rep. 675; (1922) P. 80) explained. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Harlow 498

8. Collision—Damage to ship and cargo—Action by the owners of the ship—"As owners of ship and her cargo"—Bail—Underwriters on cargo invited to join in proceedings—Refusal by some of the underwriters —Rights of those underwriters to share in sum subsequently recovered in the action—Right to intervene—Costs—Order XII., r. 24—It is the duty of the court, when by its process a sum has been recovered in Admiralty, to see that it goes to the persons entitled to claim, and it should be divided pari passu between them. The Glamorganshire (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; 59 L. T. Rep. 572; 13 App. Cas. 454) considered. Where a person sued as owner of a vessel and cargo and established the liability of the defendant to pay damages in respect of both ship and cargo, and certain of the cargo owners refused to, or elected not to, take their share in the expenses connected with establishing the liability, it was held that the cargo owners were not shut out from any benefit in the judgment. The steamer W. H. and her cargo was damaged in collision with the steamer J. V. The owners of the W. H. commenced an action "as owners of the W. H. and cargo," claiming for the damage sustained thereby. The owners of the J. V. gave an undertaking for bail in the sum of 100,000*l.*, which exceeded their statutory liability the owners of the W. H. giving bail in a like amount. The underwriters on the cargo of the W. H. were afterwards invited by the shipowners' solicitors to join the shipowners in the proceedings. Some of the underwriters did not assent to this proposal. Nevertheless, after judgment had been given against the J. V. these underwriters instructed the solicitors acting for the owners of the W. H., and those underwriters who had agreed to join with them in the litigation, to put forward claims against the sum obtained from the owners of the J. V. The solicitors agreed to do so, and received the documents supporting these claims. The total claims then exceeded the amount for which the owners of the J. V. had given bail, and for which they had been held liable. The owners of the W. H. and those underwriters who had joined with them in the litigation accordingly took up the position that those underwriters who had not agreed to join were not entitled to share in the fund before the court. At the reference the registrar reported that those underwriters who had refused to join in the litigation were nevertheless entitled to share in the fund on the ground that the writ had been issued in the names of the owners of the W. H. and her cargo, and that the solicitors of the owners of the W. H. and the other underwriters had agreed and consented to the underwriters who had at first refused to take part in the action subsequently becoming parties to it in its second stage. The owners of the W. H. and the underwriters who had joined in the action moved that this report be rejected. Held, on appeal, that all persons having a claim on the fund, including the non-assenting underwriters, were entitled to share in the distribution. Judgment of Hill, J. affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) The Joannis Vatis 506

9. Tug and tow belonging to same owner—Tow navigated by tug—Collision of tow with another vessel—Negligent navigation of tow by tug—Owners liable on tonnage of tow—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.—Where a tug and her tow belong to the same owners, and the tow is brought into collision with a third vessel by the negligence of the tug, the liability of the owners of the tug and her tow is not limited to a fund calculated upon the tonnage of the tug alone, notwithstanding that there was no negligence on the part of any person on board the tow. The owners are liable in respect of a sum calculated upon the tonnage of the tow. A barge was damaged in collision with another barge; the latter barge at the time of the collision was being towed by a tug which belonged to her owners. In an action in rem against the barge, her owners were held liable in personam on the ground that the collision was caused by the negligence of their servants on board the tug. The owners of the tug and tow then claimed to limit their liability under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 on the tonnage of the tug alone. Hill, J. held that they were entitled to do so. Held, that the judgment of Hill, J. should have been an ordinary judgment in rem against the owners of the tow because of the improper navigation of the tow through the acts of the defendants' servants on the tug and that the tow and not the tug was the vessel in relation to which liability should be limited under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Judgment of Hill, J. reversed. (Court of Appeal.) The Ran: The Graygarth 517

10. Claims settled abroad—Limitation fund—Right of the plaintiff to claim for the amount paid in settlement of claims abroad—"Claims"—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.—Where the plaintiff in a limitation suit has settled claims abroad arising out of the collision in respect of which the decree of limitation has been obtained, he is entitled to bring payment of such claims into consideration before the registrar when the administration of the limitation fund is decided upon. Proof of such payment may be brought before the registrar notwithstanding that such payment was made under a foreign system of limitation, or for an amount not limited according to the English rule of limitation. It is not material that the claimants to whom such payments were made were not subject to the jurisdiction of the court. The steamer D. and her cargo were sunk in collision with the steamer C. After the collision the C. put into a French port, where her owners were forced to give bail in order to secure her immunity from arrest at the suit of the owners of the D. Bail was given in an amount equal to the value of the C. at that time, which was the full amount of the liability of her owners under the law of France. In subsequent proceedings in France the C. was held alone to blame, and her owners were condemned on the amount of their bail and costs. The owners of the C. discharged the judgment debt and then commenced proceedings to limit their liability in England. A decree of limitation was pronounced and at the subsequent reference a claim was filed by the owners of the cargo laden on the D., and the owners of the C. themselves also filed a claim for the amount they had paid under the judgment in France, together with their costs in the French proceedings. The registrar allowed their claim for the amount paid to the owners of the D., i.e., the amount of the statutory liability of the owners of the C. in France. Held, on appeal from the registrar, that the claim was properly allowed. Leycester v. Logan (26 L. J. Ch. 306) and The Crathie (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256; 76 L. T. Rep. 534; (1897) P. 178), followed. The Kronprinz Olav (inf. à p. 312; 125 L. T. Rep. 684; (1921) P. 52) distinguished. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Coaster 560

11. Docks—Negligence—Collision with gates—Dock-owner's rights of detention—Statutory powers of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board—Limitation of liability—Priorities—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 94—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503, 504—Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32), ss. 1, 3—Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. xii.), s. 7.—The plaintiffs' steamship C., lying in a dock belonging to the defendants, the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, negligently crashed through the dock gates into the river, carrying with her a number of other craft. The C. herself had to be beached by tugs, and the defendants' assistant marine surveyor certified that she was "in a sinking condition" in the river, and, in his judgment, "an obstruction, impediment, or danger," or likely so to become, to the safe and convenient navigation of the port. The defendants then patched, docked, and repaired the C. at a cost of 1048*l.* The damage negligently done to the defendants' docks and works amounted to 10,014*l.* The plaintiffs instituted proceedings for limitation of liability. The defendants claimed the right to detain the C. under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 until the plaintiffs had paid the sum of 5000*l.*, the statutory amount of the plaintiffs' liability calculated in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Acts, and in addition the sum of 1084*l.* The plaintiffs issued a writ in detinue, alleging that the detention of the C. was wrongful. The

C. was released on payment of 5000*l.* into court by the plaintiffs. By sect. 94 of the above-named Act of 1858 a vessel negligently doing damage to any works belonging to the Dock Board may be detained until the amount of the damage, or a deposit for the estimated amount has been paid. By sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 a shipowner's right of limitation of liability under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is extended to all cases where, without his actual fault or privity, any loss or damage is caused to property of any kind, whether on land or water, by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; and by sect. 3 the limitation under the Act applies "whether the liability arises at common law or under any general or private Act of Parliament and notwithstanding anything contained in such Act." By sect. 7 of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 the Dock Board may remove the wreck of any vessel or any vessel sunk or stranded within the port which, in the judgment (written and duly recorded) of the marine surveyor or his assistant, is an obstruction, impediment, or danger to the safe use of the port, or likely, in his judgment, so to become, and the Board may sell the wreck or vessel and out of the proceeds retain the expenses to which they have been put. Similar rights are given to harbour and conservancy authorities by sect. 530 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1984. Duke, P. held (a) that until a limitation decree was made the detention of the C. under sect. 94 of the Act of 1858 was permissible; but (b) that afterwards the section did not give the defendants priority over other claimants to the limitation fund; that the fund must be distributed rateably; and that the liability of the plaintiffs to the defendants upon which the lien of the defendants depended was reduced in proportion as the total claims exceeded the plaintiffs' limited statutory liability; and he directed that the 5000*l.* should be transferred to the credit of the limitation action; (c) that the C. was a vessel "stranded" and "likely to become an obstruction, impediment, or danger to navigation," and that accordingly the defendants were entitled to recover the sum of 1048*l.* under this head. Both parties appealed. Held, by Atkin and Younger, L.JJ. (Lord Sterndale, M.R. dissenting) that, after the limitation of liability decree, the defendants were entitled to hold the deposit only until they were paid their rateable proportion of the amount of the plaintiffs' limited liability; that under the Merchant Shipping Acts the defendants had a lien until they actually received such payment, and that the order of the president transferring this deposit to the credit of the limitation action was wrong. Held, further, by the whole court, that the C. was a vessel "stranded" and "likely to become an obstruction, impediment or danger to navigation," that the judgment of the assistant marine surveyor was sufficiently certified so as to comply with sect. 7 of the defendants' Act of 1912; and that, therefore, the defendants were entitled to recover the said 1048*l.* Judgment of Duke, P. (1921) P. 279) affirmed subject to a variation. (Court of Appeal.) The Countess [Since reversed by House of Lords.—ED.] 581

1. Lloyd's policy—Total loss—Treaty of Peace—Ratification—Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 1.—On the 2nd Nov. 1918 the defendant agreed by a policy of insurance to make a payment to the plaintiff "in the event of peace between Great Britain and Germany not being concluded on or before the 30th June 1919." By the Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 59), passed before the end of hostilities, it was provided that, for the purpose of construing written instruments, except where the context of the instrument which the Act is invoked to construe "otherwise requires," the date of the termination of the war should be fixed by an Order in Council, and should be as nearly as may be the date on which ratifications of the treaty should be exchanged or deposited by the belligerents. A treaty of peace was signed on the 28th June 1919. On the 1st July 1919 a Royal Proclamation was issued proclaiming that a definite treaty of peace had been concluded. Ratifications were deposited by the 10th Jan. 1920, but no Order in Council had been made at the time of the trial. Held, that the expressions "conclusion of peace" and "termination of the war" refer to the same date, and that, in the absence of any special provisions in the instrument itself, the conclusion of peace contemplated by the parties must mean the exchange or deposit of ratifications, which took place on the 10th Jan. 1920. Held, also, that the plaintiff did not act prematurely in commencing his action on the 21st Aug. 1919, since the Order in Council, when it is issued under 8 & 9 Geo. 5, s. 1, sub-s. 1, must fix approximately the date on which the ratifications were exchanged. (Roche, J.) Kotzias v. Tyser 16

2. Perils of the sea—War risks—"Free of capture and seizure" clause—Unascertained cause of loss—Proper inference to be drawn from the facts.—If no news has been received of the fate of a vessel which set out on a voyage, part of which would take her into an area known to be infested with enemy submarines, the Court of Appeal held that it was to be inferred that she was lost by war perils rather than by the perils of the sea, as on the facts there were no circumstances likely to prevent her from reaching the area where the danger lay. The decision in Munro Brice and Co. v. War Risks Association (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 312; 118 L. T. Rep. 708; (1918) 2 K. B. 78) overruled on the proper inference to be drawn from the facts. (Court of Appeal.) Munro Brice and Co. v. Martin; Same v. The King 45

3. War risk—Warship on voyage to pick up convoy—Collision with merchant vessel—Absence of navigation lights—"Consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."—A steamship, which was insured by underwriters against war risks, and by other underwriters against marine risks, was proceeding in a convoy at night, on the 23rd July 1917, without lights by orders of the Admiralty, when she came into collision with a warship also proceeding without lights. The warship was on her way to a port to take up duty as an escort to another convoy. The war risks policy covered "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations by or against the King's enemies." The arbitrator found that neither vessel was guilty of negligence; and he awarded that the war risks underwriters must bear the loss. Bailhache, J. held that the warship was at the time of the collision engaged in a warlike operation, and that the loss was a consequence of the operation. Held, on appeal, that the case was covered by Ard Coasters v. The King (36 Times L. Rep. 555) and British Steamship Company v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879); and that therefore the war risks underwriters were liable. Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed. 4. F.c. and s. clause—Warlike operations—War or marine risk.—Appeals from Court of Appeal in the cases of the vessels P. and M. The owners of the P., which vessel was sunk by collision with another merchant vessel when both ships were navigating without lights in obedience to war emergency regulations, claimed compensation from the Admiralty Commissioners to whom the P. was chartered. Under the charter-party the Admiralty assumed liability for the losses excepted from the usual marine policy by the f.c. and s. clause. In the case of the M. the vessel was insured against war risks in addition to her usual marine policy. The dispute was in substance whether a loss sustained whilst the vessel was sailing in convoy, accompanied and controlled by warships, was a loss excepted by the f.c. and s. clause of the marine policy. Held (Lord Cave and Lord Shaw dissenting in the case of the M.), that the loss of neither vessel was approximately caused by hostilities or warlike operations, and that the loss in both cases was due to a marine, not to a war risk. Sects. 30 and 31 of the Naval Discipline Act 1866 and the relationship between convoy and escort considered. The nature of warlike operations discussed. Decisions of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507, 513; 121 L. T. Rep. 553, 559; (1919) 2 K. B. 670) affirmed. 5. Undisclosed risk—P.p.i. policy—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 4—Principal and agent—Employment to make a void contract—"Void as against public policy"—Nominal damages.—The plaintiffs were warehousemen, and employed the defendants, who were insurance brokers, to obtain for them a policy of insurance against loss by the non-arrival of certain cargoes which the plaintiffs were to receive into their warehouse. The defendants effected a policy, but failed to disclose to the underwriter that one of the risks against which the plaintiffs desired insurance was the diversion of the cargo by the order of the Government. On a slip attached to the policy there appeared a p.p.i. clause. The cargo was diverted by the Government, and the plaintiffs suffered substantial loss. In an action by the plaintiffs against the underwriter it was held that there was non-disclosure by the plaintiffs' agent, and the plaintiffs failed to recover on the policy. They accordingly commenced the present proceedings against the defendants for negligence and breach of duty. The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the policy which they were instructed to procure was void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 by reason of the p.p.i. clause, and by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest. Held, by McCardie, J., (1) that the defendants were negligent in failing to disclose the risk; (2) that the plaintiffs must, or ought, to have understood the nature of the p.p.i. clause; (3) that sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 must be taken to mean that a policy containing a p.p.i. clause is void, even if the party has an insurable interest; (4) therefore, in this case, it was unnecessary to inquire whether the plaintiffs possessed any insurable interest; (5) although it was probable that the underwriter, had the full risks been disclosed to him, would have honoured the policy notwithstanding the p.p.i clause, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover nominal damages, since a contract to procure a contract "void as against public interest" could not give rise to such a claim. The plaintiffs were not entitled to substantial or nominal damages. The plaintiffs appealed. Held, by the Court of Appeal, that sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 rendered void as against public policy a policy of insurance containing a p.p.i. clause, even though the insured might have a legal insurable interest, and that although the clause appeared on a detachable slip, in accordance with a commercial practice, it must nevertheless be taken to form part of the contract. Decision of McCardie, J. affirmed. Semble, that apart from statutory enactments a policy containing a p.p.i. clause may be had on grounds of public policy generally. Semble, also, if the contract had been to procure a void, and not illegal, contract the plaintiff might have been entitled to some damages. 6. Cargo—Lloyd's notify casualty—Notice ignored by insurers—Reinsurance policy effected after loss—Non-disclosure of material facts—Insurers deemed to have known of the loss—Loss not known to reinsurers—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 6, sub-s. 1; s. 18, sub-ss. 1, 3; s. 19.—Where the plaintiffs, who had insured a cargo (lost or not lost) effected through their brokers a reinsurance of the same cargo some hours after both parties had received from Lloyd's the usual casualty slips notifying them that the cargo had sustained damage by a peril insured against, which slips both parties had overlooked, it was decided by Bailhache, J. that a fire in the steamship was a circumstance which the plaintiffs ought to have disclosed to the defendants if they had known it, and, if the casualty slip had been duly attended to as it ought to have been, the plaintiffs must be deemed to have known of the fire in time to have communicated the information to their brokers and to the defendants before the latter wrote the risk; and that therefore the action failed. The plaintiffs appealed. Held, that the decision of Bailhache, J. was right and must be affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) London General Insurance Company Limited v. General Marine Underwriters' Association Limited 94

7. Marine risks—War risks—Ship chartered by Admiralty—Partial loss by marine risks—Unrepaired damage—Total loss by risk not covered by policy—Liability of marine underwriters.—When a vessel insured against perils of the sea is damaged by one of the risks covered by the policy and before that damage is repaired she is lost, during the currency of the policy, by a risk which is not covered by the policy, then the insurer is not liable for such unrepaired damage. The respondents' steamship E. was insured against marine risks only (including particular average) with the appellants, under a time policy dated the 16th March 1917. The steamship was under charter to the Admiralty on the T. 99 form, under which the Admiralty contract to pay for the loss by war risks of steamers chartered to them, the value to be ascertained at the date of the loss. The E. was sunk by submarine attack on the 25th Jan. 1918, during the currency of the time policy with the appellants. The steamship, before she was lost, had sustained some damage by risks insured against during the currency of the same policy, which had depreciated her value at the date of her total loss by the sum of 1770*l.* The Admiralty accordingly paid the owners 1770*l.* less than they otherwise would have paid, and the owners contended that the marine risk underwriters must make good that sum. The underwriters contended that they were not liable to pay for damage to a vessel, if, before repairs, the damage was followed by total loss during the currency of the same policy. Bailhache, J. decided that the underwriters were not liable for such unrepaired damage, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal. Held, that the judgment of Bailhache, J. was right and should be restored. Livie v. Janson (1810, 12 East, 648) approved and followed. Decision of the Court of Appeal, which court sought to distinguish Livie v. Janson (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 578; 122 L. T. Rep. 615; (1920) 2 K. B. 643), reversed. 8. Insurance upon hull and machinery—Dangerous cargo — Material circumstances — Disclosure—Waiver—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 18.—Sect. 18, sub-sect. 1, of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, provides: "Subject to the provisions of this section, the assured must disclose to the insurer, before the contract is concluded, every material circumstance which is known to the assured, and the assured is deemed to know every circumstance which, in the ordinary course of business, ought to be known to him. If the assured fails to make such disclosure, the insurer may avoid the contract." Sub-sect. 2: "Every circumstance is material which would influence the judgment of a prudent insurer in fixing the premium, or determining whether he will take the risk." Sub-sect. 3: "In the absence of inquiry the following circumstances need not be disclosed, namely:— . . . (b) Any circumstance which is known or presumed to be known to the insurer. The insurer is presumed to know matters of common notoriety or knowledge, and matters which an insurer in the ordinary course of his business, as such, ought to know; (c) Any circumstance as to which information is waived by the insurer." Policies of insurance were effected upon the hull and machinery of the vessel E. R. at and from ports in the United States to ports in France and back to ports in the United States. The E. R. was an American wooden four-masted motor schooner, built in 1918, of 784 tons gross and 695 tons net registered tonnage, and of 1461 dead-weight capacity. Her certificate of registry described her as a gas screw auxiliary schooner. At the date of the insurance the owners had contracted for the vessel to carry 100,000 gallons of petrol in 2500 iron drums from New Orleans to Bordeaux; but the owners did not disclose this circumstance to the insurers. She had also on board large quantities of oil fuel for her own use. The cargo was carried safely to Bordeaux, where it was discharged; but on the voyage back to the United States the ship was totally lost by a peril insured against. Petrol in drums is a frequent cargo for vessels crossing the Atlantic. The insurers pleaded that the policies were voidable by reason of the non-disclosure of the contract to carry the 2500 drums of petrol. Held, that the insurers could not avoid the policies because under the circumstances they had waived disclosure of the freight contract by not making inquiry. Query, whether on the facts of the case the freight contract was a material circumstance requiring disclosure. Judgment of Greer, J. reversed. (Court of Appeal.) Mann, MacNeil, and Steeves Limited v. Capital and Counties Insurance Company Limited; Same v. General Marine Underwriters Limited 225

9. Time policy on houseboat at anchor—Liberty to shift—"Including all risk of docking"—Houseboat lost while being towed to dock—Abandonment of insured adventure.—The respondent insured his houseboat, the D., by a time policy "whilst anchored in a creek off Netley, however employed, with liberty to shift." The policy contained a clause, "Including all risk of docking, undocking, changing docks, and going on gridirons, or graving docks, as may be required during the currency of this policy." During the currency of the policy he wished to have the D. cleaned, and she was taken from the river Hamble up Southampton Water to a yard on the Itchen (a distance of about seven miles), which was the nearest and most convenient yard. The D. was lashed alongside a tug, and thus towed up the Itchen, and on arrival it was found that some of the side seams above the water-line were defective, and the bow wave made by the tug raised the water to the level of the defective seams, with the result that water entered and she sank. The respondent did not know that the seams were defective, and the towage was performed in the manner usual in Southampton Water. At the time when the houseboat left the Hamble the respondent did not intend to take her back during the currency of the policy, but to lay her up in the Itchen. On an action on the policy brought by the respondent: Held, that the taking of the houseboat to the yard was authorised by the docking clause in the policy, and therefore the vessel was covered when the loss occurred; that the vessel was lost through peril of the sea; and the respondent had not at the time of the loss abandoned the insured adventure. Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 534; 122 L. T. Rep. 300; (1920) 1 K. B. 477) affirmed. (House of Lords.) Mountain v. Whittle 255

10. All risks—"Casualty"—Bales of wool damaged by water—Deck cargo—Usage—"In the absence of any usage to the contrary"—Proof—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 55, sub-s. 2 (a); s. 78, sub-s. 4; sched. 1, r. 17.—Under an "all-risk policy" it is sufficient for the plaintiff to prove that the loss was caused by some fortuitous circumstance or casualty without proving the exact nature of the accident or casualty which, in fact, occasioned the loss. The expression in rule 17 of the rules in the first schedule to the Marine Insurance Act 1906 "in the absence of any usage to the contrary" deck cargo must be specifically insured and not under the general denomination of goods contemplates a usage in a trade and not a usage in the insurance business, and the rule is not intended to alter, and has not altered, the common law on the subject. Therefore, where there is a usage to carry goods of a particular kind on deck, the insurer is liable to the insured although deck cargo is not specifically insured. Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 560; 122 L. T. Rep. 406; (1920) 1 K. B. 903) affirmed. (House of Lords.) British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company v. Gaunt 305

11. War risk—Collision between merchant ship and warship—No navigation lights—"Consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."—Two merchant vessels, while navigating at night without lights, in accordance with Admiralty orders, were sunk in collisions, the one by a patrolling destroyer and the other by an armoured cruiser on her way to take up the duty of escorting a convoy. The question in each case was whether the loss was due to a "war" risk, which, in the case of the A., was a risk undertaken by the Admiralty, who had requisitioned the ship; and in the case of the L. was a risk accepted by the appellant insurance company. Both merchant ships were insured against ordinary marine risks, and also by their policies against "consequences of hostilities and warlike operations." Bailhache, J. decided that both the destroyer and the cruiser were engaged in "warlike operations," and therefore that the ships were not lost by ordinary marine risks but as the consequence of warlike operations, and that the war risk underwriters were liable. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision. Held, that the orders appealed from were right, and both appeals must be dismissed on the grounds stated by Bailhache, J. and endorsed by the Court of Appeal. Decision of the Court of Appeal, in the first case reported 36 L. T. Rep. 555, and in the second case reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46;

12. Loss of ship—Discovery of documents—Ship's papers—Action on policy by mortgagee—Duty to disclose documents and to obtain documents for disclosure—Affidavits by owner and other persons interested.—The mortgagees of a ship sued on a policy insuring the ship against war risks. The ship was alleged to have been lost at sea off the east coast of Spain in Feb. 1921 by striking a mine. She was insured against war risks to an amount greatly exceeding the amount of the mortgages. The defence was that the ship had been wilfully lost by her master and crew with the connivance of her owner. Held, that the action should be stayed until the plaintiffs should make a proper affidavit of ship's papers, and should procure an affidavit from persons interested, and especially from the owner; or should satisfy the court that they had employed all possible means to procure such affidavits. In an action upon a policy of marine insurance, a plaintiff must disclose every material document in his possession and in the possession of other persons interested; or else he must show that he has made every effort to obtain these documents and failed. He must also account on oath for the disappearance of any material documents which have been in the possession of himself or of other persons interested. Otherwise the action will be stayed. Fraser v. Burrows (1877, 2 Q. B. Div. 624) overruled. (Court of Appeal.) Graham Joint Stock Shipping Company Limited v. Motor Union Insurance Company Limited 445

13. Requisition—War risk—Vessel requisitioned by Australian Government—Collision—Loss of vessel—Colliding vessel carrying ambulance wagons from one military base to another—Warlike operation—War risk or marine risk.—In 1916 the claimants' vessel G., which had been requisitioned by the Australian Government under a charter-party by which the Government accepted war risks usually excluded by the f.c. and s. clause, collided with another vessel, which had also been requisitioned. The latter vessel at the time of the collision was carrying ambulance wagons between two war bases. Both vessels were travelling without lights in accordance with Admiralty instructions. The G. was not at the time of the loss engaged in hostilities or warlike operations. Held (affirming the decision of Bailhache, J.), that having regard to the circumstances surrounding the date at which the collision occurred (of which the court took judicial notice) the colliding vessel was carrying out an operation of war at the time of the collision, and that the loss of the claimants' vessel was due to a war risk and not to a marine risk. (Court of Appeal.) Peninsular and Oriental Branch Service v. Commonwealth Shipping Representative 522

14. Marine insurance—Policy—Gaming or wagering—Loss in event of peace not being declared by date named—P.p.i. clauses—Insurable interest—P.p.i. clauses detached and not detached at time of claim—Short slips—No mention of p.p.i.—Instructions for insertion of in long slips—Rectification—Life Assurance Act 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48)—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 4.—The risk insured against by certain policies of insurance or re-insurance issued on marine insurance forms and containing the p.p.i. and f.i.a. clauses, meaning "policy proof of interest" and "full interest admitted," was a total loss in the event of peace not being declared on or before a certain date. The company also issued policies of marine insurance or re-insurance to which were attached at the date on which they were signed the detachable p.p.i. clause which at the time at which the claims were made on the policies were in some cases detached and in other cases not detached. The short slips for these marine policies contained no mention of p.p.i., but the long slips or concluding instructions did contain instructions for the insertion of the p.p.i. clause. On the question being raised by the voluntary liquidator of the company as to the validity of these policies, Held, that though the provisions of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 were not applicable to the peace policies they were insurances within the meaning of the Life Assurance Act 1774 and insurances on an event in which the assured had no interest or insurances by way of gaming or wagering within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Act of 1774 and therefore illegal and no premiums paid on them were recoverable. The fact that the policies were re-insurance policies and that the re-assured had paid under the policies which they had issued did not enable the claims to be substantiated. Held also, that the marine insurances were void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, being policies which at the time of issue had the detachable p.p.i. clause attached, and whether such clause was detached or not detached at the time the claim was put forward made no difference; the court would not rectify such policies as the long slips contained instructions for the insertion of the p.p.i. clause, and therefore the policies contained the real terms agreed upon. 1. Prize Claims Committee—Sums paid by Treasury on recommendation of committee not recoverable against Naval Prize Fund—Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30), Part II. of Schedule, par. 4.—The Treasury, having, on the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee, paid various claims made in respect of ships condemned as prize and declared to be droits of the Crown, claimed to be repaid out of the Naval Prize Fund None of the claims could have been established in the Prize Court. Held, that the sums paid were not repayable out of the Naval Prize Fund, as they were not claims which could have been established in a Prize Court. (Naval Prize Tribunal.) The Adolph and other vessels 192

2. Joint capture—Co-operation and joint expedition of land and sea forces—Droits of Admiralty—Droits of the Crown—Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30).—During the final campaign in German East Africa, in pursuance of a concerted operation by naval and military forces, the port of Dar-es-Salaam was captured by naval forces, military forces entering the town some four or five hours after its surrender. The German steamship F. was at Dar-es-Salaam at the time. Held (Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson dissenting), that the facts proved a joint enterprise; but that the capture of the F. was a capture by naval forces alone, not a joint capture by naval and military forces. Held, by the whole tribunal, that the law applicable to the division of the proceeds of joint captures was that that part which ought to be appropriated to the navy is a droit of the Crown and therefore will be directed to be paid to the Naval Prize Fund under the Naval Prize Act 1918; and that that part which ought to be appropriated to the army is a droit of the Admiralty, and therefore will be paid to the Exchequer to be dealt with as the Crown may be pleased. (Naval Prize Tribunal.) The Feldmarschall 299

3. Naval Prize Fund—Neutral ship ordered into port for examination—Loss of ship and cargo—Ship and cargo not liable to condemnation—Negligence of the prize crew—Negligence of the ship's master—Claims by the owners—Admission of liability by the Admiralty—Money paid in settlement—Amount chargeable on the Naval Prize Fund—Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30), sched. part II., par. 5.—The C., a neutral vessel, was stopped by a British cruiser and sent into port under a prize crew for examination. By an error of the navigating officer she was lost before reaching the examination port. It subsequently appeared that the cargo on board the C. was not contraband, that the C. had not committed any un-neutral act, and that if she had reached port she would have been released after examination. Claims by the neutral owners for the loss of the C. and her cargo were eventually admitted by the Government, and certain sums were paid to them in compensation. The Treasury claimed to have these sums charged on the Naval Prize Fund under part II. (5) of the schedule to the Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30), which provides that there shall be charged on and payable out of the Naval Prize Fund "costs, charges, expenses and claims which the tribunal consider may reasonably be treated, having regard to the principles any practice heretofore observed by prize courts, as being costs, charges, and claims which, had there been a grant of prize to captors, captors would have been liable to pay." At the hearing it appeared that the loss of the C. was due to her speed having been inaccurately given to the Prize officer by her master, and not to the negligence of the Prize officer. Held, that an unconditional admission of liability by the Government did not constitute binding and unrebuttable evidence that there was a liability, nor relieve the Naval Prize Tribunal of determining for themselves whether a claim was to be treated as one which the captors would have been liable to pay having regard to the principles and practice heretofore observed by prize courts. But in view of the difficulty of defending the case in the Prize Court, and of the fact that the admission of the Government had perhaps saved the fund from an adverse decision, such sum as might reasonably have been paid to effect a settlement ought to be charged on the Prize Fund. Half the sums paid ordered to be charged on the Prize Fund. (Naval Prize Tribunal.) The Canadia 606

NECESSARIES.

1. Necessaries—Action in rem—Payments in respect of the cargo—Liability of the ship—Necessaries to the ship.—The agents at New York of a steamship made payments in connection with her discharge at New York. In an action against the steamship in rem to recover these disbursements as necessaries it was contended that they were made in respect of the cargo only, and were not necessaries to the ship. Held, that payments though made in respect of the cargo were necessaries to the ship if she could not go on her business without them. As the business of the ship consisted in entering the port of New York, discharging her cargo, and leaving the port, payment of charges which, being unpaid, would prevent her from doing any of these things was necessary to the ship, notwithstanding that the amount disbursed did not become due, nor was the disbursement made, until after the ship had left New York. Quay rent for cargo, and the cost of destroying putrid cargo, were necessaries to the ship, since by the law of New York she was liable for these charges, and could have been prevented from sailing had they not been paid. (Hill, J.) The Arzpeitia 426

2. Necessaries—Master's wages—Master also part owner—Priorities—Foreign law—Sale of ship abroad—Right of foreign government to tax proceeds—Sale by order of the court—Practice—Judgment by default—Payment out of court.—The claim for wages and disbursements of a master who is also part owner of a ship ranks after the claims of persons who have supplied necessaries to that ship, since the master is personally liable to such persons. The Jenny Lind (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; 26 L. T. Rep. 591; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 529) considered and followed. A foreign government which is by foreign law entitled to a percentage on the sale price of ships voluntarily sold out of its national registry is not entitled to claim such percentage when the ship is sold by the marshal in a default action in rem. When a party has obtained judgment in a default action, he is entitled to move for payment out, but must give notice of that motion to any person who has intervened or entered caveats against payment out. If any other claimants to the fund want to be in a position to resist payment out they must, to entitle them to be heard, intervene or enter caveats. (Hill, J.) The Eva 424

PRACTICE.

1. Lump sum tender to separate salvors in consolidated action—Costs—Separate representation of master and crew.—The owners of two salving vessels issued a writ for salvage whilst the masters and crews of the same vessels issued another against the same defendants. On the actions being consolidated, the conduct was given to the owners and not to the masters and crews. The defendants tendered 400*l.* to all the plaintiffs. The owners delivered a reply putting the sufficiency of this tender in issue, but no reply was delivered by the masters and crews. The defendants supplied no affidavit of value to the plaintiffs until the day of the trial. Held, (1) that the tender in the present case was sufficient; (2) that in a consolidated salvage action tender of a lump sum to separate salvors is a good tender; (3) that, having regard to the time when the affidavit of values was handed to the plaintiffs, they acted reasonably in continuing the action after the tender was made, and should have the whole of their costs; (4) that the masters and crews, whose interests were in this case identical with those of their owners, were not entitled to the costs of separate representation; (5) that if any conflict should arise in any future case between tug owners and the masters and crews of tugs, it could only be a conflict as to apportionment in which defendants are not interested. The proper course for masters and crews to adopt in such a case was not to ask for an apportionment at the hearing, and then afterwards, failing agreement with their owners as to apportionment, to take proceedings for apportionment. (Hill, J.) The Crete Forest 48

2. German claimants—Judgment entered before the war—Rights of claimants to proceed to reference after ratification of peace—Treaty of Peace between Allied, &c., Powers and Germany 1919, arts. 296–297.—Treaty of Peace Order 1919, s. 1, sub-ss. 16 and 17.—Before the war the defendants, who were German shipowners, recovered judgment against the plaintiffs, who were British, condemning the plaintiffs in damages for collision and ordering a reference for assessment of the said damages. The defendants had not filed their claim before the outbreak of war. The claim and vouchers were ultimately filed a few days before the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, but it was agreed that they should be taken as filed on a subsequent date. The plaintiffs then took out a summons to set aside the claim and vouchers on the ground that under the Treaty and the Order applying its provisions the parties were not entitled to litigate the claim, but must submit to settlement by the clearing houses. Held, that the defendants' claim was not a debt under arts. 296 of the Treaty, but was a right under art. 297, which was to be "retained and liquidated in accordance with the law of the Allied State concerned." There was nothing in art. 297, nor in the Treaty of Peace Order, s. 1, sub-ss. 16 and 17, to prevent the defendants from proceeding to a reference, although they might not touch the proceeds, nor to prevent the plaintiffs from paying money into court. (Hill, J.) The Marie Gartz 98

3. Maritime Conventions Act 191. s. 8—Motion to set aside writ—Proceedings commenced within two years—"Reasonable opportunity of arresting" defendant vessel.—The plaintiffs obtained leave, on an ex parte application, to issue a writ in March 1920 against the steamship L. L. claiming damages in respect of a collision which took place on Sept. 1917. At the time of the collision the L. L. was under requisition and no effective arrest could have been made. She ceased to be under requisition on the 21st March 1919, and from the 25th March 1919 until the 4th April 1919 she might have been arrested by the plaintiffs, but the plaintiffs could not have arrested her again until Feb. 1920, when she came within the jurisdiction of the court. Hill, J., holding that the plaintiffs had had no reasonable opportunity to arrest before Feb. 1920, granted leave in accordance with sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911. The owners of the L. L. moved to set aside the writ. Held, that leave had been properly granted. (Hill, J.) The Largo Law 104

4. Limitation of actions—Unconditional appearance to writ, whether waiver—Discretion—Writ in rem—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.—Services, alleged to be salvage services, were rendered in Dec. 1916 to a requisitioned vessel, subsequently lost in July 1918, by the master and crew of a tug. A writ in rem was issued on the 2nd April 1919, and service thereof was accepted by defendants' solicitors, who in the subsequent pleadings raised a defence under sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911. Held, that the unconditional appearance did not waive the defence under the statute. (Hill, J.) The Llandovery Castle 153

5. Costs—Party and party costs—Witnesses—Seafaring witness detained on shore pending trial—Order LXV., r. 27.—Where a seafaring witness has been detained on shore pending trial, the amount which he would otherwise probably have earned on a voyage is a guide to, but is not the sole basis of, determining what allowance for his attendance should be made on a party and party taxation, especially in the case where the voyage contemplated was risky or speculative in its nature. Reasonable compensation should be allowed, regard being had (inter alia) to the wages which a person of his class was earning at the time, to the value of his evidence, and to the question whether it could properly have been taken on commission. The fact that the witness could have been called to attend on subpœna and paid only a nominal sum should not be wholly ignored. (Court of Appeal.) The Ibis VI. 237

6. Diversion of ship by direction of Shipping Controller—Claim for compensation—Loss of use and expenses of diversion—Shipping Controller sued as individual—Practice—Government not bound by judgment against official as individual—Action

misconceived.—The steamship H. was in Sept. 1919 on a voyage from Newport to Alexandria with a cargo of coal. On the 30th Sept. 1919 she received a wireless message from the Shipping Controller, directing her to proceed with her cargo to Port Said. She arrived at Port Said on the 3rd Oct., and on the 7th Oct. the master was informed by the senior naval officer at Port Said that the Shipping Controller's direction to proceed to Port Said had been cancelled and that the vessel might proceed on her voyage to Alexandria. The vessel arrived at Alexandria on the 8th Oct., six days later than she would have done but for the Shipping Controller's direction to proceed to Port Said. The plaintiffs, the owners of the vessel, brought this action against the defendant, the Shipping Controller, claiming a declaration that they were entitled to compensation for the loss of the use of the vessel for the six days, and the expenses incurred by them in consequence of the direction given by the defendant under the Defence of the Realm Regulations, and that the amount of compensation should be referred for assessment. It was not disputed that the defendant was authorised by law to give the direction in question. By his defence the defendant pleaded that he was not rightly made a party to the action, and that no cause of action was disclosed in the statement of claim either against him personally or as Shipping Controller. Held, that the action was misconceived. The defendant could not be sued, either as an individual or as Shipping Controller. The Crown could not be bound by any judgment obtained in the action. The defect could not be regarded as trivial, and an application to cure the defect by substituting the Attorney-General as defendant could not be entertained. (Rowlatt, J.) Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company v. Maclay 283

7. Writ in rem—Issue of, when res not within jurisdiction—Renewal of writ after twelve months by leave—Extension of time—Order VIII., r. 1—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.—The master of a vessel lost his life in a collision with the E. on the 25th Feb. 1917. A writ in rem was issued by his widow on the 13th Dec. 1918, but was not served, as the E. had left the jurisdiction, and was not renewed within twelve months under Order VIII., r. 1. On the 19th March 1920 the E. was again within the jurisdiction; leave was granted on an ex parte application, and writ served. On motion to set aside writ: Held, (1) that a writ can be issued although at the time of the issue the res is not within the jurisdiction; (2) that the "commencement of proceedings" in sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 means commencement by issue of writ, not by arrest; (3) that, in general, leave to renew will not be granted if, but for the enlargement of time, the plaintiff's claim would be barred by a statute of limitations. But when an application is made to extend the time for the renewal of a writ in an action which comes within sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911—which is a limitation section of a very peculiar kind—the application must be considered on its merits, and the court must inquire whether the circumstances are such that the court would give leave to issue a writ notwithstanding that the time had expired. (Hill, J.) The Espanoleto ... 287

8. Action in rem—Bail—Solicitors undertaking to provide bail—Purported withdrawal from undertaking—Arrest of ship—Amount of bail—Nature of bail in Admiralty.—A solicitor who indorses upon the writ in an action in rem an undertaking to give bail, thereby securing the immunity of the ship from arrest, undertakes to provide bail in a sum equal to the value of the ship at the time when he enters into the undertaking. This obligation is not affected by subsequent fluctuation in the value of the ship. A solicitor who has given such an undertaking cannot afterwards withdraw from it, and invite the plaintiff to arrest the ship, and although the plaintiff does so, the solicitor will not necessarily be released from his obligation to provide bail. Nature of bail in Admiralty considered and contrasted with that of bail given in criminal proceedings. Miller v. James (8 Moore C. P. 208) held not to apply. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Borre 334

9. Costs—Seafaring witnesses—Proper allowance for a witness detained on shore.—A. B., the mate of the plaintiffs' trawler, was detained on shore from the 8th Nov. to the 3rd Dec. 1918, by the plaintiffs to give evidence against the steamer I. VI. which had damaged their trawler in collision. The I. VI. was held to blame, and the damages were agreed at 300*l.* Had A. B. not been detained he would have sailed on a fishing voyage on the 9th Nov., on which he would have earned 280*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* (which sum was actually earned by the mate who took A. B.'s place). The plaintiffs had paid this amount to A. B., and claimed to recover it on taxation. The assistant registrar allowed the item, and his decision was upheld by the President on appeal. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal, who held that the amount which A. B. would have received had he not been detained was not necessarily the measure of the sum which the plaintiffs should have paid him, though it was a factor to be considered in determining the sum properly payable to him. The case was sent back to the assistant registrar for reconsideration, and after further consideration he allowed 250*l.* The defendants appealed. Held, that, the assistant registrar having applied the true measure of damage indicated by the Court of Appeal, the court would not consider the accuracy of his application of that measure in point of amount. Decision of the Court of Appeal (The Ibis VI., sup. p. 237; 125 L. T. Rep. 378; (1921) P. 255) considered and explained. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Ibis VI. (No. 2) 427

10. Practice—Interpleader—Summons issued to the Crown—Power to make the Crown a claimant in interpleader proceedings—Register of shipping—"Government ships"—Registered owner—"His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller"—Evidence of ownership—Interpleader Act 1831 (1 & 2 Will 4., c. 58)—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 36), s. 25 (11)—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 1, 11, 64, 695, 741—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 80—Order in Council, the 29*th Sept.* 1917.—The Crown cannot be summoned to appear upon an interpleader summons or made a party to an interpleader issue. Under a writ of fi. fa. the sheriff seized in satisfaction of a judgment debt two vessels owned by a foreign corporation. The Crown then intimated that the vessels had been requisitioned and were the property of the Crown. The register showed that the registered owner of the vessels was: "His Majesty, represented by the Shipping Controller, London, sixty-four shares." There was no evidence that the ships were in the active service of the Crown, and they were in fact laid up. The judgment creditors disputed that the vessels were the property of the Crown, and the sheriff accordingly took out an interpleader summons calling upon the judgment creditors and the Crown to appear and state their claims. Hill, J. held that the vessels had been registered under sect. 80 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, and the Order in Council of the 29th Sept. 1917 made thereunder. They were not ships to which sect. 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applied, and therefore sect. 695 of that Act was applicable to them. By sect. 695 the entry in the register was evidence of the facts stated therein. In this case the facts so stated indicated no more ownership in the Crown than was described by sect. 80 (3) of the Act of 1906, which might amount to no more than a holding "by the Shipping Controller on behalf of or for the benefit of the Crown." Having regard to the fact that foreign owned ships and ships detained by the Prize Court under the Chile form of order were registered under sect. 80 of the Act of 1906

no certain inference could be drawn from the register as to the Crown's ownership whether legal or otherwise. On the objection that the Crown cannot be summoned to answer an interpleader, Hill, J. held that as the Crown did not consent to submit to the jurisdiction of the court the court had no power to order the Crown to do so. Interpleader proceedings, though they may not amount to maintaining an action against the Crown, come within the wider principle that the King cannot against his will be made to submit to the jurisdiction of the King's courts. Sect. 25 (11) of the Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66) does not make the old equity rule prevail, or apply to alter the rights of the Crown. The passage of Blackstone at vol. 1, chap. 7, par. 1 (quoted and approved by Brett, L.J. in The Parlement-Belge, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 42 L. T. Rep. 273; 5 Prob. Div. 197) applied and followed. The Court of Appeal upheld the decision of Hill, J. (Court of Appeal) The Mogileff (No. 2)..... 476

11. Interrogatories—Information sought on matters not alleged—Admissibility.—Interrogatories which aim at furnishing a plaintiff with proof of a cause of action not alleged in the pleadings, or with knowledge of the defendants' information on matters not required to be pleaded by them, are bad and will not be allowed. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship S. The defendants were two firms of ship repairers who were employed by the plaintiffs to repair the S. Whilst repairs were being carried out by the defendants a fire broke out on board, and the S. was damaged. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover for the damage to the S. it was alleged in the statement of the claim that the fire was caused by unscreened candles used by the defendants' workmen. By their defence defendants admitted that the S. was in their hands and under their control for repairs. They also admitted that the fire took place and denied negligence, but put forward no explanation of the cause of the fire. The plaintiffs obtained leave to deliver interrogatories relating to the alleged use of the candles, but the registrar refused leave to deliver the following interrogatory: "What do you say was the cause of the fire?" Held, that as the interrogatory appeared to be framed with the object of compelling the defendants to set up an affimative case, or, alternatively, to disclose their defence to the plaintiffs' case, it was properly disallowed. Decision of the President affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) The Shropshire 603

1. Neutral ship—Enemy stowaway—Unneutral service—Absence of facts justifying condemnation.—A German, who was a qualified third officer in the German mercantile marine was taken on board a Swedish ship at Pernambuco bound for a Danish port with the connivance of the captain. The stowaway was discovered at Halifax (Nova Scotia), after the captain made some attempt to conceal his presence on board. There was no evidence that the stowaway was carried at the expense of the German Government or that he intended to go to Germany. The captain had on board two bags of rubber which was contraband and was carried as a venture of his own. The Prize Court at Halifax condemned the vessel. Held, that on the facts of the case as proved there was no evidence of an unneutral service to support the decree of condemnation of the ship. Judgment of the Prize Court reversed. (Privy Council.) The Svithiod 9

2. Enemy goods — Cargo — Passing of property after seizure—"Sale" of draft to bankers.—On the 22nd July 1914 the appellant, a British subject carrying on business in Texas, sold 32,000 bushels of wheat to a German firm at Hamburg, payment to be made at Hamburg against shipping documents. The wheat was shipped on the 24th July in a British steamship, delivery to the order of the appellant, who indorsed the bills of lading in blank. The appellant drew on the buyers for the price in reichmarks and sold the draft, with the bill of lading and policy attached, through brokers to a bank in New York for dollars, with a special indorsement to that bank. The vessel sailed for Hamburg before the outbreak of the war, but was diverted to Liverpool, where the wheat was seized on the 22nd Aug. 1914. The New York bank indorsed the draft to bankers in Hamburg and forwarded it, with the documents, to them to collect, the documents being received in Hamburg about the 25th Aug. 1914. The draft, unpaid and unaccepted, was eventually returned to the bank. A writ claiming condemnation was issued on the 18th Sept. 1914, and the bank, and afterwards the present appellant, claimed the goods. Held, that the wheat could not be condemned as enemy goods since at the date of its seizure in prize it was not enemy property, and this general rule applied, although the property in the wheat had passed to an enemy before the issue of the writ claiming condemnation. Judgment of the Prize Court reversed. (Privy Council.) The Orteric 10

3. Negligence in effecting capture—Ship sunk after collision—Loss of goods—Action against Procurator-General — Responsibility — Prize Court Rules 1914, Order II., r. 3.—A neutral vessel, upon which the goods of the respondent, who was also a neutral, were laden, was lost owing to a collision with an English warship whilst the latter was effecting her capture. The Procurator-General subsequently instituted proceedings in prize against part of the cargo laden on the neutral, but it was admitted that the respondent's goods, and the vessel herself, were not liable to be condemned. The respondent sued the Crown and the Procurator-General, and obtained an order for the restoration of the value of his lost goods. Held, that under the Prize Court Rules 1914, whereby the Procurator-General was substituted for the actual captors, he was liable in such damages and costs as under the old procedure the actual captors were subject, and that the rules were not ultra vires so far as they imposed that liability. Observations in The Zamora (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144, 330; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77) followed. Judgment of Prize Court affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Oscar II. 14 mail from Holland to ports in the United States. All the securities had been recently purchased in Germany. Some were being forwarded to American buyers by Dutch agents; others had been bought by Dutch dealers for prompt resale in America, or for delivery in respect of sales already made there. Held, that the securities were not exempted from seizure as "postal correspondence" under Hague Convention No. 11, but, as documents of title, were "goods" within the intention of the Reprisals Order. Further, that, although they were not "enemy property," they must nevertheless be regarded as of "enemy origin" within the meaning of the Order, since they had recently formed part "of the common financial stock of Germany's holding in foreign securities." They were therefore liable to detention under the Order, but there was nothing to prevent a proper application being made for their release to the respondents. Judgment of the Prize Court varied. 5. Conditional contraband—Consignment of selling agent—Advances by agent—"Consignee to the goods"—Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914, cl. 1 (iii.).—By the Declaration of London Order, No. 2, of the 29th Oct. 1914, conditional contraband is liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port "if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods." Held, that an ordinary agent for sale who had not the real control of the destination of the goods was not a consignee of the goods within the meaning of the above order, even if he had advanced a large percentage of the value of the goods, and therefore goods so consigned could properly be condemned. The Louisiana (118 L. T. Rep. 274; (1918) A. C. 461, 471) applied. Judgment of the Prize Court affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Urna 32

6. Enemy vessel—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Impossibility to bring captured vessel into British port—Sinking of vessel—Unintentional violation of territorial rights—Claim by neutral Power—No order for restitution or damages—Hague Conference 1907, Convention XIII., art. 3.—An enemy vessel was captured in neutral territorial waters, the captors acting bonâ fide and without negligence. Subsequently the vessel was sunk by the captors. On a claim by the neutral Government for restitution of the value of the ship and for damages and costs, it was held that, since the captors acted reasonably, honestly, and without negligence, the claim for restitution of value and for damages and costs failed, although a claim for the restitution of the ship, had she still been afloat, would have succeeded. (The President, Sir Henry Duke.) The Valeria 55

7. Bonâ fide sale to neutral of enemy cargo—Effect of option to reject in contract—Completed voyage.—A German steamship had been lying in refuge at Lisbon, laden with certain goods, since the outbreak of war. The goods were owned by a company registered and carrying on business in Holland, though ninety-eight of its hundred shares were owned by Germans domiciled in Germany. On the 14th Feb. 1916 a contract of sale of the goods was made by the company with Dutch manufacturers who were buying bonâ fide for their own needs. On the 9th March 1916 Portugal declared war, as an ally, and later the German steamship was requisitioned and the goods landed on the quay. On the 14th March 1916 the ninety-eight shares in the company owned by the German subjects were assigned to a citizen of the Netherlands. In Nov. 1916, in pursuance of the contract of sale, the goods were shipped from Lisbon for delivery at Amsterdam in three vessels under three bills of lading, consigned as by the Dutch consul at Lisbon to the Netherlands Oversea Trust. Under the original bills of lading, which were two in number, the goods were consigned by the company for delivery to their order at Rotterdam. Held, following The Baltica (11 Moore P. C. 141), that claimants, the Dutch manufacturers, might at the date of their contract have acquired a good title to the goods which would have defeated the right of capture. But that as the contract made contained a clause enabling the buyer to refuse acceptance of the goods whereupon the seller should take back the goods and repay the purchase price there was no such absolute disposal of the goods by the vendor as would defeat the right of capture. The Bawean (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 255; 118 L. T. Rep. 319; (1918) P. 58) considered. The Baltica (sup.) followed. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Naxos and other ships 53

8. Territorial waters of neutral country—Rights of neutral State—Expenses of removal of vessel improperly seized—Restitutio in integrum.—The German steamship D. was captured, through an error of judgment in computing the three-mile limit, by a British man-of-war, in Norwegian territorial waters, and proceedings were taken in the Prize Court for her condemnation. The vessel was released by the Prize Court, but the Norwegian Government claimed from the British Government, in addition to the delivery up of the ship and her cargo or its proceeds, all costs fees, and expenses incidental to her removal and restitution, and an account of the profits made during the period of her requisition. The Prize Court rejected the demand on the ground that the violation of neutral waters was unintentional and the result merely of an error of judgment. The Norwegian Government appealed from so much of the order of the President as rejected their claim to costs and damages. Held, that the claimants were entitled to such expenses of removing the vessel from British to other waters as might fall or would ultimately fall on them, but they were not entitled to the costs and fees payable to the Marshal of the Prize Court or to any sum for the requisition of the ship. Decision of Lord Sterndale (14 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 478; 122 L. T. Rep. 237; (1919) P. 245) varied. (Privy Council.) The Dusseldorf 84

9. Enemy vessel—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Requisition by Admiralty—Claim for restitution by neutral Government—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XXIX.—Treaty of Peace with Germany, art. 297, and Annex 3 to Part 8.—Two German merchant vessels were captured by British warships in July 1917 after a chase which ended in Dutch territorial waters. Lord Sterndale held in subsequent proceedings (The Pellworm, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 490; 121 L. T. Rep. 488) in prize that there had been an unintentional violation of Dutch neutrality, and he therefore dismissed the claim of the Crown for condemnation and that of the Netherlands Government for damages and costs. Further consideration was adjourned, as the vessels had been requisitioned by the Admiralty under Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XXIX., upon the usual undertaking for payment of appraised values. Two of the vessels were subsequently sunk by enemy submarines. The Netherlands Government claimed release of the vessels and compensation. Held, that the capture created no proprietary right in the Netherlands Government, and that the claim was a claim in the right of the disseised enemy owners; that the requisition by the Crown was effectual to vest the property in the vessels in the Crown; that the claim was therefore for restitution in value by the payment of the appraised values of the vessels to a neutral Sovereign for the use of German owners; that such sums were within art. 297 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany, and must be retained to be dealt with pursuant to the Treaty. The claim of the Netherlands Government dismissed. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Pellworm and other vessels 101

10. Goods in Crown custody—Insurance by Marshal—Release—Owners' liability for premiums. — The Admiralty Marshal insured against fire, aircraft, and bombardment goods which had been seized as prize. The respondents were neutral owners of goods laden on two captured vessels. Subsequently, release of the goods was ordered, but they remained in the Marshal's custody for some time as the owners were unable to obtain shipment for them. The Marshal claimed a proportion of the premiums from the cargo owners as expenses chargeable against them. Held, that the proportion of the insurance premiums could not be recovered as part of the expenses of detention by the Marshal on delivery of the goods. Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported (1920) P. 209), affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Cairnsmore and The Gunda 162

11. Damages against the Crown—Right of search—Misconstruction of Orders in Council by naval officers—Diversion of ships in danger area—Order in Council of the 16th Feb. 1917.—Two Dutch vessels trading between French colonial territory and Holland were stopped by a British cruiser just outside the area declared by Germany to be a prohibited area in which any neutral vessel would be liable to be sunk by German submarines. The vessels had all the requisite documents of clearance from the French port, including an "acquit à caution"—a document permitting the export of the cargo—but had not got the "green clearances" which were given to vessels that had called at a British port. The naval officer ordered that the vessels should proceed to Kirkwall to be searched, and they were being taken there when they were torpedoed by a German submarine. In a suit for damages by the owners the Prize Court held that as there was no ground for detaining the vessels, or reasonable ground for thinking that they might prove subject to detention, the Crown was liable. Held, dismissing the appeal, that the Order in Council of the 16th Feb. 1917 did not require a vessel which had started from a British or Allied port to call at a British port for a clearance certificate. In the absence of anything connected with the ship or cargo which could give rise to suspicion that they might be liable to condemnation, the captors, whose action in this case was prompted by doubts as to the meaning of the Order in Council, not as to the character of the ship or her cargo, were liable in damages and costs. Judgments of Lord Stowell in The Oostzee (1855, 9 Moo. P. C. 150) and in The Luna (1815, 2 Dods. 48) considered. (Privy Council.) The Bernisse and The Elve 167

12. Contraband—Doctrine of infection—Transfer of ownership in transitu.—The law of prize contains two settled rules, one which refuses to recognise transfers of the ownership of movables afloat from an enemy transferor to a neutral transferee, when unaccompanied by actual delivery of the goods; and the other (known as the rule of infection) which condemns as if contraband any goods which, though not condemnable in themselves, belong or are deemed to belong when captured to the same owner as other cargo in the same vessel, which cargo itself is liable to condemnation as contraband. It is strictly with owners that these rules deal. The rule of infection does not rest on the personal culpability or complicity of the owner of the goods. "Infection" is not a quality of the goods themselves, but is an incident of the owner's position when the seizure is made and the captor's right arises. The rule as to infection has not been abrogated by the Declaration of Paris. The Declaration of London Order in Council (No. 2) dated the 29th Oct. 1914, was revoked by the Declaration of London Order in Council dated the 30th March 1916. 13. Seizure of contraband goods — Evidence of reasonable suspicion—Detention and refusal to release—Disclosure of documents—Discontinuance of proceedings—Licence required to remove goods—Interest on proceeds.—It is not a general rule that whenever the Crown has had the benefit of goods seized the claimant is entitled to interest if the goods are released to him. In 1915 tanning materials belonging to the appellants, a Swedish firm, were seized on board certain vessels on their way from America to Sweden as absolute contraband with an enemy destination. The matter was eventually settled and the Procurator discontinued his proceedings in 1919. The appellants claimed damages for the capture and detention of the goods and for the inaction of the Procurator-General after the appellants had disclosed their documents to him and had satisfied his requisitions. Held, that as there were reasonable grounds for the original seizure, and subsequent proceedings, and as there had been no delay for indirect objects or from mere neglect, and there were materials proper to be examined judicially, the Procurator-General was not liable to the appellants for damages for the seizure and detention. A decree for the release of goods does not warrant actual ability to remove them from the realm, and the Procurator-General is not liable for a loss on the goods owing to a statutory restriction upon their export. Judgment of the Prize Court affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Falk and other ships 180

14. Enemy cargo—Sale in transitu—Contract of sale—Enemy vendor to "take back" the goods—Delivery under the contract—Title of a neutral purchaser. — A German steamer bound for Rotterdam took refuge in Lisbon on the outbreak of war. She had on board a non-contraband cargo which was the property of a company of enemy character. The cargo was subsequently sold to a Dutch company. The Dutch company, who acted in complete good faith, shipped the cargo in three neutral vessels to Amsterdam. The contract of sale gave the purchasers the right to reject the goods if they found them to be unsuited to their manufacturing business, and provided conditions upon which the vendors were to "take back" the goods in this event. The three ships were captured on the way to Amsterdam and the cargo seized as belonging to enemies of the Crown at the time of the seizure. Held, that the clause in the contract did not render the sale ineffective as a transfer of the goods to the purchasers. The provisions of the contract under which the vendors agreed to "take back" the goods contemplated a new transaction, not a failure of the sale. The appellants having got actual delivery of the cargo after a genuine sale, the condemnation was not in the circumstances justified. Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported sub nom. The Naxos and other ships, sup. p. 53; 123 L. T. Rep. 556; (1920) P. 385) reversed. (Privy Council.) The Vesta and other vessels 194

15. Conditional contraband—Application for release of goods seized—Evidence of ownership—Documents not put in evidence in court below by an oversight—Admission of documents on appeal.—The onus of proving an innocent destination of goods seized as conditional contraband rests upon the owners under the Declaration of London Order in Council, No. 2, of the 29th Oct. 1914. Receipts of prior payment for such goods by the claimants on their own behalf and not as sale agents for consignors are evidence which would have a material bearing on the question; and therefore an opportunity should be allowed the claimants of putting in such receipts on the hearing of an appeal which were not put in at the trial in the court below, such documents having been in existence and disclosed before the trial, and the omission to put them in being the result of a mistake. 16. Property found to be enemy property under Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—Subsequent sale by enemy owner to neutral purchaser—Treaty of Versailles, art. 297.—In 1915 the O. II., a neutral vessel, carrying (inter alia) 350 bags of clover seed consigned to Copenhagen, touched at a British port, when the seed was ordered to be seized as prize. The O. II., however, was allowed to proceed upon the undertaking of her owners that the seed should be returned. In 1917 the claimant, with knowledge of these facts, purchased the interest in the seed at Copenhagen from the agent of the enemy owner for 42,000 (odd) kronen, and paid into court 52,000 (odd) kronen as a condition of the release of the goods and as representing their proceeds. On the 10th Jan. 1920 the Treaty of Versailles was ratified. By art. 297 (b) this country reserved "the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals. . . " Held, that, the effect of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 not being to divest the original German owner of the seed of his right of disposal thereof, the fund was not within art. 297 (b), and must be paid out of court to the claimant, the neutral purchaser. 17. Enemy ship — Capture of German vessel in Norwegian waters—Subsequent loss of ship—Claim for restoration in money.—Restitutio in integrum.—On the 19th March 1918 a British cruiser captured the V., a German steamship, in Norwegian territorial waters. The cruiser was unaware that she was within the territorial limit. On the way to Lerwick, under escort, the V. had to be abandoned owing to very bad weather, and as she would have been dangerous as a derelict she was sunk by gunfire. The Norwegian Government claimed restoration of the vessel in money. Held, that, though the Norwegian Government might be entitled to have the V. released to them had she been in existence, because the sovereignty of the King of Norway had been wronged by her capture in territorial waters, it did not follow that if she was not in existence her value in money must be restored to them. The principle of redress was restitutio in integrum, not reparation. The Government of Norway had no property or interest in the ship nor possession, nor did it appear that the Government had come under any liability or incurred any expense, except for costs in respect of the capture. Payment of the value of the ship would either leave in the hands of the Norwegian Government a profit on the whole transaction or would constitute the Government a trustee for the enemy owners, and in neither case would the payment come within the principle of an indemnity. The Dusseldorf (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 123; L. T. Rep. 732; (1920) A. C. 1034) distinguished. Judgment of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported 122 L. T. Rep. 751; (1920) P. 81) affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Valeria 218

18. Contraband—Wool going to enemy country for combing—Combed wool to be returned to neutral country—By-products kept in enemy country—Doctrine of infection—Doctrine of Prize Court.—Certain bales of wool, absolute contraband of war, were shipped in two Swedish vessels from Buenos Ayres in 1916. The wool was consigned to a neutral firm in Sweden, but was seized by the British authorities at Kirkwall whilst on its way to Gothenburg. The evidence clearly showed that it had an enemy destination, and was intended for Germany. The claimants, the Swedish firm, asserted that even if the wool was going to Germany (which was denied) it was only being sent there for the purposes of combing, and was to be returned to Sweden as combed or spun wool, and that, therefore, although the waste wool with its by-products might be retained in the enemy country, the wool itself was not the subject of condemnation. Without deciding whether there were any circumstances in which goods sent to be worked upon in an enemy country and returned to their neutral owners would be exempt from condemnation: Held, that on the facts of this case there were no grounds shown for the contention of the claimants, and that the wool was good and lawful prize. Decision of Evans, P. (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 117 L. T. Rep. 412; (1917) P. 234) affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Axel Johnson, The Drottning Sophia 221

19. Contraband—Enemy destination—Onus of proof—Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914.—When goods declared conditional contraband are seized proof of an intention to submit the goods to public auction in the neutral country to which they are shipped does not necessarily discharge the onus upon the claimants of establishing that they were not destined for an enemy Government or an enemy base of supply. Judgment of the Prize Court affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Norne 222

20. Neutral ship—Purchase from enemy—Claim for damages for deterioration while commandeered by Crown—Validity and competency of sale—Declaration of London 1909, art. 56.—Prior to the outbreak of war with Germany in 1914 a vessel which was registered in a neutral country N. was transferred to a company in a neutral country M., and registered in M. She was in fact of German character, and rendered services to a German cruiser in the supply of coal and in other respects. She, however, took no direct part in hostilities, and was not in the employment of the German Government nor under the control of an agent placed on board by that Government. In Oct. 1915 she was bought bonâ fide and paid for by a neutral firm and her name changed. She was seized during her new ownership by a British cruiser and afterwards requisitioned by the Crown. Held, that the purchase was valid and complete, as the vessel could not be regarded as having been an auxiliary to the German Fleet so as to be subject to the disability of transfer attaching to warships. Held, further, on a cross-appeal, that the captors were not liable for damages or costs in respect of the seizure, since there was substantial ground for questioning the neutral character of the ship, and the claimants' case had been supported by flagrantly false affidavits which rendered a judicial inquiry necessary; and that in any case the claimants were not entitled to an account of profits earned by the vessel while under requisition. Judgment of Lord Sterndale, P. (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 443; 121 L. T. Rep. 281; (1919) P. 157) affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Edna 260

21. Neutral ship—Contraband cargo—Condemnation of ship and entire cargo—Knowledge of owner.—Where the owner of a neutral ship knowingly carries a cargo which is in whole or in part contraband, he is liable to forfeit his ship, but there can be no confiscation of the vessel unless there is evidence from the shipowner's conduct and other circumstances that the owner or possibly the charterer or master knew of the true nature of the cargo. Lord Parker's observations on the evidence of knowledge on the part of the shipowner which would establish the liability of the cargo to condemnation, in The Hakan (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 161; 117 L. T. Rep. 619; (1918) A. C. 148), discussed. Judgment of Lord Sterndale, P. affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Zamora (No. 2) 266

22. Carriage of contraband—Allowances of freight—Discretion and jurisdiction.—The Prize Court has jurisdiction to award freight in respect of the carriage of contraband goods which have been condemned, but the exercise of the discretion to allow it is very rare, and depends upon the particular circumstances of each case. Held, in the present case that the ignorance of neutral shipowners as to the enemy destination of contraband goods, their conduct in informing the British authorities of the proposed shipment, and their services in carrying the goods from a neutral port did not provide a sufficient foundation upon which a discretion to allow freight could properly be exercised. 23. Agreement by allies with neutral country conceding right to trade in conditional contraband —Cargo of conditional contraband destined for German base of supplies—Seizure during Armistice.—On the 30th April 1918 an agreement was made between the U.S.A. and Norway, and was assented to by the United Kingdom, under which Norway agreed not to export to Germany foodstuffs except fish in quantities not to exceed 48,000 tons per annum. This quantity was duly exported by Norway under Norwegian governmental licence, the monthly total exported being reported by Norway to the United Kingdom. The R. during the Armistice under such licence and within such condition was on a voyage to Stettin, admittedly a German base of supplies, and both ship and cargo were taken as prize by H.M.S. V. Held, (1) that the cargo was contraband, the Norwegian trade with Germany in fish provided for by the agreement being that trade only which was consistent with neutrality; (2) that as the Armistice did not reopen German trade it gave no immunity; (3) that both ship and cargo were liable to condemnation. 24. Practice—Prize Court—Investment of proceeds of sale pending action for condemnation—Terms of bail bond upon release to claimant of goods unsold pending action for condemnation—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order I., r. 2; Order XI., r. 2; Order XXVI., r. 1—Supreme Court Fund Rules 1915, rr. 73, 74, 74 (a).—Claimants to goods seized as prize had obtained orders from the registrar (1) that the proceeds of sale of certain of the goods should be placed on deposit in the joint names of the claimants and of the Procurator-General, or, alternatively, be invested in Government funds; and (2) that unsold parcels should be released on bail. The Procurator-General contended as to (2) that the costs and charges of seizure and detention already incurred should be paid unconditionally as a condition of release. Held, that the proceeds of goods sold pending the hearing of an action for condemnation should not be placed on deposit or invested. Held, further, that where goods are released on bail the claimant should not be required as a condition of the release to pay unconditionally the costs and expenses already incurred; and a claimant who pays costs and charges of seizure and detention upon receiving delivery of such goods ought to have credit for the payment as against the security which represents the full value of the goods in the event of his failure in the litigation, and that the bail bond should be expressed in terms which will evidence this right. (The President.) The Drottning Sophia 294

25. Ships on time charter not amounting to demise carrying contraband—Degrees of knowledge of owners, charterers, and masters — Liability to condemnation.—A German subject carrying on business since 1900 in New York, and president of an American steamship line, chartered in 1912 and 1913 on behalf of that line on time charters for terms of nine or ten years three Norwegian vessels. The Norwegian owners retained (inter alia) the right to appoint and dismiss the master. At the outbreak of war the ships were directed to New York, and the president organised a regular service of vessels from the U.S.A. carrying foodstuffs consigned to agents of the packers in Copenhagen, in which service the three vessels were engaged when captured. It was found by inference by the court that the service was organised as a means of furnishing to the German Government through Copenhagen necessary supplies. At the time of capture one of the vessels had on board a small quantity of rubber falsely described as gum. Two of the owners were proved to have and the third did not disclaim, knowledge of the voyage. Held, on the broad facts as to the whole undertaking, the knowledge of the master, and the knowledge of the charterers, the ships were liable to condemnation. (The President.) The Kim; The Björnstjerne Björnson; The Alfred Nobel 296

26. Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—Terms of release of goods—Incidence of (a) insurance and (b) detention expenses.—Goods seized on a neutral ship bound from Copenhagen to New York were decreed to be of enemy origin and to be enemy property and ordered to be detained till peace or further order. The Attorney-General, on a claim by American claimants, now waived the rights of the Crown in respect of such decree, but claimed that orders for release should be subject to payment of insurance and detention expenses incurred by the marshal. Held, that the seizure and detention being rightfully made in the course of a voyage begun after the publication of the Reprisals Order and consequent upon shipment presumably made with knowledge thereof, the proper order was for restitution to claimants subject to payment of expenses of discharge, detention, or sale properly incurred, including costs of insurance. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The United States (No. 2) 344

27. Security for costs of appeal—Charging order upon —Priorities—Payment out—Solicitors Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.—Claimants having paid 500*l.* into court as security for costs of their appeal to the Privy Council and having then abandoned the appeal, applied for payment out thereof. The Procurator-General then applied for a charging order upon the said 500*l.* on the ground that the security ordered in the proceedings before the Prize Court was inadequate and that the costs of those proceedings and of the abandoned appeal would fully absorb both securities. The claimants' solicitors contended that they had in any event a prior claim for their own costs under sect. 28 of the Solicitors Act 1860. Held, (1) that the charging order should be granted as prayed; (2) that the solicitors had no prior claim upon the fund as it had not been "recovered or preserved" by them. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The Dirigo 343

82. Bounty—Battle of Jutland—Joint and common enterprise—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), s. 42—Order in Council of the 2nd March 1915.—By Order in Council No. 226 of the 2nd March 1915, His Majesty made a declaration pursuant to sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25) of his "intention to grant prize bounty" and that "such of the officers and crews" (of His Majesty's ships of war) "as are actually present at the taking or destroying of any armed ship" (of any of His Majesty's enemies) "shall be entitled to have distributed among them as prize bounty a sum calculated at the rate of 5*l.* for each person on board the enemy's ship at the beginning of the engagement." In the Battle of Jutland on the 31st May and the 1st June 1916, The British Grand Fleet, consisting of 151 ships, destroyed eleven enemy ships, having on board 4537 persons, but it was impossible to contend that any one British ship or squadron was responsible for the destruction of any one of the destroyed German ships. Decreed, counsel for the 151 British ships agreeing, that the battle should be treated as a joint and common enterprise, and, the Procurator-General consenting, that the Battle of Jutland was the common engagement and enterprise of the 151 British ships, and that the prize bounty due under the regulations was 22,685*l.* (Sir Henry Duke, P.) In the Matter of the Battle of Jutland..... 345

29. Neutral ship and cargo—Barratrous design of master to take ship to enemy port—Absence of overt act in prosecution of design—Absence of consent by crew—Absence of knowledge of owners of ship and cargo.—A Dutch vessel, the T. A., having sailed under auspices of Netherlands Overseas Trust Company, from Dutch East Indies with cargo of coffee consigned to representatives in Amsterdam of the Dutch planters and owners, her master disclosed when ship in port of Freetown, Sierra Leone, that he intended criminally, without authorisation of owners, to take her to Stettin and had unsuccessfully invited the crew to assist. Held, (1) that, the crew having refused to assist, the master was not "in a position to control the destination" within the meaning of The Louisiana (14 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 233; 118 L. T. Rep. 274; (1918) A. C. 461); (2) that no overt act having brought the T. A. into the prosecution of an unneutral undertaking, she was at Freetown still on her authorised voyage with Rotterdam as her destination in intention and in fact on the part of the only persons who had the power to carry out their intentions; (3) that ship and cargo should be released. 30. Mails of a neutral State—Seizure—Transmission of mails by rail for examination—Damage by fire during transmission—Liability of captor—Duty to insure—Order in Council of the 11th March 1915.—Certain parcels of goods of enemy origin and enemy property were consigned per the Swedish parcels mails to the claimants who were domiciled in New York. The postal bags containing these packages were seized at the port of K. under the provisions of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. Eventually the bags came into the hands of the post office authorities at K., who sent them by rail to the censor of parcel post in London, there being no facilities for the examination of the postal bags at K. On the railway journey some of the goods were destroyed or injured by fire. Those packages which were delivered in London were seized and in due course sold, the net proceeds being subsequently paid to the claimants. The claimants sought to recover from the Procurator-General the loss of that part of the consignment which had been affected by the fire, contending that the captors had failed to exercise due care in the control of the goods; in sending them to London they had caused a deviation in the voyage which avoided the existing insurances upon them, and they had failed to hand them over to the Marshal, as provided by the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, by whom they would have been insured. Held, that the decision in The United States (No. 2) (ante, p. 344; (125 L. T. Rep. 446; (1920) P. 430) does not imply in the duty of the captors to take reasonable care, an obligation to insure. The captors did not fail in their duty to take care of the goods in their custody when they forwarded the mail bags to London, as there were no facilities for examining mails at K. The Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 does not require that seized goods should be placed in the custody of the Marshal as soon as they are brought into port, nor at any particular time. In the present case, it could not have been done until after examination, whether the goods were subject to seizure or not. In so far as this Order in Council is concerned, it is doubtful whether any breach of duty on the part of public officers as between themselves and the Crown, concerning a matter of administrative instruction, will give a cause of action to foreign owners of goods. (Sir Henry Duke, P.) The New Sweden. [Since affirmed by Privy Council.—ED.] 351

31. Agreement by allies with neutral country conceding right to trade in conditional contraband—Cargo of conditional contraband destined for German base of supplies—Seizure during Armistice.—On the 30th April 1918 an agreement was made between the U.S.A. and Norway, and was assented to by the United Kingdom, under which Norway agreed not to export to Germany food stuffs except fish in quantities not to exceed 48,000 tons per annum. This quantity was duly exported by Norway under Norwegian Governmental licence, the monthly total exported being reported by Norway to the United Kingdom. During the Armistice the R. was on a voyage to Stettin under such licence and within such condition. Stettin was admittedly a German base of supplies. The R. and her cargo were taken as prize by H.M.S. V. Held, that reading the agreement as a whole, each contracting party undertook certain specified obligations, namely, on the part of the United States, to furnish to Norway certain supplies, and on the part of Norway, to place restriction on her exports to the Central Powers. Norway neither obtained nor acquired a right for her subjects to ship and carry contraband; neither did the belligerent powers release their right to capture contraband. Held, further, that since the conditions of the Armistice were quite consistent with the maintenance of the German organisations in view of a possible renewal of hostilities, and since the ship-owners carried a complete cargo of conditional contraband bound to an enemy base of supplies, both ship and cargo were subject to condemnation. Judgment of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported sup. p. 292; 124 L. T. Rep. 635; (1920) P. 177) affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Rannveig 382

32. Jurisdiction—Third party procedure—Indemnity.—In Oct. 1915, a Japanese firm, as owners, obtained from the Prize Court, Egypt, an order for the release of certain goods seized in the German steamship L. The goods were in the appellants' warehouse, who held them as agents for the marshal. A large portion of the goods were in error forwarded to England instead of to Japan as the owners of the goods had directed. They issued a writ in the Prize Court, Egypt, against the marshal claiming damages for negligence. The marshal served on the appellants a third party notice claiming to be indemnified. The appellants disputed the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, but on a preliminary hearing the judge dismissed the objection, the appellants not appearing. The case was subsequently tried and judgment was given for the owners against the marshal, and for the marshal against the appellants. This appeal was brought against the latter part of the judgment, which it was contended was made without jurisdiction. Held, that there was no jurisdiction in the Prize Court to decide, as between parties some of whom were not parties to the Prize proceedings, disputes not involving the consideration of the jus belli and arising out of facts which occurred after an effective release of the goods to a claimant. Further, there was nothing in the Prize Court Rules nor in Order XLV., which privided for the calling in of third parties against whom the right of indemnity is claimed. 33. Mails of state—Seizure—Transmission of mails by rail for examination—Damage by fire during transmission—Liability of captor—Duty to insure—Order in Council of the 11th March 1915.—Certain parcels of goods of enemy origin and enemy property were consigned per the Swedish parcels mail to the claimants, who were domiciled in New York. The postal bags containing these packages were seized at the port of K. under the provision of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. Eventually the bags came into the hands of the post office authorities at K., who sent them by rail to the censor of parcel post in London, there being no facilities for the examination of the postal bags at K. On the railway journey some of the goods were destroyed or injured by fire. Those packages which were delivered in London were seized and sold in due course, the net proceeds being subsequently paid to the claimants. The claimants sought to recover from the Procurator-General the loss of that part of the consignment which had been affected by the fire, contending that the captors had failed to exercise due care in the control of the goods; in sending them to London they had caused a deviation in the voyage which avoided the existing insurances upon them, and they had failed to hand them over to the Marshal, as provided by the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, by whom they would have been insured. Held, that for unreasonable action for negligence and for wilful wrongdoing the captors were liable from the time of seizure to the time when the res was placed in the custody of the Prize Court. There was neither principle nor authority for placing the responsibility of those who exercised a lawful right of search or who acted in accordance with the terms of a reprisals order any higher than that of actual captors. As far as the Marshal was concerned the question of insurance did not arise as the loss occurred before the bags were placed in his custody at all. Held, further, that as the Order in Council provided for detention and for sale of the chattels detained, it was the net cash proceeds which were to be restored. If the court made an order just in itself, with regard to the disposal of such net proceeds as the Marshal had in his hands, so as to discharge him in accordance with its ordinary principles and refused to hold liable either its own officers or the officials who detained, forwarded, and searched the parcels mail prior to the seizure in prize of the goods in question, no default having been proved against them, it was strictly adhering to the terms and sense of the Order in Council, and if neutral rights of property suffered, that result could be justified under the terms of the Order of the 11th March 1915. Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported sup. p. 351; 126 L. T. Rep. 31; (1921) P. 473) affirmed. (Privy Council.) The New Sweden 439

34. Property of enemy—Maritime prize—Lighters and craft seized afloat—Lighters and craft seized when beached—Lighters and craft seized on land—Removal to avoid capture—Military and naval operations—"Hot pursuit"—Nature of operations—Right to damages for wrongful seizure—Jurisdiction of court—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), s. 34—Fourth Hague Convention 1907, art. 53.—A number of enemy-owned tugs, lighters, and other craft, as well as a quantity of material, were seized by the British forces during the course of the campaign in South-West Africa in 1914 and 1915. Some of the seizures took place in two ports which were occupied by the British forces, a part of the craft being afloat and a part being beached, some below and some above high-water mark. Upon the approach of the British forces part of the craft was moved inland and was eventually seized some six months later at the places which were respectively 148 and 310 miles distant from the coast. The Crown claimed condemnation of the whole. Held, that the captures of property made inland by military forces did not subject such property to condemnation as maritime prize, and it was immaterial that the property thus seized might subsequently be used under conditions which would subject it, if so used, to condemnation as maritime prize. Judgment of Lord Sterndale, P. (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 538; 122 L. T. Rep. 249; (1919) P. 329) affirmed. (Privy Council.) The Anichab and other vessels 441 of which was under 1600 tons gross, the property of a German corporation which had its head office in Danzig, were in British ports at the commencement of hostilities, and were accordingly detained there. Under Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules 1914 they were then requisitioned for the service of His Majesty. While thus requisitioned one of the ships was lost by stranding, and another was sunk by enemy action. By a decree of Sir Henry Duke, P. the three vessels had been condemned. The owners appealed. Held, that the Sixth Hague Convention having been recognised as binding upon Great Britain, and was not possible in regard to the general delinqencies of the German forces during the war, to find juridical grounds for releasing His Majesty's Government from their obligations under the convention when once they had attached and the provisions under art. II. against the confiscation of enemy merchant ships coming under the convention were therefore obligatory. Further there was no evidence of any conduct on the part of the German Government down to the Armistice which put it out of her power to return ships which had been detained. Where a requisitioned ship had been lost the owners were entitled to the appraised value of the ship, even although she had been sunk by German forces. As regards the Treaty of Versailles, while part VIII., annex III., art. 1 operated to transfer the property in all ships of 1600 tons gross and upwards, it made no such transfer in the case of ships of less tonnage, at least until they had been selected for surrender as part of those which under the Treaty were to be handed over. By part X., art. 297, the Treaty did not modify or annul the obligation which arose under the Hague Convention. Under any order of release the res shoud not be removed out of British territory for a reasonable time, lest otherwise the treaty right might be defeated. In the result, therefore, the appeal succeeded; and an order was advised that the appraised value of the two lost ships, and the ship remaining in specie be released to the custodian of enemy property to be delivered up to the owners if after the lapse of six months no proceedings had been begun for an order for delivery up to the Crown. Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. reversed (1921) P. 155). Further advised on the petitions that the ships, all of which were over 1600 tons gross, and in respect of which orders for detention had been made, should be released to the Crown. 37. Enemy vessels—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Test of capture—Requisition of captured ships by Admiralty—Requisitioned ships sunk by enemy submarines—Appraised value—Restitution—Rights of neutral government—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XXIX.—Treaty of Versailles, Part VIII., annex III., arts. 1, 297, and 440.—Capture consists in compelling the vessel captured to conform to the captor's will. Hauling down the flag by an enemy merchant vessel, taken in conjunction with stopping the engines, is not an unequivocal act of submission. Four German merchant ships were captured by British warships on the 16th July 1917, the chase beginning outside and ending inside Dutch territorial waters. The ships were on the 31st July 1917 requisitioned for the use of the Crown upon the usual undertaking to pay the appraised values into the Prize Court. Two of the ships while under requisition were sunk by German submarines. By the Treaty of Versailles, Germany recognises the validity of the orders of the Prize Court, and made certain cessions of German ships in the territories of the Allied Powers. The Dutch Government claimed the restoration of the ships to Dutch waters, or their appraised values, and compensation for the use of them. Held, that the Dutch Government were entitled to have the two existing ships restored to Dutch waters, and to receive the appraised values of the two ships sunk, but not to compensation for the past use of them. The terms of the treaty, to which the Dutch Government was not a party, as regards the cession of German ships did not affect the rights of the Dutch Government in the British Prize Court. A requisition order is not a judgment in rem, and does not affect the property in a ship. The Dusseldorf (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 84; 123 L. T. Rep. 732; (1920) A. 38. Prize bounty—Operations in Mesopotamia—Gunboats on the Tigris—Co-operation with land forces—Capture of armed enemy vessels—Claim for prize bounty—Joint operations of sea and land forces—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), s. 42—Order in Council of the 2nd March 1915.—H.M.S. T., Ma., and Mo. took part in the advance along the Tigris in the course of the British operations in Mesopotamia in 1917. In these operations which were planned under the direction of the General Officer Commanding in Mesopotamia, the ships co-operated generally with the land forces in fighting which took place between the 23rd and 25th Feb. at S., where the passage of the river, which had been blocked by Turkish forces, was effected. The flotilla was then able to pass up the river, and on the 26th Feb. the General Officer Commanding directed it to "push on and inflict as much damage as possible." On the same day the flotilla was again held up at N. K. by the Turkish rearguard, and the passage of the river was again opened by the land forces operating with cavalry and field guns. The flotilla then again advanced, overtook the vessels of the Turkish river service, and made the capture. It then anchored for two days near the furthest point reached by the operations, and sent the prizes down the river. At some time before the 25th Feb. one of the captured vessels had been bombed by an army aeroplane. The officers and crews of the flotilla claimed prize bounty. It was contended by the Treasury that the operation constituted a joint naval and military operation. Held, that the fact that the flotilla and the land forces were engaged in a joint scheme of operations did not establish a joint capture; it was necessary to show that both forces were in fact participating in the operation of capture. As the troops in fact took no part in the operation of capture, as they were in fact out of reach when the capture was made, and as the flotilla got far enough up the river to be able to act effectually for itself, without requiring or receiving help from the land forces in the immediate enterprise, the prizes were made by the flotilla alone. Judgment in favour of the claim. (Sir Henry Duke. P.) The Sulman Pak and other vessels 504

PUBLIC AUTHORITIES PROTECTION ACT 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51).

Limitation of actions—Servant of the Crown—Negligence in the performance of a public duty—Implied repeal of a statute by a subsequent statute—Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51)—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57).—The Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 protects servants of the Crown in the performance of a public duty in the same manner as it protects the servants of public authorities who can themselves be sued. In an action to which the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 applies, sect. 8 of that Act, which limits the period for commencing an action to two years, does not repeal the Public Authorities Protection Act by implication. Thus a party whose vessel has suffered damage from the negligent navigation of a Government tug by an officer of the Royal Naval Reserve acting in the course of his duty must commence an action against the officer within six months of the day upon which the cause of action arose. Consideration of the circumstances under which the provisions of one statute may by implication repeal the provisions of another. The Caliph (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; 107 L. T. REQUISITION.

1. Barge under construction—Increase in cost of materials and labour—Inevitable delay in constructing duplicate—Loss of service—Measure of compensation—Remoteness.—The claimants in 1914 made a contract with builders, at an agreed price, for the construction of a hopper barge, which was to be the property of the claimants at all stages of its construction. In Feb. 1917 the Admiralty requisitioned the barge, which was then still unfinished. But for the requisition it would have been finished in April 1917. The Admiralty also instructed the builders to make alterations, which deprived the barge of the essential character of a hopper barge, and these alterations were carried out. Owing to the war it was impossible for the claimants to replace the barge within less than three years from the date of the requisition, and between that date and the earliest date at which a contract for a similar barge could have been placed prices of materials and labour rose enormously. In these circumstances the claimants claimed from the Admiralty: (1) The difference between the contract price for the construction of the barge and the price which would have to be paid for a duplicate; and (2) compensation for the loss of the use of the barge during the three years from April 1917 to the date of completion of the duplicate. Held, that the claimants were entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the cost of replacing the barge, regard being had to the fact that replacement was impossible at the date of the requisition and continued to be impossible for several years, but that they were not entitled to compensation for the loss of the use of the barge during the three years above mentioned. (Crown Paper.) Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty 24

2. Requisition — Proclamation — Prerogative — Earning of freight by Admiralty—Urgent national necessity.—A steamer belonging to the claimants was requisitioned by the Admiralty in Jan. 1916 under a Proclamation issued in Aug. 1914, and after a first voyage she was sent with a cargo of ore and pyrites to a firm of American munition makers whose contract provided that they should be bound to supply munitions only if the ore was sent to them at a certain rate of freight. The ship was sent at this rate of freight, which was lower than the current market rate. On the voyage the ship was severely damaged by marine risks, and in an arbitration between the owners and the Admiralty, the arbitrators found that the owners were bound by the form of charter known as T. 99, which expressly threw the burden of marine risks on the owners. The arbitrators were ordered to state a case for the opinion of the court on the following questions: (a) Whether the Admiralty had the right to employ the ship on a voyage earning freight payable to the Admiralty, and whether the claimants were entitled to receive any and what extra payment and compensation in respect thereof; (b) whether the Admiralty were liable to compensate the owners for damage received on the voyage; and (c) whether marine risks should be deemed to be borne by the Admiralty or by the owners. Held, (1) that the Admiralty had a right to requisition the ship under the Proclamation in the national emergency which existed in Jan. 1916 and to employ her on the voyage in question, and the owners were not entitled to extra compensation as the fact that freight was payable to the Admiralty was not material; (2) that there was evidence to support the arbitrators' finding that the owners agreed to bear the marine risks; and (3) that consequently the Admiralty were not liable to compensate the owners for damage received on the voyage. Nature of prerogative right at times of national emergency considered. (Divisional Court. Reading, C.J., Darling, J., Salter, J.) 3. Undertaking to pay market rate of hire—Limitation order effect—Indemnity—Limitation of Freights (French) Ports Order 1918—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), ss. 1, 2.—At the outbreak of the war with Germany, in 1914, a number of ships, British and neutral, were in the Baltic Sea, and owing to the risk of capture and destruction in attempting to escape from the Baltic these vessels remained there. But after a time the scarcity of shipping became greater, and it was decided to make every effort to get these ships out of the Baltic. Accordingly, in July 1916 the Board of Trade made a general offer, which was addressed to the Baltic Exchange and communicated to the public, as an inducement to the owners of such vessels to attempt to escape, to the effect that the Admiralty had informed the Board of Trade that they were prepared to guarantee that any British vessel escaping from the Baltic up to March 1917 would either not be requisitioned, or if through some special emergency they had to be requisitioned, they would be paid market rates and not Blue Book rates. The guarantee was to apply also to ships bought by British owners from neutrals. The rates, known as Blue Book rates, on which the Admiralty began to requisition ships in Aug. 1914, were much lower than the current market rates. B., the suppliant, was a shipowner, and, relying on the Board of Trade guarantee above mentioned, purchased two ships at prices far in excess of the value of such ships if they were requisitioned at Blue Book rates, and he took the risk of getting the ships out of the Baltic. In Feb. 1918 the two ships were requisitioned on the express terms that the rate of hire to be paid should be in accordance with the undertaking of July 1916. The Government, however, only paid the suppliant at Blue Book rates, and the suppliant, by a petition of right, claimed the difference between the Blue Book rates paid by the Government and the full market rate of freight. The Crown, by their answer, admitted the undertaking, but relied on the Limitation of Freights (French Ports) Order of the 5th Feb. 1918, and said that that Order fixed the market rate and that the suppliant had been paid the full rate allowed by such Order. They also relied on the Indemnity Act 1920. Held, that the Limitation of Freights Order did not fix a market rate. The meaning of the undertaking of July 1916 was that the Government would not impose a rate of their own, but would pay what could be obtained in a free market. Held, also, that the defence of the Indemnity Act 1920 failed, and that the suppliant was entitled to be paid hire at the market rate. (Roche, J.) Brooke v. The King 205

By sub-sect. 2 (iii.) (b), if the claimant would apart from the Act have no legal right to compensation, the compensation is to be assessed according to the principles set forth in part II. of the schedule to the Act. A towage and salvage company hired the use of a tug for the purposes of their business by a charter-party which entitled them to the services of the tug for as long as they pleased with the right to terminate the hiring by a fourteen days' notice. During the currency of the charter-party the tug was requisitioned by the Admiralty. Held, by the whole court, that, apart from the Indemnity Act 1920, the charterers would not have had any legal right to compensation. Held, by Bankes and Warrington, L.JJ. (Scrutton, L.J. dissenting) that the loss of the average net earnings of the tug while requisitioned was "a direct loss or damage" by reason of the interference with the charterers' business within sect. 2 (1) (b) of the Act, and that they were entitled to compensation, which must be assessed as directed in part II. of the schedule to the Act. SALE OF GOODS.

1. Goods to be shipped during stated period—Declaration—Cancellation—A contract for the sale of pepper at sellers' risk until delivery required the sellers to declare in writing to the buyers with due dispatch "the name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars," and continued: "Should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels." The contract contained a marginal note, headed "Loss of Transhipment," to the following effect: "Should the vessel or vessels and the goods or any portion thereof be lost, this contract to be cancelled for the whole or such portion; but should the vessel or vessels be lost and the goods or any portion thereof be transhipped to some other vessel or vessels and arrive on account of the original importer, the contract to stand good for the whole or such portion." The pepper (which under the contract was to be shipped between Dec. 1917, and Feb., 1918, by a steamer or steamers from the East to Liverpool) was shipped on a steamer which sailed on the 21st Jan. 1918 and was lost with her cargo on the 26th Feb. A declaration in due form was made on the 27th March 1918 by the defendants, at a time when the loss of the vessel was known to both parties, and contained a note, in these terms: "Owing to the vessel having been lost by enemy action, this contract is now cancelled." The plaintiffs refused to accept this declaration, and brought an action for failure to deliver under the contract. Held, that the sellers, having shipped the goods and made the requisite declaration with due despatch, were not liable for non-delivery if the vessel and the goods were lost either before or after the declaration was made, and that the knowledge of the loss was not material. The plaintiffs' action therefore failed. Olymphia Oil and Cake Company, Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71, 393; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233) distinguished and on one point doubted. Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed. (Court of Appeal.) Clark (trading as Wright, Crossley, and Co.) v. Cox, McEwen, and Co. 5

2. Goods in lighters—"Ex store"—"Ex warehouse"—The defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiffs to buy certain cases of tinned meat "ex-store Rotterdam." The goods had arrived in Rotterdam some months earlier and had been landed on the quay, but, owing to great congestion at the port, they could not be put into a warehouse, but were stored in lighters, where they were at the date of the contract, and afterwards. Held, that the goods being in lighters could not properly be described as "ex store," and that the buyers were entitled to repudiate the contract. Judgment of Bailhache, J. (1920) 2 K. B. 329) reversed. (Court of Appeal.) Fisher, Reeves, and Co. Limited v. Armour and Co. Limited 91

3. Sale of goods—Delivery—Interruption of discharge—Buyer's right to reject—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 30.—If a ship which has begun to discharge a parcel of cargo at the port of delivery leaves the port to deliver other cargo elsewhere before the discharge of that parcel is complete, her action, in the absence of special stipulations to the contrary, is a breach of the contract to deliver, notwithstanding that she subsequently returns and offers the balance of the parcel. Although the buyer is not entitled to continuous delivery, yet if the vessel leaves the port before the whole of his parcel is discharged he may reject the whole consignment, or the part undelivered when the ship sailed, as provided by sect. 30 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893. (Bailhache, J.) Behrens and Co. Limited v. Produce Brokers' Company Limited 139

4. Contract—Sale of soda ash on c.i.f. terms—Validity of shipping documents tendered as bill of lading and policy of insurance respectively—Buyer's right to reject—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 21, 22, 50 (sub-s. 3), 90.—A contract provided for the sale of goods to be shipped from American seaboard c.i.f. Gothenburg. Under the contract the sellers tendered, with the invoice for the goods, two documents purporting to be a bill of lading and a policy of insurance repectively. The material part of the bill of lading was as follows: "Received in apparent good order and condition from . . . to be transported by the steamship Anglia, now lying in . . . or failing shipment by said steamer in and upon a following steamer, 280 bags dense soda." The policy of insurance was represented by a certificate of insurance issued by an American insurance corporation, which, as declared by the certificate, "represents and takes the place of the policy and conveys all the rights of the original policy holder . . . as fully as if the property was covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate." Held, that the buyers were entitled to reject the goods under the contract on the ground that proper documents had not been tendered by the sellers. The bill of lading did not contain an acknowledgment that the goods had been shipped and was therefore not a good bill of lading under a c.i.f. contract; no document of insurance is good tender in England under a c.i.f. contract unless there is an actual policy which complies with the provisions of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. (Court of Appeal.) Diamond Alkali Export Corporation v. H. Bourgeois 455

SALVAGE.

1. Property of sovereign State—Ship emplgyed by sovereign State in ordinary commerce—Arrest—Immunity.—A sovereign State may not be impleaded in the courts of this country, either by a suit in personam or by a suit in rem, notwithstanding that the property is being used at the time of arrest for the purpose of ordinary trading,, and is not being employed on public national service. Decision of Hill, J. (infrà) affirmed, the Court of Appeal taking the view that they were bound to follow the decision in The Parlement Belge (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234). (Court of Appeal.) The Porto Alexandre,..... 1

2. Tug requisitioned by Admiralty—Demise of tug to Crown—"Ship belonging to His Majesty"—Right of Admiralty to salvage remuneration—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 557—Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 41), s. 1.—Where a tug is requisitioned by the Admiralty upon terms which amount to a demise of the tug to the Admiralty, the latter and not the owners of the tug are entitled to salvage remuneration subsequently earned by the tug. By sect. 557, sub-sect. 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, "Where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to His Majesty or by the commander or crew thereof, no claim shall be allowed for any loss, damage, or risk caused to the ship or her stores, tackle, or furniture . . . or for any other expense or loss sustained by His Majesty by reason of that service. . . ." By sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916, "Where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to His Majesty, and that ship is a ship specially equipped with salvage plant, or is a tug, the Admiralty shall, notwithstanding anything contained in sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, be entitled to claim salvage on behalf of His Majesty for such services, and shall have the same rights and remedies as if the ship rendering such services did not belong to His Majesty." A tug belonging to the appellants was requisitioned by the Admiralty upon terms which amounted to a demise of the tug to the Admiralty, the tug rendered salvage services to another vessel, and the Admiralty Commissioners claimed a declaration that they were entitled to the remuneration so earned. Held, that the tug was a "ship belonging to His Majesty" within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916, and therefore the Admiralty Commissioners and not the owners of the tug were entitled to claim the salvage moneys. Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 394; 120 L. T. Rep. 137; (1919) 1 K. B. 299) affirmed. (House of Lords.) Page and others v. Admiralty Commissioners; Elliott Steam Tug Company v. Same..... 81

3. Ship belonging to His Majesty and specially equipped with salvage plant—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 577 (1)—Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 41), s. 1.—The Admiralty, owners of a ship fitted with a wireless installation, a powerful searchlight, grappling ropes, and other salvage gear and specially constructed for laying and repairing submarine telegraph cables, claimed salvage in respect of her services. Held, that the ship was not "specially equipped with salvage plant" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916, s. 1, and that the claim of the Admiralty was, therefore, barred by sect. 557 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. (Hill, J.) The Morgana..... 160

4. Benefit arising from the services—No pecuniary benefit to the owner—Request services—Tug and tow—Life salvage claimed by tug.—A steamer, whilst being towed in the Mersey, was damaged by collision with another vessel, for which the other vessel was subsequently held to be alone to blame. The master of the steamer, which was sinking rapidly, asked the tug, which had been towing at the time of the collision, to tow his vessel in shore. The tug endeavoured to do so, but the steamer grounded on the Pluckington Bank, at some distance from the shore. In this position she became a constructive total loss. Some of her cargo was, however, recovered, and a substantial sum remained in the hands of the cargo owners after the expenses of recovery had been met. At the trial it appeared that, had the services never been rendered by the tug, cargo of no less net value would have been recovered than was, under the circumstances, restored to the cargo owners. Held, that since the cargo had still to be saved in the position in which the tug left it, and as it was then worth no more than it would have been if the tug had done nothing, no salvage service had been rendered, and the tug was entitled to no award. Held, on the facts, that the requested services had not been performed, and that the lives of the steamer's crew were in no danger. Semble, if the lives of the crew had been in danger, an engaged tug, in taking the crew off the steamer which she is towing, is not acting outside the scope of her towage contract in such a manner as to earn a salvage award. The action therefore failed. (Hill, J.) The Tarbert..... 423

5. King's ship—Ship's agent—Salvage claim by the ship's officers and crew—Instructions to agent to prosecute the claim—Settlement—Authority of the agent—Naval Agency and Distribution Act 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c .116). The authority of an agent for the officers and crew of a King's ship, under the Naval Agency Act 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 116) is not wider than that of a solicitor, and does not therefore extend to the settlement of claims by the ship's officers and crew without their express authority. Thus a ship's agent who settles a claim by the officers and crew of a King's ship for salvage reward without the consent, express or implied, of the commanding officer, is liable in damages to the extent of the award which the officers and crew would have received if the salvage claim had been duly prosecuted, less the amount received under the terms of settlement. The agent has no authority to settle the claims of the officers (other than the commending officer) and crew without their instructions when the commanding officer has been giving instructions on their behalf as well as his own, notwithstanding that the commanding officer takes an exaggerated view of their claims. SEAMAN.

1. Workmen's Compensation—Seaman—Round voyage — Accident — Partial incapacity—Rejoining ship while on unfinished voyage—Subsequent desertion during voyage—"Liability" to maintain seaman—Claim to immediate compensation—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 34 (1)—Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 58), s. 7 (1) (e).—The respondent, a Mohammedan seaman, was engaged by the appellants for a round voyage from Bombay to the United Kingdom and back to Bombay within a year. On the voyage he met with a rather severe accident to his right hand. He was treated in hospital at Marseilles, and then brought by the appellants in one of their steamers ta Liverpool and thence by train to Glasgow, where he rejoined the ship. Shortly afterwards he deserted. The Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 provides by sect. 7 (1) (e): "The weekly payment shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as amended by any subsequent enactment or otherwise liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured seaman, or apprentice." Held (Lord Sumner dissenting), that when the seaman deserted, the liability of the shipowners, under sect. 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 to maintain him, ceased and the seaman was then entitled to put forward his claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906. Judgment of the Court of Session affirmed. (House of Lords.) Anchor Line Limited v. Mohad 434

TUG AND TOW.
Contract for towage—Loss of tow—Negligence—Exceptions clause—"Default of the steam tug-owner"—Tug-owner not sending assistance to tow while in danger—Liability of tug-owner.—The defendant contracted to tow the plaintiffs' motor-schooner Cap Palos on a round voyage. The contract contained an exceptions clause, which relieved the defendant from liability for "the acts, neglect, or default of the masters, pilots, or crews of the steam tugs, or of consulting engineers, ships' husbands, or other persons in his employment . . . or for any damage or loss that may arise to any vessel or craft being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, . . . through collision or otherwise, whether such damage arise from or be occasioned by any accident or by any omission, breach of duty, mismanagement, negligence, or default of the steam tug-owner, or any of his servants or employees, or by any defect or imperfections in the steam tugs. . . ." The towage contract was carried out with interruptions until the 24th Oct. 1919 the tugs left the tow at anchor in a position of some danger. The defendant knew of the danger, and ordered a tug to go to the assistance of the Cap Palos, but countermanded the order upon the ground that assistance was being sent by the Salvage Association. No assistance reached the Cap Palos, and on the 26th Oct. she was driven on the rocks and became a constructive total loss. Held, that the exceptions did not protect the defendant from liability, as they were limited to a time when the defendant was doing, or omitting to do, something in the actual performance of the contract and did not apply to a time when he had ceased, even though temporarily, to do anything at all, and had unjustifiably left the performance of his contractual duties to others. Cases Argued before and Determined by the Superior Courts

RELATING TO

MARITIME LAW.

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Nov. 10, 1919.

(Before Bankes, Warrington, and Scrutton, L.JJ.)

The Porto Alexandre. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Salvage—Property of sovereign State—Ship employed by sovereign State in ordinary commerce—Arrest —Immunity.

A sovereign State may not be impleaded in the courts of this country, either by a suit in personam or by a suit in rem, notwithstanding that the property is being used at the time of arrest for the purpose of ordinary trading, and is not being employed on public national service.

Decision of Hill, J. (infrà) affirmed, the Court of Appeal taking the view that they were bound to follow the decision in The Parlement Belge (infrà).

Motion to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings, in an action of salvage brought against ship and freight, on the ground that the ship and freight were the public national property, and in the possession and public use and service, of the Government of an independent sovereign State.

The plaintiffs were the owners, masters, and crews of the steam tugs Nora, Expert, and Torfrida.

The defendants were the owners of the Portuguese steamship Porto Alexandre, her cargo and freight.

While on a voyage from Lisbon to Liverpool with cargo, the Porto Alexandre got into difficulties in the Crosby Channel, River Mersey, on the 13th Sept. 1919, and services were rendered to her by the plaintiffs' tugs. On the 16th Sept. the plaintiffs issued a writ in this action claiming salvage, and the ship was arrested. An appearance under protest was entered on behalf of the owners of the ship and her freight, but subsequently, on a summons taken out on behalf of the Portuguese Government, who were stated to be the owners of the vessel and her freight, the release of the Porto Alexandre was ordered by the Liverpool District Registrar. The salvors thereupon appealed to the Vacation judge, who set aside the order of the district registrar, but without prejudice to the present motion, which was brought on the following grounds:—

(1) That the said steamship and freight were and are the public national property of, and (or) requisitioned by, and in the possession and public use and service of the Portuguese Government.

(2) That the steamship has been properly and lawfully condemned as prize of war by a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction of the said Portuguese Government.

(3) That the court has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit, or, alternatively, that it ought in its discretion to refuse to entertain this suit.

Miller, K.C. and W. Procter for the defendants.

Dunlop, K.C. and J. B. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.

Oct. 27. — Hill, J. — I have come to my decision in this case with very great reluctance, and if I am wrong, I shall be glad if the Court of Appeal sets me right. The writ in the action is in rem against the owners of the Portuguese steamship Porto Alexandre, her cargo and freight, in a claim for salvage services said to have been rendered by three tugs to the ship at the entrance to the River Mersey. The writ was followed by the arrest of the ship, freight, and cargo. On the 2nd Oct. 1919 the present notice of motion was served to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings, and it is expressed to be by the owners of the Porto Alexandre and her freight. The notice does not state that it is given on behalf of the Portuguese Government, but counsel, who appears in support of the motion, says he appears on behalf of the Portuguese Government, and evidence has been brought before me, including a communication from the Portuguese Chargé d'Affaires to Lord Curzon, and communicated by the Foreign Office to this court. The grounds of the motion are, "That the steamship and freight were, and are, the national property of, and (or) requisitioned by, and in the possession and public use and service of the Portuguese Government."

First, it is to be noted that there is no motion in respect of the cargo. The writ is against the owners of the cargo, which was arrested, and therefore the writ against the cargo and the arrest of the cargo must stand. The only question I have to consider is whether I am bound to set aside the writ and arrest with reference to the ship and freight. On the original motion the only affidavits filed were by the Portuguese Consul and Vice-Consul at Liverpool. That was clearly not sufficient. A claim to immunity which is a claim by a sovereign State, must be made by the properly accredited representative of that State in this country. It has now been properly made by the Portuguese Chargé d'Affaires. The affidavits by the Consul and Vice-Consul, apart from the objection that they were not made by the proper persons to put forward the claim, were themselves insufficient. The affidavit of the Vice-Consul states that the Porto Alexandre was requisitioned by the Portuguese Government "for the service of the State and is enployed under the orders of the said Government." The affidavit does not state that the ship was the property of the State, or that it was at the time of the arrest being used in the service of the State. The ship was, in fact, carrying a cargo of cork shavings, under a bill of lading which shows that the goods were consigned to the Portuguese Import and Export Company Limited; and I take it that the shippers mentioned in the bill of lading are only the agents of the consignees. At the time of the arrest there was no evidence that the ship was being used by the Portuguese Government for State purposes, or was their property. There was a further affidavit by the Portuguese Consul, who produced the ship's passport, dated the 11th Aug. 1916, which shows that the ship, being a German ship, had been requisitioned by the Portuguese Government and was administered by the Commission of Maritime Transports, and that later on, on the 31st Jan. 1917, she had been condemned as a prize.

This shows that the ships had been condemned to the Portuguese Government in 1917, but it does not show that the ship was the property of the Portuguese Government at the date of the arrest, a most important date. There has been sent and communicated to the court, however, a letter from the Portuguese Chargé d'Affaires in this country, who informs the Foreign Office that the Porto Alexandre is a public vessel belonging to the Government of the Portuguese Republic. Again, that does not state that the ship was being used in the public service, or being used for public purposes; but counsel, who moves to set aside the writ, says he is not concerned with that. He says that the ship was the property of the Portuguese Government at the time of the arrest and still is, and that this court cannot exercise any jurisdiction over it or, through it, over the Portuguese Government.

I must take it that the Porto Alexandre is, as she is stated to be, a public vessel belonging to the Portuguese Republic. In my view this court cannot permit the arrest of a ship which is the property of a foreign sovereign State, for it cannot compel that State—the Portuguese Government—to submit to the jurisdiction of this court, and it cannot so compel it, either directly by suing the Portuguese Government in person, or indirectly by arresting the property of the Portuguese Government in a suit in rem. That I conceive to be the law, unless it be the law that the foreign Government waives that immunity if it employs the ship, which is its property, in commerce. Here, upon the facts, I should be quite prepared to find that this ship was being used in ordinary commerce, and that the only interest of the Portuguese Government in the ship at this time, and on this voyage, was in earning freight.

Therefore the question comes to this: Is it a principle of law that a foreign State, which owns a ship, loses its immunity from being proceeded against by the arrest of the ship, if it is at the time employing the ship in ordinary commerce? That point has, I think, been determined by none of the cases dealt with during the war. Most were cases of requisitioned ships, and in every one of them, upon the facts, the ship was being employed for purposes which were undoubtedly national. I have looked into a good many of the cases, and it is within my recollection that I am accurately stating what the effect of those cases was. In the case of The Messicano (1916) W. N. 218) the ship was carrying war material for the Italian Government; in The Erissos (Lloyd's List, Oct. 23, 1917) the ship was carrying coal for the Italian State Railways; in The Esposende (Lloyd's List, Feb. 18, Feb. 25, 1918) the vessel was carrying goods for the French Government; in The Crimdon (35 Times L. Rep. 81) the ship was engaged in transport work; in The Koursk (Lloyd's List, June 19, 1918) the ship was carrying goods for the British Government for State purposes; in The Broadmayne (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 356; 114 L. T. Rep. 891; (1916) P. 64), the ship was carrying a cargo of oil, which was the property of the British Government. Therefore, I do not find the question now before me is decided by any of those cases which have arisen during the war, although counsel has called my attention to obiter dicta which I used, and which, if sound, show that where the ship is the property of the State, then the immunity arises in whatever manner the ship is being employed by that State. I nearly, in fact, decided The Esposende (sup.) upon that ground, and I am deciding this case as I am deciding it because my view is that the law, as it now stands and as laid down in The Parlement Belge (42 L. T. Rep. 273; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234; 5 Prob. Div. 197), is that a sovereign State cannot be impleaded, either directly by being served in person, or indirectly by proceedings against its property, and that in applying that principle it matters not how the property is being employed.

No doubt before The Parlement Belge (sup.) there is a good deal of authority in this court to support the proposition that it is an exception to that principle if the sovereign State is using the ship in the ordinary way of commerce, and certainly that was the view of Sir Robert Phillimore in The Charkieh (29 L. T. Rep. 404; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 59) and in The Parlement Belge, but it is true that this particular point did not arise for immediate decision upon the facts of the case as found by the Court of Appeal in The Parlement Belge, for, after the proposition of law had been stated, the facts made it unnecessary to decide the law in precise terms, because it was found that the ship was mainly used for carrying mails, and only in a subservient degree for the purpose of trade. It is quite true that throughout The Parlement Belge frequent use is made of expressions such as "a public ship used for public purposes;" but if the principle be that it is contrary to international comity to implead a Sovereign either directly or indirectly, that appears to me to apply whether the ship is employed in commerce or not. To arrest a Sovereign's ship is to implead him, and that, I conceive, is what the courts of this country will not do. It is quite clear that you cannot implead the Crown indirectly by arresting its property. (Young v. Steamship Scotia, 89 L. T. Rep. 374; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 485; (1903) A. C. 501). The immunity of the Crown rests upon the principle that the King cannot be impleaded in his own courts, and, as I understand the law, international comity requires that a corresponding immunity should be granted to a foreign sovereign State.

I therefore think that this motion succeeds upon the ground that it is established that this ship, the Porto Alexandre, was the property of the Portuguese Government; and it follows that so far as the owners of the ship and freight are concerned, the writ and all subsequent proceedings must be set aside, but the writ and all subsequent proceedings, so far as the cargo is concerned will remain good.

I have already, in previous cases, pointed out what I conceive to be very strong reasons why it is undesirable that cases should be withdrawn from the Courts, but I am only asserting now what I conceive to be the law.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Nov. 10.—C. R. Dunlop, K.C. and J. B. Aspinall, for the appellants.

D. Stephens, K.C. and A. Wallace Grant, for the defendants, the respondents, were not called upon.

Bankes, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Hill, J., who made an order that the writ and warrant for arrest, and all subsequent proceedings, against the Porto Alexandre and freight be set aside, but that the proceedings against the cargo should stand. The learned judge was only concerned with the question of the ship and freight, and so is this appeal.

The vessel was on a voyage from Lisbon to Liverpool, when she ran aground in the Mersey, and three tugs were engaged to get her off. An action was brought, and the ship was arrested in respect of the services rendered by these tugs. The application was founded upon the contention that the ship was the property of a sovereign State, the Republic of Portugal, and, that she was thus exempt from arrest. The conclusion of fact at which the learned judge arrived was that it had been established that the ship was the property of the Portuguese Government at the time of the arrest and is still their property, and on that ground he made the order.

It is now contended that it is not sufficient for a sovereign or a sovereign State to allege that a vessel is the property of such Sovereign or sovereign State, and that the allegation must go further and say the vessel is employed in the public service or on public service.

The facts with regard to the vessel are as follows: She was formerly a German vessel, and in Aug. 1916, was requisitioned by the Portuguese Government. On 11th Aug. what is called a passport was issued, which authorised the employment of the ship, and certain notes upon it, indicating that during the period that vessel was at the service of the Portuguese Government, for which she was requisitioned, her port of register should be Lisbon. There is also an indorsement on the passport stating that on the 30th Jan. 1917, she was adjudged a lawful prize of war. Counsel for the appellant has pointed out that the statement that she was adjudged a lawful prize of war leaves it doubtful whether she has become the actual property of the Portuguese Government, or was merely detained pending the conclusion of peace. It would rather appear that the latter is the proper conclusion, because there is an affidavit by the Portuguese Vice-Consul at Liverpool, who says that the vessel is, and has been, requisitioned by the Portuguese Government for the service of the State, and is employed under the orders of the Government. There is a further statement in writing by the Portuguese Consul at Liverpool, in which he says, in reference to this particular voyage, that the freight on the cargo was paid before shipment and belongs solely and entirely to the Portuguese Government. In addition, there is a letter from the Portuguese Chargé d'Affaires, in which he states definitely that the Porto Alexandre is a public-service vessel belonging to the Portuguese Government.

There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statements that have been made on affidavit—that the vessel has been requisitioned under the order of the Portuguese Government, and that, on the particular voyage, she was carrying freight for that Government. It is, however, contended that that is not sufficient because it is shown that she was engaged in what the counsel for the appellants says was an ordinary commercial undertaking, as an ordinary trading vessel carrying goods for a private individual or company. The question is whether it is possible to distinguish this case from The Parlement Belge (sup.), a decision of this court and binding upon us.

I gather from the judgment of Hill, J., and from what has been said by counsel, that this question is becoming one of increasing importance. In the days when the early decisions were given, no doubt, what were called Government vessels were limited almost entirely to vessels of war. But in modern times, Sovereigns and sovereign States have taken to owning ships, which may to a still greater extent be employed as ordinary trading vessels engaged in ordinary trading. The fact of itself indicates the growing importance of the particular question, if vessels so employed are to be deemed free from arrest.

The function of this court is to decide whether this particular case is covered by The Parlement Belge. I think that it is, and it is therefore not necessary or desirable that the court should enter upon a discussion of the wider question at this stage, or consider the importance of other views that may be taken. There is very little difference between the material facts in The Parlement Belge (sup.) and in the present case, and in my opinion The Parlement Belge covers this case. It is quite true that in many of the earlier cases the claim put forward, with regard to a particular ship, was that she was on public service and employed in the public service, and no doubt the statement so made was applicable to the particular case, and was made because it was applicable to the particular case, and the judgments were delivered in reference to the facts so stated. But in this case the court is bound by The Parlement Belge (sup.), and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the case is clearly covered by The Parlement Belge (sup.), and we have therefore no alternative but to dismiss the appeal.

The facts proved appear to me to amount to this: First, that the ship in question is a public vessel, the property of the Portuguese Government; next, it is proved by the affidavits that she is in the possession for the service of the State; and, thirdly, that she is employed under the orders of the Government. I will refer to one passage in the judgment of Brett, L.J. in The Parlement Belge in which he is expressing what he considers to be the result of the judgment in Briggs v. Light Boats (1865, 93 Mass. 157), an American case, of which he obviously approves and on which he founds his own conclusion. He says: "The ground of that judgment is that the public property of a government in use for public purposes is beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of either its own or any other state, and that the ships of war are beyond such jurisdiction, not because they are ships of war, but because they are public property. It puts all the public movable property of a State, which is in its possession for public purposes, in the same category of immunity from jurisdiction as the person of a Sovereign, or of an ambassador, or of ships of war, and exempts it from the jurisdiction of all courts for the same reason—viz., that the exercise of such jurisdiction is inconsistent with the independence of the sovereign authority of the State." And then again, when he is summing up the principle which he thinks is to be deduced from all the cases he says, "As a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority and of the international comity which induces every sovereign State to respect the independence of every other sovereign State, each and every one declines to exercise by means of any of its courts, any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any Sovereign or ambassador of any other State, or"—and these are the material words—"over the public property of any State which is destined to its public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such Sovereign, ambassador or property be within its territory, and, therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction." Whatever may be the actual use to which the ship is put, I think the evidence is quite sufficient to show that she is the property of the State, and is destined to public use; and therefore, the case seems to me to come exactly within the principle of the judgment in The Parlement Belge (sup.).

Scrutton, L.J. stated shortly the facts and continued:—This and other States proceed in their jurisprudence on the assumption that sovereign States are equal and independent, and that, as a matter of international courtesy, no one sovereign independent State will exercise any jurisdiction over the person of the Sovereign or the property of any other sovereign State; and now that the Sovereigns move about more freely than formerly, and Sovereigns and States do things which they used not to do, the question arises whether there are any limits to the immunity which international courtesy gives as between sovereign independent States and their Sovereigns. I think it has been well settled, first, as to the Sovereign, that there are no limits to the immunity which he enjoys. His private character is as free as his public character. If he chooses to come into this country under an assumed name and to indulge in privileges not peculiar to Sovereigns, of making promises of marriage and breaking them, the English courts still say, on his appearing in his true character of Sovereign and claiming his immunity, that he is wholly free from the jurisdiction of our courts: (Mighell v. Sultan of Johore, 70 L. T. Rep. 64; (1894) 1 Q. B. 149). It has been held, as counsel admits in The Parlement Belge (sup.) that trading on the part of a Sovereign does not subject him to any liability to the jurisdiction. His ambassador is in the same position; an ambassador coming here as an ambassador of the Sovereign may engage in private trading, but it has been held that this immunity still protects him even from proceedings in respect of his private trading. Jervis, C.J. in Taylor v. Best (1854, 18 Jur. 402; 14 C. B. 487, 519): " . . . if the privilege does attach, it is not, in the case of an ambassador or public minister, forfeited by the party's engaging in trade, as it would, by virtue of the proviso in 7 Anne, c. 12, s. 5, in the case of an ambassador's servant. If an ambassador or public Minister, during his residence in this country, violates the character in which he is accredited to our court, by engaging in commercial transactions, that may raise a question between the Government of this country and that of the country by which he is sent; but he does not thereby lose the general privilege which the law of nations has conferred upon persons fulfilling that high character—the proviso in the statute of Anne limiting the privilege in cases of trading applying only to the servants of the embassy." There being no limitation in the case of the Sovereign, nor of the ambassador, is there any in the case of the property? Counsel has argued that in the case of property of the State there is a limitation and that, as I understand him, if the property is employed in trading, that cannot be for the public service of the State.

We are concluded in this court by The Parlement Belge (sup.). Sir Robert Phillimore took the view that trading with the property of a State might render that property liable to seizure; but the Court of Appeal overruled the views of Sir Robert Phillimore, as I understand them. The principle then laid down has been recited by the other members of the court. Brett, L.J. said: "As a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority and of the international comity which induces every sovereign State to respect the independence of every other sovereign State, each and every one declines to exercise by means of any of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any Sovereign or ambassador of any other State, or over the public property of any State which is destined to its public use. . . ." One of the reasons given seems to me conclusive. The moment property is arrested in the Admiralty Court a proceeding is instituted against the person, and he is compelled to appear if he wants to protect his property; and by seizing his property the personal rights of the Sovereign or the personal rights of the State are infringed. The position seems to me to be very accurately stated in the seventh edition of Hall's International Law at p. 211, where, after dealing with the warships and public vessels so called, Mr. Hall goes on to deal with other vessels employed in the public service and property possessed by the State within foreign jurisdiction, and says: "If in a question with respect to property coming before the courts a foreign State shows the property to be its own and claims delivery, jurisdiction at once fails, except in so far as it may be needed for the protection of the foreign State."

I quite appreciate the difficulty and doubt which Hill, J., felt because no one can shut his eyes, now that the fashion of nationalisation is in the air, to the fact that many States are trading, or are about to trade, with ships belonging to themselves; and if these national ships wander about without liabilities, many trading affairs will become difficult. But while it seems to me that The Parlement Belge (sup.) excludes remedies in court, there are practical commercial remedies. If ships of the State find themselves left on the mud because no one will salve them, when the State refuses any legal remedy for salvage, their owners will be apt to change their views. If the owners of cargoes on national ships find that the ship runs away and leaves them to bear all the expenses of salvage, there may be found a difficulty in finding cargoes for national ships. These are matters to be dealt with by negotiations between Governments, and not by Governments exercising their power to interfere with the property of other States, contrary to the principles of international courtesy which govern the relations between independent and sovereign States. I think it is clear that we must in this court support the decision of Hill, J., and dismiss the appeal.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Sale of goods—Goods to be shipped during stated period—Declaration—Cancellation.

A contract for the sale of pepper at sellers' risk until delivery required the sellers to declare in writing to the buyers with due dispatch "the name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars," and continued: "Should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels."

The contract contained a marginal note, headed "Loss or Transhipment," to the following effect: "Should the vessel or vessels and the goods or any portion thereof be lost, this contract to be cancelled for the whole or such portion; but should the vessel or vessels be lost and the goods or any portion thereof be transhipped to some other vessel or vessels and arrive on account of the original importer, the contract to stand good for the whole or such portion."

The pepper (which under the contract was to be shipped between Dec. 1917 and Feb. 1918 by a steamer or steamers from the East to Liverpool) was shipped on a steamer which sailed on the 21*st Jan.* 1918 and was lost with her cargo on the 26*th Feb.*

A declaration in due form was made on the 27*th March* 1918 by the defendants, at a time when the loss of the vessel was known to both parties, and contained a note in these terms: "Owing to the vessel having been lost by enemy action, this contract is now cancelled."

The plaintiffs refused to accept this declaration, and brought an action for failure to deliver under the contract.

Held, that the sellers, having shipped the goods and made the requisite declaration with due dispatch, were not liable for non-delivery if the vessel and the goods were lost either before or after the declaration was made, and that the knowledge of the loss was not material. The plaintiffs' action therefore failed.

Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71, 393; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233) distinguished and on one point doubted.

Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of contract to deliver a quantity of Muntok white pepper, which was to be shipped from the East to Liverpool at the seller's risk. The pepper was shipped in a vessel which sailed in Jan. 1918. The vessel and her cargo were lost at sea on the 26th Feb. 1918. On the 27th March 1918 the defendants declared the shipment, but both plaintiffs and defendants knew by then that the ship and her cargo had been lost at sea and the plaintiffs therefore refused to accept the declaration.

The facts are fully stated in the judgments.

On the 19th June 1919 the action came on for trial in the Commercial Court before Bailhache, J.

G. D. Keogh for the plaintiff.

Barrington-Ward, K.C. and Maurice Gwyer for the defendants.

The following cases were referred to during the arguments:

Mambre Saccharine Company v. Corn Products Company, 120 L. T. Rep. 113; (1919) 1 K. B. 198;

Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71, 393; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 20, 1919.—Bailhache, J. read the following judgment:—In this case the plaintiffs sue the defendants for failure to deliver ten tons of Muntok white pepper sold to them under a contract of the 11th Dec. 1917. By its terms the pepper was to be shipped from the East from Dec. 1917 to Feb. 1918, and was to be delivered to the buyers in Liverpool. Until delivery the pepper was to be at the seller's risk. The contract required the sellers to declare the name of the vessel, marks and full particulars in writing with due dispatch.

The plaintiffs were the last of a string of buyers. The pepper was shipped in the Eumaeus under a bill of lading dated the 17th Jan. 1918, and the Eumaeus sailed four days later. So far everything was in order. On the 13th Feb. the defendants, having received a provisional declaration from their sellers, passed it on to the plaintiffs. The provisional declaration did not comply with the terms of the contract and was not, and was not meant to be, the declaration required by the contract. It was sent as an act of courtesy.

On the 26th Feb. 1918 the Eumaeus was lost at sea with her cargo. On the 27th March the defendants received a declaration in due form of the pepper from their sellers, and on the same day made a declaration to the plaintiffs, also in due form, adding these words: "Owing to the vessel having been lost by enemy action this contract is cancelled."

Upon this state of facts two questions arise: first, were the defendants entitled to make a declaration of goods known to them to be lost at sea before the declaration was made and did such loss excuse non-delivery under this contract? And secondly, was the declaration of the 27th March made with due dispatch?

The answer to the first question depends on the construction of two clauses in the contract. One clause has a marginal note "Declaration of shipment," and it reads thus;

The name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars to be declared to the buyers in writing, with due dispatch, but should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels, on the production of the bill of lading or other satisfactory proof of shipment by sellers as soon as fairly practicable after the loss is ascertained.

The other clause has the marginal note "Loss or transhipment," and it reads thus:

Should the vessel or vessels and the goods or any portion thereof be lost this contract to be cancelled for the whole or such portion, but should the vessel or vessels be lost and the goods or any portion thereof be transhipped to some other vessel or vessels and arrive on account of the original importer, this contract to stand good for the whole or such portion.

These two clauses are largely redundant and certainly might be more happily worded. In my opinion their meaning and effect is that a seller who duly ships the contractual goods and makes the requisite declaration with due dispatch, is excused from liability for non-delivery if the vessel and goods are lost whether before or after declaration, and knowledge of the loss at the time of making the declaration is immaterial.

The contract as regards goods so shipped and declared is cancelled. I think it immaterial, but it is satisfactory to note that the provisional declaration appropriating this particular shipment to this contract was sent to the plaintiffs before the Eumaeus was lost. This shows that the formal declaration was not an afterthought and incidentally gave the plaintiffs an opportunity to insure their profit had they been so minded.

The second question is whether the declaration of the 27th March was made with due dispatch. It was rather more than two months after shipment but it was made as soon as the defendants received the declaration from their sellers and, as I understand, as soon as the necessary details reached this country. I do not see any duty on the shipper to cable these details, and in 1918 the post from the East was irregular. It is true that the defendants themselves wrote a letter expressing the view that the declaration was too late, but commercial men are astute, and that expression of opinion would have been useful in any claim over against their sellers in the event of the success of the plaintiffs' contention. In my opinion, the declaration was made with due dispatch.

In the result both questions in the case must be answered in favour of the defendants. There will be judgment for the defendants, and with costs.

From that decision the plaintiff now appealed.

Disturnal, K.C. and G. D. Keogh for the appellant.

Barrington-Ward, K.C. and Mitchinson for the respondents.

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Bailhache, J., and it is not an easy question which has to be determined, because the terms of the contract are, as he said, in some ways rather inconsistent one with the other.

It was a sale upon the form of Arrival Contract, Landed Terms, of the General Produce Brokers' Association of London. It was a sale of 10 tons of Muntok white pepper at 1*s.* 8*d.* per lb., landed terms, to be shipped during the months of Dec. 1917 and Jan. or Feb. 1918, per steamer or steamers from the East via canal to Liverpool.

Then there was a provision that the buyers should take a sea-damaged part of the cargo with an allowance. Then there was also a provision as to the terms of landing, the result, in my opinion, being that Bailhache, J. was right when he said that the goods remained at the risk of the sellers until arrival and until after arrival, the length of time which is mentioned in the contract. It has no analogy to a c.i.f. contract at all.

Then there follow the two clauses upon which the whole question turns. The first of them proved that: "The name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars to be declared to the buyers in writing with due dispatch, but should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels, on the production of the bill or bills of lading, or other satisfactory proof of shipment by the sellers, so soon as fairly practicable after the loss is ascertained."

With the marginal note "Loss or transhipment" the other clause provided that: "Should the vessel or vessels and the goods or any portion thereof be lost, this contract to be cancelled for the whole or such portion, but should the vessel or vessels be lost, and the goods or any portion thereof be transhipped to some other vessel or vessels and arrive on account of the original importer, this contract to stand good for the whole of such portion."

The vessel declared was a vessel called the Eumaeus. She sailed on the 21st Jan. 1918, and she was lost some time in Feb. 1918, and in that month certain letters passed between the parties, the first being from the brokers, Messrs. Laird and Adamson, to Messrs. Wright, Crossley, and Co., saying: "Against your contract dated 11th Dec. 1917 for 10 tons Muntok white pepper. Sellers have received cable advice of shipment above. Per steamer 19th Jan. 1918, which information we pass on to you under the usual reserves and subject to mail confirmation which please note."

It was argued at one time that that was an appropriation of the goods upon that vessel to this contract, although the vessel was not named. I do not think that it was. There is no identification of the vessel at all. It was not contended that it was a declaration of the contract, but it was said that it was an appropriation of the goods upon the vessel to the contract. I do not think that it was for the reason which I have given, that the vessel is not identified at all.

The declaration that was given was on the 27th March, some considerable time after the loss, and at a time when the loss was known to both parties. At any rate it was known to the sellers, and I think that it was known to both parties. Again, it is from Messrs. Laird and Adamson: "Against your contract, dated 11th Dec. 1917, for 10 tons M.W. pepper the sellers declare in fulfilment," then they give the marks and numbers of the bags—"this contract is cancelled owing to the vessel having been sunk by enemy action. Bill of lading, dated 17th Jan., which please note."

The sellers were in a chain and they had received from their sellers a similar declaration. They did not accept the contention of their sellers that the contract was cancelled, and there was an arbitration with regard to the matter, with which we need not concern ourselves at all. The plaintiffs here, the buyers, took the same position as their sellers had done and refused to accept the cancellation of the contract, and an arbitration was held, which terminated, I think, before the arbitrators in their favour.

The defendants, the sellers, wished to appeal to the council of the association. The council declined to hear the appeal because the parties were not members of the association. That award was afterwards set aside and the case came before Bailhache, J., who decided that the contract was cancelled and therefore that the defendants were discharged from their obligations under it.

These are the facts and it is upon those facts that the question arises whether the decision of the learned judge was right or not.

His decision certainly seems at first sight to be in conflict to some extent with the decision of the Divisional Court in the case of Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71, 393; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233) although in my opinion the contracts were not the same, and although certainly one of the learned judges in that case treated the matter as though he had a c.i.f. contract before him, which was not the case.

However, that case has certainly been observed upon in some subsequent judgments, especially in Produce Brokers Company Limited v. Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71, 393; 112 L. T. Rep. 744; 114 Ibid. 94; (1916) 1 A. C. 314) by Scrutton, L.J. All I think that it is sufficient to say about that case is that it was upon a different contract, and therefore I do not think it is necessary for me to consider whether it was right or whether it was wrong.

But on one point I do respectfully dissent from the opinion expressed in that case, and that point is this: The learned judges seem to me to have held, and in fact they did hold, that although a clause of this kind might operate as a cancellation of the contract where the loss was not known to the party making the declaration, it could not do so if that loss was known to the party making the declaration.

With respect, I do not think except as a matter of bona fides or mala fides (and no mala fides is suggested here) that the knowledge makes any difference. Either the declaration may be made after loss or it may not. If it is not a good declaration because the subject-matter of the declaration is no longer in existence, that is a matter which is independent of the knowledge of the parties at all and the only relevance that the knowledge might have would be, as I say, as indicating mala fides, which is not there alleged. On that point, with respect, I do not agree with the opinions expressed by the learned judges in that case. And I have some confidence in saying so because I think in what I am saying on that point I am agreeing with what was thrown out by the Court of Appeal in the case to which I have referred, in which the decision of the Divisional Court was commented upon.

The argument for the appellant in the present case was in the main this: First, that this was not a vessel which may apply to this contract. It did not satisfy those words, it was contended, because no vessel can apply to the contract until the declaration has been made, and, therefore, the vessel when she was lost was not a vessel which applied to the contract.

The second and, I think, the main argument was this: The clause which I have read, which deals with the vessel being lost before declaration, is only a clause which means that, when the declaration is made, it is a contract to deliver by a named ship, and it imposes two obligations upon the sellers, namely, to deliver the goods and to deliver them by that ship. All that was intended by this clause, it was said, was to exonerate the sellers from the obligation to deliver by that particular ship and that, therefore, although they were exonerated from that obligation, there still remained the obligation to deliver in some other way. They could substitute a ship which otherwise they could not have done. And considerable stress was laid in support of that argument upon the words "the contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels."

It was said that that means not so far as regards the goods on the vessel, and that portion of the goods, but as regards the vessels and the vessels alone. In support of that argument it was pointed out that in the subsequent clause "Should the vessel or vessels and the goods or any portion thereof be lost," it was provided "this contract to be cancelled for the whole or such portion," dealing with the goods and not with the vessel.

There is considerable force in that argument and it certainly shows that this contract is not made with the clearness which might be desired.

Another matter was also pointed out. I think both parties agree that the second clause with the marginal note "loss or transhipment" must be confined to loss of the vessel or goods after declaration, and, although it does not say so, I think that is the reasonable construction of the matter. If another view were taken and this second clause were held according to the strict letter to apply to losses before declaration, then undoubtedly it would be in conflict with the previous clause. But as applied to losses after declaration it does not conflict in the same way with the previous clause.

There does remain, however, this difficulty: that, construing these clauses as the respondents invite us to do, and as Bailhache, J. has done, losses before declaration and losses after declaration are treated in a different way. Before declaration if the vessel is lost and part of the cargo comes forward, the contract is still cancelled and the buyer is not obliged to accept that transhipped portion. In the case of the loss after declaration, he has to accept any transhipped portion which comes forward, and no particular reason was pointed out why the loss before declaration was to be treated in a different way from loss after declaration.

I pointed out these difficulties because I confess that they caused a good deal of doubt in my mind, but considering all those difficulties, and giving due weight to all those difficulties, I think that the construction which Bailhache, J. put upon this contract is the right one, and I think that the intention was this, to safeguard the sellers against difficulties that he might get into if he had made a late shipment and the vessel was lost before they had time to make the declaration.

The declaration was to be made "with due dispatch" and it might very well be, especially in war time, that "due dispatch" would be at a time when the contract period had expired and that the sellers might find themselves in a difficulty of having made a late shipment and not being able to make their declaration until it was too late for them to substitute a shipment even if they could do it.

I think their intention was, amongst other things, to safeguard themselves against a position of that sort, and when they say "This contract is to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels," I think the words were used which convey a great deal more than simply "This declaration shall be set aside" or "This declaration shall not be considered as binding."

It is true that the contract says "as regards such lost vessel or vessels." But I think that that must mean as regards the parcel which is carried upon such lost vessel or vessels. In the present case the parcel carried was the whole parcel—the whole subject of the contract—and therefore the contract would be cancelled as regards the whole of it.

I think that the vessel which may apply to this contract is not ascertained in future declarations made, but this contemplates such a declaration may be made after the loss, and that this vessel was a vessel which applied to the contract; she was lost before the declaration, and, putting the proper construction as I think it ought to be upon the words, the contract was cancelled with regard to that vessel and what she was carrying.

I think, therefore, that the learned judge's decision was right and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree.

I have felt the same doubts as the Master of the Rolls has expressed in his judgment. But upon a survey of the whole of this contract I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned judge in the court below was right.

It was contended that this clause could not apply to the case where the vessel was lost at the time the declaration was made before it was said you could only make a declaration of an existing vessel and therefore there would be no vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract, if, as a matter of fact the vessel had been lost before the declaration was sought to be made.

As authority for that proposition the case of Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited (ubi sup.) was cited. I think that that proposition is too wide because eventually it had to be conceded that if the facts were these, that a shipment was made and a declaration was then made in ignorance of the loss of the ship, and it was then ascertained after the declaration that the ship had been lost before the declaration, that was the state of facts to which this clause was intended to apply. That is common ground. At any rate, that is conceded on behalf of the appellants.

If that is so, then there is a vessel or vessels which in the terms of the clause applies to the contract. It is the vessel or vessels which had been applied to the contract by the declaration, and it seems to me, therefore, to be unnecessary to consider the larger proposition, which is too wide for the purposes of the appellant's case, that in dealing with this clause you may not make a declaration and cannot make a valid declaration where the ship has been lost. That case was decided by the divisional court upon a different contract, not containing these clauses. Whether it is now a binding authority or not is a matter which will have to be decided when the actual proposition of law for which it is an authority comes into question again. But I do not think it is really helpful in this case, because here you have to construe this special clause.

One starts with the proposition which is admitted by the appellant, and which I think has to be admitted by the appellant that the clause applies in a case where the declaration has been made after loss, but without knowledge of loss. And if it so applies I see no reason at all why it should not apply where a declaration is made after loss, but with knowledge of the loss. There seems to me to be no reason at all in business why there should be any difference between those two questions.

I think the true construction of this clause is that if a declaration is made, then the ship which is named in the declaration is the vessel which applies to the contract, and I think that the declaration may be made either with or without knowledge of the loss.

Under those circumstances, if the vessel was lost before the date of the declaration, then the clause proceeds to say: "This contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels." The contention on the part of the appellant was that that ought to be read that such declaration is to be treated as inoperative. If it really meant that, it was a very easy thing to say and instead of saying that the declaration was inoperative the words go not to the declaration, but they go to the cancellation of the contract; "This contract to be cancelled so far as regards such lost vessel or vessels on production of proof of shipment." I think that must mean proof of shipment in pursuance of the contract.

Under those circumstances it appears to me that the true view is what the clause says, namely, that the contract is cancelled so far as the goods which are coming forward in that vessel are concerned, and so far as the obligation to deliver that quantity of goods under the contract is concerned.

I think that one is helped in that conclusion by reading the provisions which are annexed to the contract at the back of the contract, rule 9 of the General Brokers' Association of London, one clause (c) of which states "Each declaration is to be treated as a separate contract." The net effect, I think, is that when a seller has shipped goods in compliance with the contract on board the ship he is then, if the ship is lost, to be entitled to relieve himself of the contract if he is able to appropriate the goods to some contract that he has made, and in respect of which he still has the right of appropriation.

It is plain that the business of the contract and the meaning of the contract is this: While it is a contract for revival, if after a declaration and appropriation the vessel is lost, the obligation to deliver the goods is one from which the sellers are clearly intended to be relieved by the second clause.

Under those circumstances I can see nothing unusual in business for the sellers to bargain that they should be relieved before appropriation, if in fact they have shipped, within the terms of the contract, goods which if the ship had not been lost they would have been able to appropriate to the contract. That to my mind is the proper view of it. I think that the sellers did not mean to leave themselves with the burden, after they had shipped, perhaps on the last day of shipment, goods corresponding to the contract, of finding the ship lost and finding themselves under an obligation for breach of contract.

For these reasons I think that the view taken by the learned judge in the court below was right. I agree that questions may arise as to the construction of the second clause. If it is quite plain that those words only apply in the second clause to a loss after declaration, the difficulty is probably removed, But I do not desire to express any opinion upon that because those points may arise to be determined hereafter.

To my mind, on the facts of this particular case, the sellers were relieved from liability, and the decision of the learned judge in the court below was right.

YOUNGER, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

THE SVITHIOD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT, NOVA SCOTIA.

Prize Court — Neutral ship — Enemy stowaway— Unneutral service — Absence of facts justifying condemnation.

A German, who was a qualified third officer in the German mercantile marine, was taken on board a Swedish ship at Pernambuco bound for a Danish port with the connivance of the captain. The stowaway was discovered at Halifax (Nova Scotia), after the captain made some attempt to conceal his presence on board. There was no evidence that the stowaway was carried at the expense of the German Government or that he intended to go to Germany. The captain had on board two bags of rubber which was contraband and was carried as a venture of his own. The Prize Court at Halifax condemned the vessel.

Held, that on the facts of the case as proved there was no evidence of an unneutral service to support the decree of condemnation of the ship.

Judgment of the Prize Court reversed.

Order in Council, 7th July 1916, withdrawing partial adoption of Declaration of London.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—Their Lordships are much indebted to counsel on both sides for the unusually complete and exhaustive survey of all possible authorities bearing on a most important question, but, for reasons which their Lordships will briefly state, they do not think it necessary to deal with this case in such a manner as would require that time should be taken for its further consideration.

The case is one in which there is no appeal by the captain against the confiscation of the rubber which was his property. The learned local judge in Admiralty, Drysdale, J. has expressly said that for carrying the contraband rubber alone he would not have confiscated the ship, and that, although the captain of the Svithiod lied in certain particulars, that alone would not cost his owners their ship; and accordingly the case, although it has involved some discussion as to both the prevarication and falsehood of the captain, and his conduct, in having on board some contraband, really resolves itself, and always has resolved itself, into the question whether the captors made out, or laid foundation for making out, a case of unneutral service.

Upon that the evidence briefly stands as follows. There was a German stowaway on board the vessel found at Halifax. Their Lordships will assume that, as the learned trial judge found, this stowaway was taken on board in collusion with the captain of the vessel, although it may be pointed out that this is rather a matter of indirect inference from the probabilities of the case than dependent upon any fact positively deposed to. This person was the third mate of the Blucher, which had taken refuge in Pernambuco at the beginning of the war to avoid the risks of capture at sea, and had remained there for the best part of three years. Hellman came on board and purported to be a stowaway, and purported to discover himself when the ship was a sufficient length of time out of Pernambuco, and was then treated by the captain of the Svithiod with some consideration, and so the vessel reached Halifax. The vessel was a Swedish vessel, bound with a full cargo of maize from Buenos Ayres to a port of discharge in Denmark. The learned trial judge found that he was satisfied that the captain took the third officer intending to smuggle him to Germany. In their Lordships' opinion, that, however plausible as a matter of speculation, on this evidence is a matter of speculation only; because all that can be said is, on the one hand, that he was a German, and apparently that his relations were still alive in Germany, while, on the other hand, there is no evidence of any express intention on his part, or of anything done by him to throw any light on his further proceedings after arriving in Denmark; and for what it may be worth there is the fact that he had left Pernambuco under such circumstances of dispute with the other officers on board his ship, the Blucher, that the immediate cause of his discovery was in fact the sending of a letter by the first mate, which he must have known would fall into the hands of the British officials, betraying Hellman's presence on board, because he had gone away in debt to him and others. Therefore, it would be quite impossible, in their Lordships' opinion, to say that it has been proved that he was even going to Germany. What this man was, except that he was a mariner and a qualified third officer, the evidence does not show; and even assuming, as probably one may assume, because our eyes cannot be closed to circumstances of public notoriety connected with the war, that, if he reached Germany, some service in connection with the war would promptly have been found for him, the fact remains that he was at the time a seaman in an entirely private capacity seeking the opportunity of a voyage, by which he would at least escape from a further stay at Pernambuco, and proceeding at his own expense, or at the expense of the owners of this Swedish barque, it does not appear which, but without their cognisance at any rate. His case, therefore cannot be placed in the same category at all as the cases where the officers of a belligerent State have engaged a vessel to perform a particular service, or have paid for the carriage of particular passengers, or where persons, already embodied in the service of the belligerent country, are being transported upon some purpose of State.

Their Lordships are impressed with the fact that the circumstances of this case appear to lie outside the scope of any authority to which their attention has been drawn. It is true that when he reached Halifax the captain of the Svithiod endeavoured to conceal the presence of the man on board by means of very transparent devices, because, as he knew almost as soon as he was interrogated, the officials were already aware of the man's presence, and anything he might say or do could hardly do more than save appearances for himself, and enable him to say that he had not given the man up. The conduct of the captain of the Svithiod does not appear to their Lordships particularly aggravated. At any rate, if there is no sufficient evidence of an act which would constitute an unneutral service or a cause of condemnation under that or any analogous title, the mere deceptions of the captain of the Svithiod in themselves would not, either in justice or according to authority, be a ground for confiscating the vessel.

Their Lordships are, of course, very fully impressed with the great importance of the whole topic of unneutral service, particularly in view of the fact that the change in the circumstances under which maritime warfare is now carried on is so great since most of the cases relied upon were decided. On some proper occasion it might be necessary to define with very great accuracy the way in which well-known principles should be applied under modern conditions; but it is precisely because their Lordships are so impressed with the importance of the subject, with the high obligations which rest upon neutrals to refrain from all unneutral service, and with the gravity of that breach of duty, if it should occur, that they think it unnecessary, and therefore inexpedient and undesirable, to endeavour to decide any question of law in a case where, in their view, the captors have failed to lay any foundation in fact which would justify the investigation of so important a subject.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal succeeds; that the decree of confiscation ought to be set aside, and that the confiscated vessel ought to be restored to her owners. The respondent will pay the costs of the appeal.

THE ORTERIC. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT IN ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Enemy goods—Cargo—Passing of property after seizure—"Sale" of draft to bankers.

On the 22nd July 1914 the appellant, a British subject carrying on business in Sweden, sold 32,000 bushels of wheat to a German firm at Hamburg, payment to be made at Hamburg against shipping documents. The wheat was shipped on the 24th July in a British steamship, delivery to the order of the appellant, who indorsed the bills of lading in blank. The appellant drew on the buyers for the price in reichsmarks and sold the draft, with the bill of lading and policy attached, through brokers to a bank in New York for dollars, with a special indorsement to that bank. The vessel sailed for Hamburg before the outbreak of the war, but was diverted to Liverpool, where the wheat was seized on the 22nd Aug. 1914. The New York bank indorsed the draft to bankers in Hamburg and forwarded it, with the documents, to them to collect, the documents being received in Hamburg about the 25th Aug. 1914. The draft, unpaid and unaccepted, was eventually returned to the bank. A writ claiming condemnation was issued on the 18th Sept. 1914, and the bank, and afterwards the present appellant, claimed the goods.

Held, that the wheat could not be condemned as enemy goods since at the date of its seizure in prize it was not enemy property, and this general rule applied, although the property in the wheat had passed to an enemy before the issue of the writ claiming condemnation.

APPEAL from a decree of Sir Samuel Evans, P. (in Prize), dated the 11th Feb. 1918, condemning as enemy goods 32,000 bushels of wheat, part of the cargo of the British steamship Orteric.

Sir Erle Richards, K.C., Dunlop, K.C., and Dumas for the appellant.

J. G. Pease (with him Sir Gordon Hewart, A.-G.) for the respondent, the Procurator-General.

The facts and cases cited appear from the considered opinion of their Lordships, which was delivered by LORD SUMNER.—The claimant is a British subject, carrying on business at Galveston, Texas, U.S.A. On the 22nd July 1914 he sold to Eicholz and Loeser, of Hamburg, 32,000 bushels of wheat at a price reckoned in gold reichsmarks, "payment in Hamburg by net cash in exchange for shipping documents." By the terms of the contract it was "deemed to have been made in England, and to have been performed there." The seller had no anticipation of war at the time.

The wheat was shipped on board the British steamship Orteric, under bills of lading dated the 24th July 1914, making the wheat deliverable to shipper's order. The claimant duly indorsed them in blank. Insurance was effected with the Union Marine Insurance Company of Liverpool, through their New York branch. The claimant drew at eight days' sight on Eicholz and Loeser for the contract price in reichsmarks, attaching the certificate of insurance and the bills of lading, and, wishing not merely to collect money forthwith but to collect it in dollars, he "sold" the draft with documents attached through a firm of brokers to the National City Bank of New York, indorsing it specially to that bank. The brokers' "contract of exchange" describes this transaction as a "sale." The claimant rendered an invoice to the National City Bank for the amount of the draft less one-thirty-second, in dollars at a rate of exchange of 95, and drew a sight draft on them for that amount, which was duly paid. The first question in the case is whether this transaction was a sale in any sense.

The Orteric sailed for Hamburg before the outbreak of war, and on passage was diverted to Liverpool, where the wheat was seized. The Crown ought to have proved the date of this seizure, for it was very material, but did not do so. It was, however, stated at the trial that the seizure took place on the 22nd Aug. 1914, and this date the claimant accepted. The wheat was afterwards condemned by Sir Samuel Evans as enemy property.

The National City Bank of New York indorsed the draft to the Norddeutsche Bank in Hamburg on the 28th July 1914, and forwarded it, per the steamship Savoie, to that bank with the documents for collection for account of the Direction der Disconto-Gesellschaft of Berlin, the documents to be delivered to the drawees against payment. A special authority was added in the following terms: "You are hereby authorised, if requested to do so, to give a guarantee on our behalf to deliver to interested parties, if entitled thereto, by reason of acceptance or payment, the remaining bills of lading when received." These duplicate bills of lading went forward by the Carmania. The Disconto-Gesellschaft of Berlin was advised of this remittance of the documents to Hamburg "for the favour of collection and credit of our account with your good selves." In due course the Savoie reached Havre on the 5th Aug., and the Carmania reached Liverpool on the 7th Aug. 1914.

What happened in Hamburg is the second question in the case, and there is a good deal of dispute as to the facts and more particularly as to the date when those facts occurred. Eventually the draft and bills of lading came back to the National City Bank of New York. The draft was unpaid and unaccepted; the bills of lading had on the back of them something elaborately obliterated with black pigment. Beyond any real doubt that something was the indorsement of Eicholz and Loeser. After an interval, the bank sent these documents to the present claimant, and called on him to pay the draft, but never pressed their demand. He has neither paid nor been sued.

Certain letters are forthcoming from Eicholz and Loeser to the claimant and from the Disconto-Gesellschaft of Berlin to the National City Bank of New York. If the story they tell is true, the effect of it is this. Eicholz and Loeser had resold the wheat in four parcels, three to sub-purchasers in Hamburg and the fourth to a sub-purchaser in the interior of Germany. When they applied to them to know whether they would take up the documents, these persons in Hamburg, who probably had a very shrewd idea that they would never see the wheat, prudently replied that they would take them up when the wheat arrived. The fourth was telegraphed to but did not answer. It is consistent with these letters that Eicholz and Loeser were asked by the Norddeutsche Bank to accept the draft and made the above inquiries on one and the same day, namely, the 25th Aug. It is improbable that three days had elapsed between the presentation of the draft for acceptance and that date. Eicholz and Loeser say that the documents only arrived in Hamburg on the 25th Aug., and then were handed to them by the Norddeutsche Bank but were not taken up by them, and that they were then presented to the sub-purchasers. To make this presentation regular Eicholz and Loeser, as they say, indorsed the bills of lading. Whether this was done by arrangement with the Norddeutsche Bank does not appear. In any case, it was superfluous, for the bills of lading were already indorsed in blank. When the sub-purchasers refused or failed to take up the documents, the indorsement of Eicholz and Loeser was obliterated, and the bills of lading were returned to the bank.

The proceedings before the Prize Court, commenced by a writ dated the 18th Sept. 1914, form the conclusion of these transactions. The first to claim in prize were the National City Bank of New York, alleging that they owned the wheat. They supported their claim by inconsistent and contradictory affidavits. Their claim failed, and they do not now appeal. The appellant did not appear until nearly two years after the issue of the writ, and about seven months later he delivered his claim, alleging that the wheat was his. A passage from his evidence was much relied on for the Crown. It is as follows: "Q. You considered, did you not, the documents belonged to the National City Bank of New York?—A. Yes, only as a rule, when you sell documents and indorse them, you are supposed to be back of them. Q. Certainly. In other words, you were subject to your liability as indorser in case the drafts were dishonoured and not paid?—A. Yes, sir. Q. But your transaction with the National City Bank was intended to be an absolute sale of the documents?—A. Certainly. . . . Q. You don't know what authority . . . may have been given by the National City Bank of New York to its correspondent in Germany?—A. No. In the usual course of events, when you part with those documents, you have said 'good-bye' to the transaction."

The learned President, the late Sir Samuel Evans, relying on this passage among other circumstances, held that the appellant "never had any intention to reserve any property or interest in the wheat after he parted with the documents to the National City Bank of New York"; that the Bank were pledgees only, and that "the property had before the seizure passed to the German buyers." Plainly, therefore, not only the passing of the property, but the date on which the property passed were considerations germane to his conclusion that the wheat should be condemned.

Where, as in the present case, cargo is seized and a decree is asked that such "cargo" belonged at the time of capture and seizure thereof to enemies of the Crown, and as such is subject and liable to confiscation as good and lawful prize," the question before the Court is whether what was seized in prize was good prize—that is, whether the goods did or did not then belong to the King's enemies. This is the crucial date for the case of the captors. On the other hand, the position of things at subsequent dates may affect the claimant's rights, independently of any mere traverse of the captor's claim. Thus a claimant, having succeeded in his contention that what the captors seized was then his property, may fail nevertheless to establish a right to have it released to him if, before he comes before the court to claim as owner, it has become enemy property. He cannot then truly claim the goods as his. In order to obtain the release of the goods to himself, he has to prove that the goods were his when seized and that he is still the person who, so to speak, can give a good discharge for them if the Court decrees their release to him. In this attempt he has failed, apart from condemnation, if, in fact, they belong to an enemy: (The Prinz Adalbert, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 307; 116 L. T. Rep. 802; (1917) A. C. 586). It is in accordance with this principle that before releasing goods to a claimant the court satisfies itself that no enemy has any title to or interest in them. Many other considerations may affect the question of seizure. The time and circumstances of the alleged seizure may be inquired into in order to decide whether the seizure was valid (The Roumanian, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) 1 A. C. 124), or to decide whether what passed amounted to a seizure at all (Procurator in Egypt v. Deutsches Kohlen Depot Gesellschaft, 120 L. T. Rep. 102; (1919) A. C. 291). Belligerent rights are not exhausted by a single seizure; if a first seizure should be deemed bad, or its invalidity be apprehended, a second seizure under proper conditions may be made and relied upon. These are the questions which usually make the precise date of a seizure material, but none of these questions arose in the present case. If, as appears to be the fact, the goods did not become enemy goods, if at all, till after the 22nd Aug., the respondent was driven to contend that, for the purpose of deciding the issue of enemy goods or not enemy goods, the date of the writ will suffice as the material date. For this no authority was produced. Reliance was indeed placed on The Schlesien (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 510; 115 L. T. Rep. 555; (1916) P. 225), where the goods seized, having been neutral-owned at the date when they were first seized and at the date when a writ in prize was first issued, Sir Samuel Evans held that retention of possession by the Crown might be regarded as a continuous seizure, so that, when the goods had become enemy goods by the outbreak of war with Austria and a second writ had been thereafter issued, the requisites for their condemnation as enemy property were satisfied. If the first seizure was invalid and there was nothing to justify possession except such seizure, a second might be made, when the outbreak of war with Austria made seizure legitimate. The intention of the Crown after the original seizure to hold in the exercise of billigerent rights was found as a fact. The mode in which the cargo had been dealt with was not such as to exempt the goods from further seizure. The issue of the writ itself was not merely the expression of the purpose with which the Crown had continued in possession, though there had been no intermediate release, but it was in itself an overt and notorious act which, coupled with due service, might amount to a second and a valid seizure. It is not quite clear that this was Sir Samuel Evans' finding, but, whatever may be thought of this decision if it proceeded on other grounds, it is inapplicable to the present case. Here there is no second writ and no extraneous event at all to affect the status of the goods after the first seizure. The goods were seized once only and were seized as being then good prize, and this they were not if they were still British-owned. If the seizure was wrongful then, it does not become rightful by continuing the wrong. The captor cannot be allowed to benefit by the chance of what may happen while he delays to issue a writ, so that the chapter of events in the meantime may repair what was imperfect in his own proceedings. If the goods had been enemy goods when seized the captors would not have been defeated by a transfer of the property to a neutral before the writ could issue. If the captors take the goods of a neutral or a British subject by a bad seizure, they must, in order to avail themselves of a subsequent passing of the property to an enemy, make a fresh and valid seizure. Of this there was no vestige here.

In the present case the respondent proves nothing adverse to the claimant's title without either showing that the title to the wheat had been divested in favour of the National City Bank of New York before the decree, or had passed from the claimant and had become vested in Eicholz and Loeser before the seizure. As to the latter he proves nothing unless he relies on the statements made by Eicholz and Loeser in the letters which were put in. These letters say that the documents only arrived in Hamburg on the 25th Aug., and on this point at least the letters are self-consistent. The respondent produced nothing to the contrary except that the Savoie reached Havre on the 5th Aug. and the Carmania reached Liverpool two days later. In the circumstances then existing no inference can be drawn as to the date at which letters for Hamburg brought by these vessels would reach their destination. Substantial delay is certain. If the letters arrived on the 25th Aug. it may well be that they arrived earlier than might have been expected. Their Lordships are unable to conclude that the documents were in Hamburg by or before the date of the seizure of the wheat. namely, the 22nd Aug.

Further, in their Lordships' view, it is very improbable that the wheat ever vested generally in the National City Bank of New York, apart from a mercantile pledge, or ever vested in any German owner at all, and they conclude that neither vesting happened. There is no evidence whatever that Eicholz and Loeser or their sub-purchasers ever paid anything. Such evidence as there is goes entirely to the contrary. It was most strongly against the interest of both purchasers and sub-purchasers to part with any money under the circumstances against wheat that had not arrived and might well never arrive. It was contrary to the interests of the Norddeutsche Bank, who were in any case only agents and were acting on the instructions of an important bank in the principal neutral country, to allow the wheat to vest in others if no money was forthcoming. It is true that the bills of lading were indorsed by Eicholz and Loeser, but the Norddeutsche Bank, which allowed this to be done, also allowed the endorsement to be obliterated—a stupid thing in itself and provocative of objection by third parties—and returned them to America. The statement of Eicholz and Loeser is that most consistent with the probabilities of the case, namely, that for the purpose of getting money from the sub-purchasers, in case they could be prevailed upon to pay, they indorsed and presented the bills of lading without either taking them up or getting possession. In all probability a clerk from the bank kept them all the time, but attended when Eicholz and Loeser went to the sub-purchasers in order to exhibit the bills, ready to be delivered. They were never delivered. He took them back to the bank, and so, with the indorsement obliterated, they were sent back by the bank to New York. The whole tenor of the letters is quite consistent with the bills of lading never having been delivered to Eicholz and Loeser, in spite of the indorsement, and such is their Lordships' view.

Again it is wholly improbable that the documents were ever taken by the National City Bank of New York except by way of discount and security. Such would be the natural course of business, and as the transaction, by which the documents were transferred to them, was completed not only before the outbreak of war but even before its imminence became obvious, there was no reason for departing from the natural course. It is plain that when the claimant handed over the documents to the bank, he meant his contract of sale to Eicholz and Loeser to be completed by delivery to them of the bills of lading for the wheat. It is plain that all that the bank would get out of the transaction would be eight or nine dollars for discount. They cannot have meant to buy the wheat out and out, and, whether their statement that the wheat was their property was really believed by them or not, it is no doubt due to the uncertainty, which may well have existed before the decisions in The Miramichi (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21; 112 L. T. Rep. 349; (1915) P. 71) and The Odessa (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; 114 L. T. Rep. 10; (1916) 1 A. C. 145), as to the kind of ownership which is required to support a claim as owner in prize. As to the expression in the brokers' contract that the draft (not the wheat) was "sold," that is an intelligible, if inaccurate, expression for an exchange transaction, which would commonly be referred to as a sale of reichsmarks and a purchase of dollars.

There remains the above-quoted evidence of the claimant, as to which the respondent's argument was that he could not go back from his own evidence, but must be taken at his word. Their Lordships will say nothing to encourage the idea that claimants in prize can be allowed to deal uncandidly with the court or to modify in their own favour inconvenient admissions made by or binding upon themselves. It is, however, in fairness always necessary to ascertain what the evidence really means, and in this case the strongest light is thrown on the meaning by the familiar character of this type of transaction. In the vast majority of such cases the shipper does "say good-bye" to the transaction when he parts with the documents and receives the proceeds of the discount of the draft. In substance the documents are absolutely parted with, if not truly sold, for they are never likely to come back. Yet all the time the drawer remains "back of" the documents even when he has "sold" and indorsed them. Their Lordships think that the claimant, with some transatlantic locutions, was intending to describe the usual transaction, in which he would retain the general property and transfer to the bank only a special property by way of security, and that his language should not be further pressed against him. Nor can his case be prejudiced by the ambiguous conduct of the bank in the proceedings, or by their vacillation in asserting against him their claim to recourse on the draft. What rights and remedies may still be outstanding between the claimant and the bank their Lordships do not know and need not inquire. They are of opinion that the wheat never ceased to be the claimant's wheat till it was sold in the course of the proceedings in prize; that he is the owner of the proceeds which represent the wheat, free from any enemy interest; that he is entitled to have the decree of condemnation set aside and the proceeds of the wheat released to him; to have his appeal allowed with costs here and below, and to have returned to him in full his security lodged in the Prize Court. They will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE OSCAR II. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT IN ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Negligence in effecting capture—Ship sunk after collision—Loss of goods—Action against Procurator-General—Responsibility—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order II., r. 3.

A neutral vessel, upon which the goods of the respondent, who was also a neutral, were laden, was lost owing to a collision with an English warship whilst the latter was effecting her capture. The Procurator-General subsequently instituted proceedings in prize against part of the cargo laden on the neutral, but it was admitted that the respondent's goods, and the vessel herself, were not liable to be condemned. The respondent sued the Crown and the Procurator-General, and obtained an order for the restoration of the value of his lost goods.

Held, that under the Prize Court Rules 1914, whereby the Procurator-General was substituted for the actual captors, he was liable in such damages and costs as under the old procedure the actual captors were subject, and that the rules were not ultra vires so far as they imposed that liability.

Judgment of Prize Court affirmed.

APPEAL by the Crown from a judgment of Lord Sterndale, sitting as President of the Prize Court, dated the 3rd April 1919 (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 447; 121 L. T. Rep. 285; (1919) P. 171), ordering the restoration of the value of 250 bags of coffee laden on board the neutral ship Oscar II. to the respondents, and that their value should be ascertained by the registrar and merchants.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—In this case the Procurator-General appeals from a decree of Lord Sterndale, sitting in Prize, by which he ordered the restoration to the claimants, as owners, of 250 bags of coffee, part of the cargo of the Oscar II., their value to be ascertained hereafter by the registrar and merchants. It was admitted that the ship with her cargo was sunk on the 1st July 1915 by reason of a collision with H.M.S. Patuca, in which the latter was alone to blame; that the Patuca was engaged at the time in capturing the Oscar II. in order to bring her and her cargo into port as prize of war for the Crown; and that in fact the coffee was not liable to condemnation on any ground. No evidence was given nor were the precise circumstances explained under which the collision occurred. It is, however, clear that the captors' obligation to be answerable for due care in the custody and treatment of the property seized had already attached, and their Lordships were informed that the Oscar II. had reached port before she actually foundered in consequence of the collision. There seems to have been no salvage.

The owners of this coffee had a good claim against somebody. So much was not in dispute. The question was whether the Procurator-General could be made liable. Shortly after the Oscar II. sank, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty accepted liability both for ship and cargo, but as they claimed to limit the amount of the liability, no action was taken against the navigating officer. Matters then remained in abeyance until the following year. In March 1916, for reasons which must be surmised, the Procurator-General issued a writ praying condemnation as prize of part of the lost cargo of the Oscar II., the 250 bags in question not being included in the claim. In July 1918 the present claimants issued a writ to recover from the Crown and the Procurator-General damages for the loss of their cargo by reason of the collision, and the Procurator-General having entered an appearance and alleged that their action was misconceived, the question went to trial without further formal proceeding than an admission of facts. The learned President expressed a doubt whether the course taken by the claimants was correct in form but, as the question was merely one of procedure and could only affect costs, he treated the point as immaterial, and it has not been pressed on their Lordships as a ground for allowing the appeal. The true issue is the liability of the Procurator-General.

Captures at sea in time of war are made under the authority of the Crown in the exercise of its belligerent rights. In the regular course those who effect the capture must hold the Sovereign's commission, though a capture made without it may be afterwards ratified and adopted by the Crown. Subject to condemnation in Prize, the capture is for the Crown's benefit, and it is by the Crown's bounty that the actual captors participate in the fruits of the prize. On the other hand, the obligation is unquestioned to bring the prize in for condemnation and, pending its delivery into the custody of a Court of Prize, to safeguard it from avoidable injury or loss. This obligation is for the benefit of the parties interested, to whom the property may be released by the court if grounds of condemnation fail. These belligerent rights and these obligations towards neutrals are correlative and ought to correspond. They are rights and obligations of the Crown, though exercised and discharged by the proper executive officers.

The Prize Court Rules now make provision for the commencement of the proceedings for condemnation, to which, according to old practice, the actual captors were parties, by the issue of a writ in the name of the Crown only, by its proper officer who is the Procurator-General. As a result of this change the position of neutrals in a Court of Prize must be greatly prejudiced, unless, in assuming the position of captor in the Prize Court proceedings, the Crown also assumes responsibility towards neutral claimants. This matter came before their Lordships' Board in The Zamora (sup.), and, at least as regards liability for dealings with the res during the proceedings to the prejudice of the parties ultimately successful, the question was decided. What now remains open is responsibility for damage arising from failure to take care of the res prior to the commencement of proceedings in the Prize Court. Is there any reason why a similar conclusion should not be deduced from the orders and rules in the present case? If not, can it be said that to such extent the orders and rules are ultra vires?

The general effect of that judgment, so far as relates to the present question, is summed up in a passage on p. 111 (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 339): "In their Lordships' opinion these rules are framed on the footing that, where the Crown by its proper officer is a party to the proceedings, it takes upon itself the liability as to damages and costs, to which under the old procedure the actual captors were subject."

This passage does not limit the liability spoken of to the consequences of dealings which take place after the issue of the writ, and it sums up the whole argument upon the construction of the orders and rules, which forms the foundation of the judgment, in a manner which does not lend itself to a restricted application.

It was contended before their Lordships that the Procurator-General takes the place of captor only for the purpose of the proceedings in the Prize Court. Hence, it was said, he cannot as captor for that purpose have any responsibility for the derelictions of duty of persons, strangers to himself and his office, which took place before the proceedings began. It was said further, that the present proceedings, for the purpose of which alone he assumed the position of captor, are taken against other cargo and do not relate to the parcel of coffee in question, and that a claim cannot now be enforced against him at the instance of persons whose cargo he does not seek to have condemned.

In their Lordships' opinion, the effect of the Prize Court Rules is that, after the proceedings are instituted, the Procurator-General is the captor not for particular and specified purposes, but generally, though it is true that the actual captors are referred to in some rules for specific purposes, such as joint capture and prize bounty. It is not necessary for their Lordships to decide on the present occasion whether damages could have been claimed against him if he had commenced no proceedings in Prize, though they are not to be understood as negativing his liability even in such a case. They are, however, unable to find anything in the rules to limit his liability, since he has elected to begin proceedings, to such dealings with the subject-matter of the suit as took place in the course of it, and they think that, as a matter of construction, his position and liabilities cannot be so restricted.

Equally little are they able to accept the argument that his liability is only to such persons as may be interested in the actual goods whose condemnation he may have chosen to seek in such proceedings as he thinks fit to institute. The actual captors seized the whole ship and all her cargo. To bring any of it into port they had to bring in all, and they exposed all in common to the risk of such dereliction of duty as they were guilty of and were bound to deliver to the custody of the court all that they might ultimately bring in. Upon this argument, if there had been partial damage to part of the cargo instead of total loss of all, the Procurator-General might have chosen the undamaged cargo as the subject of his proceedings for condemnation and, by forbearing to ask for the condemnation of such cargo as suffered injury, might have escaped all liability in respect of it. Such a contention only needs to be stated to be dismissed. A Court of Prize, unless constrained by the authority of the most explicit and binding regulations, could not expose to so gross an unfairness those neutrals whose interests are committed to its protection.

It was then argued, that, if the rules impose on the Procurator-General so wide a liability they go beyond the function of rules of practice and procedure, transcend the statutory power given by the Act of 1894, which is a rule-making power, and trench upon the Royal Prerogative, which the Naval Prize Act of 1864 expressly saves. Their Lordships think that these points are scarcely debatable, since the decision in The Zamora (sup.), even though they may not have been expressly dealt with in the terms of that judgment. The argument involves no little injustice. Had the Crown been pleased to issue the proclamation, usual in former wars, granting prize to the actual captors, and had the traditional practice remained unaltered, they would have been liable in the Prize Court proceedings for neglect of due care. On the present view, by forbearing to issue such a proclamation, the Crown takes to itself the fruits of the capture, when harvested in the Prize Court, but leaves to the neutral only the satisfaction, often a barren one, of looking to the actual captors in other proceedings for payment of compensation, if his property is damaged by neglect of the captors' duty. The argument further involves some confusion. The prerogative of the Crown is strictly not involved either in the capture or in its incidents. No question then arises between the Crown and its subjects. The belligerent right of the Crown is to seize the property of neutrals at sea in time of war under certain circumstances and on certain conditions. One such condition is that the property be brought before a Court of Prize for adjudication; another is that in the meantime a certain established measure of care be used in dealing with the property. It is not one of the belligerent rights of the Crown to damage neutral property after seizure, either by omission or commission. The obligation to bring the property before the court for condemnation is one which may be discharged by the actual captors; or, if the Crown is minded to discharge that obligation and to institute the necessary proceedings by its proper officer, such a course may be taken either at pleasure or under a permanent regulation. If the Crown is pleased to take this course, it waives the right to leave the actual captors to be the parties to act. Again to seek the exercise of one part of the jurisdiction of the court is in itself a submission to the exercise, when justice requires it, of the correlative jurisdiction of the court, if the claim for a decree of condemnation fails. The enforcement against the party, who alone is before it as captor, of the liability for neglect of a captor's duty may indeed be regarded as being in itself a matter of practice and procedure, for it is part of the cursus curiæ, rules or no rules. The matter may, however, be put somewhat higher. If the Crown is pleased to assume a position which involves the abandonment of its right not to be made liable in damages, but to leave the enforcement of such liability to be made against the parties actually in fault, such a diminution or waiver of its position is valid. Now the rules are made under the authority of an Order in Council and, as this board pointed out in The Zamora (sup.), if by Order in Council the Crown intimates consent to being placed in a position more limited than might have been claimed for it, had its full rights been insisted on, a Court of Prize is bound to give effect to such a waiver in favour of the neutral. Were it otherwise, the Crown would be placed in the position of seeming to approbate the part of the rules by which it obtains as captor the advantage of a condemnation, and to reprobate that part by which it bears the captor's responsibility; such a waiver is the effect of what is done under the Prize Court Rules and this is why the construction of those rules was accepted in The Zamora (sup.) as being the only real question. Their Lordships think that the construction, which in that case made the Procurator-General liable in damages and costs under the rules, is equally applicable in the present case. There is no ground for holding the rules to be ultra vires. The decision of Lord Sterndale was, therefore, right and ought to be affirmed. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

KOTZIAS v. TYSER. (a)

Marine insurance — Lloyd's policy — Total loss — Treaty of Peace—Ratification—Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 59), s. 1.

On the 2nd Nov. 1918 the defendant agreed by a policy of insurance to make a payment to the plaintiff "in the event of peace between Great Britain and Germany not being concluded on or before the 30th June 1919."

By the Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 59), passed before the end of hostilities, it was provided that, for the purpose of construing written instruments, except where the context of the instrument which the Act is invoked to construe "otherwise requires," the date of the termination of the war should be fixed by an Order in Council, and should be as nearly as may be the date on which ratifications of the treaty should be exchanged or deposited by the belligerents. A treaty of peace was signed on the 28th June 1919. On the 1st July 1919 a Royal Proclamation was issued proclaiming that a definitive treaty of peace had been concluded. Ratifications were deposited by the 10th Jan. 1920, but no Order in Council had been made at the time of the trial.

Held, that the expressions "conclusion of peace" and "termination of the war" refer to the same date, and that, in the absence of any special provisions in the instrument itself, the conclusion of peace contemplated by the parties must mean the exchange or deposit of ratifications, which took place on the 10th Jan. 1920.

Held, also, that the plaintiff did not act prematurely in commencing his action on the 21st Aug. 1919, since the Order in Council, when it is issued under 8 & 9 Geo. 5, s. 1, sub-s. 1, must fix approximately the date on which the ratifications were exchanged.

ACTION in the Commercial List, tried by Roche, J.

The plaintiff claimed for a total loss under a policy of insurance dated the 2nd Nov. 1918, subscribed by the defendant and other underwriters, whereby, for the total sum of 3400*l.*, of which the defendant's proportion was 45*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*, the defendant and the other underwriters, each for himself and not one for another, agreed to pay to the plaintiff's brokers, on behalf of the plaintiff, the amount of their separate subscriptions "in the event of peace between Great Britain and Germany not being concluded on or before the thirtieth day of June one thousand nine hundred and nineteen."

The action was begun on the 21st Aug. 1919, and the writ claimed to recover from the defendant 45*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*, being the amount of his subscription under the policy.

In his points of claim, the plaintiff said that he was fully interested in a policy of insurance subscribed by the defendant, whereby the defendant undertook to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 45*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* in the event of peace between Great Britain and Germany (who were then at war with one another) not being concluded on or before the 30th June 1919. Peace between Great Britain and Germany was not and had not been concluded on or before the 30th June 1919.

By his points of defence, the defendant admitted the policy but did not admit that the plaintiff was interested therein. He denied that peace between Great Britain and Germany was not and had not been concluded before the 30th June 1919. Alternatively, and without prejudice to the foregoing, the defendant said that he would contend that having regard to the Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918, and in the absence of a declaration thereunder by His Majesty in Council at the date of the issue of the writ the action was prematurely commenced and would not lie.

The plaintiff, at the outbreak of the war in 1914, was a Greek merchant, but by reason of the war was unable to continue his business. He was, however, desirous of being able to resume it when the war should come to an end. In the meantime, he took steps to protect himself against the risk of the continuance of the war, and he took out the policy already mentioned under which this action was brought.

An armistice was arranged between the belligerents on the 11th Nov. 1918, and on the 28th June 1919 the treaty of peace between the Allied and Associated Powers, including Great Britain, on the one hand, and Germany on the other hand, was signed at Versailles. The preamble to the treaty contained the following clause: "From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment and subject to the provisions of this treaty, official relations with Germany, and with any of the German States, will be resumed by the Allied and Associated Powers."

(a) Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By art. 440 of the treaty it was provided, inter alia, as follows:

The present Treaty, of which the French and English texts are both authentic, shall be ratified. The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris as soon as possible. Powers of which the seat of Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible. A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the Treaty has been ratified by Germany on the one hand and by three of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the other hand. From the date of this first procès-verbal the Treaty will come into force between the High Contracting Parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present Treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the Treaty. In all other respects the Treaty will enter into force for each Power at the date of the deposit of its ratification. The French Government will transmit to all the signatory Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbaux of the deposit of ratifications.

On the 1st July 1919, His Majesty the King issued a proclamation which, after reciting that the treaty had been concluded, provided as follows: "In conformity thereunto We have thought fit hereby to command that the same be published in due course throughout all Our Dominions, and We do declare to all Our loving subjects Our Will and Pleasure that upon the exchange of the Ratifications thereof the said Treaty of Peace be observed inviolably as well by sea as by land and in all places whatsoever; strictly charging and commanding all Our loving subjects to take notice hereof and to conform themselves thereunto accordingly."

Ratifications of the above treaty of peace were exchanged by the signatory powers on the 10th Jan. 1920.

The Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 59) was entitled "An Act to make provision for determining the date of the termination of the present war, and for purposes connected therewith."

Sect. 1 provides that:

(1) His Majesty in Council may declare what date is to be treated as the date of the termination of the present war, and the present war shall be treated as having continued to, and as having ended on that date for the purposes of any provision in any Act of Parliament, Order in Council, or Proclamation, and, except where the context otherwise requires, of any provision in any contract deed or other instrument referring expressly or impliedly, and in whatever form of words, to the present war or the present hostilities. . . .

(2) The date so declared shall be as nearly as may be the date of the exchange or deposit of ratifications of the treaty or treaties of peace: Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this provision, the date declared as aforesaid shall be conclusive for all purposes of this Act.

(3) His Majesty in Council may also similarly declare what date is to be treated as the date of the termination of war between His Majesty and any particular State.

Foote, K.C. and S. P. J. Merlin for the plaintiff.—On the true construction of the policy, the war did not terminate on or before the date specified in the policy. Therefore, the event on the happening of which the money was to become payable under the policy did in fact happen, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover under the policy. According to international law, in the absence of any statutory or contractual provision to the contrary, a treaty of peace, except when personally concluded by the Sovereign, or some person occupying a station equivalent to that of a Sovereign does not become definitely binding on a signatory state until there has been ratification of it by that State:

Hall's International Law, 6th edit., pp. 322, 554;

Wheaton's International Law, 5th edit., Eng. 1916, pp. 358-360.

In this case the Treaty of Peace which was signed on the 28th June 1919, was not ratified until the 10th Jan. 1920. Therefore, peace, in the sense in which the expression is ordinarily used in international law, was not concluded by the date specified within the meaning of the policy. The termination of the present war (Definition) Act 1918 provides that the date of the termination of the war for the purposes of any contract, deed, or other instrument, (and those expressions include this policy) except where the context otherwise requires—and here the context does not otherwise require—shall be the date to be declared by an Order in Council made under the Act; and that the date so declared shall be as nearly as may be the date of the exchange or deposit of the ratifications of the Treaty of Peace. There was no exchange or deposit of ratifications of this treaty until the 10th Jan. 1920. Art. 440 of the Treaty of Peace, dated the 28th June 1919, after specifying the date of the coming into force of the treaty for certain purposes, provides that in all other respects the treaty will enter into force for each power at the date of the deposit of its ratification. That is the date specified in the treaty as the date of the termination of the state of war. Moreover, the Proclamation of the 1st July 1919, after reciting that a definitive Treaty of Peace was concluded on the 28th June 1919, declared that upon the exchange of ratifications thereof, the said treaty shall be observed inviolably. Thus on any view of the policy, whether under international law, or the Treaty of Peace itself, or the Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918, or the Proclamation of the 1st July 1919, peace with Germany was not concluded by the date specified in the policy; therefore the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Simey for the defendant.—The event of peace not being concluded on or before the date specified did not happen within the meaning of the policy. In the sense contemplated by the parties to the policy, peace was in fact concluded, or the war terminated, on or before the date specified in the policy,—namely, the 30th June 1919. The policy must be construed with due regard to its object, context and circumstances. By reason of the war the plaintiff had been forced to suspend his business and he desired to resume it as soon as it become possible for him to do so, and he, as a man of business took out this policy to safeguard himself in the meantime against the risk of not being able to resume business by the specified date. The words of the policy must be read as meaning in the event of there not being such a conclusion of peace by the 30th June 1919 as would allow of a resumption of oversea trade. The mere signing of the treaty of peace which took place on the 28th June, two days before the date specified in the policy, involved a conclusion of peace such as was contemplated by the policy. Therefore, the event on which the policy money was to become payable, did not in fact happen within the meaning of the policy. It is immaterial that the treaty of peace was not ratified before the date specified in the policy, because, by international law, a treaty of peace, as from the date of signature, and before ratification, is so far binding that hostilities must immediately cease:

Hall's International Law, 6th edit., p. 554.

The Treaty of Peace Act 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 33), which was passed on the 31st July 1919 after the signature, but before the ratification of the treaty of peace regards the treaty as concluded and binding. The Act is entitled an Act for carrying into effect the treaty and it provides for giving effect to the treaty by Orders in Council and otherwise. The expression "definitive" in the Proclamation of the 1st July 1919 used in reference to the treaty of peace of the 28th June 1919, means final and conclusive. Moreover, peace has been regarded as concluded by many other Acts and Government notices. Reference was made to the following Acts of Parliament:

Restoration of Pre-War Practices Act 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 42), passed on the 15th Aug. 1919, s. 1, sub-s. 1;
Munitions of War Act 1915 (5 & 6 Geo. 5, c. 54), sched. 2.
Anglo-French Treaty (Defence of France) Act 1919 (9 & 10 Geo. 5, c. 34), passed on the 31st July 1919.

The Anglo-French Treaty of the 28th June 1919 which is set out in a schedule of the last-mentioned Act refers to the treaty of peace as "concluded," although it had not then been ratified. Several notices issued by the Board of Trade after the signature, but before the ratification of the treaty of peace as having been concluded: (see, for example, "Board of Trade Journal," vol. 103, p. 433). No Order in Council has yet been made under the Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918, declaring what date is to be treated as the date of the termination of the war. Moreover, whatever date may be subsequently fixed, it will have no reference to this policy, for the policy must be interpreted as a whole, having regard to sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Act, when it will be found that the policy "otherwise requires." The plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

ROCHE, J.—This is an action brought on a policy of insurance dated the 2nd Nov. 1918, whereby, in consideration of a premium paid by the plaintiff as the assured, the underwriters, of whom the defendant is one, agree to pay to the brokers of the plaintiff on behalf of the plaintiff as principal the amount of their separate subscriptions "in the event of peace between Great Britain and Germany not being concluded on or before the 30th June 1919." The plaintiff claims payment from the defendant of the sum underwritten by him as for a loss under the policy on the ground that peace between Great Britain and Germany was not concluded on or before the 30th June 1919.

The only question to be decided is whether or not peace had been concluded between these countries on or before the date specified.

I am told that a number of other policies have been effected, some of them between the same parties, in terms the same as or similar to those of this policy, and that it will be of advantage to the parties to these other policies to know what interpretation the court puts upon this policy. I desire, however, to say that in the present case I am only interpreting the words of the policy before me and not those of any other document.

This policy was effected on the 2nd Nov. 1918, before hostilities between this country and Germany had ceased, but when the parties contemplated that they might soon cease. It is not contended on behalf of the defendant that the parties, in effecting the policy, meant by the conclusion of peace on or before the 30th June 1919 a mere cessation of hostilities on or before that date: it is admitted that they meant a cessation of hostilities followed at the least by the making of a treaty of peace before that date.

It is said, however, on behalf of the defendant that that is what the parties meant, and that peace was concluded on or before that date for the purposes of the policy, because a treaty of peace between these countries was signed before that date. It is said on behalf of the plaintiff, on the other hand, that peace was not concluded on or before that date within the meaning of the policy because, although the treaty of peace was signed before that date, ratifications of the treaty by the high contracting parties thereto were not exchanged on or before that date, or indeed until the 10th Jan. 1920.

I accept the view contended for on behalf of the plaintiff, and I do so for several reasons. In the first place, the authorities show that, in the absence of any specific statutory or contractual provision to the contrary, the general rule of international law is that as between civilised Powers who have been at war, peace is not concluded until a treaty of peace is finally binding on the belligerents, and that that stage is not reached until ratifications of the treaty of peace have been exchanged between them.

In the present instance, however, the matter does not rest there. The Termination of the Present War (Definition) Act 1918, which was passed during the war, and is entitled an Act to make provision for determining the date of its termination, provided by sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, that His Majesty in Council may declare what date is to be treated as the date of the termination of the present war, and that the war shall be treated as having ended on that date for the purposes, except where the context otherwise requires, of any provision in any contract, deed or other instrument, referring to the war; and by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, that the date so declared shall be as nearly as may be the date of the exchange or deposit of ratifications of the treaty of peace.

It is to be observed that the Act speaks of the date of the termination of the war, and that the policy of insurance deals with the date of the conclusion of peace, but both must be treated as referring to the same event, and therefore to the same date. The Act contemplates that an Order in Council or Proclamation may be issued declaring what date is to be treated as the date on which hostilities terminated and peace was concluded.

It is not disputed that no Order in Council or Proclamation in pursuance of the Act has yet been issued. That fact tends to confirm me in the opinion that peace had not been concluded on or before the 30th June 1919.

It is also, I think, material in this connection to consider the provisions of the treaty of peace itself. In the recital or preliminary part of the treaty it is stated that the Powers have agreed that from the coming into force of the treaty the state of war will terminate. Art. 440 of the treaty provides that a first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by the Powers, that from the date of that first procès-verbal the treaty will come into force between the Powers who have ratified it, and that in all other respects it will enter into force for each Power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

The treaty of peace thus provides that it is to come into force, or, in other words, that peace is to be concluded, by a deposit of ratifications of the treaty, and a procès-verbal thereof. That was not accomplished until the present month of Jan. 1920, and consequently it had not been accomplished on or before the 30th June 1919, the date mentioned in the policy. In view of these considerations, I am of opinion that peace can only be said to have been concluded at a date considerably later than June 1919.

With regard to the contention that because the plaintiff is a man of business and was insuring himself against a business risk, a special meaning must be given in this policy to the words "in the event of peace not being concluded," I am not satisfied that that contention is well founded. Certain Board of Trade notices which were referred to, no doubt treat peace as having been concluded for purposes of trade before the 30th June 1919, or at least before the treaty of peace was ratified, but these documents must be read in relation to their own special purport, and they do not show that peace was concluded at so early a stage for any other purpose. I am not entirely uninfluenced by the fact that this policy was effected by a man of business, for I recognise that apart from a general licence to do so, trade with Germany could not have been renewed by men of business until after the 30th June 1919.

It is argued that this action has been prematurely brought, inasmuch as no Order in Council or Proclamation in pursuance of the Act of 1918 has yet been made declaring what date is to be treated as the date of the termination of the war, and until an Order or Proclamation is made it cannot be known when the war terminated and peace concluded. In my view, that argument is not well founded. The Act provides by sect. 1, sub-sect. 2, that the date declared by the Order in Council when made shall be as nearly as may be the date of the exchange or deposit of ratifications of the treaty of peace.

On the 21st Aug. 1919, the date on which the action was brought, there had as yet been no exchange or deposit of ratifications of the treaty of peace, and that being so, the date to be declared by the Order in Council as that of the termination of the war could not well be an earlier date than that on which the action was brought. It was, therefore, open to the plaintiff to say when he brought the action that peace had not even then been concluded, and therefore that it had not been concluded on the 30th June 1919, the earlier date mentioned in the policy.

OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP LORD v. NEWSUM. (a)

Charter-party—Prescribed route—Refusal of master to follow—Error of judgment—Breach of charter-party.

By a charter-party dated the 8th April 1916, for a voyage from Liverpool to Archangel, it was provided by clause 9 that the master was to prosecute his voyage with the utmost despatch, and by clause 14, that all losses and damages occasioned by "negligence, default or error of judgment of the pilot, master, or crew, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the steamer" were to be absolutely excepted. The vessel sailed from Liverpool on the 26th Sept. 1916 and arrived at Honningsvaag, in the north of Norway. From there owing to the danger of German submarines, a special route to Archangel was prescribed by the British Admiralty and the Norwegian War Insurance Association; the master, however, after waiting some days, decided to proceed by another route and reached Vardoe on the 11th Oct. 1916. Subsequently the crew refused to continue the voyage to Archangel owing to reports as to the presence of a hostile submarine, and, in spite of the charterers' protests, the voyage was abandoned and the cargo discharged. The claim of the owners for the hire and of the charterers for damages for breach of the charter-party were referred to arbitration. The umpire found that the master in refusing to follow the prescribed route was guilty of a grave error of judgment, and that in failing to sail he had committed a breach of clause 9 of the charter-party, and he awarded the charterers damages for this breach.

Held, that the decision of the master not to follow the prescribed route was an error of judgment as to route, and not an error of judgment "in the management or navigation" of the steamer, and that consequently the owners were not protected by the exceptions in clause 14 of the charter-party. Award upheld.

AWARD stated in the form of a special case.

By a charter-party dated the 8th April 1916, and made between the owners of the steamship Lord and Messrs. Newsum, Sons and Co., the charterers, the steamship Lord, a Norwegian vessel, was chartered to Messrs. Newsum, Sons and Co., for six months. The charterers sublet the vessel to another firm for a voyage from Liverpool to Archangel. This voyage, as was required by the charter-party, was approved by the Norwegian War Insurance Association. The Lord sailed from Liverpool on the 26th Sept. 1916 and arrived at Honningsvaag, in the north of Norway. The route from there to Archangel prescribed by the British Admiralty and the Norwegian Insurance Association, in consequence of the danger from German submarines, was for vessels to proceed at a distance of some 150 to 200 miles from the Norwegian coast. The master, however, after waiting some time at Honningsvaag, decided in consequence of warnings as to the presence of German submarines, instead of following this prescribed route to proceed by the coast route to Vardoe, where the steamer arrived on the 11th Oct. 1916. After waiting at that port until the 23rd Oct. the crew, in consequence of reports as to the danger from hostile submarines, refused to continue the voyage to Archangel, and on the 31st Oct., in spite of the protests of the charterers, the voyage to Archangel was abandoned and the cargo discharged. The claim of the owners for the hire and the counterclaim of the charterers for damages for breach of the charter-party were referred to arbitration. The umpire found that if the master had followed the prescribed route the steamer in all probability would have reached Archangel safely; that, in refusing to follow the prescribed route he was guilty of a grave error of judgment, and that in failing to sail he had committed a breach of clause 9 of the charter-party, which provided that he was "to prosecute his voyages with the utmost despatch." The umpire, therefore, awarded the charterers damages for this breach of the charter-party, but found that on balance a sum was due to the owners for hire.

Clause 14 of the charter-party provided that "throughout this charter losses or damages, whether in respect of goods carried or to be carried, or in other respects arising or occasioned by the following causes shall be absolutely excepted, viz., . . . negligence, default, or error of judgment of the pilot, master or crew or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the steamer."

It was contended for the owners that even if the umpire was right and there had been an error of judgment on the master's part which had caused the voyage to be abandoned, it was an error of judgment as to the navigation of the vessel, and that they were protected by clause 14.

For the charterers it was contended that the master's decision to follow the coast route was not an error of judgment with regard to the management or navigation of the steamer, but merely an error as to the choice of route, and that clause 14 did not apply.

Neilson, K.C. and Jowitt for the owners.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Le Quesne for the charterers.

BAILHACHE, J. (after stating the facts).—It has been contended on behalf of the owners that the decision of the master to proceed from Honningsvaag to Archangel by the coastal route by way of Vardoe, and his refusal to follow the prescribed route and make a wide detour, was "negligence, default, or error of judgment" on his part "in the management or navigation of the steamer" within the meaning of clause 14 of the charter-party. Now it cannot be said that what the master did was done by him in the "management" of the steamer; the question, therefore, remains, was it something done in the "navigation" of the steamer? In my opinion the word "navigation" in clause 14 is used with reference to a vessel in motion, that is to say a vessel that is being navigated, and a reference to the other persons mentioned in the clause in addition to the master—namely, the pilot, crew, or other servants of the owners—seems to point clearly to that being the correct meaning of the term "navigation" as used therein. A pilot could hardly commit an error in navigation except when a ship was in motion, and indeed would not be employed until the vessel was being cast off. The term "management," may be applied equally to a vessel while she is in harbour as well as while she is in motion, and the two words in conjunction signify something done with regard to the user or control of the vessel while she is in harbour or proceeding on her voyage. Anything done of that nature comes within the meaning of the terms "management or navigation," but the decision of the master as to which of two routes he will pursue, a deliberate choice made while in harbour, cannot, in my opinion, be said to be an error "in the management or navigation of the steamer." It is, no doubt, very difficult sometimes to draw a clear line of demarcation between what can and what cannot be included in the term navigation, but, in my view, the line ought to be drawn to exclude the deliberate consideration by the master in harbour as to which of two routes he will pursue to reach his destination. In my opinion, therefore, the umpire was right in holding that there had been a breach of the charter-party, and that the error of judgment of the master did not come within the exceptions contained in clause 14.

Award upheld.

AKTIESELSKABET FRANK v. NAMAQUA COPPER COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Charter-party—Demurrage—Exception in cases of "accidents or other hindrances beyond charterers' control"—Martial law—Ejusdem generis rule.

In Sept. 1914 the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel for a voyage to Port Nolloth, in Cape Colony. The vessel duly arrived at Port Nolloth and made ready to discharge. Owing, however, to the fact that, on her arrival, the port was under Government control and was being used for disembarking troops and war material for an expeditionary force which was being sent to German South-West Africa, the charterers were unable to discharge her until eighty-six days demurrage had expired.

The charter-party contained three "exception" clauses. The first dealt with the charterers' obligation to load; the second was the usual exception clause containing, inter alia, "the King's enemies" and "restraint of princes and rulers"; the third, which was directed to the unloading of the cargo, excepted the charterer from his liability to pay demurrage "in cases of strikes, riots, lock-outs, labour disturbances, trade disputes, accidents, and other hindrances beyond the charterer's control." The defendants relied upon the exceptions contained in the second and third clauses.

Held, that the second clause, from its position in the charter-party, from its express words, and from the fact that the obligations on the charterers were specifically limited by the other two, did not apply to the charterers' obligation to unload the vessel; as to the third clause, the Government control could not be said to be an accident, and the "other hindrances beyond the charterers' control" must be construed ejusdem generis with the named "exceptions." The defendants therefore failed.

Action in the Commercial List, tried by Greer, J.

The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants 1440*l.* for demurrage. The plaintiffs were the owners of a Norwegian sailing ship, the Frank, and the defendants were the charterers of the vessel by a charter-party made in Sept. 1914. The plaintiffs alleged that the sum claimed was due to them from the defendants under the charter-party.

By the charter-party in question the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel, the Frank, to carry a cargo, mainly of coke, from the port of Swansea to Port Nolloth in South Africa. The charter-party provided that the vessel should load a cargo at Swansea, and that on arrival at the port of discharge the cargo was to be unloaded at a specified rate per working day, and that in case of failure by the defendants to complete the unloading of the cargo at the specified rate per day, the defendants were to pay demurrage at the rate of 3*d.* per net registered ton per day.

The vessel duly loaded the cargo at Swansea, and arrived at the port of discharge in South Africa on the 6th Jan. 1915. The vessel was ready for discharge on the 12th Jan., but the discharge was not completed until the 15th May 1915. The plaintiffs claimed demurrage in respect of eighty-six days.

The defendants denied liability and claimed to be protected by a clause in the charter-party which provided that the cargo was to be unloaded at an "average rate of not less than . . . or charterers to pay demurrage," except in cases of "strikes, riots, lock-outs, labour disturbances, trades disputes, accidents, or other hindrances beyond charterers' control."

The port of discharge in this case was situated on the north-west coast of Cape Colony, and was the nearest port in that colony to German South-West Africa. The port consisted of a jetty and there were the necessary appliances for loading and discharging lighters and small craft that could get over the bar. Large vessels lay outside about a mile or more beyond the bar and were discharged into lighters. But for the abnormal conditions at the port owing to the war, the cargo of the Frank could and would have been discharged within the time fixed by the charter-party.

In Aug. 1914, by order of the department of the Union of South Africa, which had charge of railways and harbours, and under the provisions of the South African Defence Act, an officer, described as a provost-marshal and as transport officer, took possession of the railways of the port, the port itself with its jetty, lighters, plant and appliances, and assumed complete control, for purposes connected with the war, of the business of the port, including the business of discharging vessels, the supply and control of all labour, and the determination of all questions of priority of discharge. This was done for military reasons, to facilitate the disembarkation of troops which were sent to carry the war into German South-West Africa, to enable supplies to be landed and the communications to be kept open.

Some time before the arrival of the Frank at Port Nolloth a rebellion had broken out in South Africa which lasted until the beginning of 1915. Germans had invaded the colony near Port Nolloth. On the 13th Jan. 1915, the day when in the ordinary course the lay days would begin to run, the Frank being then ready to discharge, a martial law order was posted on the jetty, which had the effect of intensifying the control of the port by the Government official. All appliances for unloading, including lighters, tugs, cranes and trucks, were under military control, and were being used for discharging troops and war material and were not available for commercial purposes. The lay days expired on the 18th Feb. 1915, but the discharge was not completed until the 15th May 1915. The defendants contended that they were excused for the delay by the terms of the charter-party, because the state of affairs then existing at the port constituted "accident or other hindrance beyond charterers' control."

The delay in the discharge of the cargo of the Frank was due to the congestion of the port caused by the arrival of transports and vessels carrying warlike stores required for the Expeditionary Force and to the priority given by the officials in charge of the port to such transports and vessels carrying military stores, to vessels carrying coal required for the railways and to steamers and other vessels carrying general goods which were required in the country owing to the increase of population by the presence of the Expeditionary Force.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—Greer, J.—The plaintiffs, who are the owners of the sailing vessel the Frank, claim against the defendants, who are the charterers of the vessel by a charter-party dated the 28th Sept. 1914, 1440*l.* 10*s.* for demurrage which they allege to be due under the charter-party. The vessel was chartered to carry a cargo, consisting mainly of coke, but with liberty to carry fifty tons of liquid fuel and fifty tons of general cargo from Swansea to Port Nolloth, South Africa. Her capacity was 1340 tons, and she in fact loaded only 100 tons of coal, the great bulk of her cargo, as loaded, being coke.

At the date of the charter-party the war with Germany had been in progress for about eight weeks. The port of discharge is situate on the north-west coast of Cape Colony, and is the nearest port in that colony to German South-West Africa. The port consists of a jetty at which are the necessary appliances for loading and discharging lighters and small craft that can get over the bar. Large vessels like the Frank lie out a mile or more beyond the bar, and are discharged into lighters. The port, the lighters used for the discharge and loading of vessels, and all the appliances necessary for receiving the cargo from the ships and delivering at the jetty, are the property of the Cape Copper Company, who, in normal times, do all the work of discharge required to be done by the receiver of cargo. But for the abnormal conditions due to the war, which will be mentioned later, the cargo of the Frank could and would have been discharged within the time fixed by the charter party.

At the end of Aug. 1914, by order of the Department of the Union of South Africa, that has charge of railways and harbours. and under the provisions of the South African Defence Act, a local statute, an officer, described in the evidence as a provost-marshal and as a transport officer, took possession of the railways of the port, the port itself with its jetty, lighters, plant and appliances, and assumed complete control, for purposes connected with the war, of the business of the port, including, of course, the business of discharging vessels, the supply and control of all labour, and the determination of all questions as to priority of discharge. The reasons for this step were entirely military, to facilitate the disembarkation of an expeditionary force which was being sent to carry the war into German South-West Africa, to enable supplies to be landed, and communications to be kept open.

A rebellion broke out in the colony and lasted until the beginning of 1915, but the control of the port began before the rebellion, and continued long after the rebellion had ceased, and the delay in discharging the Frank was not in any way caused by the rebellion.

On the 13th Jan. 1915, the day when, in the ordinary course, the lay days would begin to run, the Frank being then ready to discharge, a martial law order was posted on the jetty. This order was not produced, but it probably had the effect of intensifying the control of the port by the Government official, who was a military officer. It was agreed at the trial that the lay days provided for by the charter-party, by calculation from an agreed rate of discharge, expired on the 18th Feb. 1915, but the discharge was not completed until the 15th May 1915, and unless the charterers were excused by the terms of the charter-party they were liable for the amount claimed..

It was proved to my satisfaction that the delay in the discharge of the Frank was due to the congestion of the port by the arrival of transports and vessels carrying warlike stores required for the expeditionary force and to the priority given by the officials in charge of the port to such transports and vessels carrying military stores, to vessels carrying coal required for the railways, and to steamers and other vessels carrying general goods which were required in the country owing to the increase of population by the presence of the expeditionary force. In my judgment, but for the control exercised by the officer in charge of the port for the efficient carrying on of the war, the vessel would have been discharged within her lay days.

It was contended for the defendants that even on those facts the defendants were protected by the terms of the charter-party. The charter-party provides that the good ship Frank shall with all possible dispatch proceed to Swansea and there load a cargo of the description in the margin, that is, coke with a small quantity of coal and liquid fuel and general cargo, which the charterers bind themselves to ship. Then follows an exception which I shall call the first exception: "Except in case of riot, commotion by keelmen, strike, lock-out, or stoppage of shippers' pitmen, or any hands striking work, frosts or floods, or any other accidents or causes beyond the control of the charterers which may delay her loading." And then it says that she is to proceed to Port Nolloth in South Africa, "or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same in the customary manner alongside any craft, steamer, floating depot, wharf, or jetty, where she can lie always afloat as may be directed by the consignees to whom written notice is to be given of the vessel being ready to discharge." And then follows the exception, which I will call the exception clause No. 2: "The act of God, the King's enemies, restraint of princes and rulers, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, pirates, collisions, stranding and other accidents of navigation, boilers and machinery always excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilots, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner, in the navigation of the ship, not resulting, however, in any case from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship or any of them, or by the ship's husband or manager."

Then the only other part of the charter-party that is material is the third exception clause, which relates to the discharge of the vessel: "The cargo is to be unloaded at the average rate of not less than 40 tons for coke, liquid fuel, and general cargo, and 70 tons for coal, per working day, weather permitting, but when required by the consignees such extra quantity is to be unloaded as may be practicable (the master lending all possible assistance with the ship's boat and crew) or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 3*d.* per net registered ton per diem or pro rata for part thereof, except"—and this is the clause that I have to construe—"in case of strikes, riots, lock-outs, labour disturbances, trade disputes, accidents, or other hindrances beyond charterers' control." It will be seen that there are three exception clauses, the first relating to the charterers' obligation to load the cargo in fifteen colliery working days. The second, the usual exception clause, which appears in contracts of carriage by sea, contains, inter alia, "the King's enemies," and "restraint of princes and rulers," and the third is specifically directed to the unloading of the cargo.

It was contended for the defendants that the second exception clause applied to the charterers' obligation to unload the cargo in the lay days. I am clearly of opinion that it does not so apply. The parties to the contract contained in the charter-party directed their specific attention separately to the causes that were to excuse the charterers from their obligation to unload the ship within the lay days. The position of the second exception clause and also its express words show that the exceptions are intended to apply only to the obligations of the shipowner, and the fact that there is a specific exception clause applying to the charterers' obligation to unload the ship prevents any implication that the other exceptions in the charter-party are intended to apply to the discharging obligation of the charterers.

It was also contended on behalf of the defendants that they were relieved from liability by the third exception clause on the ground that the demurrage was caused by an accident or hindrance beyond the control of the charterers within the meaning of that clause. As the demurrage was due to the conscious and intentional acts of the lawfully authorised Government official for the better conduct of the war, it would be, in my opinion, an abuse of words to say that it was due to accident. Whatever may be the extent of that word as used in the contract between the parties, it is not, in my view, wide enough to cover the results of the conscious and purposeful control of the port by the duly appointed officer of the Colonial Government and the lawful representative of the Crown.

The argument that the causes of the demurrage as above stated are within the general words "other hindrance beyond charterers' control" raises a more difficult question. The answer to the question depends on the right understanding and application of the rule of construction compendiously referred to as the ejusdem generis rule. Where there is a list of persons, things, causes, or events, followed by general words, and the question arises for decision whether any given person, thing, cause, or event (not included in the specific list) is within the general words, the rule furnishes the test to be applied so as to arrive at a correct answer.

According to Lord Ellenborough in Cullen v. Butler (1816, 5 M. & S. 461), the question to be answered is, "Is the alleged exception of the like kind with those specially enumerated and occasioned by similar causes?" As I read the judgments of Lord Halsbury, Lord Herschell, and Lord Macnaghten in Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 1887, 57 L. T. Rep. 695; L. Rep. 12 App. Cas. 484), the test to apply is to ask whether the alleged exception is like any of these specially enumerated.

The judgments in that case do not seem to me to contemplate that the judge should go through the somewhat difficult process of defining a genus or category which will comprehend all the exceptions, and should then decide the case according to whether the alleged exception is covered by the definition. However this may be, in Tillmanns v. Knutsford (99 L. T. Rep. 399; (1908) 2 K. B. 385; (1908) A. C. 406) the Court of Appeal, consisting of Vaughan Williams, Farwell, and Kennedy, L.JJ., expressed the view that the right test to apply is that you must find a genus or category which describes all the specifically excepted causes, and, if you cannot do so, the general words must be literally interpreted. I do not think, however, that the Court of Appeal intended to lay it down that the ejusdem generis rule is to be rejected if you cannot define the genus or category with scientific precision. It is extremely difficult to define with precision the general character of the list of persons, things, or causes that is put together for practical and not for scientific purposes. I cannot help thinking that the broader statements of the question, as put in the earlier cases to which I have referred, is to be preferred to that laid down by the Court of Appeal in Tillmanns' case (sup.). If I find it difficult to define accurately the genus in the present case, I am consoled by the knowledge that Lord Bramwell unsuccessfully struggled with a similar difficulty in the case of Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. (sup.). I am also consoled by the knowledge that there is high authority for the view that the ejusdem generis rule may apply even when the enumerated exceptions suggest not one but several genera or categories of goods, and for the view that scientific precision is not required: (see per Lord Sumner (then Hamilton, J.) in Thorman v. Dowgate Steamship Company Limited (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481; 102 L. T. Rep. 242; (1910) 1 K. B. 410).

A genus or category may be roughly defined either by its positive or by its negative qualities, and, if it is necessary for me to define the genus or category to which all the specific exceptions in the clause under consideration belong, I think that I can adequately do so for the present purpose by saying that there are causes of delay that are accidental in the sense that they are nor consciously directed to the purposeful management of the business of the port in the public interest.

If the right question be that which I have referred to in the judgments in the House of Lords in Thames and Mersey Insurance Company v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. (sup.), my answer would be easier to frame and would have the same result in the decision of this case. The cause of the demurrage is not like or akin to any of the enumerated exceptions. Accordingly, I think that the ejusdem generis rule applies to the clause of the charter-party dealing with the exceptions from liability for demurrage; that the demurrage was not caused by any of the specific exceptions or by any cause coming within the general words so interpreted.

There are other considerations that lead me to the same conclusion. The war with Germany had been in operation for about eight weeks when the charter-party was signed. The port of discharge was so situated that it was not improbable that the Imperial or Colonial Government might require to exercise, for military ends, the control which they in fact did exercise over the port, and which they had begun to exercise before the date of the charter-party.

If it had been intended that the risk of delay arising from such control should be put on the shipowners, and that the cargo owners should be relieved from demurrage so caused, it is not unreasonable to suppose that specific words would have been used that could leave no doubt as to the intention of the parties. The charter-party contains express words relieving the shipowners from their obligation to carry and deliver the goods to the charterers in the event of their being prevented from performing, or delayed in the performance of, their obligations by the acts of the King's enemies or by restraint of princes. These exceptions, which are expressly stated in the second exception clause, may not unfairly be said to be expressly omitted in the third exception clause. It appears to me that there are strong reasons to be found in the contract itself and the circumstances in which it was made to reinforce the argument based on the ejusdem generis rule.

In the result there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed and costs.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. LORDS COMMISSIONERS OF THE ADMIRALTY. (a)

Requisition—Barge under construction—Increase in cost of materials and labour—Inevitable delay in constructing duplicate—Loss of services—Measure of compensation—Remoteness.

The claimants in 1914 made a contract with builders, at an agreed price, for the construction of a hopper barge, which was to be the property of the claimants at all stages of its construction. In Feb. 1917 the Admiralty requisitioned the barge, which was then still unfinished. But for the requisition it would have been finished in April 1917. The Admiralty also instructed the builders to make alterations, which deprived the barge of the essential character of a hopper barge, and these alterations were carried out. Owing to the war it was impossible for the claimants to replace the barge within less than three years from the date of the requisition, and between that date and the earliest date at which a contract for a similar barge could have been placed prices of materials and labour rose enormously. In these circumstances the claimants claimed from the Admiralty: (1) The difference between the contract price for the construction of the barge and the price which would have to be paid for a duplicate; and (2) compensation for the loss of the use of the barge during the three years from April 1917 to the date of completion of the duplicate.

Held, that the claimants were entitled to recover the difference between the contract price and the cost of replacing the barge, regard being had to the fact that replacement was impossible at the date of the requisition and continued to be impossible for several years, but that they were not entitled to compensation for the loss of the use of the barge during the three years above mentioned.

CASE stated by an arbitrator under sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889.

By an agreement made between the parties it was referred to the arbitrator to determine the amount of compensation to be paid to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board in respect of the Admiralty's acquisition of the hopper barge No. 798 which Messrs. Lobnitz were building for the board at the time of such acquisition. The case was stated for the opinion of the court under sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889, and not by way of final award.

1. The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board was a public body incorporated by Act of Parliament for the purpose (inter alia) of maintaining and improving the channels, dock entrances, docks, and other similar utilities and conveniences of the port of Liverpool. The board had power to levy rates and duties and to borrow money for such purposes, and (as the arbitrator held) the corresponding obligation to take all steps reasonably necessary to keep such channels, dock entrances, docks, and appliances in a proper state and condition. For the due performance of such duty it was necessary for the board to have a fleet of dredgers and hopper barges.

2. In the latter part of the year 1914 the board was in urgent need of additional self-propelling hopper barges to work with their dredgers in keeping open the channels, dock entrances, docks, and other appliances of the port within their jurisdiction, and in December of that year they entered into contracts with builders for three such barges. Inter alia they contracted with Messrs. Lobnitz for two such barges, one of which, known as No. 798, was the barge in question in this case. This barge was to be built according to certain plans and a specification, and was to be delivered on or before the 1st Oct. 1915, the builders agreeing to pay as liquidated damages the sum of 100*l.* per week for such time as the barge should remain undelivered after the said date. The price of the completed barge was to be 22,750*l.* There was no provision for increase or decrease of price in the case of any alteration in the cost of material or wages.

3. The said barge was to be of unusual design and construction, being planned with special reference to the port and to the delivery gear of the dredgers with which she was intended to work. By the terms of the contract she was to be the property of the board at all stages of her construction, whether instalments on account of the price had been paid or not.

4. In consequence of war work for the Admiralty, which took precedence of all ordinary work, the builders were unable to complete the vessel by the stipulated date, but the board agreed to an undefined extension of the time on condition that every effort was made to complete the barge as soon as possible. In Aug. 1915, with a view to advance the work, they had obtained from the Government a certificate that the construction of the barge was work of national importance, and with the same object, in Feb. 1916, they obtained from the Director of the Priority Section of the Admiralty a declaration that their contract with Messrs. Lobnitz was to be considered as munitions work.

5. In Feb. 1917 the barge was approaching completion, and the arbitrator found that, if it had not been for the occurrence mentioned in the next paragraph, it would have been completed in the course of April 1917. The board remained entitled under their contract to delivery of the completed vessel for the total sum of 22,750*l.*, and on her completion they would have at once taken delivery and have set the barge to work in the port.

6. On the 8th Feb. 1917 the Admiralty purported to requisition the unfinished barge for Admiralty service. They instructed the builders to stop work on the hopper doors and to plate over the bottom of the barge and otherwise to alter the barge. The alterations ordered were such as to deprive the barge of the essential character of a hopper barge. The Admiralty sent officers to the builders' yard to see that these orders were carried out.

7. The unfinished barge was not a "British ship or vessel as defined in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894," and, subject to the opinion of the court, the arbitrator held that the requisition and alteration of the barge was not authorised by His Majesty's Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914, or by any Order in Council made under the authority of the Defence of the Realm Act 1914, or of any other Act. The contention of the Admiralty before the arbitrator was that the barge was lawfully requisitioned and altered by virtue of the general prerogative of the Crown, acting for the preservation and defence of national interests.

8. Shortly after the requisition and after the commencement of the alterations the Admiralty informed the board they did not intend to acquire the property in the large, but proposed to hire her for an uncertain time. The board objected to the requisition, and also claimed that if it was to stand the vessel must be considered as entirely appropriated by the Admiralty, having regard to the nature of the alterations which had been made, or were in course of being made, and they objected to the proposal to hire the vessel. The Admiralty insisted upon their requisition, and completed the adaptation of the barge to their requirements, converting her into a vessel to carry and work hydroplanes or to serve some similar purpose. On the 9th May 1917 the vessel was sent on her trials by the Admiralty.

9. On the 7th Aug. 1917 the Admiralty, by letter of that date, for the first time informed the board that they proposed to purchase the barge from the builders. Up to this date the Admiralty had persisted in their claim to take the barge on hire, and the board had persisted in their objection and in their contention that the Admiralty had possessed themselves of the barge and that the board no longer had any interest in her, save a claim for compensation.

10. The arbitrator found the following facts:

(1) When the alterations ordered by the Admiralty were completed the barge was no longer a hopper barge, and in her converted state would have been useless to the board. It could not have been reconverted into a hopper barge without a large expenditure of time and money or without some risk that it would prove inefficient as a hopper from the effect of the Admiralty's work upon it.

(2) The barge had remained in the possession of the Admiralty up to the date of the statement of the case. There was no evidence as to the arrangement, if any, made by the Admiralty with the builders, but the agreement of reference of the 1st March 1919 contained the following clause: "The Admiralty to settle direct with Messrs. Lobnitz for the hopper which they have had completed to their special requirements."

(3) The Admiralty, when they made their requisition, and also in Aug. 1917, knew that for a long period it would be impossible for the board to replace the barge by building another.

(4) Owing to the war it was in fact impossible for the board to replace the barge, either by purchase or by building, within a less period than three years from the date of the requisition. No suitable vessel could have been purchased at any time. It was admitted that no priority order could have been obtained before the early part of 1919, and therefore no contract for construction could have been placed before that time, and a similar barge could not have been constructed in less than twelve months from the date of the contract.

(5) Between the date of the requisition and the earliest date at which a contract for a similar barge could have been placed the prices of materials and labour rose enormously, and for that reason the barge could not be replaced at less cost than about 70,000*l*. If a priority order could have been obtained, and a contract placed at or shortly after the date of the requisition the cost would have been less.

(6) The condition of the port of Liverpool at the date of the requisition, and at all material times afterwards, was such that it was the duty of the board to replace the barge as soon as possible, and accordingly at the earliest possible date—viz., in Feb. 1919—the board obtained estimates for that purpose. The lowest estimate was that of the original builders, who offered to duplicate No. 798 for 63,000*l*., with a provision for increase or decrease in the event of the increase or decrease of the cost of materials or labour during the construction. The board reasonably and properly accepted the builders' offer, and on the 7th May 1919 a formal contract to replace the barge, as per the original specification and plans, upon the terms of the said offer was entered into. Wages rose during the construction of a barge under this contract, and for the purposes of this case it was to be taken that the amount which the board would have to pay to the builders would not be less than 70,000*l*. The arbitrator further found that the barge could not be completed before the spring of 1920.

11. In these circumstances the board claimed from the Admiralty the difference between 22,750*l*., the contract price of No. 798, and the price that they would have to pay for the barge being built to replace it, and they further claimed a sum of 28,770*l*. for the loss of the services of the barge for the three years which would have elapsed between the date when No. 798 would have been completed and available if she had not been taken by the Admiralty and the date when she would be replaced by the barge being built.

12. The Admiralty did not dispute that the board was entitled to compensation for the loss, by the action of the Admiralty, of the benefit of the contract of the 4th Dec. 1914 for building No. 798, but they contended before the arbitrator that the principles on which damages were assessed for tortious acts or breach of contract had no application to the acts of the Crown in the exercise of its duty to provide for the national defence, and that neither the cost of replacement nor the delay involved therein should be taken into account in the circumstances of the case. Counsel submitted that the measure of compensation should be the difference between the contract price and the value of the vessel when taken.

As regards this contention the arbitrator found the following facts:

13. Owing to the special design of No. 798 there was no market for it or for similar vessels. No instance was produced of the same or similar design and character having been bought or sold in the market. Its value to the board consisted of the services which it was capable of rendering in the port of Liverpool, and except for the purpose of such services it would not have been worth while to build the vessel or for anyone to buy it or to take over the contract for it with a view to continue its character. It had an emergency value to the Admiralty for the purpose of conversion into war plant, but the Admiralty did not furnish the arbitrator with any evidence or estimate of the value to them. They furnished an estimate of her value, based on the value of a cargo steamer of the same tonnage, and this estimate appeared to the arbitrator to be fallacious as the hopper was not a cargo steamer and was not fitted to carry cargo, and was not a vessel of the same cost to build.

14. Inasmuch as the board was bound to replace this vessel on losing possession of it, the arbitrator thought that it was worth to the board whatever it would cost the board to replace it, limited possibly to the value to the port of the work which it would be capable of doing during its life, and he found that the board would not willingly have parted with their contract for a less sum than that for which it could have procured the building of a similar vessel. The arbitrator was unable to find any other reasonable criteria of value for such a vessel. The cost, to the builders, of the material and labour which they had put into the vessel did not appear to the arbitrator to be such a criterion, in view of the rise in prices since the vessel was laid down, but, if this figure was in any way important, the arbitrator estimated it at 26,000*l.*, or thereabouts, on the 8th Feb. 1917.

15. The increase in cost involved in the replacement was due to the general rise in wages and cost of material, which occurred between the early part of 1917 and 1919, and so far, if at all, as such rise was occasioned by the war it was only indirectly so occasioned; but the war was the direct cause of the work of replacement being delayed until such rise had occurred.

16. As regards the claim for the loss of the services of the barge for the three years preceding her replacement, the delay in replacement was a consequence of the war and was of the nature of the loss and inconvenience caused to the whole community by the war, but the board would not have suffered this loss and inconvenience from the war if the Admiralty had not taken possession of the barge. No suitable hopper could have been bought or hired by the board during that period. There was accumulation and consolidation of silt caused by the board's being short of a hopper for three years, which will be difficult and costly to deal with, and the work will have to be done at a time when wages and expenses had risen much beyond the rates of 1917. It appeared, however, in evidence that the board's claim of 28,770*l.* was arrived at by treating the expenses, such as wages, coal, and similar outgoings, in working a hopper barge for three years as an approximate measure of the value of the work which the barge would have done in that time, as suggested in the case of The Marpessa (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 197, 232, 464; 94 L. T. Rep. 168, 428; 97 L. T. Rep. 1; (1906) P. 14, 95; (1907) A. C. 241), upon which counsel for the board relied. In that case the board had the capital value which was invested in the injured dredger and producing no return while it was under repair. In the present the board had not paid for and did not possess the hopper in respect of which they claimed for the loss of services although they would have possessed and have paid for it if the Admiralty had not taken it.

17. The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether the board was entitled to recover the difference between the contract price of No. 798 and the cost of replacing her, regard being had to the fact that replacement was impossible at the date of the act complained of and continued impossible for several years?

(2) If the board was not so entitled, how should the compensation be assessed?

(3) Whether the board was further entitled to compensation for the loss of the services of the hopper during the three years mentioned, and upon what principle the compensation, if any, should be assessed?

Greaves Lord, K.C. for the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Admiralty Commissioners.

Lord READING, C.J.—The questions that arise for the opinion of the court on the case stated by the arbitrator are concerned with the method of ascertaining the compensation to be paid to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, which had a contract for the delivery of a special kind of hopper barge, No. 798, which the Government requisitioned. The Government had given notice on the 8th Feb. 1917 that they required the use of the hopper barge and, some question having arisen as to what that meant and whether they were not bound to take over the barge, the matter was settled in Aug. 1917 by the Government's definitely taking the vessel and becoming the owners of it. The Government have settled with Messrs. Lobnitz and Co., who had contracted with the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board for the construction and delivery of the barge, and therefore no question arises as to that. But the difficulty that has given rise to the question submitted to arbitration is (inter alia) that the cost of wages and materials has risen so enormously from the year 1917 until the present year, that it would now cost approximately three times the amount to construct this hopper barge as compared with the price fixed by the contract in Dec. 1914, and, to put it shortly, what the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board seek to obtain is compensation for the loss of their hopper barge, and they contend that that compensation should be measured by the amount of the difference in price that they would now have to pay in order to replace the barge of which the Government took possession in Aug. 1917. If the vessel had not been requisitioned, then in the ordinary course, after making allowance for the delay caused by the war and taking into account the fact that the contractors had obtained a priority certificate for the continued construction of the barge, it would have been delivered complete to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board in April 1917. I assume on the facts that in no circumstances could the board by the exercise of reasonable diligence have obtained before April 1920 delivery of a barge designed and constructed like barge No. 798 as per the contract of Dec. 1914, i.e., that from the year 1917, when the Government requisitioned the barge, the board could not, if they had set to work to replace the barge by a new contract, have got delivery before April 1920, when one bears in mind all the difficulties that there were during the war and the Government control of the materials required and the necessity of a certificate, and so on, before the building of the barge could be completed. Now that substantially means that three years would have elapsed by the time when the vessel would have been completed. When one looks at the facts broadly, for it is certainly not for us here to enter into minute detail, what is the principle on which the compensation is to be measured? In my opinion it is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that the board is entitled to have their property (which, I assume, would have been in their possession in April 1917) replaced by the Government, and, as it cannot be replaced except by the expenditure of money, the board is entitled to the amount of money which will represent the cost of the replacement to them, and that must be measured in view of the circumstances of the war and the increase in the cost of wages and materials up to the present time. I think that the true answer to the question put by the arbitrator, whether the board is entitled to recover the difference between the contract price of No. 798 and the cost of replacing her, regard being had to the fact that replacement was impossible at the date of the act complained of and continued impossible for several years, is yes. I do not myself see that there is a very material difference between the principles contended for on behalf of the board and on behalf of the Admiralty. In truth I think that they would lead to the same conclusion. One is assisted very much to that by the finding of fact that the board would not willingly have parted with this contract for a less sum than that for which they could have procured the building of a similar vessel. Therefore, if we adopt the contractual test put forward on behalf of the Admiralty, one gets back to the same conclusion, and from any point of view it seems to me that one must arrive at the same result. I have stated what I think is the answer to the first question Of course all detail is for the arbitrator.

The second question does not arise, in view of our answer to the first.

The answer to the third question, whether the board is further entitled to compensation for the loss of the services of the barge during the three years, and upon what principle the compensation, if any, should be assessed, is, in my opinion, that the board is not further entitled to compensation for the loss of the services of the barge during the three years. I cannot think that the board is in any better position as against the Admiralty than against a wrongdoer, and as to the latter there is the high authority of Gorell Barnes, J. in The Harmonides (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 354, at p. 355; 87 L. T. Rep. 448; (1903) P. 1, at p. 6). That was a case of collision, and therefore the value had to be estimated against the wrongdoer and estimated as at the time of the collision. Gorell Barnes, J. there said: "If one goes to the root of the matter, it is obvious that what the shipowners lose, if a vessel like this is run into and sunk, is what it would cost to replace them in the position they were in before the accident." Then he says: "So that the real test, where there is no market, is, as counsel on both sides agree, what is the value to the owners, as a going concern, at the time the vessel was sunk?" That is an authority that the test is the true value to the owners as a going concern, and therefore the Admiralty is not liable to make a further payment in respect of the loss of the services of the barge during the three years.

Further, I think it may also be said that in truth the loss of the services of the barge during the three years is not the direct consequence of the Admiralty having taken the barge; in other words, these damages are too remote for the court to take them into account. Of course one always gets into a difficulty in considering the question of the remoteness of damage, and it is not very easy to reconcile all the authorities. But in none of the numerous cases in which the court has had to fix the compensation to be paid to persons who have been deprived of their property by requisition by the Government has it ever been held that they could recover the damages referred to in the third question which has been put to us.

For these reasons therefore I am of opinion that the questions must be answered in the way that I have indicated.

Avory, J.—I agree, and I will only add a quotation from the case of The Marpessa (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 202; 94 L. T. Rep. 168; (1906) P., at p. 33), a quotation which appears to me to apply both to the first and to the third question: "This tribunal, in assessing their damages, may say, as a jury would do, 'We must act with some reasonable certainty, and you, the plaintiffs, are reasonably compensated by being awarded a sum which we are fairly satisfied you may have lost, but we cannot follow you into mere speculation.'"

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT IN ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Securities—Seizure from letter mail—"Goods"—"Postal correspondence"—"Enemy property"—"Enemy origin"—Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—Hague Convention, No. 11, art. 1.

The detention, under the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, was claimed of certain bearer bonds and coupons which had been seized from Dutch vessels in which they had been shipped by letter mail from Holland to ports in the United States. All the securities had been recently purchased in Germany. Some were being forwarded to American buyers by Dutch agents; others had been bought by Dutch dealers for prompt resale in America, or for delivery in respect of sales already made there.

Held, that the securities were not exempted from seizure as "postal correspondence" under Hague Convention No. 11, but, as documents of title, were "goods" within the intention of the Reprisals Order. Further, that, although they were not "enemy property," they must nevertheless be regarded as of "enemy origin" within the meaning of the Order, since they had recently formed part "of the common financial stock of Germany's holding in foreign securities." They were therefore liable to detention under the Order, but there was nothing to prevent a proper application being made for their release to the respondents.

Judgment of the Prize Court varied.

Consolidated appeals from judgment and decrees of the President (Lord Sterndale) of the Admiralty Division in Prize dated the 30th May and the 25th June 1919, and reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; 122 L. T. Rep. 239; (1919) P. 255.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—This appeal relates to various bearer securities found in the mails carried on voyages from Holland to the United States by several neutral mail steamers which were stopped and diverted under the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. They were all issued by extra-European Governments or companies, though in some cases they were parts of the issues appropriated to Germany. The respondents are neutral claimants, to whom Lord Sterndale, P., sitting in Prize, released these securities. The Procurator-General appeals. He contends that within the meaning of the Order they all were "goods" and were either enemy property or of enemy origin, and as such should be either condemned or detained. The respondents accept the Order in Council as valid, but contest its application and construction. In addition to traversing each contention of the Crown, they further allege that in any case the securities are exempt from either capture or detention as being "postal correspondence" within the meaning of the Eleventh Hague Convention, art. 1. There are some minor matters in respect of which an appeal is also brought, but as to these their Lordships, having examined the facts, think it sufficient to say that they see no reason to differ from the conclusion of the learned President. The questions above mentioned are those which alone require detailed consideration.

No doubt these securities were documents found in the mail bags of the mail steamers in question, but it cannot be contended that everything found in a mail bag at sea and carried at postal rates or franked by postage stamps, is ipso facto "postal correspondence" for the purpose of the Convention. These documents, though printed and engraved matter, are not vehicles of information, and the value of their contents does not lie in what they tell the reader. On the contrary, expressed in common form and earmarked by serial letters and numbers or otherwise, they are identical records of proprietary rights in certain loans and shares or in the interest payable thereon, and, by their terms or by mercantile usage applicable to them, are transferable by delivery. To a bonâ fide buyer the document represents the holder's right to a portion of the loan or the share capital as the case may be. They are commonly dealt in; they are a convenient form in which to transfer wealth from one country to another, and they require no separate assignment nor the execution of any instrument of transfer. If, therefore, any incorporeal rights can be assimilated to goods and merchandise, they must be such rights as these documents represent. If any document can stand outside the description "postal correspondence," it must be such a document as these. The occasion is not opportune for an attempt to define the word "correspondence" as used in the Convention, but their Lordships are satisfied that none of these securities come within it. Whether in the circumstances of this case the Eleventh Hague Convention has any application at all is a question which accordingly need not be pursued.

At first sight the word "goods" might seem to be an equally inappropriate description. It must, however, be observed that the word is of very general and quite indefinite import, and primarily derives its meaning from the context in which it is used. Their Lordships were referred to sundry statutes, in which the word is either defined or stated to include specified things. Of the latter kind the Naval Prize Act 1864 was particularly relied on, for it brings within the term "goods" "all things subject to adjudication as prize." This does not advance matters. When, as in that Act, a word is extended by statute to include a named thing, the conclusion naturally is that in its ordinary sense the bare word would have been insufficient to include it. There is further no reason why the definition clause of the Naval Prize Act 1864 should be treated as explanatory of the language of an Order in Council which makes no reference to it.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the cardinal consideration in interpreting the Order in Council is the character and scope of the order itself. The content of the word "goods" differs greatly according to the context in which it is found and the instrument in which it occurs. In a will or in a policy of marine insurance, in the marriage service or in a schedule of railway rates, in the title of a probate action or in an enactment relating to the rights of an execution creditor, the word may sometimes be of the narrowest and sometimes of the widest scope. The question is what is its content here.

This Order was made for the purpose of further restricting the commerce of Germany, and the retaliation, which this Order gives effect to, finds its unquestionable justification in the avowed policy of Germany to prevent crews, passengers, or goods being intrusted to British or Allied ships. That policy was intended to be, and was in fact, carried into effect by sinking ships with all that they contained. The "goods," upon which the Order operates by way of retaliation for such outrages, are things which instead of being destroyed are to be adjudicated upon, and condemned or detained as the case may be. They are things such as can be loaded on board a ship and discharged from it, placed in the custody of the Marshal of the Prize Court, requisitioned or detained, sold or released. They are such as, having been enemy property, may become neutral property at a definable date. The Order contains no definition of the word. Its general object is recited as being "to prevent commodities of any kind from reaching or leaving Germany." How should the word "goods" be construed in such a context?

If securities such as these are not covered by the word "goods," it is plain that the order as a means of carrying out its declared policy contains a large and lamentable lacuna; not that this is a reason for supplying its defects by doing violence to its language, but that the language may be legitimately interpreted with reference to the general scope of the Order. Of the several things which under the terms of the Order can be predicated of the "goods" to which it refers, no one can be said to be inapplicable to these securities. Their Lordships are of opinion that the scope of this Order is correlative to the enemy policy, which it was intended to defeat. In a British ship these securities were liable to be sunk by enemy action in the name of legitimate warfare; nothing but the clearest defect in the wording of the Order should compel the conclusion that they were not also liable, when carried on neutral ships, to be brought before a Court of Prize to be dealt with after trial in accordance with the terms of the order. "Goods" are not limited to things which are of considerable bulk or weight, though indeed these securities were anything but imponderable. The documents were not mere symbols of a right or title to be transferred by the operation of other instruments. If lost, they could not be proved and given effect to by secondary evidence. They themselves were things of price, the subjects of sale and delivery, irreplaceable and unalterable. No doubt can be entertained that they are within the descriptive word "goods" as used in the order.

Next, when these securities were seized it is plain that in fact they all belonged to neutrals. The appellant contends that they ought to be deemed to be enemy property because by the law of nations belligerent rights are not to be defeated by changes of ownership, while goods are in transit. If the securities have been in Germany since the date of the order, it is said that enemy ownership ought to be presumed, and that no transfer can be effective from the moment of their despatch from somewhere in Germany until their arrival at an ultimate destination in the United States. In order to apply the old rule of prize law to the present circumstances the argument must assume that transit is not confined to sea transit or to transit in the vessel actually seized, but extends to anterior land transit, even through Germany into Holland or through Holland to the Dutch port of departure, before the securities reach the mail steamer. It assumes the inversion of the doctrine of continuous voyage by applying this doctrine to transit away from Germany; it assumes its application to a transit in separate and discontinuous stages, and to articles which are not contraband at all; it assumes that the valid and complete transfer of property by delivery of the documents at the intermediate stages may be disregarded for the present purposes. Their Lordships are not to be understood to accept these assumptions as legitimate, or to express any opinion upon them; nor do they hold that the facts in the present case establish a "continuous transit" from Germany to America, in progress at the time of the seizure, in the sense in which that expression is used by the appellant in this part of the argument. They think that it is not necessary to investigate these assumptions on the present occasion. There is, in any case, a broad ground on which the whole of the appellant's argument on this point fails.

The Order in Council is a reprisals Order—that is to say His Majesty, in the exercise of his belligerent right, has been pleased upon just and adequate provocation to resort to measures not prescribed by the general existing rules of the law of nations. These measures are of his own selection and are defined in such manner as he thought fit to adopt in the terms of the Order. It is just because neutrals are required to submit to an Order, validly and justly made by way of reprisal, that they must also be held entitled to know from the terms of the Order itself what is the extent and limit of their liability under it. If clear terms are used, their clear meaning must be enforced; if ambiguous terms are used, the belligerent cannot ask to have them extended by construction in his own favour. It rested with those who framed the order, within the limits of the Crown's right of reprisal, to select and to state the extent of its exercise. It is the duty of a Court of Prize, administering the law of nations, to protect the rights of neutrals in this matter by limiting their obligation to that which the order itself states, no less than to enforce the obligations which the order duly creates and clearly declares. In the present case, in order to deter neutrals from assisting the enemy by engaging in his commerce, the Order tells them that their goods, if of German origin, are exposed to detention; and by declaring that condemnation applies to enemy property it tells them also that, so far as the order is concerned, what belongs to them will not be condemned, though it may be detained. The words are precise. There is nothing said of "enemy character," nothing added to the words "enemy property" to make them applicable to a date antecedent to that of the diversion, nothing to show that the words are to be deemed to include something to which otherwise they would not extend. How can their Lordships be asked, under the name of construing the plain and simple language of the Order, to declare that it condemns neutral property which has been validly acquired from Germans within a certain time and under certain circumstances, and this not by force of the Order itself, but by an appeal to general rules whose inadequacy made it necessary to bring the special provisions of the Order into existence to meet the enemy's provocation? It is not enough that the second proviso to art. 4 contemplates the release of neutral property. This is to be done only on the application of the proper officer of the Crown, and is discretionary; nor, in any case, is the argument valid that, if a misconstruction of the language leads to hardship, the hardship can be redressed by the action of the executive. Their Lordships are unable to accept the argument of the Procurator-General on this point.

There remains the question of enemy origin. Origin is a quality of the goods, not of the owners or of their intentions or dealings. To decide where a chattel originates may often be difficult; in the case of things of great durability, often impossible. Origin sometimes refers to the place where raw material was produced, but ex hypothesi the Reprisals Order goes beyond the general rules applicable to the produce of enemy soil, since existing rules were found inadequate. Origin means sometimes the place of manufacture of an artificial commodity, and sometimes it is a thing undiscoverable. It is not inconsistent with the enemy origin of goods, which come from Germany, that they have previously come into being elsewhere than in Germany. After a certain lapse of time, or certain changes of circumstances, origin may be of little more than curious or antiquarian interest. This order could not be concerned, for example, with old German machinery or old German books or old German wine imported into Holland many years ago. For present purposes there is no utility in applying to "goods" ideas appropriate only to human beings, such as the effect of an individual's place of birth or race or nationality upon his subsequent rights or obligations.

The best guide is the language and context of the order itself, and the purpose which it was intended to serve. In substance art. 3 and art. 4 of the Order are to the same effect, an inwards movement being dealt with in the one, and an outwards movement in the other. The words "of enemy origin" in the latter must correspond to "with an enemy destination" in the former; certainly no other words do. Neither expression makes any reference to the completion of some one mercantile or financial adventure or transaction; neither is limited in any way to goods which start from, or are bound to, an enemy port. One of the purposes of the order is to prevent commodities of any kind from leaving Germany; as regards certain commodities, namely, such as are of enemy origin but are not enemy property, the means of prevention is diversion, discharge and detention till the conclusion of peace. To origin in such a connection neither the place where the securities were printed or signed or sealed is really material, nor the country in which the undertakings or the debtors, from whom the securities emanate, chance to carry on their affairs.

As to the securities with which this appeal is concerned, in some cases they were bought in Germany for American buyers and received and forwarded to them by their Dutch agents; in some they were bought in Germany by Dutch dealers for the purpose of prompt resale or of delivery under sales already made in the United States. It is clear as a common characteristic that no long time before they were diverted all had formed part of the common financial stock of Germany's holding in foreign securities. What happened was that as part of the liquidation of this stock, either to support foreign exchange or to establish foreign credits or otherwise, these securities, no doubt along with many others, were separated from that common stock and dispatched from a terminus a quo in Germany to a terminus ad quem overseas. Only in two cases, and those cases of collection of interest coupons, is that terminus elsewhere than in the United States, where doubtless a free market was to be found. There they became merged in the general mass of American-owned securities. In a word, these securities were part of Germany's resources, and the subject-matter of these dispatches had its source in Germany. Their origin does not depend on subsequent and intermediate dealings. That the transfer from the place of their origin to their new resting-place was effected by bonâ fide transfers in the ordinary course of financial business and physically by a series of transportations in various vehicles, not necessarily predetermined from the outset, is material to the question of enemy property, but not to that of enemy origin. If it were otherwise the whole order could be made nugatory as to all classes of goods if care were taken in each case to sell to a neutral buyer and to deliver in Germany and to leave the buyer to do the rest. Their Lordships are of opinion that the meaning of "enemy origin" in the order is abundantly clear and satisfies all that a neutral is entitled to require of the language of a Reprisals Order.

Under the terms of art. 4 the following parcels were of enemy origin, and as such were liable to detention:

[The judgment set out the eleven parcels of bonds and coupons which had been purchased in Germany.]

In No. 190 the claimants' affidavit admits the purchase of the coupons in Germany and gives no explanation of the accompanying bond, which therefore their Lordships do not propose to separate from the coupons. The mere fact that bonds bear a German revenue stamp, apparently because they were at some time issued in Germany, does not seem to them sufficient to prove origin, where there is no evidence as to the character of the sellers.

There are other cases as to which the facts are insufficient, either by way of proof or of presumption, to establish such a connection with Germany as would bring them within the term "enemy origin," but it is not necessary to discuss these cases in detail.

Their Lordships, therefore, think that the judgment of Lord Sterndale, which was otherwise correct, should be varied by setting aside the decrees for the release of the securities, numbered and described as above, and by substituting the order for their detention, till it be otherwise ordered, which he should have made. It is not necessary to decide what constitutes "the conclusion of peace," mentioned in the first proviso to art. 4, for the objects of the Order in Council have now been satisfied and there is no further reason why the proper officer of the Crown should not forthwith apply to the Prize Court for the release of the securities to the respondents. The very limited success of his appeal does not entitle the appellant to any order as to costs, which will therefore be borne by the respective parties.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

TRINIDAD SHIPPING AND TRADING COMPANY LIMITED v. G. R. ALSTON AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO.

Trinidad—Contract—Freight—Agreement to pay rebates on freight—Illegality by foreign law—Performance of contract of carriage—Liability to pay rebates.

Till 1917 the appellants, with other companies trading between Trinidad and the United States, allowed rebates on freights to traders exclusively shipping by their steamers. The appellants' chief office was in London, and they had branch offices in Trinidad and New York. After 1917 they discontinued the rebates, alleging that rebates had been declared illegal by an Act of Congress of the United States.

Held, that the agreement to allow rebates could not be repudiated after the goods had been carried and the freight paid, since the lex loci contractus was British, and by British law there was no illegality in the rebate agreement, and the refusal to grant the rebate could not be supported even if the rebate had been made illegal by Act of Congress.

Judgment of the Supreme Court affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago, dated the 13th Jan. 1919, reversing a judgment of Russell, J. in an action claiming rebate on freight.

The respondents sued the appellants to recover 159*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, the amount of agreed rebates upon freights paid by the respondents for the carriage of goods from Trinidad to New York by the appellants' steamships between the 7th Sept. 1916 and the 30th Oct. 1917.

The trial judge dismissed the action, but his judgment was reversed on appeal and judgment entered for the respondents.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and J. A. Stamp for the appellants.

Foote, K.C. and Moritz for the respondents.

The following cases were referred to:

Re Missouri Steamship Company, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 264, 423; 61 L. T. Rep. 316; 42 Ch. Div. 321;

Ralli Brothers v. Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar, post p. 33; 123 L. T. Rep. 375; (1920) 2 K. B. 287.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—This is an appeal against an order of the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago setting aside the judgment delivered by the trial judge, Russell, J. The action was brought to recover the sum of 159*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, claimed to be due as a rebate on freights paid for the carriage of cocoa and cocoanuts from Trinidad to New York. The facts are not in dispute, and may be shortly stated.

The respondents are general merchants, carrying on business at the Port of Spain, Trinidad. The appellants are shipowners incorporated in the United Kingdom, with their head office in London, and with branch offices at Port of Spain, Trinidad, and New York, U.S.A. They are members of a shipping conference, in which certain ship-owning companies have mutual arrangements for fixing uniform freight tariffs. These companies, prior to the 30th Oct. 1917, allowed rebates on freight to traders, conditional on their shipping exclusively by steamers belonging to members of the conference. The tariff in force at all material dates was headed: "Freight Tariff Trinidad to New York. Effective 26th Feb. 1916," and after a number of rates for various merchandise it continues: "The rate on cocoa is subject to deferred rebates to conference shippers of 10 per cent. and 5 per cent. on the net freight paid. The rate on cocoanuts is subject to a deferred rebate of 25 per cent. to conference shippers payable on the 30th June and the 31st Dec. in each year on the net freight paid on shipments made during the previous periods of six months ending the 31st Dec. and the 30th June respectively."

In the present instance the rebates claimed come within the terms stated in the general notice. The respondents have complied with the condition of exclusive shipment in steamers belonging to members of the conference; their goods were shipped in a steamer of the appellants and duly carried to New York; and they have paid freight thereon due under the terms of the bill of lading, thus fulfilling all the conditions which, under British law, would entitle them to claim the sum of 159*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* It was argued on behalf of the appellants that the rebates formed part of a continuing contract between the parties, but in the opinion of their Lordships there is no ground for this contention. Each consignment was carried on a separate contract, and it is a matter of business convenience that the amount due as rebate was paid half-yearly on shipments made during the previous period of six months. The said tariff remained in force without any alteration until the 30th Oct. 1917, when the appellants gave notice to discontinue the payment of rebates on the ground that they had been rendered illegal, as regards shipments to New York, ,under the provisions of an Act of Congress of the U.S.A., which was approved, and had come into operation more than a year previously, on the 7th Sept. 1916.

The contracts under which the rebates are claimed are contracts between British subjects, made in British territory, and therefore to be governed by British law. It is clear that the lex loci contractus was British, and that no such question arises as in the case of Re Missouri Steamship Company (61 L. T. Rep. 316; 42 Ch. Div. 321). By British law there is no illegality in a rebate agreement such as was made between the appellants and respondents. The contracts have not been frustrated or rendered impossible of performance; on the contrary, the goods have been landed at New York, the freights in respect thereof have been paid, and all conditions have been fulfilled which, apart from any special defence founded on the Act of Congress, would entitle the respondents to claim payment.

The case of the appellants is based on the allegation that the payment of the rebates would render them liable to heavy penalties, under the Act of Congress, approved and brought into operation on the 7th Sept. 1916. It was argued on behalf of the respondents that this Act had no application to the contracts in question, but in the opinion of their Lordships it is not necessary to give any opinion on the construction of the Act of Congress, or to decide whether or not the appellants have rendered themselves liable to penalties. If the respondents are right in this contention, it is clear that the appellants would be liable, but the same result would follow, though the appellants had rendered themselves liable to a penalty, uncertain in amount, but of which the maximum is 25,000 dollars. It may be that the appellants might have declined to ship the goods on the ground that the allowance of a rebate might render them liable to penalties under the laws of the U.S.A. It is not necessary to express any opinion on this point. The appellants did not decline to ship the goods. It is said that when the liability for rebate was incurred, neither party was aware of the change in the law of the U.S.A. The truth is that the appellants have had the advantage of the contracts of carriage; have been paid freights due in respect thereof under the various bills of lading, and are now refusing to fulfil the collateral contract for a rebate allowance on the faith of which the respondents consigned their goods by the appellants for carriage to New York. In the opinion of their Lordships, whatever may be the true construction of the Act of Congress, such refusal cannot be supported. Their Lordships concur in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago, and will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT IN ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Conditional contraband—Consignment to selling agent—Advances by agent—"Consignee of the goods"—Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914, cl. 1 (iii.).

By the Declaration of London Order, No. 2, of the 29*th Oct.* 1914 conditional contraband is liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port "if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods."

Held, that an ordinary agent for sale who had not the real control of the destination of the goods was not a consignee of the goods within the meaning of the above order, even if he had advanced a large percentage of the value of the goods, and therefore goods so consigned could properly be condemned.

The considered opinion of the board was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—The appellants are a corporation of the State of Illinois, doing business in the States of California, Illinois, New York, and in other places in the United States, as packers, shippers, and dealers in dried fruits and other food stuffs. Alf Hansen is a Danish subject carrying on business as a merchant at Copenhagen, who has acted as selling agent for the claimants at Copenhagen for some years. On the 14th April 1919 the President of the Prize Court made an order condemning 9077 boxes of California prunes as good and lawful prize as contraband of war. These boxes were shipped by the appellants on board the Urna on the 26th Nov. 1915 for carriage to Copenhagen, and were consigned for sale to Alf Hansen. On the 24th Dec. 1915 the boxes were seized as prize, and required to be discharged at the port of Bristol. At the hearing before their Lordships two questions were raised: (1) Whether the goods, which were conditional contraband, were destined for Germany? (2) Whether they were protected by the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914?

A statistical table was put in evidence, which proved that in 1915 the imports into Denmark of dried fruits were 18,651 tons, whereas the annual average of imports before the war (1911-1913) were 6300 tons. The President has found that the statistical evidence establishes a case which throws upon the appellants the onus of showing that the goods were not going to Germany. Their Lordships concur in this opinion. There is ample statistical evidence to place an obligation on the appellants to show that the destination of the goods is innocent. The President further finds that it is impossible for him to say that the appellants have discharged the onus thrown upon them, and their Lordships concur in this finding.

The goods are said to have been consigned in pursuance of a verbal agreement made between Alf Hansen, the agent of the appellants in Copenhagen, and A. W. Porter, a vice-president of the appellants, at that time in Copenhagen. Under this Alf Hansen undertakes to sell goods for the Armsby Company, advancing 70 per cent. of the value. There is no evidence that any consignment other than the boxes of California prunes was sold on these terms, and Hansen received notice of shipment for the first time on the 29th Nov. 1915. So far as has been ascertained, no goods belonging to the claimants have been previously condemned except in the case of what is called the "Hammerstrom Group." In this case it is said that the appellants did not put in an affidavit through inadvertance, but it is not denied that the appellants were from time to time in fact sending goods to Germany. The President in his judgment deals at length with a letter written in July 1915 from the firm of J. and T. Lauezzari, and with the explanation made in the affidavit of Mr. Lester on behalf of the appellants. In this it is stated that

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

J. and T. Lauezzari were simply a centre from which a quotation from the appellants was radiated through Continental Europe. J. and T. Lauezzari, however, carried on business at the same address as Jantzen and Deeke, who carried through a transaction with Broderna Hammerstrom for the appellants, with the intention of sending on contraband goods to an enemy destination. The explanation given by Mr. Lester is set out in the judgment of the President. Their Lordships concur with the conclusion of the President that the explanation put forward by the appellants is not satisfactory, and it is not necessary to restate all the facts in detail.

In addition to this instance there are a series of intercepted messages and letters from the appellants of a character not free from suspicion. On the 23rd Nov. 1914 a wireless message was sent to Christian Eckardt, of Hamburg, indicating that the appellants were dealing or prepared to deal with him. Of this intercepted message no explanation is given. A more important message of the 17th March 1915 was sent to the Bulsing Company of Rotterdam, asking them to notify Behn and Son, of Hamburg, that the appellants had consigned apricots to them at Rotterdam. Again no explanation is forthcoming. On the 4th Nov. 1915 a wireless message was sent to ship peaches to Rabe Neuschafer, of Hamburg, under cover of the name of Rudolf Kolmodin, of Stockholm. In addition to direct dealings with Germany, there were consignments from the appellants to Nils Soeron, of Gothenburg, and Ekstrom and Leffler of the same city, both of whom had been engaged in assisting German trade during the war, as stated in the affidavit of Mr. Greenwood. There were also consignments to Clarholm and Bergman, of Gothenburg, who are merchants dealing in dried fruits and other colonial products. There is, however, no evidence that Clarholm and Bergman have been engaged in forwarding goods to Germany. All these transactions tend to confirm the judgment of the learned President that the goods in question were conditional contraband destined for Germany, and that they are subject to condemnation unless it can be established that they are protected by Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914.

In the opinion of their Lordships it would be impossible to say that an ordinary agent for sale is a "consignee of the goods" within the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914. Such an agent would not have the real control of the destination of the goods. It would be within the power of his principal to give instructions from time to time. The meaning of the words in the Order was decided in The Louisiana (sup.): "The consignee of the goods in the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914 means some person other than the consignor to whom the consignor parts with the real control of the goods."

In the present instance Alf Hansen was in the position of an agent for sale who had advanced 70 per cent. of the value of the goods consigned to him. Whatever rights of lien or otherwise Alf Hansen might have, so long as the advance made by him in respect of the goods was outpaid and outstanding, there is no evidence that there was any special arrangement that he would not be subject to the direction of the appellants in making sales, or that the appellants might not from time to time determine their ultimate destination. In respect of his advance, and apart from special conditions, the agent would not be in a better position to control the destination of goods, owing to his advance of 70 per cent. of their value, than the pledgee of the whole cargo of a ship seized as prize; and their Lordships have determined in The Odessa (sup.) that legal ownership is the sole criterion. In this case admittedly the legal ownership remains in the appellants. It is only as such owners that they are entitled to make their claim. The following passage occurs in the judgment of Lord Mersey: "If special rights of property created by the enemy owner were recognised in a Court of Prize, it would be easy for such owner to protect his own interests upon shipment of the goods to or from the ports of his own country. He might for example in every case borrow on the security of the goods an amount approximating to their value from a neutral lender, and create in favour of such lender a charge or lien or mortgage on the goods in question."

In the opinion of their Lordships the advance of 70 per cent. by Alf Hansen does not, in the absence of any other special conditions, alter the character of the ownership of the goods in question, or constitute the agent for sale a consignee within the meaning of the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914. At the same time their Lordships desire to say that they find no evidence to suggest that Alf Hansen did not act throughout in an honourable and straightforward manner.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

RALLI BROTHERS v. COMPANIA NAVIERA SOTA Y AZNAR. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — English contract—Freight payable in Spain—Payment of part of freight illegal by Spanish law — Implied condition — Mutual inability to perform—Conflict of laws—Restraint of princes—Mutual exception.

An English firm chartered a Spanish vessel from Spanish owners to carry a cargo of jute to Spain. The charter-party, which was in English, made in London in charterer's usual form, provided that part of the freight should be paid by the charterers in London when the vessel sailed, and the balance at the port of discharge in Spain, by the receivers of the cargo, who were Spaniards. It contained clauses terminating the liability of the charterer on shipment of cargo, except for the payment of freight, and excepting (inter alia) "restraints of princes." There was also a clause submitting disputes to arbitration in London.

When the vessel arrived at the port of discharge the balance of freight payable was, owing to fluctuations in the rates of exchange, in excess of the amount fixed by a decree of the Spanish Commission of Supplies. The decree was issued on the day previous to that on which the charter-party was dated. The decree, which was shortly afterwards confirmed by Royal Proclamation, subjected to penalties persons paying or receiving freight for jute in excess of the specified rate. The receivers refused payment in excess of the rate fixed by the decree.

The shipowners sued the charterers for the balance.

Held, that the charter-party was an English contract and that the charterers were liable for the balance of the freight; but that there was an implied condition excusing the parties from obligations which neither was able legally to fulfil. The Spanish decree made illegal the payment or receipt of freight in excess of a certain figure at the place where the material part of the contract was to be performed, and the charterers were therefore excused from paying any higher rate.

The mutual application of the exception "restraint of princes," upon which Bailhache, J. had in part based his decision, not considered by the Court of Appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed.

AWARD of umpire stated in the form of a special case. Differences having arisen between the owners and the charterers of the steamship Eretza Mendi (1) as to the liability of the latter for payment of freight, and (2) as to the amount of freight payable by the charterers if liable, the matter was referred to arbitration. The facts as found by the umpire were as follows:

Ralli Brothers (hereinafter called the charterers) were a firm of merchants having their head office in London, England.

Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar (hereinafter called the owners) were a Spanish company having its head office at Bilbao, Spain. The latter were the owners of the steamship Eretza Mendi, which sailed under the Spanish flag. The owners acted in the charter-party, under which the arbitration arose, by their agents Sota and Aznar, a firm of shipbrokers in London.

Godo and Co. (hereinafter called "the receivers") were a Spanish company having their place of business in Barcelona.

On the 2nd July 1918 Ralli Brothers sold to Godo and Co., Barcelona, a cargo of jute for shipment per Eretza Mendi, Calcutta to Barcelona, half freight payable by Ralli Brothers on steamer sailing from Calcutta and the other half payable by Godo and Co. at Barcelona. The price agreed for the cargo included the freight thereon.

On the 3rd Dec. 1918, Ralli Brothers invoiced to Godo and Co., Barcelona, 29,338 bales of jute at sundry prices per ton—contract dated the 2nd July 1918—steamship Eretza Mendi for Barcelona.

The amount of the said invoice was	576,969	2	2
Freight at £50 per 5 bales £293,380
Less advance 146,690	£146,690	0	0
	430,279	2	2
Less port dues on £293,380 at 6 per cent.	17,602	16	0
Payment net cash	£412,676	6	2

The umpire found that the receivers thereby were given credit for part of the freight and the amount thereof they were to pay to the owners was part of the purchase price of the goods sold, and they were to make the payment as agents for the charterers.

On the 3rd July 1918, Ralli Brothers, London, chartered, on their own form of charter, the steamship Eretza Mendi, owned by the Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar, of Bilbao, for a full cargo of jute from Calcutta to Barcelona, Valencia, Alicante, Cadiz, Pasages, or Bilbao, as ordered on signing final bills of lading.

The charter-party form used was peculiar to Ralli Brothers, and was printed in London. It was drawn up in London for the voyage to be made by the Eretza Mendi and was signed in London by Ralli Brothers as charterers and by Sota and Aznar, of London, under telegraphic authority from and as agents for owners.

By clause 1 of the charter-party the freight was agreed at 50*l.* per ton of five bales.

The clauses of the charter-party provided, inter alia:

2. The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates and robbers, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people, or accidents of navigation excepted. Strandings and collisions and all losses and damages caused thereby are also excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master mariners, or other servants of the shipowners, but nothing herein contained shall exempt the shipowners from liability to pay for damage to cargo occasioned by bad stowage, by improper or insufficient dunnage or ventilation, or by improper opening of valves, sluices, ports or other openings in the fabric of the ship, or by causes other than those above excepted, and all the above exceptions are conditional on the vessel being seaworthy when she sails on the voyage, but any latent defects in the machinery shall not be considered unseaworthiness, provided the same do not result from want of due diligence of the owners, or any of them, or of the ship's husband or manager.

5. Charterers to have the option of underletting the vessel in whole or part, they remaining responsible for due fulfilment of this charter.

22. Charterers' liability to cease on completion of shipment, they remaining responsible for freight, dead freight, and demurrage in loading, if any.

25. The freight, except as provided for under clause 30, to be paid at port of discharge on the unloading and right delivery of the cargo, by cash or approved bills (at charterers' option) at the current rate of exchange for bankers' short bills on London.

26. The captain to have a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage, and for any other lawful claim against the freighter.

29. Any dispute that may arise under this charter to be settled by arbitration, each party appointing an arbitrator, and should they be unable to agree, the decision of an umpire selected by them to be final. The arbitrators and umpire are all to be commercial men and resident in London, and the arbitration to take place there. This submission may be made a rule of the High Court of Justice in England by either party.

30. On receipt of telegraphic advice of steamers sailing from Calcutta charterers undertake to pay in London to owners or their agents in cash, without discount, one half of the total freight earned less any disbursements under clause 18, such payment to be a first charge against the total freight earned, and the master to so endorse on the bill of lading the amount advanced, which is to be deducted from freight due on the vessel's arrival at discharging port. The balance of the freight to be paid at the port of discharge by the receivers of the cargo, one half on arrival of the vessel and the remainder concurrent with discharge.

On the 23rd Sept. 1918 the Eretza Mendi arrived at Calcutta to load under the above-mentioned charter.

On or about the 12th Oct. 1918 the Eretza Mendi, having completed the loading under the said charter, sailed for Barcelona.

On the 22nd Oct. 1918 the half freight, viz. 146,690*l.*, due on telegraphic advice of steamer sailing from Calcutta, was paid.

On the 28th Dec. 1918 the Eretza Mendi arrived at Barcelona to discharge.

On the 2nd Jan. 1919 Godo and Co. notified F. Withy and Co., Barcelona, the steamer's agents, that if the freight as per bills of lading exceeded the official tariff rate they reserved the right to claim the payment of the difference which the final account on the said head might show in their favour.

On the 3rd Jan. 1919, Godo and Co. paid 50,000*l.* on account of freight to F. Withy and Co.

On the 4th Jan., Godo and Co. wrote to F. Withy and Co. that they were convinced by competent persons that freight must be paid at the official rate of pesetas 875, per ton of 1000 kilos, and submitted their statement of the freight due to the Eretza Mendi as follows:

	Pesetas.
29,338 bales of 400 English lbs. at 182 kilos per bale, 5,339,516 kilos at 875 pesetas per 1000 kilos	4,672,076.50
Paid on account:
£146,690 on departure of vessel
50,000 on arrival
£196,690 at the exchange of 23.75	4,671,387.50
Remaining to be paid—Pesetas	689.00

The umpire found that the balance so alleged was not the correct one. It was, in fact, 129,375.50 pesetas. The umpire explained in a letter that he arrived at this figure by taking the rates of exchange on the dates when the two sums were paid.

On the 8th Jan. 1919 the captain wrote to Godo and Co. demanding from them the payment of freight at 50*l.* sterling per ton, and, having no reply, he made a demand upon Godo and Co. on the same day through a notary, informing them that he would apply for the deposit of the cargo as security for the freight owing.

On the 10th Jan. 1919 Godo and Co. wrote the captain acknowledging his notarial demand, and continued as follows:

There having been made on the 14th Sept. last a Royal Order of the Ministry of Supplies, by which by virtue of the powers given to the Government in the law called the Ley de Subsistencias of the 11th Nov. 1916 there was fixed as the maximum freight for the transport of jute for India to Spain 875 pesetas per ton, it is evident that all Spanish shipowners must respect and comply with that sovereign provision, which having been inspired by consideration of the general interest and public policy, must prevail over any private agreements or contracts. By virtue thereof, as we stated in our said letter of the 4th inst., the settlement of the freight must take place in the following manner.

Godo and Co. then reproduced in this letter their freight statement of the 4th Jan. 1919, and repeated that there were only 689 pesetas due to complete the freight, which sum they called upon the captain to receive. They refused to pay freight as demanded by the captain, and failing collection by the captain of the 689 pesetas as the balance of freight they notified him of the deposit of the said sum and called upon him to abstain from delaying the delivery of the cargo and from demanding its deposit.

On the 13th Jan. 1919 Godo and Co. wrote the captain that he had unjustifiably detained discharge of Eretza Mendi since the 9th Jan., and maintained that freight in full had been paid in accordance with the Royal Order of the Ministry of Supplies of the 14th Sept. 1918, and demanded that the discharge be no longer delayed..

On the 13th Jan. 1919 the captain informed Godo and Co. that, owing to the non-fulfilment by them as holders of the bills of lading of the terms of the charter-party, he was obliged to suspend the discharge of the cargo, and that he held them responsible for any damages and losses caused by the stoppages of the discharge, especially for any demurrage incurred.

The umpire then referred to proceedings that were taken in various Spanish courts. So far as they are material they were as follows:

On the 21st Jan. 1919 the captain applied to the Spanish court to order the deposit of the cargo and that Godo and Co. be required to pay the sum of 96,690*l.*, or its equivalent in pesetas, as the amount of the freight due, failing which that the cargo should be sold. The court granted the order, but on the 27th Jan. 1919, Godo and Co. deposited the sum of 2,286,718.50 pesetas as the equivalent of the sterling sum demanded at the exchange of the day, and petitioned the court to order this sum to be placed in the general deposit fund and to order the cargo to be delivered to them. The court granted the order. The captain, however, refused to continue the delivery of the cargo, and his appeal against the order was still pending on the 15th Feb. 1919.

By a decree dated the 2nd July 1918 of the General Commission of Supplies made under the Spanish "Ley de Subsistencias," and by a royal decree of the 14th Sept. 1918, it was provided: "For goods coming from other countries, the following rates shall rule: Jute 875 pesetas per ton . . . "

The umpire found as a fact that this decree came into force in Sept. 1918 in Spain and had the force of law.

The rates of exchange for bankers short bills on Barcelona, on the material dates were:

July 3, 1918	....	17.25
Oct. 2, „	....	23.15
Oct. 22 „	....	22.90
Dec. 27 „	....	23.72
Jan. 3, 1919	....	23.67

The umpire found as a fact that on the 19th April 1919, 23,064 bales of jute had been discharged from the Eretza Mendi, leaving about 6274 bales still to be discharged.

The owners, by their points of claim filed the 17th April 1919, claimed the sum of 96,690*l.* as balance of freight, together with interest at 5 per cent. from the 25th Dec. 1918 to the date of payment. At the hearing, however, they altered their claim to one for damages for breach of the charter-party by non-payment of, or refusal to pay, the balance of the freight. The claim was so treated in the argument.

They contended (a) that the contract was an English contract, to be decided by English law; (b) that the charterers were liable for the freight under the terms of the charter-party; (c) that deposit in court in Spain was not payment of the freight under the charter; (d) that while payment under the charter was required in Spain at current rates of exchange on London, they were entitled to an award of damages calculated at the rate of exchange at the date of the breach, such damages to be payable in London in sterling.

At the hearing the charterers contended (1) that the freight was not due, as the cargo was not fully discharged; (2) that the arbitration was premature, as the matter was still pending in the Spanish courts; (3) that they were only in the position of guarantors, the primary liability being on the receivers of the cargo; (4) that any question as to the freight and the payment must be governed by Spanish law; (5) that under the charter-party the balance of the freight had to be paid in Spanish currency at the port of discharge, and that this was prohibited by Spanish law; (6) that payment was prevented by restraint of princes; (7) that payment had been made by the deposit in court in Spain of the amount claimed.

The questions for the opinion of the court are as follows on the facts so found:

(a) Are the charterers liable for the freight reserved under the charter-party?

(b) If they are, was that liability discharged by the payment into court in Spain by the receivers to the cargo?

(c) If the charterers are not liable for the freight reserved, are they liable for the amount which, with that part of the freight already paid, would amount to 875 pesetas per ton of 1000 kilogrammes?

(d) If they are so liable, was that liability discharged by the said payment into court?

1. Subject to the opinion of the court, I am of opinion that the charterers are liable for the freight reserved and that the payment into court did not discharge them from that liability. That they committed a breach of that obligation in refusing to pay the freight as demanded by the owners, and I assess the damages in respect thereof in the sum of 35,074*l.* 14*s.*, and I direct that the charterers pay that sum in sterling to the owners in London with interest thereon in the meantime at 5 per cent. per annum from the day of the date of this award to the day of payment inclusive, . . . together with the costs of the award and the owner's costs of the reference.

2. If the court is of opinion that the charterers are liable for the freight reserved, but that the liability was discharged by the payment into court in Spain, then I find that the charterers committed a breach of their obligation, and award as damages the sum of 137*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.*, being the sum of 41*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* interest on 50,000*l.* from the 28th Dec. 1918 to the 3rd Jan. 1919, and 95*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, interest on 23,345*l.* from the 28th Dec. 1918 to the 27th Jan. 1919, at 5 per cent. per annum, and I direct that the charterers pay this sum of 137*l.* 0*s.* 8*d.* forthwith in sterling to the owners in London, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the date of this award till the day of payment inclusive, and also the costs of the award.

3. If the court is of opinion that the charterers are not liable for the freight reserved, but are liable for freight at the rate of 875 pesetas a ton of 1000 kilos, and that such liability was not discharged by the payment into court in Spain, then I find and award that the charterers committed a breach of their obligation when they (or the receivers on their behalf) alleged that the total remaining liability for freight in respect of 29,338 bales of jute was 689 pesetas, and repudiated their liability to pay more, whereas the total liability for freight on such amount of cargo calculated at the rates of exchange ascertained on the various dates of payment was 129,375.50 pesetas, and I award as damages in respect of such breach the sum of 5*l.*, and I direct that the said sum of 5*l.* be paid forthwith by the charterers to the owners in sterling in London, with interest at 5 per cent. per annum . . . and costs of this award. . . .

4. If the court shall be of opinion as in the last alternative mentioned, but that the charterers' liability was discharged by the payment into court in Spain, then I find and award that the charterers have not committed a breach of their obligation, and I direct the owners to pay the costs of this award, and the costs of the charterers' of this reference to be taxed. . . .

5. If the court is of opinion that the charterers are not liable for the freight reserved under the charter party, nor for freight at 875 pesetas a ton of 1000 kilos., then I find and award that the charterers have not committed a breach of their obligation and I direct that the owners pay the costs of this award and the costs of the charterers to be taxed.

The umpire based these alternative awards on the fact that 23,064 bales had been delivered, and they were not to affect the charterer's liability (if any) to pay freight on the balance of the cargo undischarged on the 19th April 1919.

On the 3rd and 4th Dec. 1919 the case came on to be heard before Bailhache, J.

Neilson, K.C. and Clement Davies for the charterers.—The Spanish law relieves the charterers of their liability under the charter. This was a Spanish ship belonging to Spanish owners, and one of the terms of the charter-party was that part of the freight was to be paid in pesetas at Barcelona, where the cargo was to be delivered. The Spanish law was incorporated in the charter-party and the charterers were entitled to refuse to pay more than the 875 pesetas per ton, which was the amount allowed by the Spanish law. Both parties were prevented from performing their contract owing to the Spanish decree; it was illegal for the charterers to pay, and for the receivers to receive, more than the 875 pesetas per ton. Further, the charterers are excused by the clause as to restraint of princes, which is a mutual clause. The umpire was wrong in his method of arriving at the amount due, which should be based on the rate of exchange at the date of the arrival of the ship at Barcelona. The rate fixed by the Spanish decree applies to the total freight. [Bailhache, J.—You must take the current rate of the day in estimating the value in pesetas of the amount of freight paid in Calcutta.] The umpire was also wrong in making his award in sterling, it should be in pesetas in Spain. The receivers have deposited the amount in court in Spain, that is, a payment of the freight, and the charterers are only liable if the receivers do not pay. They referred to:

Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais, 50 L. T. Rep. 194; 12 Q. B. Div. 589;
Ford v. Cotesworth, 23 L. T. Rep. 165; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 544;
Cunningham v. Dunn, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; 38 L. T. Rep. 631; 3 C. P. Div. 443;
Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation, 73 L. T. Rep. 678; (1896) 1 Q. B. 208;
Re Newman and Dale Steamship Company and British South American Steamship Company, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 351; 87 L. T. Rep. 614; (1903) 1 K. B. 262.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the owners.—The charter-party is an English contract and must be interpreted according to the law of England. There is an express agreement by the charterers to pay freight at 50*l.* per ton, and the cesser clause is altered so that even after the ship has been loaded the charterers remain liable. The payment of the freight is on a sterling basis; part of the freight has to be paid in pesetas in Spain, it is true, but that payment must be the equivalent of the balance of the amount in sterling. The receivers have refused to pay the half of the freight at the port of discharge, owing to the Spanish decree but that does not excuse the charterers who are bound by an absolute promise to pay. The position is the same as that in Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais (sup.), in which it was held that the defendants were not excused from performing their contract to deliver a cargo by reason of a French law making it illegal. The clause as to restraint of princes is not a mutual clause, but is for the benefit of the owners only. Even if it is mutual the charterers still remain liable, and if the payment in pesetas in Spain is illegal, the contract must be performed in some other way. The payment into court is not a payment to the owners under the contract. They referred to

Blackburn Bobbin Company v. T. W. Allen and Sons, 119 L. T. Rep. 215; (1918) 1 K. B. 540; Bracmount Steamship Company v. Andrew Weir and Co., 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345; 15 Com. Cas. 101; 102 L. T. Rep. 73.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 17, 1919.—Bailhache, J. read the following judgment: The facts of this case, so far as they are relevant to the point submitted to me for decision, are these. On the 3rd July 1918, Messrs. Ralli Brothers of London made a charter-party through the English agents of the Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar, a company whose head-quarters are in Spain, whereby they chartered a Spanish steamship to carry a cargo of jute from Calcutta to Barcelona at a freight of 50*l.* per ton, which worked out on the cargo loaded to about 293,000*l.* Of this sum one-half was to be paid to the owners in London on receipt of telegraphic advice of the steamers sailing from Calcutta, and the balance was to be paid at Barcelona by the receivers of the cargo as to one-half on arrival and as to the remainder concurrently with the discharge. The freight payable at Barcelona was to be paid in cash or approved bills at charterer's option at the current rate of exchange for banker's short bills on London. There was a cesser clause, but the charterers' liability to pay freight was preserved. There was also an exception clause to which I will revert later. The steamship duly sailed from Calcutta, and the freight payable on that event was paid, amounting to 146,690*l.* The steamship arrived at Barcelona on the 28th Dec. 1918. Meanwhile on the 2nd July 1918, a circular was issued on behalf of the Spanish Commission of Supplies, a commission apparently set up under the Spanish Emergency War Legislation, to the effect that freight on jute to Spain was not to exceed 875 pesetas per ton. This was confirmed by Royal Proclamation on the 14th Sept. 1918. The freight reserved by the charter-party was largely in excess of 875 pesetas per ton, and the situation on the arrival of the steamship at Barcelona was that the charterers had bound themselves to pay a higher freight than they were by Spanish law entitled to pay, or the owners to receive.

On these facts the question arises: Were the owners entitled to demand from the charterers the contractual freight, or were they only entitled to demand the freight as limited by the Spanish law? The umpire has awarded to the shipowners the contractual freight. In order to answer this question the first point to be decided is: What is the proper law of the contract? That again is a question of intention to be gathered from the circumstances and from the form of the contract. The charter-party was made in London. It is in English, is on Messrs. Ralli's own form, and it contains an arbitration clause under which disputes are to be decided by commercial men resident in London, and the submission may be made a rule of the English High Court. The owners' agents carry on business in London, but the owners are Spaniards, the ship is Spanish, the port of discharge was Spanish, and the balance of freight was payable there in Spanish currency. There are three possibilities. It may be the law of the flag, or, as performance was to take place in Spain, the law of Spain, which is in this case the same, or it may be English. The presumption in favour of the proper law of the contract being English is not, I think, nearly so strong as it was in Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais (sup.), but I will assume that the parties intended English law to apply to the construction of the contract and to the consequences attaching to non-performance. It seems to be considered that the presence of an English arbitration clause and the provision for making the submission a rule of court are almost conclusive on the point. The charter-party was, however, to be carried out by discharge of cargo and payment of freight in Spain, and there is considerable authority for saying that with reference to these parts of the contract which are to be performed in Spain, the law to be applied is Spanish law, although the proper law of the contract is English, a presumption which is not lessened by the fact that the ship is Spanish, as are her owners, see Chatenay v. Brazilian Submarine Telegraph Company (63 L. T. Rep. 739; (1891) 1 Q. B. 79). There is, in my opinion, no inconsistency in holding that a contract is an English contract, and to be construed according to English law, but that for some of its incidents the English courts are to have regard to the law of the country in which those incidents are to take place. Probably the true view is that this charter-party incorporates the law of Spain so far as regards the mode in which any part of it had to be performed in Spain, but that where there has been a failure to perform the contract in Spain, the court, in considering whether there has been a breach of the contract or not, considers the failure and its consequences from the standpoint of English law, and will not admit an excuse which might be valid by Spanish law, unless it was also valid in England. This was the decision in Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais (sup.), where an attempt was made to incorporate into an English contract an exception of vis major upon the ground that under the circumstances of that case the French courts would have done so.

The next point to be determined is the effect to be given in construing an English contract to a prohibition upon its performance by the municipal law of a foreign country where the prohibited acts were to be performed. If instead of the Spanish proclamation there had been an English proclamation limiting freight, there would have been a supervening illegality, and performance of the contract according to its tenor would have been pro tanto excused. The owners say that no such effect is to be given to the Spanish Proclamation, and that it affords no excuse to the charterers for refusing to pay the full freight, although that freight is to be paid in pesetas in Spain. For this they relied on Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais (sup.). I have stated what in my opinion that case decided, but the decision was so strongly relied upon by counsel for the owners in this case that I prefer to justify my statement of its effect by a higher authority than I can claim to be. Mr. Dicey in his book on Conflict of Laws (2nd edit.), dealing with that case, says on p. 554: "Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais suggests the conclusion that an English contract to be performed in France, the performance whereof is, at the time when the contract is made, lawful by French law, may be valid in England, even though at the time for the fulfilment of the contract the performance thereof is forbidden by French law. This inference is suggested by the headnote to the report of Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais (sup.), and by some expressions in the case, but is (it is submitted) erroneous. Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais (sup.) only decides that a person who enters into an English contract, i.e., a contract governed by the law of England, is not excused for its non-performance in France by circumstances which take place after the contract is made and afford a legal excuse for non-performance under French, though not under English, law. It does not appear from the case that it would have been illegal under French law to have shipped the cargo, but only that the shipping was prevented by force majeure, namely, by the action of the rebels. This hindrance was a valid excuse according to French law, but not according to English law; hence, in an English court it would not be a valid defence for non-performance of an English contract. If the shipment had been a violation of French law this would apparently have been a valid excuse in an English court for the non-shipment of the cargo, i.e., the non-performance of the contract." In that case the defendant had contracted to ship a cargo of esparto grass from Algeria and had failed to perform his contract because of an insurrection in that country. By French law, such an insurrection amounted to force majeure, and by French law force majeure would have been a defence. It was there held that the contract was an English contract. It does not appear that the shipment was illegal by French law, and the case does not, I think, decide that an English court will enforce under the provisions of an English contract the doing of something in a foreign country which is illegal by the law of the country in which the act is to be done; see particularly the observations of Lord Bowen on p. 603. What was attempted to be done in that case was to import a vis major clause into an English contract which contained no exceptions clause, and would thus be contrary to the canons of construction applicable to an English contract. If Mr. Dicey's statement of the effect of that decision is correct, as I think it is, it obviously does not support the shipowners' contention. The impossibility there was one of actual fact and not of foreign law. There are, however, other authorities in the shipowners' favour. Lord Ellenborough laid it down in Barker v. Hodgson (1814, 3 M. & S. 267, at p. 270) that if the performance of the contract had been rendered unlawful by the government of this country, the contract would have been dissolved on both sides, and the defendant would have been excused for the non-performance of it, and not be liable in damages, but if in consequence of what had happened in a foreign country the freighter was prevented from furnishing a loading there which he had contracted to furnish, the contract was neither dissolved nor was he excused from performing it, but must answer in damages. There are other authorities to the same effect, e.g., Sjoerds v. Luscombe (1812, 16 East 201), and in Kirk v. Gibbs (1857, 1 H. & N. 810) a plea alleging prevention of loading of cargo by the regulations of a foreign Government was held bad on demurrer. In that case a loading pass was necessary, and the charterers had undertaken to obtain it, and failed to do so. On the other hand there is authority for the proposition that when the municipal law of a foreign State imposes an equal disability on both contracting parties, neither of them can sue the other, although the contract is English: (see Ford v. Cotesworth, sup., and Cunningham v. Dunn, sup.). Mr. Carver, in his book Carriage by Sea, 6th edit, s. 229, criticises the principle of joint inability as applied to these cases, and points out that it might have been applied with equal force in Barker v. Hodgson (sup.) and Sjoerds v. Luscombe (sup.). In Scrutton, L.J.'s work on Charter-parties, 9th edit., it is suggested on p. 327 that Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) and Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.) are reconcilable with Barker v. Hodgson (sup) and Sjoerds v. Luscombe (sup.), by the presence in the latter cases of a definite time for loading or unloading, and its absence in the former, citing for this a passage from the judgment of Martin, B. in Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.). This suggestion is not, I think, in accord with the view taken of Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) in Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.). In that case Brett, L.J., says at p. 449: "Ford v. Cotesworth is in point and seems to me to decide this case; it establishes that where neither party is ready to perform his undertaking because both are prevented by some superior power, neither party can maintain an action against the other." If this is putting the decision in Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) too high, it was necessary to go that length in Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.). That was an action by charterers against owners for not having the ship Rainton ready to load at Valencia. The reason she was not ready was that she had military stores on board. That fact was not a breach of her charter-party, but it would have prevented her loading, and rendered her liable to confiscation by the Spanish authorities, and she refused to go to Valencia. Had she gone there the charterers would have been prevented from loading by Spanish law, and she would have been prevented from taking her cargo on board by the same law. There was no exception in the charter-party of restraints of princes and the owners' contractual obligation to go to Valencia was absolute. It was held, however, that as the prevention of loading affected both owners and charterers, the owners were excused from going to Valencia. Cotton, L.J. puts the position at p. 449 thus: "The charterers cannot say that the ship has not been loaded through the default of her owners; the act of the Spanish Government has prevented the contract between the parties from being carried out." If that case is in point it is a decision of the Court of Appeal and is binding upon me notwithstanding the criticisms of Mr. Carver, and the suggested explanation of Scrutton, L.J., which does not, I confess, seem to me to fit the case of Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.), however satisfactory it may be when applied to Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.). I think Cunningham v Dunn is in point and I do not think it necessary to discuss the matter further. Perhaps I may be allowed to summarise my conclusions thus: Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais is a strong authority for holding that the proper law of this contract is English, but no authority for the proposition that the municipal law of Spain is no excuse for non-performance in Spain of such parts of the contract as have to be performed there. There is authority for that proposition in Barker v. Hodgson (sup.) and cases of that class, where the inability to perform the contract owing to foreign law is treated as being that of one of the contracting parties only. There are, on the other hand, the cases of Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) and Cunningham v. Dunn. (sup.) which decide that foreign law is an answer if it affects both contracting parties alike, and I may add that, as I read the judgments in Kirk v. Gibbs (sup.), the court there would have been of that opinion if the plea had alleged a joint inability. This case falls, in my opinion, within the Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.) line of decisions. It is not a case in which the balance of freight is to be paid simpliciter. Freight is to be paid in pesetas in Spain, and, in my opinion, it would be equally illegal for the owners to demand or receive as for the charterers to pay in Spain a freight in excess of the legal limit. Up to that limit freight must of course be paid.

There is, however, another way of looking at the matter. The charter-party contains an exception clause, the second of some thirty-three clauses. It is in these terms: "The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and robbers, arrests, and restraints of princes, rulers and people, or accidents of navigation excepted." It then goes on to enumerate other exceptions solely applicable to the shipowner. If so much of the first part of the clause as might be applicable to the performance of the contract by the charterers is mutual, if, for example, the exceptions of the act of God, perils of the sea, and restraints of princes are mutual, the charterers would appear to be protected by their contract whatever be the law applicable to it. The Spanish Proclamation constituted such a restraint. The earlier view was that such exceptions as these only relieved the shipowner and not the charterers. This was Lord Alvanley's opinion in Touteng v. Hubbard (1802, 3 Bos. & P. 291) and Lord Kenyon's in Blight v. Page (1801, 3 Bos. & P. 295, n.); Sjeords v. Luscombe (sup.) is to the same effect. In those days, however, the restraints of princes clause usually occurred in that part of the charter-party which defined the shipowner's duties and not as a separate clause. This was so in Sjoerd v. Luscombe (sup.), in Touteng v. Hubbard (sup.), and Blight v. Page (sup.), in both of which last cases the further words were added "during the said voyage." In charter-parties so framed it was inevitable that the exceptions should be construed as enuring for the benefit of the owner only. The form of charter-party has since then changed and the various duties of owner and charterer are set out in separate clauses as are the exceptions. With this change of form there has been a change in the view taken of their scope and operation, and where they are general and may, or some parts of them may, equally refer to either owner or charterer, they are held to do so. Martin, B. was inclined to take this view in Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.), where, although the exception restraints of princes formed part of the clause setting out the Master's duties, it was followed by the words, "throughout this charter-party." The matter was the subject of decision by Mathew, J. in Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation (sup.), a decision which was followed, though with doubt, by Bigham, J. in Re Newman and Dale Steamship Company and British and South American Steamship Company (sup.). In that case the exception of "fire" was held to protect the charterers. I venture to think that Bigham, J.'s doubts would have disappeared had his attention been called to the difference in form between the older charter-parties and those in use in 1903. I take it that the law now stands that unless a contrary intention is expressed or is to be gathered from the form of the charter-party, exceptions are mutual where they are contained, as is the modern practice, in one of the numerous separate clauses of a charter party, and do not form part of a clause dealing solely with the obligations of the shipowner or charterer as the case may be. Especially is that the case where as here there is only one set of exceptions and not, as in many modern charter-parties two sets, one appropriate to the charterers' and one to the owners' obligations. The clause in this charter-party does not differ in any material sense from the clause before Bigham, J. except it contains the words, "and all the above exceptions are conditional upon the vessel being seaworthy when she sails." It might be argued that those words show an intention that all the exceptions are in favour of the shipowner only. As I read the clause, however, the words, "all the above exceptions" relate to the exceptions which are included in the long sentence of which they form part, and which begins with the words "strandings and collisions.' They do not, I think, relate to the earlier sentence in which the words "restraints of princes" appear and which begins with "act of God" and ends with "accidents of navigation excepted." In any case the words are a truism and are inserted because of the qualification which follows them.

I have come to the conclusion in a case which I confess to have found very difficult that the position is indistinguishable in principle from Re Newman and Dale Steamship Company, &c. (sup.), that the exception "restraints of princes" is available for the charterers, and that being so I agree with Martin, B.'s opinion in Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) that the exception is an answer to the shipowners' claim for freight beyond the limit fixed by the Spanish proclamation. The charterers' contention that their liability for freight is limited to the sum allowed by the Spanish proclamation is in my judgment correct both on the doctrine of mutual disability as laid down in Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.) and because of the contractual exception of restraints of princes.

I decided during the argument that the rate of exchange was to be taken as the rate of exchange on the day of payment, or on the day that it ought to have been paid. It was agreed that no notice was to be taken of the amount that was paid into court in Spain. That will be returned to the person who paid it in.

From that decision the shipowners now appealed.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the appellants.

Neilson, K.C. and Clement Davies for the respondents.

The arguments adduced in the court below were substantially repeated and the material authorities there cited were again referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 26.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—This appeal from a judgment of Balhache, J. on an award stated by a commercial umpire, raises a difficult question as to the rights of the parties to a charter-party when the performance of the charter, or part of it, is prevented by the law of the country in which the performance was to take place.

The particular question in the present case is as to the amount of freight payable by the charterers to the shipowners. The charter was one for the carriage of a cargo of jute from Calcutta to Spain; The clauses as to freight were as follows: "Clause 1. That the steamer shall with all possible speed proceed under steam to Calcutta . . . and shall there load in the customary manner at any safe place, always afloat, as ordered by charterers or their agents a full and complete cargo of jute, which the said charterers bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle," and so on, "and being so loaded shall therewith proceed with all possible speed under steam, via the Cape of Good Hope to Barcelona, Valencia, Alicante, Cadiz, Pasajes, or Bilbao as ordered on signing final bills of lading, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there deliver the same, always afloat, on being paid freight at the rate of 50*l.* per ton of five bales of jute. Clause 18. Cash at the port of loading, for the expenses of which charterers are to be in no way responsible, not exceeding 2500*l.*, to be advanced the master if required by him at the current rate of exchange for three months documentary bills. Said advance to be a first charge against the total freight earned, and the master to so indorse on the bill of lading the amount advanced, which is to be deducted from freight due under clause 30."

Clause 25: "The freight, except as provided for under clause 30, to be paid at port of discharge on the unloading and right delivery of the cargo by cash or approved bills (at charterers' option) at the current rate of exchange for bankers' short bills on London."

Clause 30: "On receipt of telegraphic advice of steamer's sailing from Calcutta charterers undertake to pay in London to owners or their agents in cash, without discount, one half of the total freight earned less any disbursements under clause 18. Such payment to be a first charge against the total freight earned and the master to so indorse on the bill of lading the amount advanced, which is to be deducted from the freight due on the vessel's arrival at discharging port. The balance of the freight to be paid at the port of discharge by the receivers of the cargo, one half on the arrival of the vessel and the remainder concurrent with discharge."

There was also an exception clause, containing, amongst other exceptions, that of restraint of princes. There was no cesser clause; although clause 30 provided that the balance of freight was to be collected from the receivers of the cargo, the charterers still remained liable in case of non-payment by the receivers.

The charter was on the charterers' usual form, and was made in London between the charterers and a firm of Sota and Aznar by telegraphic authority, and as agents for the owners, a Spanish company called the Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar; I have no doubt that it was an English charter and governed by English law.

The umpire has found, as a fact, that in Sept. 1918, there came into force in Spain a decree having the force of law fixing the maximum freights payable on jute imported into Spain at 875 pesetas per ton. It appears from the documents produced to us that persons infringing this decree made themselves liable to penalties, the result being, in my opinion, that it became illegal in Spain to pay or receive a higher freight than the maximum fixed by the decree.

Messrs. Ralli had sold the cargo to a firm of Godo and Co. at a price not stated as "c.i.f.," but the invoice shows that the second half of the freight was to be paid as part of the contract price per ton. We have, however, nothing to do with the rights existing between the charterers and Godo and Co.

When the vessel arrived the receivers tendered freight to the amount which they considered correct, at the rate of 875 pesetas a ton, but the shipowners refused to deliver the cargo except upon payment of the charter rate of 50*l.* per ton. Certain litigation, which it is not necessary to discuss, took place in Spain, and eventually the rights of the shipowners and charterers upon the contract have to be decided upon the case stated by the umpire.

The most important question is as to the obligation imposed upon the charterers in respect of the payment of freight. It is contended by the shipowners that it is an absolute obligation to pay 50*l.* per ton, and that the subsequent clauses as to payment in Spain are only instructions not altering that obligation. They, therefore, contend that that part of the contract may be performed in England, and that the charterers are therefore liable.

I am not sure that if this were the obligation the contention would be right. The shipowners are a Spanish company, and a debtor must seek his creditor and pay him in his own country. Sota and Aznar, the firm in London, are not the creditors, and have so signed the charter as to prevent their having rights or liabilities under it.

But I do not think that this contention correctly states the charterers' obligation. I think the clauses as to place of payment constitute part of the obligation to pay and are not merely instructions. The contract and obligation, therefore, are to pay on delivery in Spain in cash, that is, Spanish currency, or approved bills at the charterers' option. The simultaneous acts of delivery and payment are both to be performed in Spain, and the shipowners are a Spanish company.

As I have shown, it was illegal in Spain to pay or receive more freight for imported jute than 875 pesetas a ton, therefore the performance of the contract was illegal by the law of the place of its performance.

In my opinion the law is correctly stated by Professor Dicey in his work on the Conflict of Laws (2nd edit., at p. 553), where he says: "A contract . . . is in general invalid in so far as the performance of it is unlawful by the law of the country where the contract is to be performed."

I think this is in accordance with the cases of Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) and Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.). Those cases have been criticised, notably in Carver on Carriage by Sea, sect. 129, but they are still authorities, and support the view which I have expressed. It was argued by the appellants that they are inconsistent with the cases of Barker v. Hodgson (sup.) and Sjoerds v. Luscombe (sup.), and that these last cases are the authorities applicable to the present case. When these cases were decided the doctrine that a person who contracted absolutely to perform a contract must do so whatever the difficulties, as laid down in Paradine v. Jane (Aleyn, 26), had not been qualified as has been the fact by later authorities. They may be reconciled with the later cases I have cited in the manner suggested in Scrutton on Charter-parties (9th edit., at p. 298). But, if there be a difference between them and Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.) and Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.), I prefer to follow the later authorities.

The appellants also relied upon the case of Jacobs, Marcus, and Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais London Agency (sup.), and the headnote at first sight seems to bear out their contention. I do not, however, think the headnote is correct. The procuring or shipment of the cargo of esparto grass was not illegal. But, by reason of insurrection, consequent Government prohibitions had become difficult and perhaps impossible. There was no clause in the contract applicable to such a state of things, but it would have amounted in French law to force majeure, and it was attempted to introduce that exception of force majeure into the contract because it had to be performed in France. That is not at all the question which is raised here. That case is examined and criticised by Professor Dicey in his Conflict of Laws (2nd edit., p. 554).

I think on principle and on authority that the charterers in the present case are not bound to perform that part of the contract, that is, the payment of freight above the maximum allowed by Spanish law, which has become illegal by the law of the place of its performance. We have not before us, and I do not decide any question as to what the result of this decision may be upon the rights of the parties as to delivery and disposal of the cargo. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion as to whether the exception of restraint of princes applies to the obligations of the charterers as well as to those of the shipowners.

In my opinion the decision of Bailhache, J. was right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of Bailhache, J. upon an award stated in the form of a special case by a commercial umpire in an arbitration between shipowners and charterers.

The question in the arbitration was whether the owners could require the charterers to pay the full amount of the unpaid balance of the chartered freight or only such sum, if any, as together with the sums already paid would make up the maximum freight by Spanish law in force at the time the freight was payable allowed to be paid or received in respect of a cargo of jute consigned as the cargo in the present case was to Spanish consignees at a Spanish port. Bailhache, J. has on this question adopted the contention of the charterers that they cannot be called upon to pay any larger amount for freight than that allowed by the Spanish law.

The owners appeal. They contend that the contract is an English contract to be construed and to have effect according to English law; that according to its true construction it contains an absolute obligation on the part of the charterers to pay the freight fixed by the contract; and that although it contemplates the payment by the receivers of the cargo in Spain, and it may be unlawful under Spanish law for them to pay it, this does not affect the obligation of the charterers.

The charterers on the other hand contend that, though the contract as a whole is an English one, the performance of it in the material respect was to take place in Spain, that the only obligation as to the balance of the freight was that it should be paid in Spain by the Spanish receivers of the cargo, that such an obligation ought to be held to be subject to an implied condition that such payment should not be illegal by Spanish law, and that if it is they cannot be required to pay.

The first question I think is what as regards payment of the freight is the true construction of the contract. The contract is one of charter-party dated the 3rd July 1918, and made between a Spanish company, owners of the steamship Eretza Mendi, and Messrs. Ralli Brothers, an English firm carrying on business in London. It is partly written and partly printed, the form used being one of Messrs. Ralli's ordinary forms with certain special variations. It contains an arbitration clause providing for an arbitration in London, and for making the submission a rule of the High Court of Justice in England. It is clear, I think, that the parties are right in treating the contract as a whole as an English contract.

The contract provides that the steamer, then at sea, is to proceed to Calcutta, there load a cargo of jute, which the charterers bind themselves to ship, and being so loaded is to proceed to Barcelona or another of certain named ports in Spain and there deliver the same on being paid freight at a specified rate per ton. There is no cesser clause as regards liability for freight. There are two clauses dealing with the payment of freight—clauses 25 and 30. Clause 25 is as follows: "The freight, except as provided for under clause 30, to be paid at the port of discharge on the unloading and right delivery of the cargo by cash or approved bills at charterers' option, at the current rate of exchange for bankers' short bills on London," and clause 30: "On receipt of telegraphic advice of steamer's sailing from Calcutta, charterers undertake to pay in London to the owners or their agents in cash without discount one-half of the total freight carried, less any disbursements under clause 17. The balance of the freight to be paid at the port of discharge by the receivers of the cargo, one-half on the arrival of the vessel and the remainder concurrent with discharge."

The true effect of these provisions as regards payment of freight is, I think this: There is no unqualified obligation on the part of the charterers to pay the freight; the introductory part of the contract contains no express obligation. "On being paid freight" which qualifies the owners obligation to discharge the cargo means, I think, "on being paid in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained."

The express obligation on the charterers is found in clauses 25 and 30. We are not concerned with the first half. This was duly paid. The second half is to be paid by the receivers at the port of discharge in Spain and in Spanish money. The charterers in effect contract for the payment of the balance of the freight by Spaniards in Spain. I will consider the position of the charterers in the event of a failure on the part of the receivers, justified by Spanish law, to make the payment bargained for, after I have stated the remaining material facts.

The charter was entered into by Ralli Brothers for the purposes of a contract for sale of jute made by them with Godo Brothers, of Barcelona. The ship arrived at Barcelona on the 28th Dec. 1918, and was ready then to discharge her cargo. Questions then arose as to the amount of freight to be paid, Messrs. Godo insisting that they could not be called upon to pay more than the legal rate fixed by the Spanish law. There was then some litigation in the Spanish courts into the particulars of which I do not propose to enter, and this arbitration was commenced in London.

The umpire finds that in Sept. 1918 there came into force in Spain a decree having the force of law fixing the maximum freight on jute at 875 pesetas per ton of 1000 kilogrammes. It appears by the translation of one of the documents annexed to the award that infractions of this decree render the infringer liable to legal penalties.

I think, therefore, that it is sufficiently made out that it would be illegal for a person subject to the law of Spain either to pay or to receive more than the maximum freight, and such payment or receipt would render him liable to penalties. There remains to be considered the legal position arising from the construction which I think ought to be placed on the contract and from the facts.

Professor Dicey (at p. 553 of the 2nd edit. of The Conflict of Laws) makes the following statement accepted by both parties in the present case as an accurate statement of the law: "A contract (whether lawful by its proper law or not) is in general invalid in so far as the performance of it is unlawful by the law of the country where the contract is to be performed" and at p. 583: "When the contract is made in one country and is to be performed either wholly or partly in another, then the proper law of the contract especially as to the mode of performance may be presumed to be the law of the country where the performance is to take place." This last statement is in substance identical with a passage in the judgment of Lord Esher in Chatenay v. Brazilian Submarine Telegraph Company (sup.).

In the present case I am of opinion that the contract is one the performance of which so far as the payment of the second half of the freight is concerned is to take place in Spain. It is true that the obligation with which we are dealing is that of the charterers. But what they promise is that payment shall be made by Spaniards in Spain. And it is only in case of default by those who are to make the payment that their own liability arises. On the facts the default of these persons is justified by the law of Spain where the performance of such a contract is unlawful and the contract would be invalid.

Does this position affect the liability of the English charterers? I think it does. It must be remembered that not only is it illegal in Spain for the Spanish receivers to pay more than the legal rate of freight, but it is unlawful for the owners who are also Spaniards to receive it. I think it must be held that it was an implied condition of the obligation of the charterers that the contemplated payment by Spaniards to Spaniards in Spain should not be illegal by the law of that country.

Had the performance of the contract, so far as it was to be performed in England, become illegal by English law, performance would, in my opinion, have been excused, and on the ground that the contract was subject to an implied condition that its performance should not be illegal: (see Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr, and Co. Limited (117 L. T. Rep. 766; (1918) A. C. 119) and many other cases to which it is unnecessary to refer.

That a similar consequence will result from a joint inability of performance arising from illegality by foreign law where that law governs the performance appears, I think, from the decision in Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.).

But it is said that there are authorities which lay down the proposition that if a man contracts absolutely to perform a certain act, he is not excused by the fact that such an act is illegal by the law of the place where it is to be performed. A type of such cases is Barker v. Hodgson (sup.). It was conceded by Lord Ellenborough in that case that had performance been rendered unlawful by the Government of this country, both parties would have been excused. But he held that the same principle did not apply where the illegality arose from the law of a foreign country.

I am not sure that this and similar cases would have been decided in the same way at the present time owing to the recent development of the law in reference to implied conditions. But, however this may be, it does not, in my opinion, govern the present case, in which, according to my view of the construction of the contract, there is no absolute obligation on the part of the charterers that they will themselves pay but only that payment shall be made in a particular way, namely, by foreigners at a foreign port.

It was contended that Jacobs, Marcus, and Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais London Agency (sup.) was an authority contrary to the view that I have expressed. I think the criticism of Professor Dicey on the suggestion contained in the head-note to that case is well founded: (see Conflict of Laws, 2nd edit., p. 554). The performance of the contract itself was not illegal by the foreign law. It was sought to be excused by saying that the collection of the subject-matter was prohibited, that such prohibition would by French law amount to force majeure, and that force majeure would by that law be a good defence. It was this contention which was rejected by the court.

On the whole, I come to the conclusion that in the present case the owners could not in this country maintain an action for a larger amount of freight than that allowed by Spanish law, and that the judgment of Bailhache, J. must be affirmed, the point of law raised by the special case being there determined in favour of the charterers.

An argument was founded on the exception of restraint of princes. It is unnecessary to decide whether this exception was intended to be mutual, and I prefer to express no opinion on the point.

I take it that this judgment decides nothing except that the owners cannot recover more than the freight fixed by Spanish law. How this may affect the legal relations of the parties in other respects is not before us, and I express no opinion about it.

I think the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

SCRUTTON, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Bailhache, J. on a special case stated by a commercial umpire, and raises a question of general importance as to the effect on a contract to be performed in a foreign country of illegality by the law of the place in which it was to be performed.

The question arises as to the freight payable by English charterers to Spanish shipowners for the transit of jute from Calcutta to Spain on a Spanish ship. The umpire finds that in Sept. 1918, there came into force in Spain a decree having the force of law fixing the maximum freight on jute (imported into Spain) at 875 pesetas per ton. He adds certain exhibits (Exhibits 14, 15, 19, and 20) from which it appears that this decree was part of a system for keeping down the price of goods essential for national welfare by, amongst other means, fixing the freight on goods coming to Spain. And the exhibits, together with the full text of that of the 11th Nov. 1916, with which we were furnished, appear to show that penal consequences follow infractions of these laws.

It appears from the special case that on the 2nd July 1918, Messrs. Ralli Brothers sold to Messrs. Godo and Co. of Barcelona, 28,000 bales of jute at various prices from 118*l.* 10*s.* to 105*l.* per ton, to be shipped by steamer Eretza Mendi from Calcutta to Barcelona. Rallis were to pay half the freight at Calcutta, Godos to pay the other half on arrival at Barcelona. The contract document is obscure, but the invoice shows that the second half-freight was to be paid on account of and as part of the contract price per ton.

The Eretza Mendi was a Spanish steamer owned by Compania Naviera Sota y Aznar, a Spanish company with its head office at Bilbao, in Spain. Its owners had on the 3rd July 1918 chartered the ship to Messrs. Ralli Brothers to load at Calcutta a full cargo of jute and proceed to Spanish ports as ordered, and there deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 50*l.* per ton.

Half the freight was to be paid by charterers in London on receipt of telegraphic advice of sailing from Calcutta. The balance of the freight to be paid at the port of discharge by the receivers of the cargo, one half on arrival of the vessel and the remainder concurrent with discharge. The half freight payable at port of discharge was to be paid by cash or approved bills at charterers' option. This half, the freight in question, was payable to a Spanish shipowner, resident in Spain, for the carriage to and delivery of goods in Spain by a Spanish ship, in Spanish money, at a Spanish port of discharge.

On arrival the receiver alleged that a maximum rate of freight for such goods was fixed by Spanish law, and that he could not legally pay more. He paid or tendered what he alleged to be the right amount of freight at 875 pesetas per ton, the maximum freight fixed by Spanish law.

The umpire finds that on his own basis, having regard to the rate of exchange, he tendered too little. Complicated proceedings followed in the Spanish courts. In April 1919, 23,084 bales had been delivered by the ship and 6274 bales were still on board. But I understand these proceedings were not brought to ascertain what was the result if freight was to be paid at 875 pesetas per ton, but to test the claim by the Spanish shipowners that they were entitled to be paid by the English charterers freight at the rate of 50*l.* per ton, without any regard to Spanish law.

I accept the contention of the shipowners that the charterers remain liable for the freight, in spite of the provision that half of it is to be paid by the receivers. But I think they remain liable to pay it in Spanish currency at the Spanish port of discharge to a Spanish company resident in Spain; and further to pay freight in Spain to a Spaniard for goods to be discharged in Spain at a rate in excess of the maximum freight fixed by Spanish law for carriage of such goods is illegal by the law of Spain. What then is the effect on the contract of illegality by the law of the place where it is to be performed, such law not being British law?

In my opinion the law is correctly stated by Professor Dicey in Conflict of Laws (2nd edit., at p. 553), where he says "A contract . . . is in general invalid in so far as the performance of it is unlawful by the law of the country where the contract is to be performed." And I reserve liberty to consider whether it is any longer an exception to this proposition that this country will not consider the fact that the contract is obnoxious only to the revenue laws of the foreign country where it is to be performed as an obstacle to enforcing it in the English courts. The early authorities on this point require reconsideration, in view of the obligations of international comity as now understood.

The argument addressed to us was that illegality by foreign law was only impossibility in fact, which the parties have provided against by their contract, and for which they must be liable, if they had not expressly relieved themselves from liability.

This is the old doctrine of Paradine v. Jane (Aleyn's English Reports, 1647, p. 26) "When the party by his own contract creates a duty upon himself he is bound to make it good, if he may, notwithstanding any accident by inevitable necessity, because he might have provided against it by his contract."

It was emphasised by Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Atkinson v. Ritchie (1809, 10 East, 530, at p. 533) when he said: "No exception (of a private nature at least) which is not contained in the contract itself can be engrafted upon it by implication, as an excuse for its non-performance." And Lord Bowen as late as 1884, in the case of Jacobs, Marcus and Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais London Agency (sup.), cited Lord Ellenborough's approval of Paradine v. Jane (sup.) with approval.

But the numerous cases of which Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr, and Co. Limited (sup.) is a recent example, most of which are cited in McCardie, J.'s exhaustive judgment in Blackburn Bobbin Company Limited v. Allen and Sons (sup., at p. 546) have made a serious breach in the ancient proposition. It is now quite common for exceptions, or exemptions, from liability to be grafted by implication on contracts, if the parties by necessary implication must have treated the continual existence of a specified state of things as essential to liability on the express terms of the contract.

If I am asked whether the true intent of the parties is that one has undertaken to do an act, though it is illegal by the law of the place in which the act is to be done, and though that law is the law of his own country; or whether their true intent was that the doing of that act is subject to the implied condition that it shall be legal for him to do the act in the place where it has to be done, I have no hesitation in choosing the second alternative. "I will do it provided I can legally do so" seems to me infinitely preferable to, and more likely than "I will do it, thoughit is illegal."

Great reliance was placed by the appellants on the case of Jacobs, Marcus, and Co. v. Crédit Lyonnais London Agency (sup.). The headnote in that case speaks of "the prohibition by the constituted authorities of the export of esparto from Algeria." I cannot find any authority for this in the case, which only speaks of difficulty from insurrection and Government commands in collecting and transporting cargo to the port of loading. No express exception covered this, and the attempt in the case was to introduce force majeure, which would be a defence by the French law into the English contract. If it had been illegal to export esparto from Algeria the question in this case would have arisen.

In Blight v. Page (sup.) a ship was chartered with fixed lay days to proceed to Libau and load barley. On her arrival there the Russian Government had prohibited the export of barley. Lord Kenyon held the charterer liable for freight, the foreign illegality being no defence to an action for damages.

This was followed in Barker v. Hodgson (sup.), where a charterer who had undertaken to load at Gibraltar in fixed days and who was prevented from doing so by prohibition to load, due to plague was held liable on the same principle "if he was unable to do the thing is he not answerable on his covenant?"

In sharp contrast with those fixed days cases is the decision in Ford v. Cotesworth (sup.). That was a charter to discharge at Callao, no fixed time being mentioned, and the law implying a reasonable time. Discharge was prevented for a considerable period by prohibition of landing due to the fear of the arrival of the Spanish Fleet. After a long time discharge was finished. When that case was decided, the interpretation of reasonable time, as a reasonable time under the existing circumstances, and not the normal time of discharge in normal circumstances, had not been explained as it subsequently was by the House of Lords in Hick v. Raymond (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; 68 L. T. Rep. 175; (1893) A. C. 22) and Hulthen v. Steward and Co. (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 285, 403; 88 L. T. Rep. 702; (1903) A. C. 389).

Lord Blackburn in giving the judgment of the Queen's Bench seems to accept the position that "reasonable time" means normal time, and, that the party prevented from performing his contract by an unforeseen circumstance beyond his control would be liable, but distinguishes the case where the act not done is one in which both parties should concur, and which neither can perform, in which case he says that the obligation on each is to use reasonable diligence, and either is excused by events beyond his control.

Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.) would now, under the House of Lords' decisions, be decided as a matter of course in favour of the party sued, for the foreign prohibition would be an existing circumstance to be taken into account in fixing the reasonable time in which the act omitted was by implication to be done. Such reasonable time would not now be construed as normal time under normal conditions.

In the Exchequer Chamber the case was again put on reasonable time—as distinguished from fixed time, and the ground that a cause of delay affecting both parties must be considered in fixing reasonable time.

In Cunningham v. Dunn (sup.) the ship was to proceed to Malta and load dead weight, which both parties knew would be military stores, and then proceed to a Spanish port to load fruit. On arrival at Valencia it was found that the law of Spain did not allow cargo to be loaded on a ship which had military stores on board, and when it was found that permission could not be obtained the vessel sailed away. The charterer sued her, and the Court of Appeal held that both parties being prevented by superior power neither was liable, citing Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.)

The late Mr. Carver forcibly criticises these two cases on the ground that in neither was there really joint disability, but takes the view, in which I concur, that they are both supportable on other grounds, which I take to be that in Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.), a reasonable time case, the time must be judged by the then existing circumstances, and that in Cunningham v. Dunn (ubi sup.) the parties must be taken to have contracted on the basis that it should be legally possible to load that ship. At the time those two cases were distinguished from Barker v. Hodgson (sup.) and other fixed lay day cases, on the ground partly of no fixed time, partly on joint inability.

It may be possible to put the earlier cases on the ground that a contract to load in fixed days, unless prevented by specified causes, excludes implied causes such as foreign illegality. An instance of this class of case is Braemount Steamship Company v. Weir (sup.), where a clause excusing payment of hire in certain named events was not extended to an unnamed event, strikes, which prevented the vessel being profitably used, though strikes were included in an exception clause. In my opinion, however, at the present day, in the absence of very special circumstances, cases which decide that a contracting party who has undertaken to do something in a foreign country is not relieved from his obligation by the fact that such an act is, or becomes, illegal in that foreign country are wrongly decided; and this is the true view to be taken of early cases like Barker v. Hodgson (sup., at p. 270), decided before the courts had developed the doctrine of continued validity of contracts being dependent impliedly on the existence, or continuance, of certain states of fact.

Bailhache, J. treated the present case as one of a joint act to be performed by both parties, paying and receiving a fixed amount of freight, in a country where it is illegal to pay or receive such an amount; and that such a joint act prevented by illegality comes within the principle of Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.) and Cunningham v. Dunn (ubi sup.) which are binding on him. In view of the fact that the recent decisions of the House of Lords would require or enable the results of these decisions to be justified in quite a different way, I should prefer to state the ground of my decision more broadly and to rest it on the reasoning that where a contract requires an act to be done in a foreign country, it is in the absence of very special circumstances an implied term of the continuing validity of such a provision that the act to be done in the foreign country shall not be illegal by the law of that country. This country should not, in my opinion, assist or sanction the breach of the laws of other independent states.

Bailhache, J. has arrived at the same result, by holding that if there is a contract, in spite of its illegality in the place of performance, the charterer is protected by the exception of restraint of princes, rejecting the argument that in this charter the exception clause only protects the shipowner. As the view I have already taken results in the dismissal of the appeal, I prefer to express no opinion on this point. But I may say that as in my experience most charters at the present day avoid the difficulty by using the words "mutually excepted," it would be well in future charters to make clear the intention that the exceptions shall protect both parties.

I understand our decision only to settle the point whether the Spanish shipowner can claim freight from the charterer at the rate of 50*l.* per ton in spite of the law of Spain, and to hold that he cannot. What freight he can claim, in view of the actual facts which are not fully before us, we do not decide.

The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MUNRO BRICE AND CO. v. MARTEN;

SAME v. THE KING. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Perils of the sea—War risks—"Free of capture and seizure" clause—Unascertained cause of loss—Proper inference to be drawn from the facts.

If no news has been received of the fate of a vessel which set out on a voyage, part of which would take her into an area known to be infested with enemy submarines, the Court of Appeal held that it was to be inferred that she was lost by war perils rather than by the perils of the sea, as on the facts there were no circumstances likely to prevent her from reaching the area where the danger lay,

The decision in Munro Brice and Co. v. War Risks Association (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 312; 118 L. T. Rep. 708; (1918) 2 K. B. 78) overruled on the proper inference to be drawn from the facts.

APPEAL from two judgments of Bailhache, J.

The first judgment was given in an action by the owners of a cargo of timber against the underwriters of a policy of insurance against marine perils. The second judgment was given upon a petition of right by the same owners as suppliants, who founded their petition of right upon a certificate of insurance issued by the War Risks Insurance Office, a sub-department of the Board of Trade, insuring the same cargo against war perils. The action and petition were heard together for the convenience of the parties interested.

The sailing ship Inverramsey left Gulf Port for Fleetwood with a cargo of timber on the 21st March, 1917, carrying a deck cargo, but not being overloaded. She had not been heard of since. The normal length of the voyage for a sailing ship was forty days. It was conceded that she had sunk at sea. It was known that submarines were at the time active off the coast of Ireland, and that a number of timber-carrying ships from the same port on a similar voyage had been sunk by submarines. From meteorological charts it appeared that there was no wind above a strong gale over the course at the time, and that only on a few occasions and for a short period. The Inverramsey was a well-found ship.

The question whether the ship and cargo were lost by marine risks or war risks had been decided by Bailhache, J. in a former action—Munro Brice and Co. v. War Risks Association (118 L. T. Rep. 708; (1918) 2 K. B. 78)—where the learned judge held that the shipowners had failed to prove a loss by war risks, and that, as the ship was lost on a voyage, the loss was due to perils of the sea. In the present cases Bailhache, J., after hearing certain further evidence, followed his earlier decision, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs, the owners of the cargo, against the marine risk underwriters, and dismissed the petition of right.

The defendants in the action, and the suppliants in the petition, appealed.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Simey for the defendants in the action.

Owners of Steamship Richard de Larrinaga v. Admiralty Commissioners. (a)

appeal from the king's bench division.

Marine insurance—War risk—Warship on voyage to pick up convoy—Collision with merchant vessel—Absence of navigation lights—"Consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."

A steamship, which was insured by underwriters against war risks, and by other underwriters against marine risks, was proceeding in a convoy at night, on the 23rd July 1917, without lights by orders of the Admiralty, when she came into collision with a warship also proceeding without lights. The warship was on her way to a port to take up duty as an escort to another convoy. The war risks policy covered "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations by or against the King's enemies." The arbitrator found that neither vessel was guilty of negligence; and he awarded that the war risks underwriters must bear the loss. Bailhache, J. held that the warship was at the time of the collision engaged in a warlike operation, and that the loss was a consequence of the operation.

Held, on appeal, that the case was covered by Ard Coasters v. The King (36 Times L. Rep. 555) and British Steamship Company v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879); and that therefore the war risks underwriters were liable.

Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed.

Appeal by the war risks underwriters from the judgment of Bailhache, J. upon an award in the form of a special case.

The claim in the arbitration arose out of a collision between the steamship Richard de Larrinaga and H.M.S. Devonshire in the Atlantic Ocean on the 23rd July 1917. The Richard de Larrinaga was insured under two policies, a marine risks policy containing the usual f.c. and s. clause, and a war risks policy.

At the time in question the Richard de Larrinaga was sailing in a convoy at a speed of about six to seven knots an hour. In obedience to Admiralty orders she was exhibiting no lights. The night was very dark. H.M.S. Devonshire had been on duty at Halifax and was on a voyage to Hampton Roads to pick up a convoy of merchant vessels. She was making a speed of about twelve knots an hour and was exhibiting no lights. The two ships sighted one another at close quarters and very shortly afterwards the collision occurred. A good look-out was being kept on each.

By a memorandum of agreement made the 2nd Nov. 1918 between the owners of the Richard de Larrinaga of the one part, the Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association of the second part, certain marine underwriters as set out in the schedule thereto of the third part, and the Treasury Solicitor for and on behalf of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of the fourth part, the questions of liability for the collision and whether the damages sustained by H.M.S. Devonshire and the Richard de Larrinaga respectively arose from a marine or a war peril were referred to an arbitrator.

On the 18th June 1919 the arbitrator issued an interim award, whereby he determined that it was not established that either of the ships was to blame for the collision. Subsequently the marine underwriters and the War Risks Insurance Association came before him for the determination of the question whether the collision arose from a marine or from a war peril. By clause 2 of the war risks policy upon the Richard de Larrinaga it was provided that: "This insurance is only to cover the risks of capture, seizure, and detainment by the King's enemies, and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat, and all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations by or against the King's enemies whether before or after declaration of war, but this insurance shall not be subject to a 3 per cent. or other franchise."

Clause 9: "The said ship shall be deemed to be at all times fully insured against all perils covered by an ordinary Lloyd's policy with collision clause attached and containing an f.c. and s. clause in the following terms: 'Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, barratry, piracy, riots, and civil commotions excepted and also from all consequencies of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war.' And to be fully entered in the Liverpool and London Steamship Protection Association Limited, and no claim whatever against which a ship is deemed to be otherwise insured or protected as aforesaid or against which she is in fact insured or protected by any other insurance policy or Protection Association shall be recoverable under this policy."

It was contended by counsel on behalf of the marine underwriters that the collision arose from a war peril and was a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations because the collision was caused by the fact that in obedience to Admiralty orders (1) the two ships were navigating on a dark night without lights; (2) that as the Richard de Larrinaga was sailing in convoy she was engaged in a "warlike operation" and that fact was the cause of the collision; and (3) that H.M.S. Devonshire was a warship engaged in a warlike operation, and that a collision with her was in the circumstances a consequence of "hostilities or warlike operations."

On behalf of the war risks underwriters it was contended that the collision was caused by a marine and not a war peril, and was not a consequence of "hostilities or warlike operations." It was urged that the fact that the cause of the collision was the absence of lights in obedience to Admiralty orders did not make it a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations; that the fact that the Richard de Larrinaga was sailing in convoy did not constitute a warlike operation; that H.M.S. Devonshire, although a warship, was not performing a warlike operation, but was at the time in question engaged on a peaceful errand—namely, on a voyage for the purpose of picking up and protecting a convoy of merchant ships—and that a collision with her was not a consequence of "hostilities or warlike operations."

(a) Reported by W. C. Sandford, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question in dispute was whether the collision arose from a marine or a war peril.

Subject to the opinion of the court the arbitrator determined that the collision was a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations and was caused by a war peril, and he awarded that the war risks underwriters were liable.

The Admiralty Commissioners did not appear on the hearing of the special case, as the dispute was between the marine risks underwriters and the war risks underwriters (the Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association).

Bailhache, J. held that, although the warship was not at the material moment actually engaged in convoying vessels, but was going to a point at which she was to take up the duty of escorting a convoy, she was engaged in a warlike operation, and the collision was therefore a consequence of a warlike operation. He accordingly affirmed the award.

The war risks underwriters appealed.

Raeburn, K.C. and S. L. Porter for the appellants.—The Devonshire was not engaged at the time of the collision in a warlike operation. She was proceeding to pick up a convoy, and was merely contemplating a warlike operation, which had not commenced, and she was in the position of a peaceful merchant ship. A mere operation in war is not a warlike operation. The mere fact that the ships were operating without lights did not make the operation warlike. In any case the alleged warlike operation was not the proximate cause of the loss, which was due to an accident caused by the absence of navigating lights. Further, the Richard de Larrinaga at any rate was not engaged in a warlike operation. They referred to

R. A. Wright, K.C. and A. T. Miller, K.C., for the respondents, were not called upon.

Bankes, L.J.—In this case a collision took place at night between H.M.S. Devonshire and the merchant vessel Richard de Larrinaga. The night was dark, and, acting under Admiralty orders, neither vessel was exhibiting lights. The Richard de Larrinaga formed part of a convoy of considerable size, which was proceeding at a speed of six to seven knots an hour. The Devonshire was proceeding at a speed of twelve knots. Both vessels were damaged by the collision, and the arbitrator has found that neither was to blame. The question is whether the marine underwriters or the war risks underwriters are liable for the damage. That depends upon whether the damage can properly be said to have been the consequence of a warlike operation against the King's enemies. In my opinion it is too late to give effect in this court to any part of the argument of the appellants, even if we agreed with it, because both points which have been taken are concluded by previous decisions of this court. I cannot distinguish the facts of this case from those in the case of Ard Coasters v. The King (36 Times L. Rep. 555), where H.M.S. Tartar was engaged in patrolling on the look-out for submarines. In the present case H.M.S. Devonshire was on a voyage to take up a convoy of merchant vessels. That is so found by the arbitrator, and I read it as a finding that the warship was proceeding under orders to a rendezvous to pick up, as he expresses it, a convoy which was either waiting for her or about to assemble there. Counsel for the appellants urged that the Devonshire was at the material time proceeding on a peaceful voyage with a view later on to engage in a warlike operation. I do not agree with that contention. I think that the Devonshire while proceeding to her station in order to pick up a convoy was at that time engaged in a warlike operation.

The second point taken was that, assuming it was a warlike operation, it was not the proximate and direct cause of the damage. In my view this point is covered by the decisions of this court in British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (sup.) and Ard Coasters v. The King (sup.). Counsel for the appellants sought to draw a distinction between the present case and the St. Oswald case (sup.) by saying that in the latter case both the vessels which came into collision were engaged in a warlike operation, whereas in the present H.M.S. Devonshire was so engaged and the Richard de Larrinaga was not. Assuming that to be so, then the present case is the same as Ard Coasters v. The King (sup.), because there the Tartar was engaged in a warlike operation, but the Ardgantock was not.

On these grounds, in my opinion, the case is covered by authority, and the appeal fails.

Scrutton, L.J.—When this group of cases reaches the House of Lords the interesting and ingenious arguments of the appellants will demand careful consideration. In this court I do not see my way to distinguish this case from Ard Coasters v. The King (sup.). Whether the decision in that case is consistent with the decision in Britain Steamship Company v. The King (The Petersham) (sup.) is a matter which the House of Lords will have to consider, and if they come to the conclusion that it is not consistent, they will have to say which is right. So far as this court is concerned the question has been determined by the decision in Ard Coasters v. The King (sup.).

THE KAFUE. (a)

Collision—Damage—Demurrage—Claim for period beyond that needed to effect repairs—Remoteness of damage.

The plaintiffs' vessel put into port to repair damage sustained in collision. Whilst she was there her Government issued an order requiring all vessels to be fitted with a gun platform and other apparatus. In assessing damages against the defendants the registrar allowed a claim for demurrage not only for the period occupied in carrying out the repairs, but also for the additional period occupied in fitting the gun platform. The defendants moved that the report be referred back.

Held, that the claim for demurrage whilst the gun platform was being fitted was bad, because the delay was not a result following naturally from the collision, but arose from circumstances unconnected with it.

The London (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; (1914) P. 72) distinguished.

MOTION in objection to an item in the registrar's report assessing damage.

The barque Dieppedalle, French owned, suffered damage in collision with and through fault of the steamship Kafue. She was taken into the Thames for necessary repairs and while under repair had to be fitted with a gun platform and wireless apparatus by order of the French Government. The repairs were finished before the fitting. The registrar allowed demurrage against defendants for extra days required for this fitting.

HILL, J. in giving judgment said:—The collision was on the 20th Nov. 1916. The collision repairs were completed on the 3rd May 1917. The ship did not sail till the 12th July 1917. Substantially the detention from the 3rd May to the 12th July was due to the fact that by order of the French Government the ship had to be fitted with a gun platform and supplied with a gun and gunners, and a wireless apparatus. The question is whether the loss by delay so caused can be treated as a consequence of the collision.

I have already decided a similar point in the case of The Charles le Borgne (1920) P. 15n.). The only difference between the two cases is that in The Charles le Borgne the order of the Government was in existence at the date of the collision, and in the present case it came into existence after the date of the collision. For the purposes of the point to be decided, the difference is immaterial.

The learned registrar reports "As regards the loss of time caused by the installation of wireless apparatus, &c., this time is under the decision of The London (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; (1914) P. 72), time which would not have been lost but for the collision and is therefore under the principle of that decision attributable to it.

I have no doubt at all that The London lays down correct law. But it has no application to the facts of this case.

In The London the collision necessitated repairs, the repairs took time, the period of repair was the longer because there was a strike of workmen—a not extraordinary incident in repairs—just as the period of repairing might have been longer because of bad weather of an unavoidable delay in procuring material or getting a dry dock. The detention of the ship was in the ordinary and usual and natural course of things, having regard to the contingencies which may operate to delay repairs. And the whole of the detention was, in the circumstances, a consequence of the collision.

In the present case it may be true that if the ship had not been in collision and had continued her voyage, she might never have come to any port in which the French Government would have compelled her to fit a gun or a wireless apparatus. Even that cannot be affirmed with absolute certainty. But, first, it was not in the usual or ordinary or natural course of things that a ship, by reason of being in collision, should be compelled by its Government to fit a gun and a wireless apparatus, and wait for gunners; and secondly, the necessity for fitting a gun and wireless apparatus and waiting for gunners arose not from the fact that the ship had been in collision, but from a quite independent series of facts—the orders of the French Government operating upon the ship, not as a ship which had been in collision, but as a ship of a certain tonnage. There was in my judgment no relation of cause and effect between the collision and the detention necessary to obey those orders. At most the collision created the condition in which these orders operated as an independent cause.

The time occupied by the necessity of obeying the orders of the French Government cannot be treated as part of the damages flowing from the collision and the matter must go back to the registrar to be adjusted on that footing.

THE CRETE FOREST. (a)

Practice—Lump sum tender to separate salvors in consolidated action — Costs — Separate representation of master and crew.

The owners of two salving vessels issued a writ for salvage whilst the masters and crews of the same vessels issued another against the same defendants. On the actions being consolidated, the conduct was given to the owners and not to the masters and crews. The defendants tendered 400l. to all the plaintiffs. The owners delivered a reply putting the sufficiency of this tender in issue, but no reply was delivered by the masters and crews. The defendants supplied no affidavit of value to the plaintiffs until the day of the trial.

Held, (1) that the tender in the present case was sufficient'; (2) that in a consolidated salvage action tender of a lump sum to separate salvors is a good tender; (3) that, having regard to the time when the affidavit of values was handed to the plaintiffs, they acted reasonably in continuing the action after the tender was made and should have the whole of their costs; (4) that the masters and crews, whose interests were in this case identical with those of their owners, were not entitled to the costs of separate representation; (5) that if any conflict should arise in any future case between tug owners and the masters and crews of tugs, it could only be a conflict as to apportionment in which defendants are not interested. The proper course for masters and crews to adopt in such a case was not to ask for an apportionment at the hearing, and then afterwards, failing agreement with their owners as to apportionment, to take proceedings for apportionment.

THIS was a case in which salvage was claimed by the respective owners of two tugs, and by their masters and crews, in respect of services rendered to a concrete dumb barge. Two writs were issued, one by the two tug owners and the other by their masters and crews. The actions were consolidated according to the usual practice of the court, and the conduct was given to the owners of the tugs. Separate statements of claim were delivered, and one defence was delivered in the consolidated actions in which it was pleaded, "The defendants bring into court the sum of 400*l.* and say that, whatever view the court may take of the facts, the same is more than sufficient to satisfy the claims of the plaintiffs in this consolidated action."

The owners by their reply put the defence in issue, including the sufficiency of the tender, but no reply was delivered on behalf of the masters and crews. The court held the tender sufficient and apportioned it equally between the two tugs.

It was then contended for both sets of plaintiffs that the tender was bad as being a lump sum tender in respect of two separate claims and, contra, for the defendants, that the tender was good, and the defendants therefore entitled to costs as from date of tender. It was further contended by counsel for the masters and crews that they were entitled to the costs of separate representation, and evidence was given by Mr. James Sexton, M.P., secretary of the National Union of Dock Labourers, that the masters and crews of all tugs in the Mersey had combined to form a tug section of that union for the purpose of defending their interests in salvage cases; that in many cases tug owners on the Mersey had agreements with shipowners not to claim salvage in any case, but to accept payment at the ordinary towage rates, and that in such cases the crew did not get the advantage of salvage; that the men were not dissatisfied where in salvage actions the award was apportioned by the court as between the owners and crews of tugs or where actions were settled out of court and the apportionment was arrived at by mutual arrangement; but that the union considered that the men had a right to be separately represented in all salvage cases.

Stephens, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the owners of the two tugs.

Dunlop, K.C. and G. J. Lynskey for the masters and crews.

Batten, K.C. and A. T. Bucknill for the defendants.

HILL, J. (after stating the facts).—In this case the question is whether the plaintiffs should be condemned in costs or allowed no costs after the date of the tender or some later date.

Two points were argued. First, it was said for the plaintiffs that the tender was bad because it was a tender of one sum to answer several claims. The owners of the two tugs joined in one writ, but the owners were different persons. The masters and crews of the two tugs joined in a second writ. The two actions were consolidated. Such consolidation was according to the almost invariable practice of the court, and in the present case was beyond all question properly ordered. Is it a bad plea to plead a lump sum tender in consolidated salvage actions? I hold that it is not a bad plea. If it is embarrassing to the plaintiffs they can ask for particulars, and in a proper case they will obtain an order directing the defendants to apportion the lump sum. See The Burnock (110 L. T. Rep. 778; 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 490), which laid down no new practice, but is only an illustration of an existing practice. The judgment in The Burnock clearly recognises that the plea is good, for it considers the circumstances in which defendants will be ordered to give particulars apportioning the payment and the circumstances in which they will not. So in The Lee (60 L. T. Rep. 939; 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 395) it was never suggested that the plea was bad. I was referred also to Benning v. Ilford Gas Company (97 L. T. Rep. 102; (1907) 2 K. B. 290), a case in which several plaintiffs had joined under Order XVI., r. 1, in respect of separate causes of action arising out of the same transaction.

But I prefer to rest my decision upon the Admiralty practice and the Rules of Court as applied to the Admiralty practice. Consolidation in Admiralty is an old practice of the court, and Admiralty actions, especially salvage, damage, and wages actions, have features of their own which are not found in any actions in the other divisions of the High Court of Justice: (see The Maréchal Suchet, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 74 L. T. Rep. 789; (1896) P. 233). I think the plaintiffs' objection to the plea as a plea fails.

The second question is this: The plea being good, and the defendants having succeeded upon it, it was said for the defendants that they were entitled to costs from the date of payment in. Here again the peculiar features of a salvage action and of consolidated actions in Admiralty must be considered.

The Lee (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 395) case shows that where the defendant has paid in one sum to answer several consolidated claims, he runs the risk that the judge may say that it was reasonable for the plaintiffs to go on to trial, even though the tender is upheld. And in salvage actions, until the values are proved or agreed, the plaintiffs always have a difficulty in arriving at a conclusion whether the tender is sufficient—a difficulty which is peculiar to salvage actions. It is considerations such as these that make it essential that the court should not fetter itself by any hard rules in regard to costs, and should exercise its discretion judicially with reference to the particular facts of each case. In the circumstances of this case, and especially having regard to the fact that the affidavit of values was only handed to the plaintiffs on the day of the trial, I allow the plaintiffs their costs. It is said that the affidavit was not sworn earlier because of the illness of the gentleman who swore it. That is the misfortune of the defendants; it does not, in my view, prejudice the plaintiffs.

There is a further question. I was asked to make an order for separate representation of the masters and crews of the two tugs who were represented by two counsel, separately instructed. As I have already stated, the masters and crews issued a separate writ. This was in accordance with a practice adopted in the Mersey during the last few years, whereby masters and crews of Mersey tugs refuse to join in salvage actions brought by tug owners and insist upon instructing separate solicitors and upon issuing a separate writ. The actions were, according to the practice of the court, consolidated by order and the conduct of the consolidated actions given to the owners of the tugs. Of course, where actions are consolidated it is for the proper officer of the court to determine who should have the conduct, and he has to have regard to the various interests and other matters in deciding in any particular case who should have the conduct. In this particular case, as I have said, he decided that the owners of the tugs should have the conduct.

The object of consolidation is to save costs. In The Jacob Landstrom (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58; 40 L. T. Rep. 38; 4 Prob. Div. 191, 193), Sir Robert Phillimore quoted Dr. Lushington in the case of The William Hutt (2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 448; Lush. 25, 27), where Dr. Lushington said: "According to my knowledge, the universal practice of the court has been to consolidate actions where the decision of each action depends on precisely the same facts, and in salvage suits the court has gone further, consolidating actions where there are several sets of salvors not rendering precisely the same services. The power of consolidating actions is most beneficial. But for this power the owners of a ship would often be vexed by a host of different actions arising out of one matter."

Barnes, J., in The Maréchal Suchet (sup.), emphasises the second consideration. That object, the object of saving costs, would be defeated and the saving of costs reduced to a minimum if each of the salvors could, whatever the circumstances of the case, insist that he was entitled to be separately represented, instruct separate solicitors and separate counsel and charge the costs so incurred upon the defendants, the owners of the salved property. In proper cases it is the practice of the court to allow, as against the defendants, the costs of separate representation, sometimes by one counsel and, more rarely, by two. It depends upon the circumstances of the case. But separate representation at the expense of the defendants is not a matter of right, and it is not, and ought not to be, allowed unless there is some good and sufficient reason why the several plaintiffs in the consolidated actions cannot be properly represented jointly. If, as against the defendants, the interests of the plaintiffs are identical, or substantially identical, there is no reason why the plaintiffs cannot be properly represented jointly.

In the present case, as against the defendants, the interests of the owners and of the master and crew of the Knight Templar were absolutely identical, and the interests of the owners and of the master and crew of the Expert were absolutely identical.

There could be no conflict as to the services of the masters and crews as distinguished from the service of the tugs. Nothing was alleged in the statement of claim of the masters and crews to suggest any special or extraordinary services of the masters and crews which might call for separate treatment. The statement of claim as it stands might have been delivered as the statement of claim of the owners, masters and crews. Nothing was added to the information of the court by the evidence called for the masters and crews—in fact, only one master, and no one else, was called for the second plaintiffs on the issues against the defendants. The owners, masters and crews had a common interest in making out the service to be as good as possible, and in obtaining as big an award as possible. As against the defendants, they were in no sort of conflict inter se. In such circumstances it would, in my judgment, be most oppressive if the defendants were made to bear the costs of two-fold representation, two sets of counsel, two solicitors' attendance, two briefs.

If in such a case as the present any conflict can at any time arise between tug owners and the masters and crews of tugs, it can only be a conflict in which the defendants are not interested, namely, as to apportionment. In the present case no real conflict could arise for, first, there were no special circumstances, and the sort of proportion allowed by this court in ordinary cases is familiar to all; and, secondly, I was informed that there is in the Mersey an agreed scale between owners and men. But if any difficulty as to apportionment was anticipated, the masters and crews could always protect themselves by giving no authority to ask for apportionment at the hearing, and then, failing agreement with the owners, taking proceedings for apportionment. The court is always zealous to protect masters and crews in respect to salvage services, and will see that no injustice is done to them.

Further, I cannot in the present case hold that the defendants have brought a two-fold representation upon themselves by tendering a lump sum.

Some evidence was given (I am not sure that I should have admitted it, but I was unwilling to shut it out) as to the reasons why the masters and crews desire separate representation, but they seem to me to be quite irrelevant to the question I have to decide. Masters and crews of tugs are apprehensive that tug owners may not claim salvage in cases where one of their regular customers owns the salved property, or for some other reason they may think it good business not to put forward a claim where salvage has been rendered, and that that will prejudice the claims of the masters and crews. But if that happens the masters and crews can always protect themselves. If the owners do not sue, the masters and crews can. Later on I shall be dealing with an action in which the masters and crews of tugs are bringing a suit, the owners not having put forward a claim. [The learned judge is referring to another case set down for trial in the same week.]

The court will always protect masters and crews and see that no injustice is done to them, and that their claims are carefully considered whether the owners are suing or not. When a case comes before the court it is acknowledged that masters and crews get the consideration they desire, and it is proper to observe in this case that the only master who was called stated that he did trust his owners and had in the past joined in actions with them.

The result is that in this case I can see no reason at all for allowing separate representation. On the contrary, I see very good reason for disallowing it. I hope in future that masters and crews of tugs upon the Mersey, unless there is some very good reason, will see fit to join with their owners in salvage actions. I cannot compel them to do so, but that is the hope I express. I believe they will get proper treatment from their owners, but I am sure they will get proper treatment from the court.

The result will be that the plaintiffs, who were given the conduct of the actions, the tug owners, will have their costs, and with regard to the masters and crews I refuse separate representation and make no order as to their costs.

Held, also, that in the circumstances the court ought not to exercise the discretion given to it by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 for an extension of time.

MOTION to set aside a writ.

The facts in the case appear in his Lordship's judgment.

Lewis Noad for the plaintiffs.

G. P. Langton for the defendants.

April 26.—HILL, J.—This is a motion for an order that the writ issued herein and the service thereof be set aside, and the conditional undertaking to appear and give bail be discharged, and the appearance entered under protest on behalf of the defendants be struck out on the ground that the proceedings herein are not maintainable under the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, the same not having been commenced within two years of the alleged cause of action, the period provided for in the Act.

On the 15th Sept. 1916 a collision occurred between the steamship Port Hacking and the steamship Clermiston. The Port Hacking sued the Clermiston. The Clermiston pleaded that the fault was the fault of the Port Hacking and, secondly, that the fault was the fault of a third steamship, the Virginia, now the P. L. M. 8, and the Clermiston counter-claimed against the Port Hacking. The Clermiston also sued the Virginia in a separate action. The Port Hacking did not at that time bring any action against the Virginia.

The trial of both these actions, between the Port Hacking and the Clermiston, and between the Clermiston and the Virginia, took place on the 5th March 1920. I found in both actions that the fault was solely that of the Virginia. Upon this the Port Hacking, which, as I have said, had so far not sued the Virginia, on the 9th March 1920 issued a writ against the Virginia, and the solicitors for the Virginia gave a conditional undertaking to put in an appearance and to give bail.

The Virginia now moves to set aside the writ and service and asks that the undertaking be discharged and the appearance set aside, on the ground that the action by the Port Hacking against the Virginia is barred by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911. Upon that the Port Hacking asks the court to extend the time under the proviso to sect. 8.

It is clear upon the affidavits that have been filed that the second part of the proviso, the obligatory part of it, is not applicable. The Virginia at the date of the collision, the 15th Sept. 1916, was American-owned. She was on the 27th April 1917 transferred to French owners. Since then she has been many times within the jurisdiction—thrice in 1917 and many times in 1918 and 1919; and she was not under requisition, and therefore she could have been effectively arrested if a writ in rem had been issued against her.

The question, therefore, is: Ought the court to exercise its discretion under the first part of the proviso to sect. 8? Now, it must be remembered that the Act gives the defendants a right, and it is a right that can only be taken away on sufficient grounds. What are the grounds which are alleged? In an affidavit filed on behalf of the plaintiffs it is said: "By reason of the delay in getting the pleadings closed in the action by the owners of the Clermiston against the owners of the Virginia, to the delay in obtaining the evidence of witnesses who had been dispersed, and to the unusual length of time which elapsed (as in many other Admiralty actions arising out of collisions during the war) before the case could be conveniently fixed for trial, the plaintiffs in the present action were unable to institute proceedings against the defendants, the owners of the Virginia, within the two years of the date of the collision."

So far as the pleadings go, the important pleading from the point of view of the present matter is the defence of the Clermiston, which was delivered on the 8th Dec. 1916, and which, as I have said, alleged that the collision was caused by the fault of the Virginia, though also attributing fault to the Port Hacking. I have no specific information as to the delay in obtaining the evidence of the witnesses. When the witnesses for the Port Hacking were examined in the two earlier actions (the examination took place in Jan. 1920) they in substance put the blame on the Virginia.

I can see no reason why that information could not have been obtained (supposing it was not obtained) from the witnesses for the Port Hacking at a much earlier date than before the two years had expired. The delay in the trial of those actions was undoubtedly unfortunate for the present plaintiffs. If they had been tried within two years I dare say that the plaintiffs would have issued their writ against the Virginia within two years.

But taking all these matters together, they do not seem to me to constitute a ground, or any sufficient ground, why the action should not have been brought within two years, or why I should exercise a discretion to deprive the defendants of a right which they have undoubtedly acquired by lapse of time. It is said that to let the Virginia off will work an injustice, because the blame has been found to rest with the Virginia. That is true enough in a sense, but it will equally work an injustice if I deprive the defendants of the legal right of limitation which they have got.

Therefore, I do not see any ground upon which I can deprive the present defendants of their right to say that the action is statute-barred.

It is also said by the defendants that difficulties would arise because they were insured in a club and no provision has been made for this claim in the accounts of the club, and that it might be very difficult to get the club to pay at this late stage if the Port Hacking should obtain judgment. I am not so much impressed by that, though it is a matter to be taken into consideration. I think, however, that it is doubtful if the club has finally closed its accounts for the year 1916, and therefore I do not attribute very much weight to that objection.

The result is that I must refuse the application of the present plaintiffs to grant an extension of time. The Act says that "no action shall be maintainable." I do not think that that means that no writ may be issued, but that if the statutory limitation has expired the action shall not be maintainable.

Therefore, I think the proper order is not that the writ should be set aside, but that the action is not maintainable. That in effect is just as if a preliminary objection had been raised at the trial and decided against the plaintiffs, and the result is the same as if I had set aside the writ. The motion of the defendants succeeds, with costs.

A German steamship had been lying in refuge at Lisbon, laden with certain goods since the outbreak of war. The goods were owned by a company registered and carrying on business in Holland, though ninety-eight of its hundred shares were owned by Germans domiciled in Germany.

On the* 9*th March* 1916 Portugal declared war, as an ally, and later the German steamship was requisitioned and the goods landed on the quay. On the 14*th March* 1916 the ninety-eight shares in the company owned by the German subjects were assigned to a citizen of the Netherlands. In Nov. 1916, *in pursuance of the contract of sale, the goods were shipped from Lisbon for delivery at Amsterdam in three vessels under three bills of lading, consigned as by the Dutch consul at Lisbon to the Netherlands Oversea Trust. In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment, the following case was cited in argument:

The Hamborn, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 204, 461; 121 L. T. Rep. 463; (1919) A. C. 993.

May 19.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—This is a claim by a Dutch chemical manufacturing company to have paid out of court the proceeds of sale of certain parcels of magnesite, which were taken in prize out of the three steamships in the course of a voyage from Lisbon to Rotterdam, the goods having formed part of the cargo of the German steamship Naxos, of the German Levant Line. The Naxos at the outbreak of war had been on a voyage from the Eastern Mediterranean to Rotterdam with a cargo of magnesite, and had been lying in a port of refuge, viz., Lisbon, from the outbreak of war until transshipment of the various parcels of cargo to the three vessels in question. The arguments proceeded upon an admitted case as to the condition of the goods in question at the time the Naxos took refuge at Lisbon. It was a German ship, and the goods by reason of the constitution of the company which chartered the ship were enemy goods. The company who were the owners of the goods were the Internationale Magnesiet Werken. It was incorporated with 100 shares, of which ninety-eight were held by one German subject and two were held by a near relative, who managed the concern.

In that state of facts it was indisputable by reason of decisions arrived at during the war—Daimler Motor Company v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Company (Great Britain) Limited (114 L. T. Rep. 1049; (1916) 2 A. C. 307) and other cases—that the goods on board the Naxos were enemy goods, and if they had been captured on the voyage to Lisbon or elsewhere these goods would have been condemned as prize. The questions in the case arise with regard to transactions which took place after the Naxos had been a long time laid up at Lisbon. They were transactions in good faith; there is no question about that. The claimants are chemical manufacturers in Holland, carrying on an old-established business, and they were sorely in need of magnesite for the purpose of their trade, and when they negotiated with the Internationale Magnesiet Werken they negotiated for the purpose of securing supplies. The question is whether, having in good faith entered into a contract with regard to the goods, they acquired such title in the goods that at the date of capture the goods were their goods and not, in contemplation of the law of prize, the goods of the enemy owner.

The contract which was relied on was made on the 4th Feb. 1916, and the first shipment was in November, the second in Dec. of 1916, and the third in Jan. 1917. The bills of lading were dated the 24th and 26th Oct. and the 2nd Nov. Various events occurred between the 4th Feb. 1916, and the sailing of the three vessels, and two which were particularly considered during the course of the arguments were the entry of Portugal into the war as one of the Allied Powers, which dates from the 9th March 1916, and the change in the ownership of the shares of the Internationale Magnesiet Werken. All I know of the latter is contained in Mr. Greenwood's affidavit, that he has ascertained that what purported to be an assignment of the ninety-eight shares had been made on the 14th March 1916, to a citizen of the Netherlands.

I have come to the conclusion that the change in the constitution of the shareholding of the company has no material effect in this case. The main questions raised were the questions whether effective transfer of the property in the goods could be made at the time and in the circumstances when the transfer was made, and whether the transfer was a good one to defeat the right of capture of a belligerent. Two bills of lading were made by the original consignors—the Internationale Magnesiet Werken, and the consignees were the same firm—to their order to be delivered to Amsterdam. The three bills of lading under which the goods were shipped from Lisbon for delivery at Amsterdam, contained the name of the Dutch Consul at Lisbon as the shipper, and the consignees were the Netherlands Oversea Trust. The identity of the shipper is not disclosed, and they are made out to the order of the consignee, who, on the face of them, does not purport to be the true consignee of the goods in the sense that it was a consignment of goods which were to pass into the ownership of the consignee, if not already so passed.

As to the first question, whether the transfer of the goods could have been made at the time and in the place when the transfer was made, Mr. Davies, for the Crown, relied upon the judgment of my predecessor, Sir Samuel Evans, in the case of The Bawean (sup.). He submitted that no transfer of these goods, until the voyage on which they had been embarked at the Levantine ports was a completed voyage, could be an effectual transfer so as to defeat the right of capture. I said at the time, and I still think that that proposition is a novel one. There is colour for it in various judgments in Prize but I have come to the conclusion that it is a proposition which is too wide to be an accurate statement of the law in regard to the right of an enemy owner of goods to transfer the property in them after shipment and before the arrival at the original port of destination. The subject is one which has beeen discussed from time to time.

The principal modern authority is the case of the Baltica (11 Moore P. C. 141, 149), judgment by the Privy Council in 1857, where a principle less sweeping than that contended for on behalf of the Crown was stated to be a true expression of the rule. The contention was that so long as the original voyage is incomplete there is an indefeasible right to capture. It is hardly necessary to point out how very comprehensive is that alleged right of capture which seems to attach for the duration of any war—the right of capture in respect of any enemy goods which have once been put on shipboard and have not reached the port for which they were destined with no abandonment of the voyage and no transfer of the ownership. If that contention truly represents the law it could be effectually made. I have said that I think that statement is too wide, having regard to the judgment of Lord Stowell, who laid down the principle which was stated anew in the case of the Baltica. Lord Stowell clearly recognised the possibility of a determination of the voyage upon which the vessel had originally entered.

In the case of the Danekebarr Africaan (1 Christopher Robinson, p. 107) Lord Stowell held that the ship was enemy property, that she had been dispatched upon the voyage as an enemy ship, and that she did not change her character in transit; he seemed to indicate a clear recognition of the principle that, although the original voyage has not been completed, the presence of the vessel or the goods on board a vessel in a port of safety such as a neutral port puts the owner of the ship or goods in a position to decide for himself as to the destination of his goods and as to the ownership of them, and in a position to abandon the original enterprise.

The same question arose in another case which Lord Stowell tried. It was a case where hides which were Spanish property—Spain being at that time at war with this country—were consigned to a Portuguese port on the Tagus. The vessel was under Portuguese convoy and the goods were brought across the Atlantic and discharged in the Tagus at a place where Spanish goods might be discharged. They were subsequently re-dispatched in coasting vessels to Spain, so that the transit was from a Spanish owner in America to a Spanish owner in Europe. The question arose, what was the effect, first, of the delivery in the Tagus? It was held that although there had been delivery into Allied waters under convoy of friendly ships, enemy character attached to the goods and they were subject to confiscation and they were confiscated. Lord Stowell, in the course of his judgment, considered whether the change in the property in these goods could have taken place at the Portuguese entrepôt, and he conceived the possibility of an effective transfer of the goods in the friendly port.

In the case of another parcel of hides, dispatched under the same convoy, there was a claim by a merchant at Emden, who prayed leave to admit further evidence. In considering this, Lord Stowell said:—"If they were going actually to Emden there had been a termination of the original voyage." That seems to indicate the view of Lord Stowell that, although the destination had been originally an enemy one, although the port on the Tagus had been merely a port of discharge for re-shipment, nevertheless, if there had been abandonment of the enemy enterprise at that time and a true interposition of neutral ownership, the result would have been to have defeated the claim for prize.

It seems to me that the claimants are right in their contention that at Lisbon at the time when they entered into the contract it was possible that they should acquire good title to this property, which would have defeated the right of capture. The next question is whether the transfer did defeat the right of capture. That raises the question of what is in truth required for that purpose. To my mind the law is sufficiently stated in the passage referred to from the judgment of Sir Samuel Evans in the Bawean. It was stated in the Baltica, and Sir Samuel Evans did not intend to depart, I am satisfied, from the rule laid down. He said it was quite clear law according to the Prize Courts in this country and America, and, he thought, in Germany also, that goods which belonged to an enemy when once shipped and become subject to the risk of capture at the hands of a belligerent, retained their enemy character until they reached their destination, and no transfer to a neutral would be effective so as to defeat the right of capture unless the transferee was actually in possession of the goods. As to the requirements for an effective transfer, what is stated is that there must be a transfer, and the transferee must have actually taken possession of the goods. In the case of the Sechs Geschwistern (4 Christopher Robinson, p. 101), Lord Stowell said: "The rule which this country has been content to apply is that property so transferred must be bona fide and absolutely transferred, that there must be a sale divesting the enemy of all further interest in it, and that anything tending to continue his interests vitiates a contract of this description altogether."

That statement of the law was considered in the case of the Ariel (11 Moore, P.C., 119), and counsel adopted the exact language of the statement by Lord Stowell. What is required is, I gather, that once and for all the enemy owner must put off his whole ownership and interest in the goods, and that that act of transfer of the whole of his right and interest in the property must be accompanied by a present delivery. It is not until there is a complete transfer to that intent and a delivery following upon that transfer that the right of capture is defeated. Now those are the principles upon which I find myself bound to proceed in examining the transaction in this case.

In the claim put forward by the claimants they do not state the origin of their interest in the goods. They set up their alleged right to them, but there is no root to the title of the claimants except that which is found in the agreement of the 4th Feb. 1916. It was suggested yesterday that there were acts of the German-owned company during the year 1916 which gave an additional effect to this transaction of Feb. 1916. It was said that the company, although an enemy company at the date of the contract, had become a neutral company at the date of the transfer of these goods.

I do not agree with or appreciate the whole effect of that proposition. The transaction sought to be relied on was one of those transactions of an elusive character which have always been held in the Court of Prize to be insufficient to defeat the rights of a captor. It has been said that the reason why paper transactions effected during a voyage of a ship cannot be examined as against the right of the captor, is that it is almost impossible to ascertain the truth of such cases; that the fabrication of a case is simple, and that an examination of it is almost impossible.

If that is the test in a commercial transaction of an every-day kind, I ask myself how is it possible that a transaction such as that relied upon—a change of ownership in the shares of the company, with its effect upon the disposition and management of the company—can be set up as an answer to the right of capture, and how it may be regarded in the Court of Prize as an answer to the captor.

It is a process that might entail persons claiming property, as that of an enemy company, entering into investigations many times in the course of a single voyage. It is a process that lends itself to fraud—I do not think there was any fraud in this case—but I decline to examine or to consider whether in the course of the transport of these goods, the German owners had transferred their character. I think the case must be dealt with on the footing that the transfer of the goods took place, and that the agreement of title is the agreement of the 4th Feb., and, if there is no good title on the transaction based on that agreement, there is no good claim.

The agreement is an agreement by which the parties declare that they have agreed in reference to the sale and purchase of 1000 tons of raw magnesite. They declare it to be purchased lying in the steamship Naxos, at Lisbon, and that all charges and expenses arising through release, delivery, unloading, loading and transport of the goods, as well as the expenses charged by the trust company, shall be borne by the purchaser, so that no expense of any description whatever should be upon the vendor. They fix the price and arrange that half shall be paid as soon as the seller has produced evidence that the goods will be released by the Portuguese Custom House authorities, and no objection is raised by the Deutsche Levante Linie against transhipment, and it is certain such transhipment can take place; that the second instalment shall fall due as soon as the goods arrive and on the approval of the goods by the purchaser, or directly it is known that the ship and cargo are lost or are seized by one of the belligerents, or, at most, not later than two months from the payment of the first instalment, irrespective of whether the goods have been shipped or not; the transloading shipment and so forth, the agreement proceeds, shall be carried out on behalf of the vendor, and on account and at the risk of the purchaser.

Then there was a second clause which seems to me to be very material in relation to the matter in question. It states that if the goods are unsuitable the buyer shall, on the arrival of the goods, have the right to refuse to accept the parcel, and the seller shall be bound to take back the magnesite and repay the amount of the purchase price, increased by the amount of the sea freight to a maximum of 30*s.* per ton, and the vendor and purchaser shall be entitled to cancel the contract before the first instalment is paid if it appears that by any prohibition it is rendered impossible.

These two clauses seem to me to raise very serious questions as to the alleged title of the claimants in this case. As to the right to repudiate the contract, that was a right to be exercised before transhipment at Lisbon, but I am not sure that it has any conclusive effect. It introduces considerations as to whether this is an absolute disposition of the goods, which must be taken into account with other general considerations arising from the agreement.

But with regard to the clause which enables the buyer to refuse acceptance of the parcel at Amsterdam, it seems to me that that is a much more serious matter. I put the question to myself in this way: Assume these goods to be transhipped in Lisbon on board a neutral vessel and to have been found at sea under such a Bill of Lading as is here in question—a Bill of Lading by a nominal consignor with a nominal consignee and not an actual consignee—and with an agreement for sale which contained a provision that on arrival at the port where the vendor and purchaser both have their establishments, it should be optional for the purchaser on ascertaining the facts to disclaim the property in the goods, could it be said there was such an absolute disposition of these goods by the enemy vendor as satisfied the test laid down by Lord Stowell and re-tried by the Privy Council in the case of the Ariel?

I put aside the other uncertainty in this transaction, but it seems to me there was an option by the terms of the last clause in the enemy vendor. That being an interest reserved in the enemy vendor, the result is that I am bound to hold that this was not an effective transfer in the course of the voyage on which the goods had entered which defeated the right to capture; that the right of capture was existent and was duly exercised, and upon these grounds I come to the conclusion that this claim on behalf of the Crown must be allowed and the goods condemned as good and lawful prize.

PRIZE COURT.

Wednesday, Jan. 14, 1920.

(Before Sir HENRY DUKE, P.)

THE VALERIA. (a)

Prize Court—Enemy vessel—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Impossibility to bring captured vessel into British port — Sinking of vessel — —Unintentional violation of territorial rights— Claim by neutral Power—No order for restitution or damages — Hague Conference 1907, Convention XIII., art. 3.

An enemy vessel was captured in neutral territorial waters, the captors acting bonâ fide and without negligence. Subsequently the vessel was sunk by the captors.

On a claim by the neutral Government for restitution of the value of the ship and for damages and costs, it was held that, since the captors acted reasonably, honestly, and without negligence, the claim for restitution of value and for damages and costs failed, although a claim for the restitution of the ship, had she still been afloat, would have succeeded.

THIS was a case in which the Norwegian Government claimed restitution in respect of a German steamship, together with damages and costs. The case was part heard on various occasions in 1919, on many dates before the former President (Lord Sterndale), and it now came on for judgment.

The Valeria was a German steamship, and whilst on a voyage from Narvik, in Norway, to Hamburg, in Germany, laden with a cargo of iron ore, she was captured by H.M.S. Glendale. In July 1919, when the case was before Lord Sterndale, it was found that the Valeria had, in fact, been captured within Norwegian territorial waters; but it was also proved that, although there had been a violation of Norwegian neutrality by reason of the capture, such violation had been quite unintentional, as the commander of the Glendale honestly believed that at the time of the capture he was on the high seas. Whilst crossing the North Sea after the capture heavy weather was encountered, and as it became impossible to bring the Valeria into port she was sunk by gunfire. It was in respect of the violation of Norwegian neutrality that the Norwegian Government now put forward a claim for the value of the Valeria and her cargo, together with damages and costs.

The contention put forward by the Norwegian Government was that there had been an act of trespass on the part of the Glendale, and, as the German vessel had been wrongfully seized, the British Government were responsible for whatever happened afterwards. The seizure was wrongful, in the first instance, and the neutral Power was bound to demand back what had been wrongfully taken within the borders of her territorial rights. [Art. 3, XIIIth Hague Convention, was cited.]

The contention for the Crown was that the capture of the Valeria was rightful as between the British Government and the German Government, and that a neutral Government could not interfere in a case where it had been shown that the infringement of territorial rights had been made under an honest mistake.

The material articles of Convention XIII. of the Hague Conference 1907, which was signed and ratified by Great Britain and Norway, are as follows:

1. Belligerents are bound to respect the sovereign rights of neutral Powers and to abstain, in neutral territory or neutral waters, from any act which would, if knowingly permitted by any Power, constitute a violation of neutrality.

2. Any act of hostility, including therein capture and the exercise of the right of search, committed by belligerent warships in the territorial waters of a neutral Power, constitutes a violation of neutrality and is strictly forbidden.

3. When a ship has been captured in the territorial waters of a neutral Power, such Power must, if the prize is still within its jurisdiction, employ the means at its disposal to release the prize with its officers and crew, and to intern the prize crew. If the prize is not within the jurisdiction of the neutral Power, the captor Government, on the demand of that Power, must liberate the prize with its officers and crew.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—This is the claim of the Consul-General for Norway on behalf of His Majesty the King of Norway for restitution in value of the German steamship Valeria with damages and costs. The Valeria was captured by an armed British trawler, H.M.S. Glendale, on a voyage from Narvik, in Norway, to the port of Hamburg with a cargo of iron ore. In crossing the North Sea towards Lerwick the commander of the Glendale encountered bad weather, and he deemed it necessary to abandon and to sink the Valeria. The ground of the present claim is that the capture of the Valeria was made within the territorial waters of Norway. Claims which were made on behalf of the German owners of the Valeria and of her cargo respectively have been struck out. A claim which was lodged on behalf of the Norwegian Customs officers and pilots who were on board the Valeria when captured will, I believe, be disposed of by agreement.

At the hearing of this case on the 17th July 1919 upon the question of the locality of the capture, the President, Lord Sterndale, found that the place of capture was within the territorial waters of Norway, but he found, further, that the violation of Norwegian neutrality had been unintentional, and that the captor honestly and reasonably believed that at the time of the capture his vessel and the Valeria were outside territorial waters. Upon these findings judgment is claimed on behalf of the Norwegian Government for the value of the Valeria and her cargo, and for damages and costs.

No allegation is made of misconduct or negligence on the part of the Glendale in the management of the Valeria after capture. The claim which is made is based upon the broad proposition that the captor was a wrongdoer and therefore held and dealt with the captured ship and cargo at his personal risk. The argument necessarily went to the length also of maintaining that if and when liability should be established against the captor, any damage sustained must be made good by the British Crown. It is unnecessary to consider the questions which this contention might be found to involve, as counsel for the Procurator-General has consented that the proceedings shall be deemed to have been amended by adding the commander of the Glendale as a party.

The rule of international law which is relied upon in support of the claim for restitution is that which was formulated at The Hague Conference in 1907 in Convention XIII., concerning the rights and duties of neutral Powers in naval war. Art. 3 of that convention deals with the case of capture in neutral waters, and runs thus: "When a ship has been captured in the territorial waters of a neutral Power, such Power must, if the Prize is still within its jurisdiction, employ the means at its disposal to release the prize with its officers and crew, and to intern the prize crew. If the prize is not within the jurisdiction of the neutral Power the captor Government, on the demand of that Power, must liberate the prize with its officers and crew."

The case of The Dusseldorf (ubi sup.), heard in this court in May 1919, is an instance in which effect was given at the instance of the Norwegian Government to the rule which is thus expressed. A German vessel which had been captured in Norwegian waters was there released upon the claim of His Majesty the King of Norway by delivering it in the port of Bergen, and, as was stated by counsel in the present case, upon the authority of the claimant, was forthwith handed over to the German owners. The rule, which was illustrated by the decision in the case of The Dusseldorf (ubi sup.) is not of recent origin. Lord Stowell states it with much emphasis in the case of The Vrow Anna Catharina (ubi sup.): "When the fact—i.e., of capture in neutral waters—is established, it overrules every other consideration. The capture is done away; the property must be restored, notwithstanding that it may actually belong to the enemy."

There are no exceptional circumstances in the case of the Valeria such as were considered in the American case of The Anne (ubi sup.), and it was not disputed on the part of the Procurator-General that if the Valeria had still been afloat she must have been released at the suit of the present claimant, notwithstanding that no claims of her enemy owners could have been admitted: (see The Bangor, ubi sup.). The question now—the release of the Valeria being impossible—is whether there is a rule of International Law enforceable in this court which requires that restitution of her value should be made. Convention XIII. of the Hague Conference does not deal with the matter. Convention XII., which contemplated the establishment of the International Prize Court, contained provisions in art. 7 which might have been relied upon in support of the claim if they had received the assent of the Parliament of the United Kingdom. That assent, however, was never obtained.

The principles which are to govern the decisions of this court must be found, therefore, in the accepted authorities. Text-books and cases were relied upon on both sides. In the text-books the most precise statement is that contained in the passage in Hall's Treatise on International Law, 7th edit., at p. 662, where the author states that for a violation of neutral sovereignty "the redress which it is usual to enforce consists in a replacement in its anterior condition, so far as may be possible, of anything affected by the wrongful act."

Instances of recognition of such an obligation are found in the text-books: (Dana; Wheaton, 8th edit., pp. 526-528; Hall, 7th edit., pp. 662-663). But they are the results of diplomatic arrangements, and not of judicial decisions, and it is noteworthy that in various cases where vessels captured in violation of neutral sovereignty had been afterwards accidentally lost or destroyed, such an event appears to have been regarded in the diplomatic arena as making an end of the matter between the neutral complainant and the belligerent Power.

Two cases in the English Prize Courts which throw some light upon the question of principle are those of The Betsey (ubi sup.) and The John (ubi sup.). The Betsey was a neutral ship carrying neutral cargo which was captured by a British warship off Guadaloupe under circumstances which made her capture unsustainable. The captor had erroneously supposed that Guadaloupe was under blockade, and that the Betsey had broken the blockade. She was lost to the captor by enemy re-capture. In adjudicating upon a claim for restitution in value, Lord Stowell stated the test of a captor's liability under such circumstances in these terms: "What was the nature of the original seizure—was it so wrongful as to bring upon the seizor all the consequences of that strict responsibility which attaches to a tortious and unjustifiable possession?" And he rejected the claim. The John (ubi sup.) was an American vessel captured by a British warship in 1815 after peace had been concluded between this country and the United States, and in ignorance of that fact, and was lost by the captor at sea without negligence. The owners' claim for restitution in value was held by Lord Stowell to be barred by the fact that the capture was made in good faith. The decisive question was said to be: Was there bonâ fide possession in the captor, i.e., possession which was "honestly taken under all the knowledge of rights which the party had or could have had upon due and practicable inquiry"? Lord Stowell also said that in such a case "the very title of bonâ fide refers to the integrity of the party rather than to the legality of the act," and added: "He errs optima fide if he acts honestly according to all the information he either had or could have procured."

In the case of The Der Mohr (ubi sup.) Lord Stowell is also reported as saying that for "loss at sea by accident only in bringing in" a captor who has made a "justifiable" seizure would not be liable to make restitution; the epithet "justifiable" being applied to the seizure in question, notwithstanding that in the event the vessel seized was held not to be condemnable as prize.

The present claim for restitution was founded rather upon an assumed analogy to cases of tortious possession under the English Common Law than upon any definite rule or precedent under International Law. The case of the captor was likened to that of a man who by mistake possesses himself wrongfully of a chattel not his own and loses it. Mr. Aspinall's illustration was that of a member of a club who inadvertently carries away the umbrella of another member. The analogy seems to me to fail in this, that the person supposedly guilty of such a conversion has no lawful authority or lawful duty to take any chattel other than his own, and is answerable in damages if he does, whereas the commander of a belligerent warship has such an authority and duty, and is not liable in damages in a Prize Court if he discharges his duty or uses his authority in good faith. The cases show, I think, that a personal claim of any owner of the ship or cargo now in question against the captor would have been disposed of by Lord Sterndale's finding that the capture was made in good faith and without gross negligence. Can the unintended encroachment of the captor upon the territorial waters of a neutral Power give to that Power a claim on behalf of enemy owners which under International Law neutral owners of a vessel seized in error would not possess? In my opinion it cannot, and I must pronounce against the claim for restitution in value.

With regard to the claim for damages, the infringement of Norwegian sovereignty is established, but this is not a wrong which gives a claim for pecuniary compensation cognisable in any court of law at present existing. Amends for such occurrences are not subject to judicial determination. The unintentional character of the offence has to be considered, therefore, in relation only to the claim which is set up for an award of damages in respect of the arrest and detention, and, if any part of that question is still open, the loss of the ship and cargo. So far as I am aware, such damages have only been awarded where a capture was made in wilful abuse of belligerent rights. The leading case is that of The Anna (ubi sup.), where, upon proof of the capture and oppressive detention in flagrant and deliberate breach of the neutrality of the United States of a ship and cargo claimed by United States citizens, Lord Stowell awarded damages and costs against the captor, the commander of a privateer, at the instance of the Government of the United States, the American Ambassador being the claimant.

A case which is like the present in the absence of wilful misconduct is that of The Twee Gebroeders (ubi sup.). The ship there in question—a Dutch vessel—was captured in the Eastern branch of the Ems while engaged in running the British blockade of the port of Amsterdam, then in enemy occupation. Claim for her release was made by the Government of Prussia on the ground that the boats which made the capture had been dispatched from a British vessel lying within the territorial waters of Prussia. The boundaries between Prussian and Dutch waters in the Eastern Ems were, it appeared, difficult of determination, and Lord Stowell, finding that the error which vitiated the capture was attributable to misapprehension or mistake, said, "It was very different from a case of actual attack in clear neutral territory," and upon this ground ordered the release of the vessel, without damages or costs. The findings of the court upon the trial of the question of fact in the present case bring the case within the authority of the decision in The Twee Gebroeders (ubi sup.), and no damages should be awarded in respect of the capture of the Valeria.

There remains the question of costs. Applying the principles stated in the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of The Zamora (ubi sup.), the Crown submits to pay such costs as may be awarded in the exercise of the discretion of the court pursuant to the Prize Rules 1914 (Order XVIII., r. 1). The Crown also accepts the liability for costs which, under the established practice of the court, might, without the Rules of 1914, have been awarded against the captor. The principal facts in relation to the question are that the capture in violation of neutral rights was not made by order of a Minister of the Crown, or intentionally or knowingly on the part of the captor; that the loss of the Valeria without negligence was known at all material times to the claimant; that the Procurator-General was in the wrong in his contention at the trial as to the question of the locality of capture; and that the claimant is found by this judgment to be in the wrong as to the question of restitution in value and of damages. The claimant is entitled to have a declaration that the capture of the Valeria was made in Norwegian waters, and I so decree; but, having regard to the general principles which govern liability for costs in prize, and to the result of the litigation as a whole, I make this declaration without an award of costs to either party.

BRITAIN STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. THE KING; GREEN v. BRITISH INDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED; BRITISH INDIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED v. LIVERPOOL AND LONDON WAR RISKS INSURANCE ASSOCIATION LIMITED; THE PETERSHAM; THE MATIANA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance — F.c. and s. clause — Warlike operations—War or marine risk.

Appeals from Court of Appeal in the cases of the vessels P. and M.

The owners of the P., which vessel was sunk by collision with another merchant vessel when both ships were navigating without lights in obedience to war emergency regulations, claimed compensation from the Admiralty Commissioners to whom the P. was chartered. Under the charter-party the Admiralty assumed liability for the losses excepted from the usual marine policy by the f.c. and s. clause.

In the case of the M. the vessel was insured against war risks in addition to her usual marine policy. The dispute was in substance whether a loss sustained whilst the vessel was sailing in convoy, accompanied and controlled by warships, was a loss excepted by the f.c. and s. clause of the marine policy.

Held (Lord Cave and Lord Shaw dissenting in the case of the M.), that the loss of neither vessel was approximately caused by hostilities or warlike operations, and that the loss in both cases was due to a marine, not to a war, risk.

Sects. 30 and 31 of the Naval Discipline Act 1866 and the relationship between convoy and escort considered. The nature of warlike operations discussed.

Decisions of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507, 513; 121 L. T. Rep. 553, 559; (1919) 2 K. B. 670) affirmed.

APPEALS consolidated which raised the question whether the loss of the ship in the one case by collision and in the other by stranding on a sunken reef was, in the circumstances fully dealt with in the judgments of their Lordships, "a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations" or was the result of a marine risk not falling within that description.

In the first appeal the appellants, the Britain Steamship Company Limited appealed from an order of the Court of Appeal (Warrington, Duke, and Atkin, L.JJ.) (sup.) which dismissed their petition of right in respect of the loss of their steamship the Petersham. The court decided that the collision which sunk the Petersham was alone due to her being navigated at night without lights in accordance with Admiralty Regulation No. 37 made under the Defence of the Realm Regulations. She was requisitioned by the Admiralty on the terms of a charter-party known as T. 99, clause 19 of which provided that "the risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following or similar, but not more extensive, clause: Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war."

In the second case the steamship Matiana, belonging to the British India Steam Navigation Company Limited, while homeward bound on a voyage from Egypt with three other merchant vessels which were being navigated in convoy under Admiralty control, the escort being four warships, stranded in the Mediterranean on the Keith Reef at midnight on the 1st May 1918. After laying there some hours she was torpedoed by an enemy submarine. The convoy had to traverse a part of the Mediterranean which was infested by enemy submarines; and, with the object of avoiding an attack, the convoy steered a course more northerly than that usually adopted in time of peace. The master of the vessel was bound to obey the orders of the officer commanding the escort. Efforts were made to get the vessel off, but they failed. On the 5th May there was a gale, and the vessel became a total loss. The vessel's position was hopeless from the first, and Bailhache, J. found as a fact that even if she had not been torpedoed she would still have been a total loss.

The vessel was insured under two policies—one against marine risks and the other against war risks. The material clause of the war policy insured the vessel against "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations by or against the King's enemies, whether before or after the declaration of war."

The Court of Appeal decided in the case of the Petersham that navigation without lights, provided that the errand itself upon which the ship was bound was a peaceful one—e.g., the carrying of an ordinary cargo from port to port—was a peaceful operation performed under conditions adopted by reason of the existence of a state of war, and was not of itself a warlike operation simply because of the existence of war conditions, and, distinguishing the case from that of British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879), affirmed the judgment of Bailhache, J., who dismissed their petition of right claiming from the Crown for the loss of the ship.

In the case of the Matiana the Court of Appeal held that sailing in convoy was only a device adopted to avoid attack or to provide means of defence or escape in case an attack should be made, being part of a series of precautionary measures taken for the safety of merchant vessels, and they held, reversing the decision of Bailhache, J., that the underwriters of the marine risk policy were liable.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

From that decision the underwriters of the policy, Green and others, appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the owners of the ship, the respondents to that appeal being the underwriters of the war risk policy.

In the first appeal:

MacKinnon, K.C., R. A. Wright, K.C., and C. Robertson Dunlop, K.C. for the appellants.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and Norman Raeburn, K.C. for the Crown.

In the other appeals:

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the marine insurers, Green and others.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the ship-owners, the British India Steam Navigation Company.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and Norman Raeburn, K.C. for the War Risks Insurance Association.

The House took time for consideration.

July 12. — The following judgments were delivered:—

Lord CAVE.—These appeals raise the same question, namely, whether the loss of a ship, in the one case by collision, in the other by stranding, was a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations, or was the result of a marine risk not falling within that description. The facts of the two cases differ, but, as they must be decided on the same general principles, they have conveniently been heard together.

The appeal in the Britain Steamship Company v. The King arises out of the loss on the 6th May 1918 of a British merchant vessel, the steamship Petersham. This vessel, which belonged to the appellants, the Britain Steamship Company, was at the date of her loss in charter to the Admiralty under a time charter in the form known as T. 99. The charter-party contained the following clauses: "(18) The Admiralty shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost, wrecked, driven on shore, injured or rendered incapable of service by or in consequence of dangers of the sea or tempest, collision, fire, accident, stress of weather, or any other cause arising as a sea risk. (19) The risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following or similar, but not more extensive, clause: Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war."

On the night of the 6th May the Petersham was on a voyage from Bilbao to Glasgow with a cargo of iron ore, and, in accordance with an Admiralty regulation made under the Defence of the Realm Regulation No. 37, was proceeding without navigation lights. At 11.20 p.m., when off Trevose Head in Cornwall, she was run into and sunk by a Spanish merchant vessel, the steamship Serra, which was on a voyage from Swansea to Bilbao with a cargo of patent fuel. The Serra was also sailing without lights, and the case has been argued upon the footing that she also was bound by the Admiralty regulation to dispense with navigation lights. The night was very dark, and it has been found that owing to the absence of lights the collision could not have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care and skill on the part of those on board the two vessels. There is nothing to show for what purpose the iron ore was intended to be used, nor is there any evidence that any hostile vessel was, or was believed to be, in the neighbourhood at the time of the collision.

A petition of right brought by the owners of the Petersham against the Crown for reimbursement was dismissed by Bailhache, J. on the ground that the loss of the vessel was not a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations within the meaning of clause 19 of the charter-party, but fell within clause 18, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The owners have appealed to this House.

The Petersham was lost by collision, and any liability on the part of the Admiralty is therefore expressly excluded by clause 18 of the charter-party, unless the collision was a "consequence of hostilities or warlike operations" within the meaning of clause 19 of the same document. In order to establish the latter proposition, it is necessary to show, first, that there were hostilities or warlike operations which could have caused the collision; and, secondly, that the collision was a direct and proximate consequence of those hostilities or warlike operations. The rule, long established in cases relating to marine insurance and embodied in sect. 55 (2) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, that an insurer is not liable for any loss which is not proximately caused by a peril insured against, applies with full force to a clause such as that which is now under consideration: (see per Willes, J. in Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353; 8 L. T. Rep. 705; 14 C. B. N. S. 259, at p. 289; and per Lord Halsbury, C. in Andersen v. Marten, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 85, at p. 87; 99 L. T. Rep. 254; (1908) A. C. 334, at p. 340).

It appears to me that in the case of the Petersham the appellants fail to show that there were in fact any hostilities or warlike operations to which the loss of the vessel can be attributed. The word "hostilities" connotes operations of war, which may be either offensive or defensive, and may be undertaken either by the vessel immediately concerned or by an enemy or friendly force. The expression "warlike operations" is said to have been added in order to cover cases where similar acts were done, but no actual outbreak of war had occurred, but, however that may be, the effect of the addition is somewhat to extend the category of acts referred to even where a war is in progress, and the appellants throughout their argument relied upon the expression "warlike operations" as the wider of the two expressions. But, in order that the words may apply, there must be some act of war or of a warlike character which could have caused the loss sued upon. Here there was no such thing. So far as is known, there was no enemy ship anywhere in the neighbourhood; and the mere fact that a submarine war was being waged by Germany cannot possibly be regarded as a proximate cause of the collision of those two vessels. No friendly warship was near. Both the Petersham and the Serra were proceeding upon a peaceful mission, and their desire was not to engage in, but by all means to avoid, warlike operations. It was suggested that sailing without lights in time of war was itself a warlike operation, but that contention appears to me incapable of being sustained. The lights were extinguished in order to avoid the enemy, and there is a well-established difference between a peril insured against and an action taken for fear of such a peril: (see Becker, Gray, and Co. v. London Assurance Corporation, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 156; 117 L. T. Rep. 609; (1918) A. C. 101). Nor can the Admiralty regulation, which was of general application, be said to be an operation of any kind. No doubt the risk of collision was greater by reason of the absence of lights, but it remained a sea risk, though increased by war conditions.

The case of British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879) was relied upon. But that case is clearly distinguishable, as it was there admitted on behalf of the Crown that sailing without lights at night was a warlike operation, and the decision proceeded upon that footing. No doubt the admission could readily be made in that case, as both the vessels concerned, the St. Oswald and the French battleship Suffren, were proceeding to evacuate troops from Cape Helles, and were therefore very plainly engaged in warlike operations. But the admission can have no effect in other cases. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Inui Gomei Kaisha v. Bernardo Attolico (reported in Lloyd's List of the 20th July 1918, p. 114) turned, not on the absence of lights, but on negligence.

In the case of the Petersham, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that the decision appealed from is right and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

The second appeal, Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company Limited, and the supplemental appeal arise out of the loss on the 1st May 1918 of a British merchant vessel, the steamship Matiana, which was the property of the British India Steam Navigation Company. This vessel was insured with underwriters against the usual marine perils, including perils of the seas, the policy containing the usual f. c. and s. clause which, so far as material, was in the following terms: "Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, barratry, piracy, riots, and civil commotion excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities and warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war." She was also insured with the Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association against war risks, the material clause in this policy insuring the vessel against "the risks of capture, seizure, and detainment by the King's enemies and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, and all consequences of hostilities and warlike operations by or against the King's enemies, whether before or after declaration of war." On the 24th April 1918 the Matiana left Alexandria for a British port with a cargo of cotton. At that time sailing under convoy was compulsory, and the Matiana with three other merchant ships sailed under convoy with an escort of four of His Majesty's ships. By sect. 46 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 and sect. 31 of the Naval Discipline Act 1866, the master of a vessel sailing under convoy is bound under a penalty to obey the orders of the officer commanding the escort in all matters relating to the navigation of his ship, and those orders may be enforced (if need be) by force of arms. On the 1st May the convoy was traversing a part of the Mediterranean between Sardinia and Cape Bon, which was usually infested with submarines, and was steering a course more northerly than that which is usually adopted in time of peace. Just before dark, the convoy then sailing N. 30 W., the senior naval officer in command of the escort gave orders that on a given signal the course should be changed to N. 81 W. This signal was given at 9.30 p.m., and the course was changed accordingly. At 10 p.m. the order was given to zigzag. The merchant vessels were proceeding in line abreast, the escorting ships being round about the convoy. At about 12.15 a.m. the Matiana, which was the second ship from the left, struck a small reef called the Keith Reef, which is unlighted. The night was calm, and no breakers were seen before she struck. Some eleven hours later she was torpedoed, but it has been found that the ship was lost as a consequence of the stranding, and that the fact of her being torpedoed made no difference in this respect. The reef is shown on the Admiralty chart with the words "generally breaks," and on the large-scale chart there is a note that "as the currents are uncertain, both in strength and direction, and the reef not always visible, care should be taken to give all these dangers a wide berth." The master of the Matiana gave evidence that at the time of stranding he believed that his vessel was some nine miles to the south of the Keith Reef. The naval officer in command of the escort was not called to give evidence.

An action was brought by the owners against the Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association, and alternatively against the marine risk underwriters, to recover the loss. Bailhache, J. found that no negligence was proved either on the part of the master of the Matiana or on that of the King's officer; and, being of opinion that sailing under convoy was a warlike operation and that the loss was directly due to that operation, he gave judgment against the War Risks Insurance Association. On appeal, the Court of Appeal reversed this decision and gave judgment for the war risk underwriters and against the marine risk underwriters. The marine risk underwriters appealed to this House; and thereupon the owners gave a counter-notice of appeal claiming that, if the marine underwriters were not liable for the loss, the war risk underwriters were so liable, and these two appeals have been consolidated. There is no doubt that the owners are entitled to be compensated by one set of underwriters or the other, and the only question is on which side the liability falls.

In order to determine this question it is first necessary to inquire (as in the former case) whether there were any hostilities or warlike operations which could have caused the loss. I think there were. No enemy craft is known to have been in the neighbourhood at the time of the stranding, and the loss cannot be attributed to hostilities on the part of the enemy. Nor in my opinion is it correct to say that the Matiana was herself engaged in any warlike operation. It is true that she was being convoyed by warships; but that was done for her protection against possible attack, and she herself formed no part of any attacking or defending force. In this respect I agree with Atkin, L.J., who says: "It appears to be fallacious to identify the merchant vessels sailing with convoy with the warships which escort them. The warships are engaged in the warlike operation of protecting non-combatant vessels from the enemy. The merchant vessels are engaged in the peacelike operation of conveying merchandise by sea. The sheep are not the shepherd, and are not engaged in the operation of shepherding."

But in my opinion the British warships which formed the escort of the convoy were engaged in a warlike operation. It has been said that almost any movement of a warship of a belligerent Power by sea in time of war is a warlike operation; and that term would certainly appear to cover an expedition undertaken by vessels of war in wartime for the protection of merchantmen against the enemy.

But, assuming this to be the case, there remains the crucial question whether the operation of the convoying vessels was the proximate or direct cause of the loss of the Matiana. I think it was. The inference which I draw from the facts above stated is that the loss was the direct consequence of the orders given by the naval officer in command to take the course which he prescribed. No doubt the existence of the reef and its surrounding currents was a condition without which the vessel would not have stranded; but the true cause of the stranding was the act or event which brought the vessel within their dangerous influence. If she had been driven upon them by a storm or by hostile pursuit, or had been brought there by the negligence of those on board, the loss would have been properly described as caused, not by the reef or its currents, but by the storm or by the enemy or by bad seamanship, as the case might be. In fact, she was compelled to enter the area of danger by the orders of the officer commanding the escort, which she had neither the right nor the power to disobey; and I think the true conclusion is that those orders were the direct and determining cause of her loss.

It is contended that, even if this be so, it does not follow that the loss was a consequence of warlike operations, as the giving of an order cannot in itself be an operation. Perhaps it cannot, if the order stands alone. But in the present case the orders were a part of the convoying operation, which included the choice of the route, the setting of the course, and the precautions taken on the voyage; and I do not think that the transaction can be split up and treated as in part an operation and in part something other than an operation. It was the duty of the commanding officer, for the protection both of the warships under his command and of the merchant vessels under his care, to direct the course of the convoy as he thought best; and in doing so he was but carrying out the operation with which he was charged. In my opinion, therefore, the loss was a consequence of warlike operations within the meaning of the war risk policy.

The Court of Appeal came to a different conclusion, and it remains to consider the reasons upon which their decision was founded. The judgment of Warrington, L.J. was mainly based on the view that neither the escorting nor the escorted vessels were engaged in a warlike operation; and I have already given my reasons for holding that the escorting vessels were so engaged. But the learned Lord Justice added: "Assuming that the order of the commander was a part of the operation, I do not think it was proved in this case that the loss was directly caused by that or by the master's obedience to it. The plaintiffs in fact leave it in doubt whether the stranding was inevitable if the order was obeyed or whether there was some other cause, such as the effect of currents, which brought it about."

Duke, L.J. did not deal expressly with this point, but Atkin, L.J. expressed his view as follows: "The actual loss was caused by an ordinary sea peril, stranding. It seems to me impossible to say that the naval officer directed her on to the reef, or that her striking was the inevitable, or even the probable, consequence of his order. That she struck the reef was a mischance. It would not be calculated. It was not proximately caused by the order. It was precisely the kind of mischance that constitutes a marine peril when voyaging an unknown or uncharted route. No doubt, by taking the course she was ordered, she was exposed to the risk of striking the reef; but in my view the true result of the order was merely to expose the ship to a greater chance of suffering a loss from marine peril."

I feel the force of this reasoning, but, with great respect to the learned Lords Justices, I think it gave too little weight to the special facts of this case. No doubt the loss was actually caused by stranding, but it is necessary to look beyond that fact and see what caused the vessel to strand. The position of the reef and the dangerous nature of the currents surrounding it appeared upon the chart and were known to everyone; and but for the orders of the naval officer the Matiana would not have found herself anywhere near them. The naval officer was not called, and we do not know why he gave the order to turn at the moment when it was given. He may have been out of his reckoning at that moment, or he may have under-estimated the effect of the tide or the currents on vessels pursuing a zigzag course. He may even (as Bailhache, J. suggests) have run the risk of the rocks to avoid some submarine danger known to or suspected by him. But in any case he set the course which took the Matiana into the area of danger. Having entered the area she could not by any exercise of seamanship on the part of her officers have avoided the rock which was submerged and invisible. Her striking was not a mischance due to the ordinary perils of the sea. It may not have been the inevitable, but it was the not improbable, consequence of the order given by the naval officer, and was its actual result. If I may borrow the apt illustration used by Atkin, L.J. in a passage which I have already cited from his judgment, I should sat that, if a shepherd in order to avoid the wolf were to drive his sheep along a path leading to a precipice down which they fell, the loss of the flock would be a direct consequence of his pastoral operations. Here the escort (either by reason of some error or for some other cause) shepherded the Matiana into a course which led to the reef, snd her stranding was the result.

The authorities, so far as they go, support the above conclusion. In Ard Coasters Limited v. The King (35 Times L. Rep. 604; affirmed on appeal, 36 Times L. Rep. 555) a trading vessel was accidentally run down by a British destroyer engaged in patrolling for submarines, and in Richard de Larrinaga v. Admiralty Commissioners (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 572; 122 L. T. Rep. 551; (1920) 1 K. B. 700; affirmed on appeal, 123 L. T. Rep. 485; (1920) 3 K. B. 65), a vessel was lost by collision with a warship which was on her way to take up a convoy. In each case it was held by the Court of Appeal that the loss was the direct consequence of a warlike operation. Of course, those cases are distinguish-able from the present, as in each of them the warship came into actual collision with the vessel which was lost; but they are useful as showing that a warship may be engaged in a warlike operation though no attack upon or by the enemy is impending or immediately apprehended, and also that an accident which is not the inevitable or calculable result of the course taken by a warship may yet be the direct consequence of her action.

Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that the loss of the Matiana was a "consequence of hostilities or warlike operations"; and accordingly that the war-risk underwriters are liable; and I would set aside the order of the Court of Appeal in this case and restore that of Bailhache, J., with costs here and below.

Lord ATKINSON.—It has long been firmly established as a rigid principle of the law of marine insurance to be unfailingly applied, that in order to recover on a policy damages for the loss of a ship by one of the perils insured against that peril must be proved to have been the direct and proximate cause of the loss.

The Petersham, a cargo-carrying ship, was lost on the 6th May 1918, in consequence of a collision with another ship, the Spanish steamship Serra. Collision at sea is primâ facie a sea risk. The burden of rebutting that presumption rests in this case upon the suppliant. Whatever be the true meaning of the words "hostilities" and "warlike operation," as used in clause 19 of the charter-party known as T. 99, under which the Petersham was chartered, the suppliants can, on the facts proved, only recover the damages sued for by establishing affirmatively that this collision was not a sea peril, but was the direct and proximate consequence of an act of "hostility" or of a "warlike operation," or, in other words, that an act of "hostility" or a "warlike operation" was the direct and proximate cause of the loss. I concur with Atkin, L.J. in thinking that the word "hostilities" connotes the idea of belligerents properly so called, enemy nations at war with one another, and is used to describe the operations, offensive, defensive or possibly protective of the one against the other, in the conduct of their war. I also concur with him in thinking that the words "warlike operations" have a much wider reach, and not only include "hostilities," but cover, even where a state of war does not exist, operations of such a general kind or character as belligerents have recourse to in war, as, for instance, where combative operations are undertaken to suppress a rebellion against an allied or friendly Power, or where the territory of a nation may "before war has been declared" require, in anticipation of attack, to be protected by such defensive measures as laying down mines. The transfer of the combative forces of a Power from one area of war to another, or from one part of an area of war to another part for combative purposes would, I think, be a "warlike operation" within the meaning of this charter-party, as would also be the patrolling by the ships of war belonging to a nation of the sea coast of that nation, or an allied nation for the purpose of preventing invasion, or even for the purpose of protecting from hostile attack by enemy vessels the lives and property of the inhabitants of sea-board towns. If, in the course of this patrolling, a ship of war collided with and sank a merchant vessel, the loss would, of course, be a direct consequence of a "warlike operation." If, however, the inhabitants of such a town, in order to prevent its being made a target for the fire of an enemy's vessels of war, chose voluntarily, or upon compulsion, to screen all their lights and bury their town in almost complete darkness, this wise measure of precaution could not, I think, with reason be described as a "warlike operation," though it might incidentally vastly increase the dangers attending locomotion in the streets and thoroughfares of the town. And just as I am of opinion that patrolling such as I have mentioned would be a "warlike operation," so also am I of opinion for the reasons I shall presently give more fully, that the shepherding, directing and protecting from possible attack by ships of war of convoyed merchantmen are on the part of those ships of war, though not on the part of the merchantmen convoyed, "warlike operations." Of course, if a merchantman chose to take combative action, such as attempting to ram an enemy submarine, that action would while it lasted be a "warlike operation." The sailing over the sea by a cargo-carrying ship from port to port is in its nature a peaceful adventure, whether undertaken by day or night, in war time or in peace time. But the dangers which in war time beset such an adventure, especially the danger of attack by enemy submarine, may not only justify, but absolutely require, that certain conditions should, as precautions against possible hostile attack, be imposed upon these merchantmen as to the mode and manner in which they shall carry out their adventures. One of those conditions is, that when sailing at night they shall not exhibit their regulation lights. It is a purely negative thing, not in any way combative or aggressive in character. The non-exhibition of those lights during darkness, no doubt, necessarily increases considerably the risks of collision since those who navigate such ships may, by reason of it, be rendered unable to see an approaching ship in time to manœuvre so as to keep clear of her, but as a recompense it is designed and presumably calculated to protect her to a considerable degree from submarine attack. The lights both of the Petersham and the Spanish ship were concealed when they collided. The collision, no doubt, was brought about by that concealment; neither ship has been found guilty of negligence. I do not think, however, that a voyage such as that upon which each of these ships was engaged—a voyage which in time of peace would be treated as an ordinary maritime adventure—becomes either a "hostility" or a "warlike operation" within the meaning of this charter-party, merely because of the fact that, as a precaution against possible attack, she is compelled not to exhibit her regulation lights during the night, even though consequences indicated should follow from this concealment. Mr. Wright on behalf of the suppliants contended (1) that the making by the Admiralty of an order that vessels should, when voyaging, not exhibit their "regulation lights" was in itself a "warlike operation," and (2) that even if not, obedience to such an order, if rendered, was a "warlike operation." Such orders are no doubt made for the purpose mentioned during war; but neither the making of them nor the obedience to them is, in my view, a "warlike operation" within the meaning of the charter-party.

The case of British and Foreign Steamship Company Limited v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2

K. B. 879), referred to in argument as the St. Oswald's case, is in all essentials fundamentally distinguishable from the Petersham case. In that case the vessel which was lost was requisitioned by the Admiralty and bound to obey the orders given through its accredited officers. She was, at the time of her loss, employed in obedience to these orders on a service which was in its very nature a "warlike operation," namely, in carrying some of the combative forces of the Crown from Gallipoli (upon its evacuation) to some other destination. It is true that at the time of her collision with the French battleship the Suffren she had not got these troops on board, but she was, under Admiralty orders, hurrying at full speed to the port at which she was to take them on board. This circumstance does not, in my view, alter the character of the operation she was at the time of collision performing. Again, the St. Oswald was sunk in an area of naval warfare by an Allied warship presumably engaged at the very time in carrying out "warlike operations." From whatever point of view the disaster be regarded it was, I think, the direct and proximate consequence of a "warlike operation." The decision in it has no application to the case of the Petersham. In the latter case the appeal, I tnink, fails and should be dismissed with costs.

The case of the Matiana is one of an entirely different character from both these cases. It presents much greater difficulties. These difficulties are somewhat increased by the fact that the senior naval officer who commanded the ships of war convoying the four merchantmen of which the Matiana was one, and gave the orders as to the courses the latter should follow, was not examined as a witness.

The war risk policy dated the 13th March 1918 effected on the Matiana with the Liverpool and London War Risk Association Limited contained the following Clause No. 9: "The said ships shall be deemed to be at all times fully insured against all perils covered by an ordinary Lloyd's policy with collision clause attached and containing an f.c. and s. clause in the following terms: "Warranted free from capture, seizure and detention and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, barratry, piracy, riots and civil commotion excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after declaration of war." Shortly after midnight on the 30th April 1918 the Matiana ran upon the Keith Rocks, on which there were no lights, and the night being calm there were no breakers which might have been observed by those on board the vessel as she approached these rocks. She was next day, at about 11.30, struck by a torpedo, but Bailhache, J., sitting in the Commercial Court, before whom the case first came, held that the position of the Matiana was hopeless from the first, and that even if she had not been torpedoed she would have become a total wreck. This finding of fact has not been appealed against. He also found that the master of the Matiana was in no way to blame for the position in which he found himself, and that no negligence was proved against the naval officer in charge of the convoy. The question for decision upon this appeal then is whether on the facts proved the loss of this vessel was due to a marine risk or to a war risk, and this, in the result, admittedly depends upon whether a "warlike operation" was or was not the direct and proximate cause of her loss. Bailhache, J. found that the loss was due to a war risk and gave judgment accordingly against the Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association Limited, the underwriters under the war risks policy already mentioned, and in favour of the underwriters under a marine risk policy.

The case before Bailhache, J. is reported (120 L. T. Rep. 275; (1919) 1 K. B. 632). From this report he seems to have based his decision on the view that to sail with a convoy is in itself a warlik e operation, not only on the part of the ships of wa which compose the convoy, but also on the part o the merchant ships convoyed, and that no negligence contributing to the disaster having been proved either against the master and crew of the Matiana or those of any of the ships of war, the loss of the Matiana was a war risk. He states his view clearly in the following passage of his judgment: "To sail in convoy is in my opinion a 'warlike operation.' The assembling of the ships to be convoyed, and of the men-of-war to convoy them, the voyage of the whole flotilla, the route chosen, and the precautionary measures taken on the voyage must all be taken together as all parts of a 'warlike operation.' In this case vessels pursued a zigzag course through a submarine infected area and some thirty miles to the northward of the ordinary peace-time course. The stranding happened in the course of this 'warlike operation,' and subject to another point made by the war risk underwriters was directly due to it."

With all respect, I am quite unable to concur in the learned judge's view that the merchant ship convoyed, whose task was simply to sail peacefully on the course they might be directed to follow, and to keep their proper places in the convoy, became so identified with the ships of war directing and protecting them as to be treated as members of a joint flotilla engaged in a common enterprise. I concur with Atkin, L.J. in thinking that tne learned judge treats, as he said, the sheep and the shepherd as both engaged in the operation of shepherding. The duties and proper tasks of convoying warships and the ships they convoy are respectively indicated in sects. 30 and 31 of the Naval Discipline Act of 1866 (29 & 30 Vict., c. 109). The naval officers are to diligently perform the duties of convoying and protecting the ships they are appointed to convoy according to instructions, to defend these ships and the goods they carry without deviation, to fight in their defence if they are assailed, and not to abandon them or expose them to hazard. Every master or other officer in command of any merchant or other vessel convoyed is bound to obey the commanding officer of the ships of war in all matters relating to the navigation or security of the convoy, and is also bound to take such precautions for avoiding the enemy as may be directed by this commanding officer. It does not appear, however, that this latter officer has any power to require the master officers or crew of any merchant ship which is being convoyed to take combative action against a vessel of any kind, or to join in such action if taken by all or any of the ships of war. The rôles of the two classes of ships while being convoyed are entirely different in nature and character, That of the ships of war is protective and. if need be, combative, that of the merchantmen is not at all combative; and, as far as the circumstances permit, is as peaceful in nature and character as would be their enterprises in time of peace.

If this latter be the correct view, as I think it is, then, in order that the underwriters of the war risk policy may be made liable, the "warlike operation" which is the proximate cause of the loss of the Matiana must have been something which was done by the attendant warships or their officers. The loss of a ship by striking or grounding on rocks is, as I have said, primâ facie a marine risk. The burden of proving that it is in this case a war risk rests upon the owners of the Matiana, or on the underwriters under the marine policy. The question for decision resolves itself, I think, into this: Has that burden been discharged by the evidence given in the case? Warrington, L.J. sums up the evidence with accuracy and sufficient fulness to enable one to decide that question. He says (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at pp. 508-9; (1919) 2 K. B., at p. 680): "The steamship lost was bound from Egypt with cotton. The convoy had to traverse a part of the Mediterranean between Sardinia and the Gulf of Tunis which was infested by enemy submarines. With the object of avoiding an attack the convoy steered a course more northerly than that usually adopted in time of peace. At 9.3 p.m., under the orders of the senior naval officer, the course was changed from N. 30 W. to N. 51 W. The ships had been warned earlier in the evening that this change of course would be made. At about 12.15 a.m. the Matiana struck a small reef called the Keith Reef, which is unlighted. Her master believed that at 9.3 p.m. his position was such that a course of N. 51 W. would have taken him nine miles to the southward of Keith Reef. The naval officer in command was not called, and nothing is known as to his information at the time he gave the order to turn. The currents in that neighbourhood are very uncertain. The convoy was sailing zigzag from 10 p.m. until the accident occurred. The master says, however, that notwithstanding this he was keeping a correct mean course of N. 51 W. Either the ship must have been further to the northward at the time of the turn than was supposed or she must have drifted north during the three and a quarter hours from 9.3. There was no evidence given showing how it came about that she struck the rock without going south of it, neither was there any evidence to show that the naval officer's order to change the course was given in consequence of information that a submarine was in the neighbourhood. In fact, the contrary would appear to be the case, for the change had been arranged some hours before, the moment of the change only being left to be decided. The course prescribed was ordered not for the purpose of avoiding or resisting attack by a particular enemy whose presence was unknown, but as part of a series of precautionary measures taken for the safety of merchant ships in waters in which enemy craft might not improbably be encountered."

The learned Lord Justice, at p. 684, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 510, expresses the opinion that there was no "warlike operation" in this case of which it could be said that the loss was the consequence, but on the following page he says: "I think it was incumbent on those who seek to throw the loss on the war risk underwriters to prove that the loss was the direct consequence of some "warlike operation." Assuming that the order of the commander was a part of the operation, I do not think it was proved in this case that the loss was directly caused by that order or by the master's obedience to it. The plaintiffs, in fact, leave it doubtful whether the stranding was inevitable if the order was obeyed, or whether there was some other cause, such as the effect of currents, which brought it about."

Duke, L.J., after assuming that the naval vessels of the convoy were engaged in a warlike operation, says (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 515; (1919) 2 K. B., at p. 690): "I am satisfied that in point of fact the Matiana was never ordered to do, never did, and never participated in any warlike operations or belligerent act. She never lost her character of a ship carrying merchandise."

Atkin, L.J. says (at p. 698, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 516): "It appears to me fallacious to identify the merchant ships sailing with the convoy with the warships which escort them. The warships are engaged in the warlike operation of protecting the non-combatant vessels from the enemy. The merchant vessels are engaged in the peaceable operation of conveying merchandise at sea. The sheep are not the shepherd, and are not engaged in the operation of shepherding. It is true that the merchant ships have to obey the instructions of the commanders of the warships. And on the next page he says: "But the fact that the non-combatants are in particular instances, or in particular areas, made subject to the orders of combatant officers does not appear to me sufficient ground for inferring that while obeying those orders they are engaged in combative action of warlike operations. . . . I have come to the conclusion that the Matiana was not engaged in a 'warlike operation.' But this in itself is not sufficient to decide the case, for it was urged that at any rate the loss was the consequence of a warlike operation by the commander of the escort in controlling the course of the ship. I doubt very much whether the giving of an order can itself ever be an operation. That which is done under it is the operation. But I will assume that in giving the order, when he (the commander) did, to take a particular course he was performing a warlike operation. Was the loss the consequence of it? The actual loss was caused by an ordinary sea peril—stranding. It seems to me impossible to say that the naval officer directed her (the Matiana) on the reef, or that her striking was the inevitable or even probable consequence of his order. That she struck the reef was a mischance. It could not be calculated. It was not proximately caused by the order. . . . No doubt by taking the course she was ordered to take she was exposed to the risk of striking the reef; but in my view the true result of the order was to expose the ship to a great chance of suffering a loss from marine peril."

I entirely concur in the views thus expressed by Atkin, L.J. I think the owners of the Matiana and the underwriters of the marine policy have failed to discharge the burden which rested upon them, that in this case, as in that of the Petersham, the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAW.—I think both of these cases are accompanied with great difficulty. The refinement of distinction between them and others, and especially between these two themselves, perplex the mind.

In result I have come to be of opinion that the loss of the Petersham was approximately caused by a peril of the sea.

It is no doubt true that when she and the Serra on the night of the collision were sailing without lights they were doing so in conformity with a general regulation issued by the authorities in consequence of the existence of a state of war. The results of lights being exposed would have been to place valuable British assets at the mercy of the submarine or other armed naval forces of the enemy; and the saving of these assets from falling into enemy hands or from being destroyed by enemy power was an object which, in a general sense, might be subsumed under the term of defence of the realm. Accordingly during the period of war the authorities charged with the subject, whether naval, military, or civil, were entitled to promote that defence by the issue of regulation and order. I do not see my way, however, to hold that the issue of such orders or regulations converted risk of collision, which under an ordinary policy falls within the category of a sea risk, into an exception from that category. The sailing without lights added to the quantum of that sea risk; it made the chance of collision greater, but I agree respectfully with the courts below, and especially with the view of Atkin, L.J., upon this point in thinking that it did not convert the risk into one arising as a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations.

Sects. 18 and 19 of the time charter-party T. 99 have already been cited. From sect. 18 it is seen that the loss of a steamer in collision is classed alongside of any other cause arising as a sea risk; while sect. 19 enumerates the risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty. They mention capture, seizure and detention and the consequences thereof or of any attempt thereat except piracy, and proceed: "and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after declaration of war." It appears to me that it would require (a collision of two ships at sea having occurred) something more than a regulation or order for safety on the voyage, something of the nature of an actual and accomplished change of facts of the nature of an operation conducted in the course of hostilities of war, to lift the event of collision into the category of war risks. I accept accordingly the result reached by the courts below.

I reach a different result in the case of the Matiana. I think that the putting of a vessel under convoy, with all that that involves, is an actual and accomplished change of circumstances and an operation conducted in the course of hostilities or war. The loss of the vessel, in my humble opinion, did arise out of "the consequence of hostilities or warlike operations, and that the case is, therefore, from the scope of a maritime peril and falls within the war risk insured against."

It is in this view that I think it necessary to quote the terms of the Naval Discipline Act of 1866 which still bound the merchant shipping of this country during the recent war. Sect. 31 of that Act provides: "Every master or other officer in command of any merchant or other vessel under the convoy of any ship of Her Majesty shall obey the commanding officer thereof in all matters relating to the navigation or security of the convoy, and shall take such precautions for avoiding the enemy as may be directed by such commanding officer; and if he shall fail to obey such directions, such commanding officer may compel obedience by force of arms, without being liable for any loss of life or of property that may result from his using such force." It is difficult to figure language which more emphatically puts the naval commander of the convoy in control of the movements of the merchant vessel. To all intents and purposes it is the same as if he had placed on the convoyed ship a naval officer in command, as subordinate to himself.

In short, so far as the direction of the course of the vessel was concerned, the merchant captain and officers were no longer in control. The naval officers were. Not only so, but the orders of the commander of the convoy were clothed with the instant sanction of force. An order disobeyed might be followed by the guns of the convoy being levelled or fired against the offending vessel, and the officer is secured by statute against liability for any consequent loss of life or property.

I do not doubt that, so far as the ships acting as convoy were concerned, they were thus conducting a warlike operation. I think the decision in the case of Ard Coasters v. The King (35 Times L. Rep. 604; affirmed on appeal, 36 Times L. Rep. 555), to the effect that a warship patrolling in the course of her duty and thereby causing a collision with a merchant vessel, was a right decision. Suppose in the present case one of the ships acting as convoy had run down one of the ships convoyed. I can hardly doubt that that event would have been similarly found.

The case accordingly is narrowed to the distinction between ships which are acting as convoy and the ships which are themselves under convoy. I myself see great force in the view which Bailhache, J. so clearly expresses to the effect that all the vessels, those acting and those under convoy, must be treated as a unity. He concludes accordingly that they were all engaged in warlike operations. I respectfully agree with that learned judge. My Lords, it is not necessary, in my opinion, and I say this having fully in view repeated expressions of opinion in this case in the courts below, to postulate that the vessel to which the accident or calamity occurred was itself actually and individually engaged in hostilities or warlike operations. The policy does not say so. What it says is that the thing which is insured against is "the consequences of hostilities or warlike operations," but it does not say "in consequence of hostilities or warlike operations in which the vessel itself is engaged." I am humbly of opinion that, so far as ships under convoy are concerned, all these ships are, along with the ships acting as convoy, under a unified command, and that command issuing from the commander of the convoy is, as part of the direction of the convoy, a military operation. The consequence of it upon those merchant vessels to whom the command was issued was to place them compulsorily in a situation of peril in which unquestionably they would not have been placed but for the course thus forced upon them. These vessels might, of course, be said not in themselves to have been engaged in either hostilities or warlike operations, but that they suffered this peril, and in the case of the Matiana this loss, as a consequence of warlike operations, seems to my mind clear.

The first broad fact of this case is that if the Matiana had not been under convoy she would not have been in that part of the sea, where the peril of currents driving her on the rocks occurred. The vessel was stranded on Keith Reef, N.E. of Biserta to the north of the Gulf of Tunis. There is no disputing the case that at this time the Mediterranean was the scene of very frequent submarine sinkings amounting to so many as five per day, and that there were "notorious tracts specially bad." Describing this "dangerous neighbourhood" in which was the Keith Reef, Captain Lane mentions the Riddlecombe Patch, the Hecate Patch, the Locust Patch, and Skerki Bank, and tells how in the ordinary course of navigation one would keep well clear of such a neighbourhood. In these circumstances, the naval authorities, acting no doubt to the best of their wisdom in trying circumstances, put the Matiana and three vessels under convoy, and the course of the convoy was steered into this unquestionably dangerous zone. A note on the chart is quoted by the witness mentioned to the following effect: "As the currents are uncertain both in strength and direction, and the reef not always visible, care should be taken to give all these dangers a wide berth." The evidence is quite clear that this was the rule of navigation with regard to that locality. In the ordinary course of navigation, merchant vessels will keep well clear of it, the witness saying: "We should not go anywhere near it, not in peace time." However, the captain says: "All the courses that I took were from the senior naval officer. He was the man who gave all the orders." Being questioned, "You were then, I take it, entirely under the direction of the senior naval officer? You could not yourself fix your vessel?" He answers, "No. He told us when he blew the whistle and gave the signal to alter our course. It was too dark to take stars or anything like that."

It is admitted that the vessel was exactly thus in the convoy when it—one of the four vessels convoyed—struck the reef. Be it that the ship was about nine miles to the southward of what was expected; it was in waters where the currents were so strong that a mistake of that kind was not unnatural, and against it the officers and crew of the Matiana, obeying naval orders, were helpless. Proper or ordinary navigation free from convoy would never have placed them or the ship within this danger zone.

I ask myself the question, what difference in principle it would have made if, instead of the seniour naval officer directing the course of the Matiana, that commander had put the Matiana in tow by a hawser from the stern of the Clematis, and guided her not only into the dangerous reach of the current, but towed her, unknowingly and in the dark, on to the rocks. I could not have seen my way to hold that the stranding did not then occur in consequence of a warlike operation; and I think that the same reasoning must be applied to the present case. The refinement is too great for me to appreciate it which would distinguish the loss of a vessel acting as convoy from the loss of a vessel, either physically convoyed as I have suggested by hawser or convoyed in her course by compulsory compliance with orders therefrom, taking and keeping her place and distance relative to the other ships of the expedition and according to the prescribed points of the compass.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the loss of the Matiana was an event which, in the language of the policy, arose from one of the consequences of hostilities or warlike operations. In my view the judgment of Bailhache, J. was correct and should be restored.

Lord SUMNER.—In the first of these two cases, that of the Petersham, the suppliants claim on a ship's time charter in form T 99. In the second case, that of the Matiana, the action is brought on a policy of insurance against all perils excluded from an ordinary Lloyd's policy by the f.c. and s. clause set out. The Matiana was insured at Lloyd's and her owners sued alternatively on the Lloyd's policy. Thus the owners of the Matiana recover on one policy or the other, and the dispute is between two sets of underwriters; in the case of the Petersham the owners bear the burden of failure themselves. It was not disputed that the claim on the charter-party was to be treated as a claim on a policy of insurance, nor were the differences in the wording of the clauses in the two cases alleged to establish any substantial difference between them for present purposes.

In effect the claim in each case is for a loss proximately caused by consequences of warlike operations. One ship was sunk in collision; the other stranded and never got afloat again. The risks excepted by the f. c. and s. clauses employed are, among others, risk of such collisions and strandings (which in themselves are losses by perils of the seas) as may be proximately caused by hostilities or warlike operations or their consequences. In each case therefore two questions arise: (a) Was the collision or stranding caused by any act or consequence of hostilities or by any warlike operations or consequence thereof, and, if so what? (b) Was it proximately so caused?

I will take the Petersham first. She was steaming at night without showing her lights, and met the Serra, which was doing likewise. Each failed to make the other out till it was too late. Each was peacefully sailing the seas on her lawful occasions, and the Serra was actually a neutral bound not to engage in any warlike operation. In showing no lights each was only doing what all ships did a few generations ago and what some ships did quite recently in unfrequented waters to save a little oil. Sailing the seas even under conditions of modern maritime warfare is not in itself the same thing as traversing a battlefield on land, though even that may be done on a peaceful errand. To go ahead in the dark may be foolish or wise, but it is not warlike, nor is it made warlike because what would otherwise be blameworthy is done in obedience to lawful commands. No doubt, the object is to avoid being seen if the enemy is present, but if no enemy is present the act is a precaution only and, fortunately, is not needed. The operation of the Petersham and the operation of the Serra were in each case peaceable; neither was doing anything warlike separately, nor were they doing anything warlike together. Nor, again, was the operation of those who issued the order warlike, though it was performed in time of war. It did not become a warlike operation merely because its object was to baulk warlike operations on the part of the enemy. I say nothing of hostilities because of actual hostilities there was no evidence at all Whatever may have been the case in British and Foreign Insurance Company v. The King (14 Asp, Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879) which turned on an admission by the Crown, I think that, in the circumstances of the Petersham's case, sailing without lights was neither a warlike operation nor was it the consequence of one. The fact is that each of these ships was making a peaceable voyage under wartime conditions, and no more. Historically, it was due to the enemy's submarine campaign, but not as its proximate consequence.

As for the Matiana, she was sailing with convoy. She was bound to take her course from the senior officer of the convoy and did so; and, thanks to the set of a variable current, she came unexpectedly on to the Keith Reef. Her operation also was proceeding on her trading voyage. It is true she did so by an unusual route, but the deviation was justifiable and obligatory. She found in her way a rock, submerged and unlighted, which, in itself, was a marine peril. It was a moonlight night, and if there had been any wind she would probably have seen the break of the sea on the reef in time. As it was, a still night she had no warning and she stranded.

Why is such a stranding a consequence of warlike operations? The Matiana had to do as she was told, but she was not told to go aground either directly or indirectly. I think that the case of the Matiana can only be distinguished from that of the Petersham by dwelling on the facts, first, that she was in convoy, and second, that, in addition to general orders as to not exhibiting lights, she was under particular orders as to the course to be shaped and the stations to be kept. In brief, sailing with convoy is only sailing in company and is no more a warlike operation than sailing alone. If, for the sake of protection in case of danger, the Matiana had kept as close as she could to a King's ship casually encountered, she would still have been peacefully occupied. What difference is made by additional orders given ad hoc by the senior naval officer? It is suggested that the case is the same as if he had been on her bridge, had himself laid and directed her course and had her steered straight on to the reef. Even if it were so, I am by no means prepared to say that this would have sufficed. Not everything done by a King's ship or a King's officer, in time of war is necessarily a warlike operation or the consequence thereof. I refrain from discussing the particular cases cited of damage done directly by men of-war lest any case decided on their authority may be under appeal to your Lordship's House, and might seem to be prejudiced by anything said now. Collision between the Matiana and a man-of-war would have raised considerations which, whatever their value, do not arise now, but I think the sufficient answer to the above contention is that the case is not that of a King's officer being on the Matiana bridge in responsible charge of the helm. It is not a case of deliberately running her aground for some purpose of war. Her course and station having been prescribed some hours before, she was in her own officer's charge, and there is no evidence to show or to suggest that the avoidance of a local obstacle in her track was not left to them, or that her orders were to keep her course let the consequence be what it might. There is nothing to suggest that, if the rock had been visible, she was not entitled and bound to manœuvre so as to avoid it. Her officers were not to blame for they could not see it, but her inability to see the rock seems to me to be indistinguishable from the Petersham's inability to see the Serra; there was nothing warlike about it—the peril of it was of the seas. For the rest, the order given by an officer in company and in authority referring to a compass course does not really differ from an order given generally in Admiralty regulations; it is a special order, but it is an order to do or to refrain, like the general order as to lights. Warlike operations and hostilities generally prevailing supplied the reason for it, but even if it was a consequence of an operation of war, the stranding was not its proximate consequence.

The case of Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 535; 8 L. T. Rep. 705; 14 C. B. N. S. 259) was relied on in this connection. It was argued, as I understood, that the illustrations given by Erle, C.J. were in point as showing that importance attaches to the presence or absence of negligence in the navigation of the vessel lost. Collation of the different reports, especially of that of the Law Journal with that in the Common Bench Reports, satisfies me that the allusion to negligence in the illustration of an escaping ship which takes a free channel but negligently runs aground, really meant that the channel was truly free, for escape by it was possible. This was proved by the fact that a better seaman would have made his escape by it. Hence the loss of the ship by stranding in the supposed case was not a loss by an attempt at capture, from which, try as he would, the captain had no escape. It was a loss by stranding, due to the helm action taken and the course laid, when the captain might have done otherwise, and the attempt at capture was a remote cause only. The fugitive ship, so far from being a lost ship from the beginning, as in the illustration of a ship hopelessly embayed or a ship deliberately stranded, was really a ship which could have escaped, just as in the illustration where the embayed ship escapes, thanks to a shift of the wind. To say that in Erle, C.J.'s illustration the captain's negligence showed that the ship was not stranded proximately by the attempted capture, is no warrant for arguing that a ship must be held to be lost proximately by warlike operations because she was put on the reef by misfortune and not by negligence. It is in this sense that I understand the observations about the trading ship's negligence in the Larchgrove and the Ardgantock by Roche, J. and Bailhache, J. respectively.

The remaining argument is that, at any rate, each loss is "attributable" to warlike operations, and hence fully within the clause, and the analogy of a loss by perils of the sea which is held to be irrecoverabie when it is artributable to the assured's own wilful act, was put forward. If that means that a loss not proximately caused by warlike operations but (remotely) attributable to them, is one for which the insurers are liable, in a case like the present, it is contrary to sect. 55 (1) of the Marine Insurance Act, for the policy contains no special provision to this effect unless the words "consequences of warlike operations" are pressed beyond anything that they will bear. It is stated in Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (sup.) that "consequence is a compendious description of the perils to be expected and not a description relating to the loss; instead of saying what particular results are to be expected, the word consequence is introduced to denote the class of perils which may result from hostilities." In the clause as worded in the charter T. 99 the words "piracy excepted," formally adopted in 1898, show that consequence of capture, seizure and detention are perils insured against causing loss, as piracy is. Further, as Willes, J. says, in the Ionides case (ubi sup.) "the words 'all consequences of hostilities,' refer to the totality of causes, not to their sequence." They are used to save a long enumerative description of incidents of capture, seizure or detention or of hostilities or warlike operations, as if one had said "all forms of hostilities or warlike operations of whatever kind," and some form or kind of hostility or warlike operations must have proximately caused the loss. Things of which it can be predicated that they were caused by hostilities are not themselves causes of loss additional to hostilities, or a new description of peril insured against, so that a remote consequence of hostilities would become a recoverable loss, if proximately caused by something itself describable as a consequence of hostilities. From the earliest time when this system of insuring was employed through all its forms, from the American War of Independence (Tyrie v. Fletcher, 1776, 2 Cowp. 688; 2 Dougl. 784), and Loraine v. Thomlinson (1779, 2 Dougl. 585) to the present time, what is insured by the war risks cover is some peril causing loss which would have been insured against by the Lloyd's policy, if it had not been excepted out of it by some kind of f.c. and s. clause, and "consequences of capture" were never perils insured against under that policy, but they were losses by perils insured against, if proximately caused. There is further no analogy to the case dealt with in the Act, sect. 55, 2 (a). That is an express provision in the Act and the expression precludes the implication of resort to the origin, to which a loss is "attributable," in any dissimilar case not within the express words. I see no connection between expressly disabling an assured from recovering for a loss, which, though in itself the proximate consequence of perils by the seas, is really self-inflicted by his ulterior wilful misconduct, and interfering with the statutory rule prescribed in sect. 55 (1) in a case where an event has happened without fault in any one, and the only question is whether or not it is within the insurance effected.

I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right; that the suppliant's petition fails, and that the war risks underwriters were entitled to judgment in the action.

Lord WRENBURY.—I agree in the opinions expressed by my noble and learned friends Lord Atkinson and Lord Sumner and shall add only a few words of my own. In the case of each of these vessels the question is whether her loss was a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations within the words "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after declaration of war." As regards the former of the two vessels, the Petersham, she was lost by collision with the Serra, when both vessels in obedience to Admiralty orders were navigating at night without lights. As regards the latter, the Matiana, she was lost by running on the Keith Rocks when sailing in convoy and zigzagging with a view to defeating the operation of possible submarines. There were, in fact, no submarines known or suspected to be in the immediate neighbourhood, but the vicinity was one notoriously dangerous in that respect.

All the decisions have, I think, proceeded and in my judgment have rightly proceeded upon the footing that the word "hostilities" does not mean "the existence of a state of war" but means "acts of hostility" or (to use the noun substantive which follows) "operations of hostility." The sentence may be read "all consequences of operations of hostility (of war) or operations warlike (similar to operations of war) whether before or after declaration of war." To attribute to the word the longer meaning, viz., "all consequences of the existence of a state of war" would give the expression a scope far beyond anything which one can conceive as intended. To define the meaning of "operation" in this connection is, no doubt, a matter of great difficulty, and for the purpose of these cases is not, I think, necessary.

The question whether there was a warlike operation or not does not turn necessarily on the character of the vessels or vessel. Even a vessel of war is not necessarily engaged at every moment in a warlike operation. Again, the character of the cargo may be irrelevant. In the fact that the holds are filled with (say) cotton or with coal can be found no cause whatever for her (say) coming into collision. On the other hand, her cargo may be relevant. If the enemy be a civilised enemy who will do his best to sink a ship carrying troops or munitions of war but will also do his best not to injure a hospital ship, the fact that she bears the one character or the other may make all the difference in determining whether action taken against her or by her is a warlike operation.

If the case be a case of collision between two vessels and one of them is engaged in a warlike operation, that may be enough. This was the case in Ard Coasters v. The King (35 Times L. Rep. 604; affirmed on appeal, 36 Times L. Rep. 555), where a vessel was lost by collision in the dark with a destroyer which was on patrol duty for the purpose of intercepting hostile submarines, and in the course of that duty was turning across the route which vessels in that part of the ocean would normally and properly follow, with the result that she fouled the route of the Ard Coaster, which was close to her.

If the British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879) is right (upon which I feel grave doubt) it must be on a similar ground. I feel great difficulty, however, in saying that from the mere fact that a vessel is a vessel of war and is steaming in her duty as such, it results that if she collides with another vessel and sinks her, the loss is in consequence of a warlike operation.

If there be only one vessel and she be not engaged in a warlike operation at all the words may still be satisfied. Thus, if the enemy has sunk a vessel in a fairway with a view to causing injury to any vessel which enters in ignorance of the fact, or if the enemy has placed false lights with a view to inducing a vessel to think she is on a course which she is not and a peaceful merchantman is consequently lost, the loss is a consequence of a warlike operation of blocking the fairway or deceiving the vessel. So if a vessel is lost by coming in contact with drifting mines, her loss is a consequence of the warlike operation of laying mines: (Stoomvaart Maatschappij Sophie H. v. Merchant Marine Insurance Company, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas, 497; 122 L. T. Rep. 295).

Again, a vessel not equipped for war at all may be engaged in a warlike operation if, as in Macgregor v. Martin (34 Times L. Rep. 504), she takes the offensive and attempts to ram what she supposes to be a submarine, and in so doing is injured. But the leading case of Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance (1 Mar. Law Cas. (O. S.) 535; 8 L. T.

Rep. 705; 14 C. B. N. S. 259) draws a line, on one side of which lie cases such as those I have mentioned, and on the other lie cases such as those which are before your Lordships. For the present purpose the distinction may, I think, be stated as follows: If the operation relied upon as a warlike operation is one which creates no new risk, but only aggravates or increases an existing maritime risk by removing something which, but for the war, would have been a safeguard against the risk, then the risk is not a war risk. But if the peril be directly due to hostile action, it is a war risk. Of the former of these, Ionides is an illustration. By reason of the war and for warlike purposes a light had been removed. Had it still been burning the master of the Linwood would have had the necessary warning to escape the danger into which he ran. The war did not create the risk but increased it. The cause of the loss was in going ashore. The loss was not a war risk. But, on the other hand, the vessel which tries to ram that which she believes to be an enemy vessel—the vessel which is rammed by a destroyer which is steaming in the dark without lights for a warlike purpose and which necessarily for the due performance of that duty, turns across the route which a vessel would normally and properly take in that neighbourhood and the vessel which is lost by striking a mine is lost by a new risk originating in and operative by reason of war.

To apply these principles to the two cases before the House: The Petersham was lost by collision by reason of navigation in the dark without lights. The risk of collision at night is an ordinary maritime risk. It was aggravated by the removal of the protection of the usual lights of navigation. This is governed by the principle of Ionides, which, I think, was right, and which in fact counsel have not attacked. The Matiana was lost by going on a reef when sailing in convoy. To sail in convoy is to increase the everyday maritime risk of collision whether with a fixed object or with another vessel, for vessels in a convoy are necessarily not far apart. But there was no new risk. The abandonment of navigation lights in the case of the Petersham by way of protection against attack by submarine—the sailing in convoy in the case of the Matiana by way of protection against the like attack are in principle similar. They are devices to give in time of war additional protection against an existing maritime risk. Their object is to give greater security to peaceful operations.

It has been argued that to sail in convoy is a warlike operation. It is an operation adopted in time of war, but this does not, I think, make it a warlike operation. Not offence only but defence also may, no doubt, be a warlike operation, but a precautionary measure is not in itself a measure of defence. If it becomes necessary to use the weapon of precaution, no doubt a defence may commence. Thus, if here submarines had been sighted, and the escorting vessel had ordered a notoriously dangerous course in order to avoid a peril of war, namely, submarine attack, and in consequence a vessel had gone on the rocks the case would, I think, have been different. But there was no such case.

Further, even if sailing in convoy were a warlike operation, the loss no doubt occurred in the course of, but how did it result in consequence of that operation? The ship went on the reef not because she was in convoy—surrounded, that is, by other ships—bound to act under the order of the escorting ship and so on, but because she did not know where she was and did not know of the danger.

There stated, quite shortly, are the reasons which lead me to the conclusion that in neither case was the loss a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations. In my judgment both the appeals should be dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, May 20, 1920.

(Before BANKES, SCRUTTON, and ATKIN, L.JJ.)

THOMAS CHESHIRE AND CO. v. VAUGHAN BROTHERS AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Undisclosed risk—P.p.i. policy—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 4—Principal and agent—Employment to make a void contract—"Void as against public policy"—Nominal damages.

The plaintiffs were warehousemen, and employed the defendants, who were insurance brokers, to obtain for them a policy of insurance against loss by the non-arrival of certain cargoes which the plaintiffs were to receive into their warehouse. The defendants effected a policy, but failed to disclose to the underwriter that one of the risks against which the plaintiffs desired insurance was the diversion of the cargo by the order of the Government. On a slip attached to the policy there appeared a p.p.i. clause. The cargo was diverted by the Government, and the plaintiffs suffered substantial loss. In an action by the plaintiffs against the underwriter it was held that there was non-disclosure by the plaintiffs' agent, and the plaintiffs failed to recover on the policy. They accordingly commenced the present proceedings against the defendants for negligence and breach of duty. The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that the policy which they were instructed to procure was void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 by reason of the p.p.i. clause, and by reason of the fact that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest.

Held, by McCardie, J., (1) that the defendants were negligent in failing to disclose the risk; (2) that the plaintiffs must, or ought, to have understood the nature of the p.p.i. clause; (3) that sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 must be taken to mean that a policy containing a p.p.i. clause is void, even if the party has an insurable interest; (4) therefore, in this case, it was unnecessary to inquire whether the plaintiffs possessed any insurable interest; (5) although it was probable that the under- writer, had the full risks been disclosed to him, would have honoured the policy notwithstanding the p.p.i. clause, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover nominal damages, since a contract to procure a contract "void as against public interest" could not give rise to such a claim. The plaintiffs were not entitled to substantial or nominal damages. The plaintiffs appealed.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, that sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 rendered void as against public policy a policy of insurance containing a p.p.i. clause even though the insured might have a legal insurable interest, and that although the clause appeared on a detachable slip, in accordance with a commercial practice, it must nevertheless be taken to form part of the contract.

Decision of McCardie, J. affirmed.

Semble, that apart from statutory enactments a policy containing a p.p.i. clause may be bad on grounds of public policy generally.

Semble, also, if the contract had been to procure a void, and not illegal, contract the plaintiff might have been entitled to some damages.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a considered judgment of McCardie, J., sitting without a jury, at Liverpool. The facts appear sufficiently from the judgments.

MCCARDIE, J.—The plaintiffs in this action are warehousemen at Liverpool, Birkenhead, and Newport. The defendants are insurance brokers. The plaintiffs claim damages against the defendants for breach of a contract made by the defendants to effect an adequate policy of insurance for the plaintiffs.

It is just to the defendants to state that the negligence complained of was not their personal negligence, but that of their London agents. It will be unnecessary to state the full details of the case, because they have already been reviewed by Bailhache, J., and also by the Court of Appeal in the action of Cheshire v. Thompson (1919, 24 Com. Cas. 114, 198).

The essential facts are as follows: From the year 1916 the export of nitrate of soda from South America was wholly in the hands of the British Government; they owned the cargoes sent from that country and the shipping was under their complete control. The cargoes were carried under time charters. The business in connection with these cargoes of nitrate was in the hands of Messrs. Antony Gibbs and Sons, who were acting as agents for the British Government, and by an arrangement which was made between Messrs. Gibbs and Sons and the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs were to act as warehousemen of the nitrate when it arrived at the ports which I have mentioned. The nature of the arrangement between Messrs. Gibbs and Sons and the plaintiffs is indicated in the letters which have been put in, and which I need merely refer to by date; they are the letters of the 4th Aug. 1915, the 13th Aug. 1915, the 19th Aug. 1915, the 26th Feb. 1916, and the 16th June 1916.

The plaintiffs' warehouses are large. They incurred, moreover, substantial expense in erecting particular accommodation, mainly of a fireproof character, for the reception of cargoes of nitrate and similar goods which they expected to receive in connection with their arrangement made with Messrs. Gibbs and Sons. In order to meet this capital outlay of the plaintiffs and to secure a return on the sums which they had previously expended in connection with their buildings, it was obviously essential that they should fill, as far as possible, their warehouses. If they knew that a cargo was coming, then, in pursuance of their duty to Messrs. Gibbs and Sons and the Crown, they were bound to reserve space for that cargo. Obviously they could not let the necessary space to others, and, therefore, if the cargo which was anticipated after advice received did not arrive, the result would be a loss by rent or otherwise to the plaintiffs by reason of the non-arrival of that anticipated cargo.

There were three main sets of risks which the plaintiffs desired to insure: First (a), the ordinary marine risks; secondly (b), war risks; and thirdly (c), there were the set of risks which arose from the diversion of the nitrate cargoes destined for the plaintiffs and so announced to them by Messrs. Gibbs and Sons for the Government, such diversion being due to the act of the Government in meeting the needs of the Allies, as, for example, Italy or France; that is, for some economic or political reason wholly disconnected with the risks to which I have referred under heads (a) and (b).

It is plain that equally serious loss might arise to the plaintiffs through either (a) or (b) or (c), and hence the plaintiffs desired to procure policies which would cover all three heads. They saw the defendants, they informed them clearly and fully of the facts which I have already narrated, and they made plain to them the risks which they desired to insure. Having received that information, and knowing the wishes and instructions of the plaintiffs, the defendants undertook to obtain policies which would cover the risks mentioned, and to secure in these policies an adequate and inclusive wording for the covering of all those risks.

The duties of the defendants were thereupon obvious. They instructed their London agents to do the necessary work; that firm saw the underwriters—Mr. Thompson was the principal underwriter—but they wholly failed to disclose the risks under head (c) which the plaintiffs were anxious to cover, and they left the underwriters in ignorance of these particular risks and the circumstances connected therewith. The slip which was handed by the agents to the underwriters in connection with the Glenaffric cargo, which is the vessel here in question, announced, so far as is material, that the profit which the plaintiffs desired to insure was 1300*l.* on the nitrate of soda, and it stated as follows: "To pay a total loss if the vessel does not reach destination named in the policy through any cause that may arise." The remainder of the slip is not material to the point here at issue.

Pursuant to that slip a policy was in fact issued, and that policy embodied the words of the slip and provided (so far as it is material to read it) that the underwriters would pay a total loss if the vessel did not reach the destination named in the policy through any cause that might arise. That was the policy in regard to which this action arises.

The Glenaffric loaded in South America in Dec. 1917, at the port of Iquique, under a bill of lading which was dated the 26th Dec. She was to go, after taking in her cargo, to a bunkering port in order to receive instructions as to her port of destination. Messrs. Gibbs wished and intended that the Glenaffric should go to Birkenhead, and that her cargo of nitrate should be there discharged and put into the warehouse of the plaintiffs. On the 29th Dec. they wrote a letter to the plaintiffs in which they said: "Glenaffric—6000 tons to Birkenhead—she sailed this week," and upon the same date Messrs. Gibbs wrote to the Ministry of Shipping the following letter: "Please note that the Glenaffric sailed yesterday with 6000 tons; kindly order her to Birkenhead, Messrs. Cheshire."

But the Glenaffric never reached Birkenhead. The Government for purely economic reasons, and in order to assist the Italian Government, diverted her from Birkenhead, to which Messrs. Gibbs had intended her to go, and in fact she unloaded at Savona, in Italy, in Feb. 1918. Her diversion was absolutely disconnected with any question of war risks or marine risks; it was of a purely financial or ecomomic character.

The plaintiffs, who had anticipated the arrival of this vessel at Birkenhead, suffered a loss by reason of the diversion. They therefore claimed upon the policy, but the underwriters refused payment, and a writ was issued by Messrs. Cheshire, the plaintiffs, against Mr. Thompson, one of the underwriters. Mr. Thompson denied liability, and, apart from the other points raised in the defence, he disputed legal responsibility upon the ground that in substance the plaintiffs had not disclosed the necessary circumstances, had not made known to him the actual risk which they desired to insure, and had not effected the disclosure required by the rules of marine insurance. The matter came for trial, and it was heard in Dec. 1918 by Bailhache, J., who held that adequate disclosure had not been made to the underwriters, and that the words of the policy were not apt to enable the plaintiffs to recover. He stated in the course of his judgment a rule of law which has been read to me, and which, in substance, I think, subject to details of language, was adopted afterwards by the Court of Appeal. The plaintiffs' appeal was dismissed on the 13th March 1919, and the grounds upon which the Judge in the first instance decided against the plaintiffs were upheld.

The judgment of Bankes, L.J. pointed out that the plaintiffs desired to cover an insurance of a special kind of risk; he further pointed out that the plaintiffs had explained the fact to their brokers, Messrs. Vaughan, and that the brokers had failed to disclose such facts to the underwriters. Bankes, L.J. said this: "It may be that Mr. Thompson did know that the whole of this nitrate of soda trade was in the hands of the Government; it may be that he knew that the Government did not insure; it may be that Mr. Reeder pointed out to him that under these very general words was included the unusual risk of the Government changing the vessel's destination in the event of some accident occurring to the ship. But the mere fact that he indicated that risk seems to me conclusive that the non-disclosure of what was a much more serious risk, namely, the risk of the Government's changing its mind for some reason which was sufficient justification from their point of view, was in my mind a non-disclosure on which the insurer was entitled to say a policy obtained under those circumstances could not be enforced."

In the above circumstances the plaintiffs bring this action. I accept in substance the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs, and on that evidence I am satisfied that the defendants must be held guilty of negligence and breach of duty in not disclosing to the underwriters the actual risks which the plaintiffs desired to insure, and the circumstances connected therewith, and in not procuring a policy worded with the appropriate breadth. Primâ facie, therefore, judgment would be given by me against the defendants for such negligence and for the appropriate damages.

Two serious points, however, are raised against the claim of the plaintiffs. First, I take par. 5 of the defence, which submits that the policy which the defendants were requested to obtain was a "p.p.i." policy and was therefore void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), and that the plaintiffs could not therefore have recovered thereunder against the underwriters and cannot now recover against the defendants for negligence. The second point the defendants submitted was that plaintiffs had no insurable interest in the cargo or profits of the Glenaffric. These points are of grave and general importance.

First, as to the "p.p.i." policy point. It is clear upon the evidence that the plaintiffs requested the defendants to procure a "p.p.i." policy, and it is equally clear that pursuant to these instructions the policy which was actually obtained on the Glenaffric cargo was in fact a "p.p.i." policy.

I might incidentally mention that in one respect I cannot accept the testimony proffered by the plaintiffs, for I can entertain no real doubt upon that which appeared before me that the plaintiffs did know the nature and effect of a "p.p.i." policy, and, indeed, even if they had not possessed actual knowledge of that, I should feel bound to impute such knowledge to them, in view of the fact that sect. 4 of the Act of 1906 was a clause dealing clearly with a public and well-known matter.

The defendants say, therefore, that by reason of sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 the policy taken out by the plaintiffs was void in any event quite apart from the other matters raised by Mr. Thompson. This position of the defendants raises a question upon sect. 4 of the Act of 1906, and I must express my surprise at the circumstance that the effect of this section has not already received judicial consideration and interpretation.

It provides by the first sub-clause that every contract of marine insurance by way of gaming or wagering is void. The sub-section constitutes an emphatic condemnation by the Legislature of any gaming contract with respect to marine insurance. It must be remembered that this sub-clause rests upon no mere technicality, it is based upon public policy, and it was passed in order to prevent if possible what was deemed to be a grave public mischief. So early as 1745 the Legislature had perceived the evils of gaming contracts of this description, and had provided a measure of legislation to deal with them. Sub-clause 2 is as follows: "A contract of marine insurance is deemed to be a gaming or wagering contract (a) where the assured has not an insurable interest as defined by this Act, and the contract is entered into with no expectation of acquiring such an interest." That is a distinct sub-section; and then the sub-section uses the word "or" and proceeds in the clearest possible manner to the alternative set of contracts which are to be deemed to be gaming or wagering contracts, and says "or (b) where the policy is made 'interest or no interest,' or 'without further proof of interest than the policy itself' or 'without benefit of salvage to the insurer' or subject to any other like term."

In my view, the effect of sect. 4 is first of all to cover contracts which are gaming or wagering contracts upon the evidence of fact, and secondly to state that policies which bear upon their face certain words which tend to indicate gaming and wagering are also to be deemed gaming and wagering contracts. I can see no other interpretation of the section which gives effect to the word "or."

The able argument of Mr. Kennedy involved the submission that the words prima facie should be inserted before the word "deemed." As I pointed out in the course of discussion, and as I repeat now, it is clear that such words cannot be satisfactorily inserted at that place without destroying, not merely the grammar, but the sense of the section. And I further point this out, that the argument of Mr. Kennedy would involve that I should read at the end of clause (b) further words to this effect, namely, "unless an insurable interest is actually proved to exist." If the Legislature meant to provide that, nothing would have been easier than to insert such words. It seems to me that the whole scope and intent of the section is to provide a statutory condemnation both of contracts in which there is no insurable interest and of contracts which use words which might well suggest that no insurable interest existed.

I come to the view that instead of the words primâ facie being inserted before the word "deemed" a more appropriate word would be the word "conclusively."

The result is therefore that the plaintiffs instructed the defendants to procure a contract which would be contrary to the provision of the Act of 1906 and which would be, in my view, utterly void by reason of sect. 4 of that Act, which is based, not upon a mere technicality, but upon a clear rule of public policy.

The question is therefore raised as to whether or not the plaintiffs can recover the 1300*l.* insured by them in respect of the Glenaffric policy from the defendants as damages for breach of duty in not getting a policy of insurance which in law would have been void upon the ground which I have mentioned. Now I conceive that on principle it would be right to say that the plaintiffs could not recover, for I should deem the true rule of law to be that a contract by one person to procure for another a contract which would be void as against public interest should itself be void. In this connection I refer to the case of Cohen v. Kittell (60 L. T. Rep. 932; 22 Q. B. Div. 680). There the plaintiff employed the defendant to bet on commission, and the defendant failed to make the bet in pursuance of the plaintiff's instructions. The plaintiff sued the defendant for breach of contract and claimed as damages the excess of gains over losses that should have been received by the defendant had the bets in question been made. It was held by Huddleston, B. and Manisty, J. that as by the Act of 1845 a bet would not have been recoverable at law, the plaintiff could not maintain the action. The judgments are concise. Huddleston, B. stated this: "The contract of agency therefore for the breach of which the plaintiff sues the defendant is one by which the plaintiff employed the defendant to enter into contracts which, if made, would have been null and void, and the performance of which could not have been enforced by any legal proceeding taken by the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiff. The breach of such a contract by the agent can give no right of action to the principal. I see no difference between the case and the employment of an agent to do an illegal act. The section of Story on Agency which has been cited shows that the right of the plaintiff to have recovered in respect of the contract to have been made by the agent on his behalf is an 'essential ingredient' in the case against the agent for negligence in not contracting. In this case 'essential ingredient' is wanting, and Webster v. De Tastet (1797, 7 Term Rep. 157) shows that, this being so, the consideration urged on behalf of the plaintiff, that the losers of the bets to the defendant would probably have paid them as debts of honour, is wholly immaterial." Manisty, J. gives judgment to the same effect. He referred incidentally to Tattersall's, and says: "The custom of Tattersall's is again invoked, this time to make the agent responsible. It is clear, however, that the action cannot be maintained."

These judgments seem to me to be wholly agreeable to the cited case of Webster v. De Tastet (sup.). I think it follows from these decisions that the plaintiffs cannot recover the damages claimed in this action, and I follow the views expressed by the judges whose names I have mentioned in holding that the fact that Mr. Thompson did not and would not have raised the "p.p.i." point is not material.

I abstain from discussing the question raised before me as to whether it is the duty of a judge, be it in the Commercial Court or any other court, to observe the existence of the "p.p.i." clause. Great jurists have been mentioned in the argument before me, and I deem it undesirable that I should say anything as to the soundness of the course which has been taken by several of those whose names loom largely in the development of British commercial law. Nor do I propose to consider either Gedge v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (82 L. T. Rep. 463; (1900) 2 Q. B. 214) or Luckett v. Wood (24 Times L. Rep. 617), which were cited by Mr. Greaves Lord in his vigorous argument, or the other cases which are mentioned in the Annual Practice under the notes to Order XIX., r. 15. In substance, therefore, the action fails. Mr. Kennedy, however, raised a further point. Undismayed by the decision in Cohen v. Kittell (sup.) he submitted that although he could not recover the 1300*l.* as loss of profits mentioned, yet he was entitled to claim from the defendants in any event nominal damages upon the ground that they had undoubtedly committed a breach of duty, and were, therefore, technically responsible in some damages to the plaintiff.

At first I was inclined to think that there might be substance in this point (though it would have but little bearing on my view as to costs), for undoubtedly the usual rule of law is reasonably clear upon the matter. It is nowhere better stated than in Leake on Contracts, 3rd edit., p. 908, where it is said: "In an action for breach of contract, if the plaintiff proves the breach but fails to prove any appreciable damage in fact, he is entitled to judgment for damages in law, which, as they exist only in name and not in amount, are called nominal, but are primâ facie sufficient to carry the costs of the suit." Much authority is set out in support of the statement, but to my mind that general rule has no application to a case where the contract is to effect another contract which would be void in law, either because it is void by statute or because it is otherwise against public policy. I conceive that the facts of this case are outside the general rule of law that I have mentioned, and I accept and follow the view in Mayne on Damages, 8th edit., p. 645, which, to my mind, sets forth the true principle applicable to the present case. After dealing with the question of nominal damages in a manner which I need not further discuss, he says this: "But when the agent can show that under no circumstances could any benefit to the principal have followed from obedience to his orders, and, therefore, that disobedience to them has produced no real injury, the action will fail. Therefore, if an agent is ordered to procure a policy of insurance for his principal and neglects to do it, and yet the policy, if procured, would not have entitled the principal, in the events which have happened, to recover the loss or damage, the agent may avail himself of that as a complete defence. A fortiori, where the principal would have sustained a loss or damage if his orders had been complied with. Accordingly, if the ship to be insured had deviated from her voyage, or the voyage or the insurance is illegal, or the principal has no insurable interest, or the voyage as described in the order would not have covered the risk, in all such cases the agent, though he has fulfilled his orders, will not be responsible."

And I conceive that that is the true view. There is no case here, I think, for the grant of nominal damages, and it is to be observed that neither in Webster v. De Tastet (sup.) nor in Cohen v. Kittell (sup.), where the point might well have been presented (if sound), was it suggested that nominal damages should be recoverable.

I hold, therefore, that the plaintiffs cannot recover either the 1300*l.* or nominal damages.

I was invited by Mr. Kennedy to decide that the plaintiffs possessed an insurable interest within the Marine Insurance Act. In the view I have taken of sect. 4 it is not necessary to decide this important, far-reaching, and uncertain point. Upon consideration I have come to the view that for several reasons it is undesirable to offer an opinion upon the matter, or to in any way deal with the Marine Insurance (Gambling) Policies Act 1909. The facts and documents in this case are clear, and the point of law can, if it becomes necessary, be determined by an appellate tribunal.

For the reasons I have given there must be judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

A. R. Kennedy, K.C., R. A. Wright, K.C., and R. K. Chappell for the plaintiffs.

Greaves Lord, K.C. and Singleton, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Bankes, L.J.—This is an appeal from a considered judgment of McCardie, J., who held that the plaintiff under somewhat peculiar circumstances was not entitled to recover any damages against the defendant. The learned judge has set out fully the facts of the case, and, therefore, it is not necessary to go through them in detail. What happened was this: The plaintiffs alleged that they had employed the defendants to take out a policy of insurance for them which covered certain risks, and their complaint was that owing to the defendants' negligence, or the negligence of the person for whom they were responsible, a policy had been taken out which did not cover one of the risks which they had instructed them to cover, and as a result of that they not only failed to recover the policy moneys but they were put to very considerable expense in the matter of costs in endeavouring to establish that the policy which had been taken out covered the particular loss. The defendants raised this defence. They said: "You instructed us to take out a 'p.p.i.' policy, and under those circumstances you are not entitled to recover anything," and that was the question which the learned judge had to decide, and which he decided in favour of the defendants. That defence rests upon sect. 4 of the recent Marine Insurance Act, which provides that every contract of marine insurance by way of gaming or wagering is void. Then sub-sect. 2 is, "a contract of marine insurance is deemed to be a gaming or wagering contract—(a) Where the assured has not an insurable interest as defined by this Act, and the contract is entered into with no expectation of acquiring such an interest; or (b) where the policy is made 'interest or no interest,' or 'without further proof of interest than the policy itself,' or 'without benefit of salvage to the insurer,' or subject to any other like term." It was said for the defendants that "Inasmuch as your instructions to us were to take out a policy which by the statute is declared to be a gaming and wagering contract and a void contract, you are not entitled in law to recover anything."

Mr. Kennedy, in his very full and careful argument to us, has divided his argument under three heads. He cannot dispute upon the evidence that the instructions which his clients gave were to take out a "p.p.i." policy. The learned judge has so found. Mr. Kennedy was not prepared to admit the correctness of the finding, but, when we were referred to the evidence, it was obvious that the learned judge was quite justified in coming to the conclusion at which he arrived on that point. So assuming those instructions to have been the instructions which were given, Mr. Kennedy's first point was that the "p.p.i." clause ought not to be considered as part of the contract of marine insurance at all. It was an intimation, if I may use the expression, that the underwriter reserved to himself an option of requiring proof of interest or not as he thought fit. But it was not a term of the contract, or intended to be a term of the contract by either party. I do not intend to express any opinion in reference to that point. I conceive that, if it were at any time established, it might remove the very considerable difficulties that sometimes learned judges have felt in reference to this question of dealing with "p.p.i." policies from which the slip has been previously removed, and I need say nothing further on that point, because it seems to me that Mr. Kennedy's second point failed.

The second point was this. He said this particular policy is not within the section at all. The section speaks of contracts of marine insurance being deemed to be gaming or wagering contracts where the policy is made interest or no interest, and he says: "Assuming that I am right in my first point, then it follows that this particular policy was not made in the form which is necessary to satisfy the requirements of the statute." Now it seems to me that the language of the section does not permit of that construction. It seems to me that the language is pointed and directed to exclude the question upon which this part of Mr. Kennedy's argument rested, namely, that his clients having in fact an insurable interest in this risk the section did not apply to their case, because it seems to me, having regard to the language of the statute, the section is drawn for the purpose of excluding consideration of any inquiry into the question of whether interest existed or not. And this sub-sect. (b) is directed to the form of the instrument, and if it is directed to the form of the instrument it must include everything which forms part of the instrument whether it is pasted on or whether it is pinned on. In my opinion the section where it deals with the contract of marine insurance and says it is to be deemed to be a gaming or wagering contract where the policy is made in such and such a form is making void a contract where the instrument in which it is expressed contains any one of these objectionable clauses.

That brings me to Mr. Kennedy's third point. He says that the learned judge was wrong in holding that the contract as between his clients and the defendants was tainted because of the fact that as between his clients and the underwriters the contract of insurance was a gaming or wagering contract and void, and he seeks to establish that contention by a reference to Bridger v. Savage (53 L. T. Rep. 129; 15 Q. B. Div. 363) and Read v. Anderson (51 L. T. Rep. 55; 13 Q. B Div. 779) and other cases which might have been referred to where under certain circumstances a person who has been employed on behalf of a principal to enter into a gaming or wagering contract has been held entitled to say that a particular instance of that contract as made by him with his principal was capable of being enforced in the courts even though the ultimate employment, if I may use that expression, was to make a gaming and wagering contract for this principal. Now Bridger v. Savage (sup.) was a case where an agent, having received money paid for a bet, was sued by his principal for the money as money had and received to the use of his principal. It is common knowledge that that form of action rested upon equitable grounds, and I think that Manisty, J. in Cohen v. Kittell (sup.) is referring to that fact in the passage in his judgment on p. 683, where he says: "Doubtless where the gambling transaction is a thing of the past, the bet having been won or lost and the money having been received or paid, as the case may be, by the agent, it would be unjust that he should not in the one case account to and in the other case be recouped by his principal." And I think that Bridger v. Savage (sup.) is a case which depends upon that view of the law. Read v. Anderson (sup.) was a case of a different character. That is a case where the agent asserted that his principal had no right to withdraw his authority to pay a bet which he had been instructed to make for his principal and which had been lost, and there, as it seems to me, on a somewhat similar view of the law, the court held that it would be unjust to the agent, who had acted upon the instructions of his principal, that he should not be allowed to claim the benefit of so much of his contract as involved an indemnity by his principal in case he was called upon to pay the bet.

Those cases, it seems to me, are distinguishable from the present case. Here the agent has suffered no loss from acting upon the instructions of the principal at all. It is not a case in which he is calling upon his principal to make good any injury which he has suffered or will be certain to suffer as a consequence of acting upon his instructions. It is a case where the principal says to the agent: "You are responsible to me in damages because you did not carry out my instructions to make this gaming and wagering contract in accordance with my instructions." McCardie, J. has held that this case is really covered by the authority of Cohen v. Kittel (sup.) and Webster v. De Tastet (sup.), and I agree with that view, although there is a passage in Huddleston, B.'s judgment in Cohen v. Kittell where it seems to me the learned judge made a slight slip. There the action was brought by the plaintiff claiming damages because the defendant had not made bets for him which he had been instructed to make, and the court, consisting of Huddleston, B. and Manisty, J., had Bridger v. Savage (sup.), Read v. Anderson (sup.), and Webster v. De Tastet (sup.) cited to them, and they came to the conclusion that the action was not maintainable. Huddleston, B. reads the section of the Gaming Act of 1745, which provides that all contracts or agreements whether by parol or writing by way of gaming or wagering shall be null and void, and then he goes on: "The contract of agency therefore for the breach of which the plaintiff sues the defendant is one by which the plaintiff employed the defendant to enter into contracts which if made would have been null and void and the performance of which could not have been enforced by any legal proceeding taken by the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiff. The breach of such contract by the agent can give no right of action to the principal." I agree with that statement, and with the conclusion. But it is not necessary to agree with the sentence which immediately follows and the reasoning of the learned judge where he says that he sees no difference between that case and the employment of an agent to do any illegal act. Now t ere obviously is a distinction, and in many cases a very material distinction, between instruction to do an illegal act and instruction to do an act which the Legislature merely makes void. But in this particular case I do not think it is necessary to consider what the instructions are. The other case which McCardie, J. relied upon—Webster v. de Tastet (sup.)—I am not sure may not turn upon considerations of a rather different character from those which underlie the judgment in Cohen v. Kittell (sup.). I am prepared to agree with McCardie, J.'s judgment upon the ground that the employment by the principal of an agent to do an act which is by law declared to be a void act is one which gives the principal no right of action.

I think that there may be another ground upon which the view of the learned judge could be supported, although it is not one upon which it is necessary to express a definite opinion. It may well be that in spite of the change introduced by the Marine Insurance Act 1906 the making of a p.p.i. policy is against public policy, in spite of the change that has been introduced by the repeal of the statute of 1745, which declared that such contracts should be illegal, and the substitution of sect. 4 of the Act of 1906, which speaks of them as being void as gaming and wagering contracts, because the mischief which it is intended that the first Act should deal with and which is recited in the Preamble was just as great an evil at the time of the passing of the 1906 Act as it was in 1745. It may have to some extent changed its form or its forms, but the evil is the same evil, and the mere alteration of the language of the statute which from some points of view may render the remedy more easily available under the later statute than it was under the other cannot, I think, be readily accepted as indicating an alteration in the view of the Legislature in reference to such a contract. If the law be that the true view of a p.p.i. policy is that it is against public policy and that these statutes and the present statute are merely the result of their being against public policy, then a contract to enter into a contract which is against public policy must, it seems to me, itself be against public policy. But, as I say, that is perhaps a more difficult question requiring more consideration possibly than one has been able to give to it, and, therefore, I do not desire to express any decided or definite opinion upon that, but I prefer to rest my judgment on the ground indicated by Huddleston, B.

Scrutton, L.J.—Mr. Kennedy's very careful and candid argument, to which I have listened with great attention, has not persuaded me that McCardie, J.'s judgment in this case is erroneous. As the point is one of considerable commercial and general importance, and as it is quite possible to think in this case that it is working an injustice to the parties concerned, I desire to express my reasons in my own words. Some Liverpool warehousemen had a contract by which a quantity of nitrate was coming to their warehouse from South American ports. The trade at that time was under the control of the Government so that ships which started at a particular port might be diverted to other ports in other countries, and the warehousemen were anxious to ensure that they should make the profits which they expected from the nitrate coming to their warehouse by insuring, amongst other things, against the non-arrival of the ship by reason of the Government diverting her to other countries. They accordingly gave a Liverpool firm of brokers instructions to effect policies which would cover, amongst other things, that particular source of loss. It is quite clear to my mind that, in view of the fact that it might be difficult to prove the actual loss, because when you knew the ship was not coming you not unnaturally would fill up your warehouse with other goods if you could get them, and there might be a somewhat complicated question as to how much you really had lost, they intended that their policies should have on them what is known in business as the p.p.i. clause, the effect of which would be that the mere production of the policy is evidence of interest to the full amount mentioned in the policy.

For a hundred years at least there has been an unfortunate conflict between the statute law and the practice of business men. It has been extremely common to place in policies a p.p.i. clause, providing that there shall be no necessity to prove the amount of loss, although all the time there was a statute which said that such a clause was either illegal or null and void. It is unfortunate that that practice has prevailed, because while, on the one hand, there are undoubtedly cases where there is a real loss, but it is difficult to prove its exact amount, and it is convenient in a business sense to have it assessed beforehand; on the other hand, there is no doubt most of the cases of deliberate attempts to get insurance money, and cases of over-valuation on the chance of a loss, are all rendered possible by the continued insertion of a "p.p.i." clause. Apart from the fact that the clause facilitates fraud, as it does in many cases, a practice has arisen with regard to it which places judges in a very great difficulty. It is clearly the duty of the judges if they know that a policy has that clause on it to treat it as null and void under the Act, and a practice has grown up of deceiving the court by parties tearing off the policy the clause which they have put on it in the hope that the court will not know that there is such a clause and will give effect to the policy. The court does not know generally, but having had some commercial experience suspects what those two pinholes mean in the margin of the policy, and suspects still more when it sees a bit of paper which has had something torn off it. Judges are placed in a very difficult position, at least, speaking for myself personally, when they strongly suspect that they are being asked to enforce a null and void contract, but have no evidence beyond the kind of indications that are on the policy. However that may be, that is the practice, and the only thing that can be said to business men who carry on business in that way is, that if they persistently run contrary to a statute, if they persistently enter into contracts and policies which are null and void under the statutes, they must not complain if the courts obey the statutes rather than their commercial practice.

In this case, the warehousemen desired to have the "p.p.i." clauses on the policies, and they were put on. The clauses were pinned on in the orthodox way. But it turned out that the Liverpool brokers who were instructed to effect the policy through their London agents did not convey to the London underwriters the exact nature of the risk that they were being asked to insure. They used general words which would cover the risk, but they did not convey to the minds of the underwriters that what their clients desired to cover was a particular special form of risk, namely, the diversion of the ship by Government orders to other ports or countries. In consequence, when a particular ship, the Glenaffric, was diverted to Italy and a claim was made under the policy the underwriters replied: "You had not told us this was the special risk you were desiring to insure and your general words do not cover it." It may be put as concealment; but it may also be put that the language under the circumstances did not cover the loss. Bailhache, J. has held, and the Court of Appeal has affirmed the view (Thomas Cheshire and Co. v. W. A. Thompson, sup.), that the London underwriters were not liable under those circumstances. The slip had been torn off the policy. So neither court thought that the transaction they were being asked to deal with was one that was null and void under the statute.

Then came the next stage, which is the present one. The Liverpool warehousemen, not being able to recover on their policy and finding that they did not recover, because of the action taken by their brokers, or the lack of action, brought an action for negligence against their brokers, to which the answer which the brokers have thought it right to make—and I am only here to enforce the law and not to express any opinion on their commercial conduct—was: "You cannot recover any damage, because you instructed us to make a 'p.p.i" policy which is a null and void transaction, and from a null and void transaction no damages can flow." And McCardie, J. has held that that is right.

Mr. Kennedy takes three points against the decision. He says, first, this clause is not really part of the policy. It is a sort of informal polite intimation that in the proceedings in connection with the policy a certain course may be taken by the underwriters, but it is not part of the policy. Now I am afraid I am not able to accept the position that slips on a policy are not part of the policy. A contract of marine insurance must be expressed in a policy, and here is the policy with the slip attached to it; and I am afraid I do not see any ground for holding that slips on the policy are merely polite intimations for information of people as to what may happen to the policy, but are not part of the policy.

Then, secondly, Mr. Kennedy says, clause 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 is not really so strict as it appears to be. It says: "Every contract of marine insurance by way of gaming or wagering is void. (2) A contract of marine insurance is deemed to be a gaming or wagering contract: (a) Where the assured has not an insurable interest as defined by this Act, and the contract is entered into with no expectation of acquiring such an interest; or (b) where the policy is made 'interest or no interest,' or 'without further proof of interest than the policy itself.'" That only means, if I understand Mr. Kennedy's argument, that it is primâ facie a gaming and wagering contract and you may defeat it if you can show you either had a real interest or a probability of obtaining it. That is, in effect, to read sub-sect. (a) of sect. 2 into sub-sect. (b). I see no ground for cutting down the section in that way. It seems to me Parliament has said: "If you put this clause in your policy without more we deem it to be a gaming and wagering policy, because the clause is a gaming and wagering clause." In my view, therefore, the second point fails.

Then comes Mr. Kennedy's third point, and the only point which has given me any trouble at all. It is said: "Even if this contract is null and void, yet if you have executed it negligently one may take into account the probabilities of the thing, and as the strong probability is that I should have been paid under this policy by the underwriter, if it had been properly executed, I may recover damages assessed in the way all damages have to be assessed on the probabilities of what would happen; and as I probably should have recovered under this policy if it had been properly effected, because probably the underwriter would not have taken the objection that the 'p.p.i.' clause was also on the policy, and we should have stopped the court from finding it out, I can recover damages." Now, my view of the principle on which this case should be decided is this, that a contract declared by the law null and void cannot be either directly or indirectly the basis of a legal claim. You have, first of all, contracts as to which there is no objection which are legally enforceable. You have then contracts under the Statute of Frauds which provides that certain legal relations do not make them illegal, do not make them null and void, but provides that they shall not be enforceable in law except by a certain procedure, namely, evidence in writing. In that class of case, which I call contracts of imperfect obligation, the illegal relation which cannot be enforced may yet have a number of legal consequences indirectly. I am not going through all the things that may happen under the Statute of Frauds. Anybody who is curious enough to look will find them in Sir Frederick Pollock's book on the Law of Contracts under "Imperfect Obligation." There the contract not being declared illegal and not being declared null and void is only unenforceable in a particular way; although it is unenforceable for lack of certain formalities, it yet may have legal consequences indirectly. When you get to the next class of case, which is where it is declared null and void, but not declared illegal, then, in my view, the court must give full effect to the nullity and invalidity which the statute declares and cannot consider as the basis of the legal obligation a set of relations which Parliament has declared to be null and void. For instance, a prominent class of null and void contracts are betting contracts. It seems to me quite clear that you cannot put forward as a claim for damages that your agent has not made a bet which he was employed to make. The bet that he would have made was a null and void transaction, and you cannot inquire into the cause of action on a null and void transaction and see what would have happened if he had made it, or what would have happened if, having made it, he had made it carelessly, made it with an insolvent bookmaker, made it for less than the amount at which he was instructed to make it. If you could go into a thing like that you would have treated as of some validity a transaction which Parliament has said shall be null and void. It seems to me, therefore, that the principle on which I should like to decide this part of the case is this: That you cannot try a transaction which Parliament has said to be null and void, the basis being illegal. The only exception, and I am not sure that it is an exception, is this, that when a man has received money for you it is no answer for him to say: "I received it in respect of a null and void transaction." He has received it and you cannot treat the receipt as null and void. Bridger v. Savage (sup.) appears to me to be a good example of that sort of case; and it rests upon the actual receipt of property. A good many people thought Read v. Anderson (sup.) was wrong. Parliament, at any rate, dealt with it very summarily by reversing it by statute within a year or two afterward, but it may be that Read v. Anderson (sup.) may be brought under the same principle. There is one thing further I wish to say about the money. It is quite possible to put it in the way in which Lord Ellenborough put it in Griffith v. Young (1810, 12 East, 513, at p. 514): "If one agree to receive money for the use of another upon consideration executed, however frivolous or void the consideration might have been in respect of the person paying the money, if indeed it were not absolutely illegal or immoral, the person so receiving it cannot be permitted to gainsay his having received it for the use of that other." That may be the same kind of principle which may justify proceedings in respect of receipt of money under a null and void contract which would not apply to any other form of utilising that transaction as the basis of a legal obligation. I prefer to rest my answer to the third point taken by Mr. Kennedy on that principle; but I am not at all sure, and I should like to reserve it for further consideration, whether you cannot raise the objection to this action and to actions of a similar character in respect of bets on the ground that the transactions which are being investigated are contrary to public policy. I am not at all sure that the legislation against these "p.p.i." clauses and the legislation against betting may not be rested on the fact that the transactions are contrary to public policy.

But, as I have said, I should like a fuller consideration of that aspect of the case before deciding it on that ground. I am content to leave it on the decision that you cannot make a null and void transaction, a transaction declared null and void by statute, the basis directly or indirectly of an action.

For these reasons, although I quite conceive that the plaintiff feels it strongly, I think that the judgment of the learned judge below was right and that this appeal fails.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree, but I should rather like to add a few words out of regard, if I may say so, to the admirable argument which has been addressed to us by Mr. Kennedy. His first point was that the slip was not part of the contract of insurance—by "the slip" I mean the attached slip. I do not think that can be supported. I think the test that one might apply would be this. Supposing there were perfectly valid terms expressed in such a slip attached to the policy, could it be said that those terms were not a part of the contract of insurance? Neither party suggests that for a moment. I think the intention of the parties was, and must be taken to have been in view of the fact that they attached it to the written document and signed the document with that slip attached, that they intended to include in the contract the terms contained in that slip.

The next point was that the contract was not within sect. 4 of the Act, because the assured had in fact, an insurable interest, and that the voidance of the contract which, according to the Act of Parliament, sect. 4, is made "'interest or no interest' or 'without further proof of interest than the policy itself' or 'without benefit of salvage to the insurer' or subject to any other like term," is only a provision that under those circumstances it is primâ facie deemed to be a gaming or wagering contract. I think that the words are inconsistent with that view, and it appears to me quite plain, when you consider the history of the clause and remember the section of the Act of 1745 which is repealed, that that was not the intention of the Legislature. I think that this contract was subject to a like term, the term used, and must be deemed to be a gaming or wagering contract.

The third point that was raised is this. It was said that the employment, at any rate, of the broker was a perfectly legal contract and that it was broken, and that in assessing the damages you were entitled to take into account the probability that the contract which the agent was employed to make, though void, would have resulted in an advantage to the plaintiff and the invalid contract gives rise to damages. To my mind, Mr. Kennedy substantiated the first part of that argument. I see nothing in the provisions of the Act to indicate as being merely a gaming and wagering contract a contract of insurance, nothing to make the employment of the insurance broker an illegal contract, and nothing to make it a void contract. If you once assume that the contract of insurance was a gaming or wagering contract you put it upon the same footing as a bet on a horse race, and it appears to me it has been decided by an authority which is binding upon this court, namely, the case of Read v. Anderson (sup.), that the employment of an agent to make a bet on horse races does give rise to a valid contract as between the principal and the agent, a contract on which the agent can sue the principal for an indemnity, and can sue him for an indemnity because that is an implied term of the contract of employment. In Read v. Anderson (sup.) it appears to me that the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal is inexplicable except upon the footing that they did consider the contract of employment to be a valid contract. They said that it was; and I think that it was further stated to be valid in the case of Bridger v. Savage (sup.). Therefore, to my mind the contract of employment was a valid contract.

But that still gives rise to the further question what damages can be recovered by the principal if the agent breaks it. I think that under those circumstances where the employment is to make a contract which is null and void as opposed to being illegal, if the agent breaks that contract his principal has no right of damages against him, whether for nominal damages or substantial damages, if the only breach alleged by the agent is an omission to make a void contract at all, or default in making it with reasonable care; and I think Cohen v. Kittell (sup.) is an authority for that proposition. I think it is based upon sound reason except for the one sentence of Huddleston, B., where he says he sees no difference between that and an employment to make an illegal contract. It appears to me there is very considerable distinction, and it follows, I think, that I do not agree with the sentence in McCardie, J.'s judgment, where he said this: "Now I conceive that on principle it would not be right to say that the plaintiffs could not recover, for I should deem the true rule of law to be that a contract by one person to procure for another a contract which would be void as against public interest should itself be void." For that he cites the case of Cohen v. Kittell (sup.). If the learned judge by "void as against public policy" means "illegal," I think the proposition would be sound. It would not refer to the matter before us, but it would be applicable to the case of Cohen v. Kittell (sup.). Webster v. De Tastet (sup.) is a different matter, because there the contract was something which was treated as illegal in the sense that it was considered to be against public policy to insure wages.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of the learned judge below should stand. But I desire, as the other members of the court have done, to reserve the question as to whether or not this contract to make a "p.p.i." policy is an illegal contract. I do not want to further discuss it except to say that when it comes up to be considered it will probably be necessary to consider what the law was before the Act of 1745, as to which, curiously enough, there is quite an extensive discussion in the exchequer chamber in the case of Cousins v. Nantes (1811, 3 Taunt. 513), and I think it will further be necessary probably to consider what the law is after the passing of the Act of 1906, taking into serious account the provisions made by the Legislature in the Marine Insurance Act 1909, which dealt, to a limited extent, with these policies. I also wish to say for myself that in this particular case it has been assumed by everybody that if in fact the sub-agent, the insurance broker in London, was negligent that the defendants here, the country insurance brokers, were responsible for that negligence. I express no opinion upon that matter at all. I daresay it is perfectly true. I can imagine circumstances in which an agent in the country employed under such circumstances, as he necessarily must be, if he is contemplating the employment of an agent in London may not be responsible for the negligence of that sub-agent if, in fact, he himself has used reasonable care in the selection of the agent. But that is a matter which does not arise now, and I only mention it. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

March 4, 5, 8, and 31, 1920.

(Before Rowlatt, J.)

Elliott Steam Tug Company Limited v. John Payne and Co. (a)

Charter-party—Termination of hire—Implied rights—Breach of charter-party—Requisition—Termination—"Restraint of princes"—Measure of damages.

A charter-party provided, inter alia, for the hire of a chartered vessel for one calendar month from the date at which it was placed at the disposal of the charterers, and that thereafter hire was to continue at the same rate of payment until determined by fourteen days' notice given by the charterers. Some months later the shipowners withdrew the vessel from the service of the charterers, claiming an implied right to terminate the charter-party by reasonable notice, which they said that they had given.

The tug was then requisitioned by the Government, and the shipowners contended further that the charter-party, if it was in existence at the time, was put an end to by the requisition; if it was not put an end to by the requisition, they relied upon the exception of "restraint of princes" in respect of the period under requisition. The charterers replied that the charter was still in existence, but that the ship was deviating when the requisition took place; her owners were not, therefore, entitled to rely upon the exceptions.

Held, that the charter-party was to continue in existence until terminated by the charterers, and that the shipowners had no implied right to put an end to it by notice or otherwise. Nor was it ended by the Government requisition, but, as the requisition was wholly unconnected with the wrongful act of the shipowners, the question of the application of the exceptions contained in the charter did not arise. On general grounds damages were not awarded for the period during which the vessel was under requisition.

Davis v. Garrett (1830, 6 Bing. 716) distinguished. Dictum of Tindal, C.J., at p. 724, held not to apply.

Action in the Commercial List tried by Rowlatt, J.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that a charter-party dated the 18th Aug. 1914 was still in force; an injunction to restrain the defendants from using a tug otherwise than in accordance with the charter-party; and damages for breach of the charter-party.

(a) Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, the Elliott Steam Tug Company Limited, carried on business in London as owners of steam tugs. The defendants, John Payne and Co., were the owners of the steam tug John Payne, of the port of Bristol.

By a charter-party dated the 18th Aug. 1914 the defendants agreed, as owners, to let to the plaintiffs, as charterers, the steam tug, the John Payne, "for the term of one calendar month, commencing from the 18th day of August 1914, at which date she is to be placed at the disposal of the charterers at Bristol." The defendants were to appoint the master and crew, and were to maintain the tug, which was to be employed between such safe ports in the United Kingdom, with the option of towing between the United Kingdom and continental ports and in the Channel, as charterers or their agents should direct. The charterers were to pay for the use and hire of the tug at the rate of 220*l.* per calendar month. The charter-party contained an exception of the restraint of princes; and there was also a type-written clause as follows: "The hire to continue at the same rate of payment until charterers determine same by fourteen days' notice."

The tug began work under the charter-party on the 22nd Aug. 1914, and the owners accepted hire, monthly in advance, until April 1915. Disputes arose between the parties at the end of 1914 and the beginning of 1915.

By letters dated the 4th and 16th Dec. 1914 the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs purporting to terminate the charter-party.

The plaintiffs complained that the defendants' tug-master was disobeying orders which the charterers were entitled to give under the charter-party. They also alleged that on the 19th Feb. 1915 the tug was, for the time being, practically withdrawn from the service of the plaintiffs in consequence of the crew refusing to proceed outside of the Thames estuary owing to the presence of German submarines.

On the 3rd May 1915, when the tug was working in the neighbourhood of Dover, the defendants withdrew her from the charterers' service; and they ordered her to Bristol to undergo alleged necessary overhaul and repairs. When the tug arrived at Bristol the defendants, on the 21st May 1915, wrote to the plaintiffs, notifying them that they had sent the tug to Bristol for repairs, and that they would not redeliver her to the plaintiffs. The defendants claimed the right, and purported to terminate the charter-party by giving a fortnight's notice, which the plaintiffs refused to accept. The defendants did not restore the tug to the plaintiffs.

On the 10th June 1915 the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendants claiming (1) a declaration that they were entitled to the use of the vessel under the charter-party until they should determine it by fourteen days' notice, and that the defendants had not the option to terminate the charter-party by notice; (2) an injunction to restrain the defendants from using the tug otherwise than in accordance with the charter-party; and (3) damages.

The plaintiffs alleged in their points of claim (inter alia) that they (the plaintiffs) had not given any notice to determine the hiring of the tug under the charter-party; that the defendants had been for some time desirous of terminating the charter-party, and not having the power themselves to do so, had sought to force the plaintiffs to exercise their option to determine it, and for that purpose the defendants, in breach of the charter-party, had not given the plaintiffs the use of the tug, and had not at all times kept her at the disposal of the plaintiffs or in every way fit for the service nor provided the necessary equipment.

They alleged, further, that the defendants had not provided a suitable master and crew; that the master, with the approval of the defendants, had not followed the instructions of the plaintiffs, had not used all dispatch in prosecuting voyages, and had not rendered all customary assistance with the crew; and that the defendants, though advised by the plaintiffs of their dissatisfaction with the master and crew, had not investigated the matter and had not made any change in the appointments; and that the defendants had withdrawn the tug from the plaintiffs, and, notwithstanding the protests of the plaintiffs, had continued to withdraw the tug from the plaintiffs.

The defendants alleged that the plaintiffs had so misused the tug as to amount to repudiation of the charter-party. The defendants delivered their points of defence and counter-claim on the 7th July 1915. They did not admit that the charter-party still continued. They alleged that it was an implied term of the charter-party that the defendants should have the right to terminate the hiring of the tug by reasonable notice to the plaintiffs; that a reasonable notice was a fourteen days' notice; and that such notice was duly given to the plaintiffs by letter from the defendants, dated the 21st May 1915, and that the hiring accordingly terminated on the expiration of that notice; that all the allegations in the points of claim and particulars of breaches of charter-party by the defendants were denied with certain admissions and explanations. The defendants pleaded, alternatively, that they were entitled to terminate the hiring of the tug by reason of various matters—e.g., by alleged continuous and unreasonable overwork of the tug by the plaintiffs, which, they alleged, made it impossible for them, the defendants, to attend reasonably to the upkeep of the tug; by alleged continuous overworking of the master and crew, and alleged putting of the tug in danger on several occasions. The defendants counter-claimed (inter alia) for a declaration that the hiring of the tug terminated fourteen days after the 21st May 1915 and for damages.

The plaintiffs by their reply delivered on the 13th July 1915 joined issue, and paid into court certain sums in respect of the counter-claim, at the same time denying liability.

On the 16th July 1915 the tug was requisitioned by the Government, and the tug continued under requisition until the 31st March 1920, and the defendants were thereby prevented from restoring the tug to the plaintiffs, even if they had desired to do so. The proceedings in the action were stayed during the period of the requisition.

On the 6th Feb. 1920 amended points of defence and counter-claim were delivered by the defendants. They added an alternative plea that the hiring of the tug had terminated on the 16th July 1915, the date of the requisition of the tug by the British Government, and they claimed a declaration to that effect.

The plaintiffs, in reply, said that if the tug was requisitioned by the British Government on the 16th July 1915 she was requisitioned at the instigation or wish of the defendants, that the defendants never alleged, until the amended defence was delivered, that the charter-party was terminated by the requisitioning, and the parties had, since July 1915, acted on the footing that the charter-party was not thereby terminated; and that in the circumstances the defendants were estopped from alleging that the charter-party was terminated by the alleged requisitioning.

Dunlop, K.C. and F. van den Berg for the plaintiffs.—On the true construction of the charter-party the tug was hired for one month at a certain rate, and thereafter the hiring was to continue indefinitely until the plaintiffs determined it by fourteen days' notice. The charter-party has not been so determined. The defendants had no power to determine the hiring, and the notices by which they purported to do so are void. The requisitioning of the tug by the British Government on the 16th July did not determine the hiring. See Elliott Steam Tug Company v. Duncan and Sons, 34 Times L. Rep. 583.

The defendants had committed breaches of the charter-party, particularly in detaining the tug from the plaintiffs in and after May 1915 for alleged repairs. The repairs were not necessary and the plaintiffs are entitled to damages. The plaintiffs are also entitled to damages for the period during which the tug was under requisition, because in the absence of proof to the contrary, the requisition of the tug should be regarded as having arisen out of its wrongful detention by the defendants. The defendants are not entitled to rely on the exception of restraint of princes because they were committing breaches of the charter-party. See

Davis v. Garrett, 1830, 6 Bing. 716, per Tindal, C.J., at p. 724;
Lilley v. Doubleday, 44 L. T. Rep. 814; 7 Q. B. Div. 510;
Morrison and Co. v. Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400, 504 115 L. T. Rep. 508; (1916) 2 K. B. 783, 795;
Shaw and Co. v. Symmons and Sons, 117 L. T. Rep. 91; (1917) 1 K. B. 799.

MacKinnon, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn, K.C. for the defendants.—On the true construction of the charter-party a term is implied that the defendants were to be entitled to terminate the hire by giving the plaintiffs a reasonable notice. A fourteen-days' notice is a reasonable notice, and such a reasonable notice had been given by the defendants to the plaintiffs. Therefore the charter-party was determined before any of the alleged breaches by the defendants took place.

Alternatively, if the charter-party was not determined by notice, it was determined by the requisitioning of the tug by the British Government on the 16th July 1915.

The dictum of Tindal, C.J. in Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716, at p. 724) does not apply here, because the requisitioning of the tug did not arise out of its alleged detention by the defendants. Therefore, the plaintiffs are not entitled to damages in respect of the period during which the tug was under requisition by the Government. Moreover, this case is entirely distinguishable from the case of Morrison and Co. v. Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company (sup.), and the defendants are entitled to rely on the exception of the restraint of princes. The plaintiffs have failed to prove that the defendants have committed any breaches of the charter-party.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 8.—Rowlatt, J. delivered an interim judgment.—His Lordship said: I will now deliver judgment on all the points that arise in this action, except one point, on which I propose to reserve my decision to another day.

The first question is, what, on the true construction of the charter-party, is the duration of the period for which the tug was hired by the plaintiffs? The charter-party contains a clause providing that the tug is to be hired for one calendar month at a certain sum for that term, and it contains also the following typewritten clause: "The hire to continue at the same rate of payment until charterers determine same by fourteen days' notice."

In my opinion, these provisions can only mean that the hiring of the tug at the specified rate is to continue indefinitely, as long as the tug remains in existence, subject to the condition that the plaintiffs may put an end to it by giving the stipulated notice. It is an extraordinary arrangement, but if the document be construed according to its plain meaning, there can be no doubt that it is the arrangement into which the parties have entered.

It follows, therefore, that the defendants had no power to terminate the hiring of the tug, and that the notices by which they purported to do so in Dec. 1914 and May 1915 were void and inoperative. Nor can it be said that the defendants were entitled to treat the hiring as having been terminated by any act of the plaintiffs. The defendants allege that the conduct of the plaintiffs was in many respects unreasonable and harassing, but I am unable to find that it amounted, in any instance, to such a breach of the charter-party as enabled the defendants to say that it constituted a repudiation of the contract. Nor are the defendants justified in their contention that the hiring was terminated by the requisitioning of the tug on the 16th July 1915. In my opinion, as I have already said, this charter-party was to continue in force for an indefinite time, and in this case, as in the previous case of Elliott Steam Tug Company v. Duncan and Sons (34 Times L. Rep. 583), I must come to the conclusion that the requisitioning of the vessel did not put an end to the charter-party. I am of opinion, therefore, that the charter-party was not terminated by any of the causes relied on by the defendants, and that it still remains in force.

That being so, if at any time after the date of the charter-party the defendants have, without lawful excuse, failed to place the tug at the disposal of the plaintiffs, they have committed a breach of the charter-party, for which the plaintiffs are entitled to relief. I think, however, that the case is one in which the relief, if any, should take the form, not of an injunction, but of damages.

On the 19th Feb. 1915 the tug was practically withdrawn from the service of the plaintiffs in consequence of the refusal of the crew to leave the estuary of the Thames, being afraid of attack by German submarines. The tug was at work in the Thames, but the plaintiffs wanted her to go elsewhere, and the crew refused to comply with their instructions. The defendants were bound to procure a crew who would carry out the instructions of the plaintiffs, and their failure to do so, in this instance, constituted a breach of contract in respect of which the plaintiffs are entitled to an inquiry as to damages.

Further, on the 3rd May 1915 the defendants withdrew the tug from the plaintiffs and sent her to Bristol, where the defendants' works were, for repairs, and kept her there until she was requisitioned. I do not say that the removal of the vessel by the defendants was unjustifiable, but I think that they kept her there longer than was necessary.

I find that the repairs could have been effected by the 1st June 1915, and that as from that date the defendants withheld the tug from the plaintiffs in breach of the charter-party. I, therefore, hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for the period between that date, on which the tug should have been returned to them, and the 10th June 1915, the date of the writ in the action.

There remains the important question whether or not the damages which the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in respect of the defendants' breaches of the charter-party should include damages for the loss of the tug to the plaintiffs during the period she was under requisition.

That is a question of some difficulty, and I will consider it further before giving my decision on it.

March 31.—Rowlatt, J. read the following judgment:—In this case I disposed, at the hearing, of all questions except one. The point that I reserved arises in this way. The defendants, so I have held, in breach of the charter-party, withdrew the ship from the service of the charterers, claiming to determine the hearing. The charterers did not accept the repudiation, but continued to insist on the ship being restored. While matters were in this position the vessel was requisitioned by the Government, and the owners were thereafter prevented from restoring her to the service of the charterers if they wished to do so. In these circumstances, it was said for the plaintiffs that the ship, when requisitioned, was to be treated as a vessel which was deviating from a voyage contracted for, and that the owners were liable for damages calculated over the whole period of the requisition.

I do not think that the point turns on the exception of restraint of princes, because it seems to me that when the owner is prevented by the law of the land from using his vessel in the service of the charterer, the result must be, independently of any exception, that the same law cannot make him liable in damages. Surely I cannot call upon him to do two inconsistent things at the same time.

But a passage in the judgment of Tindal, C.J. in Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716) was referred to, at p. 724, which is as follows: "We think the real answer to the objection is that no wrongdoer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong, and that as a loss has actually happened whilst his wrongful act was in operation and force and which is attributable to his wrongful act, he cannot set up as an answer to the action the bare possibility of a loss if his wrongful act has not been done." It is to be observed that the learned judge is there dealing with damages that did arise from the breach, and the decision was that it was none the less recoverable because it was not shown that it would not have happened if there had been no breach. I do not read the principle laid down to be that all damage which occurs during the period of a breach is to be treated as connected with it unless the contrary is shown, but that damages flowing from the act which constituted the breach, in that case navigating the vessel where and when she met with disaster, could not be excluded merely because they might have flowed from navigating her on the course contracted for.

If the larger rule indicated above is to be applied, it would seem to follow, and indeed I think it follows from the plaintiffs' argument here, that if a tenant of a house wrongfully held over for a day after the expiration of his term and on that day the house was requisitioned he would be responsible in damages for the requisitioning. This is, I think, out of the question. In my view the requisitioning, whether in the case of the vessel material to this action or in the case of a house, is not to be regarded, unless it is proved to be so in fact, as arising out of the use of the vessel or house at the time, but as due to a liability incident to its mere existence, and that the rule in Davis v. Garrett (sup.) has no application.

In the circumstances, therefore, I decide the point reserved in favour of the defendants.

Judgment accordingly.

Salvage—Tug requisitioned by Admiralty—Demise of tug to Crown—"Ship belonging to His Majesty"—Right of Admiralty to salvage remuneration—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 557—Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 41), s. 1.

Where a tug is requisitioned by the Admiralty upon terms which amount to a demise of the tug to the Admiralty, the latter and not the owners of the tug are entitled to salvage remuneration subsequently earned by the tug.

By sect. 557, sub-sect. 1, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, "Where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to His Majesty or by the commander or crew thereof, no claim shall be allowed for any loss, damage, or risk caused to the ship or her stores, tackle, or furniture . . . or for any other expense or loss sustained by His Majesty by reason of that service. . . ."

By sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916, "Where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to His Majesty, and that ship is a ship specially equipped with salvage plant, or is a tug, the Admiralty shall, notwithstanding anything contained in sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, be entitled to claim salvage on behalf of His Majesty for such services, and shall have the same rights and remedies as if the ship rendering such services did not belong to His Majesty."

A tug belonging to the appellants was requisitioned by the Admiralty upon terms which amounted to a demise of the tug to the Admiralty, the tug rendered salvage services to another vessel, and the Admiralty Commissioners claimed a declaration that they were entitled to the remuneration so earned.

Held, that the tug was a "ship belonging to His Majesty" within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916, and therefore the Admiralty Commissioners and not the owners of the tug were entitled to claim the salvage moneys.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 394; 120 L. T. Rep. 137; (1919) 1 K. B. 299) affirmed.

CONSOLIDATED appeals from orders of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 394; 120 L. T. Rep. 137; (1919) 1 K. B. 299) by the owners of two tugs which, while under requisition by the Admiralty earned respectively 4500*l.* and 350*l.* as remuneration for salvage services to two ships.

The Court of Appeal in the first, affirming Bailhache, J. (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 360; 119 L. T. Rep. 338), held that the tug in each case was a vessel "belonging to His Majesty" within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916; and therefore the Admiralty Commissioners were entitled to the amount awarded for the salvage services rendered by the vessel, the owners having no claim to any part of the salvage money.

In the second case which raised the same point, Hill, J. had given judgment for the Admiralty Commissioners, and the appeal from his decision was dismissed by the Court of Appeal.

Stewart Bevan, K.C. and Van den Berg for the appellants.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), MacKinnon, K.C., and Dunlop, K.C., for the respondents, were not called on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Birkenhead).—This is an appeal from two orders of the Court of Appeal dated the 3rd Dec. 1918, which confirmed a judgment of Bailhache, J. that was delivered on the 30th May 1918, in favour of the respondents, and a judgment of Hill, J. on the 29th July 1918, also in favour of the respondents. The actions were consolidated and the issues raised in the two cases are identical. The questions involved in the appeal are whether the appellants as against the respondents are entitled to be paid the sums respectively of 4500*l.* and 350*l.*, and these questions depend upon the rights as between the appellants and the respondents to the benefit of salvage services rendered by the tug Conqueror to the steamship Sussex in Jan. 1917, and by the tug Warrior to the steamship Messina in Feb. 1917.

With the outbreak of war it became necessary for the Admiralty to requisition a number of tugs for the service of the armed forces of the Crown and amongst others the tug Conqueror and the tugs Warrior were requisitioned in the early days of the war, the Warrior on the 7th Aug. 1914 and the Conqueror on the 4th Oct. 1914. No charter-party was ever executed between the owners of these tugs and the Admiralty, but it was agreed between the parties that the tugs should be taken upon the basis of the charter-party sometimes known as the Expeditionary Force charter-party and sometimes as T. 99. The charter-party in question contained a clause 11, which is in the following terms: "The owners shall provide and pay for all wages, provisions, and all other expenses in connection with the captain, officers, engineers, and crew, for the insurance of the steamer, for all deck and engine room stores, water for all purposes, for the proper ventilation of the cargo, for boats, for ballast necessary to enable the vessel to proceed with safety without cargo, and for the maintenance of the steamer in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery during the service." The clause which I have just read has been described in the correspondence and in the judgments in the courts below as the "gross clause"; the term is not perhaps particularly expressive, but for the sake of convenience it may be retained. Another clause of the charter-party should be specifically referred to, clause 29, which is as follows: "The steamer has liberty to assist vessels in distress, and to deviate for the purpose of saving life. All salvage to be for owners' benefit, but ship to be deemed off pay during the time occupied in salvage operations."

Now, the effect of this charter-party in relation to the point I am now dealing with may be shortly stated, the arrangement being that the owners should provide and pay wages and provisions and all other expenses—a very reasonable stipulation is contained in the latter clause to which I have called attention—and that all moneys that may be recoverable under the head of salvage should equally accrue to the owners' benefit. The arrangement which was made, and to which I have referred, was at a later date varied. In Sept. 1916, an agreement was made between the parties by which the Conqueror passed from what I may term the gross basis to a net basis, and a similar arrangement was made in Jan. 1917 in the case of the Warrior. The causes which led to the modification of the original arrangement do not, it seems to me, very greatly concern us. The change was in fact made, and the correspondence between the parties is the only record of what the parties intended at the time when this modification was made. The Admiralty proposed that the change should be made, and it is very important to consider what is the attitude at that time assumed by the appellants. It is perhaps equally important that the extent and importance of the change should be clearly grasped. The change was of this kind: the Conqueror and the Warrior at the time of the respective salvage services were commissioned as His Majesty's ships; the masters and crews were the servants of His Majesty, the masters held commissions as lieutenants in the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve, and the other members of the crews received from the Admiralty and wore uniforms according to their rank; they were naval ratings, and the wages and victualling allowances were paid by the Admiralty. The tugs were in the possession and control of the Admiralty; all the running expenses of the tugs and employment were payable and paid by the Admiralty and not by the owners. The tugs were employed at the sole risk of the Admiralty as regards all risks, except fair wear and tear. Such was the nature of the change which was proposed by the Admiralty to the owners, and it must be assumed that the owners realised at once what the nature of the proposal was and what the inevitable consequences of such a proposal must be upon the salvage clause of the earlier agreement. They knew or must be taken to have known that the charter had become a charter of demise. The appellants, although they received a proposal involving necessarily a modification so profound in the agreement between themselves and the respondents, made no observation or reservation of any kind; in other words, they are informed that the change is to be made in the arrangement between themselves and the Admiralty of such a character as to render it highly irrational and unusual that they should thereafter attempt to establish any claim to salvage. They acquiesce without protest in the making of this change and they do not suggest any stipulation on their behalf in relation to salvage.

It was attempted by counsel for the appellants to argue that because in an earlier case, where a tug belonging to the appellants had been requisitioned by the Admiralty upon the net basis and a change of arrangement had been made by the appellants, the Admiralty had acquiesced in a salvage award being made in favour of the appellants, it must be taken that the Admiralty intended when they placed the tugs in question on the net basis that any salvage payment should in this case too inure to the benefit of the appellants. I am not able to accept this contention. At the period in question the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 41) had not become law, and I entirely decline to draw any inferences from an omission on the part of the Admiralty to intervene in the earlier salvage case—an omission which took place at a moment when they had no legal title or claim on which they were concerned to insist.

It only remains that I should state my view quite shortly upon the position, which was the subject of argument by both learned counsel who addressed you. Their contention has been throughout of this kind. They say that originally the appellants were entitled to salvage. For its own purpose the Admiralty proposed a modification of the original agreement. It would have been possible to effect that modification without in any way altering the right to salvage which under the earlier agreement belonged to the appellants. The respondents did not in any way attempt to expressly modify that provision, and it must, therefore be taken to have survived. The answer to this contention is that the later agreement by its substance destroyed those circumstances in the earlier contract which, and which alone, rendered either usual or proper the payment of salvage to the appellants. Under those circumstances, and in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, it must be assumed that the right to salvage on the part of the owners disappeared when the earlier agreement was modified.

In my judgment this is a very clear case. The appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

LORD FINLAY.—I entirely agree that the appeal in this case fails. The whole question is what was the effect of the transfer of these two tugs from what has been called the gross basis to the net basis. So long as the tugs were employed upon the gross basis the vessel was run by the owner, and he received a sum estimated on a footing that he was to incur all the expenses connected with the running of the vessel. When the basis was changed to the net basis that was entirely done away with. The expense of running the vessel was after that with the Admiralty, and the sum that was paid was, in effect, a sum only for the demise of the ship to the Admiralty. Now this change from the gross to the net basis took place in Sept. 1916 and in Jan. 1917, so that both vessels by Jan. 1917 were upon the net basis. Now what was the effect of that? The effect was that the crew were no longer in the service of the owner. It therefore became quite impossible that salvage services should be rendered on behalf of the owner, so that the owner would be entitled to receive payment for such salvage services. We had, if I may say so, a very interesting and admirable argument from Mr. Van den Berg upon this point, but I confess I remain entirely unconvinced. It seems to me that it really does not matter that the owners of these tugs did not think of what effect the change would have upon salvage. They agreed to the change being made, and the question is what in law is the result of that change, and it is utterly immaterial that it never occurred to the owners to think of what its effect would be upon any salvage that might be earned.

It was very much pressed upon us that the idea with regard to the Conqueror came from the owner of the Conqueror himself. In the case of the Conqueror, indeed, it was suggested by the master of the tug, and he wrote a letter addressed to his employers, the Elliott Steam Tug Company, saying that it was very desirable for the protection of the master and crew of the tug that they should wear the King's uniform. The phrase he used was that they might be shot as pirates if they were not in uniform and were caught doing the work they were doing. Of course if they were to wear the King's uniform then they must enter into the King's service. That letter of the 3rd Aug. was considered, with the result that, by the letters which passed in September, the master and crew were taken into the service of the Crown, the master receiving a temporary commission, and the basis of hire was altered from gross to net. The change was complete, and it matters not in the slightest degree that the reason which suggested the change was the desire, and the very proper desire, of the master and crew for the more complete protection which the King's uniform would give them. They could not wear the King's uniform without becoming the King's servants, and that really ends the matter.

In the case of the Warrior the proposal, I think, came from the Admiralty on the ground that the discipline of the men of the Warrior left something to be desired, and that it was necessary, in order that discipline should be completely established, that they should become the servants or become the crew of the Crown, and the men accordingly signed articles under the Admiralty I am not going to refer again to the letters which have just been read; it is perfectly clear that from that time they became the servants of the Crown. There again you have it perfectly clear that all possibility of the earning of salvage for the owners after that was cut away.

Then what remains of the case? It is simply this: The suggestion that although all that had taken place, you could spell out an agreement between the Admiralty and the owners of these tugs that any salvage after that earned by the Crown's servants in charge of these tugs should be handed over to the owners of the tugs. Well, I have listened attentively to all that has been said upon this point, and I really cannot find any trace of any such agreement. The truth is that when the change was completed and the parties agreed to the change, the owners of the tugs, and I daresay the Admiralty, never thought about its effect upon salvage; but the change was made, and the only question now is, in the absence of any extraordinary agreement such as that suggested to vary the rights of the parties, what in law is the effect of the transfer of the crews from the service of the owners of the tugs to the service of the Crown? I entirely agree that the appeal fails.

Lord SHAW.—I agree.

In the course of the argument I put to the learned counsel for the appellants this question: Was it or was it not admitted that at the time when these salvage services were rendered the tugs rendering these services were the subject of demise to the Admiralty? The learned counsel, after consideration, admitted, as was natural and necessary, that there was such a demise. The demise was effected by the change of the transaction between the Crown and the owners having been made from gross to net. That has two consequences. When a change takes place from gross to net the result of that transaction is a complete supersession of the gross agreement. It must necessarily be so, because under the net agreement, as has been admitted, a demise to the Crown takes place; the servants become the servants of the Crown, the salvage is rendered by the Crown through its servants, and not through the servants of the owners. The result in law accordingly is, first, supersession of the gross agreement; and, secondly—the consequence of the net agreement being what I have stated—a legal demise. The proposition in law which arises finally brings us to very familiar ground, but it is well stated in the judgment of Bailhache, J., which I thus quote: "The legal effect of a charter-party which is by way of demise is that if salvage services are rendered by a vessel under such a charter-party, and an award is made for such services, the money when an award is made for such services goes not to the owners but to the charterers, who have the vessel upon time charter." Hill, J., in the case of the Warrior, assented to that being a proper statement of the law; it was also assented to by the Court of Appeal, and I entirely agree with it.

Lord MOULTON.—I agree.

Lord SUMNER.—I agree, and I only desire to put it on record that as the point, which was elaborately discussed in the Court of Appeal, upon the true construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 and the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916 has not been raised in your Lordships' House it has been unnecessary for your Lordships either to express or to form any opinions as to its correctness.

THE DUSSELDORF. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Territorial waters of neutral country—Rights of neutral State—Expenses of removal of vessel improperly seized—Restitutio in integrum.

The German steamship D. was captured, through an error of judgment in computing the three-mile limit, by a British man-of-war, in Norwegian territorial waters, and proceedings were taken in the Prize Court for her condemnation. The vessel was released by the Prize Court, but the Norwegian Government claimed from the British Government, in addition to the delivery up of the ship and her cargo or its proceeds, all costs, fees, and expenses incidental to her removal and restitution, and an account of the profits made during the period of her requisition.

The Prize Court rejected the demand on the ground that the violation of neutral waters was unintentional and the result merely of an error of judgment.

The Norwegian Government appealed from so much of the order of the President as rejected their claim to costs and damages.

Held, that the claimants were entitled to such expenses of removing the vessel from British to other waters as might fall or would ultimately fall on them, but they were not entitled to the costs and fees payable to the Marshal of the Prize Court or to any sum for the requisition of the ship.

Decision of Lord Sterndale (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478; 122 L. T. Rep. 237; (1919) P. 245) varied.

APPEAL from a decree of Lord Sterndale, sitting as President of the Prize Court (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478; 122 L. T. Rep. 237; (1919) P. 245), on a claim by the Norwegian Government for damages and expenses incident to the capture of the German steamship Dusseldorf by H.M.S. Tay and Tyne in Norway's territorial waters and to her subsequent release.

The Dusseldorf was captured in Feb. 1918, and proceedings were taken in the Prize Court for her condemnation.

The Norwegian Government entered a claim that the vessel should be released and her cargo, together with damages and costs, on the ground that the capture took place within Norwegian territorial waters.

Lord Sterndale, P. on the 12th May 1919 ordered on the above ground that the ship and the appraised value of her cargo be released to the claimants' solicitors on their behalf; he, however, held that, as there was no intention to violate territorial waters, the claim to damages and costs should be rejected.

By an order made on the 30th June 1919 the President rejected a motion by the claimants that the Crown be directed (1) to account to the claimants for the profits received in respect of the use of the ship; (2) to reimburse the claimants in respect of the expenses in taking delivery of the ship and taking her to Norway; (3) to pay the expenses incurred by the Marshal in connection with the detention, care, and custody of the ship.

The Norwegian Government entered this appeal from so much of the order of the 12th May 1919 as rejected their claim to costs and damages and from the dismissal of the subsequent motion.

Sir Erle Richards, K.C. and Balloch for the appellants.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), Butler Aspinall, K.C., and Raeburn, K.C., for the Crown.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—In this case the Dusseldorf, a German ship, was making her way from Narvik, with a cargo of iron ore, down the Norwegian coast towards the entrance to the Baltic, and so to Emden. Her object was to keep within Norwegian territorial waters, so as to baffle capture by British men-of-war. She was taken by H.M.S Tay and Tyne, at a point off Buholmen and Grisholmen, which was, as it turned out, a little (say 200 yards) within the territorial limits. The learned President, Lord Sterndale, found that the commander of the Tay and Tyne had no intention of violating Norwegian neutrality, but that, by an error of judgment, which their Lordships consider to have been very pardonable, he conceived that the three-mile line should be drawn a little further to the east than its true position. It is plain that the German shipowners had a narrow and somewhat lucky escape, and that the sovereignty of Norway suffered the minimum of prejudice from this unintentional violation.

The present claim is made on behalf of His Majesty the King of Norway by the appellant, Mr. Waldemar Eckell, the Royal Norwegian Consul-General in London. His claim was, first, for delivery up of the Dusseldorf and her cargo or its proceeds; secondly, for the cost of removing her to Norway; thirdly, for costs and fees payable to the Marshal of the Prize Court or otherwise upon her delivery; and, fourthly, the vessel having been regularly requisitioned by His Majesty's Government pending the hearing before the Prize Court, for an account of profits made by the Crown from the use of the ship, or, alternatively, for payment of a reasonable sum for her use.

It may be well to consider in the first instance how this matter stands, apart from authority. In the vessel herself and her cargo, on their own account, the Norwegian Government have neither right, title, nor interest, nor had they ever even possession. The German owners have all the right and interest, and, in the absence of any treaty or convention dealing with the case, they can neither come before the court directly as claimants nor can they be allowed to do indirectly what is directly incompetent. Indeed, as against them, the capture is good, being the capture of enemy property; and the "claim of territory," as it is called, is one which is available to the territorial Sovereign only, and not to the private shipowner. These considerations, apart from the validity and effect of orders, regularly made, permitting the Admiralty to requisition the vessel, at once dispose of the fourth claim, namely, that for profits or freight or hire in respect of the benefit which the British Government obtained from requisitioning the vessel under the Prize Rules. If the appellant recovered any such sum, it would be held simply in the interest of the enemy owners. No claim has been made, nor has any evidence been given, on the footing that the Norwegian Government have come under any pecuniary liability to the owners of the Dusseldorf, nor is there any suggestion that the seizure involved them in any outlay or pecuniary disadvantage outside of these proceedings. No one would wish to make light of a violation of territorial sovereignty, but in itself this is a matter arising between Sovereigns and, apart from the peculiar position of captors who are bound to bring their alleged prize before the court, it would in itself be non-justiciable, for in effect the Prize Court would be called on to pronounce a decree, founded on the conduct of his officers, against the Sovereign in virtue of whose commission it is authorised to act, and to evaluate imponderable wrongs, which lie outside the category of those with which it is wont to deal.

A Court of Prize is not, as such, a disciplinary tribunal for officers in His Majesty's Navy, charged with the correction of errors committed by them while discharging their duties. Any complaint against such officers which the Government of Norway might have, and any claim for amends for an invasion of the territorial sovereignty of Norway, would fitly be preferred through diplomatic channels to His Majesty's Government for examination and redress.

The facts that the court found itself regularly in possession of the Dusseldorf, and subsequently made a regular order giving leave to requisition her, are at once the foundaion of the jurisdiction and the occasion of the Norwegian Government's appearance. It is a fortunate circumstance that the ancient practice, by which Courts of Prize entertain litigious claims of this kind made on behalf of neutral Powers, led long ago to the submission of one class of international questions, at any rate, to a judicial determination instead of to the arbitrament of arms, and so provided for a solution of vexed questions at once peaceful, honourable, and friendly. It may therefore well be that the rules, which apply to capture on the high seas, are by no means closely applicable to capture in neutral territorial waters. On the high seas, if there is reasonable ground for detention, the risk of it is one which even a neutral must run, and the appropriate remedy is the release of the ship in this country. In neutral waters, on the other hand, no capture should be made at all, and rules applicable to the high seas are not in pari materiâ. Simple release of the ship in this country to the claimant Sovereign may be an inadequate redress. The fact that the court has duly received into its charge and jurisdiction a ship, which ought not to have been seized at all, leads to the conclusion that the true claim of the appellant is for a restitutio in integrum, so far as the Government of Norway are concerned; but that, naturally as their Lordships would incline to a treatment of it as liberal and ungrudging as possible, they are still bound to act judicially and to follow legal principles and the decisions already given in Prize cases.

The authorities prior in date to the recent war are few in number and are somewhat indeterminate. In cases between captors and private owners the jurisdiction to award damages and costs against the former on the ground of their misconduct, or to refuse to give them in favour of the latter, where their conduct had been suspicious or irregular, was long ago well recognised, but the language used in stating the grounds of it was not uniform. Sometimes Sir William Scott spoke of such decrees as giving compensation to the suffering owners, whether the misconduct of the captors was intentional or not; sometimes they were made avowedly as a punishment to deter others, generally privateers, from the repetition of offences. In The Ostsee (9 Moore, P. C. 150) the Privy Council laid it down that the former is the better view, though, if so, it is not easy to appreciate the relevancy of inquiring whether the captors acted under a reasonable mistake. From such a jurisdiction little guidance is to be obtained in the present case. Of actual "claims of territory" but few are reported. There are three decisions of Sir William Scott—The Twee Gebroeders (3 C. Rob. 162), The Vrow Anna Catharina (5 C. Rob. 15), and The Anna (5 C. Rob. 373)—and during the present war, in addition to the present case, there have been The Lokken (26th July 1918), The Valeria (122 L. T. Rep. 751; (1920) P. 81), and The Pellworm (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 490; 123 L. T. Rep. 685; (1920) P. 347). No point has been argued in the present case as to the effect of the provisions of the Treaty of Versailles, such as was discussed in the Pellworm.

In the Vrow Anna Catharina Sir William Scott observes: "The sanctity of a claim of territory is undoubtedly very high. . . . When the fact is established it overrules every other consideration. The capture is done away, the property must be restored notwithstanding that it may actually belong to the enemy, and if the captor should appear to have erred wilfully, and not merely through ignorance, he would be subject to further punishment."

In the Twee Gebroeders the same great authority condemned the conduct of the captors as having been in violation of a neutral Sovereign's rights; but held that, as they had not intended to commit any wrong, and as it was not easy for them to have ascertained where the neutral boundary ran, they ought not to be held liable in damages and costs. On the other hand, in the Anna, which was the case of a privateer and not of a regular King's ship, there had been deliberate abuse of the territorial waters of the United States, and in a claim of territory restitution of the captured vessel was accompanied with a decree for payment of damages and costs. It does not appear what the measure of these damages was, or whether the Government of the United States had been put to actual expense by the conduct of the privateer.

In the present case there can be no doubt that the appellant was entitled to have the Dusseldorf (and the proceeds of the cargo) released to him on behalf of His Majesty the King of Norway. Had the naval officer's error been brought to the notice of the British Government forthwith, before the Dusseldorf was brought before the Prize Court, her prompt return to Norway on behalf of the Crown, with suitable expressions of regret and regard, would, it can hardly be doubted, have been an ample satisfaction to the King of Norway for the unintentional wrong done. In the event, which has happened, of the ship's being placed in the Prize Court, the question now is what further relief, if any, should be accorded to the claimant.

The learned President, Lord Sterndale, before whom this question was hardly sufficiently argued, decided, on the authority of the Twee Gebroeders, that there was no ground for decreeing such costs and damages to the claimant as it has been the practice to grant where the violation of neutrality has been high-handed, negligent or designed. If this were the sole ground on which the matter could be put, there can be no doubt that his decision ought to be affirmed.

It is, however, now on fuller argument contended that, as the right of the Norwegian Government is at least for restoration, this involves either the physical redelivery of the Dusseldorf in Norwegian waters, which is not really asked for, or the payment of the costs of her return voyage. The ground is that, if this be not so, the Norwegian Government must either pay this expense, and so suffer pecuniarily for the error of a British officer, or leave the German owners to navigate the vessel for themselves. In any case as between the Norwegian Government and persons whose property at the time of the seizure was within the territorial jurisdiction of the King of Norway and sub protectione regis, this would place his Government in the invidious position of leaving them without any redress at all for a seizure, which occurred notwithstanding their claim to the protection of the Norwegian Crown. There is a further matter for consideration, which is this. If the hearing had been completed and the release had been decreed, flagrante bello, as might have been the case, and if the Norwegian Government, to avoid expense and responsibility for which they would receive no recompense, had forthwith handed the Dusseldorf over to her owners before she had reached the security of neutral waters, she might have been captured again. In that case the Government of His Majesty the King of Norway might have been exposed to the observation that their proceedings resulted merely in the vindication of the public sovereignty of the kingdom of Norway without advantage or redress to the private rights, which had suffered interference while within the limits of that realm.

Their Lordships think that this argument is well founded, and that, alike from the necessity of performing and paying for the voyage to Norway at their own expense, and from the possibility of being exposed to any such reflection, the Norwegian Government ought to be protected. They are, therefore, entitled to costs of the voyage to Norway paid and borne by them. The claim for repayment of the marshal's fees and other similar sums rests on a different footing. Here the important points are that the ship came regularly into the custody of the officers of the court and, but for the requisitioning, which also was a regular proceeding, would have remained throughout in its charge, and so would have had the benefit of care and protection which would enure to enhance the vessel's value or avert depreciation. Even in the hands of the Admiralty, she has necessarily had the benefit of a certain amount of upkeep in the ordinary course of user, and there is no suggestion of ill-usage, neglect or wilful deterioration. Although, as now appears, the captors had no legal right to possession, they were in fact in possession in all good faith, and, in placing the ship and cargo in the custody of the Marshal, they acted in discharge of an obligation of a very binding character, from the observance of which it would be most inexpedient to deter persons in their position in any way. Further, in a matter of costs it is particularly necessary to observe settled rules of practice, for costs are always somewhat artificial matters and dependent on the practice of the court. It has been laid down in The Franciska (10 Moore, P. C. 73) by their Lordships' board that such costs as those now in question are properly charges on the property itself, because it is for the benefit of whom it may concern that the ship and cargo should be placed in the care and custody of the Marshal of the court. This decision is, of course, binding upon their Lordships, and they therefore think that these charges form a proper charge against the ship and fall to be discharged by those to whom she is delivered up, nor is it necessary or appropriate to inquire under what form or by what process, if any, they may be recovered over from the German owners.

It is possible that some part or the whole of the costs of transferring the Dusseldorf to neutral waters has been paid, or contracted to be paid, by her owners, and so has not fallen, or, if they perform their contract, will not ultimately fall, on the Government of Norway. In such a case the appellant will not recover them in these proceedings. In the result the appeal will be allowed with costs, and the decree of the President will be varied by directing that the appellant is entitled to be paid such expenses of removing the Dusseldorf from British waters to Norwegian or other neutral waters as may have fallen, or will ultimately fall, on the Government of Norway, but otherwise the decision of the President will be affirmed. The case will be remitted to the Prize Court to make the necessary formal decree and to direct a reference to the registrar. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to this effect.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, July 6, 1920.

(Before BANKES, WARRINGTON, and SCRUTTON, L.JJ.)

SPRINGER v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carrier—Perishable goods—Delay in transit—Strike of railway employees—Sale by necessity—Duty of carrier to communicate with owner of goods.

In Sept. 1918 the defendants contracted with the plaintiff to carry a consignment of tomatoes from Jersey to Covent Garden Market, London. There was no fixed period for delivery. The tomatoes were duly loaded on board the steamship C. at St. Helier, but the vessel was weatherbound there for about three days. By the time she arrived at Weymouth a strike had broken out among the defendants' employees, in consequence of which considerable delay occurred in unloading the vessel, and it became impossible to dispatch the goods to London by rail for an indefinite time. The cargo was already in bad condition. No attempt was made by the defendants to communicate with the owners and inform them of the state of things at Weymouth and of the condition of the cargo. The defendants decided that the best thing to do in the circumstances was to endeavour to sell the cargo as a whole forthwith, and that was done. Salter, J. (following Sims v. Midland Railway Company, 107 L. T. Rep. 700; (1913) 1 K. B. 103) held that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was a breach of contract to carry the goods unless the defendants could satisfy the court that it was commercially impracticable to communicate with the plaintiff and that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was really necessary. Whether communication with the owner is commercially practicable or not must depend on the facts of each case, but if communication is physically possible without disproportionate expense, and if there is reason to expect that instructions can be obtained before a final decision is made; then the carrier must at least attempt to obtain such instructions before he deals with the goods otherwise than under the express terms of the contract of carriage. He held on the facts that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was a breach of the contract of carriage and a wrongful conversion of the goods.

Held, on appeal, that the judgment of Salter, J. (infrà) was right.

ACTION in the non-jury list tried by Salter, J.

The plaintiff's claim was for 172*l.* 10*s.* damages for breach of duty in and about the carriage and delivery of goods by railway.

The plaintiff alleged that on or about the 19th Sept. 1918, the defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to carry for the plaintiff certain goods, namely, 198 half sieves of tomatoes from Jersey to Covent Garden Market, and there deliver them to the plaintiff for reward to the defendants. The defendants received the said 198 half sieves of tomatoes for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, but the defendants did not carry them from Jersey to Covent Garden Market or deliver them there to the plaintiff.

The defendants admitted that on or about the 19th Sept. 1918 they agreed with the plaintiff by and on the terms of a consignment note dated the said 19th Sept. 1918, and signed by Marks and Proctor Limited, his agents, to carry for the plaintiff from Jersey to Covent Garden Market, and there deliver to the plaintiff for reward to the defendants 198 half sieves of tomatoes which were on or about the said 19th Sept. 1918 delivered to the defendants by Marks and Proctor Limited.

The defendants said that it was provided by the consignment note that in respect to any goods booked through by the defendants or their agents for conveyance, partly by railway and partly by sea, the defendants should be exempted from liability for any loss, damage, or delay which might arise during the carriage of such goods by sea from any or every danger or accident of the seas, rivers or navigation of whatever nature or kind soever in the same manner as if the defendants had signed and delivered to the consignors a bill of lading containing conditions to that effect.

By the agreement it became and was the duty of the defendants (subject to the terms thereof) to exercise all reasonable care and to take all reasonable steps to procure that the tomatoes should be safely carried to their destination aforesaid within a reasonable time, but the defendants were not by the agreement laid under any further or higher duty. The defendants admitted that the tomatoes had not in fact been carried to their destination, but by reason of certain matters alleged the defendants said that they had fulfilled their duty in that they had exercised all reasonable care and taken all reasonable steps, and had not been guilty of any delay, and that they were not liable to the plaintiff.

The defendants alleged that in the exercise of powers had by them under the Defence of the Realm Acts or otherwise, the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty directed and compelled the defendants to load and carry all goods delivered to the defendants for carriage from the Channel Islands to England in certain vessels which were not the property of nor in any way under the control or in the possession of the defendants, and further directed and compelled such vessels to sail from the Channel Islands by first proceeding to Cherbourg and then sailing thence under convoy to Weymouth.

In pursuance of such direction and compulsion the defendants loaded the tomatoes so delivered to them as aforesaid on the steamship Croham on the 20th Sept. 1918. On the 20th, 21st, 22nd, and part of the 23rd Sept. 1918 there was a westerly gale in the Channel, and the master of the Croham could not, or would not, sail until the evening of the 23rd Sept. 1918.

On the evening of the 23rd Sept. 1918 the Croham sailed from Jersey and proceeded with due dispatch thence to Cherbourg in pursuance of the directions and compulsion aforesaid, and was thence convoyed to Weymouth, arriving there at or about 12.45 p.m. on the 24th Sept. 1918.

By reason of a strike of the defendants' railway servants at Weymouth and elsewhere it was difficult (and impossible without substantial delay) to discharge the cargo of the Croham and impossible to forward the same or any part thereof by rail or in any other way to its destination. The cargo (including the tomatoes) was unloaded by hand on to the quay at Weymouth on or about the 26th Sept. 1918, and it then appeared that part of the cargo, which consisted wholly of tomatoes, was already unfit for human consumption, and that the remainder would shortly become so unless it were promptly consumed. In the circumstances, the best course to be adopted by the defendants in the interests of the owners of the cargo and the only course which would avoid the cargo becoming wholly useless and valueless was to sell it immediately in the locality for what it would fetch, and in the circumstances it was practically impossible to communicate with the consignors or consignees of the cargo (including the plaintiff) and ask for instructions before selling the cargo without the same becoming meanwhile wholly unsaleable.

The defendants on the 26th Sept. 1918 sold the cargo in the locality for what it would fetch.

Further, in the alternative the defendants in the circumstances claimed that they were excused from further fulfilment of the agreement, the damage and delay being due to the damages of the seas or navigation.

The defendants counter-claimed for freight.

The plaintiff admitted that in respect of the delay of the Croham in arriving at Weymouth—she was three days overdue, owing to having been weatherbound—the defendants were protected by the conditions of the consignment note.

The plaintiff stated in his evidence that if the defendants had communicated with him he could have sent a motor lorry to Weymouth to carry his tomatoes to London. Part of the cargo, including the plaintiff's tomatoes was sent by the purchaser to London by train on the 27th and was sold in Covent Garden Market on the 28th.

Colam, K.C. and F. O. Robinson for the plaintiff.

Barrington-Ward, K.C. and Wilfrid Lewis for the defendants.—It is the duty of a common carrier to carry the goods safely and to deliver them. There is the further obligation to deliver within a reasonable time, looking at all the circumstances of the case, and he is not responsible for delay arising from causes beyond his control. See Taylor v. Great Northern Railway, 14 L. T. Rep. 363; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 385.

An excuse for failure to deliver is afforded by act of God, King's enemies, and inherent vice:

Anson on Contracts, 14th edit., p. 337;
Lister v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 88 L. T. Rep. 561; (1903) 1 K. B. 878.

A further duty arises that all reasonable steps shall be taken to preserve the goods in existence, and if not to obtain their value:

Sims v. Midland Railway Company, 107 L. T. Rep. 700; (1903) 1 K. B. 103;
Great Northern Railway Company v. Swaffield, 30 L. T. Rep. 562; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 132.

So long as the goods are in esse, it is the duty of the carrier to keep them in that state and he can recover expense incurred in so doing. The conditions governing a sale by necessity are correctly stated by Scrutton, L.J. in Sims v. Midland Railway Company viz. (1) that a real necessity must exist for the sale; and (2) that it must be practically impossible to get the owners' instructions in time. In this case, it is clear on the facts that the carrier could not obtain instructions from the consignee before the sale. It was not possible from a business point of view to communicate with the consignee. Communication with the owner is not an absolute requirement, but only if it is reasonable. See Carver on Carriage of Goods by Sea, ss. 297, 298.

In this case communication would have been useless. "Practicable" in this connection means likely to be productive of beneficial results. Tomatoes are affected with inherent vice in the sense that they were in danger of immediate perishing. With whom were the defendants to communicate, the senders or the consignees? [Salter, J.—Would it not be the person with whom the contract of carriage was made?] A different standard must be applied when dealing with perishable goods:

Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company v. Huth, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 369; 44 L. T. Rep. 67; 16 Ch. Div. 474, at p. 483.

Colam, K.C. in reply.—The general principle is laid down in Australasian Steam Navigation Company v. Morse (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 407; 27 L. T. Rep. 357; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 222, at p. 228). The defendants were under an obligation to communicate with someone. It was wrong to say that if it was impossible to communicate with all, they might sell without communicating with any. Whether the goods are perishable or not, there is no right to sell without communicating with the owner, if possible to do so:

Acatos v. Burns, 47 L. J. 566, Ex.; 3 Ex. Div. 282.

It is not sufficient to prove that the master thought he was doing his best for all concerned, or even that the course which was adopted was the best. Nothing but necessity can authorise the master to do anything other than carry the goods to their destination. The defendants cannot justify selling, unless they have communicated with the plaintiff, or it was impossible to do so. But there was no necessity to sell the goods. They were not bad. The difficulty of sorting good from bad was not a reason for selling the good and the bad. But in fact on the quay the good were separated from the bad and defendants could have communicated with the owners. The sale was a tort unless it can be justified.

Cur. adv. vult.

Salter, J.—In this case, the plaintiff claims damages for breach of a contract of carriage. On the 19th Sept. 1918, the defendants contracted with the plaintiff to carry 198 half sieves of tomatoes, the property of the plaintiff, from St. Helier to Covent Garden. There was no fixed period for delivery. On that day the goods were picked and taken to the wharf at St. Helier, and on the following day, Friday, the 20th, they were put on board the steamship Croham, forming part of a cargo of of 1780 tons odd. The Croham was weatherbound at St. Helier from Friday, the 20th, to Monday, the 23rd Sept. She sailed on the evening of that day and arrived at Weymouth at 12.45 p.m. on Tuesday, the 24th. That morning a strike had broken out at Weymouth, involving certain classes of the defendant's employees. The strike affected large areas of the defendant's system, and was of an extensive and serious character. There is no evidence that it was due to any fault of the defendants, or that it could have been foreseen or prevented by them. One result of this strike was that no further dispatch of goods by rail from Weymouth could be made for an indefinite time. Another result was to greatly retard the unloading of goods in the harbour, and the third result was that it became commercially impracticable to sort out the goods of the different owners of the cargo so as to deal separately with each consignment.

There were three classes of labour then available at the quay; first, the crane men and other servants of the defendants; then a force of 150 soldiers from a labour battalion; and lastly a small body of casual civilian labourers. On the 24th Sept. a vessel called the Lady Tennant was being unloaded. When that job was finished on the evening of that day the railwaymen ceased work, leaving only unskilled labour and no tackle.

Next in turn was the Ibex, which had to be unloaded and reloaded. This would take all day on the 25th, so that the cargo of the Croham could not be unloaded till Thursday, the 26th, and then could not be forwarded unless the strike was at an end.

This was the state of things when the Croham arrived shortly after mid-day on Tuesday, the 24th. She was three days overdue, and was a bad boat. Mr. Boyle, the defendants' traffic agent at Weymouth, was anxious as to the condition of this cargo. He said: "I expected trouble from the moment the strike began on Tuesday morning, and from the cargo having been so long on board." He sent his head clerk, Gill, on board at once. Gill examined the cargo and reported unfavourably.

The position, therefore, was that the cargo was already in bad condition; that it could not be touched till the Thursday; and the further transport was impossible for an indefinite time. In these circumstances it was, in my opinion, the duty of the defendants under the contract of carriage, to endeavour to communicate with the owners of the cargo without delay. No attempt to do this was ever made. The hatches were removed and wind sails erected, but nothing was done, and nothing could be done, to remove the cargo till Thursday, the 26th.

On that day the unloading of the Croham began at 6 a.m. and was finished at 10 p.m. The goods were unloaded by hand on to the quay and stacked in three classes: (1) Those fit to be forwarded, (2) those which could be forwarded after the baskets had been repaired, and (3) those unfit to be forwarded. The condition of the cargo varied a good deal; on the whole it was bad.

About ten o'clock Mr. Boyle came to the quay, and after examining the goods decided that in the circumstances it would be best to endeavour to sell the cargo as a whole forthwith. He communicated with Mr. Drake and Mr. Digby, local fruit merchants of good position, and after negotiation he sold 13,730 parcels to Mr. Drake and 3179 to Mr. Digby. The remaining 900 were either unsaleable or were sold to casual local buyers. Drake and Digby bought at 2*s.* per parcel, all over. I gather from the evidence of Digby and Albert Nash that much the larger part of this cargo consisted of 12lb. parcels; so that the price obtained by Mr. Boyle was much more than 2*s.* per half sieve—probably nearer 4*s.*

At two o'clock in the afternoon of the day the strike ended as suddenly as it had begun. There was no evidence that this event could have been foreseen by Mr. Boyle or his superior. On the contrary, I am satisfied that when he sold the cargo that morning he had good reason to assume that further transit by rail would be impossible.

When the Croham arrived on the 24th Mr. Boyle was in possession of documents which would have enabled him to communicate directly and forthwith by telegraph and telephone with the Covent Garden consignees, among whom was the plaintiff. He could not communicate directly with the other consignees, but through St. Helier certainly, and through Paddington probably, he could have communicated promptly with most of the consignees, probably with all of them. He could have received their instructions by telegraph and telephone in the course of the 24th and 25th, and by the morning of the 26th he could have been in receipt of written instructions.

The sale of the plaintiff's goods is a breach of the contract to carry them to London, unless the defendants can satisfy me (1) that it was commercially impracticable to communicate with the plaintiff, and (2) that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was really necessary: (Sims and Co. v. Midland Railway Company (sup.). Whether communication with the owner is commercially practicable or not must depend on the facts of each case, but I think it is safe to say that if communication is physically possible without disproportionate expense, and if there is reason to expect that instructions can be obtained before a final decision must be made, then the carrier must at least attempt to obtain such instructions before he deals with the goods otherwise than under the express terms of the contract of carriage.

It was contended that if Mr. Boyle had communicated with the owners he would have received conflicting instructions, and that his difficulty would not have been removed and might have been increased. To my mind this is no answer. It is true that the defendants could not deal separately with each consignment, but in many cases the owners could. The plaintiff, if informed, would certainly have sent a lorry with men, who would have picked out his goods when taken from the ship, and brought them to London. There is no doubt that many other owners would have taken a similar course. But apart from this, I cannot accept the contention that it is for the carrier to judge whether a useful purpose would be served by communicating with the owner. A bailee cannot claim to be an agent of necessity if his principal is commercially accessible and the bailee makes no attempt to get instructions.

For these reasons I think that the sale of the plaintiff's goods was a breach of the contract of carriage and a wrongful conversion of the goods. As the plaintiff has not, in fact, received any part of the proceeds of the sale, he is entitled to obtain as damages the sum his goods would have realised if there had been no breach of contract. To ascertain this sum, I must assume that the plaintiff would have received information on the 24th or 25th. He owns motor lorries, and stated that he would have sent one to fetch the goods. I do not doubt that he would. Owing to the strike, the London market was insufficiently supplied, and tomatoes were realising good prices. I think that the goods would have reached Covent Garden at the latest in time for the early market on the 28th. To help me to determine what they would then have realised I have the following evidence. Mr. Drake sent 4578 parcels, part of his purchase, to Covent Garden on the evening of the 27th, consigned to his agent, Mr. Bradenham. The goods travelled in trucks attached to a passenger train, at three times the ordinary goods rates, and at his own risk. These parcels were not selected. They realised slightly more than 3*s.* 6*d.* per parcel net. The cargo of the Croham seems to have been mainly 12lb. parcels; so that the half sieves in this consignment probably realised nearly 7*s.* net. The evidence as to this consignment was that some of it was in awful condition. There was about 5 per cent. unsaleable. The plaintiff's goods were not quite sound, but better than the average, and the whole would have been worthless by Monday. About 11 a.m. that day, Saturday, the 28th, a lot of 239 half sieves, part of the 4578 parcels, was delivered by the defendants to Mr. Bradenham, and immediately sold by him. Of this lot about 150 or 160 were the plaintiff's goods. This lot realised an average of 8*s.*

I have carefully considered all the evidence as to the prices realised at Covent Garden by Jersey tomatoes on the 27th and 28th Sept. I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff's goods, if brought to London by motor and carefully sold at the early market on the 28th would have realised at the most an average of 10*s.* the half sieve net, including the sixteen half sieves of second quality, that is 99*l.* From this must be deducted the cost of the journey by motor, which the plaintiff put at about 2*s.* a mile each way, that is 28*l.* That leaves 71*l.* I allow 2*l.* 8*s.* on the sixteen half sieves missing, and 2*l.* 10*s.* for the lids, making altogether 75*l.* 18*s.* due to the plaintiff.

The counter-claim fails, as the freight was not earned. There will be judgment for the plaintiff on the claim and counter-claim for 75*l.* 18*s.* with costs, and an order that the money in court be paid out to the plaintiff or his solicitors in part discharge.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendants appealed.

Barrington-Ward, K.C. and Wilfred Lewis for the appellants.

Colam, K.C. and F. O. Robinson for the respondent.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Salter, J. and no complaint is made that the learned judge misconceived the law applicable to the case. But what is said is that the facts did not justify his application of them.

The short facts were these, that the plaintiff, who apparently carried on business in Covent Garden, was the consignee of a considerable quantity of tomatoes which were packed in baskets bearing his name and consigned from Jersey in a vessel called the Croham. The defendants had undertaken the carriage of those goods. The vessel was unfortunately detained by weather for a considerable time in the harbour in Jersey. She made a slow passage and arrived at Weymouth on the 24th Sept., three days after the goods had been put on board. Unfortunately when she arrived a strike broke out amongst the railway employees, and, as there were two other vessels to be discharged at the berth before her turn came, it was not possible to start discharging her until Thursday, the 28th Sept., by which time a very considerable quantity of these tomatoes were in an unmerchantable condition. The defendants sold the whole cargo locally without communicating with any of the consignees before they did so, and the plaintiff's case was: "You ought to have communicated with me at the earliest possible moment when you realised that it would probably be impossible to complete the carriage of these goods by delivery at Covent Garden, and given me the opportunity of deciding for myself whether you should sell them locally, or whether I should try myself either to take them away or sell them myself locally; and because you did not do that you have committed a breach of your duty as carrier and are responsible to me in damages." It is admitted that the law is laid down correctly in Sims v. Midland Railway Company (107 L. T. Rep. 700; (1913), 1 K. B. 113) in the judgment of Scrutton, J., and he, referring to a passage in Mr. Carver's book on Carriage by Sea, says "that the conditions necessary in order to make a sale by the carrier without notice valid are, first, a real necessity must exist for the sale, and, secondly, that it must be practically impossible to get the owner's instructions in time as to what should be done."

The whole cargo was sold on the 26th Sept., and if the defendants were entitled to treat the whole cargo of tomatoes as one indivisible lot, there is no doubt that the sale was justified. But there is a very serious question as to whether they were so entitled. There is a preliminary question as to whether or not, under the circumstances, it was practically impossible to get the owner's instructions before the 26th Sept. as to what should be done. With regard to that, one has to consider what opportunity the defendants' representatives had of forming a judgment as to what the condition of these tomatoes was upon the arrival of the vessel, or soon after, and forming a judgment as to whether it would be at all likely that it would be possible to send these goods on in merchantable state, and whether it was not obvious that, under the circumstances prevailing, a sale would have to take place. The position is this: The vessel arrived about 12.45 p.m. on Tuesday, the 24th Sept., and Mr. Boyle, who is in charge for the defendants company at Weymouth, when the vessel arrived, sent his representative, Mr. Gill, a clerk, on board, and Mr. Gill states in his evidence what he found the condition of things to be. He said: "The top tiers were very badly heated and overripe. Almost made me sick. The tomatoes were half-cooked." That he must have reported to his superior officer, and the superior officer's condition of mind before he received that report was, as he expresses it in his own evidence, "I expected trouble the moment the strike began, Tuesday morning, and from the cargo having been on board so long." Under those circumstances one asks oneself what conclusion must this experienced gentleman have come to? He was faced with this condition of things: a vessel arriving long overdue with a cargo of tomatoes—a perishable cargo—with a strike just broken out, the continuance of which no one could foretell. It had apparently begun in South Wales and spread to Weymouth, but whether it was going to last a day, or two days, or a fortnight, or a month, apparently no one at that time could tell. There were two vessels at the berth which had to be dealt with before this vessel could commence her discharge. I cannot conceive it possible that that gentleman should have come to any other conclusion than that a sale of these goods was inevitable, if they were to be disposed of at all in anything like a merchantable condition. If that is so, it seems to me that the duty of the railway company was to communicate immediately with the consignee. That they did not do, and for that Salter, J. has held them responsible, and in that view I entirely concur.

It appears now from the evidence that Mr. Boyle has, I think, misconceived what the purpose and object of communicating with the consignee is. It is to enable him to give the railway company instructions as to whether they shall sell if they consider necessary or whether they shall refrain from selling. But Mr. Boyle's reason for not communicating with the consignee is something different. He says: "I did not consider whether to notify the consignee or not, the reason being that I could not tell him the condition of his lot." It was quite true he could not tell him the condition of the lot, but what he could tell him was that he had formed the conclusion that it would be absolutely necessary in all human probability to dispose of these goods locally if they were to be saved at all, and to ask the consignee if he wished him to do that which he found to be necessary, or did he wish to deal with them himself. That sort of communication would have met the situation and relieved the defendants from liability.

As I have said, I entirely agree with the view which the learned judge took. It now turns out, from a telephone communication which has been discovered by my brother Scrutton, which was apparently not brought to the attention of the judge, that that is the view this gentleman himself entertained and communicated to his employers at Paddington.

In my opinion this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—I agree.

Scrutton, L.J.—I agree. The railway company in this case have sold somebody else's goods, and they have not the right to sell other people's goods unless they can establish certain conditions. They are agents to carry the goods, and not to sell them. To sell them, circumstances must exist which put them in the position of agents of necessity for the owners, to take the action which is necessary in the interests of the owners. Those conditions do not arise if the railway company can communicate with the owners and get their instructions. If the railway company can ask the owner what is to be done in the circumstances with any reasonable chance of getting an answer, they have no business to take upon themselves the sale of the property. They must give the owner a chance of deciding the way in which he will deal with the property, and very often he knows very much better than the railway company what is the best thing to do. The railway company, from the nature of things, cannot be experienced in dealing with every class of property which they carry, whereas the owner in the trade does know the best way of disposing of the particular kind of goods which it is his business to deal in. The first thing which the railway company must show to justify their selling the goods is that it was impossible commercially to communicate with the owner and receive instructions from him. If they show that, they must then justify the sale by showing that it was the only reasonable business course to take in the circumstances. In this case, on the 24th Sept., when the goods came into Weymouth in a ship three days late, with a strike on, it was fairly obvious that there was a serious risk of the goods not getting to London in a condition which would justify their being sent on. Under those circumstances, in my view it was the duty of the railway company to ask the consignee for instructions if there was any commercial possibility of their getting through. They were not entitled to take it upon themselves to settle what should be done with the goods if they could with any reasonable commercial probability obtain instructions from the owner. That there was such a probability of loss on the 24th is, I think, obvious from the document which we have found in the documents handed up to us—the telephone communication of the 24th. It shows that on the 24th Sept. it had been determined to sell the goods locally, pointing to the fact that on that day it was thought extremely probable that the duration of the strike, combined with the probability of sea damage through the prolonged voyage, might render it desirable to dispose of the tomatoes in some way other than by carriage. Was it commercially impossible on the 24th Sept. to communicate with the consignee at Covent Garden? The question answers itself. Of course, it was not commercially impossible. The reason why Mr. Boyle seems to have not communicated is that he did not then know the exact state of the tomatoes, and consequently could not give the fullest information to the consignee. That was not a reason which justified him in not communicating. He should, in my view, have communicated with the consignee, stating the probable delay, anything he knew about the condition of the goods, and asking for instructions as to what he should do. It is quite obvious that the consignee would then have had the opportunity of deciding: Shall I leave it to the man on the spot who knows more about the conditions locally, or shall I send down a motor lorry to get my goods and bring them up? In fact, it appears that this particular lot of goods in good packages was in a fairly good condition, and I think the second mistake that Mr. Boyle made is to think that he can sell goods in good condition because it is to the best interest of goods in bad condition. Of course, if you have an all-over price, good, bad and indifferent, it is a very good thing for the indifferent goods that you put into the sale, and it is a very bad thing for the good goods that you put into the sale—they will fetch less than they otherwise would have fetched, and the indifferent goods will fetch more than they otherwise would have fetched. Mr. Boyle seems to me to have been under the mistaken impression that some sort of law of general average applies to goods when they come out of a ship, and that you can treat them as a sort of general adventure and sacrifice the good goods for the benefit of the bad goods.

As to the law, I hope I correctly stated it in Sims v. Midland Railway Company (sup.), which seems to me to be accurate. I do not gather that it is disputed in this case. What is disputed is the application of it, and on the facts of this case it seems to me that if one is to consider, as I said one has, whether there was a reasonable business necessity for the sale, with a view to the probable duration of the strike, and the nature of the goods, and whether it was possible to communicate with the consignees and obtain their instructions as to the sale it was doubtful, even on the 24th Sept., as to what was the best thing to do—whether to get motor traffic to take away the consignments or to sell them there. But there was time to communicate with the consignee, and it was commercially possible to communicate with the consignee and to ask him what he wished done with the goods. That being so, the railway company were bound to communicate with the consignee, and were not entitled to take upon themselves the burden of deciding the question which the consignee ought to be the person to decide.

For these reasons I agree with the judgment which has been given by my Lord.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Sale of goods—Sale—Goods in lighters—"Ex store"—"Ex warehouse."

The defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiffs to buy certain cases of tinned meat "ex-store Rotterdam." The goods had arrived in Rotterdam some months earlier and had been landed on the quay, but, owing to great congestion at the port, they could not be put into a warehouse, but were stored in lighters, where they were at the date of the contract and afterwards.

(a) Reported by W. C. Sandford, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the goods being in lighters could not properly be described as "ex store," and that the buyers were entitled to repudiate the contract.

Judgment of Bailhache, J. (1920) 2 K. B. 329) reversed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Bailhache, J.

The defendants were a company registered in the United Kingdom and carrying on business in London. They were a branch of Armour and Co., of Chicago, packers and exporters of meat. Another branch of the same undertaking was incorporated under the Dutch law in Rotterdam. The branches acted occasionally as agents for one another.

In July 1919 the defendants had in their possession 7573 cases of boiled beef which they had bought in South America and consigned on board the steamship Sheridan to the Rotterdam branch. During the latter half of the year 1919 the port of Rotterdam was much congested. Great quantities of goods had been consigned to the port in expectation of demands from Germany. This expectation was not fulfilled, and consequently there was more merchandise in the port than the warehouses could accommodate. There were lying in the port lighters of very large capacity used for the transport of goods on the Rhine, and much of the merchandise in the port of Rotterdam was stored in these lighters for want of room elsewhere. The goods in question had arrived at Rotterdam on board the Sheridan in July and had been landed on to a quay, but were afterwards stored in lighters, as the Rotterdam branch could find no space for them in any of the warehouses.

On the 4th Nov. the plaintiffs, a firm of merchants in London, wished to buy 500 cases of boiled beef. Their manager, Mr. W. J. Woodward, applied to the defendants' manager, Mr. S. Herbert, who agreed to sell subject to confirmation 500 cases out of the stock at Rotterdam. Correspondence subsequently passed between the parties with reference to the contract.

On the 10th Feb. 1920 the plaintiffs issued a writ against the defendants claiming 2500*l.* and other sums for insurance and damages. In their statement of claim they alleged: (Par. 1) That by a verbal contract made on the 4th Nov. 1919 between one W. J. Woodward as agent for the plaintiffs and one S. Herbert as agent for the defendants, the defendants agreed to sell to the plaintiffs 500 cases of South American boiled beef lying in store at Rotterdam at $22.25 per case, and that the contract was confirmed by letters from the defendants, the first dated the 12th Nov., inclosing an invoice dated the 8th Nov., and the other dated the 14th Nov. 1919; (par. 2) that it was a condition of the contract, and that the defendants by their agent warranted that the goods were then lying in a store or warehouse at Rotterdam; (par. 3) that relying on that condition and on the warranty of the defendants given by their agent Herbert, the plaintiffs paid 2500*l.* and received a delivery order for the goods; (par. 5) that on or about the 12th Dec. 1919 it came to the plaintiffs' knowledge through their agent, W. J. Woodward, who was then in Rotterdam, that the goods were not in store but were in lighters; and (par. 6) that by reason of the premises the plaintiffs became and were entitled to repudiate the contract, which they did by letter dated the 16th Dec. 1919 to the defendants.

The defendants admitted that a contract was made on the 4th Nov. between W. J. Woodward on behalf of the plaintiffs and S. Herbert on behalf of the defendants, but said that by that contract the defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiffs agreed to buy 500 cases of South American boiled beef spot Rotterdam, and not "lying in store," as alleged by the plaintiffs. They said that this contract was confirmed by a letter of the plaintiffs of the 4th Nov., and they admitted and referred to letters of the 12th Nov. and 14th and to an invoice of the 8th Nov. They counter-claimed 179*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, the balance of the contract price.

It appeared from the evidence that the general prevailing condition of the port of Rotterdam was known to the plaintiffs at the date of the contract. A witness called for the plaintiffs stated that goods in a lighter or a ship could not be described as "ex store," and that "store" meant a public or private warehouse.

Bailhache, J. found as a fact that the plaintiffs' agent, W. J. Woodward, had tried to sell the goods and had asked the defendants' agent at Rotterdam to sell them for him after he had learnt that they were not in a store but in lighters. The learned judge held that the words "ex store" applied to goods stored in lighters, and gave judgment for the defendants (1920) 2 K. B. 329).

The plaintiffs appealed.

Patrick Hastings, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt for the appellants.—The judgment of Bailhache, J. was wrong. "Ex store" has reference to goods on land and not to goods afloat in lighters. "Ex warehouse" and "ex store" mean much the same thing. As "ex store" in common parlance refers to goods on land, if the defendants contend that the expression was used here in another sense, they must show that the plaintiffs understood it was being used in that other sense. The plaintiffs did not know that goods were being stored at Rotterdam in lighters and sold as "ex store." The decision of Bailhache, J. came as a surprise to the commercial world.

Stuart Bevan, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the respondents.—The judgment of Bailhache, J. has been misunderstood. The learned judge never meant to lay down that in general "ex store" includes "ex lighter." All he meant to hold was that, in the particular circumstances of this case the goods answered the conditions of the contract. The plaintiffs knew that there was great congestion at Rotterdam. "Ex store" in the contract only meant that the goods were not sold ex ship. [Scrutton, L.J.—Would an insurance of goods in store, a land risk, cover goods in a lighter, a marine risk?] That depends on the nature of the goods and the nature of the store—e.g., explosives are frequently stored in hulks. The meaning of "ex store" is different in different ports. Secondly, "ex store" was not a term of the contract; thirdly, the plaintiffs attempted to resell the goods after learning that they were stored in lighters and have waived any right to repudiate the contract.

No reply was called for.

Bankes, L.J.—The judgment of Bailhache, J. has been taken as defining generally the meaning of the expression "ex store" as applied to goods the subject of a sale, and we are informed that merchants view the judgment as disturbing the course of business, as not being in accordance with the generally accepted meaning of those words. The judgment was not, I think, so intended, and Mr. Bevan does not uphold it as a judgment of general application; but he says that in the particular circumstances of this case Bailhache, J. came to the right conclusion.

Two points were raised on this appeal; first, whether the contract was one for the sale of goods "ex store"; secondly, assuming that it was, what is the meaning of that expression in this particular contract? The appellants, in their pleading, alleged a verbal contract made on the 4th Nov. 1919; the respondents admitted a verbal contract; and both parties pleaded that the contract was confirmed by letters which passed between them. In truth, the correspondence does not confirm the verbal contract alleged by the appellants, but it is common ground that the contract was made verbally between Mr. Woodward as agent for the appellants and Mr. Herbert as agent for the respondents, and its terms have therefore to be gathered from the evidence of those two persons, both of whom were called as witnesses and each of whom had an opportunity of stating what the contract was. Mr. Woodward says it was a contract for the purchase and sale of a quantity of boiled beef "ex store Rotterdam." Mr. Herbert does not dispute this; in his letter of the 14th Nov. he spontaneously describes the contract as a purchase by the plaintiffs "ex store Rotterdam." Upon this question Bailhache, J. does not express a very clear opinion; in the view he took it was not necessary to decide the question, and he was content to take the contract as one for the purchase of goods "ex store Rotterdam." I have no hesitation in saying that the contract was for the purchase of goods "ex store Rotterdam."

Then what is the meaning of "ex store" apart from special circumstances? It is easier to say what is not "ex store" than to give a complete definition of what is "ex store." I should say most decidedly that goods ex lighter or goods ex wharf are not goods "ex store." That seems to be also the defendants' view. Their sales manager said: "We always offer our goods ex quay and/or warehouse and/or lighter," for the reason, surely, that each was to be distinguished from the others. Mr. Bevan contended that the judgment of Bailhache, J. was not to be treated as one of general application, but as having reference to the particular facts of this case and that under the conditions prevailing in the port of Rotterdam these goods might properly be described as "ex store." I could understand the view of the learned judge if the appellants knew that goods of this kind were being stored in all sorts of places which could not ordinarily be described as stores, and if they entered into this contract to buy goods "ex store" knowing that the goods might be in a lighter or in a ship or under a shed; but there is no evidence that the appellants knew this, and I do not read the judgment as based upon any inference that they did. If a person sells foods to another and uses an expression well known to have a special meaning among business men, he will be bound by that meaning unless he gives evidence that he told his purchasers, or that they knew without his telling them, that the expression was being used in a special sense. There is nothing in this case to suggest that the words were being used with any but their ordinary meaning and they must be read in their generally accepted sense. A witness having special knowledge was called to say what that sense was; he said that goods in a lighter or in a ship could not properly be described as "ex store," and went on to say "a store is a public or private warehouse." The learned judge differed with this definition. I think, myself, it is unwise to attempt a definition of a store; stores must vary greatly in size, capacity, and description according to the place where they are situate and the goods they are intended to hold; and therefore I am content to accept the other part of the witness's evidence, which accords with my own experience, where he said "goods in a lighter or ship cannot be described as 'ex store.'"

For these reasons I think the appellants are right in saying that these goods, which at the time of the sale were in lighters, could not properly be described as sold "ex store," and that they were justified in repudiating the bargain and insisting on repayment of the purchase price which they had paid. The appeal must be allowed; judgment must be entered for the appellants, and the counterclaim will be dismissed.

Scrutton, L.J.—I agree. The first question is whether the contract between the parties included a contractual description of the goods as "ex store." It seems plain to me on the evidence that this was the agreement. It was a verbal agreement. If it had been necessary to consider whether there was a memorandum in writing of that agreement to satisfy sect. 17 of the Statute of Frauds or sect. 4 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 the letter of the 14th Nov. signed by the respondents would have been sufficient, inasmuch as it contained the description "ex store" and a reference to "the 500 cases . . . boiled beef which you recently bought from us," which would have let in parol evidence of the other terms of the contract. That letter signed by the respondents coupled with the telegram they sent on the 15th Dec. strongly confirms my view. I begin therefore with a contract for the sale of goods "ex store."

The second question is whether generally, which Mr. Bevan does not assert, or in the special circumstances of the port of Rotterdam at this time, goods lying afloat in a lighter could be described as "ex store." I am not quite clear whether the learned judge meant to decide this question in view of the special circumstances of the port or on the general meaning of the word "store." If he founded his decision on this latter ground, I should both on the evidence and from my own experience disagree with the opinion that "ex store" could cover "ex lighter" or "ex quay." When goods in a lighter are insured the risk is a marine risk. If they are in a store the risk is, in my view, a land risk. I do not propose a definition of the word "store" which will cover all its meanings whatever be the trade or the port in question. The meaning varies with the subject-matter and its surroundings. Personally I have no doubt that, applied to frozen meat, "ex store" means ex refrigerating store and that a vendor who having sold frozen meat ex store tendered meat off the quay would be quickly brought to his senses by the purchaser or anyone else in the trade to whom he tendered it. "Store" in various ports may have different meanings; but one thing is clear, that in general "ex store" indicates storage on land. Mr. Bevan indeed did not argue that as a general proposition "ex store" would indicate a marine risk in a lighter afloat; he has argued that it was generally known that there was congestion in the port of Rotterdam and that anybody purchasing "ex store" must be taken to know that in a time of congestion goods may be stored in all sorts of odd places, and that any of these places may be a store. I asked whether the same wide meaning might be given to the word "warehouse" in time of congestion, and whether goods in any of these odd places might be described as sold "ex warehouse." Mr. Bevan thought that would be carrying the doctrine of congestion a little too far in its effect upon the meaning of the English language. I think the same strain is put upon the language when the word "store" is made to include any place where goods may happen to be in time of congestion. The evidence of the appellants' knowledge of the actual facts only amounts to this, that they knew the port was congested, but knew nothing about lighters being employed for storing the goods. When a seller in describing the goods to be sold uses an ordinary commercial term in a sense outside its ordinary meaning he must make it plain to the buyer that he is selling him something other than that which the term used would ordinarily indicate. In my view, therefore, whether the word "store" can only be read in its ordinary sense, or whether some peculiar meaning may be given to it in view of the congested state of the port of Rotterdam at the time, the goods were not "ex store" within the meaning of this contract, and the appellants were entitled to reject them, the description being a condition precedent of great commercial importance.

Thirdly, it was contended, though not pleaded, that the appellants had lost the right to reject, because with knowledge of the facts they took action inconsistent with that right. When one party to a contract becomes aware of a breach of a condition precedent by the other he is entitled to a reasonable time to consider what he will do, and failure to reject at once does not prejudice his right to reject if he exercises the right within a reasonable time. In my opinion, he is also entitled during that reasonable time to make inquiries as to the commercial possibilities in order to decide what to do on learning for the first time of the breach of condition which would entitle him to reject. I cannot see that the appellants did anything beyond making inquiries in order to decide what they should do. Therefore, if this matter had been pleaded, it would not have afforded a defence. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

Eve, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the contract was plainly a contract to sell "ex store" at Rotterdam, which, in my view, in the absence of special circumstances affecting the conclusion of the contract, is synonymous with "ex warehouse." The primary meaning of each expression seems to me to be a place for the storage of goods or wares. In this case I see no special circumstances to warrant us in attributing to the expression "ex store" the meaning for which the respondents contend.

The further point, that the right to reject had been lost, not having been raised on the pleadings, ought not, in my opinion, to have been entertained; but even if entertained it does not afford a defence.

Appeal allowed.

London General Insurance Company Limited v. General Marine Underwriters' Association Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Insurance (Marine)—Cargo—Lloyd's notify casualty—Notice ignored by insurers—Reinsurance policy effected after loss—Non-disclosure of material facts—Insurers deemed to have known of the loss—Loss not known to reinsurers—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 6, s b-s. 1; s. 18, sub-ss. 1, 3; s. 19.

Where the plaintiffs, who had insured a cargo (lost or not lost) effected through their brokers a reinsurance of the same cargo some hours after both parties had received from Lloyd's the usual casualty slips notifying them that the cargo had sustained damage by a peril insured against, which slips both parties had overlooked, it was decided by Bailhache, J. that the fire in the steamship was a circumstance which the plaintiffs ought to have disclosed to the defendants if they had known it, and, if the casualty slip had been duly attended to as it ought to have been, the plaintiffs must be deemed to have known of the fire in time to have communicated the information to their brokers and to the defendants before the latter wrote the risk; and that therefore the action failed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Held, that the decision of Bailhache, J. was right and must be affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Bailhache, J. in an action tried in commercial court.

The facts of the case as found by Bailhache, J. are fully stated in the following written judgment of the learned judge which was delivered by his Lordship in May 1920.

Bailhache, J.—This is a claim on a reinsurance policy on cargo in the steamship Vigo on a voyage from Italy to the United Kingdom. The defence is concealment of a material fact, namely, that part of the cargo had been destroyed by fire.

The decision depends upon the application of sect. 18 and 19 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 to the facts of this case. By those sections it is the duty of the assured to disclose to the underwriters every material circumstance known to the assured, who is deemed to know every circumstance which, in the ordinary course of business, ought to be known to him, and when, as in this case, the insurance is effected by an agent, the agent must similarly disclose every material circumstance which in the ordinary course of business ought to be known by, or to have been communicated to him, and every material circumstance which the assured is bound to disclose, unless it comes to his knowledge too late to communicate it to the agent.

(a) Reported by E. A. Scratchley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

To that duty there is one exception material to this case, namely, the assured is not bound to disclose any circumstance known or presumed to be known to the underwriter, who is presumed to know matters of common notoriety or know circumstances which an underwriter, in the ordinary course of his business as such, ought to know.

The facts are these: The fire on the Vigo was known at Lloyd's late on the night of the 24th Sept. 1918. It was posted on the casualty board on the morning of the 25th by ten o'clock. A casualty slip containing that and other information was sent by Lloyd's to their subscribing underwriters, including the plaintiffs, at or about the same time. These slips are made and sent out as occasion requires during the day. A daily register or index of information is published and issued by Lloyd's, but only contains information received not later than eight o'clock on the previous evening. At or about ten o'clock on the 25th the plaintiffs' brokers were instructed to effect a reinsurance policy at Lloyd's. They did it at about four o'clock that same afternoon. The plaintiffs, although they had the casualty slip, did not read it, and did not, in fact, know of the casualty until some two days later. The defendants, when they wrote the risk, were in the same state of ignorance.

There can be no doubt that the fire was a circumstance which the plaintiffs ought to have disclosed had they known it; indeed, they frankly admit that they should and would have done so. It is impossible, in my view, to contend successfully that such a circumstance need not have been disclosed by the assured, because the underwriter might have found it out for himself by looking at the casualty board or at the casualty slips. The duty is the same if the fire is a circumstance which the plaintiffs must be deemed to know.

The remaining questions, then, are: Must the plaintiffs be deemed to have known it, and if so, in time to communicate it to their broker, who, by the way, was as ignorant of the fact as were the plaintiffs and defendants. Brokers do not receive the casualty slips, and do not, as a rule, consult the casualty board before showing a risk in the room.

In order to solve the two questions left, and to appreciate the plaintiffs' contentions upon them, it is necessary to state the plaintiffs' method of business. Their head office and their marine insurance office are in separate buildings. The marine insurance office sends daily borderaux, as they are called, to the head office, showing the results of the day's work. These are examined, and if they show that the plaintiffs have a heavier line upon a risk than they care to carry, the insurance office is instructed to re-insure.

The plaintiffs have, I understand, a limit of 1000*l.* on any one line. They have several of the well-known automatic reinsurance treaties with other companies, and if any of them is available they simply reinsure under one or more of those treaties. If none is available, as was the case here, they reinsure, as was done here, in the ordinary way through brokers at Lloyd's.

The marine insurance office has three departments —for underwriting, for claims, and for reinsurance respectively. Instructions to reinsure are given direct by the head office to the reinsurance department, which was, at the time, under the charge of a Miss Stephens, acting when necessary under a Mr. Diaz, who was the brother and deputy of the plaintiffs' underwriter. The casualty slips were delivered to underwriters' room. There was great pressure of business. The underwriters seldom or never looked at them. They were put in a drawer and from time to time during the day taken to the Claims Department. What they did with them does not appear.

I was told by Mr. Hogg for the plaintiffs that the primary object of the slips is to give underwriters the latest available information in advance about risks that might be disclosed to them during the day. If so, the plaintiffs do not seem to have used them for that purpose as is shown by their being carried off to the Claims Department, which is not concerned with new business, but with losses on existing policies.

I am not, I think, concerned with the particular method in which the plaintiffs carried on their business. The question I must ask myself is: Was the casualty slip notice to the plaintiffs of the fire on the Vigo, and I think it was. If it were not so, the magnitude of the business of an assured, or the extent of his personal attention to it, or even the pressure of a busy time, would always have to be considered in applying sect. 18 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and the same means of knowledge would have different results according to the way an assured chooses to carry on his business, and might even depend upon whether he was busy or slack, or whether his clerks were efficient or inefficient.

The argument for the plaintiffs is that because their Reinsurance Department did not see the casualty slip and did not know its contents, therefore the plaintiffs did not know and cannot be deemed to have known of the fire. That argument does not appear to me to be sound. The question is not what ought the plaintiffs' reinsurance clerk to have known, but what the plaintiffs must be deemed to have known.

The very object of the casualty slip is to give the latest possible information to the recipients, thus supplementing the daily index whose information does not go beyond the previous day. These slips are obviously useless unless they are read as and when they come in, if not they might as well cease to be supplied. An assured neglects the information given him in these slips at his peril. If the slip had been duly attended to, there were at least four and probably five hours in which the information as to the fire might have been communicated to the brokers, and in my opinion, this was ample time for the purpose. The case called for prompt action.

In my opinion, therefore, the defence is made out and there will be judgment for the defendants with costs.

From that decision the plaintiffs now appealed.

Douglas Hogg, K.C. and Jowitt for the appellants.

Stuart Bevan, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the respondents.

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—This is an appeal from the decision of Bailhache, J. who gave judgment for the defendants in an action on a policy of insurance on the ground that there was a fact, a material fact, which must be deemed to have been known to the insurers affecting the re-insurance within the meaning of sect. 18 (1) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. In the ordinary course of business it ought to have been known to them and, therefore, must be deemed to have been known. The learned judge held also that it did not come within the subsequent sub-section of that Act which provides—sub-sect. 3—that a circumstance need not be disclosed "which is known or presumed to be known to the insurer." Then the sub-section goes on to add: "The insurer is presumed to know matters of common notoriety or knowledge, and matters which an insurer in the ordinary course of his business, as such, ought to know."

The plaintiffs had a line upon the cargo of a vessel called the Vigo, and on the 24th Sept. 1918, they wished to effect reinsurance to a certain extent because they had a bigger line than they considered right upon that vessel. The Vigo, in fact, suffered casualty in some of her cargo which got on fire on the evening of that day. I do not know at what time the casualty began. At any rate the information came to Lloyd's late at night—at eleven o'clock on the 24th Sept. 1918—and on the morning of the 25th Lloyd's sent out information of the fire in what are called casualty slips to their subscribers, amongst whom were the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs were among a number of companies who apparently employed one Maurice Diaz as their underwriter, and he carried on his business at the office of a company called the National Benefit Insurance Company Limited. There he as underwriter acted for the plaintiffs and for a number of other companies, and I think he must be considered for the purposes of this case as the underwriter of the plaintiffs carrying on their business at that place. The plaintiffs' head office was some little distance away.

In the place where Mr. Diaz was there was a Marine Department, a Claims Department, and a Reinsurance Department, and they were all underwriters and all part of the underwriting department. A lady of the name of Stevens was in charge of the Re-insurance Department apparently, under—it was distinctly said under—Mr. Diaz, and his assistant, who was his brother, Mr. Leon Diaz. She was not in the same room, the underwriting room; her room was upstairs on the fourth floor. But it was all one underwriting department divided into sections.

The way the business was carried on was thus: When the plaintiffs found they had a bigger line than they thought advisable on any risk, they communicated or it was communicated to a gentleman who was in their employment not where the head office was, but they went to Cornhill and informed the underwriting department there. I do not think, as far as I can see, from the evidence that it went straight up to Miss Stevens in her fourth-floor room, but he instructed the department at Cornhill, and then it was handed to Miss Stevens who, if she could, placed the reinsurance with some associated companies with which they had treaties of reinsurance, and if she could not, she sent out instructions to the broker to effect it at Lloyd's from outside.

On the 24th Sept. 1919, Miss Stevens received instructions to reinsure a portion of the line on the Vigo. She drafted some instructions and dated them the 25th because they were too late to be put in operation on the evening of the 24th. On the morning of the 25th, somewhere between ten and eleven o'clock, she handed these to the broker's clerk who went round to see if there was any business. The broker received the instructions, but was not able to effect the reinsurance until somewhere about four o'clock in the afternoon. It is not quite clear at what time the casualty slips came from Lloyd's to the office. It was somewhere about ten or half-past ten; I should think somewhere nearly about the same time as the instructions were handed to the broker's clerk.

When the casualty slips were received nobody took any notice of them at all. There was a great press of business and nobody apparently looked at the casualty slips. They were handed in to the underwriting department and the underwriter or his clerk picked them up and put them into a drawer, possibly he read them, possibly he did not, and at the end of the day they went up to the Claims Department, and according to Mr. Diaz's evidence the Claims Department should have given information to the Reinsurance Department as to any casualties. It seems to me quite clear from the evidence that nothing of the kind was done. Once they got into some spot there they stayed, and nobody was sent from the Claims Department to see what was done with them; therefore, really they were entirely neglected; it may have been caused to a certain extent by press of business.

The evidence of the defendants is that what was done with the casualty slips in their case was that they were looked through by a lady clerk, and if there was anything in them which concerned the risk upon which the defendants were engaged that was brought to the attention of someone in authority. It was not always done early in the morning; it was very often late in the day that something was done, and I think it must be taken that the defendants were not upon the risk in the Vigo. I think there is no positive evidence of that. I think the drift of the evidence is that they were not. The defendants also said that in effecting an insurance they would investigate either the casualty slips or any other information including what was called the daily list, which was a list of casualties the day before compiled by Lloyd's and sent out, but that in proposing reinsurances they did not look at any of these materials.

Those are the circumstances under which the question arises, Ought the plaintiffs in the course of business to have known of this casualty, and to have known of this casualty at a time when they could have recalled their instructions to their brokers to effect reinsurance free of casualties? Bailhache, J. has found that they ought, and he has found that they ought on this ground, that they had no right to neglect the casualty slips from Lloyd's, which they admitted to be sent for the purpose of giving information entirely, and certainly they ought not to neglect them in a case where they were on a risk as they were on the Vigo. Their evidence went to this, that they really did nothing to make use of the casualty slips at all. He held that that was not right, and that they ought as far as business would have permitted them to have availed themselves of the information that was given to them by Lloyd's, and I do not see my way to differ from him.

If it were a question here of the plaintiffs having done their best, so far as the press of business would allow, to make themselves acquainted with the casualty slips, and their not being able to do so in time to stop the broker's instructions, I think it might have been difficult to deal with such a case, but there is no such case before us. They never did anything at all, and I do not see my way to differ from the learned judge in the court below when he comes to the conclusion that if they had taken steps to examine the casualty slips they might and would have found out this casualty in time to communicate with their brokers before four o'clock, when the reinsurance was effected.

There remains another point, and that is this: It is said that if that is true of the plaintiffs it is equally true of the defendants, and as they ought to have known in the course of their business the contents of the casualty slips it was a circumstance which the plaintiffs were not bound to communicate to them. The learned judge has taken the view—again I do not see my way to differ from it—that the defendants were not upon the risk in the Vigo. I think that is right, and he has then taken this—that you could not expect the defendants, supposing they had looked at the casualty slips, to have present to their minds always the information about a vessel which at the time they got the information, if they did get it, would have had no interest to them at all.

In fact, the learned judge has dealt with it, I think, rather upon the same principle as the principle in the case of Bates v. Hewitt (L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 595); where the plaintiff had not informed the insurer that the Georgia had been a confederate cruiser and was, therefore, not insurable, and it was held he need not communicate that fact because the defendant had the same means of knowledge and had the same knowledge, and the defendant admitted that he had known that at one time the Georgia was a confederate cruiser, but it was not present to his mind when he took the risk, and the court held that an insurer was not to be expected to carry all sorts of miscellaneous information always in his mind—information which was not interesting at the time that he got it.

That principle seems to me to be the one on which the learned judge acted, and I do not see my way to interfere with his decision. As I have said, the defendants had nothing to do with the Vigo at all. The young lady clerk, Miss Stevens, would never have communicated the name of the Vigo to them at all, because they were not interested in the Vigo and, therefore, there was no reason really, in the ordinary course of business, why the defendants should have known this information about the Vigo.

For these reasons, although I was in doubt for a time about the case, I do not see my way to differ from the decision of Bailhache, J, and I think, therefore, that this appeal must be dismissed.

Warrington, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

I just want to mention one point which particularly strikes me and has influenced me in the conclusion at which I have arrived, and that is with regard to these casualty slips which are intended to tell the persons concerned what casualties have happened. I think the one with regard to the Vigo must be taken to have arrived in the early morning at the office in which the plaintiffs' underwriting business is carried on. It was a casualty which happened overnight, and it appears, as I understand, very near the end of the list as a casualty in the casualty book for that day, and I think one may infer it arrived early in the morning.

We know from the evidence what is done. The matter is taken to the underwriting department—that is to say, the department which is concerned with this part of the business. The business is divided into sections, one of which is concerned particularly with reinsurance, and the matter goes into that department. The casualty slips are there, and the evidence is that it was the practice of the manager of the Underwriting Department, or some practical officer, to look at those slips whenever he had the opportunity of doing so. They do not go at once to the Claims Department.

I gather from the evidence that they would be sent up to the Claims Department in the evening unless it happened to be convenient at some time during the day to send up a batch that had already arrived. But there they were in the Underwriting Department ready to be inspected by the manager, and the manager says he did look at them from time to time, and the only reason, apparently, why they were not looked at on this day was that, owing to pressure of business, he had not got them.

It seems to me that is not enough. The ship was on the casualty slips; they were contemplating reinsuring it, and there was information material to the risk actually in their possession, and it is only because they were either too busy or too careless to look at it that they did not obtain material information.

It seems to me the circumstances are such that we cannot possibly differ from Bailhache, J. in holding that this was information which, under the Act of Parliament, must be taken to be a matter of which they ought to have had knowledge.

With regard to the other point, it seems to me the defendants were in a very independent position. It is true that the casualty slips went to their office also, but they were not interested in this risk and they had no reason for referring to the slips. I do not believe for a moment that if they had been already insurers of that risk they would have accepted the reinsurance without ascertaining that fact, and if they were not interested in it then even if they had looked at the casualty slips it would not necessarily have conveyed anything to their minds, the knowledge of which must continue, when at a late hour in the day the proposal for this reinsurance was put forward.

I think that Bailhache, J. on this point also was right and that the defendants cannot be presumed to have had knowledge of this casualty merely because they had the opportunity of ascertaining it, and not merely the opportunity of ascertaining it, but the opportunity of it being carried in the head of the man whose duty it was to know it.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment of Bailhache, J. must be affirmed.

Younger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I confess that I express the conclusion at which I have in fact arrived with some reluctance.

The ground on which I have ultimately arrived at this conclusion is this—that it appears to me that the manner in which the plaintiffs' Underwriting Department was conducted was such that information as to the contents of the casualty slips would never, except in the most exceptional circumstances—"timeously," as the Scotch say—come to the knowledge of the Reinsurance Department. And if this court were to differ from the conclusion at which the learned judge has arrived, I cannot but think that in a case less meritorious than this, it might not be possible for persons in the position of the plaintiffs to establish liability against their insurers by wilfully, one might almost say, though it could not be proved, closing their eyes to information which it was their duty to know.

With reference to the point which has been made, which is borne out by the evidence, that so far as the defendants are concerned they, when they are accepting risk, are more careful, in the course of their business, in referring to the daily list than when they are offering themselves the distinction between the two cases, I think, is this: Neglect on the part of the defendants, when accepting risk, to refer to the daily list, is neglect to their own undoing, but neglect on the part of the defendants when they are offering risk for insurance to withhold or not to make some disclosure, is to the undoing of the insurer, and injures him. Therefore, I think that the two cases should be regarded from a different point of view, and, regarding them from a different point of view in relation to their duty to the other, then it seems to me that the duty of the defendants when accepting risk from the assured in relation to information with regard to this particular vessel or property with which they have had previously no concern is certainly not so intimate in the ordinary course of business as is the duty of the assured to themselves in the case of reinsurance of property already at risk.

For these reasons, therefore, I think that the learned judge in the court below came to a right conclusion, and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

THE CHARLOTTE. (a)

Practice—Limitation of liability—Right to limit—Amount of bail—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.

In a collision action the defendants gave bail for the amount of their statutory liability under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, and affirmed that the collision occurred without their actual fault or privity. The plaintiffs filed a counter affidavit alleging privity.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to bail to the full value of the defendants' vessel.

MOTION by plaintiffs in a collision action to set aside a caveat against arrest, and for leave to arrest the vessel of the defendants.

Defendants in a collision action had prepared bail for their vessel at 15*l.* per ton in accordance with sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, together with an affidavit stating that the collision occurred without their actual fault or privity. Plaintiffs by a counter-affidavit alleged that the masthead and the green light of the Charlotte were defective, and that it was believed that the defects in these lights existed at the commencement of the voyage.

For the plaintiffs it was contended that it might be that the owners were responsible for the defective condition of the lights, in which event they would not be entitled to limit the liability under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, because the collision would not have taken place "without their actual fault or privity," and in these circumstances they claimed that they were entitled to bail in the sum of 63,000*l.*, being the full value of the Charlotte. Their claim was for 80,000*l.*

R. H. Balloch for the plaintiffs.

Lewis Noad for the defendants.

HILL, J.—I think in this case I ought to grant the plaintiffs' application and set aside the caveat entered against arrest and give leave to arrest the Charlotte. With regard to the 13,000*l.* bail, I give leave to the defendants to apply if matters are not agreed, and I reserve all questions of costs of bail and of this application. In my view the practice is accurately stated in note (p), at pp. 291, 292, of Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice (3rd edit., 1902), which reads:

> If the amount for which a cause of damage is instituted exceeds the statutory limit, the defendant, on filing an affidavit with damage suit, stating the tonnage of his ship and that the collision happened without the actual fault or privity of any of the owners, will, if these facts are not denied by the plaintiff, be entitled to have the ship released on bail being given to an amount sufficient to cover the amount of the statutory limit and interest and costs. . . . Of course the plaintiff may dispute the facts on which the defendant's right to avail himself of the benefit of the provisions of the statute rests, and then bail must be given to the full value of the property.

The defendants allege that the facts will turn out to be such that they will be entitled to limit their liability, and the plaintiffs dispute that, and that issue is one which cannot be tried on the present application. That leaves the plaintiffs, who do not assent and have never assented to the bail being limited, with a right to demand bail to the full value of the ship; but, of course, they do it entirely at their own risk. If it turns out that they have made an exorbitant demand for bail, they will probably suffer for it hereafter.

THE MARIE GARTZ. (a)

German claimants—Judgment entered before the war—Rights of claimants to proceed to reference after ratification of peace—Treaty of Peace between Allied, &c., Powers and Germany 1919, arts. 296-297—Treaty of Peace Order 1919, s. 1, sub-ss. 16 and 17.

Before the war the defendants, who were German shipowners, recovered judgment against the plaintiffs, who were British, condemning the plaintiffs in damages for collision and ordering a reference for assessment of the said damages. The defendants had not filed their claim before the outbreak of war. The claim and vouchers were ultimately filed a few days before the ratification of the Treaty of Peace, but it was agreed that they should be taken as filed on a subsequent date. The plaintiffs then took out a summons to set aside the claim and vouchers on the ground that under the Treaty and the Order applying its provisions the parties were not entitled to litigate the claim, but must submit to settlement by the clearing houses.

(a) Reported by SINCLAIR JOHNSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a) Reported by SINCLAIR JOHNSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the defendants' claim was not a debt under arts. 296 of the Treaty, but was a right under art. 297, which was to be "retained and liquidated in accordance with the law of the Allied State concerned." There was nothing in art. 297, nor in the Treaty of Peace Order, s. 1, sub-ss. 16 and 17, to prevent the defendants from proceeding to a reference, although they might not touch the proceeds, nor to prevent the plaintiffs from paying money into court.

SUMMONS to set aside the defendants' claim for a reference under a judgment.

The facts and contentions are fully set out in the judgment.

A. Bucknill for the plaintiffs.

C. R. Dunlop, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the defendants.

HILL, J.—The plaintiffs in this case are the owners of the British steamship Karamea, Messrs. Shaw, Savill, Albion and Co. Limited. The defendants are the German owners of the German steamship Marie Gartz. The defendants are the holders of a judgment in their favour made before Aug. 1914, whereby the plaintiffs and their bail were condemned in the defendants' damages arising out of a collision between the two steamships, and the defendants' damages were referred to the registrar and merchants to assess the amount thereof. The defendants had not filed their claim in the registry when war broke out. In Nov. 1919 the defendants' solicitors gave the plaintiffs' solicitors notice of their intention to proceed, and a few days before the 10th Jan. 1920 filed the defendants' claim and vouchers. The plaintiffs took out a summons for an order that the filing and service of the claim and vouchers of the defendants should be set aside, and that the defendants' claim should be removed from the file. The registrar refused to so order, and from that refusal the plaintiffs appeal.

Two points were taken before me on behalf of the plaintiffs. First of all, it was objected that the notice to proceed was given and the claim and vouchers were filed before the Treaty of Peace was ratified, that is before the 10th Jan. 1920. This is a technical but a sound objection. Until the Treaty of Peace was ratified the defendants were alien enemies and had no locus standi in the King's courts. The plaintiffs, however, were willing to waive this objection, and I see no objection to the claim and vouchers being treated as filed on Monday, the 12th Jan. 1920.

The second objection is of more importance, and is based on the Treaty of Peace Order 1919, made under the Treaty of Peace Act 1919. The plaintiffs contend that neither the defendants nor the plaintiffs have any right to litigate the defendants' claim in the ordinary way, and that they, the plaintiffs, cannot appear at the reference without committing an offence under the Order in Council. Primâ facie the defendants have a right to proceed upon their judgment and prove their damages and obtain a report. Is there anything in the Order in Council which deprives them of that right or makes it illegal for them or for the plaintiffs to attend at the reference or for the registrar and merchants to hear it and make a report? The argument was mainly based upon art. 296 of the Treaty of Peace, as made law by the Treaty of Peace Order in Council, but reference was also made to art. 297. These articles and others, which make up sects. 3 to 7 of Part 10 of the Treaty, are given the force of law by the Order in Council. The Treaty of Peace Act 1919, under which the order is made, gives power to his Majesty to "make such Orders in Council and do such things as appear to him to be necessary for carrying out the Treaty and for giving effect to any of the provisions of the Treaty." In pursuance of that, the Treaty of Peace Order was made, and it gives the effect of law to the articles I have mentioned, and makes various provisions for carrying out those articles.

In my opinion, art. 296 does not apply to the defendants' claim, but art. 297 does. Art. 296 deals with debts, and, so far as obligations of private persons are concerned, is careful to limit its application to that particular class of "pecuniary obligations." It contemplates that debts may be admitted or not admitted; but it deals only with debts. In terms it distinguishes between "debts" and the "proceeds of liquidation of enemy property, rights and interests." The Order in Council which makes the articles law, and which is made under powers for giving effect to the Treaty, cannot give a wider meaning to "debts." For the purposes of the order, the claim of the defendants is, in my opinion, not a "debt." It is, however, a "right." It is a right to have the defendants' damages ascertained and the judgment turned into a judgment for a liquidated sum. Being a right belonging to a German national within the territory of the King, it comes within art. 297, and is by 297 (b) subject to the "right to retain and liquidate" it in accordance with the Treaty, and comes within the provisions of sect. 1, sub-sect. 16, of the Order in Council, which charges "All property, rights, and interests within His Majesty's Dominions and Protectorates belonging to German nationals, and . . . the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation, or other dealings therewith."

It is, therefore, a right of a German national subject to the charge so created. But it is to be observed that it has not been vested in the custodian under sect. 1, sub-sect. 17 (d), of the Order in Council. What is the position of the German national entitled to such a right so charged and of the British national bound by it? Art. 297 (b) provides that: "The liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied or associated State concerned," viz., in this case England. There is nothing in that to prevent the reference being held. The Order in Council by sect. 1, sub-sect. 17, makes provisions "with a view to making effective and enforcing such charges as aforesaid," and it includes among those provisions the following: "(a) No person shall, without the consent of the custodian, transfer, part with, or otherwise deal in any . . . right . . . subject to the charge." This applies to the defendants. And: "(e) If any person called upon to pay any money or to transfer or otherwise to deal with any . . . rights . . . has reason to suspect that the same are subject to such charge as aforesaid, he shall, before paying, transferring or dealing with the same, report the matter to the custodian, and shall comply with any directions that the custodian may give with respect thereto." As to (a), I cannot think that by proving the claim in the reference and obtaining a report the defendants will deal in the right, and certainly they will not transfer or part with it. As to (e), even if to attend the reference were a dealing with the right, which I think it is not, the plaintiffs have reported the matter to the custodian, and the custodian has not directed them to do or not to do anything.

I can find nothing in the Order in Council which deprives the defendants of their right to proceed to a reference and obtain a report, or which makes it illegal for the plaintiffs to take part in the reference. The defendants will not be able to handle the money, but, as under the Treaty Germany undertakes to compensate its nationals in respect of the retention of their rights (art. 297 (i.), it may be important for them to have the amount ascertained.

The plaintiffs objected that they would not be able to tender. I agree that they can offer no payment to the defendants, but I see nothing to prevent their paying money into court, with a notice that it is in satisfaction of the claim of a German national. The charge will prevent the money being paid out to the defendants, and the registrar will be able to deal with the question of costs, having regard to the payment in.

The plaintiffs also said that, having lost a ship by submarine attack, they had a special right of set off under art. 296, annex 14. I decide nothing about that. I decide nothing about the application of the damages when liquidated. Art. 297 provides for that, and it may or may not be that when art. 297 is applied to the proceeds of the liquidation of this right the plaintiffs will be able to apply to have the benefit of annex 14 of art. 296. I do not decide the point one way or the other. I am only deciding that there is nothing in the Order in Council which deprives the defendants of their legal right to prove their damages on a reference or which makes it illegal for the plaintiffs to take part in that reference.

I therefore dismiss the appeal, but, as the defendants can only put themselves right by getting their claim and vouchers treated as of the 12th Jan. 1920, the plaintiffs were technically right and ought to have the costs of the summons both here and before the registrar.

Collision in a river estuary—Collision Regulations and river rules both applicable—Whole duty of ship described in river rules—Conduct of ship governed by the river rules—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, preliminary note and arts. 16 and 30*—Tyne By-laws* 18 and 39.

"Where there is a certain rule which deals with the whole scope of the subject, to add parts of the provisions of the sea rules would be to interfere with the operation of the river rules."

In a fog a steam vessel, when inside the piers at the Tyne entrance, heard a long blast right ahead. She did not stop her engines, but continued to navigate at a moderate speed; whilst doing so she came into collision.

Held, that the collision occurred at a place where both the Collision Regulations and the Tyne By-laws applied. But that by art. 30 of the former the Collision Regulations were not to interfere with the operation of any local rules, and, as in this case the Tyne By-laws 18 and 39 prescribed the whole duty of a vessel navigating in fog, the Collision Regulations were entirely inapplicable.

The Carlotta (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 80 L. T. Rep. 664; (1899) P. 223) followed.

ACTION for damage by collision.

Arts. 16 and 30 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea provide:

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog . . . go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

Art. 30. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule, duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbour, river, or inland water.

The facts and contention appear from the judgment.

HILL, J.—The collision in this case happened at about 9 a.m. on the 13th Feb. 1919 inside the piers at the Tyne entrance. . . . There is no doubt in my mind that from the time the Ceylon sighted the Oscar Fredrik the Ceylon did nothing wrong and neglected nothing that she ought to have done. . . . And I find, as a fact, that the collision happened well over on the south side of the channel in the Ceylon's water, and not in the Oscar Fredrik's water.

This leaves for consideration the charges against the Ceylon (1) of speed, and (2) of not stopping the engines. As to speed, I find that it was moderate. It may have been rather more than two or three knots, but it was not much more, and, in the circumstances, it was moderate. It is significant that she was preceded by the Luga, which she was not overhauling, and she was followed by the Lake, which was not overhauling her until the Ceylon stopped her way by dropping her anchor. They were all coming down at about the same speed, and, applying the best test I can, I find that they were not making more than four knots, and the Elder Brethren think that that was a moderate speed, and I agree.

As to not stopping the engines, the Ceylon heard a long blast, some of the witnesses think more than once, right ahead. The pilot, who was steering by objects on the south shore, and who knew the Luga was going down in front of him, concluded that it came from the Luga. He did not stop the engines. The plaintiffs say that this was a breach of art. 16 of the sea regulations. The defendants say, firstly, that the sea regulations did not apply; and secondly, that their not stopping was justified, for the position of the ship ahead was ascertained, for it was either the Luga, which was known to be outward bound, or, if it was an incoming ship, then a ship which was presumed to be coming up north of mid-channel; and in this connection the defendants refer to the case of The Hare (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 549; 90 L. T. Rep. 323; (1904) P. 331).

Whether the sea regulations apply is a difficult question. The sea regulations are primâ facie applicable to the waters in question, for they are "waters connected with the high seas, navigable by sea-going vessels" within the preliminary to the sea regulations. It is not disputed that the Tyne rules are applicable to the waters in question. The Tyne rules are made under proper local authority. By art. 30 of the sea regulations: "Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of a special rule duly made by local authority, relative to the navigation of any harbour, river, or inland waters."

By art 16 of the sea regulations (by the addition made in 1897), if that article is applicable, the Ceylon, on hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which was not ascertained, should, as far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision was over. And by the sea regulations this rule is applicable in narrow channels as elsewhere. The only difference, if the ships are in a narrow channel, is that that circumstance may affect the question whether "the circumstances of the case admit" and the question whether "the position of the vessel is ascertained" or not.

The Tyne rules provide with great detail for vessels keeping on their own side of the channel when in the channel. They also provide for the way in which the entrance to the Gateway between the piers is to be approached. Then, as to fog, they provide by rule 18 the fog signals which are to be sounded, and by rule 30 it is provided that "every vessel under way when overtaken by a fog shall be navigated at a very moderate speed, and shall, as soon as practicable, be moored or anchored out of the navigable channel. Vessels shall not, without the permission of the harbour master, be got under way during a fog."

In The Carlotta (sup.) a very similar question arose. The question in that case was whether a ship in the Thames being aground ought not only to make the whistle signal required by the Thames rules, but also ought to exhibit two black balls under art. 4 (a) of the sea regulations. It was held that art. 4 (a) of the sea regulations did not apply to a ship aground and therefore the other part of the judgment was in effect obiter; but Barnes, J. in a careful and considered judgment, which is relevant here, dealt with the question on the assumption that art. 4 (a) did apply to a ship aground, and on that assumption he held that the matter was governed by the Thames rule and not by the sea regulations. And his reasoning is summed up in the last words: "Where there is a certain rule which deals with the whole scope of the subject, to add parts of provisions of the sea rules would be to interfere with the operation of the river rules."

It will be noticed there that the subject was what signal should be given, either by sound or exhibition, by a vessel aground. The Thames rule provides for a whistle signal and the sea rule for the exhibition of two black balls. It might well be said that these were not inconsistent, but one supplementary to the other, and therefore both should apply; but Barnes, J. held that, inasmuch as the Thames rule dealt with the whole scope of the subject of ships aground, and provided the signal for it, the sea regulation which dealt with the same subject-matter was excluded.

Applying that to the present case, the Tyne River rules 18 and 39 seem to me to deal with the whole scope of the subject of the duties of ships in fog in the river, and to add to them the second provision of art. 16 of the sea regulations would, in my opinion, be as much to interfere with the river rules as in The Carlotta it was to add the sea regulation as to exhibiting black balls. I arrive at this conclusion with considerable hesitation, but that is the conclusion at which I arrive. Applying rule 39 of the Tyne rules, I find that the Ceylon was being navigated at a "very moderate speed," and nobody has suggested on either side that the circumstances were such that either of these ships ought to have been moored or anchored out of the main channel.

Having found, as I have, with regard to the rules, it is unnecessary to consider whether I ought to extend the decision in The Hare to cover a case where ships are in a natural channel of the width of the lower Tyne. The Hare was in collision in the Manchester Ship Canal, and I should hesitate—I should want to consider the matter much more carefully—before I could think it right to extend the reasoning which was applied to a collision in the Manchester Ship Canal to a collision in a narrow water as wide as the lower part of the Tyne. I do not express an opinion one way or the other upon it.

But I will only add this: If the matter is to be considered independently of rules altogether, I have asked the Elder Brethren whether, in their opinion, it was contrary to good seamanship or an unreasonable thing for the Ceylon to act as she did in not stopping, and they advise me that they cannot say that it was either contrary to good seamanship or an unreasonable thing in the circumstances of the case.

I therefore find that these allegations against the Ceylon are not made out. The matter stands or falls entirely on the question of the side of the channel, and on that I have decided in favour of the Ceylon.

I therefore pronounce the Oscar Fredrik alone to blame.

THE PELLWORM AND OTHER VESSELS. (a)

Prize Court — Enemy vessel — Capture in neutral territorial waters — Requisition by Admiralty — Claim for restitution by neutral Government — Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XXIX.—Treaty of Peace with Germany, art. 297, and Annex 3 to Part 8.

Two German merchant vessels were captured by British warships in July 1917 after a chase which ended in Dutch territorial waters. Lord Sterndale held in subsequent proceedings (The Pellworm, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 490; 121 L. T. Rep. 488) in prize that there had been an unintentional violation of Dutch neutrality, and he therefore dismissed the claim of the Crown for condemnation and that of the Netherlands Government for damages and costs. Further consideration was adjourned, as the vessels had been requisitioned by the Admiralty under Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XXIX., upon the usual undertaking for payment of appraised values. Two of the vessels were subsequently sunk by enemy submarines. The Netherlands Government claimed release of the vessels and compensation.

Held, that the capture created no proprietary right in the Netherlands Government, and that the claim was a claim in the right of the disseised enemy owners; that the requisition by the Crown was effectual to vest the property in the vessels in the Crown; that the claim was therefore for restitution in value by the payment of the appraised values of the vessels to a neutral Sovereign for the use of German owners; that such sums were within art. 297 of the Treaty of Peace with Germany, and must be retained to be dealt with pursuant to the Treaty. The claim of the Netherlands Government dismissed.

ACTION for condemnation. Claim by Netherlands Government for restitution.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), Sir E. M. Pollock (S.-G.), Butler Aspinall, K.C., and Dunlop, K.C. for the Crown.

The facts and argument are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—This is a claim of the Netherlands Government, on behalf of her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands, in respect of the seizure of four German steamships, the Pellworm, the Marie Horn, the Heinz Blumberg, and the Breitzig, with their cargoes of fuel, which was made by ships of his Majesty's Navy on the 17th July 1917. The ships were brought in forthwith for condemnation, and a cause of condemnation was duly commenced on the 25th July 1917. On the 31st July 1917, upon application by the Admiralty pursuant to Prize Court Rules, 1914, Order XXIX., leave was given to requisition the ships and their cargoes subject to appraisement and the usual undertakings and on the 11th Aug., after appraisement, the ships were released to the Admiralty upon the undertaking of the Procurator-General for payment of the appraised values as the court might direct. The cargoes were also delivered to the Admiralty.

In Dec. 1917, the Netherlands Government appeared in the several causes and made claims for release of the ships with costs, damages and expenses on the ground that the seizures had been made in the territorial waters of the Netherlands. There are claims to the cargoes by or on behalf of various claimants, but no evidence with regard to these were brought to my notice. Three of these claimants are neutrals.

In July last the claims in relation to the ships were heard by Lord Sterndale, who found that the seizure had, in each case, been made within the territorial waters of the Netherlands, but without any intention to violate the neutrality of Holland. Lord Sterndale made a declaration as to the locality of the seizures, rejected the claims for damages and costs, and reserved further consideration of the cause. Upon further consideration evidence was received as to certain material events subsequent to the seizure. As to the several ships, it was shown that the Pellworm and the Marie Horn were employed after delivery to the Admiralty as colliers plying between Wales and North France; the Pellworm until the 9th Oct. 1917, when she was sunk by an enemy submarine without warning and eighteen of the crew were drowned; the Marie Horn until the 8th May, 1918, when she was sunk by an enemy submarine without warning and two of her crew were drowned. The Heinz Blumberg and the Breitzig, after being employed by the Admiralty on various duties, were at the date of the hearing before me engaged in the British coasting trade.

Between the hearing before Lord Sterndale and the further consideration of the case the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany, which was signed at Versailles on the 28th June 1919, had been ratified, and Annex 3 to Part 8 and art. 297 thereof have a bearing upon the present claims. By Annex 3 to Part 8 Germany ceded to the Powers the property in all German-owned ships of 1600 tons and upwards, and in one-half, reckoned in tonnage, of all German-owned ships between 1000 and 1600 tons, and undertook within two months of the coming into force of the Treaty to deliver the ships so ceded. By art. 297 Germany ceded to the Powers respectively the right to retain and liquidate all property and interests within their territories belonging to German subjects at the date of the coming into force of the Treaty, leaving the expropriated owners to look to the German State for compensation in respect of such expropriation. An order of His Majesty in Council, dated the 11th Aug. 1919, made in pursuance of the Treaty of Peace Act, 1919, has provided official agencies in this country for dealing with the property and interests in the United Kingdom which pass under the Treaty.

Of the ships here in question, one, the Heinz Blumberg, was of 1600 tons gross measurement or more, but for reasons which will appear I do not find it necessary to deal separately with the cases of the several vessels.

The claimants delivered particulars of the relief claimed by them in consequence of the decision of Lord Sterndale. The claims include delivery up of the ships in like condition as at the time of capture; compensation for user of the ships since the requisition; compensation in value for the cargoes requisitioned; and the values of the ships lost. The answer made on the part of the Crown alleges in respect of the ships the release and delivery to the Admiralty under Orders of the court for requisition of all four and the sinking of the Pellworm and Marie Horn by enemy action, "in flagrant contradiction with the rules of International Law." It admits the delivery under requisition and the disposal and consumption of the requisitioned cargoes. As to ships and cargoes and all claims in respect of them, the answer further sets up Annex 3 to Part 8 and art. 297 of the Treaty of Versailles, and submits that in the events that have happened no order should be made for delivery or payment to the claimants.

Counsel for the claimants insisted before me on their right to delivery of the vessels remaining in the possession of the Crown under the rules laid down by Lord Stowell in the Vrow Anna Catharina (5 C. Rob. 15), which has been recently applied by this court in the cases of The Dusseldorf (ante, p. 84; 122 L. T. Rep. 237; (1919) P. 245) and The Valeria (ante, p. 55; 122 L. T. Rep. 751; (1920) P. 81). As to the orders of the court giving leave for requisition and the release and delivery of ships and cargoes made thereunder it was argued that the right of requisition which is exercised under Order XXIX. is derived from municipal law only and does not bind foreign States and their subjects. As to the Treaty of Versailles, the case was made that the rights of the Sovereign of Holland in the ships and cargoes in question are independent of the rights of the German owners, and are not affected by a treaty to which Holland was not party, even though the rights of the German owners should be held to be so affected.

In respect of the ships sunk by enemy action, counsel for the claimants contended that the risk of loss by such means was accepted by the Crown upon obtaining delivery by process of requisition, and that the value of the ship in each case with a fair recompense for its user must be awarded against the Crown. Application was made for an opportunity of considering whether the appraisements made under the order of the court represented the true values; but to this application, for the first time made at the hearing more than two years after the appearance of the claimants, and without any apparent ground for challenging either the regularity or the correctness of the appraisements, I thought I ought not to accede.

As to the vessels in the possession of the Admiralty, as well as those sunk by enemy action, counsel for the Procurator-General relied on the orders of the court, under Order XXIX., as orders which vested the ships in the Crown for all purposes. The claim for payment on account of user they resisted as inconsistent with the order for requisition, and, in substance, a claim for damages. Counsel informed me that in the case of The Dusseldorf (sup.) a like claim was made, and was disallowed by Lord Sterndale. Apart from the Treaty of Versailles, it was contended on the part of the Crown that, at any rate as to the two ships still in its possession, the order, properly consequential upon Lord Sterndale's interlocutory decree, would be an order for payment out to the claimants, on behalf of the German owners, of the sums undertaken by the Procurator-General to be paid as a term of the requisitions. The wrongful destruction of the ships sunk by submarine was, however, alleged as an answer to any German claim in respect of these ships, and the Treaty was relied upon as an answer to any claim made in respect of German property or interest. Counsel maintained that a Neutral State claiming restitution of prize taken in its territorial waters claims only as a trustee for the owner of the property seized.

The case depends mainly, I think, upon the question whether a neutral State claiming a vessel captured in its territorial waters claims in respect of an interest of its own or solely in assertion of its sovereignty and of the right of the disseised owner. If the seizure creates a right in the ship on the part of the neutral Sovereign, that right must be safeguarded by the court. If the only proprietary right at the time of the claim is that of the owner, cesser of that right pending the suit prevents any decree of restitution for the use of the owner.

The only encroachment which was made upon the rights of the owner by the seizure here in question was the subtraction from them of an inchoate right of prize on the part of the captor. Nothing done then or later by captor or owner seems of itself to found a claim of interest in the neutral State whose territory was violated by the seizure. The case for the claimants was supported by reference to cases like The Anne (1818, 3 Wheaton's Reports U.S. 435), The Bangor (114 L. T. Rep. 1212; (1916) P. 181), and The Dusseldorf (sup.). The statement of Story, J., in giving judgment in The Anne, is in these words: "A capture made within neutral waters is as between enemies deemed to all intents and purposes rightful; it is only by the neutral Sovereign that its legal validity can be called in question; and as to him, and him only, it is to be considered void. The enemy has no rights whatsoever; and if the neutral Sovereign omits or declines to interpose a claim, the property is condemnable jure belli to the captors."

The argument for the claimants assumes that the right of the neutral State which is asserted by Story, J. is a right coupled with an interest. There is no decision to this effect, so far as I know. In the recent cases in this court the question did not directly arise, though on examining the decree in The Dusseldorf (sup.), where His Majesty the King of Norway was claimant, and restitution of a German-owned ship was ordered, I find the direction in the decree to be "that the said steamship be handed back by the Crown to the Marshal and forthwith released by him to Messrs. Waltons and Co. on behalf of the said claimant." The words are perhaps capable of a meaning consistent with the existence of a special interest in the claimant—an interest which it would be an act of grace on his part to yield up to the disseised owner. The proposition that there is such an interest can be tested by applying the rule of international law as it is stated by Lord Stowell in the often-cited case of The Vrow Anna Catharina (sup.): "When the fact [of capture in neutral waters] is established it overrules every other consideration; the capture is done away with; the property must be restored." "Do away with the capture" and you extinguish the right in prize of the captor. "Restore the property" and it reverts in its former owner. It cannot revest in the neutral claimant for it never was vested in him. This conclusion is supported by the forms of the entries, which I have seen, in the Assignation Book of the Admiralty of the decrees in some well-known cases. For example, in The Twee Gebroeders (3 C. Rob. 162), heard in 1800, the claimant on behalf of the King of Prussia, alleging a seizure of a Dutch ship in Prussian territorial waters, was Sebastian Friday 'intervening and claiming the said ship and cargo.' The Registrar's note of this decree is that 'the judge pronounced the ship to have been captured and seized in violation of the territory of His Majesty the King of Prussia . . . and decreed the same to be restored to the said claimant for the use of the owners and proprietors thereof.'

In the case of The Anna (5 C. Rob. 373) decided in 1805, the claimant was Mr. Lyman, acting on instructions of the United States Government, and the ship, cargo and specie were decreed to be restored to him for the use of the owners and proprietors thereof.

In point of principle I see no ground on which it can properly be supposed that the neutral Sovereign in a case like the present asserts a right to property other than that of the enemy owner, and I think the authorities show that he does not. Because of his enemy character the enemy owner can maintain no claim, but when the neutral sovereign appears to demand restitution he demands it for the use of the enemy owner.

What is next to be determined is whether the orders of the court authorising the requisitions which were made by the Crown were effectual to charge the property in the ships and cargoes, that is to say to vest the same in the Crown. That depends upon two things; the intent of the rules under which the requisitions were made, and the validity of them in point of international law. Order XXIX. provides for permanent and for temporary requisitions; having regard to the definition in Order I., r. 2, it includes both ships and goods, and the process by which it is carried out is that of "release and delivery" to the agents of the Crown. Requisitioned goods are certainly delivered for consumption. Ships are delivered for purposes which involve certain distinctions in some cases, as, for example, sinking in waterways for defensive purposes, and great risk of destruction in most other cases. Looking at the order as a whole I think its intent is that ships and goods requisitioned shall become the property of the Crown, and, for all purposes of the jurisdiction in prize, shall thenceforward be represented by the appraised values. The judgment of the Privy Council in the case of The Zamora (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77, 166) determines the conditions under which the power of requisition can be exercised so as to bind the rights of persons not subject to our municipal laws. Applying the rules there stated, I find that the vessels and goods here in question were urgently required for the defence of the realm; there was a real question to be tried in prize as between captor and claimants; and the determination of the court that the right of requisition was exercisable was a judicial determination. On the whole, therefore, I hold that the orders for requisition and the release and delivery made thereunder vested in the Crown the property in these ships and cargoes. Once it is held that the ships were vested in the Crown, the sinking of some of them by enemy action after requisition is, I think, an irrelevant matter. Neither the claimants nor the owners are barred by it, in respect of a claim upon the funds which result from the requisitions, and neither of them was an actor in the lawless transaction by which the ships were destroyed.

The demand of the claimants for payment by way of recompense for the use of the several ships since they were requisitioned is disposed of so far as this court is concerned by what I have already said. Not only had the claimants no property of their own in respect of which such a claim could arise; the property was in the Crown when the user in question occurred. I need not consider whether this claim was in reality a claim for damages transformed, as was said for the Crown, by something akin to waiver of tort into a money claim under an implied obligation. At any rate, no award can be made.

Apart from the Treaty of Versailles, the result as to these four ships of the conclusions I have stated would be a decree for restitution in value by payment over of the four appraised amounts to the claimants for the use of the respective owners. What is the effect of the Treaty? The distinction between ships of 1600 tons and upwards and ships of under 1600 tons becomes immaterial. The subjects of the claim now are four sums of money payable to a neutral Sovereign for the use of German owners. The Treaty purports to transfer to the Crown all property and interests in the United Kingdom belonging to German subjects at the date of the coming into force of the Treaty. The beneficial interest in the same is, I think, within the class of things transferred. I cannot doubt that a neutral assignee of one of the shipowners would have had as good right as his assignor to the beneficial interest of his assignor under the decree. There being no property or beneficial interest in the claimant, the Neutral Power, the fact that that Power is no party to the Treaty seems to me to be immaterial. The ratification of the Treaty by the sovereign authority of the signatories gives it binding effect as against their respective subjects, and none the less so because ratification was subsequent in date to the material events in the cause, including the interlocutory decree. The view which I take of this matter is, I think, based upon identical considerations with those which underlie the judgment of the United States Supreme Court in the case of United States v. The Schooner Peggy (1803, 1 Cranch's American Law Reports, 2nd edit., p. 103, at p. 108). Marshall, C.J. stated the governing principle in these words: "Where a treaty is the law of the land and as such affects the rights of parties litigating in court, that treaty as much binds those rights and is as much to be regarded by this court as an act of Congress."

The treaty there in question operated to divert by certain of its general provisions rights of a captor which had been established in a court of first instance before the date at which the treaty took effect. In the present case effect must be given to the relevant articles of the Treaty of Versailles.

In the events that have happened the proceeds of the four ships must be retained to be dealt with pursuant to the Treaty.

Consideration of the claims relating to the cargoes must be reserved until the facts have been more fully ascertained.

MOTION to set aside a writ.

The facts in the case appear from his Lordship's judgment.

A. D. Bateson, K.C. and Sinclair Johnston for the plaintiffs.

R. H. Balloch for the defendants.

April 26.—HILL, J.—This motion arises upon an ex parte order made by me, extending the time under sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act, and the defendants now say that the order ought not to have been made.

The collision in question happened in Sept. 1917. The defendants' ship, the Largo Law, remained under requisition until the 21st March 1919. During that time, though a writ could have been served upon her, she could not have been effectively arrested here, for if the marshal had made the arrest the Crown would have got the arrest set aside.

During 1918 she was within the jurisdiction, but she was still under requisition. In 1919, after the time at which she ceased to be under requisition, she was once within the three miles limit. She does not appear to have been in any port within the jurisdiction, but she arrived at Barry Roads on the 25th March 1919, and she sailed on the 4th April 1919. She had in fact been released from requisition on the 21st March. Therefore she was for ten days in Barry Roads, a period which began four days after she had ceased to be a requisitioned ship.

She was not within the jurisdiction again until Feb. 1920, when she was first at Greenock, then at Glasgow, and afterwards at Cardiff.

Mr. Bateson says that this case comes within the second and obligatory part of the proviso to sect. 8. He says that the evidence is such that the court ought to be satisfied "that there has not during such period [the limitation period of two years] been any reasonable opportunity of arresting the defendant vessel within the jurisdiction of the court or within the territorial waters of the country to which the plaintiff's ship belongs or in which the plaintiff resides or has his principal place of business."

Mr. Balloch says that the court ought not to be satisfied of that at all because there was this period of ten days, and because for a long time, it is quite obvious on the affidavits, the plaintiffs were not thinking about arresting the vessel at all, but were thinking about the matter being arranged by the British Government, both vessels being under requisition.

Whatever the motives of the plaintiffs were for not taking action earlier, the matter I have to determine is whether, within the meaning of sect. 8, there was a reasonable opportunity of arresting the vessel within the jurisdiction of the court. The plaintiffs have satisfied me that there was not. On the facts as I have stated them I think there was not.

It would be quite idle to ask to have the warrant of arrest executed during the time the Largo Law was under requisition, and after she had come off requisition, a matter which was not known immediately to anybody except the owners of the ship. the only occasion on which she could have been arrested was for those ten days during which she was lying in Barry Roads, and I am not at all sure, without knowing all the circumstances, whether the marshal's men could have effectively arrested the ship when she was in Barry Roads.

But assuming that the marshal's men could have effectively arrested the ship while lying in Barry Roads, then I think the plaintiffs have still satisfied me that, notwithstanding that fact, there was no reasonable opportunity of arresting the vessel.

Therefore I think I was right when I granted the first application, and I adhere to that decision and dismiss the defendants' motion.

I should add that it is not irrelevant that the owners of the Lord Dufferin were in Canada and the managers in New York.

PAQUET AND ANOTHER v. CORPORATION OF PILOTS FOR AND BELOW THE HARBOUR OF QUEBEC; ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR CANADA, INTERVENER. (a)

Canada—Quebec Harbour—Corporation of pilots—Legislative authority—British North America Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 3), ss. 91-92 — Canada Shipping Act (Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, s. 123—4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48, ss. 1, 2, 3 (Stat. of Can.).

The respondent corporation, which consists of licensed pilots of the Harbour of Quebec and below, sued the first appellant, a pilot and a member of the corporation, to recover a sum earned by him for services of a pilot of the harbour during the season of navigation of 1917. The defendant pleaded that under 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48 (Stat. of Can.), he was entitled to retain for his own use and benefit the amount of his earnings over and above such sum as might be required for the pilots' pension fund.

Held, that the power conferred on the corporation by 23 Vict. c. 123 (Stat. of Can.), to demand pilot dues and to call on pilots to hand over their earnings as received was extinguished by 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48, ss. 1, 2, 3 (Stat. of Can.). The Dominion Legislature had power under the British North America Act 1867, s. 91, Head 10 (Navigation and Shipping), to enact laws with regard to pilotage, although they trenched upon the property and civil rights in a province. On the question whether the corporation was still entitled to demand from a pilot a contribution to the pilots' pension fund their Lordships expressed no opinion.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Judgment of the Court of King's Bench, reported Q. Rep. 27 K. B. 409, reversed.

APPEAL by special leave from a judgment of the King's Bench for Quebec dated the 3rd April 1918, reversing a judgment of the Superior Court dated the 2nd Nov. 1917.

The action was brought by the respondent corporation against the first appellant, since deceased, in the Superior Court to recover the amount earned by him for pilotage services during the season of navigation of 1917. The defendant pleaded that under the Dominion statute 4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 48, he was entitled to retain for his own use and benefit the amount of his earnings over and above such sum as might be required for the pilots' pension fund.

The action was tried before Dorion, J., who gave judgment for the defendants. On appeal the Court of King's Bench (Archambeault, C.J., and Lavergne, Carroll, and Pelletier, JJ., Cross, J. dissenting) reversed the decision and gave judgment for the present respondents.

By the Order in Council granting special leave to appeal, the Attorney-General for Canada was given leave to intervene as the appeal raised questions in which the Dominion Government had a direct interest.

Macmaster, K.C. and Hon. S. O. Henn Collins for the respondents.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord HALDANE.—In this case the Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada has been made a co-appellant, as the appeal raises questions in which the Dominion Government has a direct interest.

In 1917 the respondent corporation brought the action out of which the appeal arises, in the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec, against a pilot named Paquet, who was one o he members of the corporation, to recover a sum of about $532, being the amount earned by him for services as a pilot of the Harbour of Quebec. In the court of first instance, Dorion, J. decided for the defendant, but on appeal to the Court of King's Bench for the Province this decision was reversed by a majority of the learned judges of that court, Cross, J. dissenting. Paquet died subsequently, and his personal representative is the first appellant.

The plaintiff corporation consists of the licensed pilots of the Harbour of Quebec and below. In 1860 they had been incorporated by a statute of the then Province of Canada. Under that statute the pilots had to hand over their earnings to the corporation, and out of the fund so constituted the former were paid by the latter, who were to distribute the surplus among the pilots.

After the quasi-federal distribution of legislative powers which was effected by the British North America Act in 1867, it is clear that the power to pass laws regulating the pilotage system of the harbour was given exclusively to the Dominion Parliament. Navigation and shipping form the tenth class of the subjects enumerated as exclusively belonging to the Dominion in sect. 91 of the Act, and the second class in the section, the regulation of trade and commerce, is concerned with some aspects at least of the same subject. Whether the words trade and commerce, if these alone had been enumerated subjects, would have been sufficient to exclude the Provincial Legislature from dealing with pilotage, it is not necessary to consider, because, in their Lordships' opinion, the introduction into sect. 91 of the words "navigation and shipping" puts the matter beyond question. It is, of course, true that the class of subjects designated as "property and civil rights" in sect. 92 and there given exclusively to the Province would be trenched on if that section were to be interpreted by itself. But the language of sect. 92 has to be read along with that of sect. 91, and the generality of the wording of sect. 92 has to be interpreted as restricted by the specific language of sect. 91, in accordance with the well-established principle that subjects which in one aspect may come under sect. 92 may in another aspect that is made dominant be brought within sect. 91. That this principle applies in the case before their Lordships they entertain no doubt, and it was, therefore, in their opinion, for the Dominion and not for the Provincial Legislature to deal exclusively with the subject of pilotage after confederation, notwithstanding that the civil rights and the property of the Corporation of Pilots of Quebec Harbour might incidentally, if unavoidably, be seriously affected.

The Dominion Parliament, after confederation, passed what is now c. 113 of the Revised Statutes of Canada 1906, the Canada Shipping Act. Part 6 of that Act dealt with pilotage. By sect. 411 the pilotage district of Quebec is defined, and by sect. 413 the Dominion Minister of Marine and Fisheries is to be the pilotage authority, in whom all the powers of the Harbour Commissioners of Quebec are vested. By subsequent sections the Minister was given powers to regulate the qualifications of pilots, the management and maintenance of their boats and the distribution of their earnings, the performance of their duties, and, subject to the limitation referred to in the case of the Quebec District, the mode and amount of remunerating the pilots, and the establishment of superannuation funds; but the alteration of the rates for pilotage in the Quebec District and of the administration or distribution of their earnings was excluded from the power of the Minister by sect. 434. For some purposes, other than those specifically conferred on the Minister, the respondent corporation retained powers, and among them were rights in certain cases to demand from the masters of ships pilotage dues. Out of the sums thus received the treasurer of the respondent corporation was to set aside 7 per cent. for a pilot fund, and the corporation was to account to the Minister for the administration of this fund, which was due to be employed for superannuation purposes.

It is however, in their Lordships' view unnecessary to determine precisely what powers remained to the respondent corporation after the passing of the Canada Shipping Act, for in 1914 another statute amending it was passed by the Dominion Parliament, and this statute applies in the case before them. It provides by sect. 1 that the Minister, subject to the provisions of the general Canada Shipping Act, is to have charge of the control and management of the pilots and their boats for the pilotage district of Quebec, and of all questions respecting pilotage arising in connection with such district, and of the collection of pilotage dues in respect of such district; and that all powers vested in the Corporation of Pilots of Quebec under Part 6 of the Canada Shipping Act are transferred to and vested in the Minister. By sect. 2 all powers of the Corporation of Pilots with respect to the management and control of pilots and their duties, the collection of pilotage dues and the management and control of pilotage, were thereby repealed. By sect. 3 nothing in the Act was to be deemed to affect any power possessed by the corporation in connection with the management and disposal of the pilot pension fund, but such power was to be exercised under the supervision of the Minister as theretofore.

In their Lordships' opinion it is plain that whatever powers to demand dues, or to call on a pilot to hand over his earnings as received, may have survived to the respondent corporation after the passing of the general Canada Shipping Act, are now extinguished by the first and second sections of the Act of 1914. What right the corporation may have had as between itself and the original defendant Paquet to demand from him a contribution to the superannuation fund is not a question which is before their Lordships. It is enough for them to say that they are unable to take the view of the majority of the learned judges in the Court of King's Bench, that there is no repeal of the title of the respondent corporation to receive the pilotage dues which a pilot may now earn. The result of the Act of 1914 is to get rid altogether of the old title of the corporation, and to enable the Minister to direct that the payment shall be made to the pilot employed and no one else.

They will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, which was in favour of the corporation as plaintiffs, should be reversed and that of Dorion, J., dismissing the action with costs, should be restored. The appellant Paquet will have his costs here, in so far as he has incurred costs, and in the Court of King's Bench. The Attorney-General for Canada, in accordance with the usual practice, will receive no separate costs.

Steamship Magnhild (Owners of) v. McIntyre Brothers and Co. (a) Charter-party — Cesser of hire during grounding of ship and consequent repairs—Construction of words "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer"—Ejusdem generis rule.

A charter-party contained a clause providing "that in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men, or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull, or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." The steamer forming the subject of the award was chartered in Aug. 1916 to load at Sunderland and to discharge at a French port. The steamer was ordered by the French Government to discharge at Marans, which was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. She arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16*th Oct.* 1916, and went aground on soft clay, while going up the river. She remained aground till 1 p.m. on the 24*th Oct., and was damaged in consequence. The work of repairing began on the* 8*th Nov. and lasted for some time. The harbour contained no bar which would cause detention through grounding or otherwise. The arbitrator awarded that hire ceased* (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16*th Oct.* 1916 till 1 p.m. on the 24*th Oct.* 1916 and (b) during the time occupied while the damage to the steamer consequent upon such grounding was being repaired.

Held, that the ejusdem generis rule did not apply so as to restrict the meaning of the words, "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer," in the clause in question, there being no common or dominating feature in the specific words contained in such clause, and that therefore the award of the arbitrator must be upheld.

Action on the award of an umpire stated in a special case for the opinion of the court.

The steamship Magnhild was chartered under the terms of a charter-party dated the 7th Aug. 1916, which contained the following clauses, amongst others:

Clause 1. The said owners agree to let, and the said charterers agree to hire, the said steamer for the term of six calendar months fifteen days more or less from the time . . . the said steamer is delivered and placed at the disposal of the charterers . . . to be employed in lawful trades . . . between good and safe ports or places within the following limits; United Kingdom, Continent Calais/Sicily limits where she can always safely lie afloat or safe aground as charterers or their agents shall direct.

Clause 5. That the said charterers shall pay as hire for the said steamer 3400*l.* per calendar month commencing from the time the steamer is placed at the disposal of charterers . . . in cash without discount monthly in advance.

Clause 12. That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account.

(a) Reported by R. F. Blakiston, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following facts were found by the umpire:

(a) That the charterers fixed the steamer to load at Sunderland and to discharge at La Rochelle, La Pallice, Rochefort, or Tournay Charante.

(b) That by the instructions of the French Government the steamer was directed to proceed to the Ile d'Aix for orders, whence she was ordered by the French Government to discharge at Marans.

(c) That the steamer arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, and that she got aground on soft clay while proceeding up the river at a little bend between two buoys and remained so aground till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916.

(d) That there was no bar in the river harbour or port which caused detention through grounding or otherwise.

(e) That Marans was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party.

It was contended on behalf of the owners that upon the true construction of clause 12 of the charter-party the charterers were not entitled to a cesser of hire for the time lost (a) owing to the grounding of the vessel in the river as aforesaid, and (b) while repairing the damage to the vessel consequent upon such grounding. Subject to the opinion of the court the umpire awarded and determined that hire ceased (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916 till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916, while the steamer was aground as aforesaid, and (b) during the time occupied while the damage done to the steamer consequent upon such grounding was being repaired.

Leck, K.C. and A. Jowitt for the owners.—The main question in the case turns upon the construction of certain words in clause 12 of the charter-party, which is referred to in the special case. That clause runs as follows: "That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer, and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost, and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterer's account." It is submitted that the words "or other accident . . ." must mean something which rendered the steamer inefficient and that the operation of the clause, so far as those words are concerned, was confined to matters ejusdem generis with the words immediately preceding. The rule as to the construction of words ejusdem generis is laid down in the case of Fenwick v. Schmaltz (18 L. T. Rep. 27; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 313). The words in the present case refer to the inefficiency of the steamer and mean something in the nature of a breakdown. The accident referred to must be one affecting the steamer and lasting in effect. It would be different if the words were "any other accident whatsoever":

Mudie v. Strick, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 235; 100 L. T. Rep. 701.

The second part of clause 12 was inserted for the protection of the shipowners:

Schilizzi v. Derry and others, 4 E. & B. 873; Carlton Steamship Company v. Castle Mail Packets Company, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 325, 402; 78 L. T. Rep. 661; (1898) A. C. 486.

The effect of the latter part of clause 12 is to put the burden of delay arising from any deficiency of water on the charterers. The general purpose of the clause was to put the responsibility for the inefficiency of the ship on the ship owner, but any result which followed from the ship being ordered to shallow waters was a risk which attached to the charterers. Taking ground is not a "stranding" under the law of marine insurance, nor does it come within the words "or other accident" in clause 12 of the present charter-party. The charter-party expressly contemplated that the steamer might be used in shallow waters. On the facts found by the umpire there is nothing which brings the charterers within the first part of clause 12 of the charter-party, and the alternative award in favour of the owners is correct.

Stuart Bevan, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the charterers.—The two questions involved in the case are the application of the ejusdem generis rule and the effect of the second part of clause 12 of the charter-party. The question for the charterers is whether they have brought themselves within the terms of the first part of clause 12. The point of law raised is the application of the ejusdem generis rule to the words "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer." The court should consider the whole of clause 12. It is not open to the court to take a limited view of the latter part of the clause by reference to the earlier part:

Jersey (Earl of) v. Neath Poor Law Guardians, 22 Q. B. Div. 555.

There are four specified events; deficiency of men, deficiency of owners' stores, breakdown of machinery or damage to hull. Where is the genus to be found in these events expressly mentioned? Reference may be made to a passage in Scrutton on Charter-parties, 9th edit., p. 222, and to the case of Fenwick v. Schmaltz (sup.). With regard to the latter part of clause 12, I may refer to Smailes and Sons v. Evans and Reid (116 L. T. Rep. 595; (1917) 2 K. B. 54). It has never been suggested that damage did not include grounding. A contention not raised before an arbitrator cannot be put forward in saying that such and such facts have not been found by the arbitrator. The onus of proof lies on the owners to prove that the events which happened came within the latter part of clause 12 and disentitled the charterers to the protection of the first part. "Grounding" is included in the words "or other accident," and comes within the first part of the clause. The word "accident" must be taken generally and a wide and not narrow meaning must be given to clause 12. The words "where there are bars" relate to harbours, rivers, and ports, a "bar" being a natural obstruction and commonly found in such localities.

Leck, K.C. in reply.

McCardie, J. read the following judgment:—This award in the form of a special case involves the construction of a charter-party between the owners of the steamship Magnhild and Messrs. McIntyre Brothers and Co.

The charter-party is dated the 7th Aug. 1916. It is in the form known as the Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter 1912 for European Trade (as revised at Berlin in 1912). [His Lordship read the material clauses of the charter-party.]

The facts, as found by the arbitrator, can be briefly stated. The steamer loaded at Sunderland and was fixed by the charterers to discharge at La Rochelle, La Pallice, Rochefort, or Tournay Charante in France. By the direction of the French Government the steamer was ordered to proceed to the Ile d' Aix for orders. She was then ordered by the French Government to discharge at Marans. She arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, and she got aground on soft clay while proceeding up the river at a little bend between two buoys. She remained so aground till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916. She then got off. She was damaged by the occurrence. Repairs commenced on or about the 8th Nov., and they occupied a substantial time. Marans was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. There was no bar in the harbour, river or port, which caused detention through the grounding or otherwise. The arbitrator awarded that hire ceased (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916, and (b) during the time occupied while the damage to the steamer, consequent upon such grounding, was being repaired. The contention of the owners was that on the true meaning of the charter-party the charterers were not entitled to a cesser of hire for the time lost owing to the grounding of the vessel in the river as aforesaid, while the resultant damage to the vessel was being repaired.

This contention raises a difficult question as to whether or not the ejusdem generis rule does, or does not, apply to the words "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer."

Before the hearing of this case I had often felt a difficulty in stating, and an equal difficulty in applying, this rule. After hearing the able arguments here of Mr. Leck and Mr. Stuart Bevan, and reading many decisions, I realise still more acutely the difficulties which surround the real meaning and the juristic operation of the ejusdem generis doctrine. If I regard this case as it would be looked at by the ordinary layman of business experience and intelligence, I should have no real doubt that the words "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer" covered the facts of the present case. It is, I conceive, clear that there was an accident; and, indeed, if the fortuitous, unexpected and injurious event which here took place was not an accident, I know not what an accident can be. That the accident prevented the working of the steamer seems equally clear. Prima facie, therefore, the award of the arbitrator is right. But Mr. Leck has rested his argument upon the contention that the ejusdem generis rule applies to the words in question, and that they must be read subject to and limited by the preceding words of clause 12. Hence, I feel it may be useful to examine concisely the ejusdem generis doctrine and to refer to the more relevant decisions. It is an unfortunate circumstance that so important a matter of law should be surrounded with so large a measure of obscurity. The dangers of the rule have been indicated by high authority. Thus Fry, L.J. said in the Earl of Jersey's case (22 Q. B. Div. 555, p. 566) (where the document was a deed of conveyance reserving minerals): "The so-called doctrine of ejusdem generis, which I think has often been urged for the sake of giving, not the true effect to the contracts of parties, but a narrower effect than they were intended to have." These words of Fry, L.J. were cited, with approval, by Lord Loreburn, L.C., in Larsen v. Sylvester (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 78; (1908) A. C. 295, p. 296) (a charter-party case), when pointing out the danger of loosely applying the ejusdem generis rule. In the same case (p. 297) Lord Ashbourne says that the above cited words of Fry, L.J. were "wise and reasonable words." Yet in this very case of Larsen v. Sylvester (sup.) I find that Lord Robertson says at p. 297: "I hope nothing will be deduced from our decision to-day which shakes the soundness of what is called the ejusdem generis rule of construction, because it seems to me that both in law and also as matter of literary criticism it is perfectly sound," and in the report of this decision in 13 Com. Cas., p. 333 (though this does not appear in the Law Reports), Lord Loreburn seems to have said at the end of the opinions: "I only desire to say that I agree with what my noble and learned friend Lord Robertson has said as regards the well-established rule of ejusdem generis."

Equally significant are the words of Rigby, L.J. in Anderson v. Anderson (72 L. T. Rep. 313; (1895) 1 Q. B. 749, p. 755) (a post-nuptial settlement case). He there stated: "The doctrine known as that of ejusdem generis has, I think, frequently led to wrong conclusions on the construction of instruments." But the rule exists, and it has been assiduously applied by the courts to statutes, commercial documents, and many other instruments. The risk seems to be that the rule may develop into a juristic fetish.

As to statutes, a large number of decisions are collected in Maxwell on Statutes, 5th edit., p. 537 et seq. That learned author at p. 538 says: "But the general word which follows particular and specific words of the same nature as itself takes its meaning from them, and is presumed to be restricted to the same genus as those words; or, in other words, as comprehending only things of the same kind as those designated by them; unless, of course, there be something to show that a wider sense was intended." At page 546 he says: "Of course, the restricted meaning, which primarily attaches to the general word in such circumstances, is rejected where there are adequate grounds to show that it was not used in the limited order of ideas to which its predecessors belong." At page 549 he says: "The general principle in question applies only where the specific words are all of the same nature. Where they are of different genera, the meaning of the general words remains unaffected by its connection with them." These passages illustrate the complexity of the rule.

It is interesting to contrast the presumption of restriction apparently indicated by Maxwell with the following words from Attorney-General of Ontario v. Mercer (49 L. T. Rep. 312; 8 App. Cas. 767, p. 778 (per Lord Selborne) (a case on the construction of the British North America Act 1867): "It is a sound maxim of law that every word ought, primâ facie, to be construed in its primary and natural sense, unless a secondary or more limited sense is required by the subject of the context." At the root of many cases involving the applicability of the ejusdem generis rule there might well appear to be a question as to whether a presumption exists that general words are primâ facie limited by preceding special words. This point was stated, but expressly left unsolved, by Hamilton, J. in his powerful judgment in Thorman v. Dowgate Steamship Company (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481; 102 L. T. Rep. 242; (1910) 1 K. B. 410, p. 420), a charter-party case. He there said that discussion has arisen "as to whether the presumption of law is that general words are general until they can be shown to be particular, or whether general words are ejusdem generis with the particular words until they can be shown to be general without any limitations. I do not think it is now necessary," he adds, "to embark on that discussion."

If any real presumption exists one way or the other it might substantially affect the interpretation of many documents. Nowhere, perhaps, has it been definitely and authoritatively laid down that any presumption exists. It is difficult to see how it could satisfactorily exist. For a fundamental rule of construction is that every part of a document must be fully considered before any portion of such document be interpreted. If so, it results that general words which are sequent to specific words cannot well be the subject of any presumption at all, inasmuch as they cannot be considered separately from the preceding words without violating the fundamental rule. In Barton v. Fitzgerald (15 East, 530, at p. 541), Lord Ellenborough said (in the case of a lease under seal): "It is a true rule of construction that the sense and meaning of the parties in any particular part of an instrument may be collected ex antecedentibus et consequentibus; every part of it may be brought into action in order to collect from the whole one uniform and consistent sense, if that may be done." And in Hayne v. Cummings (16 C. B. (N. S.) 421, at p. 427), Byles, J. said (in the case of an agreement for a lease): "I apprehend it is a sovereign rule in the construction of all written documents to give effect to the intention of the parties as expressed in the instrument itself, and to give effect, if possible, to every word, or, at all events, to every provision." If there is any presumption that the rule applied whenever general words followed special words, then an added point would be given to the remarks of Lindley, M.R. in Re Stockport Industrial Schools (79 L. T. Rep. 507; (1898) 2 Ch. 687), where he said, at p. 696: "I am quite aware that there have been cases such as Anderson v. Anderson (sup.) (to which I drew attention during the argument) where the court has protested against pushing the doctrine of ejusdem generis too far. It is very often pushed too far."

That any such general presumption exists seems, however, to be contrary to the view of Lord Esher in Anderson v. Anderson (sup.), where he said: "I entirely adopt the canon of construction which was laid down by Sir Knight Bruce, V.C., in Parker v. Marchant (1 Y. & C. Ch. 290), and I reject the supposed rule that general words are, primâ facie, to be taken in a restricted sense." But although there may be no general presumption applicable to documents so various as statutes, deeds, wills, or commercial contracts, yet it is impossible to overlook the fact that the ejusdem generis rule has been so frequently and firmly applied to such contracts as charter-parties, bill of lading, and policies of marine insurance, that undoubtedly both lawyers and commercial men habitually incline to the view that general words in such contracts are, in the majority of cases, normally to be restricted by preceding specific words. This is consistent with the observation of Bowen, L.J. in the Earl of Jersey's case (sup.), where he states that the ejusdem generis rule "is, after all, but a working canon to enable us to arrive at the meaning of the particular document." So, too, the judgment of Hamilton, J. in Thorman v. Dowgate Steamship Company (sup.), says: "The ejusdem generis rule is a canon of construction only. The object of it is to find the intention of the parties. The instrument, the nature of the transaction, and the language used, must all have due regard given to them, and, although it is a commonplace to observe it, I think it is important to bear in mind, first of all, that this is a clause of a kind very familiar in ordinary contracts of carriage or contracts connected with the carriage of cargoes." This observation explains the words of Lord Macnaghten in Steamship Knutsford Limited v. Tillmanns (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 105; 99 L. T. Rep. 399; (1908) A. C. 406, at p. 409), where he said: "I think the rule of ejusdem generis applies as laid down in Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 57 L. T. Rep. 695; 12 App. Cas. 484, at pp. 490 and 501), and I prefer to take the rule on a point of that sort from a case which did deal with bill of lading and shipping documents rather than from cases that dealt with real property and settlements."

Bearing these observations in mind, I next ask: What is this ejusdem generis rule? The matter was cautiously put by Lord Halsbury in the Thames and Mersey Marine case (sup.) at p. 490, where he said: "Two rules of construction now firmly established as part of our law may be considered as limiting those words. One is that words, however general, may be limited with respect to the subject matter in relation to which they are used. The other is that general words may be restricted to the same genus as the specific words that precede them." Now this statement seems to prevent the application of the rule unless a genus can be found. Such view is fully agreeable to the opinion expressed by the Court of Appeal in Steamship Knutsford Limited v. Tillmanns (99 L. T. Rep. 399; (1908) 2 K. B. 385). At p. 395 Vaughan Williams, L.J. says: "If a common genus is not to be found the necessary consequence would be that the words 'or any other cause' could not be limited by the doctrine of ejusdem generis." At p. 403 Farwell, L.J. said: "Unless you can find a category there is no room for the application of the ejusdem generis doctrine. At p. 409 Kennedy, L.J. said: "The genus must be first found, and then you must find whether the words that follow are applicable to the species enumerated belonging to the one genus." So too in Larsen v. Sylvester (sup.) at p. 296, Lord Loreburn said: "These words follow certain particular specified hindrances which it is impossible to put into one and the same genus." What, then, is a genus? I confess that I find great difficulty in answering the question. How the language of natural history came to be applied to the construction of commercial documents or statutes, wills and deeds, I know not. The phrases of science deal with precise things. The phrases of law deal with matter of infinite ambiguity and cross division. Hence it was well said by Hamilton, J. in Thorman's case (sup.), at p. 422, that: "It is not necessary that either genus or differentia should be of extreme scientific precision." But the rule of ejusdem generis cannot be applied at all unless there be some broad test for the ascertainment of genus. So far as I can see the only test seems to be whether the specified things which precede the general words can be placed under some common category. By this I understand that the specified things must possess some common and dominant feature. Thus in Fenwick v. Schmalz (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 313), the words were "except in cases of riots, strikes, or any other accidents beyond his control." The court apparently thought that the words "other accidents" meant accidents ejusdem generis with riots and strikes, in which human instrumentality was concerned. So, too, in Richardsons' case (Re Richardsons and Samuel and Co.. 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 330; 77 L. T. Rep. 479; (1898) 1 Q. B. 261) (a charter-party case), the charter-party excepted, amongst other things, "strikes, lock-outs, accidents to railway," and also "other causes beyond charterers' control." The Court of Appeal held that the ejusdem generis rule applied. A. L. Smith, L.J., said: "Of course, there must be some limitation put upon these words (that is the general words) . . . In my opinion, this clause must be read as covering exceptions ejusdem generis with those that precede it, that is, matters that deal with the impossibility of getting the oil to the port and into the ship." Thus the court found that the specific words in question fell under a common category.

Speaking broadly, the judges in the past seem to have been somewhat acute to find, if reasonably possible, a common category in charter-parties, bill of lading, and policies of insurance. This seems evident from the decisions such as Mudie v. Strick (sup.) and Thorman's case (sup.). Several authorities are collected in the luminous work on charter-parties by Scrutton, L.J., 9th edit., pp. 221-222. I need only add that if the particular words exhaust a whole genus, the general words must refer to a larger genus: (see per Willes, J. in Fenwick v. Schmalz, sup.). But even if a common category be found, there still arises a question as to the operation of the ejusdem generis rule. Must the particular facts in question be similar to the one or other of the specified things before they can be allowed to fall within the general words, or will it suffice if they fall within the genus? Even on this point there seems much doubt. In the Thames and Mersey case (sup.), at p. 501, Lord Macnaghten said, when speaking of general words in a policy of marine insurance: "Ever since the case of Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), when they first became the subject of judicial construction, they have always been held or assumed to be restricted to cases 'akin to' or 'resembling' or 'of the same kind as' those specially mentioned." In an earlier passage, however, he had said that "their office is to cover in terms whatever may be within the spirit of the cases previously enumerated." In Thorman's case (sup.), at p. 417, Hamilton, J. said: "The mere consideration that so many matters have been carefully enumerated (quite superfluously so, unless some restriction is placed upon the subsequent words 'any other cause beyond my control') would lead one to construe that clause according to the ejusdem generis rule, and to say that it was intended by the parties that the time should not count only if the various matters specifically enumerated, or any other cause, similar to them and beyond the charterer's control, interfered with the loading."

Yet Scrutton, L.J. points out in his work on Charter-parties (p. 222) as follows: "It must be remembered that the question is whether a particular thing is within the genus that comprises the specified things. It is not a question (though the point is often so put in argument) whether the particular thing is like one or other of the specified things. The more diverse the specified things the wider must be the genus that is to include them; and by reason of the diversity of the specified things the genus that includes them may include something that is not like any one of the specified things." This, I most respectfully think, is a most cogent, useful, and accurate statement. I need only add that the comparative ease with which the ejusdem generis rule can be prevented from applying is shown by Larsen v. Sylvester (sup.), where the words "of what kind so ever" were held sufficient for that purpose. Now, in directing the above observations to the present case I do not overlook the fact that unless the charterers can bring themselves within the first part of clause 12, hire continued to be payable throughout the chartered period: (see Scrutton on Charter-parties, 9th edit., art. 146, and notes).

Upon the best consideration I can give to this case, I come to the view that the ejusdem generis rule does not here apply. I cannot create a genus (whether scientific or other) out of the specific words. I see no common or dominating feature of such words. Default of the owners cannot, of course, be such a feature, for the matters mentioned in the specific words could arise either with or without such default. Unseaworthiness, whether due to owners' default or not, cannot be a common or dominating feature inasmuch as damage to hull might supervene, although the ship was perfectly seaworthy. Human agency cannot be a common or dominating feature, for damage to hull might arise through tempest or the like as well as through accident caused by human fault. If, then, there be no such common or dominating feature, the ejusdem generis rule cannot apply. Even if a genus could be found, it would, I think, be so wide (having regard to the totality of words) as to allow the present facts to fall within the general words. Those words are, moreover, "or other accident, &c.," which appear to suggest that the precedent genus (if any) was intended to cover cases of accidental occurrences to the ship which prevented her working for twenty-four hours or more. The latter part of clause 12, I also think, seems to assume a wide meaning of the first part. Upon clause 12 as a whole, I form the view that the parties intended that a suspension of hire should ensue under the circumstances here found by the arbitrator.

I therefore uphold the award. The owner must pay the costs of the proceedings before me.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS.

April 26 and May 3, 1920.

(Before HILL, J.)

THE DISPERSER. (a)

Limitation of liability—Position of the parties—Reference—Claim statute-barred—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503-504 —Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.

In a reference following a limitation suit, in which the decree was pronounced more than two years after the collision which gave rise to the suit had taken place, a claim was properly filed, but the claimant had issued no writ. Another claimant objected that the claim was statute-barred.

Held, following The Bellcairn (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503, 582; 53 L. T. Rep. 686; 10 Prob. Div. 161), that the claimants had against each other the same rights which they had against the limiting shipowner and the same rights which he had against them. One claimant was, therefore, entitled to object that the claim of another was statute-barred, but, if the objection was based on sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, it was open to the court to exercise the discretion vested in it by that Act, and to allow a writ to issue.

Observations on the exercise of this discretion where a writ had been withheld because limitation proceedings were pending.

MOTION in objection to the registrar's report.

The Maritime Conventions Act 1911 provides:

Sect. 8. No action shall be maintainable to enforce any claim or lien against a vessel or her owners in respect of any damage or loss to another vessel, her cargo or freight . . . caused by the fault of the former vessel . . . unless proceedings therein are commenced within two years from the date when the damage . . . was caused. . . . Provided that any court having jurisdiction to deal with an action to which this section relates may, in accordance with the rules of court, extend any such period, to such extent and on such conditions as it thinks fit. . . .

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, provides:

Sect. 504. When any liability is alleged to have been incurred by the owner of a British or foreign ship . . . and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of that liability, then the owner may apply in England or Ireland to the High Court . . . and that court may determine the amount of the owner's liability, and may distribute that amount rateably among the several claimants, and may stay any proceedings pending in any other court in relation to the same matter, and may proceed in such manner and subject to such regulations as to making persons interested parties to the proceedings, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of any costs, as the court thinks just.

The facts and contentions are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Balloch for the owners of The Marshalls.

G. P. Langton for the owners of the Caledonia.

HILL, J.—This case raises a question which is not altogether easy, a question as to the relation between sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, and the effect of a decree in a limitation suit. The collision happened between the steamship Caledonia and the lighter The Marshalls, which was in tow of the steamship Disperser. The fault was in the Disperser. There was damage to The Marshalls and the Caledonia. The Disperser was owned by Mr. W. H. Loveridge. The Marshalls, as has been found by the Registrar, was under demise to a syndicate or partnership, of which Mr. Loveridge was a member. At the reference which took place, the Caledonia's claim was agreed at 1053*l.* 6*s.* 5*d.* The registrar has found that the extent of the damage to The Marshalls, measured in money, after excluding Mr. Loveridge's interest, was 388*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* That brings the total claims to over 1400*l.*

A limitation suit was brought by the owner of the Disperser, Mr. Loveridge, and he limited his liability to the sum of 1122*l.* 2*s.* On the reference in the limitation proceedings, in consequence of the limitation decree, those who represented the Caledonia objected to any claim in respect of The Marshalls, on grounds which have been found against them by the registrar mainly in respect of the ownership of The Marshalls, and upon the question of whether the claimants were the demise charterers and whether the person interested was not really Mr. Loveridge.

These objections were overruled by the Registrar. But on behalf of the owners of the Caledonia, the objection was also taken that the claim was barred by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, and that objection the Registrar has found to be good.

The Registrar reports on that point as follows: "In cases of limitation of liability, only those who have either commenced actions to recover damages or who are in a position to maintain actions at the time the decree for limitation is pronounced, are entitled to claim against the fund in court. The claimants here were not in such a position, and it would have been necessary for them to obtain an extension of the time fixed by the statute before any such action could have been maintained. The claim, therefore, must be disallowed." It is upon that ruling that the present motion is made on behalf of those parties who succeeded on the other grounds in respect of the claim for damage to The Marshalls. The material dates are as follows: The collision was on the 31st Oct. 1916. The two years, therefore, would expire on the 31st Oct. 1918. The decree in the damage action of the Caledonia against the Disperser, pronouncing the Disperser alone to blame, was on the 27th March 1918. Messrs. Botterell and Roche were acting at that time as solicitors for the Disperser. They were also instructed in respect of the damage to The Marshalls, and Messrs. Hearfield and Lambert, of Hull, were acting as solicitors for the Caledonia. On the 8th April 1918, Messrs. Botterell and Roche, writing to Messrs. Hearfield and Lambert, said: "We have been instructed by the charterers of the lighter The Marshalls to act for them in connection with their claim for damages against the Disperser. We are informed that the amount paid by them in settlement is in the vicinity of 500*l.* As we understand your claim is in the neighbourhood of 1000*l.*, the total of the two claims will exceed the limit of the Disperser's liability, and in these circumstances it will be necessary for us to commence a limitation action." Messrs. Hearfield and Lambert, in reply, asked Messrs. Botterell and Roche for the names of their clients, the charterers of The Marshalls. Messrs. Botterell and Roche, being at the time misinformed, wrote stating that their clients were Messrs. W. H. Loveridge and Co. Limited, the charterers of The Marshalls. Messrs. Hearfield and Lambert on the 11th April 1918, said: "In any limitation proceedings you commence our clients will oppose the claim you intimate that the charterers of the lighter The Marshalls have against the Disperser."

There the matter rested for the time. The intimations up to this point were that the Disperser was bringing a limitation action; that in it the charterers of The Marshalls would claim, and that the Caledonia would oppose the claim. It seems to me that at that time both parties contemplated that limitation proceedings would be taken, and that means that claimants to the limitation fund would include the charterers of The Marshalls, and that that question would be determined in the ordinary way in the reference following upon the limitation decree. At that time two years from the initial collision had not expired. The claim put forward in respect of The Marshalls was in the name of Mr. Loveridge, but it subsequently turned out that several others were interested. Nothing happened until the 6th May 1919, when the writ in the limitation action was issued. On the 14th July 1919, the decree in that action was made. By that decree it was provided that all claims were to be brought in by the 14th Oct. 1919; it stayed all proceedings that were in existence, and referred all claims to the Registrar. The claim in respect of The Marshalls was filed on the 7th Oct. 1919, and was headed as a claim against the owners of the Disperser by five persons, who were named, including Mr. Loveridge. It turned out afterwards that Mr. Loveridge was interested in the Disperser, and his claim was disallowed. On the 22nd March 1920, the reference was heard, and the various points of objection by the Caledonia to the claim in respect of The Marshalls were taken. On the 25th March 1920 the Registrar made his report.

It is now said by Mr. Balloch that the limitation decree having been made directing all claims to be brought in, and The Marshalls's claim having been brought in within the time mentioned in the limitation decree, they were no further concerned with sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act, and, further, he said that if the court thinks that the Maritime Conventions Act applies, then the time ought to be extended for commencing the proceedings under the discretion given by the proviso to sect. 8. Mr. Langton, on the other hand, contends that the effect of the limitation decree is not to alter the parties' rights except that it limits the amount for which the wrongdoer is liable, and that you have still to see whether the right of The Marshalls is statute-barred, and if it is there are no merits upon which the extension should be granted.

The case has been well argued on both sides. Upon these things there can be no doubt. In the first place, it seems to me quite clear that in the reference which follows a limitation decree it is open to any claimant to dispute the right of any other claimant against the fund. The limiting owner in general ceases to have any interest in disputing anybody's claim because he is liable only for the amount he has paid in, and, that being so, all rival claimants to the fund must be entitled to dispute one another's claims. It is further clear that a claimant cannot establish any right against the fund unless he can establish a good cause of action against the limiting owner. The case of the Bellcairn (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 503, 582; 53 L. T. Rep. 686; 10 Prob. Div. 161) shows that. In that case, cross actions having been dismissed by consent and judgment entered accordingly, those parties were bound by the judgment, and had no longer got any legal right, and, whatever the merits were, they could not at the reference assert that they had any right against the fund.

If each claimant against the fund must establish a legal right against the limiting owner, and if each claimant may raise against the other any defence which the limiting owner could raise, I find it impossible to distinguish a defence given by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act from other defences, and it seems to me that it must be open to a rival claimant to raise a defence against another claimant that his action was barred by the effect of sect. 8. Possibly difficulties may arise where the limitation decree is made before the expiration of the two years.

But I have not to face that here. The limitation decree was made after the two years had expired. Whatever effect a limitation decree may have in preventing people from bringing an action, there was no limitation decree preventing the charterers of The Marshalls bringing an action within the two years. Mr. Balloch puts a case of great difficulty where, for instance, within one month of the expiration of the two years, the limitation decree is made; and he asks, is anybody who has a claim which he intends to bring in a limitation action, to rush in and issue a writ for fear it should be said that he is statute barred. But these difficulties are met by the consideration that the court always has it in its power under sect. 8 to extend the time.

What would have happened if the point had arisen in respect of a claim under Lord Campbell's Act? I need not pause to consider. It would have been more difficult because Lord Campbell's Act has not a proviso enabling the court to exercise a discretion. But the court always has it in its power under the Maritime Conventions Act to extend the time.

Notwithstanding the difficulties which Mr. Balloch has pointed out, I cannot see my way to saying that the effect of the limitation decree is to destroy the effect of sect. 8 as an answer to a claim when the claim is brought in in any limitation proceeding. But when the defence is raised by a rival claimant in limitation proceedings, then always under sect. 8 two issues arise. One is whether the two years have expired, and, secondly, if they have, is the case one in which the court is bound, or ought in its discretion, to extend the time? Those two issues must be determined in some way when raised on the reference. The Registrar is not the proper authority to deal with the question of extension of time and that must come before the court. I should think in ordinary cases if this point had been raised, it would be convenient for the Registrar to deal with all other matters and then withhold the decree until an opportunity had been given to the claimant to apply to the court for an extension of time, and upon that application the rival claimant could be heard in opposition.

Then this case, in my opinion, comes to this point. The Registrar has properly found, and it is not disputed, that the two years have expired. That standing by itself, is an answer to the claim, and it is an answer which the rival claimant is entitled to set up, but the rival claimant cannot escape from having the other issue determined if the other claimant wants it determined. And here in this case Mr. Balloch applies to me to extend the time. Now I have to consider whether the time should be extended. I must take the Registrar's report as I find it. He has found that the people to whom he has made an award were the charterers by demise of The Marshalls, and that they have suffered damage. Mr. Langton says the claim has no merits in it. But I cannot go behind the report. I find that there are four people who have suffered damage, and who would undoubtedly be entitled to claim if they had issued their writ within two years. Ought they to have the time extended? I am bound to pay attention to the correspondence which passed because it seems to me that in 1918 it was contemplated by everybody that the claim in question would be dealt with in the limitation proceedings.

Therefore, I think it is a proper case for exercising a discretion under sect. 8 and for extending the time. And I should think that in most cases in which limitation proceedings are going on, they will be found to be proper cases for extending the time. I do not want what I have said to lead people to issue unnecessary writs. In general where limitation decrees are made I should think that a good reason for not issuing writs, and I hope therefore that when objections based on sect. 8 are taken in limitation cases it will be borne in mind that in general the extension of time ought to be granted if the non-issuing of the writ has merely ensued from the contemplation of the parties that a limitation action would be begun and a limitation reference held.

The result is that in this case I hold that the time ought to be extended, and in the circumstances there will be no costs of this motion.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Insurance — Marine risks — War risks — Ship chartered by Admiralty — Partial loss by marine risks — Unrepaired damage — Total loss by risk not covered by policy—Liability of marine underwriters.

When a vessel insured against perils of the sea is damaged by one of the risks covered by the policy and before that damage is repaired she is lost, during the currency of the policy, by a risk which is not covered by the policy, then the insurer is not liable for such unrepaired damage.

The respondents' steamship E. was insured against marine risks only (including particular average) with the appellants, under a time policy dated the 16th March 1917. The steamship was under charter to the Admiralty on the T. 99 form, under which the Admiralty contract to pay for the loss by war risks of steamers chartered to them, the value to be ascertained at the date of the loss. The E. was sunk by submarine attack on the 25th Jan. 1918, during the currency of the time policy with the appellants. The steamship, before she was lost, had sustained some damage by risks insured against during the currency of the same policy, which had depreciated her value at the date of her total loss by the sum of 1770*l*. The Admiralty accordingly paid the owners 1770*l*. less than they otherwise would have paid, and the owners contended that the marine risk underwriters must make good that sum. The underwriters contended that they were not liable to pay for damage to a vessel, if, before repairs, the damage was followed by total loss during the currency of the same policy.

Bailhache, J. decided that the underwriters were not liable for such unrepaired damage, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

Held, that the judgment of Bailhache, J. was right and should be restored.

Livie v. Janson (1810, 12 East, 648) approved and followed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, which court sought to distinguish Livie v. Janson (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 578; 122 L. T. Rep. 615; (1920) 2 K. B. 643), reversed.

Appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Bankes, Warrington, and Scrutton, L.JJ.), reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 578; 122 L. T. Rep. 615; (1920) 2 K. B. 25, reversing a judgment of Bailhache, J. in favour of the present appellants.

The dispute arose on a policy of marine insurance subscribed for by the appellants on the respondents' steamship Eastlands, and the question for determination was whether the appellants were liable under the policy in respect of damage suffered by the ship, where the damage had not been repaired at the time of her total loss during the currency of the policy, or whether there was a merger of the partial loss in the total loss.

By a marine policy dated the 16th March 1917, for which the appellants subscribed, the respondents' steamship Eastlands was insured against marine risks only (including particular average) for a period of twelve months. At all material times the Eastlands was chartered to the Admiralty under the form of charter known as T. 99, whereby the Admiralty assumed all responsibility for war risks, and agreed in the event of a total loss from war risks to pay the owners the ascertained value at the time of the loss. In Sept. and Oct. 1917 the Eastlands suffered damage through collision, fire, and grounding; and in Jan. 1918 she was torpedoed by a German submarine and was sunk. At the time of her loss the previous damage, to the extent of 1770*l*., was left unrepaired. The Admiralty deducted this 1770*l*. from the sum agreed upon as the sound value of the ship at the time of her loss and the respondents brought an action against the appellants on the marine policy to recover their proportion of the 1770*l*.

Bailhache, J., on the authority of Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648) gave judgment for the appellants, but his judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Bankes, Warrington, and Scrutton, L.JJ.), and judgment was entered for the respondents for the sum claimed.

The House took time for consideration.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Birkenhead).—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing a judgment of Bailhache, J. in an action brought by the respondents against the appellants for a loss under a policy of insurance.

The respondents were the owners of the steamship Eastlands, which was insured against marine risks under a time policy for the period from the 20th Feb. 1917 to the 20th Feb. 1918. The appellants were among the subscribers to that policy. There was no policy covering war risks, but during the whole of the currency of the marine insurance policy the vessel was chartered to the Admiralty under the form of charter known as T. 99, whereby among other obligations the Admiralty assumed all responsibility for war risks, and agreed, in the event of a total loss from such risks, to pay to the respondents the ascertained value of the vessel at the time of such loss.

On three several occasions, namely, on the 16th and 19th Sept. and the 29th Oct. 1917, the ship sustained damage from marine risks. On the 17th Dec. 1917 she was dry docked and surveyed at Cardiff, when temporary repairs were effected to make her seaworthy, but permanent repairs, estimated to cost 1770*l*., were postponed, and, in fact, were never executed for on the 25th Jan. 1918 the vessel was torpedoed by an enemy submarine and became a total loss.

The respondents have received from the Admiralty a sum of money which was calculated by deducting from the agreed "sound" value the sum of 1770*l*., which is the estimated cost of the repairs which were never executed.

There is no dispute as to the appellants' liability for the cost of the temporary repairs. They have paid their proportion, but as to their share of the estimated cost of the unexecuted repairs, they dispute liability on the ground that they are not bound to pay for damage which, before it was repaired, was followed during the currency of the policy by a total loss.

The question which requires decision is whether under a policy of marine insurance the assured can recover in respect of damage sustained by the ship insured during the currency of the policy when the ship is totally lost before the damage is in fact repaired.

It is evident that two aspects of this question may arise: (1) Where the total loss is caused by a peril insured against by the policy in question; (2) where the total loss is not covered by that policy. The first case, as to which no question is raised on this appeal, is governed by sect. 77 (2) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. The second case which requires decision is not dealt with by the Act. Some attempt was made to found argument upon this omission, but no inference can properly be drawn from it either way. It is necessary to examine the law as established by the existing authorities, in conformity with the provision contained in sect. 91 (2) of the Act that "the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance."

The earliest case which requires consideration is Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648), which was decided by Lord Ellenborough in 1810. The action was brought upon a policy of insurance upon the ship Liberty, the insurance being declared "to be on ship and cargo warranted free from American condemnation." During the currency of the insurance the ship was damaged by ice driving the ship ashore. The master and crew endeavoured without success to get the ship off, and the next morning she was discovered and seized by the American authorities. Lord Ellenborough, at p. 653, stated the issue in these terms: "The ship and goods were damaged by the perils of the seas and were afterwards seized by the American Government and condemned; and the question is whether the total loss by subsequent seizure and condemnation takes away from the assured the right to recover in respect of the previous partial loss by sea damage?" And he states his conclusion at p. 654: "We may lay it down as a rule that where the property deteriorated is afterwards totally lost to the assured, and the previous deterioration becomes ultimately a matter of perfect indifference to his interests, he cannot make it the ground of a claim upon the underwriters. The object of a policy is indemnity to the assured, and he can have no claim to indemnity where there is ultimately no damage to him from any peril insured against. If the property, whether damaged or undamaged, would have been equally taken away from him, and the whole loss would have fallen upon him had the property been ever so entire, how can he be said to have been injured by its having been antecedently damaged?"

In whatever form the principle upon which this decision is based should be stated, the decision itself is clearly right. If not, the assured, whose vessel becomes a total loss during a voyage in the course of which she meets a succession of gales, each of which causes damage, would, in a case to which sect. 77 (2) of the Act of 1906 does not apply, be in a position to claim under his policies for each of these losses in succession, although none of them is or could be repaired, and he could at the same time recover the value of the ship as a total loss if she is wrecked during the currency of the policies. Such a result would, of course, be contrary to the principles upon which marine insurance has always been conducted. The owner would not, in such a case, merely be indemnified against loss but he would receive a profit.

Stewart v. Steele (5 Sc. N. R. 927) was a case in which Livie v. Janson (sup.) was cited and discussed both during the argument and in the judgments. Maule, J. in the course of his judgment, at p. 949, stated the fundamental principle: "That the proper time to estimate the loss, where the party is put to no expense, is at the expiration of the risk." This principle underlies the decision of Lord Ellenborough, for, as Maule, J. in an earlier passage on the same page, says: "It is said that the plaintiff had a vested right of action at the moment of the happening of the loss which nothing could afterwards divest. That, I apprehend, is quite contrary to the doctrine laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Livie v. Janson." The learned judge was of opinion that, inasmuch as the time for assessing unrepaired damage is at the expiration of the risk, if the vessel is totally lost before the risk expires there is nothing upon which such assessment can be made.

Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649) contains a comment by Campbell, L.C.J. upon Livie v. Janson, and the other judges of the court were parties to this comment. He remarked at p. 668: "The insurers on a ship, if they pay a total loss, certainly are not liable likewise in respect of any prior partial loss which has not been repaired; and if a total loss occurs from which they are exempt they are not liable for any prior partial loss which, in that event, does not prove prejudicial to the assured," and he pointed out that in Livie v. Janson the risk which caused the total loss was expressly excepted from the policy.

Such was the state of the authorities at the date when the last edition, which was prepared by the author of Arnould's Law of Marine Insurance, was published in 1857. In that work, 2nd edit., vol. 2, pp. 1003, 1004, the late Mr. Arnould stated the law in the following terms: "If a ship has been actually repaired in a port of distress, and be afterwards totally lost before arriving at her port of destination, the cost of such repairs may be recovered cumulatively in addition to the total loss, either quâ average or as money laid out and expended in labouring for the safeguard and recovery of the ship under the general printed clause in the policy; but this rule only applies to repairs actually made; hence, where a ship was put back twice in distress, and on the first occasion was actually recoppered, but on the second occasion was only surveyed but not repaired, and in the course of the survey some of her wales, &c., were necessarily removed in order to examine her timbers, and never replaced, but sold, with the rest of the ship, as wreck, it was held that the cost of the recoppering might be recovered in addition to a total loss, but not the estimated cost of replacing the wales; where no repairs have been made, no previous partial loss by sea damage can be recovered from the underwriters as a particular average, in addition to a subsequent total loss, but where a previous partial loss, though unrepaired, is followed by a sale of ship, which, not being justifiable, does not transfer the property, nor operate a total loss, such partial loss may be recovered." It is clear from the footnotes that the learned author did not forget that the subsequent total loss might be from a risk excepted from the policy and that he did not consider that this circumstance affected the liability of the underwriters for unrepaired partial damage. In other words, if, after partial damage has been sustained and before it is repaired, the ship is totally lost during the currency of the policy, then, in his opinion, the underwriter is under no liability for such partial damage, whether he has to pay a total loss or not.

The next case of importance is Lidgett v. Secretan (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 95; 24 L. T. Rep. 942; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 616), decided by Willes, J. In that case, while a ship which had suffered partial damage was being repaired, the policy expired and shortly afterwards, before the repairs could be completed, she was totally destroyed by fire. During the argument the learned judge remarked that the reason for applying the doctrine of merger "where the partial loss and the total loss occur during the continuance of the same risk is obvious; the parties never intended that the insurers should be liable for more than a total loss in any event. But the same reason does not apply where the partial loss takes place during the period covered by one policy and the total loss whilst the ship is insured for a different voyage and under another policy," and in his judgment at p. 625, he reverts to this topic and comments on Livie v. Janson: "There is another case—viz., where after the vessel has sustained damage but has not been repaired, and has subsequently and during the currency of the policy been totally lost by a peril excepted out of the policy and in respect of which the assured was his own insurer. Such was the case of Livie v. Janson." Mr. Wright admitted that if this passage were good law, then the respondents must fail, but he contended that the dictum was wrong.

Lindley, J. in Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 46 L. T. Rep. 863; 9 Q. B. Div. 192) made a pronouncement to the same effect as that of Willes, J. and Mr. Wright also admitted that if this opinion was in law well founded the respondents in this case are wrong. Pitman's case turned upon the question: What is the true principle upon which an unrepaired loss is to be estimated? In the course of his judgment Lindley, J. remarked: "Against what do the underwriters agree to indemnify the assured? Surely against such loss as he may in fact sustain by reason of the perils insured against. That this is so is plainly proved by those cases which decide that, where a ship has been injured and not repaired, the assured must wait until the expiration of the risk before he can sue the underwriters for the loss he has sustained. The assured has no vested right of action when the injury is sustained. If, in such case, the ship is lost whilst the policy is running by a peril not insured against, the assured has no right of action at all; and if she is lost by a peril insured against the assured can only claim for a total loss: he cannot claim both." The judgment of Lindley, J. was upheld by the Court of Appeal, with a variation which is not relevant to this part of his judgment.

The authorities establish the existence of a rule whereby underwriters are not liable for unrepaired damage if there is a total loss before the expiration of the policy. As stated by Lord Ellenborough in Livie v. Janson, and by the Court of Queen's Bench in Knight v. Faith, the rule might appear to be limited to the case where "the previous deterioration became ultimately a matter of perfect indifference to the assured's interests." Bailhache, J. (adhering to the view expressed by Willes, J. and Lindley, J. in the cases cited) came to the conclusion that there was no such limitation. The Court of Appeal, on the other hand, having regard to the statement of the rule by Lord Ellenborough and Lord Campbell, were of opinion that the condition was an integral part of the rule, and therefore that the present case was on the facts distinguishable from Livie v. Janson. If Lord Ellenborough's words are taken to mean that the circumstance more than once and somewhat pointedly insisted on is a condition to the application of the rule, the Court of Appeal may well have been right in the distinction which they drew. I have, however, come to the conclusion that no such condition ought to be admitted. Lord Ellenborough was dealing with unusual facts, and his judgment must be construed in relation to those facts, but the rule ought not to be limited in the manner suggested. I adopt the reasoning of Bailhache, J. in the following passage from his judgment: "Whether an underwriter is or is not liable for unrepaired damage cannot be ascertained until the expiration of the policy. If before the expiration of the policy there is a total loss, he is not liable to pay for the earlier unrepaired damage sustained during the currency of the same policy, and it makes no difference whether the total loss falls upon him or is due to an excepted peril against which the owner is insured or uninsured. The true doctrine is that the smaller merges in the larger, and the rule is not limited to the ground upon which it was based by Lord Ellenborough, namely, that there was no continuing prejudice. The question in every case must be: Did the total loss happen before the underwriter's liability for the unrepaired damage accrued? If yes, he is not liable; if no, he is liable. It would be strange if an underwriter's liability should vary with the terms of some contract not needing to be disclosed to him which the owner has made with some stranger to the contract of insurance."

It is beyond doubt that if the respondents had been their own insurers they could not have recovered. Their argument in effect is that by an independent contract of their own which confers on them a right of indemnity they have been enabled to increase the burden on the insurers, and this by reason of the circumstance that, as it has been applied, they have not obtained a complete indemnity. As to the amount which the Admiralty deducted from the "sound" value the respondents were their own insurers, and their loss is due therefore not to a peril insured against, but to their failure to obtain complete indemnity under the terms of their charter-party. Such a cause is no concern of the underwriters and cannot, in my judgment, be treated as a material fact in determining their liability.

The true rule is capable of statement in the following proposition. When a vessel insured against perils of the sea is damaged by one of the risks covered by the policy and before that damage is repaired she is lost, during the currency of the policy, by a risk which is not covered by the policy, then the insurer is not liable for such unrepaired damage. The rule so stated embodies the principle upon which underwriters and merchants have based their practice in such matters for upwards of a century, and, even if this House were of opinion that the rule did not correctly state the law, it would be a matter for grave consideration whether such a rule, which has been observed for so long, which has been expressly or impliedly incorporated in so many contracts, and which has profoundly influenced the course of dealing between merchants, should be reversed at this period of its history. In my opinion this question does not arise.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be reversed and that of Bailhache, J. be restored, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord FINLAY.—The facts in this case are few and simple.

The Wilson Company were the owners of the steamship Eastlands. That vessel was chartered to the Admiralty under the form of charter known as T. 99, under which the Admiralty are not liable for any sea risks, but undertake risks of war "on the ascertained value of the steamer if she be totally lost at the time of such loss or, if she be injured, on the ascertained value of such injury." The Wilson Company insured the steamer against sea risks in the value of 82,000*l*. under a time policy subscribed by the appellants, the British and Foreign Insurance Company, covering the period from the 20th Feb. 1917 to the 20th Feb. 1918.

In Sept. and Oct. 1917 the Eastlands sustained damage by sea risks and put into Cardiff for repairs. The repairs were estimated at 2698*l*. Repairs to the amount of 928*l*. were executed, but as the vessel was urgently wanted by the Admiralty the remaining repairs, estimated at 1770*l*., were not executed. The vessel proceeded to sea, and on the 25th Jan. 1918 she was torpedoed by a German submarine and sunk. The Admiralty agreed with the owners that 82,000*l*. represented the sound value of the Eastlands at the time of the loss, but claimed to deduct from this the value of the repairs which had not been executed—1770*l*. The amount paid to the owners was therefore 80,230*l*. The owners have been paid the value of the repairs actually executed at Cardiff, but the underwriters dispute their liability for the 1770*l*. in respect of the unexecuted repairs on the ground that the total loss occurred during the currency of the policy of insurance against sea risks and that the recovery for the unrepaired partial damage is barred under the authority of Livie v. Jansen (1810, 12 East, 648).

The case came before Bailhache, J., who decided against the claim on the authority of Livie v. Jansen. His decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal, where it was held that the principle there laid down did not apply if in the event the owner was damnified by the partial loss, and that there was such damnification in the present case, inasmuch as but for the unrepaired damage the Admiralty would, under the contract of charter-party, have paid to the owners 1770*l*. beyond the 80,230*l*. actually paid.

The liability of the insurer in the case of total loss in any ordinary insurance is for the value of the vessel at the commencement of the risk. If the indemnity given by the Admiralty against war risks had been in that form no claim for the partial loss would have arisen, as the payment for the total loss would have been on the sound value of the ship at the commencement of the risk.

The question in the case is whether the shipowners are entitled for this purpose to rely on the fact that by reason of their special bargain with the Admiralty there fell to be deducted from the value of the vessel the sum of 1770*l.* in respect of the unrepaired damage as taking them out of the rule in Livie v. Jansen. In that case the insurance was on ship and cargo from New York to London, warranted "free from American condemnation," these last words having reference to an embargo that had been imposed by the United States Government. The vessel, in leaving New York, was driven by floating ice upon the rocks and seriously damaged. She was seized by the officers of the American Customs House, and the ship and cargo were condemned for breach of the embargo. The policy covered the deterioration in the vessel and cargo due to the sea damage, while in respect of the total loss by seizure and condemnation the owner was his own insurer. Lord Ellenborough held that the underwriter could not be made liable for the sea damage. He said: "Considering the deterioration of the ship and cargo then as the extent of what is referable of sea damage, we think we may lay down as a rule that where the property deteriorated is afterwards totally lost to the assured, and the previous deterioration becomes ultimately a matter of perfect indifference to his interest, he cannot make it the ground of a claim upon the underwriters. . . . If the property, whether damaged or undamaged, would have been equally taken away from him and the whole loss would have fallen upon him had the property been ever so entire, how can he be said to have been injured by its having been antecedently damaged?"

If the damage resulting from the sea perils had been repaired the amount disbursed for that purpose would have been recoverable on the policy in spite of the subsequent loss. But if the repairs have not been executed the liability cannot accrue until the termination of the risk under the policy, and if, before that happens, there is a total loss, the partial loss is "swallowed up" in the total.

The decision in Livie v. Janson is attacked by Mr. Phillips in his Treatise on the Law of Insurance (5th edit., vol. 1, ss. 1136 and 1137). I am unable to agree with the criticisms there made. Livie v. Janson was carefully considered by Willes, J. in Lidgett v. Secretan (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 95; 24 L. T. Rep. 942; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 616). In that case there was an outward policy at and from London to Calcutta, and for thirty days after arrival, and a homeward policy at and from Calcutta to London, both of which were underwritten by the defendant. On the outward voyage the vessel sustained damage from sea perils. She reached Calcutta, and was dry-docked for repairs. While repairs were in progress the outward policy expired, and afterwards, and while the ship was still at Calcutta, she was totally destroyed by fire. It was held that under the homeward policy the assured were entitled to recover for total loss in respect of the fire, and that under the outward policy the assured were entitled to recover the amount of the vessel's depreciation at the expiration of the risk in consequence of the damage on the outward voyage without reference to the sum actually expended on her repairs. During the argument an extract was read from a shorthand note of a judgment by Willes, J. in a previous case, Potter v. Campbell (16 W. Rep. 401), in which he said: "The doctrine of merger must be limited to a loss happening during the period over which the underwriters' liability extends." On the same page (620) Willes, J. is reported as having said, in the course of the argument, that the doctrine of merger could not apply where the partial loss takes place during the period covered by one policy, and the total loss while the ship is insured on a different voyage and under another policy. Willes, J. develops this at some length in the judgment, and the decision was that there was no merger.

This amounts to a recognition of the correctness of the decision in Livie v. Janson, while it is pointed out that the decision has no reference to a case in which the risk under the policy convering the partial damage has run out before the total loss.

Livie v. Janson was decided in 1810, and has always been recognised in England as a decision of authority. It was referred to with approval in Stewart v. Steele (1842, 5 Sc. N. R. 927) by Maule, J. during the argument, and in his judgment in Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649) it was recognised by Lord Campbell, while it was pointed out that in the particular circumstances of that case its doctrine did not apply. It has been generally recognised in the text-books. In my opinion Livie v. Janson is good law, and the only question is as to the limits within which the doctrine there laid down is applicable.

Lord Ellenborough, in Livie v. Janson, pointed out that by the supervening total loss the unrepaired partial loss had become a matter of indifference to the owners. In Knight v. Faith Lord Campbell said that in Livie v. Janson: "The assured in the event which happened were not in any degree prejudiced by the partial loss, which only rendered the ship less valuable to the American Government, the assured being in the same situation as if the partial loss had never occurred."

In the present case the applicants contend that they have been prejudiced by the partial loss inasmuch as in respect of it they have received 1770*l.* less from the Admiralty than they would otherwise have received. This is true, but the clause of indemnity in the charter-party is a special one. Under the ordinary policy what is recovered in respect of a total loss is the value of the ship at the commencement of the risk. If the indemnity under clause 19 of the charter-party had been in respect of the value of the steamer at the commencement of the risk, there would have been no prejudice to the assured by reason of the partial loss. He would have recovered the value of the vessel as it stood at the commencement of the risk, when the partial loss had not occurred. It is only by reason of the special bargain with the Admiralty contained in clause 19 of the charter-party that he received from them less in respect of the unrepaired partial damage.

Bailhache, J., in the course of his judgment, said: "It would be strange if an underwriter's liability, which is that a ship should remain unhurt by a peril insured against during the currency of the policy, and whose liability is determined by her loss during the insured term by an excepted peril should vary with the terms of some contract not needing to be disclosed to him which the owner has made with some stranger to the contract of insurance. . . . In my judgment, the plaintiff's position by reason of his charter-party with the Admiralty is an irrelevant circumstance."

The judgments in the Court of Appeal do not appear to me to deal adequately with this point. They proceed on the basis that the very special nature of the bargain with the Admiralty which reduced the amount payable by the value of the unrepaired damage may be disregarded. They treat the loss of the 1770*l.* as if it had happened in the ordinary and natural course of things, whereas it occurred only by reason of the special terms in clause 19 of the charter-party.

There is no evidence that the existence of this special clause was known to the insurers in respect of sea risks. Indeed, counsel for the appellants, in answer to a question put by the Lord Chancellor, disclaimed resting his case upon any such ground. I express no opinion as to what would have been the liability of the insurers in the present case if there had been evidence from which it could be inferred that their contract of insurance was entered into with reference to the special liability of the Admiralty for total loss under the charter-party.

In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Shaw.—I entirely agree with the judgment of Bailhache, J. in this case, and I venture to express my full concurrence with the views set forth by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in his address.

Out of respect to the Court of Appeal, I think it right to add these few words.

The Eastlands was torpedoed by an enemy submarine, and became a total loss on the 25th Jan. 1918. She had had during the preceding few months several mishaps, and then had been sufficiently repaired to make her seaworthy. All these repairs have been met by the underwriters. There was, however, unrepaired damage done to the vessel to the extent of 1,770*l.* When the vessel was totally lost, the "sound" value of the steamer was ascertained to be 82,000*l.*, and the damaged value necessarily 1770*l.* less. Had accordingly that 1770*l.* been expended by the owners on the repair of the vessel, they would have received 82,000*l.* for the total loss. What the owners, however, now claim is that they are entitled to finance the situation on the footing that, having received 80,300*l.* from the Admiralty, they are entitled to receive a further payment of 1770*l.* from the appellants in order to indemnify them against making good a repair on the vessel to the extent of 1770*l.*, although the fact is, no repair upon the vessel is now possible. The question is whether the law of England justifies such a demand.

In my own opinion, no doubt can be cast on the accuracy of the judgment in the case of Livie v. Janson. It is one of a long series. It has never been disapproved. On the contrary, has been uniformly accepted as sound law.

Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648) was decided in 1910. In 1842 came Stewart v. Steele (5 Sc. N. R. 927); in 1850, Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649); in 1871, Lidgett v. Secretan (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 95; 24 L. T. Rep. 942; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 616); and in 1882, Pitman v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 46 L. T. Rep. 863; 9 Q. B. Div. 192). It will not be found in this series of cases of high authority that doubt has been cast upon Livie v. Janson.

There are two dicta in the course of that series to which I wish to make special reference.

In Stewart v. Steele Maule, J. puts the actual issue involved in the argument of the appellants thus: "It is said that the plaintiff had a vested right of action at the moment of the happening of the loss, which nothing could afterwards divest." The answer he gave was clear: "That, I apprehend, is contrary to the doctrine laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Livie v. Janson." Further, according to Maule, J., and in this, I think, he stated acknowledged law, that the proper time of estimating the loss where the party is put to no expense is at the expiration of the risk.

Further, what appears to me to approach most nearly to the fundamental principle of such cases is to be found clearly set forth in the judgment of Lord Justice Lindley (then Lindley, J.) in Pitman's case. I venture to repeat it.

"Against what did the underwriters agree to indemnify the insured? Surely against such loss as he may in fact sustain by reason of the perils insured against. That this is so is plainly proved by those cases which decide that where a ship has been insured and not repaired, the assured must wait until the expiration of the risk before he can sue the underwriters for the loss he has sustained. . . . The assured has no vested right of action for the injury he has sustained. If in such case a ship is lost whilst the policy is running by a peril not insured against, the assured has no right of action at all. And if she was lost by a peril insured against, the assured can only claim for her total loss, but cannot claim both for a total loss and for the previous partial loss, as he might if the damage had been actually repaired." That is expressly the principle which underlies sect. 77 (2) of the Marine Insurance Act of 1906. It is true, of course, that that section is framed to cover the case of a partial loss, and a total loss, "under the same policy." But the common law of England was not repealed by that statute, and, in my opinion, no argument to that effect can be derived from sect. 77 (2) dealing with the one specific case.

When a ship, damaged but only partially repaired, is totally lost, it becomes impossible to complete her repair. No contract of indemnity can apply to being recouped for such repair, because that would be to present a false and impossible demand for indemnification, i.e., indemnification for an expenditure which can never be made. If once the principle of indemnity were extended the length of permitting a mere right of action to be the ground or the measure of the indemnity, then the reality of the case is lost sight of, for the right of action is a mere abstraction and represents in truth a right to be recouped for expenses which can never be laid out, and the word "indemnity," or the word "recouping" fails on account of sheer self-inconsistency. One finds oneself not in the region of indemnity against loss, but in the region of profit-earning. This is contrary to all sound principles of marine insurance, and, apart from all those authorities which have been most properly canvassed, I am of opinion, on the principle I have just stated, that this appeal should succeed.

Lord Moulton.—The question raised by this appeal is one of great gravity. It is in substance the question whether the law laid down by the decision in Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648) should be reversed. This decision, delivered by a judge of great eminence, has formed part of the law of marine insurance in this country for more than a century. It has been accepted and acted upon again and again without hesitation by our courts, and the respondents have been unable to produce to us any later decision that throws doubt upon it. Judges of great eminence have taken part in decisions which have treated it as sound law. It is so treated in all the text-books, and there can be no doubt that contracts of insurance to which it applies have during this long series of years been framed on the basis of its authority. Under such circumstances, I should have felt great reluctance in setting aside such a decision even if I felt some doubt as to whether the reasoning of the judgment might not be open to criticism. But I feel no such doubt. In my opinion the decision was right in every respect, and I am glad that your Lordships' House has an opportunity of giving to it its express authority. Indeed, if the case of Livie v. Janson had been decided otherwise, the decision would, in my opinion, have been so inconsistent with the principles of our law of insurance that it would not have stood test of time, but would have been speedily differed from by other courts, and would ultimately have been set aside. The only alternative to that decision would have been to hold that when damage was done by perils insured against there instantly accrued a pecuniary claim against the insurer for the estimated cost of the repairs, whether done or undone, a doctrine which, among other things, would have led to the absurd result that all the damage done to a ship immediately before or in a storm in which she was totally lost might be claimed as particular average by an owner who had not insured against total loss.

I am aware that the judgments of the learned Lords Justices in the court below are not formally based on a dissent from the decision in Livie v. Janson. They purport to distinguish it upon a point arising out of the special facts of that case, and accordingly they give such an interpretation of the judgment delivered by Lord Ellenborough in that case to make it inapplicable to the case now before us. I am of opinion that the interpretation which they give to the decision makes it turn on a matter which did not constitute any portion of the reasoning which led to that decision. But I go farther. In my opinion the facts of this case, so far as they are relevant to the right of the parties, make it an exact parallel to the case of Livie v. Janson, so that, however the language of the judgments in that case be interpreted, the present case must fall within it. It is only by admitting into their consideration facts which ought to have been excluded by reason of their being res inter alios actæ that the learned members of the Court of Appeal have been able to raise a doubt as to whether this case comes precisely within the law as laid down in Livie v. Janson.

The facts of this case are very simple. The steamship Eastlands, belonging to the respondents, was insured with the appellants against total loss on a valued policy for 182,500*l*. That policy included also an insurance against particular average. War risks were excluded. She sustained damage at sea which was partially repaired at Cardiff at a cost of 928*l*., and this sum has been duly paid to the respondents by the insurers. There remained unrepaired damage to an estimated amount of 1770*l*. The ship then sailed from Cardiff and was totally lost by an excepted risk. The above are all the facts relevant to the liability of the appellants under the policy, and, according to the decision in Livie v. Janson, the total loss of the vessel puts an end to all claim for the cost of the unexecuted repairs which have now been rendered impossible by the total destruction of the thing to be repaired.

What is then the claim of the plaintiffs in the action? They allege that they made a contract with the Government relative to the charter of the vessel which, while covering them to a certain extent from the excepted perils, did not cover them with regard to unexecuted repairs. What have these matters to do with the liabilities of the insurers under the policy which they signed? It is admitted in the frankest manner by the counsel for the respondents that the insurers had no connection whatever with the contract between the respondents and the Government, or with the circumstances under which the respondents entered into that contract. It is also admitted (as is otherwise evident) that the losses sued for in this action are solely due to the special provisions of that contract. To quote from the judgment of Bankes, L.J., "the question is . . . what have the appellants (i.e., the present respondents) in fact lost under the contract with the Government by reason of the fact that the vessel had sustained the partial damage which had not been repaired?"

These considerations appear to me to decide the rights of the parties to this action. The insurer's liabilities are fixed by the contract that he has signed and cannot be increased by an act of the assured to which he is no party. It is true that those liabilities may in some cases be lessened by such acts as in a case where the assured has made further contracts which give rise to rights of contribution. But they cannot be increased. This rests on something deeper than the special law of insurance. It is a fundamental principle of our law of contracts. So far as the insurers were concerned they might therefore assume that the assured was making no insurance against the excepted perils, and was taking the war risks on himself. It was immaterial to them whether he was so doing or not so long as they remained strangers to any action that he might take in the matter. I fully agree with the language of Bailhache, J. in his judgment in this case when he says: "It would be strange if an underwriter's liability, which is that the ship should remain unhurt by a peril insured against during the currency of the policy and whose liability is determined by her loss during the insured term, should be increased by reason of some contract not needing to be disclosed to him which the owner has made with some stranger to the contract of insurance," and I also agree with his language at the conclusion of his judgment to the effect that "the plaintiff's position by reason of his contract with the Admiralty is an irrelevant circumstance."

It is because I am of opinion that the court below should have on these grounds excluded the matter of the contract with the Admiralty from their consideration in determining the liabilities of the appellants that I regard this case as differing in no respect from the case of Livie v. Janson, which I hold to have been rightly decided. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, and the judgment of Bailhache, J. should be restored and that the appellants should have their costs here and in the Court below.

Lord SUMNER.—Sect. 77 (2) of the Marine Insurance Act, by using the words "under the same policy," enacts something narrower than the decision in Livie v. Janson, for in that case a partial loss, insured under the policy in suit, was followed by a total loss during the same voyage, but not insured under that policy. I do not know why this course was taken. The section is one of a fasciculus of sections headed "Measure of Indemnity," throughout which the words "a policy" and "the policy" are constantly used to denote not merely a single instrument, whether subscribed by one underwriter or by many, but also an entire insurance on the same subject-matter, which is spoken of as one insurance and referred to as if it was expressed in one instrument, although, in fact, the total value insured in respect of that subject-matter may only be fully covered under several instruments or even may only be partially covered by them, while for the residue the assured, as it is said, "becomes his own underwriter."

I surmise, therefore, that what this section is really referring to by these words is not a single instrument covering two losses, which are not simultaneous, but is an aggregate insurance effected in one or more policies on one subject-matter, in which the assured is his own underwriter, both for any uncovered part of the total value of his insurable interest in it, and also for any uncovered peril among the aggregate of the perils, to which the subject-matter is actually exposed. If so, the words "under the same policy" mean "during the adventure insured," whether it be a voyage or a period of time.

The question is more curious, however, than important, for sect. 91 (2) preserves Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648), and to its full extent according to the true construction, unless or until it is overruled. What I think is important is, that the Act says nothing about the partial loss becoming ultimately a matter of perfect indifference to the assured's interest, but only speaks of a sequence in time between a partial loss and a total loss, and of the partial loss not having been repaired. No inference against taking the rule in Livie v. Janson in its widest sense can be drawn from the Marine Insurance Act, but I think that the language of sect. 77 (2) is against the limited construction placed on that rule by the Court of Appeal.

In my opinion, Lord Ellenborough's language does not mean that two conditions must concur to relieve an underwriter from liability for unrepaired damage; first, the occurrence of a subsequent total loss; and, second, an absence of any pecuniary interest whatever in the unrepaired partial loss. The words: "And the previous deterioration becomes ultimately a matter of perfect indifference to his interests" explain the effect which the subsequent total loss has on the prior unrepaired damage, and so justify the rule.

Bankes, L.J. reads the words as though Lord Ellenborough had only said "where the previous deterioration becomes ultimately a matter of perfect indifference to his interests," had confined the rule to that case; but they do not really except out of the rule cases where, owing to matters not within the terms of the insurance, the partial loss happens to affect the rights of the assured under contracts, to which the underwriter is a stranger. It is simply a fuller expression of the idea afterwards expressed by the word "merger." If the rule means that unrepaired partial losses are swallowed up in subsequent total loss, when the assured is none the worse for them, but survive, and must be paid for, if he would be out of pocket unless he recovers for them on the policy, inadmissible results would follow.

I do not see why on this argument the unrepaired partial loss by marine perils should not be recoverable from the marine underwriters on the simple ground that, owing to the insolvency of war-risk underwriters, no indemnity at all can be got for the subsequent total loss by hostilities. So stated, the principle is independent of proximate or direct causation. It would not matter whether the pecuniary prejudice was the direct or the indirect consequence of the partial loss. If indirect prejudice, directly due to the form of the charter T. 99, enables the assured to recover for the partial loss unrepaired, so would diminution of freight-earning power under the charter, consequent on the damage being unrepaired. On the other hand, if there were a rise in shipping values after the damage was done, which partially or wholly restored the value of the ship as at the date of the total loss to what it had been before the damage was done, this, by throwing on to the Admiralty under the charter part or the whole of the amount of the depreciation due to the absence of repair, would diminish or do away with the marine underwriter's liability. In this case his liability would be made to depend on market fluctuations of the value of the ship during the currency of the policy.

Nor am I pressed by the statement that in some cases "the assured may nevertheless have rights or claims in respect of that prior loss, which may not be extinguished by the subsequent total loss." If Livie v. Janson, where the assured had no policy against capture, was not such a case, a fortiori the present case is not such an exception. Further, the illustrations put for the purpose of showing that the rule in Livie v. Janson, widely applied, may produce anomalous consequences, seem to me to be either fortuitous hard cases or to be instances of want of skill in arranging the details of the insurances effected. If an assured chooses to be his own underwriter against collision, and look only to the ship that is to blame, no doubt he may come off worse than if he had insured, but this is not a reason for increasing the liability of the underwriters, with whom he insured, beyond what it would have been, if he had taken out a policy against the risk of collision.

I do not see anything intrinsically in conflict with a contract of insurance in the proposition, that perils insured against have not caused any direct loss, where, although the ship was damaged, the owner had nothing to pay, and although the ship was depreciated, she ceased to exist as a ship before the time came for measuring the amount to be recovered. At that date there was no pecuniary loss against which the owner would be indemnified.

I agree that it is not now practicable to overrule the law as it has so long been understood to have been laid down in Livie v. Janson. I do not, however, rely merely on its authority. I think it is fully consistent with what I take to be the principles of marine insurance. In practice contracts of insurance by no means always result in a complete indemnity, but indemnity is always the basis of the contract. Where all the risks to which a ship is exposed at one time are covered by each of several underwriters, and it is only the total amount of the insurance that is distributed, the aggregate of the insurance is regarded as having been designed to give one indemnity, and for certain purposes the policies are so applied. If the assured has not insured the full value insurable, he is deemed to be his own underwriter for the residue.

The foundation of the rule in Livie v. Janson, of course, is that an assured cannot be allowed to recover under a contract of indemnity both a total loss, which he has suffered, and a partial loss, which in substance he has not. It is said, and truly, that it is a rule to prevent the assured from recovering more than a full indemnity, not to save underwriters from having to pay a full indemnity, but—what is a full indemnity? If the application is limited to the one policy in suit, or to the one subscriber sued, the whole attempt to restrict the assured to one full indemnity fails at once. If it extends to the whole body of assurances, which he takes out in respect of all risks affecting the subject matter of insurance during the voyage or time adventured upon, the measure of a full indemnity is only got by looking at the risks run, not at the persons liable for them. Otherwise, the indemnity would be full or more than full at the mere choice of the assured.

It seems to me that the aggregate of the insurances is to be looked at, where it is the perils insured against that are distributed, and some perils causing loss or some categories of loss, caused so, are covered by one person and some by another. I do not see why an assured should be allowed to recover more than an indemnity where his war risk is placed with A. and his marine risk with B., if he could not have done so had both been placed with A. or both with A. and B. in equal moieties. Further, and for the same purpose, namely, that of reducing insurance as far as possible to a complete indemnity, I do not see why an assured should not be considered to be his own underwriter where he places one set of risks with one set of underwriters and another with another, just as much as where one set of underwriters covers, although not to the full amount.

If he has not assured a complete indemnity by the owner effecting contracts, which will procure it for him, he must to the extent of the deficit be treated as having underwritten it himself. I regard art. 19 of charter T. 99 as an insurance policy for this purpose. In the event, which happened, it fell short by 1770*l.* of covering the full value, in which the assured was interested, when the contracts were first effected. Accordingly, I think he must be treated as being his own underwriter for the difference between the ship's value when totally lost, which is all he covered with the Admiralty, and the ship's value at the inception of the risk, which is her value for the purposes of the other policies according to ordinary rules and apart from special valuations, which do not seem to affect the principle. Whether he insured in this manner with the Admiralty because he chose to do so, or because he could not help himself is immaterial.

I agree further that the 1770*l.* was lost directly by the form in which the liability of the Admiralty is expressed, in the sense that from the time when the charter became effective the assured had made himself the party to bear any depreciation from unrepaired partial damage, which might exist at the time of the total loss. Of course it is not contended that he can alter the meaning of his marine policy by the arrangements that he chooses to make with the Admiralty, but I think it is equally impracticable to say that the marine policy impliedly promises to pay for unrepaired damage if less than the original value is recoverable under the charter for a subsequent total loss, but not to pay for it when the charter provides otherwise.

I therefore think that the appeal succeeds and that the judgment of Bailhache, J. should be restored.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision — Compulsory pilotage — Duty of master and crew to assist pilot.

They who seek to establish the defence of compulsory pilotage, which is of statutory origin, must show that the collision was due solely to the fault of the pilot, and if there is neglect on the part of the master and crew of the ship of which the pilot is in charge which cannot be shown to be unconnected with the collision they do not discharge that onus.

A pilot is entitled to the assistance of a look-out and timely reports of material incidents, and, if this assistance is not given, it cannot be said that the pilot ought to have known of incidents without being told of them, and therefore that the blame is his alone

Where a pilot was navigating a ship at full speed in narrow waters among a large number of vessels and the course taken was such that it must have been obvious to the master either that the pilot did not know of a risk, or that, if he did know, he was undertaking an unwarrantable risk, it was held that the master owed a duty to his owners and to the pilot to call the pilot's attention to the risk, and was not justified in doing nothing.

APPEALS from two decisions of the Court of Appeal varying decisions of Hill, J.

The question arising on the facts in each case was as to the nature and extent of the duty of the master and crew of a vessel in charge of a compulsory pilot to render assistance to the pilot.

The litigation arose out of a collision which occurred between the Gothland and the Alexander Shukoff and a consequent collision between the Larenberg and the Gothland in the South Edinburgh Channel in the Thames shortly before noon on the 4th Dec. 1916.

The Aberdale, the Alexander Shukoff, and the Gothland, which with several other ships had been detained in the Black Deeps, were proceeding down the channel in the order named. The Aberdale, which was a good way ahead of the Alexander Shukoff, was signalled by a torpedo boat to anchor, and she turned round in the channel to pass up to the Black Deeps for anchorage. This signal, which was general, was apparently not seen by the other vessels. The Aberdale thus met the Alexander Shukoff, and the two vessels exchanged port helm signals, and were about to pass port to port, the Alexander Shukoff altering her course about half a point to port for that purpose. At this time the Gothland, which was proceeding at full speed, was rapidly overhauling the Alexander Shukoff on her starboard quarter, and she suddenly starboarded, intending to pass across the bow of the Alexander Shukoff. There was not time to effect this, and the port bow of the Gothland came into contact with the starboard bow of the Alexander Shukoff, and considerable damage was done to the latter ship.

Hill, J. held that the Gothland was solely to blame for the collision, and, finding as a fact that the master and crew did not report to the pilot the position of either the Aberdale or the Alexander Shukoff, he held that the defence of compulsory pilotage failed inasmuch as the pilot had not received from the master and crew the assistance to which he was entitled, and the owners of the Gothland had not shown that the neglect of the master and crew was not a contributory cause of the collision.

The Court of Appeal reversed this decision on the ground, first, that there was no duty to call the pilot's attention to this particular vessel before the moment when, according to the evidence, the pilot became fully aware of her position, and, secondly, that at the time the pilot himself could by the exercise of reasonable care and skill have avoided the accident. The Lords Justices therefore, accepting the advice of their nautical assessors, differed in their view of the facts, and accordingly held that the defence of compulsory pilotage had not been made out.

In the second action the Larenberg, which was proceeding down the Thames following behind the Gothland, on seeing the Gothland steering her course so as to run across the bow of the Alexander Shukoff, slowed her engines but did not stop them. After the first collision the Larenberg reversed her engines, but the Gothland came across her course before she could take all her way off, and as the result the Larenberg struck the Gothland on her port quarter and did her serious damage. The Larenberg was at the time also under compulsory pilotage.

Hill, J. held that both vessels were to blame and apportioned the blame as to two-thirds to the Gothland and as to one-third to the Larenberg. He also held that the fault on the Gothland was not solely that of the pilot, but that the fault on the Larenberg was solely that of the pilot, and he gave judgment for the owners of the Larenberg for two-thirds of the damage sustained, and dismissed the claim of the Gothland.

In this case also the Court of Appeal varied the judgment of Hill, J., and held that the Larenberg was alone to blame, but that as the fault was solely that of her pilot the Gothland could recover nothing.

The House (Lord Birkenhead, L.C., Lords Finlay, Shaw, and Moulton—Lord Sumner dissenting in the first case, but agreeing in the second) after consideration reversed the order of the Court of Appeal in each case and restored the judgment of Hill, J.

Lord BIRKENHEAD, L.C.—It will, I think, be convenient if I read the speeches I have prepared on these matters consecutively, putting the questions, of course, separately from the Woolsack afterwards. I take first the case of the Alexander Shukoff.

This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated the 12th Feb. 1919, reversing a decree of Hill, J. dated the 17th June 1918.

The action was brought by the appellants in respect of a collision in the Thames between the steamship Alexander Shukoff and the steamship Gothland during the morning of the 4th Dec. 1916. Both vessels carried pilots by compulsion of law. Hill, J. held that the Gothland was solely to blame and that the defence of compulsory pilotage was not made out. The Court of Appeal, while agreeing that that vessel was solely to blame, held that the defence of compulsory pilotage was made out, and accordingly this appeal has been brought.

There was considerable conflict of evidence in the trial court, and there can be no doubt that Hill, J. was right in refusing to accept the explanations and statements of facts offered on behalf of the Gothland. The real issue is whether the defence of compulsory pilotage has been established by the owners of that vessel.

The collision in question occurred shortly after 11 a.m. on the 4th Dec. 1916, in fine clear weather in the South Edinburgh Channel between No. 5 and No. 3 buoys. The learned judge found that the tide was on the ebb between one and two knots setting south-easterly. The Alexander Shukoff, a vessel of 257ft. in length, capable of eight knots, and the Gothland, which is 490 ft. long and capable of thirteen knots, were among a large number of other vessels which had been at anchor in the Black Deeps, and had obtained permission to proceed. As the North Edinburgh Channel was closed they all had to pass through the South Edinburgh Channel. There were therefore at the time a large number of vessels in the vicinity. The entrance to the channel is marked on the port side by No. 5 buoy.

The first ship whose manœuvres require notice is the steamship Aberdale, which entered the channel ahead of the other two, and when in mid-channel was ordered by a torpedo boat to anchor instantly. This signal, which was general, was apparently not seen, and was certainly not obeyed by the other ships. The Aberdale swung round with her head pointing north-west and, while she was so heading, the Alexander Shukoff was seen about a quarter of a mile away heading in a south-easterly direction a little on the port side of the channel. As she entered the channel she was going about eight knots. The Gothland was seen by the Aberdale almost at the same moment as the Alexander Shukoff. She was about three-quarters of a mile away heading down channel, in a south-easterly direction, on the starboard quarter of the Alexander Shukoff and proceeding at full speed. The Aberdale and the Alexander Shukoff exchanged port helm signals, and passed port to port, the latter altering her course about half point to port for the purpose. The Gothland was about a quarter of a mile from the latter vessel and overhauling her when the signals were exchanged. She was on the Aberdale's starboard quarter. Both passed the Aberdale on courses which, though nearly parallel, were none the less converging. The evidence given on behalf of the Gothland was not evidence of truth, but certain facts are nevertheless established. This vessel was proceeding at full speed in narrow waters among a large number of ships. The pilot was in charge. The master and second officer were on the bridge, the chief officer was on the forecastle head, and there was a man in the crow's-nest as look-out man.

The pilot stated that he first saw the Alexander Shukoff when she was one or two ships' lengths away, and in cross-examination put the distance at 700ft. No one reported her to him. The master did not see her until they had passed ahead of the ship at anchor, and he said that there were so many ships about that they could not notice any one in particular. The second officer, who was near him, first saw her when she was about a ship's length off a little abaft the beam, and his observation was so perfunctory that he seems to have thought that she was overtaking the Gothland. The chief officer noticed the Alexander Shukoff when she was on their port side, perhaps half a ship's length away, at the moment when they were manœuvring to pass round the stern of the ship at anchor, but he obviously did not think it his duty either to keep a look-out or to report. It does not appear whether the look-out saw her, but certainly he made no report to anyone. Nor was any report made to the pilot as to the Aberdale. In these circumstances the Gothland continuing to come on, the two ships collided at a fine angle, the starboard bow of the Alexander Shukoff coming into contact with the port bow of the Gothland. Hill, J. held that the Alexander Shukoff did nothing wrong, that the Gothland was proceeding at a reckless and excessive speed, and did nothing to avoid the collision until it was too late, because no one on board was paying attention to the other vessel. The learned judge did not decide whether it was the duty of the master to interfere having regard to the rate of speed, which in his view made the duty of rendering every possible assistance to the pilot all the greater. This duty, which should have been present to the minds of all the officers, was not discharged at all. In his view the failure to report a ship which was being overtaken and on a converging course fine on the Gothland's bow, left the pilot without proper assistance, and therefore the defence of compulsory pilotage failed.

The Court of Appeal reversed this decision on the ground, first, that there was no duty to call the pilot's attention to this particular vessel before the moment when, according to the evidence, the pilot became fully aware of her position, and, secondly, that at that time the pilot could by the exercise of reasonable care and skill have avoided the accident. The Lords Justices, therefore, accepting the advice of their nautical assessors, differed in their view of the facts. On the question of speed, they pointed out that interference with the pilot is only justified in extreme cases, of which this was not one. They therefore held that the defence of compulsory pilotage had been made out.

In cases where such a defence is set up there are two factors which must be taken into account. The first is that this defence, which is of statutory origin and has been repeated in successive Acts of Parliament, is part of the settled policy of the country, and is not to be narrowed or diminished in force by decisions of the courts. The second is that this rule, which is intended as a measure of security, does not mean, and must not be taken to mean, that a pilot when once he is in charge of a vessel is so circumstanced that the master and crew owe him no duty to inform him of circumstances which, whether he has noticed them himself or not, are material for him to know in directing the navigation of the vessel. The master and crew are not mere passengers when a pilot is on board by compulsion of law. The pilot is entitled to their assistance, and to apply the defence of compulsory pilotage to a case where the accident would have been averted if such assistance had been given though in fact it was not, would defeat the policy which has created the defence, and so far from increasing the safety of navigation would actually increase its risks. The law has been laid down in a number of cases, though not, I believe, in this House. In The Iona (16 L. T. Rep. 158; (1867) L. Rep. 1 P. C. 426), the Judicial Committee, after pointing out that it was for defendants to make out the defence and that therefore they must prove not merely that there was fault or negligence on the part of the pilot, but that the damage was occasioned exclusively by such default, proceeded at p. 435 to point out that if the pilot had been made earlier aware of the position of a certain barge the accident might never have occurred. Thus the neglect of duty on the part of the look-out man not only might have been conducive to the disaster, but was in all probability the ultimate cause of it. Again, in The Velasquez (16 L. T. Rep. 777; (1867) L. Rep. 1 P. C. 494) the Judicial Committee laid down the rule in these terms: "The cases have clearly established that if, for any act or omission which contributed to the accident the master or crew is to blame—then, although the pilot is also to blame, the owners are not exempted from liability," and the judgment adds: "That it is the duty of the crew, by means of a sufficient look-out, to give to the pilot the earliest possible information of an approaching vessel and accurately to describe her position was the principle enforced in the case of The Iona, and in the present case it may reasonably be inferred that if the pilot had received earlier information he would not have given the order to starboard at all or would have given it at a time when on a starboard helm he could have gone clear of the barque." In The Tactician (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 534; 97 L. T. Rep. 621; (1907) P. 244) Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. stated (at p. 250) the rule in these terms: "The cardinal principle to be borne in mind in these pilotage cases . . . is that the pilot is in sole charge of the ship," and he expressed his agreement "with the opinions of the very learned judges from Dr. Lushington downwards . . . as to the danger of a divided command and of interfering with the conduct of the pilot and that if anything of that kind amounts to an interference or a divided command serious risk is run of the ship losing the benefit of the compulsory pilotage. . . . But side by side with that principle is the other principle that the pilot is entitled to the fullest assistance of a competent master and crew, of a competent look-out and a well-found ship. . . . The cases in which the master has to interfere at all with the pilot very rarely occur . . . but there is or may be a distinction between interference and bringing to the pilot's notice anything which the pilot ought to know. The pilot has a good many things to attend to, particularly in a place like the Thames, and certainly it is not putting the case too high to say that he is entitled to full information with regard to any surrounding fact which it is important he should know."

It must be borne in mind that, as Lord Selborne pointed out in Clyde Navigation Company v. Barclay (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 390; 36 L. T. Rep. 379, 1 App. Cas. 790, at p. 796), there are three things necessary to be proved: first, that a qualified pilot was acting in charge of the ship; secondly, that the charge was compulsory; and, thirdly, that it was his fault or incapacity which occasioned the damage.

Your Lordships have to apply these principles to the facts of this case. If the pilot, having received timely information of the position of the Alexander Shukoff and the Aberdale, acted so negligently as to cause the collision, there can be no doubt that the fault would be his alone. The evidence establishes clearly that so far from receiving such information in time he was given none at all. In circumstances which called for the greatest care and fullest assistance he was left to his own observation. It is obvious from his own explanation that he was not fully aware of the position and intentions of both these vessels at the time of the collision. It may be (though I am not satisfied upon this point) that he ought to have been aware, but a pilot's duty is that of controlling the navigation of the ship and his attention must at times be concentrated on some particular fact. He is entitled to have the assistance of a look-out and timely reports of material incidents. He is in charge, but he is not in charge without assistance. If that assistance is not forthcoming it is difficult, if not impossible, for the owners to say that the pilot ought to have known without being told, and therefore that the blame is his alone, for this reason, that it by no means follows that, if the pilot had been informed, as he should have been, of the respective positions of these two vessels at a time when a report ought to have been made, he would have acted as he did. When he first saw the Alexander Shukoff he was only a short distance away, and he was committed, at a late period in the development of events, to a course which, as events proved, brought his vessel into collision with her. Had a proper look-out been kept and had information been given him in time he would not have been placed in a position in which he found himself forced to come to a swift and peremptory decision whether to hold on or to alter his course. Even although at the actual moment of decision the collision might have been avoided if he had acted differently, it cannot be said that he would have found himself obliged to come to an instant decision at that moment, and in those circumstances, if he had received the assistance to which he was entitled. There is also another consideration which must have considerable weight—namely, that the pilot was navigating the ship at full speed in narrow waters among a large number of vessels. It cannot be contended that in this case it was the master's duty to take the vessel out of the pilot's charge, but the course taken was such that it must have been obvious to the master either that the pilot did not know of the risk to which he was subjecting the ship or that if he did know he was undertaking an unwarrantable risk. The master owed a duty to his owners and to the pilot to call the pilot's attention to the risk so that the latter might have his attention directed to the danger that was imminent unless more care was taken. Yet the master did nothing.

Your Lordships have to decide whether in these circumstances the respondents have established that the collision was due solely to the fault of the pilot. In my opinion they did not discharge that onus, but, on the contrary, there was neglect on the part of the master and crew of the Gothland which cannot be shown to have been unconnected with the collision.

The Lord Chancellor then read the following judgment in the case of the steamships Larenberg and Gothland:

This appeal is concerned with a collision between the steamship Larenberg and the steamship Gothland, which took place very shortly after the collision between the latter vessel and the steamship Alexander Shukoff. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the facts up to the time of the first collision as I have already fully stated them in my speech in that case. The steamship Larenberg is a vessel of 326ft. in length and at the material time was in ballast. At the moment she entered the South Edinburgh Channel she was following the Alexander Shukoff and ahead of the Gothland, but before the first collision the latter ship had passed her, and but for that collision the events which happened could not have taken place. At that time the Larenberg was astern of the other two vessels and further over to the east side of the Channel. The Gothland's case was, shortly, that, after the first collision was over, she was again on her down channel course when she had to manœuvre for a vessel at anchor, and the Larenberg overtaking her failed to keep out of her way. The case for the Larenberg is that as a result of the collision the Gothland came across the course of the Larenberg, which had slowed down before the first collision and had reversed about the time that event took place, and that in consequence of the Gothland's coming across the Larenberg's course she collided with the latter before that vessel had lost all her way.

The evidence was very conflicting, and Hill, J. accepted the evidence of the Larenberg's pilot with one exception. This witness's evidence was that the Larenberg was following the Alexander Shukoff at about the same speed, and when squared up in the channel was about 500ft. or 600ft. off on the port quarter. The Gothland approached the Alexander Shukoff from the southward towards the east, and the first collision took place when the Larenberg was about 300ft. behind the Shukoff, still on her port quarter. Before that collision the Larenberg's pilot slowed his engines and went inside No. 5 buoy, and at the time of that collision his engines were going slow. After that collision the Gothland passed ahead of the Shukoff across her bows, being on a starboard helm. The Larenberg at the time of that collision went full speed astern and the Gothland also was going astern, with the result that the Larenberg's stem came into contact at right angles with the port side aft of the Gothland, which had by then stopped her engines. The place of this second collision was near No. 3 buoy. The witness estimated that three minutes elapsed between the two collisions. He was of opinion that the Gothland could have avoided the Larenberg without getting into shoal water by going ahead on her port engine. As the learned judge pointed out, the Larenberg was only 100 yards behind the Gothland when the first collision occurred, and the place of the second collision was only about 500 yards away from the spot where the former occurred, and therefore the Larenberg's engines cannot have been reversed so soon as the witness said, and consequently not so soon as they ought to have been.

The Gothland's pilot attributed his actions to the need for avoiding a vessel at anchor right across the channel. It is a remarkable circumstance if this were the case that he did not notice her until after the first collision; the omission means that he did not observe a vessel anchored right across his course in a narrow channel along which he was proceeding at full speed. Nor do the other witnesses appear to have seen this vessel. It is obvious that the pilot was seeking for an excuse, but, even if this vessel was where he places her, the excuse will not avail, as he ought to have seen her before and, moreover, he did not know, nor was he informed, that he was bringing the ship across the Larenberg's course. The evidence for the Gothland was conflicting and difficult to understand. It is not remarkable therefore that the learned judge found it impossible to reconcile this evidence with the known facts. He found both vessels to blame, but held that the Gothland was not, but that the Larenberg was, protected by the defence of compulsory pilotage. The Court of Appeal, while agreeing that the position of the Gothland was due to the negligence of those placed in charge of her, was nevertheless of opinion that the Larenberg's pilot could have avoided the Gothland if he had exercised proper care and skill, and therefore held the Larenberg solely to blame. As, however, the court held that the negligence was that of the pilot who was in charge by compulsion of law they gave effect to the defence of compulsory pilotage. From this decision the Larenberg has appealed to your Lordships' House. In coming to a decision upon these facts it is important to observe that the Larenberg should have reversed her engines at the very moment of the first collision, as indeed her pilot claimed that she did. It is impossible in this respect to acquit her of an act of negligence, which probably led to the collision and certainly made the shock more severe than otherwise it would have been. The Gothland was also negligent not only in respect of the earlier collision but also by not taking proper steps to clear the Shukoff and avoid coming across the channel. Had she not come across in continuing negligence the second collision would have been avoided. It is clear that the master and crew of the Gothland did not report the Larenberg to the pilot, who, according to his own story, did not know of her until, hearing a shout from her, he saw her about half a ship's length away. This conduct shows that the pilot and the master and crew were guilty of negligence right up to the time of the second collision. This is not in my view the simple case of a vessel which was negligent but whose negligence was not the cause of the accident. In this case the Gothland had by negligence got into a position which contributed greatly to the second collision. It was her duty to do all that she could to prevent any untoward result of that negligence. She failed in that duty and it is impossible to say that in those circumstances she has proved that the blame must be placed solely upon the Larenberg.

Both vessels are therefore to blame, but in the case of the Larenberg the defence of compulsory pilotage is established. The Gothland cannot avail herself of that defence. As I have already stated, the first collision was a cause which contributed to the second, and, on the facts, the master and crew failed in their duty in that case. They also failed in their duty to keep a proper look-out and keep the pilot informed after the first collision. The result is that the order of the Court of Appeal must be reversed and the decree of Hill, J. restored.

Lord FINLAY.—I will read first my judgment in the case of the Alexander Shukoff. (a)

The appellants in this case, the owners of the steamship Shukoff, brought an action against the respondents, the owners of the steamship Gothland, for damage sustained by them in a collision between the two vessels which occurred in the South Edinburgh Channel in the Thames on the 4th Dec. 1916 shortly before noon. There was a counter-claim by the owners of the Gothland. The case was tried before Hill, J. sitting with the Elder Brethren. He decided that the Gothland was solely to blame and that the defence of compulsory pilotage failed. The Court of Appeal agreed that the Gothland was solely to blame, but held that the defence of compulsory pilotage had been established. The only question on the present appeal is as to the defence on the ground of compulsory pilotage. The Gothland was under compulsory pilotage, but Hill, J. held that the master and crew were also to blame for the collision on the ground that they had failed to report the Shukoff to the pilot and that this default had contributed to the collision. With regard to the contention that the master of the Gothland ought to have interfered with the pilot on the ground that the speed at which he was going was excessive and reckless, Hill, J. thought that it was unnecessary for him to express any opinion. The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Hill, J. on the question of compulsory pilotage. They held that the collision was solely the fault of the pilot on the ground that he was aware of the presence of the Gothland in time to prevent the occurrence of the collision by the exercise of reasonable care and skill, and that no case had been made out to show that the master ought to have interfered with the pilot.

The Shukoff was proceeding down the South Edinburgh Channel, and at the same time a considerable number of other vessels which had been detained in the Black Deep and its vicinity, and had received permission to put out to sea, were also proceeding in the same direction. One of these ships was the Gothland, which had a speed of thirteen knots as against the eight knots of the Shukoff. Those on board the Shukoff first noticed the Gothland, according to their preliminary act, about half-a-mile distant astern and on the starboard quarter of the Shukoff. A steamship called the Aberdale had been proceeding down the river a good way ahead of the Shukoff, when she was signalled by a torpedo-boat to anchor at once. The Aberdale turned round in the Channel in order to pass up to the Black Deep for anchorage. She met the Shukoff, which was coming down, and the two vessels were about to pass one another port to port. They had exchanged signals for that purpose, and the Shukoff had ported half a point. The Gothland was overtaking the Shukoff, and for some reason starboarded and attempted to pass between the stem of the Shukoff and the stem of the Aberdale, these vessels being then at no great distance from one another. The port bow of the Gothland struck the port bow of the Shukoff, doing a good deal of damage. The pilot of the Gothland, when asked in cross-examination why he did not port so as to pass clear of the Shukoff, gave as his excuse for not doing so that there was a vessel on his starboard bow a little further down the Channel which made this impossible, but there is no confirmation of this statement, and it cannot be accepted.

No report was made by the look-out or officers on board the Gothland to the pilot as to the presence either of the Shukoff or of the Aberdale. It appears from the evidence that no reports whatever were made on board the Gothland of any ships in the Channel. It is said that there were so many ships that such reports would have been useless, as the pilot could see the vessels himself, and that reports might have distracted his attention from the proper discharge of his duties. I quite agree that at some points in the Thames, owing to the multitude of shipping, it must be impossible to report every vessel, and that to attempt to do so might be mischievous. It is, however, impossible to justify the course which those on board the Gothland followed in reporting nothing at all. From time to time there must be cases in which a report is desirable even in so crowded a river if a vessel is in such a position as to call for some action on the part of the pilot in charge. Even if the pilot can see the vessel himself his attention may for the moment have been diverted elsewhere, and a report would ensure that he becomes aware of a possible source of danger.

Hill, J. found that there was default on the part of the master and crew of the Gothland in not reporting the Shukoff as the Gothland overhauled her, and that this contributed to the collision. But the Court of Appeal found that the pilot of the Gothland was perfectly aware of the presence of the Shukoff in time to enable him to avoid her, and that the fault was absolutely his. I should not be prepared to hold that the failure to report the Shukoff contributed to the collision. The Gothland had been overhauling her for some time, and it is obvious that the statement of the pilot that he saw her himself is true. He undertook the somewhat risky manœuvre of taking his vessel across her bows, trusting no doubt to the superior speed of the Gothland to carry him through this manœuvre in safety.

But the failure to report the Aberdale stands on a very different footing. The pilot states that he did not notice the Aberdale. Her presence proceeding up the channel a little on the port bow of the Shukoff, which was coming down, and at no great distance from her, was a matter which certainly should have been reported to the pilot. It may be that the pilot was not speaking the truth when he said that he did not see her. Indeed some of his evidence was of such a character that it is impossible to attach much importance to any unsupported statement of his. But it is quite possible that he is speaking the truth in this instance. His attention may have been concentrated on the Shukoff, across whose bows he was about to take the Gothland. The appearance of the Aberdale proceeding up channel after she had turned was a new phenomenon which ought to have been reported so as to call the pilot's attention to her. Her presence in that position was a most material element in determining as to the propriety of attempting to cut across the bows of the Shukoff.

In my judgment it is impossible to accept the proposition that there is no duty to report anything that the pilot can see for himself. The fact that the master or officer in charge of the ship can see an object does not excuse the failure of the look-out to report it. Apart from the fact that two pairs of eyes are better than one, the attention of the officer in charge may have been for the moment turned in some other direction. The pilot is there to take charge of the ship, and in doing so he is entitled to the same assistance from the look-out as the master or officer would in ordinary course receive. I think that the failure to report the Aberdale under the circumstances was inexcusable. The principle on which the master and crew of the Gothland acted, that they need report nothing on the ground that the pilot, if he uses his eyes, could see for himself, is at once novel and dangerous. The attention of the pilot ought to be called by a proper look-out to the appearance of anything which should be taken into account with reference to the proper navigation of the ship. If, in the present case, his attention had been called to the presence of the Aberdale it might have led him to think twice before he attempted to cut in across the Shukoff's bows between her and the Aberdale.

It was alleged on behalf of the Shukoff that the speed of the Gothland was reckless and that it was the duty of the master at least to give some warning to the pilot on this score. The Gothland was going at fifteen knots and there was a great deal of shipping about, but, on the other hand, it has been urged that with a good speed the vessel answers to her helm more readily and therefore that the speed really made for safety. The question of speed is a matter for the pilot in charge of the ship, and it might be productive of danger if your Lordships laid down any rule of conduct which might appear to encourage interference with the pilot. Except in extreme cases, and under very special circumstances, unasked advice might rather tend to worry and distract the pilot in the discharge of his very responsible duties.

I agree with the Court of Appeal that no circumstances existed in the present case which called for any interference by the master of the Gothland whether in the way of advice or otherwise. Hill, J. expresses no opinion upon this point.

But on the ground which I have already stated—failure to report by the look-out—I think that the collision cannot be held to be the fault exclusively of the pilot and that the defence on the ground of compulsory pilotage of the Gothland fails, and I think, therefore, that the judgment of the Court of Appeal must be reversed.

I now proceed to deal with the collision between the steamship Larenberg and the Gothland.

The Larenberg is a Dutch steamer of 3625 tons gross, and she came into collision with the Gothland within a few minutes after the collision between the Gothland and the Shukoff. An action for damage was brought by the owners of the Gothland, and there is a counter-claim by the owners of the Larenberg.

Hill, J. found that both ships were to blame, the Gothland to the extent of two-thirds and the Larenberg to the extent of one-third, but in the case of the Larenberg he held that the defence of compulsory pilotage had been established. The Court of Appeal held that the Larenberg was solely to blame and that the defence of compulsory pilotage was made out.

In this case it appears to me that Hill, J. was right in finding that both the Larenberg and the Gothland were to blame. The Larenberg came down the South Edinburgh Channel behind the Gothland and more to the east. She had the Gothland on her starboard bow. She was under compulsory pilotage, and the pilot, apprehensive of danger ahead from what he saw of the behaviour of the Gothland, put her inside No. 5 buoy so as to pass down with that buoy on his starboard side and slowed down his engines. He witnessed the collision between the Shukoff and the Gothland, and says that he at once reversed his engines. The Gothland, after the collision with the Shukoff, angled off towards the shoal water to the east of the channel. She was so angling across, abreast of No. 3 buoy, when the Larenberg came down the channel, and, going at about four knots, struck her on the port quarter nearly at right angles.

We are advised by our nautical assessors that if the engines of the Larenberg had been reversed immediately when the first collision—that of the Shukoff and the Gothland—took place the collision between the Larenberg and the Gothland would in all probability not have happened at all, or, at all events, that the violence of the blow would have been much less than it was. This advice is in accordance with that given by the Elder Brethren in the Admiralty Court, and I think that we should act upon it. The Larenberg, therefore, must be held to blame. As regards the Gothland, she clearly was in fault with regard to the second collision, as she had been with regard to the first. The fact that she was angling across the channel in the manner I have described was due in the first instance to her own negligence which brought about the collision with the Shukoff. I am further of opinion that there was negligence on the part of the Gothland after the first collision in two respects. Her look-out was again defective. Those on board her were unaware that the Larenberg was coming down the channel until she was close upon her, and, in my opinion, if they had been so aware the Gothland could, by porting, have got out of the way of the Larenberg. For these reasons I think the judgment of Hill, J. that both vessels were to blame was right.

Both the Larenberg and the Gothland, however, raised the defence of compulsory pilotage. In the case of the Gothland that defence must fail as the master and crew failed to report the Larenberg, and therefore the fault of the negligence subsequent to the first collision cannot be imputed solely to the pilot, and it was by the failure of the look-out on board the Gothland, as well as by the default of the pilot, that the first collision had taken place, bringing the Gothland into the way of the Larenberg. The Larenberg was also under compulsory pilotage, and there is nothing in her case to show that any blame can be thrown upon the master and crew, so that that defence in her case is established.

The decision of the Court of Appeal that the Larenberg was solely to blame for this collision proceeds, in my opinion, upon a mis-application of the doctrine acted upon in the case of The Sanspareil (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59, 78; 82 L. T. Rep. 606; (1900) P. 267). The principle of law applied in the Sanspareil case is very old. In that case it was held by the Court of Appeal that the tug with a vessel in tow was guilty of bad seamanship and negligence in keeping her course and speed so as to cross in front of the Channel Fleet, which was proceeding up the Channel. The Court of Appeal, however, held that that initial negligence on the part of the tug was not really part of the effective cause of the subsequent collision, which was solely due to the manner in which the Sanspareil, one of the vessels of the fleet, was handled.

It is often a question of great nicety whether the negligence of the plaintiff was in the transaction itself or occurred at an earlier stage of the history. In the case of the Sanspareil it was held that it was not really part of the incidents of the collision itself, but was entirely antecedent. In the present case it seems to me clear that the negligence of the Gothland was in the transaction itself which immediately led to the collision, and that the ordinary rule of contributary negligence is applicable.

I therefore think that in this case judgment should be entered that both vessels were in fault, but that the Larenberg is exonerated on the ground of compulsory pilotage.

Lord SHAW.—In these cases I desire to say to your Lordships that in the course of considering them I was favoured with the perusal of the judgment of Lord Finlay, and I so entirely concur in the statement of the facts of those cases that my noble and learned friend gave, and the verdict and reasons for which he has pronounced that I feel it not to be incumbent upon me even to presume to add to or vary his judgment. I make this exception only to pronounce one sentence and it is in reference to the case of the Shukoff. When a ship is put under compulsory pilotage it is no doubt true that the entire control of her movements is under the command of the pilot so charged with the vessel. It is not, however, in any sense true that the pilot is thus charged with a vessel deprived of the ordinary and proper services of her crew. It would be a strange result if it were so. The testing instance is the case of the man on the look-out. His responsibility as the servant of the vessel remains, and if there are degrees in such a case it is, of course, specially acute when the vessel is under compulsory pilotage. If it were not so the situation in law would indeed be peculiar, because it would place the pilot, who presumably was in a position where exceptional skill and knowledge are required for the navigation of the vessel, in a situation in which he had to render those services to it deprived of the ordinary and elementary facilities for navigation which were afforded by the active and vigilant services of the man on the look-out. I do not think that the law countenances either such reasoning or such an absurd result. If such services are not rendered, and that materially contributes to the collision, the ship fails to obtain a quittance of liability by reason of the compulsory pilotage. I have that fully in view when I pronounce my adherence to the views given by my noble and learned friend.

Lord MOULTON.—I will give my opinion first in the case of the Alexander Shukoff.

The litigation in the case of the owners of the steamship Shukoff, and in the associated case of the owners of the steamship Larenberg against the same defendants, arises from two collisions which took place in the Thames on the morning of the 4th Dec. 1916.

The vessels concerned had been at anchor through the night in the Black Deeps in company with a considerable number of other vessels which were waiting for daylight to proceed down the South Edinburgh Channel on their respective voyages. The Shukoff was an iron steamship somewhat over 250ft. long and was proceeding to Dunkirk laden with a cargo of coals and was at the time moving with a velocity of about eight knots through the water. The Gothland, which was a much larger vessel, about 490ft. in length fitted with twin screws was starting on a voyage to New York. At all material times her engines were working full speed ahead and she was making about thirteen knots. Both vessels were under compulsory pilotage.

The case is complicated by the circumstance that the Courts below have come to the conclusion (and, in my opinion, rightly) that the case set up on behalf of the Gothland, mainly on the evidence of the pilot of that vessel, cannot be relied upon in any way, and it is indeed in its important features obviously fictitious. Nevertheless, the circumstances of the actual collision are not difficult to arrive at. The Shukoff was originally coming down the channel considerably in advance of the Gothland which would appear to have been delayed somewhat in her course by having to pass round a vessel lying much higher up in the channel. Inasmuch as the Gothland was going at the high speed of thirteen knots an hour, it rapidly overtook the Shukoff. If any reliance is to be placed on the evidence of the pilot of the Gothland, the time at which he first became aware of the Shukoff as a ship to which he had to pay attention, was when she was a little forward of his port beam and about 700ft. away. I can see no reason for doubting the substantial accuracy of these figures. They are not essential to the decision of the case.

Some little time before this, the steamship Aberdale had been passing down the channel much in advance of the other two vessels, having started considerably before either of them. But she had met a torpedo boat, which promptly directed her to anchor. Instead of anchoring on the spot, the Aberdale turned round in the channel and proceeded to pass up it towards the north-west before coming to an anchor. In so doing, she became aware of the Shukoff ahead of her and coming down the channel on her port bow and exchanged port helm signals with her, in consequence of which the Shukoff quite properly altered her course slightly to starboard.

The position of the three vessels, therefore, at the moment when it is necessary to consider them, was that the Gothland was proceeding at a speed of thirteen knots down the channel, the Shukoff was also proceeding down the channel at about eight knots an hour on an almost parallel course nearly level with the Gothland, but lying about 700ft. on her port side. The Aberdale was lying still further to the north-eastern side of the channel and was coming up the channel and about to pass the Shukoff port to port.

It was when the three ships were in these positions relative to one another that the Gothland undertook the extraordinary manœuvre which led to the accident. It attempted to pass the Shukoff by shooting across its bows. Even if the Aberdale had not been there, this would have been a sufficiently improper manœuvre, but inasmuch as the Aberdale was coming up the channel to pass on the further side of the Shukoff it seems almost incredible that the pilot could have adopted such a rash and dangerous course if he had been aware of the position and movements of the Aberdale. It is evident that the pilot of the Gothland in trying thus to rush across the bows of the Shukoff must have starboarded and gone full speed ahead. In spite of his great speed, he failed to clear and his port bow collided with the starboard bow of the Shukoff, and this is the collision with which we are concerned in this case. So soon as it occurred, the Gothland was obliged to stop and reverse, no doubt in order to prevent his getting into trouble with the Aberdale and also to allow the latter to continue on its course up the channel. His own statement is that he did it to avoid a small steamer which he had not previously noticed and which lay in mid-channel. But there is no ground for believing the truth of this statement, unless it refers to the Aberdale itself.

That the collision was due to the improper navigation of the Gothland is clear beyond dispute. Indeed, it has been "practically conceded" (to use the words of the judge at the trial) "throughout." The defence relied upon by the owners of the Gothland is that of compulsory pilotage, namely, that the collision was wholly the fault of the pilot. If this is established, the plaintiff's case fails. But we must bear in mind that the fact that the pilot was guilty of negligence in directing the movements of the vessel is not sufficient by itself to establish such a case.

The further question arises whether those on board the ship had given to him the assistance which he was entitled to receive from them in order to enable him to fulfil his duty. I am content to accept the law on this point as laid down by the president of the Court of Appeal in his judgment in this case: "The pilot is entitled to the fullest assistance from the officers and crew of the vessel of which he is in charge by compulsion of law and that assistance includes the keeping of a good look-out so that the pilot should be informed of the position and movements of and possible danger to other ships."

We must ask ourselves, therefore, whether in this case the pilot received this assistance from the officers and crew of the Gothland. The evidence shows clearly that he received from them no such assistance at all. Nothing was reported to him by them from the beginning to the end of the history. He was left entirely to his own unaided observation. This is the finding of the learned judge at the trial, and it is not differed from by the Court of Appeal, and I agree with it entirely. Indeed, it is not denied by the defendants.

The real defence set up by the defendants is not that this duty was in fact performed by the master and crew of their ship, but that it would have made no difference if it had been performed. They say that the pilot either knew all that they could have reported to him, or that if he did not know it, he ought to have found it out for himself. The first alternative in this excuse is negatived by the evidence. The pilot states that he had not become aware of the existence of the Shukoff until a late stage, and he excuses himself for this by saying: "I was too much engaged noticing my own ship to take notice of the other." And so far as the evidence shows, he was never aware of the proximity of the Aberdale or that it was travelling up the channel on its way to pass the Shukoff port to port until after the collision. Both these facts were matters of prime importance which should have been reported to him.

The second alternative in the excuse is at once more specious and more dangerous. The defendants say that the pilot ought to have found out these things for himself, and that, therefore, they are excused from having omitted to report them to him. Now it must be remembered that the pilot has many things to think of, especially where, as in the present case, he is leaving the port in company with other vessels and new incidents may at any moment arise. He needs, therefore, to be in a position of feeling that he can give his whole attention to his duties of management secure that all relevant occurrences will be duly reported to him. No doubt one of his duties is to observe that which is going on around him, but compulsory pilotage is not a case where the law intends that the pilot shall double the rôles of captain and crew and "look-out." When the matter relates to vessels or occurrences within the sphere of that which may reasonably influence the action of the pilot, it is in my opinion no adequate excuse to one whose duty it is to report that he thought that the pilot ought to discover it without his assistance.

Let me examine for a moment the issue that we are deciding. It is a severe, but no doubt a just, law that says that a shipowner whose ship has been damaged through the careless navigation of another ship shall have no redress in the case of compulsory pilotage, if the accident be due solely to the negligence of the pilot. But the law does not unconditionally shift the responsibility of a ship and crew to the shoulders of one man. To justify the application of the law, the pilot must be a duly instructed pilot. The master and crew of the ship are not freed from their obligations of watchfulness and proper service, but the recipient of these services is now the pilot and the condition of the owner receiving the benefit of the provision is that his master and crew should have fulfilled these obligations in all material respects. It is for this reason that I scrutinise so closely such suggestions as that: "Although I ought to have reported the matter to the pilot, yet he ultimately found it out himself, or ought so to have done in time to enable him to avoid the accident."

This is not a question of negligence between two ships which are equally responsible for their own proper navigation, but a question whether the owner of a ship is entitled to benefit by the provision which relieves him from liability on the ground of compulsory pilotage. He does not earn the exemption if he has not performed the part incumbent on him. If it was the duty of his master and crew to report, and they did not do so, he is not entitled to excuse himself in the way suggested, for it may well be that if notice had been duly given to the pilot at the proper time, he would never have permitted the ship to have got into the difficulties from which he failed to extract himself. In such a case the owner would not, in my opinion, be entitled to the benefit of the provision, because he would have failed, in a material respect, to fulfil the fundamental condition of his exemption from liability.

Speaking for myself, I look in vain for any excuse for the master and crew of the Gothland having thus wholly made default in their duty to report to the pilot, more especially in respect of the presence and position and movements of the Shukoff and the Aberdale. The excuse of the master is: "There were so many ships under way as a matter of fact that we could not notice any one ship in particular." This excuse comes badly from the mouth of one whose ship is coming through this alleged crowd of ships at a speed of thirteen knots. But I do not believe this statement of the master. There might have been other ships in the neighbourhood, although there is no evidence of it, but these must, in general, have been ships with which the Gothland had no concern, while both the Shukoff and the Aberdale were ships of which she was bound to take particular notice, not only at the moment of the manœuvre, but even before.

The opinion of the learned judge at the trial was not only that the collision was due to the negligence of the Gothland, but that this default on the part of the master and crew to give to the pilot the assistance he had a right to demand from them, is fatal to the plea of compulsory pilotage which the defendants have set up. I am in entire agreement with this decision, and am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the learned judge at the trial restored, and that the appellants should have their costs here and in the court below.

There is another consideration which I have not allowed to influence me in arriving at the conclusion that the plea of compulsory pilotage is not made out, because it is not necessary to enable me to arrive at that conclusion. But it is a matter which comes into such prominence in this case, and, in my opinion, is one of such importance, that I cannot refrain from dealing with it.

When the pilot of the Gothland starboarded to rush across the bow of the Shukoff, and thus got himself into difficulties with the advancing Aberdale, the chief officer of the Gothland, who was standing by him on the bridge, must have been aware of the danger that he was thus recklessly incurring. In my opinion, it was the duty of the master to call the pilot's attention to the danger that he was thus voluntarily running. In saying this, I am not suggesting that such a crisis had arisen as to justify the master in taking the ship out of the control of the pilot, although it is settled law that in very extreme cases it is his duty so to do. But, short of cases such as that, there must be many cases in which the action of the pilot is so obviously dangerous to the safety of the ship that it is the duty of the master to call the pilot's attention to it. It may be that the pilot has failed to perceive something gravely affecting the course he ought to take, or that he has failed to interpret rightly what he has seen. Whether omissions such as this are the cause of a dangerous manœuvre, or whether it is the wilful or perverse choice of the pilot is a matter which the master cannot decide. Therefore, where, as in the present case, a glaring and very serious risk is being run for no apparent justification, it may well be, and I think it was in this case the duty of the master to call the pilot's attention to the risk he is running, so as to prompt him to reconsider his course of action. I fully realise the absolute authority of the pilot and the importance of not interfering with him, but it is, in my opinion, no more an interference with his authority to call his attention to such a matter in a proper case than it is an interference with him to tell him of something which he might himself see, but may have allowed to pass unnoticed. The case where a master is bound thus to point out to a pilot the risk he is running will be rare, because it is manifestly the wiser course to refrain from so doing in ordinary cases. Whether any particular case comes within the class where the master is justified or bound to call the pilot's attention to the matter, so that he may reconsider his action, must be a matter of judgment in the circumstances of each case, but, personally, I think that in the present case the master ought to have done so, and that, if he had done so, the collision would probably have not occurred.

Lord MOULTON's judgment in the case of the Larenberg was as follows:—

The collision which has given rise to this litigation is closely connected with the collision between the Shukoff and the Gothland, which has been dealt with by this House, in the judgment which has just been delivered.

The Larenberg, which was a steamship of the length of 326ft., was coming down the south Edinburgh Channel light—so light, in fact, that its propeller was half out of the water—a little behind the other two vessels and further over to the east side of the Channel.

The judge who tried the case found the facts as follows: That the Larenberg saw the Gothland steering its course so as to run across the bows of the Shukoff, and, being afraid that there would be trouble between them, slowed his engines, but did not stop them. She was about 100 yards behind the Shukoff at the moment of the first collision. Some little time after the first collision the Larenberg reversed its engines, but the Gothland came across her course before the Larenberg had succeeded in taking off all her way, and thus the Larenberg struck the Gothland on her port quarter and did her serious damage. Under these circumstances the learned judge held both vessels to blame, apportioning the blame as to two-thirds to the Gothland and one-third to the Larenberg. The negligence of which he found the Larenberg guilty was that she should have reversed her engines earlier, and at least as soon as the first collision. He says: "The pilot of the Larenberg, having the colliding Shukoff and Gothland so close and so fine on the bow, had no business to speculate as to how the Gothland would clear, and he ought to have appreciated the risk of not at once taking off his way, and ought to have reversed at once. If he had, the collision would most probably not have happened, and certainly the blow would have been much less severe."

With regard to the Gothland, he finds that the negligence which caused the first collision was a contributing cause to the second collision.

I agree with the judgment of the learned judge that both vessels were to blame. I am unwilling to differ from his view that the Larenberg was to blame for not reversing earlier, and with regard to the Gothland I am of opinion not only that its negligence in bringing about the earlier collision contributed to the second, but I am also of opinion that she made no effort to extricate herself from the position in which the collision left her, excepting by allowing herself to get across the channel down which the Larenberg was coming, and that this itself was a continuing act of negligence which contributed to the second collision. Her pilot was primarily responsible for this, but it was no doubt partly caused by the negligence of the master and crew of the Gothland in not making any report to their pilot, who says that he saw nothing of the Larenberg until he heard a shout from her and found that she was close on his port quarter, not half a ship's length away.

For these reasons I agree with the judgment of the judge at the trial that both vessels were to blame, but the Court of Appeal has varied this judgment and has held the Larenberg alone to blame, although the misconduct of the Gothland was unquestionably the cause of the whole trouble. The Court of Appeal has done so on the ground that they are advised by their nautical assessors that if the pilot of the Larenberg had acted as he ought to have acted when he realised danger, this collision would not have occurred, and that this is sufficient to make the Larenberg solely to blame.

I differ fundamentally from this proposition. It entirely puts out of consideration the conduct of the Gothland, which made no effort to extricate itself from the position in which the collision left it, so as to avoid the collision with the Larenberg. Its not doing so was a continuing act of negligence leading up to the collision, and I lean to the belief that if the Gothland, after the collision, had ported down the channel so as to get into a course parallel with that of the vessels that were also running down the channel, including the Larenberg, the same consequences would have followed as those which the judge at the trial considers would have followed if the Larenberg had reversed its engines earlier, namely, that the collision would most probably not have happened, and certainly the blow would not have been much less severe.

There is great danger of mis-applying the doctrine for which Radley v. London and North-Western Railway (35 L. T. Rep. 637; 1 App. Cas. 754) is quoted as an authority. The language sometimes used by the Courts on this point would seem to imply that a ship guilty of the initial negligence is relieved from all responsibility, and that the other ship alone has to bear the task of avoiding the consequences, and that if it could have done so by proper navigation it is solely to blame. This is not the true rule. The ship guilty of the initial negligence remains bound to do everything that it can to prevent the consequences of that negligence, and the burden upon it is to show that it has done so before it can claim that the negligence of the other ship is the sole cause of the accident. Otherwise, we should be putting a premium on taking the initiative in negligence. In the present case, the Gothland continued to be negligent until the moment of the collision with the Larenberg, and thereby aggravated, if it did not wholly cause, the danger; and although the Larenberg was also negligent, it must share the blame.

The negligence of the Gothland in the original collision is part of the negligence which caused the second collision, and as, in my opinion, it was contributed to by the default of the master and crew of the Gothland not duly reporting to the pilot, its consequences are not covered by the plea of compulsory pilotage. But I am of opinion also that the continuing negligence of the Gothland in allowing itself to get across the channel without heeding the Larenberg that was coming down it on its port side, was also contributed to by the same cause, so that the plea of compulsory pilotage fails altogether with regard to the Gothland. On the other hand, it is scarcely contested that the negligence of the Larenberg is covered by that plea. In both these respects I agree with the judgment of the judge at the trial, and am of opinion that the appeal of the Larenberg against the decision of the Court of Appeal, to the effect that it was solely to blame, should be allowed with costs, and that the plea of compulsory pilotage should be held to be good in the case of the Larenberg but should be disallowed in the case of the Gothland.

Lord SUMNER.—Both courts below have found that the Gothland, the overtaking ship, was at such a lateral distance and on such a bearing from the Shukoff when the Gothland's pilot himself became aware of the Shukoff's position, that clearly he could then have averted the collision by appropriate action. The reason given by the pilot for not doing so has been found to be false, nor does he allege that the actual position of the Aberdale placed him in a difficulty. I am satisfied that, when he saw where the Shukoff was, he must equally have seen where the Aberdale was, and I see no reason for assuming some explanation of his conduct arising out of the latter vessel's actual position, which he does not even offer for himself. If so, his failure to give way to the Shukoff, when he saw where she was and could have done so, is the sole cause of this collision.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to come to any decision about the alleged default of the Gothland's officers and crew in not assisting the pilot by reporting the Shukoff and her change of course when she gave way to the Aberdale. I do not think it is open to your Lordships to consider any possible default on the part of the Gothland's master in not expostulating with the pilot after he had seen the Shukoff and still did not keep out of her way. It is a new case, not made by questions put to the witnesses. I only desire to say that I do not wish to be understood to favour either class of alleged default, in view of the importance of leaving a pilot to himself as much as possible, where he has only to use his eyes and his wits in order to be more fully informed than any look-out can make him.

As to the Gothland's speed, I understand the advice given to your Lordships to be that, under the circumstances, it was not excessive, and in this I concur.

In the case of the Larenberg I agree that she did not reverse her engines soon enough. If that had been done when engine action was first considered necessary by her pilot, the accident would not have happened. This, however, was solely her pilot's fault, and she succeeds in the defence of compulsory pilotage.

I think the Gothland, equally with the Larenberg, contributed by her negligence to bring about the collision. For this purpose it is not necessary to inquire whether that negligence consisted in the default which brought her into collision with the Shukoff, or in some default in her handling after she had struck the Shukoff, for even in the first case that default continued to operate and to determine her position up to the time of the collision with the Larenberg. There may even have been negligence contributing to the collision in both respects.

After she struck the Shukoff the Gothland certainly was under control to some extent, and was brought by her pilot over towards the north-east side of the channel, so as to angle across the course of down-coming traffic. As the story he tells is again not true, there is some doubt what he actually did, but it does not appear to me possible to say that the Gothland was simply shot across the channel in a helpless condition by reasons of the first collision. She was manœuvred into the position in which she was struck, and did nothing to avoid the downcoming traffic at all, as she ought to have done. In this state of things the Larenberg was never reported to her pilot, and as he was visibly and fully occupied with the position he had got into after the first collision, he ought to have had the benefit of such a report. No doubt he had seen her some minutes before, but I do not think this exonerated the Gothland's look-out. No doubt the Larenberg was the overtaking ship, but I think that the position into which the Gothland had got by colliding with the Shukoff was so exceptional that those in charge of the watch on the Gothland would not be justified in leaving to the Larenberg the whole responsibility for keeping out of the way, or in treating her as a ship with which neither they nor their pilot need concern themselves.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that the Gothland has not made out the defence of compulsory pilotage in the case of the Larenberg.

SCRUTTON, SONS, AND CO. v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR TRINIDAD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF TRINIDAD.

Docks—Government ownership—Damage caused to ship owing to an alleged misleading buoy—Petition of Right.

A steamship belonging to the appellants was proceeding to enter a Government floating dock under a contract for repairs. She had to pass a shoal where buoys had been placed and in avoiding it struck a concealed rock. The appellants by a Petition of Right claimed damages, alleging that the Government authorities were under contractual liability to afford safe access to the dock, and were liable for the misleading character of the buoys.

Held, that the Petition failed as there was no warranty of the safety of the particular part of the channel where the rock was situated.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Trinidad, dated the 7th Jan. 1919, reversing a decision of the Chief Justice in favour of the now appellants.

Dunlop, K.C., Sir H. A. Alcazar, K.C. (Trinidad), and Balloch for the appellants.

Raeburn, K.C. and R. F. Hayward for the respondent.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord DUNEDIN.—The Government of Trinidad are proprietors of a floating dock which is moored in Chaguaramas Bay, the use of which they let for hire to shipowners or to ship-captains requiring it. The plaintiffs, the appellants, are owners of the steamship Savan. This ship being at Port of Spain, and having lost a blade of her propeller, it was arranged that she should proceed to the dock for repairs. The captain navigated the ship from Port of Spain to the bay without asking the services of a pilot, and arrived there safely at 10.10 a.m. on the 3rd March 1915. The time for the reception of the ship had been arranged for 10.30 a.m. On the ship's arrival a boat was sent to her by the dock authorities to inform the captain that the dock was not yet ready for the reception of the ship, and the captain anchored in the middle of the channel at a point about 350ft. distant from the warping buoy which is itself distant about 625ft. from the entrance of the dock. The effect of the wind on the ship as it lay at anchor was to blow the ship athwart the entrance to the dock so that she lay with her head to the eastward, the dock being directly to her north. At 10.30 a.m. the captain was informed that the dock was ready; he then requested one of the dock officials to come aboard, and Mr. Sharpe, who was in charge of the dock, came aboard. The position of the ship was such that it could not straighten on her starboard helm and enter the dock straight. The captain, therefore, determined to go round on a port helm seawards until he had sufficient room to turn completely round and head straight into the dock.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The bay in which the dock lies may be roughly described as pear-shaped, the dock being situated at the narrow end of the pear. The bounding land on the east has an irregular point which is the point on which Nora Villa stands. To the north of this there is shoal water, and with a view to marking the presence of a shoal the dock authorities had put a buoy with two other buoys directly to the north. The principal buoy was anchored in 3½ fathoms, and the engineer who put it there as well as the fishermen who frequented the bay were not aware that outside the line of that buoy and the two small buoys there was any danger to shipping. As a matter of fact there was a concealed rock. The captain while turning round on the port helm asked Mr. Sharpe if it was safe outside the buoy and was told it was. He directed his course close to the line of the three buoys and struck the rock.

The plaintiffs raised their action by way of a Petition of Right and claimed as damages the sum which was lost by direct injury to the ship and by demurrage while the ship was being repaired. The learned trial judge gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, but his judgment was reversed by the full court of Trinidad. From this judgment the present appeal is brought.

A Petition of Right must be founded on contract and not on tort. The appellants accordingly argue that in respect of the contract with the dock authorities the authorities were under a contractual liability to afford him safe access to the dock; that the buoy, as placed, was misleading, and that the ship suffering damage while passing outside the buoy showed a breach of warranty on the part of the respondent. The learned trial judge cited a number of authorities on which he relied. He sought to draw a parallel between this case and the well-known case of Indermaur v. Dames (16 L. T. Rep. 293; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 311). This may at once be put aside. Indermaur v. Dames proceeded entirely upon the fact that the defendant was in control of the premises upon which he invited the plaintiff and in which he allowed to lurk a hidden danger. It is obvious that the dock authorities were not in control of a portion of the sea in this bay in the sense that the defendant was in Indermaur v. Dames. As little can the appellants get help from the case also cited by the learned judge of Reney v. Kir cudbright Magistrates (67 L. T. Rep. 474; (1892) A. C. 264). In that case the ship was entirely under the orders of the harbour-master and bound to do what the harbour master told him; the accident occurred in consequence. Here the ship was not under the control of Mr. Sharpe nor was the captain, the actual operation of entering the dock not having begun, under his orders in any sense whatsoever.

Their Lordships accept the law as laid down in the cases of The Moorcock (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 357, 373; 60 L. T. Rep. 654; 14 Prob. Div. 64), The Calliope (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 359, 440, 585; 63 L. T. Rep. 781; (1891) A. C. 11), and Reg. v. Williams (9 App. Cas. 418). If the appellants could equiparate the facts in this case to the facts dealt with in those cases they would be entitled to succeed, but in their Lordships' opinion it is not possible for them so to do.

In The Moorcock the part of the channel which it was held that the defendants had impliedly warranted to be safe was the channel close up to the quay, without resting on the bottom of which it was impossible to use the quay. In The Calliope, where upon the facts no liability was held to exist, Lord Watson, it is true, used the expression "access to the dock." His expression, however, must be interpreted secundum subjectam materiam, and the place which was being discussed as an access was a few feet distant from the place where the vessel was destined to lie. In Reg. v. Williams the concealed snag was close to the staith which was provided by the dock authorities for the vessel to moor at. If the wreck here had been in the jaws of the dock or even in close proximity to the warping buoy, the case might have been a parallel one, but the wreck here was in no proper sense in the access to the dock. There was an ample fairway by which the dock could be approached. All fairways fringed by a shore must have a limit, and it was a very proper thing for the authorities to do to put a buoy in a shoal where the distance to the shore was very near. But to extract from that fact a guarantee on the part of the authority that there was absolute safety on the outside, however near to the buoy a ship might go, is a proposition for which their Lordships know of no authority.

The appellants then argued that there was liability in respect of the statement made by Mr. Sharpe that there was safety outside the buoy. As a matter of fact Mr. Sharpe in so saying was telling what he believed to be true. No one knew of the concealed rock, not even the fishermen. But even had he known, for any tortious statement of Sharpe the respondent cannot be held liable, and it is clear that once it is settled that the dock authorities had not by their contract warranted that there was absolute safety outside the buoy, Mr. Sharpe had no authority to impose upon them such a warranty.

Their Lordships, therefore, come to the conclusion that the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs, and will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP LORD (COGSTAD AND CO.) AND H. NEWSOM, SONS, AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Arbitration — Appeal—Case stated by arbitrator—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 7 and 19.

Where an arbitrator states a special case for the opinion of the court without indicating whether he is acting under sect. 7 or sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889, it is necessary to consider, in order to ascertain under which section such special case is stated, whether the arbitrator intended to part with the matter for good and all, so far as his jurisdiction over it was concerned; or whether, whilst retaining his jurisdiction, he merely sought the direction of the court upon some point which had arisen before him.

If the language used indicates that the arbitrator desires the case to go back to him in order that he may give his final award after the court has expressed its opinion, then the special case is stated under sect. 19 and no appeal will lie to the Court of Appeal.

When stating a special case arbitrators should state under which section of the Act it is intended to be stated.

APPEAL from a judgment of Bailhache, J.

By a charter-party, dated the 8th April 1916, for a voyage from Liverpool to Archangel it was provided by clause 9 that the master was to prosecute his voyage with the utmost dispatch, and, by clause 14, that all losses and damage occasioned by "negligence, default, or error of judgment of the pilot, master, or crew, or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the steamer" were to be absolutely excepted. The vessel sailed from Liverpool on the 26th Sept. 1916, and arrived at Honningsvaag, in the north of Norway. From there, owing to the danger of German submarines, a special route to Archangel was prescribed by the British Admiralty and the Norwegian War Insurance Association; the master, however, after waiting some days, decided to proceed by another route, and reached Vardö on the 11th Oct. 1916. Subsequently the crew refused to continue the voyage to Archangel owing to reports as to the presence of hostile submarines, and in spite of the charterer's protests the voyage was abandoned and the cargo discharged. The claim of the owners for the hire and of the charterers for damages for breach of the charter-party were referred to arbitration.

The umpire found as facts: (a) That the voyage Liverpool to Archangel was a voyage which the charterers were entitled to order the steamer to perform and was so accepted by the owners as a voyage duly approved by the directors of the Norwegian War Insurance Association; (b) that it was a voyage undertaken by the charterers in sufficient time to be considered in season; (c) that, in disregarding the advice of the Norwegian War Insurance Association on arrival at Honningsvaag to proceed from there direct to Archangel at a considerable distance from the Norwegian coast, the captain of the Lord was guilty of a grave error of judgment and was influenced thereto by fear of the consequences to himself and the crew, and that his failure to sail was a breach of clause 9 of the charter-party; (d) that if the Lord had so sailed in accordance with the advice of the Norwegian War Insurance Association there was a strong probability of her reaching Archangel; (e) that in giving no instructions to the captain of the Lord at Honningsvaag to proceed on his voyage without delay the owners of the Lord connived at and are responsible in damages to the charterers for the failure so to proceed; (f) that having elected to proceed to Archangel by way of Vardö it was incumbent upon the captain to complete the voyage to Archangel; (g) that on the 13th Oct. the Norwegian War Insurance Association, who "undertook the responsibility which might be involved thereby," directed the Lord to remain at Vardö pending their further instructions, and the owners instructed the captain to follow such orders; (h) that these orders were temporary in character, and that on the 21st Oct. 1916, permission was given to proceed. The Lord was accordingly timed to leave Vardö on the 23rd Oct., but in consequence of alarming reports the captain abandoned the attempt; (i) that, although attended by great danger, a successful passage to Archangel by the route chosen by the captain was at this time by no means an impossibility, as vessels had considerable protection from the prevailing weather as well as from the fact that there was darkness for about seventeen out of twenty-four hours in those latitudes; (k) that the embargo against sailing continued until the 31st Oct., when, in consequence of the lateness of the season and the weather conditions prevailing, the Allied Governments directed that a number of steamers of which the Lord was one should not proceed to Archangel; (l) that the voyage was abandoned as from that date and was frustrated; (m) that the owners were justified in withdrawing the steamer in consequence of the non-payment of hire, and that the measure of their damages was the charter-party rate of hire and expenses as per charter-party up to the date of discharge of the steamer at Trondhjem at noon on the 23rd Nov. 1916; (n) that the owners committed a breach of clause 9 of the charter-party, and I assess the damages for this breach at 4586*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* The award concluded:

"20. Subject to the opinion of the court upon any point of law, I find that there is nothing due by the owners to the charterers, but that there is due by the charterers to the owners the sum of 1840*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.* in full settlement of all accounts. . . .

"21. The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party and the facts stated by me the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in point of law. If they be correct my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particulars I desire that the award may be referred back to me for reassessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court."

Bailhache, J. (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 19; 123 L. T. Rep. 64) held that the decision of the master not to follow the prescribed route was an error of judgment as to route, and not an error of judgment "in the management or navigation" of the ship, and that consequently the owners were not protected by the exceptions in clause 14 of the charter-party, and upheld the award.

The owners appealed.

The respondents, the charterers, took the preliminary objections that no appeal lay.

The Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49) provides by

Sect. 7. The arbitrators or umpire acting under a submission shall, unless the submission expresses a contrary intention, have power—(b) to state an award as to the whole or part thereof in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court. . . .

Sect. 19. Any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the Court or a judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference.

Le Quesne (MacKinnon, K.C. with him), for the respondents, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay to the Court of Appeal on the ground that the award was not final, and was not stated under sect. 7, but under sect 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889. He referred to

Re Holland Steamship Company and Bristol Steam Navigation Company, 95 L. T. Rep. 769.

Neilson, K.C. and Jowitt for the appellants.—The award is a final award. It is not the less a final award, because the umpire said: "If incorrect in any particular, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for reassessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court." A case is always sent back to the arbitrator under sect. 10 of the Act if the court disagrees with the arbitrator in point of law. The umpire was only requesting that that should be done which the court would do of its own accord. An arbitrator cannot be expected to indicate all possible views, and to say what is to be done in every case, according as one view or other of all the possible views is taken by the court. The question in each case is whether the arbitrator is giving his decision without the aid of the court, or whether he is asking the court to help him to the proper decision:

Re Knight and Tabernacle Building Society, 67 L. T. Rep. 403; (1892) 2 Q. B. 613;
Re Kirkleatham Local Board and Stockton Water Board, 67 L. T. Rep. 811; (1893) 1 Q. B. 375.

In the present case the arbitrator was not invoking the court in its consultative capacity, but was making a final award subject to the opinion of the court upon any point of law. The case is therefore within sect. 7; the award is a final award, and an appeal lies to the Court of Appeal.

Le Quesne replied.

Cur adv. vult.

The following judgments were read:—

BANKES, L.J.—In this case the preliminary point is taken that no appeal lies to this court because the special case stated by the arbitrator for the opinion of the High Court was not a final award embodied in a special case under sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889, but was a case stated for the opinion of the court under sect. 19 of the same Act.

It is well settled that no appeal lies to this court if the special case is one stated under sect. 19. The arbitrator has not stated on the face of the special case under which section he intended to proceed. It is necessary to arrive at a conclusion on the point from an examination of the language used by the arbitrator. The essential difference between the two kinds of special case is, I think, this. In the one case the arbitrator intends to part with the matter for good and all, so far as his jurisdiction over it is concerned; in the other he intends to retain his jurisdiction, but asks the court for its direction on some point which has arisen before him. If by the language used in a special case an arbitrator has sufficiently indicated that the matter must go back to him, after the court has expressed its opinion, in order that he may give his final opinion upon it, then the special case is one stated under sect. 19, and no appeal will lie.

is a case in point. In that case the arbitrators stated their award in the form of a special case. They decided two points, and then went on to say that if the court held that the two points were correctly decided, then the award was to stand, but if the court should be of opinion that either point was wrongly decided, then the matter " is to be remitted to us to give effect to the true construction of the contracts in our interim and final awards." In arriving at a decision the court laid no stress upon the particular language in which the arbitrators expressed their intention to have the case sent back to them, in the event of the court disagreeing with their findings. What appears to have impressed the court was that the special case did not state the question for the opinion of the court in such a way, that whichever way the court answered that question the award would be final.

On this point the present case is indistinguishable from the Holland Steamship case (sup.). The arbitrator here has come to no decision in reference to the damages which may become payable in the event of the court not accepting the decision to which he has come; but he desires that the award may be referred back to him for reassessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court if they disagree with his decisions. The only distinction which can be drawn between the present case and the Holland Steamship case (sup.) is that in the one the arbitrator desires that the award may be referred back, and in the other the arbitrator states that the matter is to be referred back. I should construe both expressions as evincing the same intention—namely, to retain seisin of the case—but whether that view is the correct one or not, I think that any drawing of fine distinctions between the decisions of this court will only add to the uncertainty and confusion produced by the present state of the law in reference to these two classes of special case.

In the case of Shubrook v. Tufnell (46 L. T. Rep. 749; 9 Q. B. Div. 621) the point now under discussion was not raised.

Until the law is altered, of which there is apparently some probability, I think arbitrators would be well advised when stating a special case to state on the face of the case under which section it is intended to be stated. In my opinion the objection must prevail and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—In this appeal from an order of Bailhache J. upon a case stated by an umpire the preliminary objection is taken that no appeal lies, because, it is said, the case was stated not as an award in that form, but for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court in the course of the arbitration, the function of the court being in that view consultative only.

The document we have to deal with purports to be an award in the form of a special case, but I think it must be admitted that it is the duty of the court in such matters to look at the substance and not merely at the form. The question seems to be: Did the umpire intend to dispose finally of the question submitted to him? or did he, in the event of the decision of the court being of a particular nature, purport to retain seisin of the matter for further consideration and adjudication?

In the present case, after stating certain findings of fact, and conclusions of law, the umpire proceeded: " The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party, and the facts as stated by me, the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in point of law. If they be correct, my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particulars, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for reassessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court."

Now this clearly indicates that in his view, in the event of the decision of the court being of one nature, there remained a matter covered by the submission which had not been disposed of and which must be disposed of before his function as umpire would be completely fulfilled. As a mere matter of construction I should say that this special case asked for an opinion which in one event only would dispose of the matter, and in the other would leave something for the umpire to do under the original reference. But if I were of a contrary opinion, I should consider myself bound by the decision of this court in the Holland Steamship case (95 L. T. Rep. 769). I can find no substantial distinction between the two cases. It is true the " is to be referred back " of that case is rather more peremptory than the " I desire that the award may be referred back " of the present one, but in this, as in the other, the umpire shows that he considers the reference is not finally concluded. In Shubrook v. Tufnell (sup.) the present question did not arise. On the whole, I agree with Bankes, L.J. that the preliminary objection ought to prevail, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Scrutton, L.J.—When this appeal was called on in court, objection was taken by the respondents that no appeal lay.

There are two classes of special cases under the Arbitration Act. There is, first, an award stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court under sect. 7 of the Act. From the decision of the court on such a special case an appeal lies: (Re Kirkleatham Local Board and Stockton and Middlesbrough Water Board, 67 L. T. Rep. 811; (1893) 1 Q. B. 375). There is, secondly, a special case stated for the opinion of the court at any stage of the proceedings under a reference. From this consultative case, as it is sometimes called, no appeal lies: (Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society's Arbitration, 67 L. T. Rep. 403; (1892) 2 Q. B. 613).

The importance of the distinction has been much lessened by the recent decision of the House of Lords in the British Westinghouse Electric Limited v. Underground Electric Railways Company of London (107 L. T. Rep. 325; (1912) A. C. 673), that when the arbitrator in his final award purports to act on the consultative opinion given by the court that opinion can be questioned by legal proceedings up to the House of Lords on the ground of error of law appearing on the face of the award. The distinction, at present, only added another legal hearing to the numerous existing facilities.

In the present case the experienced umpire purports to make his award; he finds facts, he finds liability in law and assesses damages. If his findings stand, his award is final. He then says: " The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter and the facts as stated by me the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in law. If they be correct, my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particular, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court."

The question is whether this award is final, under sect. 7, or consultative, under sect. 19 of the Act. A special case under sect. 19 can be stated at "any stage of the proceedings," which, on the words of Lord Halsbury in the Knight and Tabernacle case (sup.) must be before the proceedings have come to an end by a completed award. Lord Bowen defines the distinction in the Kirkleatham case (sup.) as the case where the arbitrator has stated his award in the form of a special case, and a case where he has asked the opinion of the court by interlocutory proceedings in order to assist him to form his judgment. He elaborates this in the Knight and Tabernacle case (sup.) by saying: "Sect. 19 contemplates a proceeding by the arbitrator for the purpose of guiding himself as to the course he should pursue in the reference. He does not divest himself of his complete authority over the subject matter of the arbitration. He is still clothed with the final duty of determining the case."

If the question in this case is whether the arbitrator expressed his final opinion and asked whether it was right, or whether as an interlocutory proceeding he asked a question the answer to which he could consider in making his final award, I have no doubt the former is the correct view. But it is said for a case to be final and the decision of the Court subject to appeal, the arbitrator's award must provide for every contingency so that, whatever view the court took of the questions asked, the award finally determined the matter. It was said that if the arbitrator said simply: "On the facts my final award is so and so, the question for the opinion of the court is whether my award is correct," that this, though purporting to be final, was merely interlocutory, and to be final the award must anticipate and provide for every possible view of the law the court might take. This would impose a very heavy burden on commercial arbitrators. But it seems, also, inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Shubrook v. Tufnell (sup.). There the arbitrator found the facts, stated the question, and continued: "If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then the case is to be referred back to the arbitrator. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment is to be entered up for the defendant with costs of suit." The Divisional Court entered judgment for the plaintiff and sent the case back to the arbitrator. On appeal to the Court of Appeal it was objected that no appeal lay, but Jessel, M.R. and Lindley, L.J. were clearly of opinion that an appeal lay. In that case the arbitrator had not expressed his own opinion; the case is much stronger where, as here, he expresses his final opinion.

The case relied on by the appellants was Holland Steamship Company v. Bristol Steam Navigation Company (sup.), in which, as it happens, I was umpire. The case was a peculiar one, the award being fully set out in the report. There was an agreement made to avoid competition providing for a pool and the joint running of two steamship lines. The agreement worked with great friction, and a permanent arbitrator was appointed, who had continually to decide what the agreement meant and what should be done. Though he came to final decisions on particular points their application always gave rise to fresh disputes. He decided finally certain points of construction and stated a case as to whether his decision was right. If it was wrong, further liabilities might arise according to the view taken by the court, and the award continued: "If either or both points are wrongly decided the matter is to be remitted to us to give effect to the true construction of the contract in an interim and final award." Objection was taken that no appeal lay from the decision of the court in this case, and Collins, M.R. and Farwell, L.J., stating the distinction was rather a fine one, held that as the umpire had said the case was to go back to him, the case was under sect. 19. They do not appear to have considered the bearing of Shubrook v. Tufnell (sup.) in their decision.

I remain of the opinion that my decision in that case was a final decision (as it was stated to be, and was certainly intended to be), and not an interlocutory one. But, in the present case, the arbitrator certainly does not retain conduct of the case. He "desires," not "directs," the matter to be remitted to him, if he is wrong, which is the course the court would usually take under sect. 10 of the Act, if he did make a final award in the form of a special case, and gave no direction or expressed no desire as to what was to happen if his decision was erroneous.

Finding two conflicting decisions of the Court of Appeal, I think I am at liberty to take my own view, which is that where the arbitrator expresses his final opinion in the form of a special case, he need not work out all the possible results which may follow from the possible other views the court may take. If he is stating his final view, as distinguished from an interlocutory request for an opinion to guide him in forming his final view, I think he is stating the case under sect. 7, and not under sect. 19, of the Act.

Arbitrators would, however, be well advised to state in their award for the consideration of the court under which section they intend to act.

The point in the present case has no merits, for if it succeeds the case must go back to the arbitrator to make a final award; and if in that he states that he followed the opinion of the court, all the appeals would follow which the objection intends to avoid. The respondents, however, desire the point to be taken; it fails in my opinion, and, in my opinion, they should pay the costs occasioned by taking it, and the appeal must proceed.

JONES v. EUROPEAN AND GENERAL EXPRESS COMPANY. (a)

Carriage of goods—Shipping agents—Obligations—Loss of goods—Pilferage—Insurance—Liability of the forwarding agent.

In July 1918 the plaintiff forwarded to the defendants, who were shipping agents, eight bales of cloth to be shipped to a French port and thence to be forwarded by rail to a consignee at Lyons. The defendants undertook to have the goods insured against pilferage during transit from warehouse to warehouse. They held an open policy of insurance under which they were able to declare the goods in question and obtain the protection of the underwriters' undertaking. The defendants made the usual and proper arrangements with steamships and railways for the carriage of the goods in question to their destination, and also made proper arrangements with the underwriters for the insurance of the goods during transit. While the goods were in the custody of the French Customs' authorities two bales were lost, and only six bales reached their destination. It was thought that the two bales were stolen. There was no evidence of any negligence or default on the part of the defendants having caused the loss of the goods.

Held, that the obligation imposed upon the defendants was, not to carry the goods, but to make arrangements with the carriers, and to make such arrangements as might be necessary for the intermediate steps in the journey between the different sets of carriers and others who had successive possession of the goods.

As to the contract to insure, the defendants were only obliged to place the plaintiffs' risk with the underwriters, for whose subsequent actions they were not responsible.

In discharging these obligations the defendants had shown no negligence.

ACTION tried by Rowlatt, J., sitting as a commercial judge, without a jury.

The plaintiff, who was a woollen manufacturer carrying on business at Leicester, sued the defendants, who were shipping and forwarding agents, for the loss of two bales of cloth during transit from Leicester to Lyons.

The plaintiff's case was that he employed the defendants to forward eight bales of cloth to a consignee at Lyons. In July 1918, he forwarded to the defendants eight bales of cloth. The goods were to be shipped by the defendants to a French port, from whence they were to be forwarded by passenger train to Lyons. Of the eight bales of cloth forwarded only six reached their destination. The two bales of cloth in respect of which the action was brought were lost while the goods were in the custody of the French Customs authorities.

The plaintiff contracted with the defendants that the defendants would have the goods insured against, among other things, pilferage during transit, or, in other words, theft from warehouse to warehouse. The defendants held an open policy of insurance, under which they were able to declare these goods and obtain the protection of the underwriters' undertaking. Accordingly, the defendants insured the goods in accordance with their contract.

The eight bales of cloth were duly shipped on a vessel called the Corea and forwarded to Caen. Being subject to duty, they were discharged at that port into the custody of the Customs authorities of France. As the duty on these goods was not payable until the goods arrived at their ultimate destination, which was Lyons, the journey to Lyons would have to be made in bond. The goods had to remain in the custody of the French Customs authorities until they could be put on rail for Lyons, and then they would have to go forward in bond. It was thought that the two missing bales were stolen at the port of Caen, after discharge from the steamship Corea, and while they were in the custody of the French Customs authorities at that port. The goods were, in fact, lost while they were thus in the custody of the Customs authorities at that port.

The plaintiff alleged that the loss was due to the negligence of the defendants, and he claimed the value of the goods from the defendants on the ground of their alleged negligence in losing the goods and in not insuring them as agreed.

The defence was that the defendants had undertaken, on the terms of their printed conditions, to forward the goods. They relied on an express condition that they were not acting as common carriers, but as forwarding agents. They denied negligence, and said that they had insured the goods against theft in accordance with their contract.

The defendants counterclaimed for work and labour and for a declaration with regard to certain fines payable to the French Government under a law of 1791.

Russell Davies for the plaintiff.

Rayner Goddard for the defendants.

ROWLATT, J.—In this case the plaintiff sues the defendants, who are forwarding agents, for the loss of two bales of cloth merchandise, and for damages for the breach of the contract to insure the said goods.

The defendants were employed to insure these goods against (inter alia) pilferage, and they held an open policy which enabled them to declare these goods and obtain the protection of the underwriters' undertaking. But the underwriters say that they are not satisfied with the evidence of the loss. They may be right, or they may be wrong; in their absence I am not entitled to express any opinion on their attitude. The defendants, however, never guaranteed that the underwriters would pay or would make no dispute. They undertook to place the plaintiff's risk with the underwriters at that time and they did so, and there is no ground for complaint against them because the underwriters take what the plaintiff thinks is an unjustifiable view with regard to the facts and their position.

But, of course, the underwriting was only, collateral protection for the plaintiff, and he is independently altogether of that, entitled to recover from the defendants, if he can make out that the loss was due to the defendants' negligence in carrying out what they were instructed to do. It must be clearly understood that a forwarding agent is not a carrier. He does not obtain possession of the goods and he does not undertake to deliver them. All he does is to act as agent for the owner of the goods, and make the necessary arrangements with the people who do carry—steamship, railways, and so on—and to make arrangements, as far as they are necessary, for the intermediate steps between the ship and the rail, the Customs or anything else; so that the liability of the defendants, if any, depends on their failing—if they have failed—to carry out those duties that I have described.

The goods in question in this action were shipped on board the Corea and they were landed at Caen. They had to be discharged into the custody of the Customs authorities at that port. That is quite clear, and as the duty was not payable until the goods arrived at their ultimate destination—namely, Lyons, it is obvious that they remained in the custody of the Customs authorities until they could be put on rail for Lyons and go forward in bond. The goods were still in the custody of the Customs authorities when the two bales of cloth were lost or stolen. That much is quite clear.

It is impossible for me to say that the loss was due to the default of the defendants. They had to do what was necessary in the ordinary course of their business, and the ordinary course, from which the defendants could not escape, was that these goods were landed into the clutches of the Customs, and followed the routine prescribed by the Customs, into whosever hands and on whosever premises that routine led them. There is not the slightest evidence to show that the defendants delayed these goods. The defendants were powerless to alter the ordinary course which was followed in this case. The delay at Caen was probably due to congestion, and there was no default on the part of the defendants. There is nothing to show that the goods were lost through any delay at the port of Caen for which the defendants were in any way responsible. The facts are quite consistent with the story that the goods may have been stolen on the day of their arrival at that port. In these circumstances the claim against the defendants breaks down.

There is a counter-claim by the defendants. They are asking for a declaration of a novel kind. Under the law of 1791, if goods are shipped to France and there is a shortage against the manifest, the consignee is liable to pay what is called a fine to the French Government because dutiable goods have disappeared. I do not think it is a penal sum. It is really compensation for goods disappearing without paying duty. I cannot make the declaration. It is extremely improbable that this fine will ever be exacted. I understand that if the loss is due to theft the fine in question is not exacted. Therefore, if the fine is levied on the defendants, it will be because the French authorities will take, and act on, a view of the facts of this case, which is contrary to the one now put forward. There must be judgment for defendants on the claim and the counterclaim must be dismissed.

Behrens and Co. Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited. (a)

Sale of goods—Delivery—Interruption of discharge—Buyer's right to reject—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), s. 30.

If a ship which has begun to discharge a parcel of cargo at the port of delivery leaves the port to deliver other cargo elsewhere before the discharge of that parcel is complete, her action, in the absence of special stipulations to the contrary, is a breach of the contract to deliver, notwithstanding that she subsequently returns and offers the balance of the parcel.

Although the buyer is not entitled to continuous delivery, yet if the vessel leaves the port before the whole of his parcel is discharged he may reject the whole consignment, or the part undelivered when the ship sailed, as provided by sect. 30 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893.

Special case stated for the opinion of the court. The award of the umpire and the special case stated by him were (omitting immaterial parts) in the following terms:

By a contract in writing, dated the 8th July 1919, Messrs. Behrens and Co. Limited (hereinafter called the sellers sold to the Produce Brokers Company Limited (hereinafter called the buyers) 200 tons of Sakellarides Egyptian cotton seed to be shipped per steamer from Alexandria and (or) Port Said and (or) Ismailia during Aug. and (or) Sept. 1919 at 32*l.* per ton. By a similar contract, dated the 12th Sept. 1919, the sellers sold to the buyers about 500 tons of Tayumi Egyptian cotton seed at 26*l.* per ton to be shipped per steamer from Alexandria and (or) Port Said and (or) Ismailia during Oct. 1919 to London. By a letter of the 15th Sept. 1919 the buyers gave to the sellers the option of shipping the said 500 tons in Sept. 1919. Each of the said contracts provided that the seed was to be delivered in London to buyers' craft alongside; that particulars of shipment were to be declared in London within twenty-four hours after receipt of documents in this country; that payment was to be made in London in fourteen days from the seed being ready for delivery by net cash in exchange for shipping documents and (or) delivery order; that the seed was to be received (during custom house hours) immediately it was ready for delivery from the steamer. Each of the said contracts further provided that any dispute arising thereout should be referred to arbitration in accordance with the rules endorsed thereon. Copies of the contract notes and letters were attached to and formed part of the case. By two letters dated the 6th Oct. 1919 the sellers gave notice to the buyers that they appropriated in part fulfilment of the contract of the 8th July 1919 176 tons per steamship Port Inglis bill of lading dated the 20th Sept., and in part fulfilment of the contract of the 12th Sept. 1919 400 tons per the same steamer, bills of lading dated the 19th Sept., which appropriations were accepted by the buyers. The said quantities of 176 tons and 400 tons had been in fact shipped at Alexandria on the said steamer under the said bills of lading.

(a) Reported by R. F. Blakiston, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The said steamer docked at Regent's Canal Dock, London, on the 13th Oct. 1919, and on the following day the buyers paid the sellers for the said 176 tons and 400 tons, and took up the bills of lading therefor. The steamer commenced her discharge on the 14th Oct. 1919. The buyers duly presented the bills of lading, and were ready and willing to take delivery of the whole bill of lading quantity. The steamer, however, failed to deliver, and the buyers were unable to obtain more than (about) 15 tons of Tayumi seed and (about) 22 tons of Sakellarides seed, which were discharged on the 17th and 18th Oct. The steamer then left for Hull, having still on board the balance of about 384 tons and 153 tons of seed. By letter of the 21st Oct. 1919 the buyers gave to the sellers notice of arbitration and contended that the vessel had completed her voyage and that the contracts were at an end, and requested the return of the amounts paid against the undelivered quantities. On the 3rd Nov. 1919 the steamer again docked in the Regent's Canal Dock, London, and on the 5th Nov. 1919 began to discharge the balance of the said seed. The discharge was completed on the 11th Nov. On the 28th Oct. 1919 it had been agreed between the parties that the buyers should take delivery of the balance of the said seed in the steamer on her arrival in London, and the buyers accordingly took delivery without prejudice to their rights under the contracts. The dispute which had arisen between the sellers and the buyers was referred to arbitration according to the terms of the said contracts. The umpire appointed by the two arbitrators, who were unable to agree, awarded as follows: That the sellers committed a breach of the said contracts by failing to deliver the said balance of the seed in accordance with the contracts and that the sellers should pay to the buyers the sum of 6*l.* per ton on the quantity of Tayumi seed and the sum of 13*l.* per ton on the quantity of Sakellarides seed respectively delivered to the buyers on or about the 5th to the 11th Nov. 1919, and the costs of the reference and award.

The following special case was stated by the umpire, at the request of the sellers, for the opinion of the court:

Case.

The sellers contended before me:

(a) That the sellers had completed their obligations by delivering documents against payment.

(b) That the buyers' rights (if any) were in any case limited to recovering damages for breach of contract.

(c) That the sellers had not been guilty of any breach of contract, and were not responsible for the acts of the shipowner in proceeding to Hull before delivering the balance of the goods.

(d) That even if the sellers had been guilty of a breach of contract that such breach did not justify the buyers in claiming to reject part of the goods or to claim repayment of any appropriate amount.

(e) That if the sellers had been guilty of any breach of contract the damages were limited to the cost of insuring the then undelivered balance from London to Hull and back, together with interest on the proportionate purchase price during the delay consequent thereon.

The buyers contended:

(a) That it was the duty of the sellers to deliver the cotton seed in London to buyers' craft in sound and merchantable condition.

(b) That by the long-established custom and usage of the trade payment is made on advice from the sellers of arrival of ship net cash in exchange for shipping documents, and (or) delivery order, and that such payment is without prejudice to the duty of the seller to deliver the goods into buyers' craft in sound and merchantable condition.

(c) That the buyers paid for the said documents on the basis detailed above.

(d) That the sellers failed to deliver the said goods in accordance with the said contract, and only delivered 22 tons (about) under the contract of the 8th July 1919 and 15 tons (about) under the contract of the 12th Sept. 1919.

(e) That the ship then abandoned the voyage and sailed away to another port; that the buyers were thereupon entitled to claim a refund of the amounts paid by them for the cotton seed which the sellers so failed to deliver and the brokerage which they thus failed to earn.

In addition to the facts set out in pars. 1 to 10 of the special case, I find:

1. That on the 18th Oct. 1919, and at the time of delivery of the balance of the said seed to the buyers, the market price of the said seed was below the contract price.

2. That the steamer did not discharge the balance of 384 tons and 153 tons on her first visit to London because other goods were loaded above, and the object of her proceeding to Hull was to discharge such other goods. She returned to London without undue delay after finishing the discharge of such other goods.

3. That in so far as it is a question of fact, the voyage of the said steamer ended at London before she commenced to discharge on the 14th Oct. 1919, and that the buyers were then entitled to delivery.

The question for the opinion of the court is:

Whether upon the facts above stated the buyers were legally bound under the said contracts to take delivery of the balance of 384 tons and 153 tons of seed loaded on the said steamer on her return to London on the 3rd Nov. 1919. If the court shall be of opinion that the said question should be answered in the negative, then my award is to stand. If the court shall be of opinion that the said question should be answered in the affirmative, then I award that the buyers are not entitled to recover anything from the sellers, and that the buyers pay to the sellers one-third part of the said costs of the reference and award.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt for the sellers.—The contract in this case is somewhat peculiar. It is not a c.i.f. contract, and it is not a "delivered" contract. The sellers have done everything that they were required to do under the contract. It will be noticed that neither in the contract nor in the correspondence is any time fixed for delivery, nor is there any finding in the award on this point. It must be taken, therefore, that a reasonable time for delivery was contemplated by the parties. And there is no suggestion that the actual delivery of the larger part of the goods was unreasonable in point of time. The real remedy of the buyers is against the ship. They had no right to accept part of the goods delivered and reject others, even if they were entitled to reject the whole consignment:

Jackson v. Rotax Cycle Company, 103 L. T. Rep. 411; (1910) 2 K. B. 937.

Stuart Bevan, K.C. and F. van den Berg for the buyers.—The real question is what are the obligations of the sellers under the contract? It is a "delivered" contract, and not a c.i.f. contract, and delivery in the terms of the contract is a condition. Clauses 1 and 2 of the contract must be read together and show that delivery in London was of the essence of the contract and that no deviation was allowed. Reference may be made to:

Sargant and Sons v. East Adriatic Company Limited, 21 Com. Cas. 344;
Bowes v. Shand, 36 L. T. Rep. 857; 2 App. Cas. 455.

The goods were received but not accepted; even if part of the goods were accepted that does not constitute acceptance of the whole consignment: (see Benjamin on Sale, p. 566). Even if the buyers cannot reject part of the goods delivered, they are entitled to damages.

W. A. Jowitt in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

July 7.—Bailhache, J.—In this case the sellers, by two contracts of sale, and in the events which happened, bound themselves to the buyers to deliver in London, ex the steamship Port Inglis, to the buyers' craft alongside, two separate parcels of cotton seed, one of 176 tons and the other of 400 tons. The buyers, on their part, had to pay for these parcels against shipping documents, and to send craft to receive the goods. The buyers fulfilled both these obligations, and received from the Port Inglis some 15 tons of one parcel and 22 tons of the other. When these had been delivered it was discovered that the rest of the seed was lying under cargo for Hull, and the Port Inglis stopped delivery and left for that port, promising to return and deliver the rest of the seed. She returned in about a fortnight's time, and the seed was tendered to the buyers, but they had meantime informed the sellers that they regarded the departure of the Port Inglis with the remainder of their seed on board as a failure to deliver and a breach of contract. They kept so much of the seed as had been delivered to them, and demanded repayment of so much of the contract price as represented the seed undelivered.

The umpire has decided in favour of the buyers, and I am asked to say whether he was right. Everything depends upon whether the departure of the Port Inglis for Hull with the greater part of both parcels of seed on board was a failure to deliver, notwithstanding the promise to return and complete delivery. Both contracts between the parties are in the same terms, and neither has any express provision on the subject. In my opinion, the buyer under such a contract, and where each parcel of goods is indivisible, as here, has the right to have delivery on the arrival of the steamship, not necessarily immediately or continuously; he must take his turn, or the goods may be so stowed that other goods have to be discharged before the whole of the buyers' parcel can be got out. To such delays and others which may occur in the course of unloading the buyer must submit, but in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary the buyer, being ready with his craft, is entitled to delivery of the whole of an indivisible parcel of goods sold to him for delivery from a vessel which has begun delivery to him before she leaves the port to deliver goods elsewhere. If this is so, the rest of the case is covered by sect. 30 of the Sale of Goods Act, and the buyer can either reject the whole of the goods, including those actually delivered, in which case he can recover the whole of his money; or he may keep the goods actually delivered and reject the rest, in which case he must pay for the goods kept at the contract price, and he can recover the price paid for the undelivered portion: (see Devaux and Conolly, 8 C. B. 640). I think that the award is right.

J. and J. Denholm Limited v. Shipping Controller. (a)

Ship — Requisition — Charter-party — Accident — Liability for continuous hire.

A ship was requisitioned under charter-party T. 99, by which the Shipping Controller was entitled to make certain deductions from the freight in the event of the voyage being protracted by the deficiencies of the steamer. The concluding subsection of the clause allowing these deductions provided as follows: "If through any accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and reloading same to be deducted from the hire." In the course of the voyage time was lost in discharging and reloading on account of a fire which broke out in the cargo. The fire could not be attributed to any particular cause. The Shipping Controller claimed the right to make the deductions.

Held, that the meaning of "accident" depends upon the circumstances and intentions of the parties concerned. An accident may or may not arise from negligent or wilful acts or from causes unconnected with negligence or wrongdoing. In this case there was no accident in the sense contemplated by the parties.

Even if the fire had been an accident, the Shipping Controller must still have failed, since it would have been accident to the cargo, not to the ship.

In any event the Shipping Controller could not succeed, since hire runs continuously in favour of the shipowner in the absence of clear provisions to the contrary. The provisions relied upon in this case were ambiguous.

Award stated in the form of a special case by the arbitrator, Mr. Raeburn, K.C.

The claimants were Messrs. Denholm Limited, who were the owners of the steamship Carron Park. The respondent was the Shipping Controller. The Carron Park was requisitioned by the respondent under the terms of a charter-party known as T. 99. The question raised in the special case turned upon the construction of clause 25 of the charter-party, which was in the following terms: Clause 25 (a). "If from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or any other cause, the working of the steamer is at any time suspended for a period exceeding twelve running hours, pay shall cease for the whole of such and any subsequent period, of whatever duration, during which the vessel is inefficient." Clause 25 (b). "Partial inefficiency.—Any work that may be done during a period of partial inefficiency of the steamer, except proceeding to a port for repairs, or to replenish bunker coals owing to an accident, shall be paid for on the basis of the time it would have occupied had the steamer remained efficient. If upon the voyage her speed be reduced by a defect in or breakdown of any part of her machinery, damage to propeller, rudder or by any other mishap of hull or engines or cargo, the time so lost and the cost of any extra coal consumed in consequence thereof shall be deducted from the hire; but should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or for coals, such detention or loss of time shall be at the Admiralty expense. In the event, however, of breakdown at sea or other accident necessitating the steamer proceeding to a port of refuge for repairs, or to replace or land crew, hire to cease until the steamer arrives back in a similar position to that in which she was at the time of the breakdown or accident, &c., and any coals used to be replaced or paid for by owners, whichever Admiralty may elect." Sub-clause (c), with the marginal note, "Period of inefficiency not to count," ran as follows: "If through accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and reloading same to be deducted from the hire. Any time so lost shall count as part of the term of charter named in clauses 2 and 7, but the Admiralty have the option of keeping the steamer for an additional period equivalent to the whole or part of the time lost." The facts on which the dispute between the parties arose were as follows: On the 12th and 13th Feb. 1917 the Carron Park loaded a cargo of coals at Barry Dock on behalf of the respondent. On the evening of the 13th Feb. she left the docks and went into Barry Road, bound for Rochefort. The weather being thick fog, she anchored in the Roads at 8 p.m., and there stayed fog-bound that night and the next day. At 10 p.m. on the 14th Feb., while the ship was still at anchor in the Barry Roads, a fire broke out in the cargo of coal in No. 2 hold. Efforts to extinguish the fire failed, and it was decided to take the vessel back to dock to discharge the coal and so get at the fire. This was done, and when she was moored in dock coal was discharged from several holds. The discharge was finished on the 21st Feb. at 1 p.m. The total amount of coal discharged was 742 tons, but the amount damaged by fire was 30 tons only. The 742 tons discharged was, through error, loaded in the steamship Prosper and not on board the Carron Park. A substituted load of 742 tons of coal was placed in the Carron Park. The loading of the latter tonnage began on the 25th Feb. and ended on the 26th Feb. The actual number of hours employed in the actual process of discharge was but thirty-nine and a half hours. The actual number of hours employed in the actual operation of loading on the 25th and 26th Feb. was but twelve hours.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), D. Mackinnon, K.C. and L. F. C. Darby for the Shipping Controller.—The point raised in this case is a short one, and is whether the Shipping Controller was entitled to deduct hire for a certain period while the steamship Carron Park was, according to the case for the Crown, inefficient by reason of a fire which broke out in part of her cargo. The vessel was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under the terms of the well-known charter-party "T. 99." She loaded a cargo of coals at Barry Dock for Rochefort. She then proceeded to the Barry Roads, where a fire broke out in the cargo. Ineffectual efforts were made to extinguish the fire, and it was then decided to take the ship back into dock and discharge some of the coals so that the seat of the fire could be reached. The Carron Park discharged 742 tons of coal, and thirty-nine and a half hours were occupied in so doing. She then took on a fresh supply of coal and proceeded on her voyage. No damage was done by the fire to the ship. Ten days elapsed between the outbreak of the fire and the sailing a second time, and the Crown contend that they are justified in deducting hire for that period under the clause of the charter-party which runs as follows: "If through accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and re-loading to be deducted from the hire." In the alternative, the Crown claimed that the delay came within the words of the accident clause; that there was a mishap to the cargo in consequence of which time was lost and that the Crown were entitled to a deduction from the hire paid for the vessel.

Leck, K.C. and D. H. Leck for the claimants.—The clause referred to has reference to an accident happening to the ship, not to the cargo. The award is right and should be upheld.

McCardie, J.—This is an award in the form of a special case stated by the arbitrator, Mr. W. N. Raeburn, K.C. The claimants are Messrs. Denholm Limited, owners of the steamship Carron Park. The respondent is the Shipping Controller. The Carron Park was at all material times under requisition by the respondent under the terms of a charter-party known as T. 99. The rate of hire was 39*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* per day. The point at issue is an important one, and turns on the construction of clause 25 of the charter-party, which is well known and widely used. The clause, with marginal words in big letters "Inefficiency" runs as follows, clause 25 (a): "If from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery or any other cause, the working of the steamer is at any time suspended for a period exceeding twelve running hours, pay shall cease for the whole of such and any subsequent period of whatever duration during which the vessel is inefficient." "Partial inefficiency" (b): "Any work that may be done during a period of partial inefficiency of the steamer, except proceeding to a port for repairs or to replenish bunker coals owing to an accident shall be paid for on the basis of the time it would have occupied had the steamer remained inefficient. If upon the voyage her speed be reduced by a defect in a breakdown of any part of her machinery, damage to propeller, rudder, or by any other mishap of hull or engines or cargo, the time so lost and the cost of any extra coal consumed in consequence thereof shall be deducted from the hire; but should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or for coals, such detention or loss of time shall be at the Admiralty expense. In the event, however, of breakdown at sea or other accident necessitating the steamer proceeding to a port of refuge for repairs, or to replace or land crew, hire to cease until the steamer arrives back in a similar position to that in which she was at the time of the breakdown or accident, &c., and any coals used to be replaced or paid for by owners, whichever the Admiralty may elect." Then sub-clause (c), with marginal note "Period of inefficiency not to count," says: "If through accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged the time occupied in discharging and reloading same to be deducted from the hire. Any time so lost shall count as part of the term of charter named in clauses 2 and 7, but the Admiralty have the option of keeping the steamer for an additional period equivalent to the whole or part of the time lost." No other clause in the charter assists in the interpretation of clause 25. [The learned judge, after stating the facts as given above, proceeded as follows:] The following is a material paragraph of the award by the arbitrator, clause 5: "I am unable to find the cause of the fire, but it was not due to any negligence or default on the part of either the claimants or respondent, or any person or persons for whom they are responsible. It was an accidental fire. The ship herself was in no way damaged."

By the finding in clause 5 I understand the arbitrator to mean only that the fire did not arise either through negligence or wilful act. The question for my decision is whether upon the facts found the arbitrator was right in holding that the respondent was not entitled to deduct hire for "time occupied in discharging and reloading." I think that the first point to determine is whether or not there was an "accident" at all, within the meaning of sub-head (c) of clause 25. It appears perhaps, to have been assumed before the learned arbitrator that this fire on board the Carron Park was an accident. In my view it may often be important in charter-parties and the like documents to distinguish between an "incident" and an "accident." The two may be quite different. Every accident is an incident. But every incident is not an accident. Was the fire which broke out in this vessel an incident or an accident? To mark the distinction between the two let me give two examples. To illustrate an incident with regard to cargo, let me assume that the cargo on board a vessel is perishable fruit. Let me then assume that owing to the vessel remaining fog-bound, some of the fruit began to deteriorate in such a manner and to such an extent as to render discharge necessary. Could this event be called an accident? I think the answer is no. To illustrate an accident with regard to cargo is scarcely necessary. An obvious case would arise if the upper goods in a hold fell upon goods below and crushed them, and rendered a discharge of all or some of them necessary. This, I conceive, would be an accident as well as an incident. There was no evidence here as to how the fire arose, whether from something akin to spontaneous combustion or from some other cause. Nor was there anything to show whether the cause, whatever it was, existed before the voyage started or arose afterwards. In the case of Hamilton v. Pandorf (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 44, 212; 57 L. T. Rep. 726; 12 App. Cas. 518), Lord Halsbury said (at p. 524 of L. Rep.): "I think the idea of something fortuitous and unexpected is involved in both words 'peril' and 'accident'; you could not speak of the danger of a ship's decay; you would know that it must decay, and the destruction of the ship's bottom by vermin is assumed to be one of the natural and certain effects of an unprotected wooden vessel sailing through certain seas." The distinction between incident and accident is shown, I think, by the judgments in the case of Kendall v. London and South-Western Railway (26 L. T. Rep. 735; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 373), where, at p. 377 of L. Rep., Baron Bramwell says: "If perishable articles—say, soft fruit—are damaged by their own weight and the inevitable shaking of the carriage, they are injured through their own intrinsic qualities. If through pressure of other goods carried with them or by an extraordinary shock or shaking, whether through negligence or not, the carrier is liable." The passage suggests an obvious distinction between incident and accident of transit. [Compare, also, sect. 178 of the 2nd edit. of Macnamara on the Law of Carriers by Land.] The word "accident" has, I suppose, several meanings. The definition given in one well-known dictionary is this: "Chance, or what happens by chance; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and, therefore, not expected; often in the sense of an unforeseen and undesigned injury to human life and limb; casualty, mishap." Such definitions as these are of no real value in the solution of legal problems. A helpful statement was made in the case of Fenton v. Thorley (1903) App. Cas., at p. 453) by Lord Lindley. He there said: "The word 'accident' is not a technical legal term with a clearly defined meaning. Speaking generally, but with reference to legal liabilities an accident means any unintended and unexpected occurrence which produces hurt or loss. But it is often used to denote any unintended and unexpected loss or hurt apart from its cause; and if the cause is not known the loss or hurt itself would certainly be called an accident. The word 'accident' is also often used to denote both the cause and the effect, no attempt being made to discriminate between them. The great majority of what are called accidents are occasioned by carelessness; but for legal purposes it is often important to distinguish careless from other unintended and unexpected events." This passage, though useful, throws but little light on the present case. The difficulties raised by the use of the word "accident" are amply indicated by the authorities cited in Stroud's Judicial Dictionary (1903, 2nd edit.), title "Accident," vol. 1, and in the supplement published in 1909. They are equally emphasised by MacGillivray on Insurance Law, p. 918 and following pages, where the decisions with respect to "accident policies" are well reviewed. In the case of Musgrove v. Pandelis (120 L. T. Rep. 601; (1919) 2 K. B. 43) affirming Lush, J. (1919) 1 K. B. 314), the Court of Appeal discussed the meaning of sect. 86 of the Fires Prevention Metropolis Act 1774, which contains the words "any fire which shall accidentally begin."

In the case of The Torbryan (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 358, 450; 89 L. T. Rep. 265; (1903) P. 194) the charter-party contained words exempting the shipowner from liability for "accidents even though caused by negligence." In that case it appeared that in the process of discharge stevedore's men employed on board the ship recklessly used hooks which tore the bags of sugar and carelessly allowed the bags to be cut by the slings, and to burst through, striking against the hatch-coamings while being lifted out of the hold. It was held by the Court of Appeal, confirming the judgment of Phillimore, J., that these facts constituted "accidents caused by negligence." It appears. on looking at all the decisions on the point, that the words "accident" or "accidental" vary so much in meaning that they can only be construed by the light of the particular contract, the particular clauses, the particular subject, or the particular circumstances which are before the court. The word "accidental" is, I conceive, generally employed to distinguish occurrences arising without either negligence or wilful act from occurrences arising through one or the other of those things. Sometimes it is used to distinguish an occurrence arising from negligence as distinguished from an occurrence arising from wilful acts. When we speak of a street "accident," we generally use the word in that sense. Sometimes again it may be and is properly used to distinguish an occurrence arising from some extrinsic, physically identifiable, and often violent cause from an occurrence springing from the qualities or characteristics of a particular thing, and which are often independent of negligence or wilful act. See the line of cases from Lenton v. Thorley (sup.) as to the meaning of the word "accident" in the Workmen's Compensation Acts. It will be noticed in the present case that in sub-head (b) of clause 25 the word "accident" occurs twice, and the word "mishap" once. Upon a careful consideration of the clause as applied to the facts found by the arbitrator, I have come to the conclusion that there was not in the present case an "accident" within the meaning of the clause. It is clear, of course, that sub-heads (a) and (b) have no application to the present dispute. In my view sub-clause (c) was not intended to cover the present circumstances. I see no evidence of an accident within the meaning of that sub-clause. I think that sub-clause (c) was framed alio intuitu, and upon a business construction of the bargain between the parties it is not, in my opinion, applicable to the facts before me. In the case of Baily v. De Crespigny (19 L. T. Rep. 681; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 180) Hannen, J., in delivering the finding of the court says, at p. 185 of the report: "Where the event is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, they will not be held bound by general words which though large enough to include were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happens." This passage was quoted with approval by Scrutton, L.J. in his cogent judgment in the Court of Appeal, in the case of the Metropolitan Water Board v. Dick, Kerr, and Co. (116 L. T. Rep. 201; (1917) 2 K. B., p. 31). In the same case in the House of Lords (117 L. T. Rep. 766; (1918) A. C. p. 138) Lord Parmoor said: "I think, however, that the language was used alio intuitu, and that it is not reasonable to hold that it had any reference to such a contingency, or that such a contingency was in the contemplation of the parties when framing the terms of the section. See also the judgment of Pickford, L.J. in the case of United States Steel Company v. Great Western Railway (109 L. T. Rep. 212; (1913) 3 K. B., at p. 365), and that of Bankes, L.J. in the case of Radcliffe v. Compagnie Générale Transatlantique (24 Com. Cas., p. 44).

Even if I had been of opinion that there was here an "accident," it must be observed that the accident (if any) was to the cargo and not to the ship. The ship and her machinery remained uninjured. Her efficiency was in no way impaired. Hence counsel for the owners submitted that sub-head (c) of clause 25 had no application, inasmuch as this sub-head related only to "accidents" to the ship, and not to mere accidents to the cargo not affecting the ship itself. I agree with this submission. If clause 25 be taken as a whole, I think it reasonably clear that it provides for a cessation of hire only where the ship itself is affected. The conspicuously printed marginal notes to the sub-clauses are as follows: "(a) Inefficiency, (b) partial inefficiency, and (c) period of inefficiency not to count." These marginal words represent, I think, the true effect of the sub-clauses. Sub-clause (a) clearly deals with complete inefficiency of the ship. Sub-clause (b) deals only with partial inefficiency of the ship, and the words "mishap" and "accident" in that sub-clause bear only on such matters as affect the ship's efficiency. I think that sub-clause (c) must also be read so as to refer to accidents to the ship, whereby a part of the cargo or bunker coal has to be discharged. This gives sub-clause (c) a fair and full business meaning when read in conjunction with sub-clauses (a) and (b). It gives it, moreover, a just meaning, for I fail to see why the shipowner should lose his hire by reason of the defects or misfortunes to the cargo which the Shipping Controller has compelled him to take on board. Such is my humble view of the matter.

But even if I had been in doubt, I should still have held in favour of the owners of the Carron Park. The rule is clearly established that once hire has begun it runs continuously in favour of the shipowner unless there be some special provision to the contrary in the charter-party: (see Brown v. Turner, Brightman, and Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 105 L. T. Rep. 562; (1912) A. C. 12; and Scrutton on Charter-parties, 9th edit., art. 146). If a charterer wishes to escape this liability, he must be careful to make the necessary provision clear and unmistakable.

The present is a case where the ship was requisitioned by the Shipping Controller, and the charter-party before me represents conditions imposed on the shipowner rather than terms which have been mutually negotiated. The doctrine of contra proferentem, therefore, applies with full cogency. From any point of view the wording of clause 25 is at least ambiguous, and the Shipping Controller has failed to use words of adequate clarity and width to save him from the liability of continuous hire under the circumstances before me. If necessary I should have applied the principle in the case of Price v. Union Lighterage Company (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 398; 89 L. T. Rep. 731; (1904) 1 K. B. 412), and in Nelson Line v. James Nelson (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 581; 97 L. T. Rep. 812; (1908) A. C. 16) to this dispute. That principle was briefly but forcibly expressed by Lord Macnaghten in the case of Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 24; 1905, A. C. 96) where he says: "An ambiguous document is no protection." For the reason I have given I uphold the award of the arbitrator. The Shipping Controller must pay the costs of the proceedings before me.

Owners of Steamship Crown of Leon v. Admiralty Commissioners. (a)

Requisition — Proclamation — Prerogative — Earning of freight by Admiralty—Urgent national necessity.

A steamer belonging to the claimants was requisitioned by the Admiralty in Jan. 1916 under a Proclamation issued in Aug. 1914, and after a first voyage she was sent with a cargo of ore and pyrites to a firm of American munition makers whose contract provided that they should be bound to supply munitions only if the ore was sent to them at a certain rate of freight. The ship was sent at this rate of freight, which was lower than the current market rate. On the voyage the ship was severely damaged by marine risks, and, in an arbitration between the owners and the Admiralty, the arbitrators found that the owners were bound by the form of charter known as T. 99, which expressly threw the burden of marine risks on the owners. The arbitrators were ordered to state a case for the opinion of the court on the following questions: (a) Whether the Admiralty had the right to employ the ship on a voyage earning freight payable to the Admiralty, and whether the claimants were entitled to receive any and what extra payment and compensation in respect thereof; (b) whether the Admiralty were liable to compensate the owners for damage received on the voyage; and (c) whether marine risks should be deemed to be borne by the Admiralty or by the owners.

Held, (1) that the Admiralty had a right to requisition the ship under the Proclamation in the national emergency which existed in Jan. 1916 and to employ her on the voyage in question and the owners were not entitled to extra compensation as the fact that freight was payable to the Admiralty was not material; (2) that there was evidence to support the arbitrators' finding that the owners agreed to bear the marine risks; and (3) that consequently the Admiralty were not liable to compensate the owners for damage received on the voyage.

Nature of prerogative right at times of national emergency considered.

Special case stated by arbitrators under an order of the court dated the 18th June 1917. This order directed that certain questions of law arising out of the requisitioning of the steamship Crown of Leon, and her employment on a voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia with a cargo of material for the manufacture of munitions, should be stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court. These questions, which were marked respectively (a), (b), (c), were: (a) Whether the Admiralty had the right under the Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 or otherwise to employ the Crown of Leon for the voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia with ore, freight on which was payable to the Admiralty, and whether the owners were entitled to receive any and what additional hire payment, or compensation, over and above the monthly hire, when it should be finally adjusted, in respect of the use of the vessel on the said voyage. (b) Whether the Admiralty were not liable for the damage sustained by the vessel in the course of the voyage, and by reason of the carriage of the cargo. (c) Whether marine risks should be deemed to be borne by the Admiralty or by the owners, unless the arbitrators should decide to state their award in the form of a special case. The arbitrators took a view of the facts under which they found themselves unable to formulate any definite question of law on the subject as they thought that there was an agreement upon it, but they submitted the facts and their inference therefrom.

1. The steamship Crown of Leon was requisitioned by the Admiralty on the 26th Jan. 1916 by virtue of His Majesty's Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914, and she remained under requisition in the service of the Admiralty throughout the occurrences which were in question between the parties.

2. Before the said requisition the owners had informed the Admiralty that they were not prepared to accept the rates of hire proposed by the committee of the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board, commonly known as the Blue Book rates, and had requested that the final settlement of the rates of hire of such of their vessels as were, or should be, requisitioned might stand over until some later date or until the termination of the war, and the Admiralty had acquiesced in the arrangement so proposed.

3. When the Crown of Leon was requisitioned, and before she entered upon service, the Admiralty sent to the owners a notice dated the 20th Jan. 1916, stating that it was proposed to employ her "under the conditions of the pro forma charter T. 99 enclosed." The form of charter enclosed was one in common use between the Admiralty and owners of requisitioned vessels. The Admiralty in forwarding this notice further stated in the letter enclosing it that it was "not proposed at this juncture to enter into a formal charter of the ship." As the question of rate of hire was to stand over, no complete charter of the vessel could in fact have been entered into at this time. Three copies of the said form T. 99 were sent by the Admiralty to the owners with a request that they would fill in the particulars of the ship and return two of the forms, and the owners on the 27th Jan. 1916, without making any objection to the said form or to the proposal to employ the vessel on the conditions thereof, filled up and returned to the Admiralty two unsigned copies thereof, the rate of hire being left blank, and stated in their letter enclosing the same that "the only information asked for in the charter is the steamer's class, which is the highest class—British Corporation—deadweight about 5600 tons, speed about nine knots on about 24 tons. As you are aware, the steamer has been requisitioned, but no charter has been signed. We point out that this steamer is a cargo liner, and not a tramp." On the same day the owners wrote to the Admiralty that the vessel had completed her repairs at Barry at six o'clock the previous morning, and that, "this being so, she comes into Admiralty service again." On the 30th Jan. 1916 the Admiralty replied, agreeing the time of readiness for service, and further stated that in accordance "with clause 4 of the charter (meaning the form of charter T. 99) hire will commence from and including such date."

4. The said form T. 99 contemplated that the vessel should remain (and she did in fact remain) under the general management of the owners, and that the master and crew should be (and they in fact were) appointed and paid by the owners throughout the period of service. The said form further provided (inter alia) that as regards sea risks and war risks respectively the owners should bear the sea risks and the Admiralty the war risks.

5. The arbitrators found and determined that the said terms as regards sea and war risks were to the knowledge of the owners the usual terms for vessels requisitioned, as this vessel was requisitioned, and that they were reasonable and proper terms. No objection to the said terms as regards the said risks was made by the owners at any time prior to the occurrences hereinafter mentioned which gave rise to this claim.

6. The Admiralty made payments on account of hire to the owners at Blue Book rates throughout the service of the vessel, and the owners received such payments "to account pending final settlements of rates of hire." The said Blue Book rates provided certain monthly rates for vessels therein classed as "tramps," and certain higher monthly rates for vessels therein classed as "cargo liners." The Admiralty in the first instance included the vessel in the tramp class, but the owners claimed that she should be included in the cargo liner class, and on the 7th Feb. 1916 the Admiralty wrote to the owners agreeing to that classification and stating that "payment will therefore be made at the rates of 12*s.* 9*d.* per gross ton per month for the first two months and 12*s.* 3*d.* afterwards. If evidence of actual times on two summer and two winter voyages is furnished showing the vessel's speed to be ten knots and more, payment will be increased in accordance with the Blue Book scale for cargo liners." The rates of pay and other terms referred to in this letter were, as the owners knew, those provided in the Blue Book for cargo liners working on the terms that sea risks were borne by the owners and war risks by the Admiralty and not otherwise, and the owners received such rates on account throughout the vessel's service.

7. There was no evidence by or on behalf of the owners or otherwise that they supposed or understood that the Admiralty would be responsible for sea risks, or that they did not understand that the terms of the said pro forma charter, as regards sea and war risks, were intended to apply to the vessel, and the owners did in fact keep the vessel insured against sea risks at their own expense throughout her service.

8. The arbitrators found as a fact that it was understood between the parties, and, subject to the opinion of the Court, they found that it was impliedly agreed between them, that the vessel while under requisition should and would be at the risk of the owners as regards the sea risk and at the risk of the Admiralty as regards the war risk, and, in case the Court should nevertheless be of opinion that there had been a failure of agreement as to the said risks within the meaning of His Majesty's said Proclamation, the arbitrators (subject to the opinion of the Court as to their powers to do so under the directions of the said Proclamation) intended to award and arrange that the aforesaid terms were and would be terms to which the right of the owners to compensation for loss or damage occasioned by the employment of the vessel in Government service was and should be subject.

If in the opinion of the Court the question of law as to whether marine risks should be deemed to be borne by the Admiralty or by the claimants arose on the facts stated, that question, which was marked (c), was submitted to the court.

9. The only other questions submitted by the order of the Court to the arbitrators, with the exception of one that stood over by arrangement, were: (a) Whether the Admiralty had the right, under His Majesty's said Proclamation or otherwise, to employ the said vessel on a certain voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia with ore, on which freight was payable to the Admiralty, and whether the owners were entitled to receive from the Admiralty any and what additional hire, payment, or compensation over and above the said monthly hire, when it should be finally adjusted, in respect of the use of the said vessel on the said voyage.

(b) Whether the Admiralty were liable to compensate the said owners for the cost of repairing certain damage sustained by the said vessel on the said voyage.

10. With regard to question (a), the arbitrators found the following facts: The said vessel being then in the Mediterranean under requisition was ordered by the Admiralty to load, and did load, at Huelva, a cargo of ore or pyrites for Philadelphia. She loaded under the superintendence of the master employed and paid by the owners, and the said master gave directions as to the quantity of cargo to be sent on board and was responsible for the stowage thereof, but it appeared that the owners were not aware of the intention so to employ the vessel until the loading had been completed. The said vessel was employed on the said voyage by arrangement between the Admiralty and the Minister of Munitions, and the objects with which she was so employed were to supply munition makers working in America for the British Government with ore or pyrites for making munitions of war, and incidentally to place the vessel where she could load sugar homeward for the Government Sugar Commission; and the freight received by the Admiralty for the carriage of the said ore was charged and received because the contracts of the Government with the said munition makers provided for and included a rate of freight and were on the basis that the said munition makers should be able to obtain the necessary material at a freight not exceeding the rate so provided; and the vessel was employed with the object of supplying such material at such rate, which was a rate substantially lower than the current market rate at the time; and the said material could not have been supplied promptly or at the contract rate of freight by ordinary commercial tonnage. The vessel was not so employed with the object of earning freight or making commercial profit. The arbitrators found that the said use of the vessel was in the national interest in a national emergency, and was a reasonable and proper measure for preserving and defending national interests, and, subject to the opinion of the Court, that it was a legitimate use of the vessel by the Admiralty acting for the Crown and within the powers of the Admiralty, and, subject to the opinion of the Court, they were prepared to decide and award that the owners were not entitled to any extra hire, payment, or compensation in respect thereof.

11. With regard to question (b), the arbitrators found as follows: In the course of the said voyage the vessel encountered in the Atlantic a succession of gales and heavy weather and shipped much water on deck. During the voyage, or on survey after arrival, certain damages or defects were discovered, all on or above the upper deck. The vessel had not otherwise suffered. The owners claimed from the Admiralty in respect of such damage the sum of 1700*l.* or thereabouts as the actual or estimated cost of repairing the same. There was a question whether some part of the damage so repaired was not due to the wasted condition of part of the upper deck and its ironwork. For the purposes of this special case the arbitrators did not think it necessary to express any opinion on this point. They found, as a fact, that so far as such damage was not due to such wasted condition, it was entirely caused by the said gales and heavy weather, and that such cause was a sea risk or peril which, subject to the opinion of the court on the question first herein submitted, the arbitrators would hold to have been at the risk of the owners or their underwriters. The arbitrators further found as a fact that no part of such damage was caused by or due to any negligence or default on the part of the Admiralty as regards the cargo loaded, or the loading or stowage thereof, and that there was not, in fact, any such negligence as alleged by the owners, and, subject as aforesaid, the arbitrators were prepared to decide and award that the Admiralty were not liable to the said owners in respect of any part of the said damage or the repair thereof.

Sir Erle Richards, K.C. and C. T. Le Quesne for the claimants.

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Admiralty Commissioners.

Lord Reading, C.J.—This case comes before us on a special case stated by the arbitrators, who are the Board of Arbitration constituted under the Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 and subsequent notifications, and the case is stated under sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889, which means that the consultative jurisdiction of this court is invoked for the purpose of giving its opinion upon points of law stated by the arbitrators. It is very desirable to bear this in mind for the reason that the facts as stated bind us if there is evidence to support them, and we can only give our judgment on the law upon the facts as found.

The owners of the steamship Crown of Leon received a notice from the Admiralty in Jan. 1916 requisitioning the use of the ship, the Crown of Leon; correspondence ensued which formed the subject of much discussion; and in the result the ship was actually used in the service of the Government. She made a voyage, and then eventually she was sent on a voyage from Huelva in Spain to Philadelphia in the United States, carrying ore and pyrites to munition makers in America who were under contract with the British Government to supply munitions. The contract in question provided that the munition makers should only be under obligation to supply if ore was carried at a certain rate of freight, that is, the contract was made on the basis that the munition makers should be able to obtain the necessary materials at a freight not exceeding the rate provided in the contract, and it is only under these circumstances that they could be called upon to perform their contract.

It appears from the figures of the arbitrators that this particular vessel was employed on a voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia with the object of supplying these materials to the munition makers at the rate of freight provided in the contract, and that rate was substantially lower than the current market rate; and then there is this further finding, that the material could not have been supplied promptly or at the contract rate of freight by ordinary commercial tonnage. Those are very important findings of fact. The position therefore was that the Government required the munitions from America; the American munition makers were not under an obligation to supply, because of the rate of freight then prevailing, and apparently also, as would seem to follow, because of the scarcity of tonnage available. The Government then made use of this ship, which they had already requisitioned and used on another voyage or voyages, to send her to America carrying this ore and pyrites necessary for munition-making, and the Government justifies it on the ground that it was necessary to supply this material promptly so that the American munition makers could make and supply that which was so necessary for us, munitions; and further, on the ground that the American munition makers could not have got, by the use of commercial tonnage, freight at the rate provided for in the contract.

The vessel then proceeded from Huelva to Philadelphia; she encountered fierce gales and was severely damaged during this voyage. The question that arises as between the owners and the Government substantially is, who is to bear the cost of the repairs? The owners say that they had not contracted to take sea risks, and that they consequently were not liable; that the Government had the use of the vessel, and the Government must pay for the sea risk. On the other hand, the Government's contention is that this requisition was made upon the terms, inter alia, to be found in the charter-party form T. 99, which provided that the sea risks should be borne by the owners and that the war risks should be borne by the Admiralty. Now that the T. 99 form of charter-party does so stipulate is beyond all question; but the owners contend that they are not bound by this form of charter-party; that they never had agreed to bear the sea risks; and consequently that they are entitled to claim as against the Government.

Those are the material facts upon which the questions submitted to us arise. That the vessel after she had got to America was then sent to Cuba to carry a cargo of sugar from Cuba to this country for the British Government is immaterial for this purpose, because if the use of the ship was being made properly within the powers of the Government, it is not contended before us that she could not have been used to bring home a cargo of sugar for the Government from Cuba. The real point in the case turns on this voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia. We have had the advantage of an able and carefully considered argument on behalf of the owners of the vessel, who have put before us a number of propositions on which they contend that the questions ought to be answered in their favour. In my opinion, many of these questions do not arise for our decision in this case, and I propose now to deal with the questions as put, and to answer the questions which apparently were those that the Court of Appeal (affirming a decision of the Divisional Court) ordered the arbitrators to state. The arbitrators have prefaced their statement of the case by the observation that so far as their opinion went no questions of law arose, but that really these were questions of fact on which they came to a conclusion, but nevertheless, acting on the order of the Court, they have stated the case in such a form as enables us to pronounce an opinion upon the questions of law.

The first question stated in the case, question (c), is whether marine risks should be deemed to be borne by the Admiralty or by the claimants. The decision upon that point turns upon whether we think there was evidence sufficient in law to support the finding of fact of the abitrators. They have heard the evidence, and they have considered the documents in the case, and they have come to a conclusion that the owners did agree to be bound by this provision in the form of charter-party T. 99. Looking at the correspondence in the case, taken in conjunction with the facts as found by the arbitrators, I come to the conclusion that there is evidence to support the finding of the arbitrators and that when once we come to that conclusion the function of this court is exhausted. It is not for us to examine the facts or to determine whether we should upon the same materials come to the same conclusion. I do not mean to throw any doubt upon their conclusion of fact; what I do mean is that it is not for us, and we ought not, to express an opinion upon the facts, if there is sufficient evidence to support the finding. There is this evidence, that in Jan. 1916 the notice came requisitioning the ship on urgent Government service under the conditions of the pro forma charter-party T. 99 enclosed. There is a letter sent by the Director of Transports, Sir Graeme Thomson, inclosing the requisition of the Admiralty to the owners of the steamship, and attaching to his letter three copies of the pro forma charter-party T. 99, which they were requested to return to the department, and there was another form enclosed which asked for certain information and which is not now material. The owners replied to that, returning the form which asked for certain information, upon which nothing turns in this case. They stated that the steamer had arrived at Barry and that they were dry-docking her, after which she would enter on Government service. That seems to show that they were not objecting to her entering on Government service, but acquiescing. Then they said, "We thank you for the memorandum T11591, this doesn't apply to any of our steamers." The fact was that the owners were contending that the class of ship into which the Crown of Leon came was a liner and not a tramp. The Blue Book rates payable by the Admiralty when a ship was requisitioned varied according to the class in which the ship was put; and if she was a tramp she would receive a lower rate of freight than if she was a cargo liner. There was some discussion as to whether she was a cargo liner or a tramp, and eventually the Government accepted the fact that she was a cargo liner on other facts supplied; but nothing turns on that in this case. On the 26th Jan., six days after the first letter which I have referred to, the Director of Transports wrote asking the owners to send without delay two of the three copies of the charter-party, that is T. 99, "which were sent to you on the 20th inst., completed with the necessary particulars as requested in my letter of that date." It is difficult to understand what the owners can have thought of being asked to send back two of the copies of the charter-party, and to retain the third, and to fill up certain particulars which had been asked for in this form of charter-party, unless the provisions applicable in T. 99 were to be applicable to the hiring or requisitioning by the Government. The owners did on the 27th Jan. return the two copies; they gave the information, and they said, "As you are aware the steamer has been requisitioned but no charter has been signed." That is perfectly right. It is the strongest expression relied upon by Sir Erle Richards. It only amounts to this: there has been no formal charter-party entered into; you have requisitioned the ship on terms which the Government is paying and which are to be found in documents or in the Blue Book. That is only carrying out what Sir Graeme Thomson had written seven days before, that it was not proposed at that juncture to enter into a formal charter of the ship. Then they say, "if further particulars are required, will you let us know?" and on the same day the owners again wrote to the Director of Transports that the steamer had completed her repairs at Barry, and that, that being so, she comes into Government service. Then on the 30th Jan. the Director of Transports writes to them and says, "With reference to the requisitioning of the Crown of Leon, I have to acquaint you that the vessel was ready for Admiralty service at 6 a.m. on the 26th Jan.," and then come these words, which to my mind are of importance, "and in accordance with clause 4 of the charter-party hire will commence from and including that date." Clause 4 of the charter-party is clause 4 of T. 99; no other charter-party had been discussed or mentioned; and clause 4 of T. 99 does say when the hire is to commence. It is the provision which stipulates the date or the period at which the hiring is to commence; and it is to my mind significant that after that date and after the 30th Jan. there is no letter from the owners demurring to this statement as to the charter-party. No objection is made by them. On the contrary, there is evidence (I will not say more) from which it may be inferred that they were acquiescing, because they did not in any way object after having this statement made to them.

That deals with all the correspondence that took place.

From the facts there is further the statement by the arbitrators: "We find and determine that the said terms as regards sea and war risks," that is the terms of requisitioned ships, "were to the knowledge of the owners the usual terms for vessels requisitioned as this vessel was requisitioned, and that they were reasonable and proper terms. No objection to the said terms as regards the said risks was made by the owners at any time prior to the occurrences hereinafter mentioned which gave rise to this claim." That is an additional finding of fact which it was open to the arbitrators to arrive at; and there is evidence there which I think any judge, if he was trying this case with a jury, would have to leave to the jury, for the jury to determine whether they inferred as a fact from the evidence to which I have just referred that the ship had been requisitioned, and that form T. 99, in so far as it stipulated that the sea risks should be borne by the owners, was a part of that agreement. When once I have come to that conclusion the question is answered that is submitted by the arbitrators; and when the arbitrators find the fact, as we know they have found, that the owners did agree that the marine risks should be borne by them, and there is evidence to support that finding, the conclusion must be on those facts that the marine risks should be borne by the claimants, the owners of the steamship, the Crown of Leon.

The second question, question (a), is of a wide character, and introduces other questions of great public importance. It is contended by the owners that, although the vessel was properly requisitioned in Jan. 1916 for the use of the Government under the Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914, the use to which she was put by the Admiralty was an improper use of the vessel, and consequently an unlawful exercise of the rights which they had under the powers given to them to requisition. Incidentally, and in the course of the argument, Sir Erle Richards contended that this Proclamation went too far if it was to be construed only by reference to its operative part, and that we must have regard to the preamble in order to construe it, and that if we did have regard to the preamble, we must limit or restrict the ordinary meaning of the language used in the operative part of the Proclamation, and it was said that, unless we did so, the Proclamation in itself goes too far.

Let me deal first with the point as to the preamble, which may be dealt with quite briefly inasmuch as there is no question as to the law or the canon of construction to be applied in dealing with a Proclamation issued by the Sovereign or in dealing with regulations under it. The principle is that the preamble does not restrict or extend the operative or enacting part if the language of the operative or enacting part is not open to doubt. If there is ambiguity, then, of course, one may refer to the preamble for the purpose of throwing light upon the intention of the Legislature, if it is an enactment, or of the Sovereign, if it is a Proclamation. In this case I do not think that we are entitled to have regard to the preamble at all. I think that the language is not open to doubt. It is clear, it seems to me, beyond all question. It states in simple form the power that is to be exercised. It is a Proclamation which was issued on the 3rd Aug. 1914, that is, the day before war was declared. It was issued when it was thought that there was imminent danger of war, and it was issued in the national interests in the exercise of the duty of the Crown to protect the national interests, by making available the prerogative which rests in the Sovereign, and the Proclamation authorised the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, for such period of time as might be necessary, to requisition and take up for service any British ship or British vessel, as defined in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, within the British Isles or waters adjacent thereto; it stipulated that the owners should receive payment for the use and services rendered and compensation for loss and damage; any questions that arose should be determined by the Board of Arbitration under the Proclamation and other notifications issued by the Admiralty. Now, as I have said, I find no ambiguity at all; indeed, it cannot be argued there is any ambiguity in the language itself. What was contended by Sir Erle Richards and Mr. Le Quesne was that, if one gives the language the ordinary interpretation, the effect is so far-reaching that we ought to conclude that that never can have been the intention. I am unable to take that view; on the contrary, I think that, reading that language as it is in the Proclamation, it was intended to give the widest possible powers in view of any emergency, which was at least imminent, and in view of this, that, if war was declared, it was impossible to measure beforehand the ships which the Government would have to requisition from the subjects of the Crown. Consequently, in order to be prepared for that, this Proclamation was issued the day before the war, and as the language imports, and, as I think we must hold, was intended to give the fullest power to the Admiralty to requisition British ships in the British Isles on payment for the use and services rendered and compensation for any loss or damage.

Digressing for one moment from the question as to the preamble, it is contended that that power goes beyond the right which is vested in the Sovereign. I do not agree. No authority has been cited which would lead me to the conclusion that there was not a power in the Crown to make such a Proclamation. It is made in the national interests to protect the realm and the subjects of the realm, and, so far as I can find from the references that have been made, there is nothing which would limit it. It is said that there is a passage in Chitty's Prerogatives of the Crown which would have the effect of limiting it. That is at p. 50: "What is termed the war prerogative of the King is created by the perils and exigencies of war for the public safety, and by its perils and exigencies is therefore limited. The King may lay on a general embargo, and may do various acts growing out of sudden emergencies; but in all these cases the emergency is the avowed cause, and the act done is as temporary as the occasion. The King cannot change by his prerogative of war either the law of nations or the law of the land by general and unlimited regulations." Those were the words apparently of Lord Erskine sitting in the Privy Council; they were used with reference to Orders in Council. They are quoted in Chitty as stating the law accurately. It is to be observed that that is not a judicial pronouncement; it was a statement that was made, I gather, in Parliamentary debates on Orders in Council; but it is quoted by the learned author as stating the law correctly. There is in that statement nothing which in the slightest degree would lead us to the conclusion in this case that this exercise of the prerogative went beyond what is right. The argument is that the avowed cause must be the emergency, and the act done is temporary, and it is suggested that it is only where there is what was called "instant and urgent necessity" that such prerogative could be invoked. "Instant" really there only means "then existing"—a then existing necessity. In this case can it be doubted that there was in fact "an existing urgent necessity?" It does not mean that at the precise moment one must be able to justify the use of the prerogative by proof that there was such a state of things that, unless the act was done by invoking the prerogative, the nation would succumb; that is far too limited a meaning. What it does mean, I think, is that there must be a national emergency — an urgent necessity—for taking extreme steps for the protection of the Realm. Now there is a finding by the arbitrators that there was a national emergency; but whether there is a finding or not, it cannot be doubted in my view that there was a national emergency in Jan. 1916 and later, when the events in question happened. If there was a national emergency, then there was a power not only to issue but to put the Proclamation in operation. It is not contended there was not power to issue it on the 3rd Aug. 1914. What is said is that when Jan. 1916 had arrived there had been ample time to go to Parliament and get Parliamentary powers. That is not a sufficient answer. Parliament could give powers in a national emergency, of course; but it might have thought that they already existed under the Proclamation. The fact is that there was then urgent necessity in the sense of a national emergency then existing. I think there was power to issue the Proclamation and to act upon it in Jan. 1916 and at the later dates.

As soon as the interpretation is clear from the language, as I hold it is, then no question arises with regard to the preamble. I would observe that even if it did I am far from satisfied even on the preamble that the exercise of the prerogative could not have been justified, but I do not decide on that ground, because I can conceive that there are arguments to which one would have to give great consideration as to whether the preamble did apply.

Therefore the question which is submitted under (a), which is, "Whether the Admiralty have the right under His Majesty's said Proclamation or otherwise, to employ the said vessel on a certain voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia with ore, on which freight was payable to the Admiralty, and whether the owners are entitled to receive from the Admiralty any and what additional hire, payment, or compensation over and above the said monthly hire when it shall be finally adjusted, in respect of the use of the said vessel on the said voyage," is a question which really involves other considerations. The first answer that was made to it was the one to which I have already adverted, which is that the Government could not requisition this ship under the Proclamation in Jan. 1916 because there was no instant and urgent necessity; and further, it is said that the Government had not the power to requisition the ship because she was not required in Jan. 1916, when they requisitioned her, for transport or as an auxiliary for the convenience of the fleet or in other similar circumstances. I have already dealt with that in saying that the preamble does not really apply. The Government, therefore, have the power to requisition the ship, and did requisition her, and now comes really the substantial point in the case. Could they, the ship being requisitioned, send this vessel on this voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia? I have already stated the facts as found, and I come to the conclusion that the use of the vessel, once properly requisitioned as she was for the purpose of the voyage from Huelva in the circumstances described, was not an improper use or an unlawful exercise of the powers given under the Proclamation. I rest my judgment on this point upon the facts that I have already stated. It is sufficient in my opinion to say that, with the knowledge that munitions were so urgently required, and that they could only be obtained, or obtained in part, from munition makers in America, and that these munition makers could not supply them unless this ship had been sent, carrying ore and pyrites necessary to make these munitions, it seems to me to follow that the ship was used by the Government for the purpose of obtaining munitions at a time of national emergency, and when munitions were so vitally necessary in the interests of the realm. Now that seems to me really to dispose of (a), because I come to the conclusion that the Admiralty had the right to employ the vessel on the voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia with ore. I cannot think it is material, if once one comes to that conclusion, to decide whether the owners were entitled to receive any additional hire, payment, or compensation above the monthly hire because the Government apparently received something; I do not think that becomes a question which has to be determined. When once one comes to the conclusion that the Admiralty had the right to employ the vessel, then it was not an improper use of her to send her from Huelva to Philadelphia, and as a matter of law, therefore, the contention of the claimants, the owners, must fail. The mere fact that freight was payable to the Admiralty does not affect the question if the Government requisitioned the vessel properly.

That leaves only one question (b): Whether the Admiralty are liable to compensate the owners for the cost of repairing certain damage sustained by the said vessel on the said voyage? That really is answered by the replies given to questions (a) and (c). Once we come to the conclusion that the arbitrators are justified in finding that there was an agreement by the owners to bear the sea risks, and that the Government was making a proper use of the requisitioned vessel by sending her on a voyage from Huelva to Philadelphia, it follows that the Admiralty are not liable to compensate the owners for the cost of repairing the damage, inasmuch as that is damage done by perils of the sea which the owners have agreed to bear themselves.

That seems to me to answer all the questions submitted to us, and I have only dealt with the larger questions in so far as they are necessary because of the arguments which have been addressed to us.

Darling, J.—I am of the same opinion.

I desire to say a word only on one point. My Lord has dealt carefully and fully with each of the questions upon which the arbitrators desired to consult this court, and upon only one of them do I desire to say anything. That is upon the larger question, not so much raised by the arbitrators as raised by Sir Erle Richards in an argument which went to the root of the matter, when he said that here, Proclamation or no Proclamation, the prerogative of the Crown had been exceeded; and he contended that this user of this British ship in sending her on a voyage from Huelva in Spain to Philadelphia in America could not be justified under the prerogative. Now that depends not on this Proclamation; it depends upon the common law of England and the constitutional law of England, and the rule undoubtedly is that the King, acting of course in regard to what is called "prerogative regale et legale," should have the right on behalf of his subjects for the defence of the Realm to take property belonging to the subjects in order to defend their own interests, and compensation, of course, is to be fairly made. Nowadays it is made by reason of exact provisions, but it ought always to be made, because what is taken for the general good should be paid for by the general community. It seems to me that here there was no stretching of the prerogative, and it would be very difficult for us to judge. It is no business of this court to look carefully into all the military necessities, and to consider whether this or that manœuvre be performed, or whether the country should be defended by ships or by bayonets. That must be left, and there is ample authority for saying so, to the Executive, and this court, whoever might be sitting here, could not profess to interfere with the discretion of the military, and say "You ought not to have taken this ship and sent her from Huelva to Philadelphia with iron ore to make munitions of war, you ought to have defended the country in a totally different way." We do not know and cannot know what were the necessities of the time; that must be left to the Executive, as has been said in several cases which the Solicitor-General cited. It was said by Sir Erle Richards, and said with a great deal of insistence, that, though one must look to instant and urgent necessity, we ought to say that there was no instant and urgent necessity here, and that, though war was going on, it was not absolutely necessary to do this or to do that, and we ought to look very carefully and meticulously to see whether the use of this particular ship was required. Of course, it is quite possible that the war would have been carried to a successful conclusion if this ship had not been taken; I do not pretend that if this ship had not been sent from Huelva to Philadelphia we should have lost the war, and if I did I do not suppose that anybody would be the least impressed by it; but I do not think that that is what it is necessary to look at.

There is authority for it in the most interesting case of John Hampden and Ship Money (3 State Trials, 826). John Hampden, of course, was a public hero, and ship money had a bad name, but a great many wise things were said in the course of the opinions delivered by the judges in that case on a great many things which are absolutely applicable to the state of things which existed during this war. Now I am going to quote from the argument of Sir Edward Crawley, one of the justices of the Common Pleas in the Exchequer Chamber in the great case of ship money. Although his judgment concerning ship money cannot be sustained—since it was reversed by the Battle of Naseby—yet what he says here is I think still good. He said (at p. 1083): "The moralists do make three parts of Providence. 1. 'Memoria præteritorum'; 2. 'Perspicientia præsentium'; and 3. 'Providentia futurorum.' It much concerns the King, the head of the commonwealth, to be circumspect in the prevention of public danger; conjectures and probabilities are to be regarded. Now put the case upon a probable and violent presumption; a potent enemy is prepared and ready to come. Is it not fit there should be a defence prepared instantly?" "Providence" there means providing for the defence, and he goes on to prove that you cannot know what your enemy is going to do, and you cannot tell what your own people are going to do, because if you do you tell your enemy; and what was true in the time of Charles I. is more abundantly likely to happen in the days in which we live. He goes on then to quote a very learned writer, and he says: "Comines, fol. 179, saith, 'That if the cloud be seen but afar off, the King, without the consent of the subjects, cannot tax them; but if the cloud be overhead, the King may call certain wise persons to him, and tax his subjects.'" Is that not very remarkable? "If the cloud be overhead" is exactly what happened to us: Crawley, J. or Philip de Comines might almost have foreseen Zeppelins when he wrote that. Then Crawley, J. goes on: "You say, that if the King doth move a war offensive, there's time enough to call a Parliament; if defensive, the cloud is seen long before. But oh, good sir! is this always true? Is not the cloud sometimes even over the head before descried? If you read Comines, he will tell you that in times of peace we ought to fortify." That is excellent good sense, and exactly what the Government did here; they did not wait till we had not a shell left; and people know by this time how little ammunition there was at that very critical period of the war. They did not wait until they had not a shell left before they sent the ship from Huelva to Philadelphia. It is said that in doing what they did they strained the prerogative and acted in a manner that would have justified some other John Hampden falling on Chalgrove Field. It seems to me that nobody could contend, and, if they did, it would be hardly for this Court to judge, that in doing this they strained the prerogative so as to exercise it illegally.

I only desired to say a word on this question, because some people have an impression that to use the prerogative of the Crown even for the purposes of defence of the king's subjects is to do something which ought not to be done. It seems to me that this is a case in which it was necessary to be done and was done properly.

Salter, J.—I am of the same opinion.

I desire to add a word only in reference to question (a), on which I think this matter mainly turns. As the original requisition by the Crown of the subject's chattels in an emergency must be justified by the emergency, so the use which the Crown makes of the subject's chattels during the requisition must always be justified by showing a state of public danger and emergency. But no one can doubt that the Crown has the right to use the requisitioned goods of the subject in any manner which grave national emergency makes necessary. I cannot doubt that these powers were fully delegated to the Admiralty by the Proclamation.

Here the arbitrators have found in effect that at a time which to the common knowledge of us all was a time of grave national peril the Government had a contract for the supply of munitions from people in the United States, and by sending this ship on this voyage they were able to supply these persons with materials for making munitions more promptly than could otherwise be done. The obvious and necessary result would be that they would get munitions in this country, or at the seat of war, more promptly than they would otherwise have got them. The arbitrators have found these facts, and that this vessel was not sent on this voyage with any object of earning money, and they state their conclusion of fact in these words: "The arbitrators find that the said use of the vessel was in the national interest, in a national emergency, and was a reasonable and proper measure for preserving and defending national interests." That is a finding of instant urgent necessity; it is a finding of fact; and I think there was evidence on which the arbitrators could so find.

I do not think that in this case it is necessary to consider whether or in what circumstances the courts should accept the opinions of the responsible officers of the Crown, as stated by them, or as shown by their acts, as conclusive evidence of emergency. That such opinions would always be cogent evidence goes without saying. On the facts to which I have referred I think that question (a) should be answered in the affirmative, that by virtue of the delegation of authority which was notified by the Proclamation, the Admiralty had the right to send this ship on this voyage. I am referring only to the first part of the question, that is to say, that the Admiralty had the right, and I think we might fairly add "under His Majesty's said Proclamation to employ the said vessel on the voyage mentioned."

THE LUNA. (a)

Tug and tow—Towage contract—Collision between tow and third vessel—Tug to blame—Indemnity due from tow.

A Dutch shipmaster signed a contract of towage containing conditions which he was unable to read or understand, though he was aware of their existence. One of these conditions cast upon the tow owners responsibility for the acts of the tug. Relying upon this condition, the tug owners claimed in third party proceedings to be indemnified by the owners of the tow for the dmaages recovered against them in an action by the owners of a third vessel which had been in collision with the tow through the sole fault of their tug.

Held, the tow owners were bound by the contract to indemnify the tug owners.

THIRD-PARTY proceedings.

The material facts are set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Ellis Cunliffe for the owners of the Frances and Jane.

Dunlop, K.C. and Dumas for the owners of the Kingston.

Stephens, K.C., A. E. Nelson, and Aylmer Digby for the owners of the Luna.

HILL, J.—In the action of the Frances and Jane against the Luna and Kingston, I have already held that the tug Kingston was alone to blame for bringing the tow Luna into collision with the Frances and Jane. The question I have now to determine arises upon the third-party notice whereby the owners of the Kingston claim indemnity against the owners of the Luna in respect of the liability to the owners of the Frances and Jane and the costs of the Frances and Jane action. The answer to this question depends on whether the owners of the Luna contracted with the owners of the Kingston in the terms of the clause which appears in print on the document which the master of the Luna signed. If the contract entered into embraced that clause and if the master of the Luna had authority to enter into that contract, then, subject to two points I will mention hereafter, it is not disputed that the owners of the Luna are liable to indemnify the owners of the Kingston.

First as to authority. I have no doubt that the master of the Luna had authority to enter into towage contracts, and at least apparent authority to enter into this towage contract. It is said that the clause is unreasonable. It is, and has for many years been, usual for tug owners to protect themselves by such a clause. Nor can I see any ground for saying it is unreasonable. It is all a question of price, just as bills of lading exception clauses are all a question of freight. The less the liability of the tug owner or ship owner, the lower the price. There is nothing unreasonable in a bargain which puts the work of towage on the tug and the risk of the service on the tow.

Then as to what the contract was. The document upon which the owners of the Kingston rely is a document signed by the master of the Luna. It is common ground that that document contains a contract for the towage of the Luna. The contention of the owners of the Kingston is that the whole document is the contract. The contention of the owners of the Luna is that only part of it, which states the towage to be performed and the prices to be paid, is the contract. If any facts beyond the fact that they both intended the document to contain that contract and that the master signed it are material, then the facts are as follows: The Luna was boarded by a Mr. Thompson, one of the partners of the firm which owned the Kingston, and he and the master, who was a Dutchman, agreed that the tug should tow the Luna from river to dock and from dock to sea, and agreed the price, 15*l*. Mr. Thompson wrote these terms out on the document in question, which was in the form of a debit note with the clause in question printed on it, and placed the document before the master. The master understood very little spoken English and could speak English very little, and could not read English at all. He had spent most of his time in fishing, and this was his first visit to England, except as a boy. The Luna was a fishing vessel which had been adapted for cargo, and was a sort of vessel new to the home trade. The master saw there was print upon the document, but did not attempt to read it and did not ask any questions about it. Mr. Thompson said nothing about it. The master signed the document. Each intended the document to contain the contract for towage. Mr. Thompson intended the whole document to be the contract. The master said he would not have signed it if he had known what the clause provided, and that he asked no questions because he believed Mr. Thompson would not do anything unjust.

Counsel for the Luna referred me to Roe v. Naylor (116 L. T. Rep. 542; (1917) 1 K. B. 712; 119 L. T. Rep. 359, C. A.). I think that case does not apply to the present. That was not a case in which the document relied on as the contract had been signed. If it had been, can anyone doubt that the buyer would have been bound by it? As Atkin, J. said: "If a party signs the document, he is taken to have assented to the terms contained in it." So in the ticket cases, like Richardson, Spence, and Co. v. Rowntree (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 482; 70 L. T. Rep. 817; (1894) A. C. 217) and Marriott v. Yeoward Brothers (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 306; 101 L. T. Rep. 394; (1909) 2 K. B. 987), depending not upon signature, but on knowledge or notice, can anyone doubt that if such a ticket is signed the passenger is bound? Here I am dealing with a document admitted to be a contract and signed by the party who says that a part of its contents is to be rejected as not forming part of the contract. There is no suggestion or ground for suggestion of any deceit. The master was not trapped into signing one thing, thinking it to be something quite different. There was no common mistake on which the contract, if it had not been performed, could be rectified. The document was signed, and signed with the intention of its being a contract. The master, in my view, is bound by the contract, whether he read it or not, and therefore the owners of the Luna, whose agent he was, are bound too. It is suggested that the contract of indemnity did not apply because in the Frances and Jane action I have found, in fact, that those on board the tug were not the servants of the owners of the Luna. There is, in my opinion, nothing in that. If they had, in fact, been the servants of the owners of the Luna, then no contract of indemnity would have been required. The owners would have been liable for the acts of their servants. But the contract contemplates a case in which those on board the tug are not the servants of the tow, but are deemed to be so for the purposes of the contract between the tug owners and the tow. It is further contended that the contract does not apply to a case where the tug was engaged in towing two tows, which was the fact here, and that the clause is only applicable when the tug is towing one tow. I cannot find anything in the contract to justify that contention. The contract provided for more than one tow. I therefore find that the contract is as alleged by the owners of the Kingston, and that it amounts to a contract to indemnify the owners of the Kingston against the damages they will have to pay, and against the costs in the action of the Frances and Jane.

The order will be as in The Adriatic (3 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 516; 85 L. J. 12, P.)—namely, that the plaintiffs (the plaintiffs in the third-party proceedings) are entitled to be indemnified by the defendants (the owners of the Luna) against the damages assessed against the tug owners in the collision action and the costs payable by them to the plaintiffs in that action and also their own costs in that action; and to an order for payment to them of such damages and costs; and I give judgment for the present plaintiffs accordingly.

THE LLANDOVERY CASTLE. (a)

Limitation of actions—Unconditional appearance to writ, whether waiver—Discretion—Writ in rem—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.

Services, alleged to be salvage services, were rendered in Dec. 1916 to a requisitioned vessel, subsequently lost in July 1918, by the master and crew of a tug. A writ in rem was issued on the 2nd April 1919, and service thereof was accepted by defendants' solicitors, who in the subsequent pleadings raised a defence under sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911.

Held, that the unconditional appearance did not waive the defence under the statute.

SALVAGE ACTION.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the judgment of the learned judge.

Laing, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the plaintiffs.

Balloch for the defendants.

HILL, J.—In this case the master and crew of the tug William Grey claim remuneration for salvage services alleged to have been rendered to the steamship Llandovery Castle in Dec. 1916. No claim is or has been made by the owners of the tug.

The right of the plaintiffs to recover is disputed on two grounds: First, that they rendered no services of a salvage character; and, secondly, that the claim is barred by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911.

The William Grey was a steam tug fitted with salvage plant and carrying a crew of ten hands all told. She was in Government service and stationed at Dover, where she was employed in whatever work the Admiralty required of her. In Dec. 1916 the master and crew were the servants of the owners of the tug and not of the Crown. The Llandovery Castle, belonging to the Union-Castle Mail Steamship Company, was also in Government service. On the evening of the 6th Dec. 1916, while the Llandovery Castle was lying at Folkestone, on a voyage in ballast from Tilbury to Havre, fire was discovered in the stores in the lower No. 4 hold, and later in No. 5 hold. The ship's hoses were got to work, and the Llandovery Castle made for Dover, sending wireless messages asking for a salvage tug and a pilot. She was met by the Lady Brassey, one of the powerful Dover tugs in Government service, and she followed the tug towards Dover with the intention of entering Dover Harbour. Meantime, by orders of the Admiralty, the William Grey proceeded out shortly after midnight. She took on board her Captain Iron, who was both King's harbour-master and Admiralty salvage officer at Dover. There were a number of warships in the harbour, and Captain Iron was unwilling that the Llandovery Castle should enter the harbour during darkness. When the William Grey met the Llandovery Castle and the Lady Brassey about two miles outside the entrance, Captain Iron directed the ship to follow him, and the William Grey, with Captain Iron on board, led the Llandovery Castle to an anchorage to the westward of the Admiralty Pier. Captain Iron then boarded the Llandovery Castle and directed the operations while the Lady Brassey passed her hoses on board. Between 9 a.m. and 10 a.m. the Llandovery Castle, with the assistance of the Lady Brassey, was brought into the harbour, and by the afternoon the fire was out. The William Grey remained near the Llandovery Castle while she was at anchor near the pier and accompanied her into the harbour, and, after the Llandovery Castle was moored, the William Grey was told she was no longer required, and she got back to her berth about 9 a.m. Early in the morning she had carried a letter from Captain Iron to the admiral and returned. She had had her hoses ready in case they were needed. I have stated the whole of what the William Grey and her master and crew did. As far as actual assistance goes, she did nothing except that she took out Captain Iron. The guidance to the westward of the Admiralty Pier was not for the safety of the Llandovery Castle, but for the safety of the harbour, and involved no difficulty of any sort. The letter had nothing to do with the safety of the Llandovery Castle. The William Grey took out Captain Iron, and went out by orders of the Admiralty, in response to the wireless message from the Llandovery Castle, and stood by for some seven or eight hours in case she was wanted. The Lady Brassey was amply sufficient to put out the fire. Except in taking out Captain Iron, the William Grey did nothing which on the most favourable view can be regarded as actually contributing to the safety of the Llandovery Castle. No doubt she went out and stood by, and it may be said that that was done at request. But where a tug is in the employ of the Admiralty, engaged to do whatever is required of her, and she is required to proceed to a ship in case she is wanted, and, in fact, does not actually contribute to the safety of the ship, I find it difficult to say that she has rendered a salvage service to the owners of the ship. If it be a salvage service, it would, in this case, be rewarded by a very small sum, and the share of the master and crew would be very small indeed. It is, however, unnecessary to decide this question, for the claim is barred unless the case is one in which I ought to extend the time, and I am clearly of opinion that there are no sufficient grounds for depriving the defendants of the protection given them by sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911.

The service was rendered on the 7th Dec. 1916. The Llandovery Castle was sunk by the enemy in July 1918. The first intimation of a claim was on the 23rd Nov. 1918, and, after correspondence between the solicitors, it was on the 18th Jan. 1919 definitely repudiated. The writ was issued on the 2nd April 1919. It was in form a writ in rem, and was sent by the plaintiffs' solicitors to the defendants' solicitors for acceptance. The defendants' solicitors indorsed it, "We accept service and undertake to appear for the defendants in due course." And they wrote: "We presume you are aware that the Llandovery Castle has been lost." Appearance was entered on the 14th April 1919. There was, of course, no res, and no bail was asked for or given. The statement of claim prays that the defendants be condemned in such amount of salvage as to the court shall seem fit. I mention the facts as to the writ and appearance because some argument was based upon the writ being a writ in rem. It is, in my opinion, immaterial whether it was in rem or in personam. The defendants might have refused to accept service of the writ in rem, and have refused to recognise the writ as a good writ in personam. They waived that objection and entered an appearance. By so doing they placed themselves in the same position as if they had been brought before the court by a writ in personam: (see The Dictator, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 175, 251; 67 L. T. Rep. 563; (1892) P. 304, 320; and The Gemma, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 585; 81 L. T. Rep. 379; (1899) P. 285). But whether they were sued in rem or in personam, they had the right which sect. 8 gives them. It was contended that the defendants by appearing waived that right. I am unable to follow that argument. The section says—I am leaving out the irrelevant words—"No action shall be maintainable against the owners in respect of any salvage services unless proceedings are commenced within two years of the date when the services were rendered."

If owners are sued after the period of limitation has expired, how are they to raise that defence? The usual way to rely on a defence based on a statute of limitations is to plead the statute. Order XIX., r. 15, provides that: "The defendant must raise by his pleading all matters which show the action or counter-claim not to be maintainable . . . as, for instance, . . . Statute of Limitations." Sect. 8 is a statute of limitations. About that there is no doubt. If there be any doubt, see Gregory v. Torquay Corporation (105 L. T. Rep. 886; (1912) 1 K. B. 442), which deals with the Public Authorities Protection Act and the limitations contained in it. The proviso to sect. 8 enables, and, in one set of circumstances, directs, the Court to extend the period. The practice of the court has provided a simple way by which the plaintiff, or intending plaintiff, can, before he begins or proceeds with his action, apply to the court to determine whether the period shall be extended. But if the plaintiff does not so apply and issues his writ, how can the fact that the defendant appears to the writ deprive the defendant of the defence which the section gives him? Suppose the defendant should raise the defence by some form of interlocutory application, what is there to prevent him from raising it by his pleading? There is nothing. If his so doing is inconvenient to the plaintiff, the plaintiff has only himself to thank for neglecting to ask the Court to determine the matter at the first stage.

There remains the question of whether the plaintiff is entitled to an extension, or, if not, whether the Court in its discretion ought to grant an extension. The proviso to sect. 8 contains two branches. The first is discretionary and the second compulsory. The second branch of the proviso is inapplicable to the present case. The power under that—the compulsory branch—can only be exercised in order to give reasonable opportunity of arresting the ship, and, as a matter of fact, in this case there is no possibility of arresting the ship because she has been lost. On the first—the discretionary—part of the proviso, the section fixes a period of two years, and the discretion can only be used in favour of a plaintiff if there are special circumstances which create a real reason why the statutory limitation should take effect.

I am unable to find any special circumstances here. The plaintiffs were at all times stationed at Dover, and could have instructed solicitors at any time. If they were waiting for the owners of the tug to take proceedings, they could have easily ascertained the owners' intentions long before the end of two years. If they expected a reward from the Admiralty and have been disappointed in getting it, that is no reason why the owners of the Llandovery Castle should be deprived of the protection which sect. 8 gives them. The defendants are the Union-Castle Line, upon whom a writ in personam could at any time have been served. If it is said that a letter was written just before the expiration of two years, the answer is that liability was definitely repudiated on the 18th Jan. 1919, and no explanation at all is given for the further delay of over two months before the writ was issued. Moreover, I think the fact that the claim is at best a trifling one is one of the considerations which should be taken into account.

I see no reason for exercising a discretion in the plaintiffs' favour, and I refuse to do so. The action is statute-barred, and must be dismissed with costs.

THE TURID. (a)

Charter-party — "Always afloat" — Alongside as customary—Custom of Port of Yarmouth—Custom inconsistent with terms of charter.

A charter-party provided for a vessel to deliver timber at Yarmouth "always afloat," the cargo to be taken from alongside at the charterer's risk as customary. She could not float within 13ft. of the side of the quay, and it was accordingly necessary to erect staging between the ship and the wharf. The cargo was then carried from the ship's side across this staging and stacked 12ft. from the edge of the quay. This method of unloading follows the custom of the port.

In an action by the shipowner in the County Court to recover the cost of carrying the timber from the ship's side to the quay, and of erecting the staging over which it was carried, it was held that the custom of the port was not consistent with the terms of the charter.

Held, by the Divisional Court (Duke P. and Hill, J.), that this judgment was right. Although a custom may be admitted to show that delivery from "alongside" need not mean delivery over the ship's rail, it did not follow that the place of delivery was the place indicated by the suctom.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal in Holman v. Wade (Times Newspaper, May 11, 1877, supplemented by further particulars from the Public Record Office) followed.

APPEAL from the Yarmouth County Court.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—The appellants are timber merchants at Great Yarmouth. The respondents are the owners of the Norwegian steamship Turid. The appellants chartered the Turid to bring a cargo of timber from Soroka to Yarmouth, and the parties are at issue as to who is liable under the charter-party to pay certain expenses of the discharge of the cargo. By the charter-party it was agreed that the Turid should load at Soroka and proceed with the cargo to Yarmouth and deliver the same "always afloat." . . . The "cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary."

The draught of the Turid was such that to be afloat at Yarmouth she could not come within about 13ft. of the quayside at which she was to discharge. The usual method of unloading for a ship so situated is to erect stagings between the ship's side and the edge of the quay, abreast of the several holds, such stagings being constructed of baulks of timber carried from the quay to the ship's side at a level of 4ft. or 5ft. below the rail with planks resting upon the baulks. The Turid had three holds and three stagings were erected. At each staging one gang of men carried the timber to the ship's rail and another gang received it there, carried it ashore, and stacked it at a distance of some 12ft. from the face of the quay. Stacking of timber nearer the waterside was not permitted, as free passage-way had to be kept there. The cost in question was the cost of erecting the stagings, carrying the timber across the stagings and across the 10ft. or 12ft. of quay, and stacking it.

Before the learned judge in the County Court proof was given of a custom of the Port of Yarmouth that the whole of this work should be done by, and at the cost of, the ship. It was objected, on the part of the shipowners, the plaintiffs, that the alleged custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and the learned judge took this view, and gave judgment in their favour for the sum in dispute. The defendants appeal against this decision upon the one question of whether the alleged custom is consistent with the terms of the contract. If it is, the evidence was admissible, and as it was uncontradicted there should be judgment for the defendants.

The appellants agreed to take delivery of their timber from alongside the steamer, lying afloat, at their own risk and expense as customary. The express qualification as to custom appears to relate to the mode of taking delivery, and not to the mode of meeting risk or bearing expense. The custom of the port will govern the mode of delivery if it is consistent with the express agreement. What has to be determined is whether the claim of the appellants to have a staging erected for them between the ship and the quay and to have the timber stacked on their ground at the landward side of the 12ft. of clear frontage is consistent with their agreement to take delivery from alongside.

Although delivery alongside is in the primary meaning of the words delivery at the ship's rail, custom may undoubtedly give to the term an enlarged meaning. The shipowners may by force of custom be required to deliver into a lighter alongside or a quay alongside. The limitation put by law upon such a customary requirement is that it shall be reasonably consistent with what has been agreed. In the present case I should have thought, apart from authority, that what is demanded of the shipowners is not reasonably consistent with the agreement of the parties. The quay was not alongside; the merchants' men could only come alongside by coming upon the staging. It is necessary, however, to examine some of these authorities which were cited as conclusive of the question at issue, and in particular the decision of the Court of Appeal in Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1877), decided in 1877, and Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman (76 L. T. Rep. 537; (1897) 2 Q. B. 83).

Holman v. Wade is reported only in the Times newspaper, but was a considered judgment upon a state of facts and a charter-party very like those in the present case. The words of the charter-party are these: "Cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at the merchants' risk and expense as customary." Owing to the form of the report in the Times some doubt has arisen as to the exact character of the expenses which were in dispute, and Mr. Carver, in his excellent work on "Carriage by Sea," describes them as expenses of stacking. We have examined the record which is in the Public Records Office and which puts the scope and result of the litigation beyond question.

The plaintiffs were the shipowners suing upon a charter-party for carriage of a cargo of timber from Riga to Hull, which provided that the vessel being loaded at Riga should proceed to the consignees' quay, Victoria Docks, Hull, or so near thereto as she may safely get and deliver the same always afloat for the agreed freight; "the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchants' risk and expense as customary." The action was brought for breach of contract; the alleged breaches being that defendants did not and would not (a) take the cargo from alongside the ship at their own expense as customary within the true intent and meaning of the charter-party, and (b) discharge the cargo as fast as the steamer could deliver it. The averments of damage were that the plaintiffs were forced and obliged to discharge the cargo at their expense and to stack the same on the defendants' quay, whereby they incurred expenses amounting to 11*l.*, and the ship was delayed two days, with consequent loss to the plaintiffs of 60*l.*

The defendants by their defence alleged a custom at Hull for ships laden with timber to discharge their cargo upon the quay alongside, and to continue the discharge as long as there was quay space vacant for the discharge, the cargo then to be taken from alongside by the consignees. Defendants alleged further that the plaintiffs' loss of time was due to their having "at first" refused to discharge the cargo as customary, and that the subsequent discharge of the cargo had been made in the customary manner. Plaintiffs by their reply joined issue and demurred to the pleas as to custom on the ground that the alleged custom was contradictory of the charter-party. The action was tried before Mr. Justice Manisty and a City of London jury. The evidence, as stated in the Times, showed that at the quay in question it was necessary, in order to unload deals, to construct a stage from the quay to the ship, and as the deals were landed to stack them, and that this had involved, with regard to the cargo in question, the expenses amounting to 11*l.* which the plaintiffs claimed.

Evidence was also given of a custom at Hull that these expenses should be borne by the shipowners. The amount of the damages was agreed at 7*l.* Mr. Justice Manisty directed that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs on the ground that the custom was inconsistent with the contract. The defendants' appeal was heard before Coleridge, C.J., Bramwell and Brett, L.JJ. Mr. Day (afterwards Day, J.) appeared for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Butt (afterwards Sir Charles Butt, P.) for the defendants; and after consideration the judgment of the court was delivered by Bramwell, L.J. on the 10th May 1877. On the ground that the contract could not be varied by custom the appeal was dismissed.

In this present case the facts and the contract are as nearly as can be alike with the facts and contract in Holman v. Wade, and the judgment in that case seems to me directly in point.

We were invited to consider some cases subsequent to Holman v. Wade which were cited by the respondents as expressions of the principle there explained. Hayton v. Irwin (41 L. T. Rep. 666; 5 C. P. Div. 130) was a claim under a charter-party for a voyage to Hamburg in respect of expense thrown on the shipowner by the charterers' refusal to take delivery at a point in the Elbe short of Hamburg. The charter-party required the ship to proceed to a safe port or as near thereto as she can safely get and deliver cargo . . . and to discharge as customary with all dispatch. The vessel could go no nearer to Hamburg than Stade without being lightened. The charterers refused to take delivery at Stade or to pay the costs of lightening the ship there, and the shipowner sued for the expenses thus thrown upon him. Defendant pleaded a custom of Hamburg whereby he was only bound to take delivery there, and the expense of lighterage for lightening the ship at Stade was payable by the plaintiff. Grove, J. allowed a demurrer to the defence, and Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ. affirmed his decision on the ground that the terms of this contract excluded the custom.

The case of The Nifa (69 L. T. Rep. 56; (1892) P. 411) was heard in this court on appeal from the County Court at Yarmouth. The shipowners sued the charterers for expenses of the same kind as the expenses here in question, caused by the same conditions at the Yarmouth quays which are described in this case—staging, carriage across the quay, and stacking. The mode of discharge was the same. The claim of the shipowners for the expenses of delivery of the cargo in excess of expense of delivery at the ship-rail was met by a plea of the custom which is alleged in this case. Upon proof of the custom the County Court judge gave judgment for the defendants. On appeal the Divisional Court in Admiralty (Sir Francis Jeune, P. and A. L. Smith, J.) reversed the judgment, on the ground that the custom was contrary to the plain meaning of the printed contract. The material provision in the charter-party was in these words: "Cargo to be supplied . . . and discharged as fast as steamer can deliver and according to the customs of the respective ports." The decision is in point here. The appellants relied before us upon the cases of Stephens v. Winteringham (3 Com. Cas. 169), Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman (76 L. T. Rep. 537; (1897) 2 Q. B. 83), and Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (102 L. T. Rep. 172; 15 Com. Cas. 88).

In Stephens v. Winteringham (sup.) the charter-party required that the cargo should be "taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense according to the custom." The ship berthed alongside the quay and the space available for receipt of the cargo by the merchants was 60ft. or 70ft. distant from the ship's side; the custom of the port was that the shipowner should bear the cost of delivery at that space and of the lumping there which was necessary in order that the prompt discharge of the ship might proceed; and Bigham, J. held that the merchants' duty to receive the cargo arose only when it had been lumped at that place. In Helios v. Ekman the charter-party for carriage of a cargo of deals from Ramock to one of the usual wood docks in the River Thames provided for the deals to be "brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchant's risk and expense." At the trial before Collins, J. evidence was received of a custom of the Port of London for delivery into lighters alongside, the ship bearing the cost of putting the timber into the lighter. The learned judge held that the custom was not inconsistent with the contract, and gave effect to it by his judgment, and upon appeal to the Court of Appeal, before Lord Esher, M.R., A. L. Smith and Chitty, L.JJ., the judgment was affirmed. The decisions in Holman v. Wade and The Nifa were cited, and Mr. Joseph Walton, who argued for the respondents, appears to have accepted the principle on which they proceed. Lord Esher, M.R. in his judgment pointed out that the consignee, in fact, took delivery alongside. He said: "It is part of the operation of taking delivery of the cargo that the consignee or merchant should provide barges and take them alongside in such a position that the timber can be delivered from the ship into the barge. . . . The custom found is . . . that in the case of long lengths of timber the shipowner alone has to perform the operation of delivery into the barges, which, if there were no custom, would have to be performed by both parties together. . . . The question is whether the custom . . . is contrary to the terms of the charter-party. . . . I think not. It simply explains what delivery of the cargo to the consignee alongside is and how it is to be effected—namely, by the act of the shipowner alone instead of the joint act of both parties."

In Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (sup.), Hamilton, J. had before him another dispute over the custom which was dealt with in the case of Helios v. Ekman, before Collins, J. A question had arisen as to whether the customary duty of delivery of the timber into the barges by the ship included stowage in the barges, which question was not determined. Before Hamilton, J. this question was tried out upon a great body of evidence, and decided in favour of the charterers. The arguments and the judgment show it to have been assumed by both parties that if the custom included stowage in the barges the charterers were entitled to succeed, and the judgment proceeds upon that footing.

Our attention was further called to the Irish case of Northmoor Steamship Company v. Harland and Wolff (1903, 2 Ir. Rep. 657), in which the late Palles, C.B. examined the authorities to which I have referred, other than Glasgow Navigation Company v. Howard (sup.). That case was decided later. The observations of the learned Chief Baron are not directly in point here; but any opinion of so great a master of the common law commands attentive consideration, and I respectfully concur in the view taken by the Chief Baron with regard to the effect of the judgments in Holman v. Wade (sup.) and The Nifa (sup.), and the mode in which the decision in Stephens v. Winteringham can be reconciled with them.

Mr. MacKinnon argued on behalf of the appellants that once a customary condition is introduced into the contract which gets rid of the obligation of the merchant to take delivery of the cargo at the ship rail, the question whether a particular place is alongside is to be determined by custom. I cannot entirely accept this proposition, and I do not think it follows naturally from the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Helios v. Ekman (sup.), or necessarily from the judgment of Bigham, J. in Stephens v. Winteringham (sup.). The barge in Helios v. Ekman (sup.) was literally "alongside." The quay in the case before Bigham, J. was alongside, if it can be regarded as an entirety. Whether the place of delivery selected by the charterer, 60ft. from the ship, was a place of delivery alongside is another matter. If so, it was alongside—because in part and in whole the quay was alongside. But to say that premises like those in the present case, which are separated from the ship's side by 13ft. of waterway and a breadth of quay space not available for receipt of goods, are alongside the ship by force of custom seems to me to make custom contradictory of fact.

I think the custom relied upon is not reasonably consistent with the agreement of the parties, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

HILL, J.—The relevant terms of the charter-party are as follows: "To proceed to Great Yarmouth as ordered, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same always afloat"; and "the cargo to be . . . taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary."

The ship was ordered to discharge at a portion of the quay occupied by the charterers. "Always afloat," she was able to get within a distance of about 13ft. from quay to rail. She there discharged. The method of discharge was that a staging was slung from ship's side to quay abreast of each of the three holds, and the stevedore's men, working in two gangs, carried the timber from the ship's deck and holds across the staging and on to the quay, and stacked it on the quay, leaving a space of 10ft. or 12ft. between the edge of the quay and the outer edge of the stacks; one gang brought out the timber and carried it to the ship's rail; the other received it on the staging and carried it to the place of stacking on the quay and there stacked it. The space of 10ft. or 12ft. was necessarily left, as cargo was not permitted to obstruct a passage-way along the quay edge. It was admitted that discharge into lighters was not practicable, and that the only practical method of discharge was that which was adopted.

The contention of the charterers was that, by the custom of the Port of Yarmouth, the whole of this work was done by and at the expense of the shipowner. The contention of the shipowners was that the custom was inconsistent with the express terms of the charter-party, and that their obligation was to deliver at the ship's side—i.e., that the work of the first gang was ship's work, but the work of the second gang, including the erection of the stagings, was charterers' work. The amount in dispute is the difference between the cost of the whole of the work and the rate for delivery at the ship's rail. The custom proved, and not disputed, was as follows: "It is the custom to erect a wooden stage between the ship and the quay, and for stevedores to be employed by the shipbrokers to carry the cargo for the shipowners from the ship's rail over the wooden staging and to put it down 10ft. or 12ft. from the edge of the quay." This was all done at the cost and expense of the shipowners.

The question is whether that custom is so inconsistent with the express terms of the charter-party that it cannot be read into it. The custom is not inconsistent with the words "deliver the same always afloat," because the ship, being always afloat, could deliver in the customary manner. Is the custom inconsistent with the words "cargo to be taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary"? That means that the cargo is to be taken from alongside in the customary manner. It connotes a corresponding obligation on the ship to deliver the cargo alongside in the customary manner. From the point when and where the cargo is delivered alongside in the customary manner, it is to be at charterers' risk and expense. Up to that point it is to be at the ship's risk and expense. The question is: Does the custom proved explain "alongside," or does it contradict "alongside"? Primâ facie, "alongside" means along the side of the ship, and if the contract is for delivery alongside, and nothing else, and there is no custom, the operation of discharge is a joint one, the ship delivering and merchant receiving the timber as it passed over the ship's side. But by custom delivery alongside may be at a point beyond the ship's rail, and custom may involve an obligation upon the ship to deposit the cargo at some place alongside, and put that work upon the shipowner alone, and such a custom is not inconsistent with "alongside." In Helios v. Ekman the custom put the obligation on the shipowner to deposit the timber in the lighters which lay alongside the ship. In like manner, if the custom be that the shipowner deposits the cargo on the quay at the side of the ship, there would, in my opinion, be no inconsistency with the obligation to deliver "alongside." And, in such a case, some extension must necessarily be given to "alongside"—it cannot mean a mathematical line immediately along the side of the ship; the cargo in being deposited on the quay must cover some space, and in practice would hardly ever be placed on the very edge of the quay.

Speaking for myself, I should be prepared to hold that the question whether a spot which is not immediately along the side of the ship is "alongside" or not ought to be determined by the answer to the question whether it could reasonably be said to be "along" the side of the ship, and that a custom which was not unreasonable in that respect did not contradict the word "alongside." And I should, in the present case, be prepared to say that the place of deposit was reasonably along the side of the ship, notwithstanding that the ship was not close up to the quay nor the deposit on the very edge of the quay. I should, therefore, not be prepared to say that the custom was inconsistent with the express terms of the charter-party, and I should decide as I believe Bigham, J. decided in Stephens v. Winteringham (sup.). But now that the record in Holman v. Wade (sup.) has been examined, I am unable to distinguish it and feel bound to follow it. If the custom in Holman v. Wade (sup.), where the ship was against the quay, was inadmissible as inconsistent with the express terms, it is a fortiori inadmissible here. In Holman v. Wade (sup.) the jury found the alleged custom proved. The alleged custom as pleaded was: "It is the customary and required mode of discharge of the Victoria Docks at Hull for ships laden with timber to discharge their cargo upon the quay alongside and to continue the discharge as long as there is quay space vacant for the discharge thereof, and the cargo is then taken from alongside by the consignees thereof"; and it was pleaded that "accordingly it was the duty of the plaintiffs to have delivered the said cargo on the quay alongside the Volga." The words of the charter-party were, in the material parts, identical with the words of the charter-party in the present case. The Court of Appeal upheld Manisty, J. in rejecting the custom as inconsistent with the express words.

I follow the Court of Appeal in Holman v. Wade (sup.), and, in so doing, I also follow the decision of this court in The Nifa (sup.), though I think the reasoning of the judges in The Nifa (sup.) is different, and such as I do not express my agreement with. I find it very difficult to reconcile Stephens v. Winteringham (sup.) with Holman v. Wade (sup.). In Northmoor Steamship Company v. Harland and Wolfe (sup.) the cargo was to be taken from alongside "always within reach of the ship's tackles," and is clearly distinguishable.

I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

THE CHELSTON. (a)

British master's certificate—Suspension of certificate—Wreck Commissioner's Court—Canadian procedure—Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Rehearing Rules 1907, rr. 22, 3, 12—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 470—Canada Shipping Act 1908 (17 & 18 Edw. 7, c. 65), s. 36.

The certificate of a British master was suspended by a Wreck Commissions Court sitting at Montreal.

The master appealed on the ground (inter alia) that the procedure under the Canada Shipping Act 1908, s. 36, was not consistent with the rights to which a British master is entitled under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 470, sub-s. 4, and the Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Rehearing Rules 1907, rr. 3 and 12.

Held, that the rights of British shipmasters in a Canadian Wreck Commissioner's Court are to be determined by considering whether the Canadian statutes diminish the rights assured to them by British legislation. The safeguards provided for the interests of shipmasters by the Merchant Shipping Act and the rules made thereunder are in no way diminished by sect. 36 of the Canada Shipping Act 1908. But as in this case the Wreck Commissioner's Court had not complied with the provisions of sect. 36, the decision must be quashed and the master's certificate restored to him.

APPEAL against the decision of the Wreck Commissioner's Court held at Montreal.

The master of the steamer Chelston was coming down the St. Lawrence with a cargo of timber in difficult weather, under conditions with which he was not familiar, and under sailing orders which put a considerable burden upon him. Enough allowance was not made in the navigation for the set of the current and the direction of the wind. The Chelston in consequence stranded and became a loss.

The sitting of the Wreck Commissioner's Court was expedited and held late at night to enable the master to sail by a certain boat. Findings were later promulgated adverse to the master, upon which an order was made suspending his certificate for three months. The master appealed.

The Shipping Casualties and Appeals and Rehearing Rules 1907 provide :—

Under rule 3 :

When an investigation has been ordered, the Board of Trade may cause a notice, to be called a notice of investigation, to be served upon the owner, master, and officers of the ship. The notice shall contain a statement of the questions which, on the information then in possession of the Board of Trade, they intend to raise on the hearing of the investigation.

Under rule 12 :

After the questions for the opinion of the court have been stated, the court shall proceed to hear the parties to the investigation upon and determine the questions so stated.

Sect. 470, sub-sect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides :

A certificate shall not be cancelled or suspended by a court [holding a formal investigation into a shipping casualty] unless a copy of the report or a statement of the case on which the investigation or inquiry has been ordered has been furnished before the commencement of the investigation or inquiry to the holder of the certificate.

Sect. 36 of Canada Shipping Act 1908 provides :

3. A certificate shall not be cancelled or suspended under this sub-section unless the holder of the certificate has had an opportunity of making a defence.

G. A. H. Branson for the Board of Trade.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—This is an appeal by a master mariner holding a master's certificate issued by the Board of Trade against the determination of the Wreck Commissioner's Court at Montreal whereby the appellant's certificate was suspended for three months.

The appeal in the form in which it has been presented raises questions of principle which might have far-reaching consequences. In particular there is a challenge of the power of the Legislature of the Dominion of Canada to make amendments of the merchant shipping practice in England and Canada made under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 so far as those amendments affect the certificates of British shipmasters. There is also raised a question of considerable gravity as to whether the rules which govern procedure in Canada under the Canada Shipping Acts provide sufficiently for the protection of a person implicated by charges before a Wreck Commissioner's Court.

The master of the Chelston was coming down the St. Lawrence with a cargo of timber. He was confronted with difficult weather, and he was navigating under conditions with which he was not familiar, and under sailing orders which no doubt put a considerable burden upon him. The current was changeable, and the set of the current at the point where the disaster occurred was liable to be affected by the direction of the wind, and it seems that on this occasion it was so affected. The true cause of the loss of the Chelston appears to have been that the master or navigating officer did not make sufficient allowance for the set of the current in the weather that prevailed. At the time when the vessel was supposed to be several miles to the southward of the island upon which she struck in fact she was heading directly for it. The loss of the vessel took place on the 12th Sept. 1919 by reason of her stranding on St. Paul's Island, Nova Scotia.

There were communications between the ship's agents and the Board of Trade authorities in Canada with reference to the loss of the ship. The master was desirous of taking his passage from Montreal at a particular time, and the sitting of the Wreck Commissioner's Court was fixed with reference to that time. It was fixed for the 9th Oct. 1919. Owing to the exigencies of the master's position, the inquiry was held late in the evening, and it was continued until nearly midnight, because the master wished to avail himself of the passage he had booked in a ship sailing the following day. The master and chief officer were examined for something like three and a half hours. The master had counsel with him, who asked some questions, and after the examination there was an adjournment for the purpose of the Wreck Commissioner stating at the adjourned date what were the findings of the court. Subsequently findings were promulgated which found the master guilty of an error of judgment, and also that when the master had found that the ship had run her distance his duty was to stop and sound, which he failed to do. Upon these two findings an order was made suspending the master's certificate for three months.

It is not necessary to say anything with regard to the terms of the findings. If the findings had been those of a British Wreck Commissioner it might have been desirable to express an opinion as to the express terms of the decision, and as to the consequences which might follow from those terms. But in the view which we take of the case, it is not necessary to make any such expression of opinion.

The master first of all appeals on the substantial ground that he did not have due notice of the charges upon which, by the findings, his certificate was dealt with. There is the further ground that, as alleged, the Canadian procedure did not satisfy the requirements of British law with regard to this master's certificate, and therefore was ineffective to warrant a finding which prejudiced his certificate.

Thirdly, he complains that part of the finding —as to what was shown by the ship's log—was not in accordance with the evidence. I say nothing as to this last matter, though it is a tempting subject ; but it is not necessary to consider it.

Two substantial questions have to be considered here. Having regard to the view we take upon the first question, the second as to the conformity of the Canadian statute and the Canadian rules with the requirements of the British legislation as it affects British masters' certificates, becomes really an immaterial question. But it has been raised, and it is desirable, I think, to express an opinion upon it, although it is not a ground upon which we have come to the conclusion at which we have arrived. In my view, the rules made by the Lord Chancellor are rules governing the procedure in British Commissioners' Courts. The rights of the master in the Canadian Court are to be ascertained by considering whether the provisions of the Canadian enactment diminish in any way the safeguards for the master's interests given him by the British legislation. In my opinion they do not. The Canadian legislation amply protects the rights of shipmasters, and I hope the judgment we propose to give in this case will make it clear that that is so.

This case will merely be an instance of the efficacy of the provisions of the Canadian statute for the protection of a shipmaster who comes within the Canadian jurisdiction. Besides being a matter of general interest, it is of the highest interest in this country as well as in Canada that it should be recognised that justice is administered in the Dominion of Canada, as it is here in the United Kingdom, with proper regard to the elementary principles which have governed the administration of justice among civilised peoples for all times. The Canadian statute of 1908 (Canada Shipping Act 1908) by provisions in sect. 36 substitutes certain words for the provisions in the British statute of 1894, which are ample for the protection of shipmasters. The provision introduced by amendment is in these terms: "The certificate shall not be cancelled or suspended unless the owner of the certificate has had an opportunity of making a defence."

I say nothing about foreign systems of law, but I think with regard to our own, and with regard to the law which prevails throughout the British Empire, there is recognition of the elementary principle of justice inherent in our law, and, I believe, in that of Canada, that there must be a hearing and there must be a charge preferred before a penalty can be inflicted. The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act—the particular provisions which direct that this or that step shall be taken—are merely modes of securing for the persons affected the benefit of that principle of our jurisprudence. The provisions of the rules framed by the Lord Chancellor are provisions with the same object and it seems to me that the interests of shipmasters are more effectively protected rather than less by being embodied in that provision in sect. 36 of the Canadian Act of 1908, instead of being limited by specific directions in rules. It makes it easier to administer jurisdiction if one has specific directions in rules which show how the interest of the suitor is protected, but if the matter be at large, and one has to do justice, then it is sufficient to say, in a case of this kind, that the interest of the suitor, in this case the appellant, shall not be prejudiced unless he has had an opportunity of making a defence.

Being satisfied that the effect of the Canadian Legislature and the effect of the Canadian rules is as I have said, what the court has to ascertain is whether the British shipmaster here had the opportunity of making his defence. In my judgment he had not. I think that, owing to the dispatch which was used, owing to the exceptional nature of the transaction—the sitting of the court being fixed at an exceptional hour and hurry being used—those who conducted these proceedings lost sight of the requirements of sect. 36 of the Canadian Act of 1908, and lost sight of the fact that a Court cannot visit a man with a penalty until it has first informed him what is the matter in respect of which he is brought to judgment.

Here there was a searching inquiry conducted by skilled persons with great care and they exposed by a number of questions a great variety of topics on which it would have been quite competent to representatives of the Board of Trade, or any other complainant, to have submitted to the court that the master was in default on one or other of that great variety of topics, but that step never was taken. The investigation was completed by the evidence of the master and the chief officer, and there the matter was left. It may be that it would have been easier for the Canadian Wreck Commissioner if he had had the guidance of a set of rules like that contained in the Lord Chancellor's rules in this country, but that is entirely a matter for the Canadian administration. Those who administer the jurisdiction of Canada are perfectly competent to say whether rules should be laid down to secure definite objects, or whether those objects should be left to be secured by general principles of law. Rules are not laid down in this case. It is left at large as to what means shall be taken to secure that the holder of the certificate has an opportunity of making a defence.

In the present case, owing to the exceptional circumstances, the necessity of formulating charges was overlooked. No charges were ever formulated, and the first notice the master had of the charges it was proposed to make against him was in the findings of the court by which he was found guilty of certain of them. It seems to me that the decision of the Canadian court must be quashed, and that the master's certificate must be restored free from any suspension. The successful appellant must have the costs of the appeal

The Admiralty, owners of a ship fitted with a wireless installation, a powerful searchlight, grappling ropes, and other salvage gear, and specially constructed for laying and repairing submarine telegraph cables, claimed salvage in respect of her services.

Held, that the ship was not "specially equipped with salvage plant" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Salvage Act 1916, s. 1, and that the ACTION for salvage remuneration in respect of services rendered.

Between the 13th March and the 16th March salvage services were rendered by five vessels, including the Admiralty's cable ship Monarch to the steamship Morgana. The claims by the four other vessels and by the commander and crew of the Monarch were upheld by the judge. A claim was also made by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty in respect of the services of the Monarch.

The facts and statutes relevant to the latter claim are fully set out in the judgment.

HILL, J., after dealing with the other claims, said:—

Last of all comes the writ originally issued on behalf of the officers and crew of his Majesty's cable steamship Monarch, and by a very late amendment a claim by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty was added, they claiming in respect of the services of the Monarch as an instrument of salvage. That amendment was made on the 10th June 1920, and the defence has not been amended in time for this trial, but it was intimated that the right of the Admiralty to sue in respect of the services of the Monarch as an instrument of salvage would be put in issue, and I have to determine that matter.

The Monarch was a cable ship, and in response to a wireless message she proceeded to the Morgana, reaching that vessel on the afternoon of the 15th March. She was then unable to make fast because the weather was bad. She subsequently made fast and assisted the Lacerta in towing off from the land for some four hours, and then she stood by until the following morning when the Sea Monarch came up. She then left to see about her own work. As I have said, I do not think the true view is that she saved the Morgana from immediate risk of going on to the rocks. There was nothing critical at that time, but she did assist the Lacerta in getting the ship further away from the coast.

Then arises a question, not an easy question, with reference to the claim of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. The Monarch belongs to the Admiralty, and is in fact in the employment of the Post Office. She is described in this way: "She is fitted with a wireless installation, a powerful searchlight, grappling ropes and other salvage gear, and was specially constructed for laying and repairing submarine telegraph cables."

Apart from the Merchant Shipping (Salvage) Act 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 41) no claim could be made for her as an instrument of salvage, because she would come within sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), which provides that where any salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to her Majesty no claim shall be allowed, with the proviso, of course, that the master and crew can claim with the consent of the Admiralty. Here the master and crew do claim with the consent of the Admiralty. Then the Act of 1916 was passed and it is in these terms: "Where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to his Majesty and that ship is a ship specially equipped with salvage plant, or is a tug, the Admiralty shall, notwithstanding anything contained in sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, be entitled to claim salvage on behalf of his Majesty for such services and shall have the same rights and remedies as if the ship rendering such services did not belong to his Majesty."

The Monarch was not a tug. Was she "a ship specially equipped with salvage plant"? A list of her equipment has been put in, and it is said, not that that plant was put on board her for the purpose of rendering salvage services, but that it was specially put on board her and was the sort of plant which was very useful in salvage services. There can be no dispute that a good deal of the equipment must be useful in rendering salvage, but in my view it is no more true to say that it is specially useful in rendering salvage services than are powerful hawsers or powerful engines. But, assuming that the various articles described in this case come within the words "salvage plant," I have still got to find, before I can bring the Monarch within the Act of 1916, that she is a ship "specially equipped" with such salvage plant.

What do the words "specially equipped with salvage plant" mean? It seems to me that they must mean equipped with salvage plant in a way or of a kind that such a ship would not be equipped with but for the purposes of rendering salvage assistance if it became necessary.

The whole of the plant on board this ship is there not for the purpose of rendering salvage services, but because it is essential for the ordinary working of the ship as a cable ship, and it is especially for that purpose. Therefore, it seems to me that she is not "specially equipped" with anything; she is equipped with all that is necessary for carrying on her own work. Some of that equipment is useful for salvage, but I do not think that that brings the Monarch within the Act of 1916.

I have never been able to understand why any particular ships should be excepted from the general rule—why if the Admiralty can make claims in respect of salvage services by tugs they should not be able to claim in respect of salvage services by men-of-war. They are all ships maintained at the public expense, and if it is fair to claim in respect of one it is only fair to claim in respect of the other. But as I cannot see any real principle at the bottom of the Act of 1916, I have to give effect to what appears to me to be the meaning of the exact words.

I doubt very much whether the equipment here was "salvage plant," and I am satisfied that the Monarch was not "specially equipped with salvage plant." Therefore, I find that she does not come within the Act of 1916. Accordingly, I can only reward the master and crew of the Monarch, and it is on that basis that I make my award in her case.

I allot to the commander of the Monarch 75*l*., and to the crew 225*l*. I should add, in case the matter goes further, that but for my view as to the claim of the Admiralty being barred, I should have awarded 600*l*. in respect of the Monarch as a salving instrument.

THE CAIRNSMORE AND THE GUNDA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Goods in Crown custody—Insurance by Marshal—Release of goods—Owners' liability for premiums.

The Admiralty Marshal insured against fire, aircraft, and bombardment goods which had been seized as prize. The respondents were neutral owners of goods laden on two vessels which were captured. Subsequently, the release of the goods was ordered, but they remained in the marshal's custody for some time as the owners were unable to obtain shipment for them. The Marshal claimed a proportion of the premiums from the cargo owners as expenses chargeable against them.

Held, that the proportion of the insurance premiums could not be recovered as part of the expenses of detention by the Marshal on delivery of the goods.

APPEAL by the Crown from a judgment of the Prize Court (England) reported (1920) P. 209).

The Marshal claimed from the respondents a proportion of the premiums under which the goods in question had been covered while in his custody as prize as expenses incidental to their retention under circumstances fully set out in the judgment of their Lordships. The President (Sir Henry Duke) rejected the claim.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord WRENBURY.—This is the appeal of the Procurator-General from an order of the President, Sir Henry Duke, by which he pronounced the cargo owners not to be liable for the premiums or policies of insurance effected by the Marshal against fire, aircraft, and bombardment. The claimants, Messrs. Ballins Sonner and Co., of Copenhagen, were the owners of 1425 tons of quebracho logs laden on the Cairnsmore and 2400 tons of quebracho logs laden on the Gunda which were seized as prize in July and Aug. 1915, and were discharged and stored on open ground in the Albert Dock, Leith. The Crown claimed condemnation, but on the 21st and 24th July 1916, Sir Samuel Evans ordered the goods to be released. Nevertheless, the greater part of the Cairnsmore shipment and the whole of the Gunda shipment remained stored at Leith until after the 31st July 1919. This was due to the fact that the Danish owners were unable to get shipment for them. Ultimately all the goods were sold and removed.

At the outbreak of war the Admiralty Marshal had effected a general cover by way of insurance against fire of goods which might from time to time be placed in his custody as prize. Further, on the 23rd May 1918, he gave notice by advertisement and by notice posted to solicitors practising in the Prize Court including the solicitors for the claimants in this case that, in addition to the cover already effected against fire, goods in his custody as prize would from that date be insured against aircraft risk and at certain places against bombardment risk. The goods in question in this case were brought under the covers thus effected. The question to be determined is whether a proportion of the premiums, amounting in the aggregate to 910*l.* 4*s.*, is payable by the cargo owners to the Marshal on delivery of the goods as expenses chargeable by the Marshal against the owners. The learned President held that it is not.

The duties and liabilities of the Marshal as executive officer of the Crown in respect of goods placed in his custody under a claim of prize must arise either by statute or apart from statute. Sect. 31 of the Naval Prize Act 1864, which relates to goods, refers back to sect. 16, which relates to ships. The latter is a section which provides for delivery to the Marshal and for retention by the Marshal in his custody subject to the order of the Court. The statute defines no special statutory duties or liabilities in the matter. The duties and liabilities of the Marshal are those which the law imposes upon one who has the custody of the goods of another against the will of that other. His duty is to exercise all due care and diligence in the safe custody of the goods. This is not necessarily limited to such care and diligence as he would exercise if the goods were his own: (The William, 6 Ch. Rob. 316). He might be content if the goods were his own to use less care than he owes when they belong to another. He must exercise all due care and diligence, and will be allowed the expenses attending the possession, care, and custody of the property, and those expenses will be treated as a charge upon the property itself: (The Franciska, sup.; The Dusseldorf, sup.). But captors in cases of bonâ fide possession are not answerable for incidents not arising from any misconduct on their part: (The Franciska, sup., p. 430). This is equally or even à fortiori true of the Marshal. The liability of the Marshal, therefore, in respect of fire or like risk is a liability only for his own negligence. The duty of the Marshal to use all due care and diligence does not involve a duty owing to the owner of the goods to insure them while in his custody. It may be quite right and prudent that he should insure the goods to cover his own liability, say, for the negligence of his agents, but there is no authority to insure for the benefit of the owner of the goods if they are lost without negligence on the part of the Marshal. The owner may already have covered the risk by an insurance effected on his own behalf. If so, why should he pay a second premium to insure them again? The owner being, say, a foreign neutral, may prefer to insure them in his own country, where he has perhaps more confidence in the insurance office, or where he will pay a less premium. Or he may prefer to be his own insurer—or, in other words, to accept a risk which he thinks is not likely to result in a loss rather than pay a premium which is, in any case, money out of pocket. If the owner has not insured elsewhere, and the goods are lost, and the Marshal has effected an insurance which covers the risk, the owner may no doubt have the benefit of it, and can only have the benefit of it if he pays the premium. But it does not follow that he is bound to pay the premium and take the benefit.

The point is not without authority. In The Catherine and Anna (sup.) an order had been made to restore a ship on payment of the captor's expenses. The captor had insured the ship against fire. Sir William Scott held that the costs of insurance were not to be allowed as captor's expenses, meaning "expenses that are necessarily incurred by the act of capture." Sir William Scott there said: "Captors are generally bound for two things—for safe and fair custody, and if the property is lost or destroyed for want of that safe and fair custody, they are responsible for the loss. For these two things every captor is answerable; but if an accident, or mere casualty, happens, against which no fair exertions of human diligence could protect, it must fall on the party to whom the property is ultimately adjudged. If to secure himself against the negligence of his own agents, or to secure his own responsibility, the captor chooses to make insurance, I understand the practice of the registrar and merchants has been not to allow it in their report, and I am not prepared to say, upon any principle which occurs to me, that such a disallowance is wrong. . . . The claimant is not bound to look further, not to contribute to the expense which the captor, for his own security, may choose to incur."

In that case the claimants had in fact previously effected an insurance themselves, but their Lordships do not find in this fact anything to affect the principle of the decision.

In The Südmark (No. 2) (sup., at p. 484), Lord Parker of Waddington, in delivering the judgment of this board, said: "It was suggested that if an application had been made to the Prize Court the appellants would in some way or other have obtained the advantage of some insurance effected or to be effected by the Prize Court Marshal. This may or may not be the case, but their Lordships are quite satisfied that there is no obligation on the part of the Crown or its executive officers, or the Prize Court Marshal, to effect insurances against fire for the benefit of cargo owners, whether the cargo be landed or kept on board a captured ship."

There is in their Lordships' opinion not sufficient evidence that in this case the cargo owners, during the currency of the risk, assented to the Marshal insuring the goods on their behalf, in which case, of course, they might have been liable for the reasonable cost of such an insurance.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the President was right in holding that the premiums cannot be claimed as expenses to be recouped to the Marshal on delivery of the goods.

There is a subsidiary point in the present case which is of no general importance. On the 16th March 1918, the solicitors for the claimants wrote to the Marshal that their clients were remitting them a sum "to pay all the charges of detention. . . ." On the 18th March 1918, the Marshal replied acknowledging receipt of the letter of 16th March "advising me that you shortly expect a remittance to cover the charges of detention, insurance, &c." The word "insurance" is not found in the letter of the 16th March. On the 7th Nov. the claimants' solicitors wrote to the Marshal asking "what the cost of insurance amounts to." In Feb. 1919 the purchasers of the goods were prepared to take delivery, but the Marshal refused to direct the collector of customs at Leith to give delivery until the solicitors had given their personal undertaking to pay all the Marshal's charges including the cost of insurance. On the 26th Feb. 1919, the solicitors gave the undertaking. This related to a first parcel of goods. On the 29th July 1919, they gave a similar undertaking as to the second parcel. Their Lordships do not find that these facts in any way affect the question to be decided. There was no consideration and no admission or acceptance of liability in the matter. The claimants' solicitors very sensibly gave their personal undertaking to pay without which they could not get delivery, leaving the rights of the parties unaffected.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Accordingly the appeal would be dismissed.*

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Admiralty Jurisdiction) upon a case stated.

In Nov. 1918, the Marlborough Hill loaded at New York on behalf of the British Government, the charterers, a cargo of general merchandise for carriage to Sydney. Funch, Edye, and Co. of New York, as agents for the charterers, received for shipment certain packages consigned to, among other persons in Sydney, the various respondents. The goods not being delivered upon the arrival of the Marlborough Hill at Sydney the respondents issued a writ in rem. against the ship for non-delivery of the goods under bills of lading in the Supreme Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction), claiming by the indorsement on the writ "as consignees or indorsees of bills of lading." Upon affidavits filed by the respondents the ship was arrested.

The appellants took out a summons to set aside the writ and, by order, a special case was stated for the opinion of the full court.

The special case raised two questions (1) whether the Supreme Court in its Admiralty jurisdiction had jurisdiction in the case, and (2) whether the plaintiffs were properly joined. The full court answered both questions in the affirmative, adding as to (1) that it would be necessary in order to succeed for each plaintiff to prove that the goods in respect of which he claimed were shipped on board the Marlborough Hill.

The document issued to each consignor acknowledged the receipt of the goods "for shipment by the sailing ship Marlborough Hill or by some other ship owned or operated by" certain lines of vessels to be transported to Sydney and there delivered to shipper's order, and the document contained references to itself as a "bill of lading," and was signed by Funch, Edye, and Co. "for the master." The question with regard to the jurisdiction conferred under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 6, and the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 27), s. 2 (2), depended in part upon whether the document given to the shippers was, or was not, a "bill of lading" for the purposes of the former Act. On the question whether the plaintiffs were properly joined, reference was made to rules 29 and 155 of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Rules.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the appellants.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Sinclair Johnston for the respondents.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by

Lord PHILLIMORE.—In the month of June 1919, the Finnish sailing ship Marlborough Hill arrived at Sydney on a voyage from New York, and on the 12th June a writ in rem at the instance of some twenty plaintiffs, the present respondents, was issued against the ship, in an action for non-delivery of goods under bills of lading. The writ was indorsed as follows: "The plaintiffs claim as consignees and indorsees of bills of lading for non-delivery of goods agreed to be carried by the said ship Marlborough Hill, and delivered to the plaintiffs respectively at Sydney, or agreed to be shipped within a reasonable time by some other vessel of the same line, and delivered to the plaintiffs respectively in Sydney, and for the loss and value of the goods undelivered as aforesaid, and the plaintiffs claim the sum of 1515*l.* for the loss aforesaid and for costs."

There followed particulars of the several claims, the largest being for 334*l.*, and the smallest for 3*l.* 16*s.* Affidavits were sworn separately by each of the plaintiffs on or about the 12th June. They were all in similar form and averred that in Nov. 1918, bills of lading were signed on behalf of the master by a firm of agents for the carriage of certain cargo from New York to Sydney to be delivered to the holders of the bills of lading; that the plaintiffs were indorsees of the bills of lading; that "the said goods were either lost during the said voyage or were not shipped either by the said vessel or by any other vessel within a reasonable time, and were not delivered to the plaintiff as agreed"; with further necessary formal statements to support process. Thereupon a warrant was issued to arrest the ship, and she was held to bail, and the necessary bail bond having been entered into, the ship was released. It is presumed that an appearance must have been entered on behalf of the owner of the ship, at or before the time when the bail bond was given; but the actual form of the appearance is not upon the record, and their Lordships have no information whether it was an absolute appearance or an appearance under protest. The rules in the Admiralty Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of New South Wales make no specific provision for an appearance under protest. But by rule 155: "In all cases not provided for by these rules the practice of the court in its common law jurisdiction shall be followed, or in cases therein unprovided for the practice of the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice of England shall be followed." And the usual mode of raising an objection to the jurisdiction in Admiralty cases is by appearing under protest.

However this may be, on the 17th June a summons was taken out on behalf of the owner of the ship to set aside the writ and all proceedings thereupon, on the ground that the claims of the various plaintiffs in respect of which the writ had been issued were separate and distinct claims, and could not legally be joined together in one action. In support of this application, an affidavit was filed sworn by one Frank Linton. The terms of this affidavit will be discussed later. The application was heard by Owen, J. in chambers on two occasions. On the second occasion, a further point was taken on behalf of the shipowner to the effect that no such action would lie in Admiralty even if brought by each plaintiff separately, or, alternatively, that some of the claims were outside the jurisdiction. The judge allowed this further point to be raised, and then had the whole matter stated in the form of a special case for decision by the full court. The questions submitted for the opinion of the court were two: "(1) Has the Supreme Court of New South Wales in its Admiralty jurisdiction under the circumstances set out herein any jurisdiction to hear and determine this action? (2) Are the plaintiffs properly joined in this action?"

After argument the full court ordered: "That the said questions of law should be answered as follows: (1) 'The Supreme Court of New South Wales in its Admiralty jurisdiction has jurisdiction to hear and determine this action, but it is necessary in order to succeed there that each plaintiff should prove that the goods in respect of which he claims were shipped on board the Marlborough Hill. (2) Yes."

It is from this decision that the ship owner has appealed to the King in Council.

An extract from the bill of lading was annexed to the special case, but their Lordships have had the full document submitted to them.

Admiralty jurisdiction is conferred upon the Supreme Court of New South Wales by the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act of 1890, which in substance provides that the jurisdiction of a Colonial Court of Admiralty shall be over the like places, persons, matters and things as the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England, and that the Colonial Court may exercise such jurisdiction in the manner, and to as full an extent as the High Court in England. The Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court in England, with a consequent right to try actions in this class either in rem or in personam, arises from sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, whereby it is provided that: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales, in any ship for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court, that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. . . ."

By a provision of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, the words "domiciled in England or Wales" must mean in this case "domiciled in New South Wales," which the owner of this ship was not.

The first point taken on behalf of the appellant is that this purports to be a claim by the assignee of a bill of lading, and that the shipping instrument on which reliance is placed is not a bill of lading; and this point requires some careful consideration. The document is not in the old form of a bill of lading. The old form starts with a statement or acknowledgment that the goods have been shipped. It runs "shipped on board," &c. But this document runs "received in apparent good order and condition from . . . for shipment." The old form is precise that the goods have been shipped on board the particular vessel, though the conditions of the bill of lading may proceed afterwards to permit of transhipment. This document runs to the effect that the goods have been received for shipment by the sailing vessel called the Marlborough Hill, or by some other vessel owned or operated by the Commonwealth and Dominion Line Limited, Cunard Line, Australasian Service; and the first term which is expressed to be mutually agreed is to the effect that the ship owner may substitute or tranship the whole or any portion of the goods by any other prior or subsequent vessel at the original port of shipment, or at any other place. The contract, therefore, is not one by which the shipment on the particular vessel proceeded against is admitted, nor one whereby the shipowner or his agent or the master contracts to carry and deliver by that ship. It is one whereby the agents for the master put their signature to the contract, admit the receipt for shipment and contract to carry and deliver, primarily by the named ship, Marlborough Hill, but with power to substitute any other vessel owned and operated by the specified line, or possibly under the first condition by any other ship whatsoever. But the contract does contain the further obligation that, subject to the excepted conditions and perils, either the named ship or the substituted ship shall duly and safely carry and deliver.

It is a matter of commercial notoriety, and their Lordships have been furnished with several instances of it, that shipping instruments which are called bills of lading, and known in the commercial world as such, are sometimes framed in the alternative form "received for shipment" instead of "shipped on board," and further with the alternative contract to carry or procure some other vessel (possibly with some limitations as to the choice of the other vessel) to carry, instead of the original ship. It is contended, however, that such shipping instruments, whatever they may be called in commerce or by men of business, are nevertheless not bills of lading within the Bills of Lading Act of 1855, and it is said, therefore, not bills of lading within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861.

Their Lordships are not disposed to take so narrow a view of a commercial document. To take the first objection first. There can be no difference in principle between the owner, master or agent acknowledging that he has received the goods on his wharf, or allotted portion of quay, or his store-house awaiting shipment, and his acknowledging that the goods have been actually put over the ship's rail. The two forms of a bill of lading may well stand, as their Lordships understand that they stand, together. The older is still in the more appropriate language for whole cargoes delivered and taken on board in bulk; whereas "received for shipment" is the proper phrase for the practical business-like way of treating parcels of cargo to be placed on a general ship which will be lying alongside the wharf taking in cargo for several days, and whose proper stowage will require that certain bulkier or heavier parcels shall be placed on board first, while others, though they have arrived earlier, wait for the convenient place and time of stowage.

Then as regards the obligation to carry either by the named ship or by some other vessel; it is a contract which both parties may well find it convenient to enter into and accept. The liberty to tranship is ancient and well-established, and does not derogate from the nature of a bill of lading; and if the contract begin when the goods are received on the wharf, substitution does not differ in principle from transhipment.

If this document is a bill of lading, it is a negotiable instrument. Money can be advanced upon it, and business can be done in the way in which maritime commerce has been carried on for at least half a century, throughout the civilised world. Both parties have agreed to call this a bill of lading; both, by its terms have entered into obligations and acquired rights such as are proper to a bill of lading. All the other incidents in its very detailed language are such as are proper to such a document. The goods are marked and numbered as stated in the margin, and are to be delivered to the order of the shipper or his assignees, on payment of freight and charges. There are the usual, now in modern times very detailed, provisions and excepted perils. There are provisions for the payment of general average; that the shipper is to be liable to the ship owner for damage owing to his having shipped dangerous goods; and that he shall pay all expenses for reconditioning and gathering of loose cargo. The ship owner is to have a lien on the goods, not only for freight, but for fines, damages, costs and expenses which may be incurred by any defect in insufficient marking or description of contents. It is called a bill of lading many times in the course of the fifteen provisions, and particularly in the last, where it is provided that the shipment, being from New York, shall be subject to all the provisions of certain statutes of the United States, and specially to the well-known Harter Act. The list closes as follows: "In accepting this bill of lading, the shipper, owner and consignee of the goods, and holder of the bill of lading, agrees to be bound by all its stipulations, exceptions and conditions, whether written, stamped or printed, as fully as if they were all signed by the shipper, owner, consignee or holder, any local customs or privileges to the contrary notwithstanding. If required by the shipowner, one signed bill of lading, duly endorsed, must be surrendered on delivery of the goods." And then the document ends in the time-honoured form. "In Witness whereof the Master or agent of said vessel has signed three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, of which if one is accomplished, the others shall be void."

No doubt it appears from the margin that it is the form in use by the Commonwealth and Dominion Line Limited, Cunard Line, Australasian Service, trading from New York to Australia and New Zealand, with Funch, Edye and Co. Incorporated, as the American agents; and it may be said that it is not signed by the master, but by that firm as agents for the master. It is, however, well known that in general ships the master does not usually sign. The bills of lading are signed in the agents' office by the agents. It should perhaps be added that it is evidently contemplated by the document that the shipper will assign his rights and that the assignee or holder of the bill of lading will present the document at the port of delivery, and that his receipt and not that of the shipper, will be the discharge to the ship owner.

Their Lordships conclude that it is a bill of lading within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861.

It is next contended on behalf of the appellant, that at any rate no writ in rem could be issued against the ship Marlborough Hill, in respect of any goods, except those which were actually shipped on board, which is no doubt the view which the Supreme Court has taken, as is shown by answer No. 1—an answer from which there is no cross-appeal—and that this being so there is no averment, and, at any rate, no proof that any of the goods in question were shipped on board this particular vessel. The language of the endorsement of the writ has already been given, and both it and the affidavits to lead the warrant are not precise and positive that any goods were actually shipped on board the Marlborough Hill.

As regards the affidavits, their Lordships have not to consider whether they were sufficient in form to support a warrant for arrest, or whether upon such affidavits the proper officer ought to have allowed the warrant to go. The summons was not a summons to set aside the warrant or to release the ship without bail, but to set aside the writ and all further proceedings. Nor was the summons originally taken out on this ground.

Turning to the endorsement on the writ and accepting for this purpose the position that there would be no right in rem, except in respect of goods actually shipped on board the particular ship, the endorsement is no doubt open to some objection for uncertainty. But it is not usual to take the extreme course of setting aside a writ for a defect in the endorsement, unless indeed it appears that there is substance behind the objection. And if the several documents which were before the full court are closely scrutinised, it would appear that the fact that some at least of the goods were shipped was not brought into controversy. The judge's notes on the argument before him in chambers were made an exhibit to the special case, and it should be observed that when application was made for leave to take the second point, the way in which it was brought before the judge was that the counsel for the defendant, using the language of the note, "wished to object that no such action would lie in Admiralty even if brought by each plaintiff separately, or" (and this is to be noted) "some of the claims are outside the jurisdiction of the court."

Mr. Linton's affidavit states that he is informed by the master, and believes, that separate and distinct bills of lading or shipping receipts were issued for the several goods of the several plaintiffs. This is correct. He proceeds to state that all the goods in respect of which the plaintiffs are claiming were received for shipment under the terms of these bills of lading or shipping receipts, which appears to be an admission that at any rate all the goods were received for shipment. He does not proceed to say that any of them, still less that some of them, were not shipped on board the Marlborough Hill. In the reasons for the judgment of the full court, it appears that the first objection was that none of the goods had been carried into the port of Sydney; a verbal objection to the terms of the statute, which was got over by Dr. Lushington in very early days in the case of the Danzig (9 L. T. Rep. 236; Br. & Lush. 102; 32 L. J. 164, Adm.), a decision which has not since been questioned and which counsel for the appellants did not question now. The second objection was that there was no evidence that the goods were in fact ever shipped on board the Marlborough Hill. On this the full court observed that "in our opinion that objection to the jurisdiction fails, and cannot be given effect to at the present stage," and again, "the plaintiffs do not admit that their goods were not so shipped. At the most their affidavit states that they are uncertain whether they would be able at the trial to prove that fact—a fact which is, as we think, essential to their success."

In their Lordships' opinion the full court dealt with this point in the proper manner. This was not the kind of objection which would warrant a summary dismissal of the action at this early stage, and by this form of procedure, an unusual one, especially if there was no appearance under protest. When the action proceeds, the statement of claim must make the proper averments, and at the trial they must be proved, or the plaintiffs will fail. The defendants have the advantage that they have an expression of opinion by the full court, and possibly it should be considered as a decision of the full court, from which there has been no appeal, that the case will fail except as to goods actually shipped on board the Marlborough Hill. In other words, the opinion or decision of the full court is that the contract in a bill of lading whatever obligation it imposes upon the ship owner in an action in personam, cannot be considered as giving a right in rem except for such goods as were actually shipped on board the res. From the course this case has taken, this point does not come before their Lordships for decision, and therefore they do not decide upon it; but they desire it to be understood that they have formed no opinion contrary to the view taken by the full court. It is enough to say that for the reasons given by the full court, their Lordships think that it was right to allow the action to proceed, unless the second objection, which they are about to deal with, is fatal to it.

The second objection is that each plaintiff ought to have sued separately. On this point authorities upon the construction of the rules of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England were cited. Their Lordships, on the whole, think that these are not applicable. The matter is covered, so far as the court in question is concerned, either by rule 29: "Any number of persons having interests of the same nature arising out of the same matter may be joined in the same action whether as plaintiffs or as defendants," or by rule 155, already quoted. It might no doubt be that with regard to the new subjects of jurisdiction conferred upon the High Court of Admiralty by the Act of 1861, a different practice should prevail. But, at any rate, with regard to the subjects of the older Admiralty jurisdiction such an objection as that now raised was unheard of. In an action for collision claims by ship owner, and if the ship were lost, by cargo owner, by master and crew, who had lost their clothes and effects, by representatives of seamen drowned claiming for goods and effects of the deceased, were always joined in one action. In cases of salvage the owners, master and crew of the salving vessel were always joined. In cases of wages, all the seamen joined in one action, though some of them were taken on board at the commencement of the voyage and stayed to the end, while others may have been shipped or discharged at intermediate ports. If separate actions had been started, the court would have at once consolidated them, and probably punished those who had brought separate actions by making them pay the costs up to consolidation. More than this, if two or more vessels were engaged in salvage, even though at different periods, and of a different nature, it was not unusual to join them in one action. In the case cited in argument in the court below, the Marechal Suchet (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 553; 74 L. T. Rep. 789; (1896) P. 233), the propriety of this course was expressly confirmed, and the argument from the general rules of the Supreme Court of Judicature was put aside.

The procedure in rem has some different incidents from those appropriate to an ordinary action inter partes, and their Lordships think it open to them to consider the general question of convenience in such actions, treating them as being of a special nature.

If each of these twenty or more parties had been obliged to issue a separate writ, and to apply, as would be the consequence for separate warrants, several of them for sums under £10, the costs would be enormous; and it is for the interest of shipowners that joinder of plaintiffs in such cases should be encouraged.

Admiralty jurisdiction originated in the civil law, and never lost all touch and connection with it. Its procedure was malleable and adaptable. The ordinary procedure in such a case as the present would be that if the plaintiffs obtained a primary judgment their several claims would be referred to the registrar who would deal with each separately, and on his report the court would deal with the costs. Their Lordships, while thinking it unnecessary that they should give an express construction of the words in rule 29, are not disposed to interfere with the decision of the Supreme Court, on what they regard as a question of procedure.

Upon the whole their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

THE BERNISSE AND THE ELVE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Damages against the Crown—Right of search—Misconstruction of Orders in Council by naval officers—Diversion of ships in danger area—Order in Council of the 16th Feb. 1917.

Two Dutch vessels trading between French colonial territory and Holland were stopped by a British cruiser just outside the area declared by Germany to be a prohibited area in which any neutral vessel would be liable to be sunk by German submarines. The vessels had all the requisite documents of clearance from the French port, including an "acquit à caution"—a document permitting the export of the cargo—but had not got the "green clearances" which were given to vessels that had called at a British port. The naval officer ordered that the vessels should proceed to Kirkwall to be searched, and they were being taken there when they were torpedoed by a German submarine.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In a suit for damages by the owners the Prize Court held that as there was no ground for detaining the vessels or reasonable ground for thinking that they might prove subject to detention the Crown was liable.

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the Order in Council of the 16th Feb. 1917 did not require a vessel which had started from a British or Allied port to call at a British port for a clearance certificate. In the absence of anything connected with the ship or cargo which could give rise to suspicion that they might be liable to condemnation, the captors, whose action in this case was prompted by doubts as to the meaning of the Order in Council, not as to the character of the ship or her cargo, were liable in damages and costs.

Judgments of Lord Stowell in The Oostzee (1855, 9 Moo. P. C. 150) and in The Luna (1815, 2 Dods. 48) considered.

APPEAL from a judgment of the President (Lord Sterndale) of the Prize Court (England) reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 525; 122 L. T. Rep. 286; (1920) P. 1).

The steamships Bernisse and Elve were owned by a Dutch firm, respondents to the appeal, who chartered them to a Dutch company (also respondents) for the carriage of cargoes of ground nuts from Rufisque, a port in the French colony of Senegal, to Rotterdam. The trade was carried on by the charterers with the consent of the French Government subject to certain safeguards as to the ultimate destination of the cargoes, each of which was accompanied by a document called an "acquit à caution," issued by the French port authorities. The ships were stopped on the 20th May 1917 in the course of the voyage by H.M.S. Patia, an auxiliary cruiser. The naval officer was shown the French document above mentioned, but finding that neither ship had a "green clearance" such as was issued to ships after examination at a British or Allied port under the Order of Council of the 16th Feb. 1917 (known as the second reprisal Order) he ordered them to proceed to Kirkwall. This involved taking a course more dangerous to attacks from German submarines than they otherwise would have done. While proceeding to Kirkwall they were attacked by a German submarine, with the result that the Elve was sunk and the Bernisse badly damaged. The latter ship was towed into Kirkwall, but was afterwards repaired and allowed to proceed to Rotterdam.

Actions which were brought by the respondents, the owners of the ships and the owners of the cargoes, against the Procurator-General were consolidated, and the President gave judgment in the case of the Elve for restitution in value, and in the case of the Bernisse for the payment of damages.

The Procurator appealed.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and Bruce Thomas for the appellant.

Sir Erle Richards, K.C. and Bisschop for the respondents.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by

Sir ARTHUR CHANNELL.—This is an appeal by the Procurator-General from a decree of Lord Sterndale dated the 25th July 1919 in a consolidated action brought by the respondents, the owners of the steamship Elve and of the steamship Bernisse and of their cargoes, whereby the learned President decreed on the claim in respect of the steamship Elve restitution in value, and gave damages in respect of the steamship Bernisse, which had already been released but in a damaged condition.

The steamships were owned by P. A. Van Es and Co., a Dutch firm at Rotterdam, and were chartered to a Dutch company in business at Delft for the carriage of cargoes of ground nuts from the Port of Rufisque, in the French colony of Senegal, to Rotterdam. The Dutch company had factories at various places in Holland, where the ground nuts were dealt with and oil was extracted from them. This importation had commenced before the war. It was for a time stopped on the outbreak of war, but the object of it having been explained to and looked into by the French Government, it was permitted to proceed under agreed conditions and guarantees. Each consignment of ground nuts was to be accompanied by a document called an "acquit à caution," issued by the French colonial authorities at the port of loading and which was to be deposited on arrival in Holland with a representative of the French customs authorities at the port of discharge whose duty it was to take precautions to secure that the ground nuts were used at the factories and that the products did not go to an enemy destination.

On the 20th May 1917 the two steamships sailing in company with cargoes of ground nuts in bulk were proceeding on the voyage from Rufisque to Rotterdam by the route then considered the safest, round the north of Scotland, and on that day they were stopped by H.M.S. Patia, an auxiliary cruiser, at a point situate in latitude 62° 4′ N., and longitude 15° 10′ W. This spot is in the North Atlantic, approximately west of the Orkneys, and is outside the zone within which the Germans had announced their intention of sinking all neutral vessels. At the time the vessels were so stopped the Order in Council of the 16th Feb. 1917 was in force, and was being acted on by H.M. cruisers, and as it is necessary on this appeal to consider the words of that order, it is well to set out the operative part:

1. A vessel which is encountered at sea on her way to or from a port in any neutral country affording means of access to the enemy territory without calling at a port in British or Allied territory shall, until the contrary is established, be deemed to be carrying goods with an enemy destination, or of enemy origin, and shall be brought in for examination, and, if necessary, for adjudication before the Prize Court.

2. Any vessel carrying goods with an enemy destination, or of enemy origin, shall be liable to capture and condemnation in respect of the carriage of such goods; provided that, in the case of any vessel which calls at an appointed British or Allied port for the examination of her cargo, no sentence of condemnation shall be pronounced in respect only of the carriage of goods of enemy origin or destination, and no such presumption as is laid down in art. 1 shall arise.

3. Goods which are found on the examination of any vessel to be goods of enemy origin or of enemy destination shall be liable to condemnation.

4. Nothing in this order shall be deemed to affect the liability of any vessel or goods to capture or condemnation independently of this order.

It had become the practice to give to any vessel which started from a British port on a voyage to a port affording access to enemy territory or which when on such a voyage wherever commenced had, in order to comply with the Order in Council, called at a British port for the examination of her cargo, a clearance on a green card, which became known as a green clearance. When the two steamers were stopped, they were boarded by an officer from H.M.S. Patia, who made the usual inquiries, and was told the port from which the vessels had come, and that to which they were bound, and was shown her French documents, including the "acquit à caution." The officer asked if they had a "green clearance." and was, of course, told that they had not. He ascertained that the cargo was in bulk, and in his evidence at the trial he gave a decided opinion that it would have been impossible to examine the ships at sea in order to find out whether there was anything hidden under the cargo. He stated, however, that if there had been a green clearance, or in other words, if the cargoes had been examined at a British port, he would have been satisfied. Being in doubt what to do, he reported the facts by signal to the captain of the Patia, and the captain, being also puzzled, reported them by wireless to the admiral in command of the cruiser squadron, who directed that the vessels should be sent to Kirkwall. They were accordingly ordered to go there, and an officer and three men were put on each steamer to see that they went. The captains remonstrated on the ground that they would have to go through the danger zone, but they were told that it did not make much difference, as there were German submarines about outside the zone as well as within it, and that they sank vessels wherever they met them, so that ships were nearly as likely to be torpedoed outside the zone as in. On this point the learned President, although he did not think it material, found that there was greater danger on the route the ships were directed to go than on that which they had intended to take, and their Lordships would be not inclined, and indeed have not been asked to differ from the learned President on this point. The vessels did when within the zone encounter a German submarine, which fired on them without previous warning, and sank the Elve by one torpedo, and seriously damaged the Bernisse with another. Fortunately a British cruiser appeared, which took on board the crews of the vessels, who had taken to their boats, and towed the Bernisse in her damaged condition into Kirkwall. The Bernisse was temporarily repaired, and ultimately was allowed to proceed on her voyage to Rotterdam, and it is in evidence that her cargo was never examined, although in the course of the repairs it probably became evident that there was no contraband on board. On these facts the learned President has held that there was no ground in fact for detaining the vessels and sending them into Kirkwall, and further that there was no such reasonable ground for thinking that there was as to relieve the Crown from paying the damages arising from sending them in, and it is on the latter point that the appeal has been brought.

It is necessary first to consider the construction of the Order in Council. It has been held by this Board that the Order is binding on neutrals (The Stigstad, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 388; 120 L. T. Rep. 106; (1919) A. C. 270; see also The Leonora, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 500; 121 L. T. Rep. 527; (1919) A. C. 974) and the Order expressly directs that vessels which come within the first clause shall be brought in for examination. The Order is not very happily worded, but these vessels having started from an Allied port do not come within the Order at all, unless the words "without calling at" imposed on a vessel the obligation for a subsequent call even although her cargo has been duly examined and passed at the British or the Allied port from which she started. This is an impossible construction. Having regard to the fact that the object of requiring a call is to ensure that there shall be an opportunity of examining the cargo, it seems clear that "calling at" must include "having been at" a British or Allied port when the port was the original port of departure on the voyage; and as regards the want of a green clearance, that would only be given at a British port, and it really is quite clear that throughout the order an Allied port is put on the same footing as a British port. The President so held, and their Lordships agree with him.

As there was in this case no ground whatever proved on which either ships or cargo could have been condemned as prize, any more than any ground for detaining them under the Order in Council, the question remaining is merely that of reasonable ground for the action taken. To show such ground the Crown rely on two points. First they say that the detention was a legitimate exercise of the right of search. In this war it has been agreed that search at sea has been practically impossible, and sending in to port for search has been almost universal. In this case further there was evidence that the search at sea for contraband hidden under the ground nuts would have been impossible. The President, however, has disposed of this point by saying that even if the officers might have suspected that something contraband was hidden under the ground nuts, in fact they did not do so and have never said that they did. They really only sent the vessels in because there was no green clearance. This seems a sufficient answer, and it is unnecessary to go further, but counsel for the respondents do further argue that even for a search reasonable ground of suspicion must be shown, and that where everything is in order on the papers, and there is no circumstance suggesting hidden contraband, even a search on the spot would be unjustifiable. In strictness this is of course correct, but so little suspicion is required to justify a search that their Lordships are not prepared to say that if a boarding officer were to state that finding a cargo to be in bulk he thought something might be hidden under it, and therefore directed a search, his conduct would be so unreasonable as to subject the Crown to a liability for damages. That case must be considered if it should arise. Here it does not appear to arise.

The second point on which the Crown rely is really the only one which gives rise to any difficulty. It is that there was a bonâ fide doubt on the part of the officers who gave the order for detention as to the true construction of the Order in Council. The question as to what is sufficient to relieve a captor from paying damages in respect of a capture which is afterwards decided to be in fact wrongful was very fully considered in the case of The Oostzee (1855, 9 Moo. P.C. 150). It was there held that to exempt captors from costs and damages there must be some circumstances connected with the ship or cargo affording reasonable ground for belief that the ship or cargo might prove a lawful prize. That case arose during the Crimean War, and the cases down to that date were fully dealt with. The only case which at all supports the contention put forward by the Crown in the present case is

The Luna (1810, Edw. 190). There a neutral vessel proceeding to St. Sebastian, in Spain, which had at the time been for two years in the occupation of the French, was seized for alleged breach of blockade by British captors who were in bonâ fide doubt whether or not an Order in Council of the 26th April 1809, declaring a blockade of "ports and places under the government of France" extended to San Sebastian so temporarily in French occupation. Sir William Scott held that it did not so extend, and decreed simple restitution, and he not only refused the claimants costs and damages, but gave the captors their expenses. In giving judgment he said: "It is impossible for the Court to throw out of its consideration that when these Orders in Council are issued it is the duty of the officers of His Majesty's Navy to carry them into effect, and although they may be of a nature to require a great deal of attentive consideration, gentlemen of the Navy are called upon to act with promptitude and to construe them as well as they can under the circumstances of cases suddenly arising. With every wish, therefore, to make the greatest allowance for the difficulties which are at present imposed on the commerce of the world, I cannot in this instance refuse the captors their expenses, but in no future case arising on the same state of circumstances will the Court grant that indulgence."

In The Actæon (1815, 2 Dods. 48), five years later, Sir William Scott, without referring to his former decision in The Luna, which does not appear to have been quoted to him, laid down what seems to be a different rule. He says at p. 52: "Neither does it make any difference whether the party inflicting the injury has acted from improper motives or otherwise. If the captor has been guilty of no wilful misconduct, but has acted from error and mistake only, the suffering party is still entitled to full compensation, provided, as I have before observed, that he has not by any conduct of his own contributed to the loss. The destruction of the property by the captor may have been a meritorious act towards his own Government, but still the person to whom the property belongs must not be a sufferer."

These cases are reviewed at length in The Oostzee (sup.), and it is said in the judgment that in The Luna Lord Stowell must have felt that he was going to the very verge of the law. The headnote to the report of The Oostzee in Moore's Report states as part of the decision and not as a dictum that an honest mistake occasioned by an act of government will not relieve captors from liability to compensate a neutral; but it should be noted that towards the end of the judgment delivered by Lord Kingsdown he points out that in the case then before the Board there was no point of law. In strictness, therefore, what was said as to the insufficiency of a mistake in point of law might be considered as obiter. Their Lordships, however, consider that the judgment in The Oostzee must be looked at as a whole, and that it really does decide the point stated in the headnote. It is not necessary to say that in order to relieve the captors from paying damages the neutral owner must be in some way in default; it may be only his misfortune; but there must be something "connected with the ship or cargo" in order to give rise to the suspicion which will relieve. Here the doubt which certainly was honestly entertained was not a doubt as to anything so connected, but merely a doubt as to the meaning of an Order in Council issued by the British Government. If the decision in The Luna proceeded entirely on the ground stated in the judgment as reported, it is contrary not only to The Oostzee but to the judgment of Lord Stowell himself in The Actæon, and it cannot now be followed. It may well be that in addition to the point stated in the judgment in The Luna as reported, and which is, as Lord Stowell truly said, a point which ought not to be left out of consideration, there were also in the facts of that case circumstances connected with the ship which were in Lord Stowell's mind. It is clear on the face of the report that the whole judgment is not reported. Even if San Sebastian was not in strictness a blockaded port under the Order in Council, nevertheless a ship going there was obviously taking goods to the enemy who were in actual occupation of it, and on that or some other ground, in addition to what appears in the judgment, the decision may have been justified. It has, however, been treated as a decision that the facts referred to in the judgment as matters to be taken into consideration would in themselves be sufficient, and so understood it is contrary to at least one decision binding on this Board. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

THE KRONPRINSESSAN MARGARETA; THE PARANA; AND OTHER SHIPS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Contraband—Doctrine of infection—Transfer of ownership in transitu.

The law of prize contains two settled rules, one which refuses to recognise transfers of the ownership of movables afloat from an enemy transferor to a neutral transferee, when unaccompanied by actual delivery of the goods; and the other (known as the rule of infection) which condemns as if contraband any goods which, though not condemnable in themselves, belong or are deemed to belong when captured to the same owner as other cargo in the same vessel, which cargo itself is liable to condemnation as contraband.

It is strictly with owners that these rules deal.

The rule of infection does not rest on the personal culpability or complicity of the owner of the goods. "Infection" is not a quality of the goods themselves, but is an incident of the owner's position when the seizure is made and the captor's right arises.

The rule as to infection has not been abrogated by the Declaration of Paris.

The Declaration of London Order in Council (No. 2) dated Oct. 29, 1914, was revoked by the Declaration of London Order in Council dated March 30, 1916.

CONSOLIDATED appeals arising out of suits for condemnation of cargoes as prize.

In respect of two of the appeals the appellants appealed from a judgment of Sir Samuel Evans, P. dated the 19th March 1917 and reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 31, 301; 116 L. T. Rep. 508;

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(1917) P. 114. In the case of the Parana the appeal was from a similar decision pronounced by Lord Sterndale while president of the court on the 29th May 1919 and reported (1919) P. 249. The other cases are unreported.

The question on which each appeal turned was the validity of the doctrine of "infection," particularly where there had been, according to municipal law, a change of ownership after shipment. The grounds for the decisions below will be found set out in the two reported decisions above referred to.

Sir H. Erle Richards, K.C., R. A. Wright, K.C., Balloch, and Sir Robert Aske for the appellants.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by LORD SUMNER.—These appeals are brought to test the validity of the doctrine of "infection" and its applicability to the conditions and forms of overseas commerce at the present time, and their Lordships think it right to deal with them accordingly, although, as will appear, they, or at any rate some of them, might have been disposed of on narrower grounds. They relate to four ships, the Hilding, the Parana, the Rena, and the Kronprinsessan Margareta, and to five voyages, there being two of the ship last named.

The claimants are neutrals, who acquired the titles on which they rely in the ordinary way of trade. The goods condemned were coffee and hog products which are in themselves conditional contraband, and they were carried in neutral bottoms under the protection of neutral flags and were shipped from and deliverable at ports in neutral countries. None of them was shown to have had an ulterior enemy destination, nor was it shown that any of the claimants themselves were privy to the ulterior destination of any of the cargo carried in the same vessels, but in each case there was other cargo, which was in itself conditional contraband and was found to have an ulterior enemy destination, and it is by this that the goods in question have been held to be infected.

The case of the Hilding is mainly one of fact, and will be stated later. In the case of the Parana, neutral shippers, acting through agents, shipped sundry parcels of coffee belonging to them, of which one had an ulterior enemy destination, as the president found and as the appellants now accept, and others were consigned to the appellants, Messrs. Lundgren and Rollven, in pursuance of contracts of sale and purchase made before the date of the bills of lading. The terms of the sale were c. and f. Stockholm, reimbursement by confirmed sight credit on a Swedish bank. The draft in respect of one shipment, that made at Santos, was met by the bank in Sweden before seizure; the draft drawn in respect of the other shipment, that made at Rio, was met after seizure. Both dates were long after the ship sailed from Santos and Rio respectively.

In the case of the Rena, Diebold and Co., a German firm trading in Brazil, had shipped sundry parcels of coffee, of which one, nominally consigned to Swedish consignees, but claimed on behalf of a Dutch firm, the Commanditaire Vennootschap Heybroek and Co., as purchasers, was held by the President to have belonged to Diebold and Co. at the time of the seizure and to have had an ulterior enemy destination at that time given by Heybroek and Co., and was accordingly condemned. The present appellants, while not admitting these facts, to which indeed they appear not to have been privy, were not in a position to contest the President's findings and condemnation. This may have been their misfortune, but it cannot affect the case. They are a firm of Mattsson Peterzens and Co., consignees named in the bill of lading of another portion of the coffee pursuant to a contract of purchase and sale dated before the shipment, the terms of which were cost and freight Gothenburg, payment at sight on a Swedish bank, who confirmed the credit by telegram to Santos. The Swedish bank met this draft before the seizure but after the ship had sailed. This parcel of coffee was not shown to have had any ulterior enemy destination; on the contrary, it was admitted to have been in itself the subject of a legitimate transaction.

In the case of the second voyage of the Kronprinsessan Margareta, the claimants and appellants are Messrs. Bergman and Bergstrand. Coffee was shipped by Diebold and Co., under a bill of lading dated the 8th May 1916, consigned to Messrs Dahlen and Wahlstedt. This parcel had, in fact, an ulterior enemy destination and the President condemned it as contraband, but it is contended that it was not liable to condemnation, and therefore not capable of infecting other goods in the same ship, as the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914, respecting immunity from condemnation of conditional contraband, consigned to a named consignee at a neutral port of discharge, was still in force and applied to it. There is, therefore, here a question whether this immunity had or had not been revoked before the 15th June 1916, the date of seizure. The appellants, Messrs. Bergman and Bergstrand, bought other parcels of coffee from Diebold and Co., under contracts effected before shipment, and were the consignees named in the bill of lading. Their coffee was only destined for Sweden. The terms of these contracts provided for payment by sight reimbursement credit on a Swedish bank, but the draft was not met until after the date of the seizure.

The remaining case, that of the first voyage of the Kronprinsessan Margareta, is rather more complicated. There are four claimants and appellants—Messrs. Engwall, Berg and Hallgren, Levander and Ofverstrom—all neutrals importing for neutral consumption only. An enemy firm, Goldtree, Liebes and Co., in Brazil, made shipments of coffee, of which, in addition to the parcels claimed as above, one was condemned by the President as having an ulterior enemy destination and as being the property of the shippers at the date of seizure. The appellants all bought their parcels under contracts made after shipment, except Levander. The terms of his contract were f.o.b. Acajutla, payment 90 per cent. against bill of lading and balance on delivery, but he, like the other appellants, did not take up the bill of lading and make any payment until after the date of the seizure. In all these cases the appellants were innocent and ignorant of the enemy destination of the infecting parcel.

It will be convenient to consider the nature of the rules impugned and the reasoning and authority on which they rest before dealing with the particular circumstances of the cases under appeal, especially as the application of these rules is complicated by the fact that the purported transfers of ownership have all been effected by transfers of documents representing the goods while afloat and by the fact that, in so far as the position of enemy transferors has to be considered, the appellants further invoke the Declaration of Paris.

For about one hundred and fifty years at least the law of prize has contained two settled rules, one which refuses to recognise transfers of the ownership of movables afloat from an enemy transferor to a neutral transferee, when unaccompanied by actual delivery of the goods, and the other, which condemns, as if contraband, any goods which, though not condemnable in themselves, belong or are deemed to belong when captured, to the same owner as other cargo in the same vessel, which cargo itself is liable to condemnation as contraband. It is strictly with owners that these rules deal, and although an owner is normally the person who has and exercises control over goods which belong to him, there is no warrant for saying that either rule refers to anything but ownership. It is not the case that a neutral, who could not otherwise establish such ownership as the law will recognise, is entitled to be treated as if he had done so, because he can show that he has by personal contract acquired a right to control the goods in certain events, nor is it the case that enemy ownership of goods, so associated with contraband as to become liable to confiscation, may be disregarded if the enemy ownership does not happen to be made active by the exercise of actual control, or if the enemy owner's contractual position has made him indifferent to the fate of his goods. Upon the authorities it is also clear that the above-mentioned refusal to recognise transfers does not apply when both transferor and transferee are neutral, apart from special circumstances affecting them, and that the common ownership, which involves goods, not in themselves contraband, in the condemnation of other goods which are condemned as contraband, is common ownership which subsists at the time of the seizure and has not previously been determined.

Their Lordships are fully aware that some Continental jurists have criticised the rule of infection adversely, and that Continental Prize Courts have not always accepted it, though it has long been adopted in the United States and more recently in Japan. They are, however, bound by the decisions of their predecessors, which, consistent as they are, it is too late to overrule and impracticable to distinguish. They would observe that, valuable as the opinions of learned and distinguished writers must always be as aids to a full and exact comprehension of a systematic law of nations, Prize Courts must always attach chief importance to the current of decisions, and the more the field is covered by decided cases the less becomes the authority of commentators and jurists. The history of this rule is obscure. A reference to some of the proclamations in Rymer's Fœdera suggests that it may have had its origin in the practice followed by the executive during the seventeenth century in successive wars, and the theories on which writers like Zouch, Bynkershoek and Heineccius appear to proceed, seem rather to have been an effort to find in their erudition some ex post facto warrant for an accepted rule than an historical statement of the reasons which actually guided those who laid it down. Sir William Scott found it well settled, and if he appears to take some credit to the courts for mitigating the harshness of an older time, this points rather to the substitution of legal doctrines for executive practice than to the exercise of any assumed dispensing power by Courts of Prize.

That the so-called doctrine of infection does not really rest, in spite of many passages which suggest it, on the personal culpability or complicity of the owner of the goods is shown by the fact that, if it were so, excusable ignorance would be an answer, and for this there is no authority. The term is as old as the Treaty of Utrecht, but the doctrine is perhaps unfortunately named. From the figure which describes the goods as contaminated when seized, the mind passes to the analogy of a physical taint, which runs through the entire cargo in consequence of its being in one bottom, and begins on shipment or at least on sailing. Hence, "once infected always infected," is assumed to be the rule, and a buyer would get a tainted parcel, even though he became owner before seizure, and was recognised as such. This is inconsistent with the view that the rule is a penal rule, as it certainly has been said to be, but it is argued that the penal effect is only accidental and that the real foundation is the belligerent's right of capture, which may arise as soon as the ship gets out to sea. "Infection" has then attached to all the goods afloat in one common ownership, and to purge it by a subsequent transaction and transfer of ownership on land would be to defeat an accrued belligerent right.

This reasoning is answered as soon as it is appreciated that "infection"—that is, the liability of a particular owner to a derivative condemnation of his goods—is not a quality of the goods themselves, but is an incident of the owner's position when the seizure is made and the captor's right arises. This consideration operates in two ways. It fixes the critical moment as the time of seizure and makes liability to condemnation depend on the facts as they are then found to be; but it also establishes that by those facts the claimant must stand or fall. His liability is not in the nature of punishment, nor does it involve mens rea. It does not depend on his having formed or having abandoned an intention to send the goods in question to an ulterior enemy destination. The destination of the goods is a matter of fact, by whomsoever it is given, and, when transit to that destination is in progress, this may make the goods themselves absolute contraband. When once it is found that, at the time of the seizure, the same person was owner of goods on board and embarked in the same transaction or transit, of which the ulterior destination involved their condemnation, and of goods bound for a neutral port without any ulterior destination, neither the captor nor the court is called on to investigate his mercantile operations as to these other parcels—an inquiry complex and remote, in which the claimant has all the information and the captor all the disadvantage—but these goods also are involved in the condemnation.

Neutrals, however, must be taken to accept the consequences of the belligerent's legitimate exercise of all his recognised rights. If cargo has in fact such an ulterior destination as makes it liable to condemnation, that consequence follows independently of the actual owner's knowledge, intention or interest, for res perit domino. It is accordingly beside the mark to say that the appellants were innocent parties themselves; that they never interposed in the war; that, so far as they knew, all the goods with which they were concerned had a final neutral destination; that if their buyers had arranged otherwise it was unknown to them and unsuspected; that guilty shippers escape because they have been paid, and guilty sub-purchasers because the goods have been intercepted and they are not liable to pay, and that thus the penalty falls for the offence of others on the shoulders of the party who of all is the most innocent.

It has been contended that control and not ownership is the real test, so that either control, divorced from ownership, when vested in a neutral will avert condemnation, or bare ownership in an enemy, if devoid of control, will be so innocuous as to neutralise any infection. It may be doubted if this point really arises. None of the appellants here had control, as distinguished from a contractual right to obtain control on taking up the documents and thereby becoming owner, and, unless in the cases of the Rena and the Parana the intention was to retain, if anything, only a lien by way of security and not the general property, none of the transferors were anything less than owners, who had contracted to give control and ownership as well, upon the due taking up of the documents.

In any case, however, there is a fallacy in the argument. In cases like The Hamborn (sup.) control is looked to instead of the mere persona, in which, according to municipal law, the ownership resides, because under the rules there applicable enemy character is the question and civil property is not. The rules now applicable adopt the test of ownership and not that of enemy character. They may be criticised or impugned on other grounds, but if they are recognised and the question is merely as to their application, they must be accepted as they stand.

It is objected that the rule "infects" goods, which are in themselves free from all objection, by reason of what has been done with other goods, over which the claimants had no control, and which in some cases received their enemy destination from consignees whose design was unknown even to the enemy shipper. The rule neither penalises nor deters the enemy shipper, especially if it is applied in cases where he has been fully paid. It only operates to pass what belongs to an innocent neutral into the pockets of the captors.

Though this kind of deterrent is not always of direct and obvious efficacy, few modes of deterring contraband trade are more effectual than to establish a rule, known by and applicable to all, that the inclusion by a shipper among his other shipments by the same vessel of one parcel having in fact an ulterior enemy destination may lead to the condemnation of the whole. On the other hand, the adoption of the date of the seizure is a great protection to the innocent neutral. Just as the general rule is that a ship is not open to proceedings merely for having carried contraband on a past voyage, so goods are liable to infection not because they formerly belonged to an owner of contraband, but because they are found to do so when the captor's inchoate title by seizure begins. If the common ownership existing before the seizure had then come to an end by means which are valid in prize, this liability does not arise; if it continues till after the seizure a new and neutral owner, acquiring ownership only after seizure, though nothing forbids his acquiring title from a belligerent, can have no better right as against the legitimate captor than to stand in the shoes of the owner, from whom he derives title, as they were when the goods were seized, and he, by reason of his common ownership of both classes of goods, would have forfeited them all. At the time of the seizure the subsequent transferee has acquired no right to object, and, the goods having been legitimately brought into court for condemnation, a claimant on a title not completed until after seizure must obtain them, if at all, only by the aid of the court and only on the terms of accepting the law there administered as binding upon him.

The rule against recognising transfers of enemy goods while at sea, if unaccompanied by actual delivery and transfer of possession, is so well established and is now so ancient that its authority cannot be questioned or its utility impugned for the purposes of a judicial determination. Its application assumes that the circumstances of the shipment, and the dealings with the shipping documents and otherwise, are not such as to make the shipment itself an actual delivery of the goods to the transferee through his agent the carrier. It assumes also that a documentary transfer has taken place in good faith by a real and not a sham transaction, and that in pursuance of that transfer rights have been acquired by the transferee, which in other courts not bound by such a rule would be valid and enforceable. With sham transactions Courts of Prize would deal in another fashion; with incomplete transactions insufficient to transfer rights, no court would deal at all. The expression "mere paper transaction," sometimes used, does not imply that something unreal or ineffectual in itself is under discussion. It serves to draw attention to the fact that the transaction is unaccompanied by any dealing with the goods themselves, such as by its overt or notorious character would serve to inform the captor as to the subject which he seizes and the nature of the right if any, which he may be entitled to acquire in consequence. The history and the theory of the rule, neither of which is now very clear, are too inconclusive to add weight to the rule itself or throw light on its true application. It appears to have been regarded as a particular example of a wider principle, that the national character of movables cannot be changed while they are at sea by any independent dealings or occurrences. Thus, in the Negotie en Zeevaart, decided on appeal in 1782, the question was whether a ship, which went to sea a Dutch ship, had ceased to bear that national character when she was taken because the Dutch colony of Demerara, from which she sailed, had before her capture become British by capitulation to the British Crown. It was held that she had not. This was followed in The Danckebaar Africaan (1 C. Rob. 107), where the question was whether the capitulation of the Cape of Good Hope which had taken place after the ship sailed but before her capture, and had made British subjects of the Dutch owners, had not also entitled them to claim their ship on arrival at the Cape as prize on the ground that there had been in fact a capture of British property. So strict was the rule even then that the claimants, though British subjects themselves at the time of the capture, could not be heard to assert that title against the presumptions arising when the ship sailed. Shortly afterwards it was accepted in The Vrouw Margareta (1 C. Rob. 336) that there was no recorded instance of a claim being sustained for goods purchased of an enemy in transit in time of war, for the practice of the Prize Court to look only to the time of shipment was already invariable.

It has been contended that this is a rule applied for the purpose of determining the status of goods, and that it is only so applicable; that it decides whether goods have enemy or neutral character, but not whether they, being neutral and in themselves innocent, can be condemned as having been infected by other cargo which is contraband. No authority has been cited for this proposition.

Whether the foundation of the rule be taken to be the tendency of documentary transfers to encourage evasion and fraud, so as to defeat a belligerent's rights in one way, or the tendency of changes of ownership in transit to make the right of seizure at sea precarious, and so to defeat in another way the correlative belligerent right—namely, the right to obtain a condemnation—the reasoning is equally applicable to such cases of exercise of belligerent rights as those now in question. Its application in either case involves the proposition that the goods claimed belong in the eye of the law either to an enemy or to another neutral, and such prior owner being a person unable to claim the goods owing to their destination or their association according to the established law relating to contraband, the captor's claim to condemnation succeeds.

It was urged that if this rule originated in a question of the national character under which the ship and goods sailed, it would have no application except to cases where the national character—i.e., enemy character—was the ground upon which condemnation was or could be prayed. There is a confusion here. What can it matter whether the form of the decree is that there is a condemnation because the goods are proved to be enemy property in fact, or because the goods are deemed to be enemy property in law? The condemnation must equally be decreed, and the determination that the goods are enemy property according to the laws of property generally, or according to the particular laws by which in a Court of Prize the question of enemy property is to be tested, is equally an application of rules of law which bind the Court. To proceed a step further, if the determination is that the goods are enemy property, and such as would enjoy the protection of a neutral flag, were it not for the fact that, being contraband, they lie outside of that protection, the result is the same—namely, that a forfeiture of goods, which the court is bound to regard as being still enemy goods, follows under the circumstances of the case. The rule, stated in 1799, as being a settled rule, is still logically as much part of the process by which the liability of goods shipped by enemy merchants is to be determined as if the case had arisen before 1856, or as if the issue, enemy goods or neutral, arose directly, as it did in The Odessa (sup.), and the rule was applicable that ownership and not lien or pledge forms the test which guides the Court.

An attempt was made to use this Board's decision in The Baltica (11 Moo. 141), by which their Lordships are bound, as a further ground for excluding the application to these cases of any rule which denies recognition to titles obtained through a documentary transfer made while the goods are at sea. It is true that in that case Mr. Pemberton Leigh, delivering the judgment of the Board, states that there are two possible foundations for the rule—the one that documentary transfers lend themselves to fraud and concealment, and the other that they tend to defeat the belligerent's right of seizure, and then describes the former as the "true" view. It was not, however, any part of the question then to be decided to settle the foundation of the rule, since its mere existence sufficed for the determination of the case, and in the circumstances of that case and the contemporaneous case of The Ariel (5 W. R. 427) the danger of collusive transfers was the one which was most clearly to be apprehended. Their Lordships do not regard this judgment as declaring the view that these transfers tend to defeat a belligerent's rights to be a false view. Indeed, it is plain that in The Daksa (sup.) this Board was of a contrary opinion. The two views are not really inconsistent. A collusive transfer, the truth of which the court has no means of penetrating, does defeat the belligerent's rights. On the other hand, the transaction may be genuine, as in the Baltica it was, yet not be recognised. It cannot be doubted that the reason was not that the Court was afraid of being deceived or felt itself incapable of ascertaining the truth, but that, if it were deceived or left in doubt, it would be unable to do justice to the belligerent captor's claim. It is, therefore, no answer to say that there was no collusion about the present transfers. They fall within a rule, which recognises no personal or particular exceptions, and if the goods were liable to be forfeited, assuming them to be rightly stamped with enemy character when seized, an admission of a documentary transfer to a neutral would defeat the captor's rights.

As these rules are undoubtedly well established, the appellants have been principally constrained to impugn their application to the facts of the present appeals. The circumstance that they do not appear to have been applied together in the same case before is merely accidental, and if the result seems to wear an artificial appearance that is an accident also. The same may be said of the observation that in the old cases the infecting parcel has been shipped direct to the enemy by the common owner himself, and that infection in consequence of an ulterior enemy destination is new. This is merely a consequence of the development of the doctrine of continuous voyage.

Two further arguments are chiefly relied on. The first, that the rule as to infection has been virtually abrogated by the Declaration of Paris; the second, that the rule as to transfers of goods while at sea and without delivery is inconsistent with modern mercantile practice, and therefore ought no longer to be followed. Their Lordships will, of course, pay every possible regard to such an instrument as the Declaration of Paris, but it is necessary to point out exactly what, in this connection, its provisions were. A neutral flag protects enemy goods from capture as enemy goods; in a neutral bottom enemy goods are placed on the same footing as neutral goods. The Declaration, however, is not a charter of immunity in all circumstances for enemy goods under a neutral flag, nor does it protect goods simply as being enemy goods, which, if neutral, would have been liable to condemnation. The Declaration says nothing about the criteria by which the enemy or neutral character of goods is to be determined; it says nothing about the doctrine of "infection"; it says nothing about admissibility or rules of evidence; it says nothing of the rights of a belligerent to repress traffic in contraband of war, or of the modes by which Courts of Prize give effect to and protect those rights. It is said that the grounds on which so-called "paper transfers" of property at sea are disregarded have no application in the present case, for the goods, even in the cases where they were enemy property when shipped, were covered by the neutral flag, and not even potentially capable of being made good prize, and have since been transferred in good faith and in the ordinary way of trade. The answer is simple. They were capable of being made good prize, even though they were enemy goods in a neutral bottom, for if they were contraband, or were "infected" by contraband, being in a common ownership with contraband when seized, nothing in the Declaration of Paris either expressly or impliedly protected them.

It is then said that, if so, "infection" has no application, for this principle is a punitive principle and, as a neutral is entitled to trade in contraband at his peril, there is nothing for which to punish. He has not intervened in the war or sided with one party against the other, and he has carried on his own neutral trade in his own and a legitimate way. He is really being penalised in an abortive attempt to punish an enemy, who escapes the penalty. Accordingly, the maxim cessante ratione legis cessat ipsa lex applies equally as in the case of the doctrine discussed above. If the rule against recognition of transfers of goods at sea ceases to apply, because these goods cannot be good prize even if enemy-owned so that the reason of the rule is gone, equally, when the goods are proved to be neutral property, the doctrine of infection ceases to apply, for that was laid down in order to punish, and this trade is now admitted to be innocent though hazardous. Again the answer is simple.

Penalty and punishment in this connection are in a further respect unsuitable terms—namely, that they might seem to question a neutral's right to ship or to buy contraband at his peril. Neither belligerents nor Courts of Prize exercise a general correctional jurisdiction over the high seas. The ownership of contraband goods, though often spoken of as if it were a guilty departure from the neutral duty of impartiality, is now well recognised as being in itself no transgression of the limits of a neutral's duty, but merely the exercise of a hazardous right, in the course of which he may come into conflict with the rights of the belligerent and be worsted.

The language about "innocent" and "guilty" goods, about the "offence" of carrying contraband and about taking contraband goods "in delicto" and imposing a "penalty" accordingly, was effective and apt in the connection in which it was used, but that connection involved a decision, not as to the rationale of the doctrine of infection, but only as to its application in particular cases. The decisions do not preclude their Lordships from recognising that it is not the function of Courts of Prize to be censors of trade generally during war; that, if neutrals have the right to carry contraband, belligerents have the correlative and predominant right to prevent it; and that the doctrine of infection was established and still stands as an effectual deterrent, the need and justification for which have by no means passed away.

As to the changes in mercantile practice, it has already been indicated in The Odessa (sup.) that trade machinery, which is the growth and creation of years of peace, cannot supersede the settled law of prize. In time of war the remedy is for neutrals to change their practice and buy before shipment, and, if they pay after shipment and before they get the goods, they must take their risk of infection. In the long intervals of peace between war and war, commerce flourishes and commercial practices and modes of business change and develop while the law of prize is in abeyance, but merchants have no power to alter or affect this law, nor have Prize Courts any discretion or authority to abrogate settled and binding rules on the ground that their application is inconvenient to or inconsistent with the smooth and regular working of modern commerce. Nor is it the case that, when the rules now under discussion first grew up, either the use of documents as symbols of goods afloat in connection with passing the property or the practice of loading general ships with an aggregate of parcels, intended to be distributed among sundry consignees, was unfamiliar or unknown. In any case, and although Prize Courts will always be mindful of the just rights of neutrals, it is certain that none would be greater sufferers than neutral merchants if it were once admitted that in Prize Courts fixed principles could be disregarded and settled law could be set aside in hard cases, for cases may be hard to belligerents as well as to neutrals. The President, Lord Sterndale, made some observations in his judgment in the case of The Rena which show how much he was impressed with the argument that a combination of these two rules, leading to the consequence of condemnation in the present cases, is harsh and impolitic, but it is plain that if mere considerations of particular hardship prevailed to alter the application of the law, the whole uniformity of the system administered by Prize Courts would be impaired. It is plain also that, if a claimant's ignorance could be relied on as an answer to the captor's rights, nothing would be easier than to defeat those rights in almost every case. Strictly speaking, a neutral is not in a position to complain of being penalised by the doctrine of infection, when his transferor and the common owner of his parcel and of the contraband parcel is an enemy, for, if the court cannot recognise his title, he fails because he is not the owner, not because he is subject to a general doctrine of infection. It is otherwise when he takes from a neutral, but here again, if he is not owner at the time of seizure, he fails because he has no right to complain of the seizure or to defeat the rights which the captors derive from it, and if, nevertheless, he has paid his money, he loses it because, before doing so, he failed to ascertain the facts as to the goods and to make sure that the documents taken up would avail him to obtain delivery.

The result of these considerations is that, subject to the exceptional points which follow, the appellants were rightly held to be affected by the doctrines impugned and their claims were properly dismissed. It remains to consider three special cases, in two of which it is contended that the appellants became owners before the commencement of the voyage, whilst in the third reliance is placed on the terms of the Declaration of London Order in Council, dated the 29th Oct. 1914. It is convenient to take this last case first.

In the case of The Kronprinsessin Margareta's second voyage, two firms, Dahlen and Wahlsteldt and Bergman and Bergstrand, each claim portions of her cargo. Dahlen and Wahlstedt admitted that their parcel had an ulterior enemy destination, but claimed that the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914, applied to it, and, in accordance with the language of art. 35 of the Declaration of London, waived the Crown's right to ask for its condemnation. The question is whether that Order in Council, so far as it would affect this parcel, had been revoked prior to the seizure on the 15th June 1916—that is to say, by the Order in Council of the 30th March 1916—and this is a question of construction.

In general, when the Crown exercises such power as it has to affect the rights of neutrals by Order in Council the terms of that order, to be effectual, must be unambiguous and clear. In the Kronprinsessin Victoria (14 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 391; 120 L. T. Rep. 75; (1919) A. C. 261), their Lordships have so held. In the present case the neutral rights affected are such as subsist by virtue of a prior Order in Council, intimating an intention to waive a portion of the full belligerent rights of the Crown for the time being, but this circumstance does not affect the construction of the order under discussion. The Declaration of London Order No. 2 had announced that the Crown would observe certain articles of the Declaration of London, of which that now material was art. 35. No doubt that was a concession to neutral interests, and Dahlen and Wahlstedt's transaction would fall within the terms of the article.

The Order in Council of the 30th March 1916, after reciting that doubts have arisen as to the Declaration of London Order No. 2, says in art. 1 " the provisions of the Declaration of London Order in Council No. 2 1914, shall not be deemed to limit nor to have limited in any way the right of His Majesty to capture goods on the ground that they are conditional contraband, nor to affect or to have affected the liability of conditional contraband " to be captured under circumstances such as those of the present case; in other words, that for the future His Majesty no longer assents to any limitation on his full belligerent rights in the matter in question, the terms of the Declaration of London Order No. 2 notwithstanding. In what respect are these words wanting in clearness, and how do they fall short of an unambiguous withdrawal of any prior waiver of the Crown rights as affecting certain neutral shipments? They are more than a mere warning that the Crown can, by revocation of prior waivers, return to the exercise of its full belligerent rights unimpaired, nor was there any occasion for such a declaration.

Attention is first drawn to the words " shall not be deemed . . . to have limited " those rights. As these words refer to the past and to the consequences of transactions which have already occurred, they are clearly severable from the other words of the sentence, which refer to the future. Even if they are ineffectual, for an Order in Council cannot give to a prior order any other validity or effect than that which its terms, truly construed, possessed according to law, they do not diminish the full effect of the other words as to matters within the undoubted competence of His Majesty in Council, nor do they cloud or obscure their meaning. Their Lordships think it needless and inexpedient to surmise with what object these words relating to past occurrences were inserted. The formula, now so common, which declares something to be deemed to have been what it really was not, is sometimes no doubt convenient, but the limits of its utility are soon reached, and they may have been exceeded here. This their Lordships have not to consider. It is enough that the obscurity of the words in the past tense, such as it is, does not touch those in the future.

The next point is that the order of the 30th March 1916 itself in art. 2 virtually makes a reference to art. 35 of the Declaration of London as modified by art. 1 (iii.) of the order of the 29th Oct. 1914 which is only consistent with the continuance of that article in force, and by art. 5 expressly revokes any recognition of art. 19 of the Declaration of London, thereby showing that the intention is to name articles no longer recognised and not further or otherwise to withdraw the Declaration of London Order No. 2. Their Lordships can only observe that, the question being one of clearness or ambiguity, the clearness is on the side of art. 1 of the order of the 30th March 1916, and that art. 2 is not clear enough to preserve what the words used de futuro in art. 1 have clearly renounced. The effect of art. 2 is not a point that they need further pursue. As to art. 5 there may be more ways than one of being clear, but the use of general terms in art. 1 is not ambiguous merely because the use of particular terms is adopted in art. 5, nor does the first expression fail to be clear merely because, following the model of the second, it might have been clearer.

The last contention is that the express revocation of the Declaration of London No. 2 Order in terms and in toto by the Maritime Rights Order in Council of the 7th July 1916 is in itself a ground for construing the order of the 30th March 1916, wherever possible, as being something less than a revocation, and it is said that the order of July 1916 recognises that some part of the order of Oct. 1914 then still subsisted. In the Kronprinsessin Victoria (sup.) their Lordships observed that its whole tenor, the recitals, the repeal and the re-enactment are consistent only with the view that the order of the 29th Oct. 1914 had up to that date remained in full force and unaffected, and such was doubtless the view which those who framed that order in fact entertained. In the case of an Order in Council, however, the same weight does not attach to the view of the existing law adopted by its authors as attaches to the language of the Legislature when amending existing law, and in that case their Lordships had not to consider the order of the 30th March 1916 at all, and decided nothing about it. Doubts had arisen and continued to arise as to the effect of these Orders in Council and it might well be thought right ex abundanti cautela to declare in July 1916 finally and in the most general terms the revocation of an order, which had already been cancelled, not indeed in such downright language yet with sufficient clearness.

Accordingly the claim of Dahlen and Wahlstedt fails, and it is admitted that the claim of Bergman and Bergstrand is covered by the same considerations, for the shipper of the two parcels was the same person and an enemy—and no title having been acquired by Bergman and Bergstrand before the commencement of the voyage (subject to what is hereafter said upon the effect of a confirmed credit on the transaction) the enemy destination, which made Dahlen and Wahlstedt's parcel of conditional contraband liable to be condemned would also infect the parcel claimed by Bergman and Bergstrand and warrant its condemnation also as the property in it was, at the time of seizure, in the same owner as the property in the contraband parcel.

The peculiar conditions produced by the war have led to two new features in transatlantic commerce, not necessarily connected, but, as it happens, both present in these appeals. One is that all the insurances are effected in Europe by the consignees: the other that the consignor stipulates for a confirmed Bank credit, against which he draws. The first appears to have been due to the difficulty of covering the war risks in America; the second doubtless arose from the fact that commerce has been carried on in new channels and not always with persons of unimpeachable personal repute, and it had the additional advantage of minimising the inconvenience to the seller of sharp fluctuations in the rates of exchange. The question now raised is whether, under circumstances which include especially these two practices, an intention can be inferred to pass the property in cargo before the voyage commences, independently alike of payment for the property or delivery of documents. If it can, the neutral buyer, becoming owner from the neutral seller and shipper before the beginning of the transit to which the doctrine of infection applies, escapes from the risk of it. Further, in the two cases when the sellers and shippers were the enemy firm of Diebold and Co., the transaction of purchase would be complete before the point of time at which the rule against documentary transfer of goods afloat begins to apply. These points arise in the cases of The Parana, The Rena, and The Kronprinsessan Margareta, on her later voyage, but, as the facts are similar in all three, the argument was presented mainly on those of The Parana.

In the case of The Parana the terms stipulated on behalf of Urban and Co., the neutral sellers and shippers, were "cost and freight Gothenburg . . . reimbursement A-S on Malareprovinsernas Bank, Stockholm." The buyers applied to this bank to open a credit available to the sellers and to confirm to the latter the fact of their having done so, and they deposited a sum of money to make the credit effective. The bank did cable confirmation of this credit in the following terms: "Confirmed credit opened Kroners 100,000 account Lundgren Rollven against 2000 bags coffee shipment Parana." The shippers thereupon took bills of lading making the coffee deliverable to the consignees' order and sent them with an invoice and a sight draft for its amount, through collecting agents of their own, to be presented together to the bank in Sweden. The appellants contend that the effect of this transaction was that the property in the coffee passed from the sellers to the consignees before the commencement of the voyage and that infection has accordingly no application to their case.

The passing of property being a question of intention is ultimately a question of fact. There is no evidence of the intention of these parties beyond the inferences to be drawn from their situation and interests and from the mercantile operations which they conducted. What law they supposed would govern their transaction is not shown nor is any evidence given of the provisions of any foreign law, and, for the reasons given in The Parchim (sup.), the law to be applied must under these circumstances be that of England so far as the matter is one of law at all. That law has attached definite presumptions as to intention to definite courses of procedure and modes of expressing and dealing with common mercantile instruments.

If the shippers had insured the goods and had attached the policy to the draft, and if they had taken the bills of lading to their own order, no question could have arisen. Again, if in pursuance of the contract the consignees had insured for the benefit, as between buyer and seller, of whom it might concern, there would have been little doubt possible. Their Lordships will assume, because the argument appeared to assume on all hands, that the insurance effected in Europe was for the consignees' benefit only, though they are by no means satisfied that it was so, and that none was effected by or for the consignor. The importance, which always attaches to the incidence of insurance in international commerce, makes this a significant point.

Again, importance attaches to the fact that the shippers, having loaded the coffee on a general ship—a bailment to the carrier—took the bills of lading to the consignees' order. Without the consignees' indorsement they could not thereafter demand delivery ex ship as a matter of course, though without delivery of the bills of lading to the consignees they in their turn would not obtain delivery in the ordinary way of business. The 2000 bags bought by Lundgren and Rollven appear to have been part of a total quantity of 4000 bags shipped by Urban and Co. These bags were lettered and numbered in different ways, probably according to the place of origin and quality of the coffee, and, unless the other 2000 bags of similar coffee were nevertheless numbered and marked in a wholly dissimilar way of which there is no evidence, it would seem from the specification sent forward that specific bags were not appropriated to the contract of Lundgren and Rollven. Their contract was to be satisfied out of the bulk on discharge, and until some bags were then appropriated to the holders of their bills of lading, it could not be predicated of any particular bag that it was one of those deliverable to the order of Lundgren and Rollven. In the case of The Rena and The Kronprinsessan Margareta, however, it does not appear that there was any other cargo on board shipped by the same firm and forming a bulk of which the parcels in question were only an undivided part.

There seems no doubt that business of this kind was such as the Malareprovinsernas Bank was always ready to do for a respectable customer whose credit was good or who put it in funds for the purpose. The customer applying formally to the bank for the credit was in each case the buyer. There are some expressions in the letters of the sellers' agents in the case of the Parana, which suggest that they had made some arrangements on the seller's behalf with this bank prior to the completion of the agreement of sale, so as to ensure an available credit ready to be operated upon, but no such arrangement is forthcoming or is proved, nor is there any suggestion of it in the other cases, and it does not appear that anything more passed between the bank and the consignors than a cabled statement to the effect that "as requested we inform you that Lundgren and Rollven have opened a credit with us, out of which a draft with bills of lading can be met." Their Lordships are unable to infer that, by English law at any rate, any enforceable obligation arose between the consignors and this bank. There was no contract of guarantee. The Santos cargo certainly, and the Rio cargo in all probability also, was shipped before the credit was confirmed, for in the latter case the bill of lading and the confirmation of the credit are on the same day. No letter of credit was issued; no case of estoppel has been made, and indeed the facts stated by the bank were true; no request for shipment or consignment to the appellants was made by the bank; no promise to meet the draft as an obligation de futuro arose on any consideration moving from the consignors to the bank. Their Lordships do not doubt that in the ordinary course this bank—an institution against which nothing has been said or suggested—would scrupulously apply Messrs. Lundgren and Rollven's funds in their hands to meeting the consignors' draft, duly presented. Whether the bank could have resisted, if their customers had claimed to withdraw their funds before presentation of any draft, does not appear, but there is no need to suppose on either side any possibility of such a course being attempted. In the case of the Kronprinsessan Margareta the form of application to the bank provided for the irrevocability of the credit up to a certain time, and for this a blank was left but it is noticeable that Messrs. Bergman and Bergstrand did not fill up the blank. It is enough to say that no obligation on the bank to meet the draft, which the drawers of it could have enforced, is shown to have arisen. Not merely was there no payment of the consignors on shipment of the goods, there was not even material for a novation. In spite of the confirmation of the credit they were and remained unpaid vendors till a much later date.

Now two things are quite plain. The consignors did not propose at any time to rely for payment on the mere personal credit of the consignees, and they carefully kept the bills of lading in their own agents' hands until the draft was met: (see Moakes v. Nicholson (12 L. T. Rep. 573; 19 C. B. N. S. 290). But for the absence of a policy of insurance they strictly pursued the same course of dealing with the documents, as if there had been a c.f. and i. sale.

In these circumstances what can be inferred as to the passing of the general property? What is there to show an intention to pass that property for anything less than payment, and what motive is there for such an intention? The appellants, Messrs. Lundgren and Rollven, have to show that it passed to them and passed, too, before the beginning of the voyage. If it did, then the consignors no longer owned the goods and had nothing to show against them except a draft of their own, which could not be enforced, and a bill of lading, which would not entitle them to delivery of the goods, though its retention might seriously inconvenience the new owners, the consignees. Rights to stop in transitu or to exercise an unpaid vendors' lien need hardly be discussed, for, on a question of intention in fact as to which there is a good deal of evidence, it would be artificial to assume that the consignors' minds were actually determined to the contrary by consideration of legal remedies, of which it is not shown that they had any knowledge, let the legal presumption be what it will. It is said that, as a matter of business, the confirmed credit relieved the consignors of all further concern in the goods, for they could have no doubt that they would be paid by the bank in any event and that the failure to insure is proof positive of this. It may be so, though their Lordships do not desire to express any opinion as to the rights of the parties if the coffee were known to be already lost at the time of the presentation of the draft, but it seems clear that the consignors desired to retain an interest in the goods, otherwise why should they retain the bills of lading in their agents' hands? It is said that this only points to an intention to reserve a special property as security, but the omission to insure would be equally significant in this case, and there is no reason why, as a matter of actual intent, a special and not the general property should have been reserved. The case might be very different if the bills of lading had been forwarded to Lundgren and Rollven direct (Ex parte Banner; Re Tappenbeck, 34 L. T. Rep. 199; L. Rep. 2 Ch. Div. 278). As it is, Shepherd v. Harrison (24 L. T. Rep. 857; L. Rep. 5 H. L. 116), would surely apply, if on presentation of the bills of lading with the draft there had been a retention of the first without payment of the second. There may be explanations of the shipper's election to be his own insurer of the coffee till the sight draft should be met, but, however this may be, there is nothing to outweigh the significance of a dealing with the documents so nearly identical with that in an ordinary transaction c.f. and i.

No authority was forthcoming, which proved to be completely in point. Cases, in which it has been held that taking the bill of lading in the shipper's own name negatives any unconditional appropriation to the buyer by the delivery of the goods on shipboard and indicates one conditional on the documents being taken up, can throw only an indirect light on the question here involved. Certainly no case was found, in which it was held that taking the bill of lading in the buyer's name, while withholding delivery of it until presentation and taking up of the documents, would not be, as an appropriation, equally conditional. Much reliance was placed on The Parchim (sup.) a case not only decided on very special facts, but on facts so different from those arising in the present appeal as not in any way to rule it. That case did not in any degree substitute the incidence of the risk for the passing of the general property as the test to be applied.

There the sellers of the entire cargo of a named ship took the bills of lading to their own order, but it was held that the presumption of an intention to retain the property till something was done by the buyer after shipment was rebutted by the special circumstances of the case. The contract was unusual. It was on cost and freight terms, but was by no means similar to that now under discussion. With the exception of the form of the bills of lading, which itself was determined by the sellers' agent without either particular instructions or actual knowledge of the terms of the contract, everything pointed to the intention that the property should pass to the buyer on shipment, though he was only to have possession of the cargo and of the bills of lading representing it, on subsequently paying the price. Special significance was attached to the fact that, on shipment or at least on notification of it, the cargo was to be at the buyer's risk and he had to pay, lost or not lost. Meantime the documents were held by a bank in medio, neither to be transferred to the buyers without payment, nor to be placed at the sellers' disposal, unless and until the buyers failed to take them up. Incidentally it may be observed that, although the loading was only completed after the outbreak of war, the interval was short, the shipment was made in pursuance of a contract entered into before the war, and no point was taken on behalf of the captors, even if any arose, as to the passing of property afloat during the war from an enemy seller to a neutral buyer by delivery of documents. The case does not purport to lay down any general rule, that a particular mode of dealing with a bill of lading must, whenever it occurs and in whatever circumstances, always prove a particular intention. It is not an authority for the contention, that if the bill of lading is taken in the buyer's name this necessarily proves that the goods shipped are appropriated to the contract, and delivered to the captain as the buyer's bailee, with a consequent inference of the passing of the property to the buyer on shipment.

In the present case it appears to their Lordships that the retention by the seller of the bill of lading was inconsistent with an intention to pass the property. They think that it was "clearly intended by the consignor to preserve his title to the goods until he did a further act by transferring the bill of lading." The special circumstance of the existence of a confirmed banker's credit in this case is only indirectly relevant. It no doubt enhances the likelihood that the bills of lading will eventually be taken up and the goods be paid for, and so diminishes the importance to the seller of being still able to say that the goods are his, but it is not direct evidence of intention; it is only a reason why a particular intention is more likely to have been formed in such a case than in others. The intention has still to be inferred, principally from what was done and from the communications made with reference to it, and these point to an intention not to pass the property till the drafts were paid, and it is really rather a reason for intending to get the documents presented and taken up as soon as possible, than for an intention not to retain the ownership even until that could be effected. If the seller was paid or was holder of an enforcible contract from a bank for payment, the sooner he passed the property the better, for he was uninsured, but if he was neither he gained nothing by passing the property away. It was not onerous property.

In one respect the appeal succeeds. Of the two shipments by the Parana, the draft for the 1000 bags shipped at Santos was met by the Swedish bank a fortnight before the ship was seized. Thereupon the appellants Lundgren and Rollven became the owners, and there was not any common ownership of this parcel with an infecting parcel at the time of the seizure to justify the condemnation of this 1000 bags. The decree appealed against in this case will, therefore, be varied by ordering the release of this parcel, but as this success is very partial, their Lordships think that it should not affect the costs. As to the other parcel, Lundgren and Rollven fail because the goods at the date of seizure were in the same ownership, namely that of Urban and Co., as the contraband parcel intended for Hyllen and Kock, which was condemned, and are infected, the Declaration of Paris notwithstanding. Mattsson, Peterzens and Co. fail for the same reasons. They too acquired title only after seizure and, at the time of the seizure, the goods were liable to condemnation. Bergman and Bergstrand fail because Dahlen and Wahlstedt's parcel, not being protected by the Order in Council, infected the rest of Diebold's coffee, and they cannot claim recognition of an ownership which was not acquired by payment till after seizure, and then was only effected by documentary transfer of goods afloat. The claims of Engwall, Berg and Hallgren, Levander, and Ofverstrom must be dismissed, for their ownership only arises by documentary transfer of the goods while afloat, which was only effected after seizure, and the goods, when seized, belonged to the owners of a parcel of conditional contraband in the same ship, which had an ulterior enemy destination.

The appeal in the case of the Hilding may be dealt with shortly. It relates to 200 cases of fatbacks and 100 of clear bellies in their nature conditional contraband, and covered by bills of lading making them deliverable to Paulsen and Co., as consignees. The 200 cases of fatbacks were the balance of a larger parcel, some of which Paulsen and Co. had appropriated to Weimann and Co., and some to Henrik Lucas as sub-purchasers under contracts previously made. That the goods had an ulterior enemy destination was not disputed before their Lordships, but they were shipped by neutrals on a neutral ship plying between neutral ports and were seized while the Declaration of London Order No. 2 of the 29th Oct. 1914 was in force. The appellants, Paulsen and Co., claimed to have bought and paid for the goods and to have become invested with the property in them before seizure. There were on board the Hilding also the other cases, which E. L. Weimann and Co. and Henrik Lucas purported to have purchased from Paulsen and Co., and the claims to these were put in by Weimann and Co. and Lucas and not by Messrs. Paulsen. To these no claimant appeared at the hearing, and the president, Sir Samuel Evans, being satisfied that they had an ulterior enemy destination condemned them. He further held that at the time of seizure the property in this parcel had not passed out of Paulsen and Co., and concluded that its condemnation in any case involved the condemnation on the gound of infection of the parcel of goods now claimed by Paulsen and Co., even assuming that they had proved the ownership to be in themselves. The President further, though his exact finding is somewhat uncertain, does not appear to have been satisfied that Paulsen and Co ever acquired the property in any of the goods above mentioned.

It is impossible for their Lordships to review the decision of the President that the goods claimed in the name of Weimann and Co. and of their sub-purchasers were to be condemned. The statistical case made by the Crown was sufficient, unless answered, to prove the destination in Hamburg and no one appeared to answer it in support of the claim. Paulsen and Co. found it necessary to elect whether they should say that as to this parcel they were owners no longer, or that they were owners still. They chose the former course and made no claim; they cannot now be heard to make the claim, which they would have made before the President, if they had chosen the latter.

Again, in proving their case before him they set up that they had sold to Weimann and Co. and had been paid before seizure, but before the Prize Court they never gave the date of the payment, which in the usual mercantile course, applicable to this transaction, was the crucial matter. Their Lordships could not allow them to mend their hand and endeavour to supply this deficiency on the appeal. Nor are the inferences satisfactory, which were drawn from certain intercepted messages referring to some customer as having "taken up" some "documents," that remained unidentified. They find it impossible, therefore, to say that the President was wrong in finding that the ownership in the Weimann parcel had not passed from Paulsen and Co. before seizure.

Paulsen and Co. were in fact the persons to whom the goods were consigned in name and in the bill of lading. Were they, however, consignees having actual control, or were they merely intermediaries introduced as the creatures of others? The President does not expressly find either, but it is clear that he found the entire position of Paulsen and Co. to be ambiguous and unsatisfactory. On consideration of the evidence their Lordships also are not satisfied that Paulsen and Co. really controlled either the goods or their destination. The burden of proof was on them, and it is only by inference that the President's judgment is suggested to find anything in their favour. It never does so in terms: it expresses doubt as to the passing of the property from Crossman and Sielcken, the shippers, at all. There is ground for thinking that not Paulsen and Co., but some other party provided the funds required and that they were only intermediaries acting as they might be directed. It cannot be said that they have discharged the burden of proof in fact, and accordingly there is no sufficient ground for arriving on appeal at a finding of fact in their favour at which the late President could not bring himself to arrive.

This makes it unnecessary to decide the point which was raised, that the naming of the consignee in the bill of lading to which the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914, refers, only avails to protect contraband goods from condemnation as contraband and cannot be extended to the further waiver by the Crown of its right to claim the condemnation on the ground of infection by goods in the same bottom and in the same ownership with goods which are contraband. Accordingly Messrs. Paulsen and Co.'s appeal fails.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the order appealed from in the case of the Parana ought to be varied by discharging so much of the decree as condemns the 1000 bags shipped at Santos and by directing their release or payment of their appraised value to the parties who claimed them, without costs, but that otherwise all these appeals should be dismissed with costs.

THE FALK AND OTHER SHIPS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Seizure of contraband goods—Evidence of reasonable suspicion—Detention and refusal to release—Disclosure of documents—Discontinuance of proceedings—Licence required to remove goods—Interest on proceeds.

It is not a general rule that whenever the Crown has had the benefit of goods seized the claimant is entitled to interest if the goods are released to him.

In 1915 tanning materials belonging to the appellants, a Swedish firm, were seized on board certain vessels on their way from America to Sweden as absolute contraband with an enemy destination. The matter was eventually settled and the Procurator discontinued his proceedings in 1919.

The appellants claimed damages for the capture and detention of the goods and for the inaction of the Procurator-General after the appellants had disclosed their documents to him and had satisfied his requisitions.

Held, that as there were reasonable grounds for the original seizure, and subsequent proceedings, and as there had been no delay for indirect objects or from mere neglect and there were materials proper to be examined judicially, the Procurator-General was not liable to the appellants for damages for the seizure and detention.

A decree for the release of goods does not warrant actual ability to remove them from the realm, and the Procurator-General is not liable for a loss on the goods owing to a statutory restriction upon their export.

Judgment of the Prize Court affirmed.

APPEAL from a decree of Sir Henry Duke, P., rejecting a claim by the appellants, a Swedish company, to recover against the Procurator-General damages and costs in respect of the seizure and detention of a quantity of tanning materials shipped from the United States in the Falk and seven other neutral vessels, and consigned to Swedish ports.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Spence for the appellants.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and T. Mathew for the Procurator-General.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by

Lord SUMNER.—In Nov. 1915 the claimants, old-established dealers in hides and tanning materials in Sweden, bought for the purposes of their trade 500 tons of quebracho extract and 1000 tons of chestnut extract from James Meyer, of Copenhagen, which Meyer in his turn bought from Schmoll Fils et Compagnie, of Paris, Basle, and New York.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The goods began to come forward almost at once, and eight vessels with parcels of them on board were brought into British ports between the end of that month and the early part of the following May. In due course writs were issued against them as having an ulterior enemy destination in Hamburg. They had been conditional contraband since the 11th March 1915, and became absolute contraband before the seizure. In the cases of the first five vessels to be detained and of the last but one, the shippers named in the bills of lading were Schmoll Fils et Compagnie, and in the other two the National Export and Import Company, both of New York. In the cases of the first and second the consignee named in the bills of lading was Otto Zell, a forwarding agent at Gothenburg. The claimants themselves were named as consignees in the other cases and they duly appeared and claimed the goods in all.

An assiduous and intelligent agent was then employed, who made it his business to procure all documents relating to the matter and to put them at the disposal of the Procurator-General in numerous bundles and portfolios, and the Procurator-General devoted the Christmas holidays of 1916 to their perusal. Assuming them to have been the same as those again submitted shortly before the trial, they filled thirty-four volumes; even those printed in the record, though but a small part of the whole, occupy 450 printed pages.

Accordingly the Procurator-General decided to try to settle the case. At this time neither quebracho extract nor chestnut extract could be exported from the United Kingdom except by special licence, by virtue of a proclamation dated the 3rd Feb. 1915, and of an Order in Council dated the 18th March 1915, issued under the Customs and Inland Revenue Acts of 1879, the Customs (Exportation Prohibition) Act of 1914 and other statutes. He informed the claimants' solicitors of these facts, of which they presumably were and certainly might have been already aware, and offered that the War Office should purchase the goods at the duly authorised price and that the proceedings for condemnation should be discontinued. The claimants insisted on their right to damages and stipulated that both the sale and the discontinuance should be without prejudice to their claims. This was agreed to in letters dated the 26th April and 1st Oct. 1917, and the Procurator-General discontinued his proceedings by leave on the 28th July 1919. Thereafter the suit continued for the claimants' benefit only; they were the actors and the parties to take the conduct of it and to press it on. When their claims came to trial they failed. The President decided that, as regards both the original seizure and the subsequent proceedings, what had been done was done on reasonable grounds and was therefore excusable. Hence this appeal.

There can be no doubt that the appellants have suffered a loss which is regrettable and large. Some four years elapsed between the seizure and the judgment. Their costs have been heavy and they allege that they have had to pay interest to Meyer, their vendor. Above all, the difference between the price which they obtained in England, and that obtainable if they had sold the goods in Sweden, as they meant to do, was on so large a quantity very great.

Their Lordships, however, do not wish it to be supposed that in their apprehension of the matter these large sums could in any case have been chargeable against the Procurator-General. Strictly speaking, only liability is in issue now. If that could be established, it would be for the registrar and merchants to assess the damages payable for proceedings taken without sufficient grounds, which deprived the claimants of the possession and control of their goods. So much, however, has been said of the commissions and omissions of the Procurator-General, as the occasion, if not the cause, of this great loss, that their Lordships think it would be misleading to pass over in silence the contention which has been raised.

No doubt the effect of sending the vessels in for further inquiry was to bring this cargo within the ambit of the prohibition of export of tanning materials, but it does not follow that all the claimants' loss thereby can be thrown on the captors. The same misfortune would have fallen on them if the vessels had come into a British port of refuge and had there discharged the goods. Further, under a proper licence export would have been permitted, but the claimants never applied for that licence or ascertained whether it could have been obtained or not. So far they are presumably the authors of their own injury. Besides, the measure of damage, applicable to conversion or detinue of their goods or to failure to deliver them under a contract of sale in an action brought in a municipal court, may be no guide in a claim against captors, without proof of special circumstances. As for loss of interest the claimants' relations with Meyer are remote matters and it was in any case for them to take steps to minimise this and other losses. They seem to have done nothing.

The authorities may be referred to briefly. The foundation of the right, variously expressed in different cases, may be said to be the existence of reasonable suspicion, it may be of illegitimate traffic, it may be of enemy character, it may be of illegal action or service or what not, but there must be such suspicion as warrants inquiry into the facts and adjudication upon them by a properly constituted court: (see the judgment of Story, J. in The George, 1815, 1 Mason, 24, quoted with approval in The Ostsee, 9 Moo. 150). Even slight grounds of suspicion may suffice. In The Elizabeth (1809, 1 Acton, 10) the reason given by the Lords of Appeal for condemning the captors in costs was that there appeared to be scarcely any ground for detaining the vessel. The Judicial Committee's judgment in The Baron Stjernblad (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; 117 L. T. Rep. 743; (1918) A. C. 173) develops the matter. In a case where it has become apparent by statistical evidence or otherwise that a considerable proportion of the collective imports into a neighbouring neutral country of a particular commodity, which is in its nature contraband, does in fact proceed by a continuous transit into the enemy territory, any particular importer of such goods belongs to a class of importers some of whom at any rate must be obviously engaged in contraband trade. Suspicion then attaches to all, and the question is one of the existence of reasonable suspicion, not of the possession of proof attaching that suspicion to a particular member of the class.

The suspicion, for example, attaches to the particular goods by reason of the circumstance connected with the class of goods generally that it is in its nature contraband. Those who seize on the grounds of reasonable suspicion are entitled to the benefit of such evidence as other officers of the Crown may possess as to ulterior destination, and are not limited by the information, or the lack of it, to be found in the ship s papers themselves. Neither at the actual time of seizure nor in the conduct of the proceedings is the officer responsible called upon to constitute himself judge or justified in doing so. The decision, if grounds for seizure existed, must in general rest with the court, and the court is also peculiarly the tribunal to determine any questions of suggested delay in the proceedings. The judgment in The Ostsee (9 Moo. 150) is the standard authority on all these matters. It points out that the ship (and equally the cargo) "may be involved with little or no fault on her part in such suspicions as to make it the right or even the duty of a belligerent to seize her"; nor is it possible to lay down by any exact definition what the circumstances are that will justify capture or excuse it if no condemnation follows. Even if the circumstances known by the captor at the time of the first detention are not so founded in fact as to serve as an excuse, he may still avail himself for this purpose of other grounds subsequently brought to his knowledge, as he could have done if he had proceeded and obtained condemnation. "It is not necessary," says Sir W. Scott in The Juffrow Maria Schroeder (3 C. Rob. 152), "that the captor should have assigned any cause at the time of capture; he takes at his peril and on his own responsibility," and from this it must follow that after-acquired knowledge is available for the one purpose or for the other. It is a fallacy to suppose that suspicion can only be reasonable in so far as there are facts before the mind of the person who suspects, and that accordingly no facts learnt subsequently are available to excuse a seizure. The present is not a case of arbitrary or capricious arrest, ventured on the hazard that a case for conviction may ultimately turn up. Nor can it be said of it that there were no "circumstances connected with the ship or cargo affording reasonable ground for belief that one or both or some part of the cargo might prove upon further inquiry to be lawful prize: (The Ostsee, 9 Moo. at p. 162.)

The liability of the Procurator-General, if any, has been rightly presented under two heads: the first, liability for the original seizure; the second, liability in respect of the course taken in the legal proceedings. Somewhat different considerations no doubt arise in the two cases. The original seizure takes place before the particular circumstances have been inquired into; the suit is prosecuted after materials have been collected and time has been allowed for their examination. The element of mere suspicion, so prominent when first the prize is brought in, diminishes as investigation proceeds and proof takes its place. The prospect of the discovery of substantial evidence is one that can be weighed by those in charge of the case for the Crown. It follows, in their Lordships' opinion, that a point must ultimately be reached, at which, without purporting to act as a judge, the Procurator-General should decide for himself whether to go on or not. This obligation is all the more important because of the change of practice, necessitated by changed circumstances, which authorises the collection of material at large and its presentation by both sides instead of deciding the question of release or detention, in the first instance, only on evidence coming from the ship.

It was not contended at the bar that the liability under the first head was to be considered simply as at the time when the vessels were first diverted, or simply upon the information then present to the minds of the actual officers who ordered the diversion. Counsel recognised that, under the conditions imposed by modern warfare during the late war, the question should be considered in the light of the information available to the Procurator-General and his assistants at the time when the effective decision was taken to detain the goods for the purpose of condemnation in prize, that is, substantially, at the dates of the writs. At the trial evidence was given, in the usual form of information obtained and communications intercepted, with regard to the parties connected or apparently connected with these shipments. It is true that it was given in affidavits recently sworn, which did not in all cases specify the dates at which particular events relied upon had first become known to the authorities concerned. The President, however, gave attention to these points, for he discarded some matters on the ground that they were after-acquired information and assumed that others only were available at the critical time, and, as the claimants do not appear to have pressed that the Procurator-General should be more specific in the matter of dates, the objection has little weight now.

It appears, then, that when the several proceedings were begun the following matters were available for consideration. The goods were contraband goods of a kind often and largely sent on a continuous transit from the United States through Sweden to Germany, where they were scarce and dear. They were going to Gothenburg, a place of import for goods intended for Swedish consumption, but convenient also and often used for this ulterior trade. The National Export and Import Company of New York had been concerned in it, and so had Otto Zell, who furthermore was a forwarding agent for others, and in fact had no interest in the claimants' goods, and an intercepted message had given ground for expecting large quantities of quebracho extract to be sent shortly from Schmoll Fils et Compagnie to Scandinavian ports for account of James Meyer, though it was not yet known, or is not shown to have been known at the time in question, that Meyer was the claimants' vendor in respect of these very consignments.

Under these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that they cannot question the President's conclusion as to the existence of sufficient grounds for the detention. Although in the long run condemnation could not be hoped for, still, when the goods were placed in prize there was probable cause for a judicial inquiry with a view to their condemnation. It is not a case like The Ostsee (sup.), where the detention, though honestly made, was made on a ground which in fact had no existence. Nor is it such a case as is there mentioned as possible of a seizure "where not only is the ship in no fault, but she is not by any act of her own open to any fair ground of suspicion." In such cases (and the proposition applies equally to goods) the belligerent may seize at his peril and take the chance of something appearing on investigation to justify the capture, but failure is visited with the liability to pay damages and costs. Nor was the case merely one of goods going to a geographical neighbour of Germany or of goods going to a port whence they could easily be sent on. Of all the goods, in their nature contraband, which went to that port, some, perhaps many, parcels certainly had Germany as their ultimate destination, and large profits awaited any neutral consignees who sent them there. As for the goods themselves, some came from and some went to persons known to be engaged in the trade. Their Lordships cannot doubt that, as regards all their consignments, the claimants were rightly brought into court to explain where they were really going to.

As the second part of their case the appellants claim damages for the action or the inaction of the Procurator-General after they had disclosed their documents to him and had satisfied his requisitions. They say that it then became his duty to obtain the prompt and effective release of the cargo, and, if necessary, to apply for and to procure a licence to export it. They even aver, as a ground for claiming all damages consequent upon the detention of the goods, that if the prohibition so stood in the way of the fullest benefit being derived from a decree of release, the Prize Court was bound to restore the position in their favour by requiring the Procurator-General to pay compensation, because another, and the appropriate, department had failed to exercise its discretion in the manner desired.

Their Lordships think that in principle these contentions fail. The greater the mass of transactions to be inquired into, the more astute the schemes of contraband traders, the more enlarged the available sources of information and the means of making it subserve the discovery of truth, the more is it necessary that the Procurator-General should have all proper opportunity of preparing the case for submission to the court, free from the insistent pressure of a liability in damages and costs, so long as he has not been guilty of delay for indirect objects or from mere neglect, and has materials which are proper to be examined judicially. It is not suggested against the Procurator-General that he protracted the proceedings in bad faith or maliciously, or in fact at all. His good faith is indeed conspicuous throughout. When he offered a settlement, the claimants, under advice, entertained it without protest and shortly accepted it. They reserved their existing claims, but they made no allegation of any fresh ground of complaint. The Procurator-General is not a judge; neither to the Crown, to the court, nor to the claimants does he owe any duty to decide questions, which are for the court, nor is he entitled to proceed only when he has a personal conviction upon the question in suit. His duty is to act reasonably. Even where the paucity of the evidence for condemnation or the abundance of the evidence in reply would lead the Procurator-General, as a reasonable man, to abandon any further attempt to obtain a condemnation, there is no authority for saying that the ship or cargo will be detained thereafter at his expense in damages, and that the application for release is merely a protective step for him to take in self-defence. It is equally a step which the claimant can take and ought to take to mitigate his damages. As to this the Procurator-General duly applied for a discontinuance of his own part of the proceedings. Before he did so the claimants had made no application to the court, so far as the record shows, to accelerate their course, and after that discontinuance they were themselves domini litis. He was under no obligation towards them to apply for an export licence, and, if none was forthcoming, he came under no liability in consequence. Instead of applying for a licence themselves, as they were free to do, the appellants preferred to sell the goods to the War Office and to take their chance of obtaining damages on some ground at the trial.

A passage in the judgment of Sir Samuel Evans in The Kron Prinz Gustav Adolf (2 Br. & Col. P. C. 418) is relied on as laying down a rule that the Procurator-General must within a reasonable time after getting full information into his hands decide whether he has a case for condemnation or not, so that if he has none he may apply for the release of the res, and that, if he fails to do so, he proceeds or delays to discontinue at his personal risk as to damages. The point does not seem to have been argued; the proposition intended to be laid down is by no means clearly expressed, and it has been doubted whether anything more was intended than to give interest in the particular case to mitigate exceptional hardship: (The Dirigo, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 121 L. T. Rep. 477; (1919) P. at p. 227). Their Lordships agree with the view expressed by Lord Sterndale in that case that, if the decision in question purported to lay down a general rule that "whenever the Crown had the benefit of the money they ought to pay interest to the claimant when an order of release was made," the decision so far cannot be supported.

It may be that there are cases so plain that to keep them up is patently unreasonable and some mulct, probably in costs, should be the consequence of undue tenacity. Deliberate procrastination or a scheme for delay would, of course, be a wholly different matter. Where, however, there is a real question of law, a conflict of testimony or a genuine doubt as to the inference to be drawn from ascertained facts, the Procurator-General is not to be visited with costs or damages merely on the ground that he submits it to the judgment of the court, instead of taking the decision into his own hands. He is entitled to have genuine doubts cleared up by the claimant to the satisfaction of the court. The duty of a neutral claimant to explain what is doubtful or obscure in his conduct or position for the enlightenment and decision of the court has been laid down in The Louisiana (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; 118 L. T. Rep. 274; (1918) A. C. 261, at p. 464): "In the Prize Court a neutral trader is not in the position of a person charged with a criminal offence and presumed to be innocent unless his guilt is established beyond reasonable doubt. He comes before the Prize Court to show that there was no reasonable suspicion justifying the seizure or to displace such reasonable suspicion as in fact exists. The State of his captors is necessarily unable to investigate the relations between the neutral trader and his correspondents in enemy or neutral countries; but the neutral trader is, or ought to be, in a position to explain doubtful points."

It would be inconsistent to hold that the Procurator-General is bound to forestall that decision, or permitted to seek it in a genuinely doubtful case only at his own personal risk.

The settlement, into which the appellants entered even though made without prejudice and accompanied by a reservation of their rights as to damages, took place before, or at any rate no later than, the earliest date at which it can be said that the Procurator-General ought to have concluded that he had no case to go upon, and it is from this settlement and sale that nearly all the damages incurred by the appellants have arisen. Further, it put them in no better position than they would have been in if they had received the goods themselves under a decree for their release instead of receiving the proceeds of their sale to the War Office. A decree for release does not warrant actual ability to remove the goods from the realm. This might be impossible for want of bunker coals or of labour or of repairs, and yet it could not be said that the redress given by the Prize Court was made inefficacious by reason of something of which that court ought to take notice. As is assumed in The Dusseldorf (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478; 15 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 84; (1920) A. C. 1034), release means release out of the custody of the marshal in this country, where the goods are, and it is for the owner of them to arrange to remove or dispose of them as he can. The Court of Prize cannot give itself a more extensive jurisdiction in cases where the neutral is unable to remove his property out of the realm, or award damages against the Procurator-General for consequences arising from matters to which he is a stranger, merely because he and the officers of the customs are alike in the service of the Crown. As a matter of fact, in this case the prohibition on export was duly made under statutory authority, and the question of granting a licence to export was not raised, but had it been otherwise the claimants should have sought their remedy, if any, against the officials actually concerned, in the ordinary courts of the country. An imaginary case was put of sovereign power being used to thwart neutral claimants, to stultify the Prize Court and to defeat the benefit of adjudication in prize, by an executive prohibition of the export of any and every subject matter released. Their Lordships cannot entertain so far-fetched a case. Should it ever arise the courts of the country concerned will be most fitted to pass upon it. The jurisdiction of the Court of Prize is to condemn or to release, not to override the executive after release has taken place. It is bound by the statutes of this country, in which it sits, and cannot interfere with acts done under Proclamations or Orders in Council validly issued by virtue of those statutes. If this is so, it cannot do indirectly what it has no power to do directly, and give damages against the Crown in prize because it had no power to give to the successful claimants permission to export.

Their Lordships are accordingly of opinion that neither in respect of the original detention of their goods nor of his subsequent conduct in the proceedings in prize can the Procurator-General be made liable in damages or costs, and they will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Jan. 14 and 17, 1921.

(Before Lord STERNDALE, M.R., WARRINGTON and SCRUTTON, L.JJ.)

THE TURID. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Charter-party — Expense of unloading timber — "Cargo to be taken from alongside at charterers' expense as customary"—Custom of port of Yarmouth—Custom inconsistent with term of charter-party.

By a charter-party of the 1st Oct. 1914 it was agreed between the plaintiffs, the owners, and the defendants, the charterers, that the steamship T. should load a cargo of timber at Soroka for carriage to Yarmouth and deliver there "as ordered, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat"; and that the cargo should be "taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." The T. was ordered to discharge at a part of the quay occupied by the charterers, to which she was always afloat unable to get nearer than about 13*ft., and the cargo was there discharged by stagings slung from the ship's side to the quay, the stevedore's men working in two gangs, one carrying the timber to the ship's rail and the other carrying it ashore. It was proved that there was a custom of the port of Yarmouth that the whole of this work should be done by and at the cost of the ship. The shipowners objected that the alleged custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and sued the charterers to recover the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail.*

Held, that the case was indistinguishable from Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1877) and that the court were bound by that case to hold that the custom was inconsistent with the charter-party; and that the shipowners were entitled to recover from the charterers the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail.

Decision of the Divisional Court (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 155; 122 L. T. Rep. 587) affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants, the charterers, from a decision of the Divisional Court (Duke, P. and Hill, J.) who followed the decision of the Court of Appeal in Holman v. Wade (sup.).

The facts appear sufficiently from the headnote.

Raeburn, K.C. and J. G. Trapnell for the respondents.

Lord STERNDALE, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court, sitting in Admiralty, in favour of the shipowners in respect of a claim for certain expenses incurred in discharging the steamship Turid. She went to Soroka under a charter by which she was to load a cargo of timber, and being so loaded, to proceed to Great Yarmouth as ordered, or as near thereunto as she could safely get, and deliver the same afloat. The charter also provided that the cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." The facts, after the ship arrived at Yarmouth, as stated by the learned President, were as follow: "The draught of the Turid was such that to be afloat at Yarmouth she could not come within about 13ft. of the quayside at which she was to discharge. The usual method of unloading for a ship so situated is to erect stagings between the ship's side and the edge of the quay, abreast of the several holds, such stagings being constructed of baulks of timber carried from the quay to the ship's side at a level of 4ft. or 5ft. below the rail. with planks resting upon the baulks. The Turid had three holds, and three stagings were erected. At each staging one gang of men carried the timber to the ship's rail, and another gang received it there, carried it ashore, and stacked it at a distance of some 12ft. from the face of the quay. Stacking of timber nearer the water side was not permitted, as free passage way had to be kept there. The cost in question was the cost of erecting the stagings, carrying the timber across the stagings, and across the 10ft. or 12ft. of quay, and stacking it. Before the learned judge in the County Court proof was given of a custom of the port of Yarmouth that the whole of this work should be done by, and at the cost of, the ship. It was objected, on the part of the shipowners, the plaintiffs, that the alleged custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and the learned judge took this view and gave judgment in their favour for the sum in dispute."

In my opinion, this case is governed by the decision in Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1877), and that being so, I do not think it necessary or indeed advisable, to express any opinion of my own as to what my decision might have been if I had not thought the case to be governed by Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1887). The two learned judges in he Divisional Court differed with regard to that matter, the President being of opinion that the custom was inconsistent with the charter, while Hill, J. was of opinion that he would have held that it was not inconsistent if he had not been bound by Holman v. Wade (sup.). There is a great deal to be said on both sides, and I do not think it necessary or right to express any opinion upon it.

Holman v. Wade (sup.) is only reported in an unsatisfactory manner, that is to say, it is only reported as a piece of news in a newspaper. Counsel for the appellants referred to it as an ancient case which had been disinterred from the rest where it had lain so long. It surprised me to find after that that it was decided in 1877, a date well within the recollection of, at any rate, one member of the bench. It is reported in The Times newspaper only; why, I do not know, and I think it is very unsatisfactory to find oneself bound by a case not fully reported, and as to which we have not full and proper knowledge. But the case has been referred to and dealt with in various other cases. I do not think any opinion has been expressed with regard to it in the Court of Appeal here, although it came before the Court of Appeal in Ireland, but it has been cited from time to time in courts of first instance. It has been followed in a case to which I shall refer directly, and so far as I know, no disapproval of it has ever been expressed. The difficulty about it is to ascertain exactly what it did decide. It was a case at Hull, where the shipowners were claiming for the expense of discharging in circumstances very similar to those of this case. In answer to that claim, the defendants set up a custom which is pleaded in the defence as follows: "It is the customary and recognised mode of discharge of the Victoria Docks at Hull for ships laden with timber to discharge their cargo upon the quay alongside, and to continue the discharge as long as there is quay space vacant for the discharge thereof, and the cargo is then taken from alongside by the consignees thereof." The custom is rather curiously expressed, but I think what it means is that when the cargo has been discharged upon the quay, and not until then, it has been discharged alongside, and that the consignees taking it from there are taking it from alongside. It rather appears as though the custom which had been put to the jury was not exactly the custom in the terms there pleaded, because in the associate's certificate this appears: "The jury found that according to the terms of the charter-party (apart from the question of usage or custom) the cargo was not to be taken by the shipowner from the ship's rail by means of a stage, supplied by him, to the quay, and there stacked by and at the risk and expense of the shipowner: that was to be done by and at the risk of and expense of the merchants." I rather infer that that was the custom that had been put to the jury, and if so it is not exactly in the terms of the defence. The jury also found "that the alleged usage or custom is proved to their satisfaction." On that Manisty, J. entered judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground that the custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

Holman v. Wade (sup.) has been cited as a decision upon the question whether a custom to stack could be a good custom. That, I suppose, means stacking after complete delivery had taken place, and it was attempted to distinguish this case on that ground. I do not think it is distinguishable on that ground for two reasons: One is that the expense which was sued for in the action, a small sum, was an expense both of stacking and unloading. I was taking the words "stacking and unloading" from the report in the Times, but it is more accurate to take it from the pleadings in that case: "They were forced to discharge the said cargo and stack the same on the said quay, and thereby incurred expenses amounting to 11*l*." The whole of that expense was given to the plaintiff. If it had been stacking alone, of course, the expense, small as it was, ought to have been divided, and only the stacking expenses should have been given to the plaintiffs; but I also notice that in the report in the Times it is stated that it is necessary in order to unload deals to have a stage from the quay to the ship, and as the deals are unloaded and the ship, being lightened, rises, it is necessary to raise the stage and it is necessary also as the deals are landed to stack them, and all this involves considerable expense." I gather from that that it is not meant that, after there had been a complete delivery, the merchants were asking the shipowners to stack, in the sense that they wanted them to stack and mark qualities or sizes or anything of that kind, but that in the course of delivery it was necessary to stack, because a large quantity of timber cannot be thrown loose upon the quay, as it would take up an unnecessary amount of room. The stacking, I think, was considered as part of the putting upon the quay—part of the delivery.

For these reasons I do not think that that case can be distinguished from this on the ground that it related to stacking only. If it cannot be so distinguished it seems to me to be exactly in point here. It has been acted upon in The Nifa (69 L. T. Rep. 56; (1892) P. 411; 7 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 327) in the Admiralty Divisional Court, and whether it be inconsistent with the decision of Bigham, J. in Stephens v. Wintringham (1898, 3 Com. Cas. 169) or not, it is not a matter that it is necessary for us to consider here. I can see points of distinction between that case and this; but whether Stephens v. Wintringham (sup.) can be reconciled with Holman v. Wade (sup.) or not, in my opinion, the decision in the case before us cannot be distinguished from that in Holman v. Wade (sup.). Therefore, I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—I agree. I also think that we are bound by the decision in Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1887). It is quite true that the report of Holman v. Wade is somewhat unsatisfactory, and the rest of the materials for considering that case are afforded only by the record. But this, at all events, is clear both from the report and from the record, that the question between the parties was, who was to pay the expense of the process by which, according to the alleged custom, the cargo was discharged. The shipowner said: "By the terms of the contract, you, the charterers, are to pay the expense of discharging from alongside." The charterers said: "By the custom which we have proved, you, the shipowners, are not only to perform the operation of landing the cargo in the way we say the custom prescribes the landing, but you must also pay the expense of it." The ultimate decision was that, at any rate, that part of the custom which was said to throw the expense upon the shipowner was inconsistent with the terms of the contract, which provided that that cargo should be taken from alongside the ship at the risk and expense of the charterer. The custom may well be held to regulate the mode of discharge according to the express terms of the contract; but the payment of the expense is an absolute obligation thrown by the contract upon the charterer, and not, therefore, capable of being varied by any such custom as alleged in the present case. For the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, I think we are bound by Holman v. Wade (sup.), and, therefore, so far as we are concerned, there is an end of the matter.

Scrutton, L.J.—I have felt considerable doubt and difficulty as to whether we know enough about Holman v. Wade (Times, May 11, 1887) to be bound by it, as we should, of course, be bound by it, as a decision of the Court of Appeal, if we clearly knew what it decided. I have felt the more doubt and difficulty, because although it is not proper that I should express a final opinion if we are bound by the decision in Holman v. Wade (sup.), I think, as at present advised, that in the absence of Holman v. Wade (sup.) I should have taken the same view as Hill, J. would have taken but for that case. I think I should have treated the custom alleged in this case, as was said by Lord Esher in Aktieselkab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; 76 L. T. Rep. 537; (1897) 2 Q. B. 83), as simply explaining what the delivery of the cargo to the consignee alongside is and how it is to be effected. I think I should have taken the same view of that case as Bigham, J. took in his working out of it in Stephens v. Wintringham (3 Com. Cas. 169), as applicable to the Port of Hull. But we have certain materials upon which we can judge of what Holman v. Wade (sup.) decided. We have the record and the formal judgment, and we have a short report of the case in the Times newspaper. It appears from the record that the shipowners alleged that the ship came to Hull; that the charterers did not and would not take the said cargo from alongside the ship at their own risk and expense; and that the shipowners were forced to discharge the cargo and stack it on the quay, and incurred expenses amounting to 11*l.* The charterers, in their reply, alleged a custom in the mode of discharging at Victoria Docks, whereby ships discharge their cargo upon the quay alongside and continue the discharge as long as there is quay space vacant for the discharge thereof. The shipowners replied that the alleged custom was contradictory of the charter-party. For some reason which I do not at present understand, Manisty, J. left to a common jury the meaning of the charter, and it appears from the terms of their answer that something further than was pleaded had been alleged as the custom. They found that the cargo was not to be taken by the shipowners from the ship's rail by means of a staging supplied by them to the quay and there stacked at their risk and expense; but they also found that the alleged usage or custom was proved in fact to their satisfaction. The judge, however, entered judgment for the plaintiffs, the shipowners, for the whole amount claimed on the ground that the custom was inconsistent with the charter-party, and the Court of Appeal upheld his decision.

It is not quite clear what construction the court put upon the charter-party. There have been judges who have said that "alongside" means at the ship's rail; others who have said "alongside" means within reach of the consignee, hanging on to the ship's tackle. Others have said that it means deposited upon the quay, and deposited not haphazard, but in a sort of order. Whichever construction the court took in Holman v. Wade, it seems to me that they included in the 11*l.* which they gave to the ship something more than mere stacking; they included what they called discharging or unloading, which I think must mean a certain amount of carriage over the quay, and whichever custom it was that the jury found, whether it was the custom as pleaded, or whether that of erecting a stage and stacking which is not the custom pleaded, it must have been held to be inconsistent with one of the constructions of the charter which I have put forward. That being so, there being, so far as I can see, no subsequent decision of this court inconsistent with that finding, although some parts of the judgments in Aktieselkab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (sup.) in my view go very near it, whatever I may think I might have found if I had been sitting in the court at that time, it appears to me that I am bound by that decision of the Court of Appeal, and that it would not be dignified or proper for me to argue against the correctness of that decision. If it is to be reversed—and it may be a case of sufficient importance as affecting other ports to take it to the House of Lords—it is for the House of Lords to say whether they think Holman v. Wade (sup.) was rightly decided and not for me.

For that reason, coming to the decision with considerable doubt, I think I am bound by Holman v. Wade (sup.), and I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

THE DANUBE II. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Limitation of actions—Servant of the Crown—Negligence in the performance of a public duty—Implied repeal of a statute by a subsequent statute—Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51)—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57).

The Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 protects servants of the Crown in the performance of a public duty in the same manner as it protects the servants of public authorities who can themselves be sued. In an action to which the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 applies, sect. 8 of that Act, which limits the period for commencing an action to two years, does not repeal the Public Authorities Protection Act by implication.

Thus a party whose vessel has suffered damage from the negligent navigation of a Government tug by an officer of the Royal Naval Reserve acting in the course of his duty must commence an action against the officer within six months of the day upon which the cause of action arose.

Consideration of the circumstances under which the provisions of one stutute may by implication repeal the provisions of another.

ACTION for damage by collision.

The facts fully appear in Hill, J.'s judgment.

Stephens, K.C. and Dumas for the plaintiffs.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and Dunlop, K.C. for the defendants.

In addition to the cases cited in the judgment, the following cases also were cited in the argument:

Wilson v. 1st Edinburgh City Royal Garrison Artillery Volunteers, 1904, 7 F. 168;
McTernan v. Bennett, 1898, 1 F. 333;
Salisbury v. Gould, 1904, 68 J. P. 158;
Parker v. The London County Council, 90 L. T. Rep. 415 (1904) 2 K.B. 501.

HILL, J.—In this case a further question has been raised for argument based upon a paragraph in the defence that the defendant is entitled to the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. The circumstances are these: The claim having been intimated to the Admiralty, the Admiralty offered to accept liability upon the basis that they should compensate as if they were entitled to limit their liability to the tonnage of the tug as ascertained in accordance with the provisions for limitation of liability contained in sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. They were willing to pay that amount. The plaintiffs were not satisfied with that, and issued their writ on the 17th Dec. 1918 against Mr. Harry Jewiss, the master of the tug Danube II., whom I have found to have brought about the collision with the steamship by reason of his negligence.

I have to decide whether that action ought to have been brought within six months from the 8th Dec. 1917 when the collision happened. It was not brought until rather more than one year after. The defendants' counsel say that they are entitled to the protection of the Act, because the action, being against the master of the tug, is an action against a person in respect of neglect in the execution of a public duty. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, say, first, that the Public Authorities Protection Act does not apply at all to servants of the Crown, but only to public authorities other than the Crown and to servants of such public authorities. Secondly, they say that, if it does not apply to servants of the Crown, and protection would be given by the Act if it stood by itself, then, by reason of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, which provides in respect of claims for damage and salvage a different period, namely, two years, sect. 1 of the Act of 1893 must, so far as actions for damage are concerned, be taken to be impliedly repealed by the Maritime Conventions Act. The proposition of the defendants, I confess, was to me a startling one. It is not disputed by the defendants that this defence would be open in every case of negligent navigation of a King's ship in an action brought against her navigating officer, so that in every case, unless the action were brought within six months, the defence afforded by the Public Authorities Protection Act would be open to him. And if the navigators of King's ships, who are negligent in their navigation, are persons who are acting in the execution of a public duty within the meaning of the Act, then every servant of the Crown who is carrying out similar duties and who is negligent in the performance of them is also protected by the Act. I instanced the case of the telegraph messenger who was negligent in riding his bicycle while carrying telegrams and knocked a man down, and Mr. Dunlop admitted that his argument carried him to that extent. No such plea has ever been raised in this court, nor, so far as I know, has any claim been made for costs as between solicitor and client. So far as the experience of the practitioners in this court goes, this contention is new since the Public Authorities Protection Act was passed in 1893. The court, however, has to see what the Act means and what are the facts with regard to the defendant in this case. The defendant at the time of this accident was a commissioned officer in the Royal Naval Reserve; he was master of a Government tug—that is to say, a tug which was requisitioned and in commission; he was engaged in the duty of towing Government property, a battle target, from Portsmouth to Scapa Flow, and in the course of that voyage, and in performing that duty, having to come to anchor in accordance with the orders of a patrol boat, he so negligently managed his tug and tow that he came into collision with the plaintiffs' ship. If I had to decide this question without having any authority on the matter, I should have grave doubts whether this Act, which deals with public authorities and their servants, dealt also with servants of the Crown, but Mr. Dunlop has referred me to a decision of Darling, J. in Benney v. Fitzgerald (unreported, June 27, 1918), and a reference in the course of Mr. Branson's argument in that case to a decision of Lawrence, J. in Sexty v. Wells (unreported, June 14, 1917). Neither of these are reported decisions, but they are to my mind quite indistinguishable from the present case. In both cases actions were brought against persons in the army in respect of negligence in driving motor vehicles belonging to the War Office, and in each case the Act was held to apply to such persons. I can see no distinction at all, nor can Mr. Dumas see any distinction, between these cases and the case of a man who is navigating a Government tug, and I feel bound to follow these decisions and take them as my guide. I therefore hold that the Act does apply to this defendant. The next question is whether it was impliedly repealed by the later Act, the Maritime Conventions Act 1911. As I understand it, having two statutes on the statute-book, the court must, if it can, read them both as subsisting statutes, and not, unless it is clearly driven to it, treat one as repealing the other. One of them, the earlier Act, gives a limitation of six months in favour of a limited class of people; the other creates a limitation of two years in respect of a limited class of causes with action. They are not both of them in terms dealing with the same matter. I think it may be that the explanation of the decision in The Caliph (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; 107 L. T. Rep. 274; (1912) P. 213) is this, that both Lord Campbell's Act and the Maritime Conventions Act are, in terms, dealing with claims for loss of life and giving different limitation periods; and, it may be, in such a case, the later Act must be taken to impliedly repeal the earlier Act. But here the two Acts are not dealing with the same thing; they cut across one another, and it seems to me that the court is not driven to say that either is inconsistent with the other. Reading the two together, the limitation imposed by sect. 8 in the Act of 1911 of two years can be well read as being subject to the qualification that it does not apply to persons to whom the Public Authorities Protection Act applies, and in their case it will still remain six months. I rather regret that this is the result of what I regard as the logic of the argument, because I think that six months in respect of ships and persons who may be in charge of ships, when their negligence may happen on the ocean, may work out to be a very short limitation indeed, and the period of two years seems to me to be quite short enough. However, that the result works out in a way of which I do not personally approve is nothing to the point; the question is, what is the law? And the conclusion that I have arrived at is that the law is as I have stated. Therefore this defence will be held to be good. There will be judgment for the defendants with costs other than costs of the issue of negligence, which will be the plaintiffs'. The costs that the defendant recovers will be taxed as between solicitor and client.

The Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, s. 1, provides:

> Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of any such Act, duty, or authority, the following provisions shall have effect (a) The action, prosecution, or proceeding shall not lie or be instituted unless it is commenced within six months next after the act, neglect, or default complained of. . . .

The Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57) provides by sect. 8:

> No action shall be maintainable to enforce any claim or lien against a vessel or her owners in respect of any damage or loss to another vessel, her cargo or freight, or any property on board her, or damages for loss of life or personal injuries suffered by any person on board her, caused by the fault of the former vessel, whether such vessel be wholly or partly in fault, or in respect of any salvage services, unless proceedings therein are commenced within two years from the date when the damage or loss or injury was caused or the salvage services were rendered, and an action shall not be maintainable under this Act to enforce any contribution in respect of an overpaid proportion of any damages for loss of life or personal injuries unless proceedings therein are commenced within one year from the date of payment. . . .

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed. The defence raises a point which, so far as I know—and so far as Hill, J. in the Admiralty Court knows—has not been previously raised in an action of this kind.

The action is against the master of a tug which was in the service of the Crown, and in that service the master had to take a battle target north to Scapa Flow, for the practice of the fleet. On his way he was ordered to anchor in the Black Deep. In pursuance of those orders in the course of his voyage he navigated his tug so negligently that his tow, the battle target, came into collision with a ship of the plaintiffs, and sank her.

The only defence raised is the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. [His Lordship read the section and continued:] The appellants raise two contentions: First, it is said that the Act does not apply to this case because it does not apply to any person in the service of the Crown, nor to any persons in the service of a public authority which itself could not be sued. There is nothing to that effect in the Act. So long as it is in pursuance of a "public duty or authority" I do not see anything in the Act to restrict it to the service of any servant of an authority which itself could be sued. The Attorney-General called our attention to the fact that in the schedule which repeals a number of Acts placing restrictions upon actions brought against various kinds of public servants there are two, at any rate, which relate to actions and proceedings against servants of the Crown; and in the repeal section there occur these words: "There shall be repealed as to the United Kingdom so much of any public general act as enacts that in any proceeding to which this Act applies the proceeding is to be commenced in any particular place or within any particular time . . . and in particular there shall be so repealed the enactments specified in the schedule to this Act to the extent in that schedule mentioned." That section seems to recognize that the matters dealt with in the repealed Acts are matters which would be proceedings to which the Public Authorities Protection Act would apply. But apart from that altogether, I think that a man who, under the orders of the Crown——in this case the Admiralty which is a department of the Crown—is taking a battle target to Scapa Flow for the purposes of the fleet is undoubtedly engaged in a public duty. Perhaps no member of the public could complain if he did not take it; but certainly the master was doing what was for the benefit of the public, and under the authority of the Crown; and it can, I think, hardly be denied that the Crown is a public authority. I think, therefore, that the Act applies to this case, and that none of the cases referred to in any way militate against that view. The same view has been held in cases not binding upon us by Lawrence, J. and Darling, J., and it also seems to me to be involved in the decision in Wilson v. 1*st Edinburgh City R.G.A. Volunteers* (7 F, 168). In my opinion, therefore, the first point fails.

The second point is that, even if the Public Authorities Protection Act applied before the passing of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 that Act has altered the position. I cannot see that that is so, even if the Maritime Conventions Act applies to the Crown at all. It is "an Act to amend the law relating to Merchant Shipping," and it is to be read with the Merchant Shipping Acts. The sect. 8 says: "No action shall be maintainable to enforce any claim or lien against a vessel or her owners in respect of any damage or loss to another vessel, her cargo or freight, or any property on board her, or damages for loss of life or personal injuries suffered by any person on board her, caused by the fault of the former vessel . . . unless proceedings are therein commenced within two years from the date when the damage or loss or injury was caused." It does not seem to me that, even assuming this Act to apply as against the Crown, that section is in any way inconsistent with the Public Authorities Protection Act. There may very well co-exist a general limitation of all actions in respect of maritime damage to two years, and a further limitation where the action is brought against persons of a specific class to six months in the case of those persons. I see nothing inconsistent in the two Acts. I think that second point also fails and that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Scrutton, L.J.—On the first point argued, I share the difficulty that the House of Lords felt in Bradford Corporation v. Myers (114 L. T. Rep. 83; (1916) A. C. 242), in knowing exactly what the limit is in the Public Authorities Protection Act between those acts which are protected by the measure of limitation and those acts which are not. But on the best consideration I can give to the matter it appears to me that the Admiralty were under a public duty to make provision for public defence; that in carrying out the particular measure of sending a battle target to Scapa Flow by tug they were carrying out that public duty; and that the neglect of the servant in charge of the tug was a "neglect in the execution of any such duty" within the words of the Act. The particular action, therefore, is prima facie within the Public Authorities Protection Act.

On the second point, this court has recently had to consider the principles on which a subsequent statute is held to repeal a prior statute, and the principles are to be found stated with authorities in Flanagan v. Shaw (122 L. T. Rep. 177; (1920) 3 K. B. 105). In that case I cited a passage of Lord Coke's in Foster's case 1614, L. T. Rep. 56 (b), 63 (a): "Only it must be known, that forasmuch as Acts of Parliament are established with such gravity, wisdom and universal consent of the whole realm, for the advancement of the commonwealth, they ought not by any constrained construction out of the general and ambiguous words of a subsequent Act, to be abrogated," and the modern expression by A. L. Smith, J. of the same principle in Kutner v. Phillips (64 L. T. Rep 628; (1891) 2 Q. B. 271): "Now a repeal by implication is only effected when the provisions of a later enactment are so inconsistent with or repugnant to the provisions of an earlier one, that the two cannot stand together." Then he says: "Unless two Acts are so plainly repugnant to each other, that effect cannot be given to both at the same time, a repeal will not be implied, and special Acts are not repealed by general Acts unless there is some express reference to the previous legislation, or unless there is a necessary inconsistency in the two Acts standing together." In this case, the later Act has a general provision, applicable to all sorts of people, of a two years' limitation; and there was the prior Act, with a special provision applicable to public authorities only, of six months' limitation. I see no reason why the two should not stand together, and I see no plain words in the second Act showing that Parliament intended to repeal the first Act.

For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Younger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

Charter-party—Discharge of cargo—"As customary"—"Arrived ship"—Commencement of discharge—Time fixed by charter-party—Delay in finding berth—Discharge with customary dispatch—Presence of other ships.

proceed to the port of N. and, after loading a cargo, to proceed to Q. and there deliver the cargo. A clause in the charter-party provided that the cargo was to be discharged "as customary," and that the time for discharge should be counted from the first high water on or after the arrival of the steamship at or off a discharging berth. The steamship arrived at the port of Q. and was off her discharging berth at ten o'clock on the morning of the 5th July 1920, and the first high water after her arrival was at 3.30 o'clock in the afternoon of that day. There were a number of other ships in the port, which had arrived before the steamship N., and were therefore entitled to priority over the steamship N. Consequently, the steamship N. did not begin to discharge until about the 9th July. She was then discharged within forty-eight hours. The plaintiff claimed 150*l. demurrage as being the amount due at* 2*s. per gross ton per day for the period between the 7th July and the 11th July, according to the tonnage of the vessel, under a provision in the charter-party to that effect.*

Held, that the effect of the charter-party was to determine when the N. became an "arrived ship." Thereafter the defendants were only bound to do what was reasonable under existing circumstances, such as the presence of other ships in the port. The defendants, having discharged with customary dispatch after securing a suitable berth, were not liable for demurrage.

Action tried by Roche, J. sitting in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs, the Bargate Steam Shipping Company Limited, shipowners, claimed from the defendants, the Penlee and St. Ives Stone Quarries Limited, charterers, demurrage on their steamship Nanset.

By a charter-party dated the 1st July 1920 the plaintiffs chartered the steamship Nanset to the defendants as charterers to load a cargo of stone for conveyance from Newlyn to Queenborough at a freight of 15*s.* per ton. A clause in the charter-party provided that the cargo was to be loaded and discharged as customary, and that the time for discharging was to be counted from first high water on or after arrival at or off the discharging berth. It was agreed that the demurrage, if any, was to be at the rate of 2*s.* per gross ton per day.

The Nanset duly loaded the cargo at Newlyn and proceeded to Queenborough, where she arrived at 10 a.m. on the 5th July 1920. She was then off her discharging berth. The first high-water time after her arrival was 3.30 p.m. on the same day. The time allowed under the charter-party for discharging expired at 3.30 p.m. on the 7th July 1920. But when the Nanset arrived at Queenborough on the 5th July there were a number of ships in the port, which had arrived before her and therefore had priority over her, so that, from the 5th July to the 9th July, the only berth in the port of Queenborough was occupied. As soon as that berth became vacant the Nanset came alongside and discharged with due dispatch. It was admitted that the delay in reaching the berth was not the fault of the defendants. The discharging was not completed until 10.30 on the 11th July, and the plaintiffs claimed 153*l.* demurrage for three days nineteen hours at the agreed rate of 2*s.* per gross ton per day.

W. A. Jowitt for the plaintiffs.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the defendants.

Roche, J. stated the facts and said: —I find as a fact that the only suitable discharging berth in the port was the berth at which the ship the Nansen did in fact discharge. I further find that the steamship in fact discharged with customary dispatch. The plaintiffs contend that the period of waiting must be for the account of the defendants. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that time was only to run "as customary," which means at such a rate as was reasonable in the circumstances, and that as they had done all that was within their power they were not liable for the delay. I am satisfied that during the period of waiting the berth was never in fact available. It was held in Hulthen v. Stewart (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 285, 403; 88 L. T. Rep. 702; (1903) A. C. 389) and again in Van Liewen v. Hollis Brothers (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 596; 122 L. T. Rep. 657; (1920) A. C. 239) that the obligation to discharge "as customary" meant "as fast as the ship can deliver and the cargo be discharged having regard to existing circumstances." That being the measure of diligence, the question is whether the words of the charter-party impose on the defendants the obligation to pay for the period of delay. In other words, do the words fixing the time for the commencement of the discharge make any difference? In my opinion they do not. The object and effect of those words are, in my opinion, merely to indicate the place and time at which the steamship Nanset became an "arrived ship." They do not put the risk of delay on the defendants. She is an arrived ship from the time of the first high water after her arrival off the berth, and from that time the defendants were only bound to do what was reasonable in existing circumstances, and one of the circumstances which must be taken into consideration was the presence of other ships.

In my judgment the defendants have carried out their obligations and are not liable for the delay. This view of the case is supported by the decision in Temple Thompson and Clarke v. Runnalls (18 Times L. Rep. 822). The action therefore fails.

SUMMONS for a charging order.

The facts and contentions in this matter are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Stranger for Messrs. Stokes and Stokes.

A. T. Bucknill for the parties liable in damages.

HILL, J.—In this case Mr. Graham Stokes, carrying on business as Messrs. Stokes and Stokes, applies for a charging order under sect. 28 of the Solicitors Act. He is the surviving partner of the firm of Messrs. Stokes and Stokes upon the death in Aug. 1914 of his partner, Mr. Reginald Stewart Stokes. Between some date in 1912 and the 4th Aug. 1914, and since the conclusion of peace with Germany, Messrs. Stokes and Stokes acted as solicitors for the German owners of the Marie Gartz in a collision action between the English owners of the steamship Karamea and the owners of the Marie Gartz, in which there were claim and counter-claim. Before the 4th Aug. 1914, that action, which was carried on appeal to the House of Lords, ended in a decree in favour of the Marie Gartz and judgment against the Karamea for damages and costs. Since the conclusion of peace with Germany the claim of the owners of the Marie Gartz has been investigated by the registrar and merchants, and on the 5th July 1920 I confirmed the report but stayed execution pending further order. The amount payable by the owners of the Karamea in respect of the damages is 7391*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.*, with interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the 15th Dec. 1912, until payment. In addition there are payable the taxed costs of the owners of the Marie Gartz in this court and the Court of Appeal and House of Lords. Taxation has not yet been completed.

An affidavit has been filed in support of the application wherein Messrs. Stokes and Stokes costs as between themselves and their clients, the owners of the Marie Gartz, are estimated to amount to approximately 2000*l.* and the out-of-pocket disbursements to approximately 1100*l.*

The present summons asks for a charging order upon the damages recovered against the owners of the Karamea and for an order that Messrs. Stokes and Stokes' costs be taxed as between solicitor and client, and that the owners of the Karamea be ordered within seven days after the date of the certificate of taxation to pay to them the amount found due on taxation out of the amount found due to the owners of the Marie Gartz.

Apart from questions arising under the Treaty of Peace Order in Council, there would be no difficulty in the matter. The recovery has been by the exertions of Messrs. Stokes and Stokes, and they would be entitled to a charging order, and an order for payment to them, and the order would charge both the damages recovered (Birchell v. Pugin, 32 L. T. Rep. 495; (1875) L. Rep. 10 C. P. 397) and the costs payable under the judgments: (Dallow v. Garrold, 52 L. T. Rep. 240; (1884) 14 Q. B. Div. 543). A charge upon the costs, however, is not asked for in the summons. Neither the owners of the Karamea nor the owners of the Marie Gartz dispute that such an order would in ordinary course be made.

But it is said that the order cannot be made because of some provisions of the Treaty of Peace Order in Council, and of articles in Part 10 of the Treaty of Peace. The applicant had given notice of his application to the Public Trustee as custodian under the Treaty of Peace Order, and I had hoped for some assistance from him. He has, however, written a letter in which he says: "In view of the limited time available it has not been possible to instruct counsel to appear on behalf of the Custodian, but in pursuance of par. 1 (17*a*) of the Treaty of Peace Order 1919, he is prepared to consent to the sum due by the owners of the Karamea being dealt with in such manner as his Lordship may direct."

The Public Trustee did not appear upon the summons or upon its adjournment into court; and I must, without his assistance, construe as best I can articles and an Order in Council which are not at all easy of interpretation. The representative of the owners of the Marie Gartz, the judgment creditors, did appear, and consented to the order being made. The owners of the Karamea, the judgment debtors, also appeared, and while expressing great sympathy with Messrs. Stokes and Stokes, contended that the order could not be made, because the effect of it would be to deprive them pro tanto of a right of set-off which they contend they have by virtue of art. 296, annex 14. They state that they lost a ship by German submarine attack, and contend that the concluding paragraph of annex 14 gives them a right to recoup themselves out of the moneys they owe to the owners of the Marie Gartz, and that that right is superior to any right of Messrs. Stokes and Stokes.

In addition to considering this contention, I have also to consider whether there is anything in the Treaty of Peace Order which prevents my making the order asked for. I have already on another occasion held (ante, p. 123 L. T. Rep. 680; (1920) P. 172) that the right of the owners of the Marie Gartz against the owners of the Karamea in respect of damages is a right within art. 297 of the Treaty and not a "debt" within art. 296. Now that the right to unliquidated damages has been converted into a liquidated sum, it has not thereby become a debt within art. 296, for the only debts to which art. 296 relates are debts payable before the war, or debts which became payable during the war: (see art. 296 (1) and (2).) Indeed, having regard to par. 2 of the annex to art. 296, it may be doubted whether the annex relates to any debts, except debts payable before the war.

Be that as it may, the judgment debt for 7391*l.* 10*s.* and interest owing by the owners of the Karamea to the owners of the Marie Gartz did not come into existence, and did not become payable as a debt till the confirmation of the registrar's report on the 5th July 1920. Art. 296 has no direct application to the judgment debt of 7391*l.* 10*s.* and interest. Art. 297 continues to apply to it as it applied to the right for unliquidated damages. In art. 297 I can see nothing which prevents me making the order asked for. On the contrary, art. 297 (b) provides that the liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied State concerned, and that the German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights or interests, nor to subject them to any charge, without the consent of that State. This shows that the consent of the owners of the Marie Gartz is of no effect. But it provides that the liquidation of the right of the owners shall, in this case, be carried out in accordance with the laws of England. It is in accordance with the laws of England to see that a solicitor who recovers property for a client shall be protected in the way provided by sect. 28, and the solicitor's costs of recovery are expenses of liquidation. Art. 297 (h) provides how the property, rights and interests of the owners of the Marie Gartz, when liquidated, are to be dealt with. It speaks of "the net proceeds of sales," and "in general all cash assets." I observe that both in (b) and in (h) the same word "liquidation" is used in the French text, while in the English text "liquidation" is used in (b) and "sales" in (h).

But if I have to regard only the English text, which is set out in the Order in Council, I read "assets" as meaning net assets, that is, the assets after deducting the expenses of collection or realisation. I therefore hold that there is nothing in art. 297 (h) which prevents me making the order asked for. This also disposes of the point made by the owners of the Karamea as to set off. Assuming that the last paragraph of art. 296, annex 14, applies at all to assets realised under art. 297, as to which I say nothing, the owners of the Karamea can only get the benefit of the set off as against debts which would otherwise have to be credited to the Creditor Clearing Office. And in my view the effect of art. 297 (h) is that it is only the net assets, or net proceeds of liquidation, which have to be credited through the Clearing Office.

I still have to consider whether there is anything in the Treaty of Peace Order in Council apart from the incorporated articles of the Treaty which prevents me making the order. The charge created by sub-sect. 16 is a charge upon the net proceeds. Sub-sect. 17 (e) provides that "if any person called upon to pay any moneys . . . has reason to suspect that the same are subject to such charge . . . he shall before paying in report the matter to the Custodian and shall comply with any directions that the Custodian may give with respect thereto."

The owners of the Karamea have reported to the Custodian and so have Messrs. Stokes and Stokes. The Custodian has given no directions. I understand that he leaves it to the Court. I need not, in those circumstances, decide whether I could override express directions of the custodian, and I see no reason why I should not order payment to Messrs. Stokes and Stokes.

In my judgment there is nothing which prevents me making a solicitors' charging order in the usual way, ordering payment to the solicitors by the judgment debtors. I make a charging order as prayed. I direct Messrs. Stokes and Stokes' costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client. I order payment in seven days thereafter, including their costs of this application.

Naval Prize Tribunal.

Jan. 30, March 12, and May 12, 1920.

(Before Lord PHILLIMORE, Admiral of the Fleet Sir GEORGE CALLAGHAN, and Sir GUY FLEETWOOD WILSON.)

THE ADOLPH AND OTHER VESSELS. (a)

Naval Prize Tribunal—Prize Claims Committee—Sums paid by Treasury on recommendation of committee not recoverable against Naval Prize Fund—Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5. c. 30), Part II. of Schedule, par. 4.

The Treasury, having, on the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee, paid various claims made in respect of ships condemned as prize and declared to be droits of the Crown, claimed to be repaid out of the Naval Prize Fund. None of the claims could have been established in the Prize Court.

Held, that the sums paid were not repayable out of the Naval Prize Fund, as they were not claims which could have been established in a Prize Court.

CLAIM by the Treasury.

Certain sums had been paid by the Treasury on account of claims for necessaries, general disbursements, seamen's wages, dock dues, freight and towage, or arising out of a mortgage, an advance against shipping documents, and an unpaid vendor's lien, in each case in respect of ships subject to prize jurisdiction and being droits of the Crown.

Par. 4 of part 2 of the schedule to the Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30) provides:

Part II.—Charges on Naval Prize Fund.—(4) Any claims in respect of any ships or goods subject to prize jurisdiction, which are droits of the Crown, or which, if condemned, would have been droits of the Crown or of the proceeds of sale of, or money representing, any such ship or goods which the Treasury on the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee, may have paid, or may hereafter pay, being claims of a nature that had they been established in prize proceedings would have been ordered by a Prize Court to be paid by the persons entitled to the ship or goods, or out of the money representing the same.

The Treasury claimed to be repaid these sums out of the Naval Prize Fund, and the claim was opposed on behalf of the Naval Forces.

The facts and the argument are fully stated in the judgment of the tribunal.

The Attorney-General (Sir Gordon Hewart, K.C.) and Pearce Higgins for the Treasury.

Sir Reginald Acland, K.C. and Darby, for the Naval Forces.

The judgment of the tribunal was delivered by Lord PHILLIMORE, who said:—Under part 2 of the schedule to the Naval Prize Act, par. 4, certain claims in respect of ships subject to prize jurisdiction and being droits of the Crown have been preferred before this tribunal by the solicitor to the Treasury on behalf of the Exchequer to be paid out of the Naval Prize Fund. Certain typical examples have been supplied to the tribunal. They are all instances of sums of money which the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee, has paid. In the case of The Adolf the claim was for necessaries supplied by a coaling company. In The Concadoro for general disbursements on her behalf, presumably of a nature similar to those in the case of The Adolf. In the case of The Australia it is wages to a seaman. In the case of The Ulla Boog the claim was for dock dues; in The Werner Vinnen for towage. These expenditures were all before the war. These five cases seem to stand in one class.

In the case of The Emil a firm of English shipowners had sold the vessel before the war to German owners and received part only of the purchase money, and had a mortgage on the ship to secure the balance. The Prize Claims Committee recommended a payment of the principal without interest. In The cargo ex Achaia the claim was for an advance made on the security of the shipping documents; and in The cargo ex Derfflinger the goods had been sold to German firms, but not paid for, and the lien of the unpaid vendors was recognised. These three cases, again, seem to stand in a class.

In the case of The Ulrich the ship was sailing under a charter arranged by English shipbrokers, who would have collected the freight and deducted their commission. As the ship was seized the Crown collected the freight, and the Prize Claims Committee allowed the brokerage.

The first condition of par. 4 of the schedule is that in order that this tribunal should allow a charge on the Naval Prize Fund the claim must be one which the Treasury has paid or will pay on the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee. This committee, which was a purely consultative body, but to which the Naval Prize Act refers as an authority, consists of a body of eminent persons appointed by the Lord Commissioners of the Treasury on the 18th Nov. 1914, with the following reference:—"To receive and consider claims made by British, Allied, or Neutral third parties against ships or cargoes which have been condemned or detained by order of Prize Courts, and to recommend to what extent, in what manner, and on what terms such claims should be met or provided for out of the Prize Funds."

It will be observed that the reference only mentions cases where ships or cargoes have been condemned as prize or have been detained under the Hague Convention. The paragraph in the Naval Prize Act rather looks as if the draftsman had supposed that the reference was wider because it speaks of "claims in respect of any ship or goods . . . which are droits of the Crown or which, if condemned, would have been droits of the Crown," which at first sight looks as if the Prize Claims Committee might sometimes have to deal with claims where the vessel had been released. Possibly the words "which if condemned would have been droits of the Crown" may be meant to cover cases of detention under the Hague Convention.

Passing this question by, we have next to consider the second condition. Any claim with which we deal must be in respect of money which the Treasury pays on the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee—condition No. 1. But it must also be a claim "of a nature that had it been established in prize proceedings would have been ordered by a prize court to be paid (condition No. 2)."

We are, however, informed that the Prize Claims Committee has made it a rule to entertain no claims which could be supported in the Prize Court, which apparently leaves us in the position that the statute requires the claim to fulfil two conditions, and the action of the Prize Claims Committee has been such that it never can fulfil both. It may be noted that there is nothing in the reference precluding the Prize Claims Committee from entertaining claims which could be preferred in the Prize Court. It is conceivable that an applicant might have put his case before the Prize Claims Committee in this way: "I think I have a good case for submission to the Prize Court, but instead of going to that court to have it decided and to have it assessed, I will be content with anything that you will recommend for me." And in that event the claim might fulfil the two conditions of this paragraph. But on the other hand, it is to be presumed that those who framed this paragraph and submitted it to Parliament were aware of the fact that the Prize Claims Committee had never construed its reference so as to enable it to do anything of the kind. The construction of the paragraph submitted by the Attorney-General on behalf of the Exchequer was that it referred to claims of a nature which, if it had been possible to establish them in a Prize Court, as it is not, would have been ordered to be paid; and he supposed that this would cover cases of mortgage and bottomry. What a Prize Court would do, if it could do what it cannot do, it is impossible to say. The possibilities are infinite. We cannot accept this construction.

Then there is the third condition. The Prize Court is to order money to be paid "by the persons entitled to the ship or goods, or out of money representing the same." Who are the persons entitled to the ship or goods? Counsel on both sides suggested that it meant the captors, but they are not, and never were, entitled to the ship or goods. If there had been a Prize Act, as there is not, or a proclamation, as there is not, giving to the actual captors any ship or goods which they captured and procured to be condemned as prize, they might possibly be considered as the persons entitled to the ship or goods. But again there is no such Prize Act and no such proclamation. Moreover, the Legislature seems to have known how to express itself when it wanted to refer to the actual captors, because they are mentioned by name in the succeeding par. 5. The idea occurred during the course of the argument that par. 4 might be intended to cover cases where the Prize Court would have ordered payment out of the proceeds of the prize—for example, for such matters as pilotage and towage, if not paid by the marshal and deducted as an expense from the gross proceeds, or for salvage. We have a claim for salvage of a prize now pending before us. But this suggestion is answered, because such a case is covered by par. 5, so that par. 4 seems unnecessary. It is just possible that a scintilla of meaning could be given to par. 4 if it were to be considered as giving power to the Prize Claims Committee to assess claims that would come under par. 5, so that the claims could come to the Naval Prize Tribunal for a liquidated sum instead of leaving it to this tribunal to assess and liquidate.

However all this may be, it is not so much for the Tribunal to discover what cases fall within par. 4 as to determine whether the present applications do fall within it. They are applications which fulfil the first condition. The Treasury has paid, or will pay, the claims upon the recommendation of the Prize Claims Committee. But they are confessedly not claims of a nature which could have been established in prize proceedings, and therefore they are not claims which would have been ordered by a Prize Court to be paid by anyone or out of any funds, and therefore we must disallow them. It is satisfactory to think that this decision follows the practice with regard to such matters on grants of prize in former wars. In cases where a claim was established by a third party as mortgagee, bottomry bond holder, or as having a lien on a parcel of cargo, the Crown made a grant to him of its bounty out of the national Exchequer, and not out of the proceeds of the prize, and the captors took the whole proceeds undiminished and free of any charge.

THE VESTA AND OTHER VESSELS (PART CARGOES EX). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Enemy cargo—Sale in transitu*—Contract of sale—Enemy vendor to "take back" the goods—Delivery under the contract—Title of a neutral purchaser.*

A German steamer bound for Rotterdam took refuge in Lisbon on the outbreak of war. She had on board a non-contraband cargo which was the property of a company of enemy character. The cargo was subsequently sold to a Dutch company. The Dutch company, who acted in complete good faith, shipped the cargo in three neutral vessels to Amsterdam. The contract of sale gave the purchasers the right to reject the goods if they found them to be unsuited to their manufacturing business, and provided conditions upon which the vendors were to "take back" the goods in this event.

The three ships were captured on the way to Amsterdam and the cargo seized as belonging to enemies of the Crown at the time of the seizure.

Held, that the clause in the contract did not render the sale ineffective as a transfer of the goods to the purchasers. The provisions of the contract under which the vendors agreed to "take back" the goods contemplated a new transaction, not a failure of the sale.

The appellants having got actual delivery of the cargo after a genuine sale, the condemnation was not in the circumstances justified.

Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported sub nom. The Naxos and other Ships, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 52; 123 L. T. Rep. 556; (1920) P. 385) reversed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Admiralty Division (in Prize) dated the 19th May 1920.

The appellants, a Dutch company, appealed from a judgment of the President, Sir Henry Duke, condemning as enemy property about 1000 tons of magnesite ore (non-contraband) seized in the Vesta and other neutral steamships.

Inskip, K.C. and Balloch for the appellants.

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.) and Clement Davies for the Procurator-General.

Artemus Jones, K.C. and Wilfred Lewis for the Netherlands Oversea Trust.

The facts are fully set out in the course of the judgment.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—About the middle of July 1914 the steamship Naxos, a German vessel belonging to the Deutsche Levante Linie, sailed from Lefkandi and Limni, ports in Eubœa, with a cargo of about 1000 tons of raw magnesite, shipped by the Internationale Magnesiet Werken of Rotterdam and made deliverable to order at Rotterdam. These shippers own magnesite mines in Greece, and the finding of the President, that they were of enemy character though formally a Dutch incorporation, is not now contested. The Naxos was still on passage when the war broke out, and to avoid the risk of capture took refuge in Lisbon and there remained. An enemy ship cannot thus defeat belligerent rights exercisable so long as the original transitus is deemed to continue. Even transhipment would not have this effect. It is not a question of abandoning the adventure for insurance or other contractual purposes. What is done by an enemy in consequence only of the peril of capture, which is imposed by the opposite Power, is not for prize purposes a voluntary abandonment at all.

Early in 1916 the appellants, the Naamlooze Vennootschap Chemische Fabriek Kampen, a Dutch company who manufacture magnesia out of magnesite at their works at Kampen, in Holland, were in great need of the raw material necessary for their business. On the other hand, the owners of the cargo on the Naxos were very willing to sell it, as it was lying useless on their hands at Lisbon, without waiting indefinitely for peace to terminate the risk of capture. The parties came together, and by an agreement dated the 4th Feb. 1916 the appellants bought the cargo, and arranged for its transhipment and carriage to Amsterdam by neutral vessels, the Vesta, Castor, and Titan. These ships were detained en route and the magnesite was captured by British captors. The case for condemnation was that the original transit of the magnesite was still in course of execution at the time of seizure; that it was not in the power of the enemy vendors or of the enemy shipowners to abandon the voyage by the Naxos to Rotterdam, so as to create a new voyage in neutral ships to the detriment of belligerent rights; and that, even if the agreement of purchase was a genuine and not a merely colourable transaction, no title was acquired by the appellants which could be asserted in a Court of Prize so as to defeat a British capture of enemy goods.

The case of enemy ships laden with enemy cargo taking shelter from the risk of capture in neutral ports frequently occurred in the early stages of the recent war, as in older wars, and the question has then arisen how far and under what circumstances the belligerents' rights can be defeated, if the first physical step of successfully eluding capture is followed up by mercantile transactions intended to transfer the ownership of the goods to neutrals. Sir William Scott, in The Vrow Margareta (1799, 1 C. Rob. 336), thus states the general rule, applicable alike to ships captured at sea and to goods captured at sea after transfer from ships which have taken refuge in a neutral port: "In a state of war, existing or imminent, it is held that the property shall be deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment till the actual delivery; this arises out of the state of war, which gives a belligerent a right to stop the goods of his enemy." He goes on to give as a reason for the rule what is rather a maxim of prudence than a consideration of law, namely, the risk of protection being given to the enemy goods by transfers to neutrals, the true character of which it might be impracticable to expose. (See, too, The Jan Frederick, (1804, 5 C. Rob., at p. 131). The Vrow Margareta, however, was a case where the transfer to the neutral took place both in good faith and before actual or anticipated outbreak of war.

In The Baltica (11 Moo. 141) the question came before the Judical Committee in the form of a transfer made in contemplation of outbreak of war, and the committee applied the rule as stated in The Vrow Margareta, and also by Story, J. (Pratt's Story, p. 64), "the same distinction is applied to purchases by neutrals of property in transitu; if purchased during a state of war, existing or imminent, and impending danger of war, the contract is held invalid and the property is deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment until the actual delivery." Accordingly the property having been not merely bought by but delivered to the neutral buyer before seizure in good faith and without any reservation to the seller, the transaction was held to be protected. The actual words of Mr. Pemberton Leigh (p. 150) should be quoted: "At this time the ship had come fully into the possession of the purchaser, and thereupon, according to the principles already referred to, the transitus in the sense in which for this purpose the word is used, had ceased."

In the recent war, the same principle has been recognised in cases where the alleged transfer has taken place not merely while war is imminent, but after it has actually broken out; but until the present case it has not been necessary to decide on the validity of the transaction, because either the purported sale has not been bonâ fide or the cargo was contraband with an ulterior enemy destination (The Rijn, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 424; 120 L. T. Rep. 395; (1917) P. 145; (1919) A. C. 546; The Jeanne, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 115 L. T. Rep. 838; (1917) P. 8; The Bawean, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 255; 118 L. T. Rep. 319; (1918) P. 58), or the matter has rested in contract only without actual delivery to the buyer before the time of the seizure: (The United States, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 568; 116 L. T. Rep. 19; (1917) P. 30). It was, however, observed in The Bawean by Sir Samuel Evans, P. that actual possession by the neutral buyer is essential. Mere removal of goods from the enemy vessel, which is in shelter, to a neutral vessel which can carry them on, will not serve, even though constructively the possession of the captain of the neutral vessel is that of a bailee for a buyer who will be liable for the freight. Upon this point it is not necessary for their Lordships to pronounce any opinion. They, however, do not agree that as long as the original voyage of the enemy vessel, on which the goods were loaded, is incomplete, there always remains an indefeasible right to capture. Though in The Baltica the ship had actually completed her voyage to Copenhagen when the new owner took possession of her, the passage above quoted from the judgment shows that the taking possession was itself a determination of the transit, and the observations of Sir W. Scott in The Danckebaar Africaan (1 C. Rob. 107) and The Carl Walter (4 C. Rob. 207) bear this out.

It is worth while to consider the object and operation of the agreement of purchase in this case before passing to its terms. No doubt the enemy vendors wished to avert the loss which capture of their cargo would involve; and, if they could do this by means which did not merely shift the loss to the shoulders of the neutral buyers, they would in effect by saving themselves defeat the belligerent enemy right of capture. Such a result would cause them no regrets, but there is no reason to suppose that their object was not principally the mercantile one of turning their goods into cash, or that, if the price was satisfactory as it apparently was, they had any concern in recovering the goods for any purpose or in any event.

The appellants, on the other hand, knew the position of the cargo. They equally obviously had no mind to see the ore captured and condemned, and if the transaction in the result extricated the cargo from the possible risk of capture and placed it in ultimate safety, incidentally they intended to defeat the rights of belligerents. Though on both sides the primary object was purely commercial, the operation in fact involved the secondary result of finally avoiding capture.

There was a further consequence involved. The ore was bound for Holland, where it would be adjacent to Germany. In Lisbon it was isolated and remote. If by any means, legitimate or illegitimate but successful, it could be conveyed to Holland and there in one way or other again fell into the hands of its original shippers, they would have successfully performed their original importation, the risks of war notwithstanding, and could, if so minded, send the ore on into Germany. How far ultimate transport to Germany was ever in the sellers' minds does not appear and need not further be considered. As regards the buyers it must be remembered that the Internationale Magneseit Company was on its face a Dutch company and that, even if the appellants had been shown to be aware of the ownership of the shares and the control of the business which invested it with enemy character in time of war, they might still, on the state of the decisions at the time in question, have supposed that its Dutch incorporation availed to make it for all purposes a neutral persona.

The materiality of these considerations is that they show the importance in this and in all similar cases of a close and vigilant scrutiny of the whole transaction, for the purpose of seeing whether it truly is what it purports to be—an out and out and genuine sale without reservation of any interest in or to the seller in the goods—or whether it merely cloaks under the form of a sale an operation for transporting the seller's goods to the destination from which risk of capture at sea excludes him.

In the present case it has been found by the President, and is not now contested, that the appellants acted in complete good faith; that they were in great need of raw material; that they intended to consume it in their own works in Holland; and that, except in so far as the true construction of the agreement of sale may involve another conclusion, they were buying out and out for themselves, and were not designedly reserving to the sellers any interest in the goods for their benefit. Accordingly the matter now turns on the construction and effect of the agreement, for, if that be plain, the mere fact that under other circumstances it might have been put to illicit uses cannot affect its meaning.

It was an agreement "regarding the sale and purchase of 1000 tons of raw magnesite lying in the steamship Naxos," and it declared that "the magnesite is purchased lying in the steamship Naxos, and all the expenses arising through the release, delivery, transloading and transport of the goods . . . shall be borne by the buyer." The price was 25 florins per kilo, payable in two instalments, half payable as soon as the seller should produce evidence that the goods would be released by the Portuguese Customs and no objections were raised by the shipowners, the other half payable as soon as the goods have arrived. The agreement proceeded: "And, in case of superficial approval by the buyer or in case the ship or cargo is lost or is declared forfeited by one of the belligerent parties, immediately after this has become known, but not later than two months after the payment of the first instalment, irrespective of whether all the goods have been shipped or not. The transloading, shipment, &c., shall take place in the sellers' name for the account and risk of the buyer. If the goods when being manufactured are found to be unsuitable for buyers' industry, the buyers shall have the right to refuse to accept the parcel, and the sellers shall be bound to take back the magnesite and to repay the amount of the purchase price already paid, increased with the sea freight from Lisbon, to a maximum of 30*s.* per ton."

The agreement was made without first inspecting the magnesite, or drawing and testing samples, or forwarding a trial shipment for experiment in the works of the Chemische Fabriek at Kampen. It contemplated that the whole 1000 tons would be sent forward to Holland and yet that, when they reached Holland, they might not suit the buyers' purposes. The reason probably is that the appellants had been buyers of Eubœan magnesite before the war and were generally well acquainted with its character. At any rate the circumstance, which might have excited a good deal of suspicion but for the admission of the appellants' good faith, is not now of any real significance.

The result is that the appellants agreed to buy specific and ascertained goods, as they lay in the Naxos, undertaking all risk and expense thereafter arising, except general average and demurrage in connection with the vessel, and were bound to pay half of the price in advance of shipment and in certain events the other half also. Without saying anything as to the prudence of it, of which the parties were the best judges, the agreement so far seems clearly to intend that the sellers are to part with all interest in the ore as soon as it leaves the Naxos, and to receive their price for the goods, lost or not lost, with considerable promptitude. There is no provision even for adjusting the price in case the quantity falls short of 1000 tons, beyond anything that can be inferred from the fact that, while each moiety is named as one-half of 25,000 florins, the price itself is described as 25 florins per 1000 kilos.

The Procurator-General contends, and the learned President held, that the effect of the clause, beginning "if the goods when being manufactured," is to reserve an interest in the enemy vendor, which prevented an effective transfer of them at Lisbon; that, in the language of Sir William Scott in the Sechs Geschwistern (4 C. Rob. 101), there was not "a sale divesting the enemy of all further interest," for "anything tending to continue his interest vitiates a contract of this description altogether." The President's view was that the sale was only to be complete on the fulfilment of a condition subsequent, namely, that the goods should be found suitable for the buyers' industry—in other words, that it was a sale on approbation, a delivery of the goods of the enemy company to the neutral company on sale or return. The expression is relied on that "the buyer shall have the right to refuse to accept the parcel," as showing that the time for his acceptance and consequent acquisition of the property does not arrive until he has at least had a reasonable opportunity of testing the magnesite in his works at Kampen.

Their Lordships are unable to adopt this view. If the words "refuse to accept" stood alone, or if the scheme of the agreement was that the sellers should deliver at Kampen and there tender the ore to the buyers, much might be said for holding that the property had not previously passed. Prefaced, however, as they are by a whole series of expressions pointing to an earlier passing of property, and combined with provisions which disinterest the seller in the shipment and transport and the risks of the voyage, the words are susceptible of another interpretation. They form part of a clause the remainder of which provides that the sellers shall be bound to "take back" the magnesite. Physically a person takes back something that he has brought to a place, but the sellers were not to bring this cargo to Kampen. The buyers were to do that. In connection with passing property a person "takes back" what had previously been but has ceased to be his; by a repurchase he undoes part at least of the prior transaction. That the taking back is here a new transaction and not merely the failure of the old one is further indicated by the fact that the next provision is not simply one for undoing the payment for the goods, as it would undo the physical tender of them. The seller is not to repay all the buyer's outlay—the expenses at Lisbon, the expenses of discharge and the freight incurred, whatever it might be—but only the purchase price and "the sea freight from Lisbon to a maximum of 30*s.* per ton"; that is to say, he is to pay a different and a smaller total consideration than had been paid by the buyer, and he gets the goods safely arrived in Holland in addition. It is further to be observed that what is expressed is the buyer's right and the seller's obligation if that right should be exercised. The words do not invest the seller with a corresponding right to have the goods back, if they are found unsuitable for the buyer's industry. Even if the sellers had such a right as that, in the event of the goods being found unsuitable, they could require a resale to themselves whether the buyers desired it or not; this would be a personal right the breach of which would sound in damages only. There was not reserved to them any proprietary interest in the goods themselves. What is provided for is a liability on, not a right in, the seller, and none the less for the fact that, if that liability were enforced, he might find it mitigated by substantial advantages to himself. The buyers were at all times in a position to give a good title to third parties without the concurrence of the sellers. It is not as though the buyer's title was to be automatically divested in the happening of an event. It is divested only at his option, an option which indeed only becomes exercisable in a certain event but remains his option still. Nor is it a possibility that the seller may become owner again, if called upon to take the goods back, equivalent to the reservation of an interest under the original sale. No authority was forthcoming for the contention that it suffices for the preservation of a belligerent right of capture, if mere provision is made for the contingency of a new interest arising in the original enemy seller upon the happening of a condition subsequent, and their Lordships are not minded thus to extend a rule which in itself may in some cases press hardly upon neutral trade. Their Lordships are accordingly of opinion that the agreement, truly construed, provides for a sale out and out to the buyers and a consequent passing of the property to them on delivery to them at Lisbon, with a supplementary option to the buyers in a certain event to require the sellers to buy back the goods at a price agreed.

It was laid down by their Lordships' board in The Ariel (11 Moore, 119) and in The Baltica (sup.), after full discussion, and more recently in the consolidated appeals of The Kronprinsessan Margareta, The Parana, and other Ships (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 170: 1_4 L. T. Rep. 609; (1921) A. C. 486), that a neutral can acquire the property in merchandise from an enemy owner, while the merchandise is afloat, if there is an out and out transfer, neither accompanied by elements of unreality nor by any reservation of property therein to the seller, provided that the buyer takes actual delivery and not a mere symbolical delivery by handing over mercantile documents.

The question, therefore, arises whether the appellants got actual delivery of the magnesite at Lisbon, and this comes to be the crucial question in the appeal as being the real test whether the transitus of the ore was truly determined. After the agreement for the sale of the magnesite had been entered into war broke out between Portugal and the German Empire, and the Portuguese Government took possession of the German ships lying in the Tagus, including the Naxos, and hoisted on them the Portuguese flag. It is suggested that this in itself terminated the original transitus of the Naxos, as no doubt in a physical sense it did, and thereby put an end to the rights of His Majesty, such as they might be, to seize the cargo of the Naxos if afterwards found at sea, no matter what the circumstances or nature of its transfer to new owners. It is a singular result of the entry into the war of a friendly Power in aid of His Majesty and his allies, and there is no reason why the exercise by the Portuguese Government of their right to requisition the ship should prejudice their allies as to the cargo. No authority for the proposition was forthcoming.

For some time no progress was made with the discharge of the magnesite, but eventually in September the appellants sent to Lisbon, as a special representative, their managing director, M. Barendrecht, and he obtained from the Portuguese Government permission for the discharge of the magnesite from the Naxos. This was done, and for a time the ore was stored on the quay, the costs of stevedoring and storage being paid by the appellants and the instructions for the work being given by M. Barendrecht, who was present, according to his affidavit, on their behalf. From the quay the ore was subsequently loaded on the three vessels, belonging to the Koninklyke Nederlandsche Stoomboot Maatshappij, which were detained by the British naval forces. The Internationale Magnesiet Werken indorsed the Naxos bills of lading to the appellants, M. Barendrecht handed them to the Netherlands Consulate at Lisbon, and new bills of lading were given for the carriage by the ships in question to Amsterdam. It is true that these bills of lading described the Netherlands Consul as shipper and as consignees the Netherlands Overseas Trust, but the former was acting on behalf of the appellants, to whom he was giving official assistance, and the consignment to the latter was in accordance with the general regulations of the Trust and for the purpose of effecting delivery to the appellants for consumption in Holland. Indeed, in the bills of lading there are express provisions that the ships' agents are to notify the appellants, and one at any rate of them is indorsed to the appellants by the Netherlands Overseas Trust. Their Lordships think it clear that, on delivery of the ore overside ex the Naxos, the Internationale Magnesiet Werken washed their hands of it, and that, in accordance with the contract, the appellant company directed and were liable for whatever was done with it till it was reloaded on the forwarding steamers. It follows that the appellants took actual delivery at Lisbon. It is not a question of constructive possession by delivery to a carrier, who recognises by the form of his bill of lading his obligation to deliver to the consignee; it is as complete delivery as is possible to a company, which can only act by human agents.

Had the claimants failed to establish their title, an argument was to have been submitted to their Lordships, which was admitted before the President, that if the ore had not become neutral property it remained enemy property and was being carried under a neutral flag to a neutral country without ulterior destination of any kind. Accordingly the Declaration of Paris was to have been invoked. It appears to have been overlooked that the claimants could only use this argument after their own title to independent rights had been negatived. They never purported to have merely bought the enemy owners' right or chance of escape. They could not claim on behalf of the enemy owners, if the enemy owners could not claim for themselves, and if the enemy owners were competent to claim for themselves, they should have entered an appearance and have done so. Enemy claimants have been repeatedly recognised, to assert rights under international conventions (e.g., The Möwe, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; 112 L. T. Rep. 261; (1915) P. 1; The Marie Glaeser, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218), or to contest condemnation of their goods, if shipped or carried under circumstances which give immunity from capture: (The Roumanian, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) 1 A. C. 124; The Hakan, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479; 117 L. T. Rep.

619; (1918) A. C. 148, at p. 150). Their Lordships have already decided that ownership claims on appeal must be made by appellants who come before the board as owners. It follows that, if this point had arisen for decision, the claimants would have failed upon the preliminary ground that it was not available to them.

In the result their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be allowed with costs, and that the decree appealed against should be reversed and the goods or their proceeds should be released to the appellants.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Friday, Feb. 25, 1921.

JAPY FRERES AND CO. v. R. W. J. SUTHERLAND AND CO.; R. W. J. SUTHERLAND AND CO. v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP THOEGER. (a)

APPEALS FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Dead-weight—Permanent ballast of cement—"Whole reach and lawful burthen of ship"—Carrying capacity—"Carrying about 600 tons dead-weight without guarantee"—Rate of hire.

The steamship T. was described in a charter-party dated the 24*th April* 1917 as being "supposed to carry about 600 tons but no guarantee given dead-weight on Board of Trade summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers." The charterers on the same day sub-chartered the vessel by a sub-charter, describing her therein as "carrying about 600 tons dead-weight on Board of Trade summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers without guarantee." At the time when the vessel was delivered under the terms of the charter and the sub-charter she had some 100 to 150 tons of hard cement fixed in her holds, which reduced her total dead-weight capacity to about 497 tons.

Held, (1) that in giving the whole reach and burthen of the ship as it existed at the time of the charter, the owners had performed their covenant that the whole reach and lawful burthen of the ship should be at the charterers' disposal; and (2) that the words "without guarantee" protected the owners from liability in respect of the dead-weight capacity being short of 600 tons.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. reversed.

APPEALS from decisions of Rowlatt, J. on the awards of an umpire in the form of special cases stated for the opinion of the court. The two charter-parties were treated as one for the purposes of argument in court.

By a charter-party in writing dated the 24th April 1917 made between Robertson, Shankland, and Co. Limited, as agents for the owners of the steamship Thoeger (thereinafter called "the owners") and the above-named R. W. J. Sutherland and Co. (thereinafter called "the charterers") it was agreed that the owners should let and the charterers hire the said steamer for the term of twelve calendar months from the time she was placed at the disposal of the charterers as therein mentioned.

The said steamer was described in the charter-party as follows: "Of 459 tons gross register, 265 tons net register, carrying about loaded March 1917 464 tons coke and 51 tons bunkers supposed to carry about 600 tons but no guarantee given dead-weight on Board of Trade summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers." By clauses 5 and 33 of the charter-party it was agreed that the charterers should pay as hire 3000*l.* sterling per calendar month, the hire to be paid at a minimum rate of exchange of 17 kroners to the pound sterling. By clause 8 it was provided that the whole reach and lawful burthen of the steamer, including lawful deck capacity (compatible with vessel's seaworthiness), not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry, should be at the charterers' disposal, reserving only proper accommodation for the steamer's officers, crew, tackle, provisions, and stores. By clause 27 it was provided that in the event of any dispute arising it should be referred to arbitration in London, one arbitrator to be nominated by each party, and in case the arbitrators should not agree the matter was to be referred to the decision of an umpire. The said vessel was duly delivered by the owners to the charterers for the purpose of fulfilling the said charter-party, and ran thereon for twelve and one-third months. On the same date—i.e., the 24th April 1917—the charterers sub-chartered the vessel to Japy Frères at the rate of 3600*l.* per month. In the sub-charter the vessel was described as follows: "Of 459 gross register, 265 tons net register, carrying about 600 tons dead-weight on Board of Trade summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers without guarantee." In other respects the sub-charter party was identical with the head charter. Both charter-parties contained a clause giving the charterers the option of sub-letting the vessel. The sub-charterers made claims under the sub-charter against the charterers alleging that the vessel was capable of carrying on Board of Trade summer freeboard about 497 tons dead-weight only. The said claims were eventually referred to an umpire for his decision, and by an award in writing in the form of a special case the umpire held that, subject to the opinion of the court, the sub-charterers were entitled to recover from the charterers the sum of 8394*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* Disputes then arose between the charterers and the owners, the former alleging that, relying upon clause 8 and the statement as to tonnage in the said (head) charter-party, they had entered into the aforesaid sub-charter to Japy Frères, and that if Japy Frères were entitled to recover any damages from the charterers, the latter were entitled to recover the same amount from the owners. The charterers further claimed that a vessel of the net and gross registered tonnage of 265 and 459 respectively had ordinarily a total dead-weight capacity of about 600 tons, and that in April 1917 the market rate hire of a vessel of the carrying capacity of 497 ons total dead-weight (which they alleged to be the capacity of the Thoeger) was 600*l.* per month les than the market rate hire of a vessel carrying 600 tons dead-weight all told, making a difference on the hiring for twelve and one-third months of 7400*l.*, and, further, that, having had to pay at a fixed rate of exchange, they had (owing to the fall in the Swedish exchange against the United Kingdom) in fact paid in all 8394*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* more than they would have paid on a hiring at 2400*l.* per month. The charterers further alleged that the steamer was placed at their disposal with 100 to 150 tons of hard cement fixed in her holds, which had reduced the total dead-weight capacity the vessel would otherwise have had to about 497 tons.

(a) Reported by R. F. BLACKISTON and W. C. SANDFORD, Esqrs., Barrister-at-Law.

The questions between the owners and charterers were duly referred to arbitration, and eventually an umpire was desired to state a case for the opinion of the court on the questions of law arising out of the dispute. The umpire found as a fact in the first instance that on the delivery of the said vessel to the charterers she had in her holds between the floors a large quantity of cement approximately from 100 to 150 tons. The said cement was fixed and irremovable, it having apparently been placed in the vessel for the purpose of acting as permanent ballast. The effect of the said cement was that upon the vessel loading a dead-weight cargo instead of loading and carrying (as she would otherwise have done) about 600 tons on her Board of Trade summer freeboard she was capable of loading about 500 tons. The charterers claimed that they had suffered damage by reason of this to the extent of any damages they might be held liable to pay to their sub-charterers, or, alternatively, 600*l.* per month, plus the extra cost of the arbitrary rate of exchange, viz. :

Difference in value between a vessel of 600 tons dead-weight capacity and a vessel of 497 tons at 600*l.* per month for 12¼ months	7,400	0	0
Additional cost by reason of Exchange fluctuation	994	1	11
	8,394	1	11
They further claimed in the event of their being held liable to their sub-charterers for the same the cost of insurance in excess of an insurance on Kr.300.000	4,383	19	9
	12,778	1	8

The charterers on the arbitration put forward the following as their contentions :

(1) That a cargo steamship of the measured tonnage described in the charter-party of the 24th April 1917 between the parties had ordinarily a total summer dead-weight carrying capacity of about 600 tons.

(2) That the hold of the Thoeger contained 100 to 150 tons of cement, and was therefore unable to carry the amount of cargo ordinarily carried by a cargo steamship of the tonnage described.

(3) That the owners failed to give the charterers any notice of the fact that the hold of the Thoeger contained such quantity of cement, or that the vessel was unable to carry the ordinary amount proper to her tonnage as described.

(4) That the presence of the said quantity of cement constituted a breach of the warranty contained in clause 8 of the charter-party of the 24th April 1917.

(5) That the charterers, relying upon the warranty contained in clause 8 and the statements as to tonnage contained in the said charter-party between the parties of the 24th April 1917, rechartered the Thoeger to Messrs. Japy Frères on the same day.

(6) That the true measure of the damages which the charterers will suffer is the loss, if any, resulting to the charterers from the breach of warranty of clause 8 by the owners, or from the omission of the owners to notify the charterers of (a) the presence of the cement in her hold ; (b) the fact that the vessel could not carry the ordinary amount of cargo proper to her tonnage as described.

(7) That the amount of such damage is the amount. if anv. which the charterers may be called upon to pay to their sub-charterers, Messrs. Japy Frères, in respect of the charter-party between them of the 24th April 1917.

The owners put forward as the points of law which they required to be stated :

(1) That on the true construction of the charter-party there was no guarantee of the carrying capacity of the vessel.

(2) That the presence of the cement in the hold did not constitute a breach of any representation made in the charter-party or deprive the charterers of the carrying space for which they had contracted.

(3) That if, as the charterers alleged. the vessel tendered was commercially different from that described in the charter-party, the charterers by their conduct in continuing to trade the vessel after they became aware of the presence of the cement waived any objection and treated the vessel as a proper tender under the charter-party.

(4) That the presence of the cement did not constitute a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness.

(5) That the charterers had not suffered any damage the true measure of which was the difference between the amount paid for the ship and the amount which the vessel was worth as a ship of about 500 tons dead-weight, which was proved to be at the rate of 6*l.* per ton, or 3000*l.* in all. The owners claimed that on this view of the measure of damages they were not concerned with any restitution which the charterers might be liable to make to their sub-charterers on the speculative sub-charter.

The following facts were found by the umpire :

No evidence was offered that the statements in the charter-party that the vessel had loaded 464 tons coke and 51 tons bunkers in March 1917 was not correct, nor was any evidence offered as to the owners' reasons for stating that she was "supposed to carry about 600 tons, but no guarantee given."

The statement as to the quantity of coke and bunkers carried would be no guide to the vessel's dead-weight capacity on account of the light and varying specific gravity of coke, and, if and so far as it be material and a question of fact for me, I find that the owners would not have been justified in making any representation or warranty that the vessel in fact had a dead-weight capacity of anything approximating to 600 tons in that they had no reasonable ground for such a statement. If and so far as it be a question of fact for me, I find that the statement in the charter-party did not amount to any representation or warranty of fact on this point except as to a supposition.

No evidence was given by either party as to when the cement was put in the vessel (which was built in 1889) or as to whether it was in her when she was measured for the calculation of her registered tonnage, but it was assumed by the charterers and not challenged by the owners that it was added subsequently to such measurement, and there is a very strong presumption that this was so. If I am entitled to act on this, I find that the cement was not in her when she was measured. Its presence would probably have made no difference in her registered tonnage, which depends on certain arbitrary rules for calculation of the ship's cubical contents based on certain measurements, but, owing to the specific gravity of cement, even if it had been in her then and allowed for in her measurement, it would not have made any very substantial difference in her measurement for registration tonnage purposes. The dead-weight capacity of a vessel may vary after she is built and measured for registration purposes by reason of alterations or additions. In my view the charter-party in question does not imply that the vessel has the same dead-weight capacity when chartered as when she was measured for registration. Subject to this, I find, if it be material, that the owners did not place at the charterers' disposal the whole reach and burthen of the steamer as she was originally built and measured for her gross and net registered tonnage not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry in that the vessel contained, as stated above, about 100 or more tons of cement fixed between the floors of the holds as permanent ballast, the addition of which to the vessel's weight prevented the utilisation of the dead-weight lifting capacity for cargo and bunkers which the vessel would otherwise have had to the extent of 100 tons or thereabouts. If, however, the vessel is to be taken as she was when chartered, i.e., with her fixed ballast, then her full reach and burthen was placed at the disposal of the charterers. No notice was given to the charterers that this ballast was in the vessel. The dead-weight capacity of the vessel with this permanent ballast was about 500 tons and no more. If and so far as it is material, I find that the difference between a vessel of 500 tons dead-weight capacity and of 600 tons dead-weight capacity is so great as to make the latter commercially a different thing from the former. The presence of the cement did, subject as stated above, encroach on the original dead-weight capacity of the vessel, but being between the floors it did not encroach on the cargo space, i.e., cubic capacity of holds as distinguished from dead-weight capacity.

The gross and net register tonnage of the vessel was correctly stated in the charter-party, but that would not give a reliable indication of her dead-weight capacity. There is no fixed ratio between the two things, but the dead-weight capacity of 500 tons as compared with her gross and net register tonnage was abnormally small. A steamer of 459 tons gross and 265 tons net would ordinarily be estimated as likely to carry nearer 600 than 500 tons, but such estimates are mere approximations based on rule of thumb and are liable to considerable error from a variety of causes, and a prudent commercial man would not rely on such estimates for the purpose of buying or hiring such a steamer for dead-weight carrying purposes. The presence of the cement in the hold of the Thoeger did not in any way detract from her seaworthiness. No sufficient evidence was given to enable me to decide whether the vessel would have been seaworthy without ballast, but the probability is that the vessel having no water ballast would when sailing light have required some although not fixed ballast, but no evidence was given to enable me to form any conclusion as to the quantity of ballast (if any) that she would have required under such circumstances. The difference in hire value between a vessel of 500 tons and of 600 tons dead-weight capacity on the time charter in question was difficult to ascertain, there being little or no market at the time in question, and rates paid fluctuated considerably. No evidence was given to me by either party of any other measure of damages than a comparison of time charter rates. On the assumption that in the absence of other evidence the proper measure of damages is the difference in time charter hire value at the date the charter was made, then I find that this vessel was worth 600*l.* per month less with a carrying capacity of 500 tons only than she would have been with a carrying capacity of 600 tons. The charter-party imposed upon the charterers an obligation to pay at a fixed rate of exchange, and, taking this into account, I find that the charterers during the period of the charter-party paid 8394*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* more than they would have paid at a hire of 2400*l.* per month. If the court is of opinion that the cost of exchange should not be taken into account, then this amount will be reduced to 7400*l.*

I find that it would have made no substantial difference in the value of this vessel for insurance purposes whether she was capable of carrying five or six hundred tons, and in my finding above in allowing 600*l.* per month as the difference in value for time charter purposes of the vessel I am of opinion and find that a charterer paying 2400*l.* per month for the Thoeger of 500 tons carrying capacity would have had to pay the same insurance as that provided in the charter-party now under consideration. Subject to the opinion of the court on all questions of law arising upon the facts as above stated, I find and award as follows:

(a) That the charterers are not entitled to recover anything from the owners.

(b) That the charterers do pay to the owners their costs of this reference and shall also pay the arbitrators' and my fees and expenses of this award and special case amounting to 230*l.* 9*s.*

If the court be of opinion that the statements and provisions in the charter-party as to the vessel's capacity and the findings of fact as above do impose a liability upon the owners and that my finding in par. 17 is wrong in law, then I find and award that the charterers shall recover from the owners (a) the sum of 8394*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

If the court whilst holding the charterers entitled to recover damages shall be of opinion that the charterers are not entitled to recover the additional cost of hire by reason of the fixed exchange or the damages which the charterers have been held liable to pay to their sub-charterers, then I find (b) that the charterers shall recover from the owners 7400*l.* and no more.

And, further, in either of the last-mentioned cases I direct that the owners shall pay to the charterers the costs of this reference and the arbitrators' and my fees and expenses of the reference and this my award as above set out.

Leck, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the appellants, Messrs. R. W. J. Sutherland and Co.—The umpire was wrong in the conclusion he came to in his award. No guarantee as to the dead-weight capacity of the vessel was given, and, there being no warranty, there was equally no condition under the contract. The presence of the cement in the hold of the vessel did in fact render her more seaworthy. As to the question of warranty or condition, see Harrison (T. and J.) v. Knowles and Foster, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 249; 118 L. T. Rep. 566; (1918) 1 K. B. 608.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Rowland Thomas for Messrs. Japy Frères and Co.—There was not merely a breach of warranty, but a condition was implied in the form of the words used in the charter-party. The description of the vessel as carrying about 600 tons constituted a condition in the contract between the parties for the breach of which the charterers are liable in damages. The court is referred to the case of Wallis and others v. Pratt and another, 105 L. T. Rep. 146; (1911) A. C. 394.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt for the Norwegian owners.—The umpire has found in my clients' favour on his award. There was no contract of any kind that the vessel should be capable of lifting 600 tons. On the contrary, the owners had expressly refused to give an undertaking of that nature, and had been careful to state that there was no guarantee as to lifting capacity. There was no implied term in the contract to the effect that the vessel was not to have ballast.

Rowlatt, J.—The two charter-parties in these cases are, in my judgment, the same in effect. In both charters the vessel was described correctly as to her net tonnage and supposed carrying capacity of 600 tons dead-weight without guarantee. When the vessel was delivered it was found that she carried permanent ballast in her hold, consisting of cement, which had the effect of reducing her carrying capacity from 600 to 500 tons or thereabouts. In my opinion, both charterers and sub-charterers are entitled to recover because the owners did not place at their disposal the full reach and burthen of the steamer. I am not considering any question as to the alleged breach of warranty in clause 1 of the charters, nor do I think that the case of Wallis v. Pratt and Haynes (sup.) cited in argument affects the question. The charterers are entitled to the full reach and burthen of the ship as constructed, and this they did not obtain. It was lessened owing to the presence of the cement in the hold of the vessel. The cement was certainly ballast, but it was permanent ballast and could not therefore be taken out. The charterers have been prevented from fully loading the ship, and the description of the ship in the first clause of the charter-party, dealing with burthen and capacity, does not affect the question in the case. The result of my judgment is that the award in favour of Messrs. Japy Frères and Co. is confirmed to the extent of 7400*l.*, and that part of the award which is in favour of the owners, Messrs. Sutherland and Co., is reversed. The award will have to go back to the umpire on the question of damages relating to the removal of the ballast and other similar matters.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Jowitt for the owners.

Leck, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the charterers.

F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. and Rowland Thomas for the sub-charterers.

Bankes, L.J.—A claim was made by time charterers for damages on the ground that the vessel which had been chartered to them was not of the carrying capacity to which they were entitled under the charter-party. The charterers had themselves sub-chartered the vessel, and the sub-charterers had brought an action against the charterers on the same ground. Both claims were referred to arbitration; in both cases the umpire stated a special case, which came before Rowlatt, J. Before the umpire and before the learned judge two points were made: one in reference to the proper construction of the opening words of the charter, the contention being that there had been a warranty that the carrying capacity of the vessel was about 600 tons; the other, which depended on clause 8 of the charter, being an allegation that the owners had failed to give the whole reach and lawful burthen of the vessel to the charterers and sub-charterers respectively.

The vessel, the Thoeger, was apparently very old, and at some time in her career (the date when and circumstances in which it occurred are not given) a considerable quantity of concrete or cement had been placed in her bottom as permanent ballast. The umpire has found that "the said cement was fixed and irremovable, it having apparently been placed in the vessel for the purpose of acting as permanent ballast." I think that this point about placing the whole reach and lawful burthen of the ship at the disposal of the charterers depends on what is the true inference to be drawn in reference to that operation. If the true inference is that it was merely loose ballast, however heavy or difficult it might be to remove, the charterers might perhaps have had a right to call upon the owners to remove it, or to complain, if it was not removed, that they were not getting what they were entitled to, viz., the full reach and burthen of the vessel. But this cement was fixed and irremovable and was intended to act as permanant ballast; and the inference which I think should be drawn is that from the time when it was placed there the cement must be treated as if it were a part of the vessel herself just as much so as the deck or any other permanent part of the vessel. If that is the true inference to draw I understand that it is not disputed that if the owners gave the charterers the full cargo space existing at the time of the charter they would be fulfilling their obligations under the clause. Rowlatt, J., as I understand his judgment, has drawn the same inference as I from the facts. He says "then it was found that she had been permanently ballasted with cement and that reduced her dead-weight carrying capacity to 500 tons." If he meant by that that he drew the same inference from this alteration—I feel satisfied that it was an alteration—of the vessel as I do, then with great respect I cannot agree with his conclusion that the charterers were entitled to recover on the ground that the full reach and burthen of the vessel were not put at their disposal. He goes on to say "they did not get the full reach and burthen of the ship as I understand she was constructed." By that he must mean "originally constructed," and I do not think that that is the true view of clause 8 of the charter-party. I think that it refers to the reach and burthen of the vessel as then existing. I agree that by clause 8, providing that the full reach and burthen of the vessel shall be given, the charterer is to have both the full cargo space and the full lifting capacity; but I cannot agree that where such a permanent alteration as this has been made in the vessel the owner is committing a breach of his contract if he does not remove it.

The other point in the case depends on the construction of the language of the charter-party. Before the umpire it was contended, as I understand, that there was a warranty of the capacity of the vessel. The umpire found that in fact the vessel's full capacity was about 500 tons dead-weight, and it was said that upon a true construction of the language used there was a warranty that the carrying capacity was 600 tons dead-weight. But we have heard no argument in support of that contention in this court beyond this, that there was a description of the vessel as being of 600 tons dead-weight, and that as she was in fact of only 500 tons dead-weight capacity the difference of 100 tons rendered her commercially something different from the thing contracted for. It is said that because the owners handed over a vessel substantially different from the one referred to in the charter-party the charterers and sub-charterers have a right of action for damages for breach of warranty. Reliance was placed on the case of Wallis and others v. Pratt and another (105 L. T. Rep. 146; (1911) A. C. 394); but in my opinion there is a clear distinction between that case and this. The sale there was of common English sainfoin, and what was supplied was not common English sainfoin at all, or English sainfoin of any description, but giant sainfoin, which is something quite different. The contract of sale contained a provision that "the sellers give no warranty, express or implied, as to growth, description or any other matters," and it was held that, inasmuch as the article supplied was not the article contracted for at all, the sellers had not protected themselves by a provision which had reference to some failure in quality or description in the article which they had contracted to sell. But here the charter is of a named vessel, so there is no doubt that the charterers and the sub-charterers have got the thing which they contracted for, in the sense that they got the very vessel. Besides the description of the vessel by name there were words of description dealing with her carrying capacity, and the question is whether the owners in the one case, and the charterers in the other, sufficiently protected themselves against any action for breach of warranty in respect of that description. The language used in the charter is not quite the same as that used in the sub-charter, but it is not suggested that there is really any substantial difference between them. In the charter the words are "supposed to carry about 600 tons but no guarantee given"; in the sub-charter, the words are "carrying about 600 tons dead-weight but without guarantee." There is, therefore, a description of the named steamer with reference to her carrying capacity, but a perfectly plain statement that the description is given without guarantee; and it appears to me that the charterers and the sub-charterers fail in establishing any right of action on the ground that the vessel was not of a guaranteed carrying capacity. The appeals therefore succeed; the judgments must be set aside and the appropriate judgments entered according to the findings of the umpire upon the view of the case which I have presented.

Scrutton, L.J.—I agree, and can shortly express my opinion. This case relates to a small tramp steamer of considerable antiquity. At some time in her history her owners had thought it advisable to provide her with permanent ballast by filling in the space under the hold with cement, so that her bottom was a mass of cement. The effect of that was not to reduce the space of her hold, but to reduce her effective lifting power for certain sorts of cargo which might not need ballast. Rowlatt, J. has found that this permanent ballast is a breach of a clause in the charter to give the full reach and lawful burthen of the ship to the charterers, and apparently he has come to that conclusion because he regards the charter as a charter of the ship as originally constructed.

In my view the charter is primâ facie a charter of the ship as she existed at the time when the charter was made. It is the duty of a shipowner to provide the necessary ballast for a chartered voyage, and if he has on board movable ballast which is unnecessary for the chartered voyage it is his duty to discharge it. But—and this is entirely a question of degree—if the ballast is so permanent that it may be treated as part of the structure of the ship I can see no obligation on the shipowners to remove that permanent ballast because it is not necessary, or there is more of it than is necessary, for the particular voyage. In that case it appears to me there is no breach of the contract to provide the burthen of the ship, for I think that that contract refers to the ship as she is at the time of the contract, with the permanent ballast in her.

Here the umpire found that the cement is fixed and irremovable and was intended to act as permanent ballast. We are bound by his finding of fact, and on that finding I think there has been no breach of the contract to provide the full reach and burthen of the ship. Mr. MacKinnon has referred to a case which actually occurred where a cargo of asphalt became solidified without the intention of the parties, but there there was no intention to make the solidified material part of the structure of the ship; the intention was to the contrary. I think, therefore, that the decision of Rowlatt, J. on this point was wrong.

Now it was argued that though the charter was of a named ship, the words "carrying about 600 tons dead-weight" had the effect, in spite of the words excluding any guarantee, of making the ship not of the description contracted for. For my own part whenever I find a statement of fact I am inclined, if I can, to give some legal effect to it. I always assume that people have a reason for putting in a statement of fact. Here the general description of the ship is correct; it was named as stated and was of the tonnage stated, and I can only read the statement that she could carry 600 tons "without guarantee" as being a refusal to contract that she shall actually carry 600 tons and that there shall be a right to claim damages if she does not. Such a phrase ought to put the charterers on inquiry as to what is really the matter with the ship. It is not necessary to decide the point, but I myself should have been disposed to think that this was a representation the untruth of which would have enabled the other party to rescind the contract on discovering the untruth. But the charterer here had obtained much too profitable a sub-charter for him to want to rescind the charter; and nobody did take any steps to rescind the charter, treating this as a representation. If it is attempted to treat it as a term of the contract the breach of which gives a right to damages then I think the words "without guarantee" preclude any claim; and the description of the named ship appears to be satisfactorily complied with, for it was that named ship that was handed to the charterers. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree. I think that the original reach and burthen of the ship had been permanently changed by an irremovable alteration of her arrangement, and since that alteration her reach and burthen had been of the smaller capacity mentioned by the umpire. In these circumstances I think that there was no breach of contract by the shipowner, because he gave to the charterers the full reach and burthen of the ship at the time the contract was made.

As to the second point, I think that the words "without guarantee" negative the notion that the words as to carrying capacity had any contractual operation, and therefore there was no breach of contract in reference to the alleged condition or warranty as to carrying capacity.

Appeals allowed.

Arbitration and award—Practice—Amendment of award—"Error arising from any accidental slip or omission"—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 7 (c).

S. and Co. were the charterers and H. and Co. were the sub-charterers of a steamship. At the termination of the charter-party questions arose with regard to the balance of hire and of insurance premiums. The owners claimed against the charterers, and the charterers claimed against the sub-charterers. Both disputes were referred to arbitration. As the arbitrators disagreed, the disputes came before the same umpire, who, in the first case, namely, that between the owners and the charterers, awarded that the costs of the arbitration, which he assessed at 130*l.*, and taxed costs should be paid by the charterers. In the second case, that between the charterers and the sub-charterers, the umpire awarded that the sub-charterers should pay to the charterers for hire and insurance, and proceeded: "I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration, which I assess at 130*l. and taxed costs, as well as costs of the arbitration between the owners and Sutherland and Co. (the charterers) on the same subject, except taxed costs of the sitting of the* 27*th June* 1919, shall be paid by the charterers" [i.e., the sub-charterers in the second arbitration.].

As the parties were not clear as to what costs were payable by the sub-charterers under the umpire's award, correspondence ensued between the solicitors for S. and Co. and the solicitors for H. and Co., and a letter was written to the umpire suggesting that a clerical mistake or error arising from an accidental slip had been made in the award. The umpire being under the impression that he had made an error in writing his award delivered a further award which he said he had amended so that it should read as he had originally intended to state it. The amended award was as follows: "I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration, which I assess at 130*l.*, and taxed costs, as well as costs of the arbitration and the taxed costs of the owners against Sutherland and Co. and Sutherland and Co.'s own costs of the arbitration . . . shall be paid by the charterers [i.e. the sub-charterers in the second arbitration] . . . "

Held, that the amended award must be set aside because the umpire had no power to expound what he had purposely written in his original award. The arbitrator had written down everything which he intended, and nothing which he had not intended, to write down; he had therefore no jurisdiction to alter his award. There was no "error arising from an accidental slip or omission" within the meaning of sect. 7 (c) of the Arbitration Act 1889, which enacts that an arbitrator had power "to correct in an award any clerical mistake or error arising from an accidental slip or omission."

(a) Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Motion to set aside an award.

By a charter-party made on the 30th April 1917, between R. W. J. Sutherland and Co., the charterers (herein called "the respondents"), and the owners of the steamship Steady (re-named the Oistein), the owners chartered the steamship in question to the respondents. On the 4th May 1917, the respondents by a sub-charter, re-chartered the steamship Steady to Hannevig Brothers Limited, the sub-charterers (herein called "the applicants") The terms and conditions of the sub-charter were identical with those of the charter-party of the 30th April 1917.

Disputes arose between the parties, and these were referred to two arbitrations, one between the owners and the respondents, as charterers, and the other between the respondents, as disponents, and the applicants as sub-charterers. The owners claimed against the respondents as charterers. The respondents, in their turn, claimed over against the applicants, the sub-charterers. Both disputes ultimately came before the same umpire. In the first arbitration, the umpire having made his award on the points at issue ordered the charterers to pay the costs in these terms: "I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration, which I assess at 130*l.*, and taxed costs shall be paid by the charterers, and, if in the first place they shall have been paid by the owners, the latter shall forthwith be reimbursed for such costs by the charterers."

In the second arbitration, namely, the one between the respondents (the charterers) and the applicants (the sub-charterers), the umpire awarded that the applicants should pay certain sums, and on the question of costs, he added: "I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration which I assess at 130*l.* and taxed costs, as well as costs of the arbitration between the owners and Messrs. Sutherlands (the respondents) on the same subject, except taxed costs of the sitting of the 27th June 1919, shall be paid by the charterers (in this case the sub-charterers, the applicants), and if, in the first place, they shall have been paid by the disponents (i.e., the respondents), the latter shall forthwith be reimbursed by the charterers (i.e. the applicants)."

The respondents thought that the award did not define sufficiently clearly, the costs which the applicants (Messrs. Hannevig Brothers Limited) were to pay. Accordingly, the respondents' solicitors, on the 20th May 1920, wrote to the umpire as follows:

Dear Sir,—On perusing the award in this matter we are under the impression that a clerical mistake or error arising from an accidental slip or omission has been made in the award. The award gives to our clients, Sutherland and Co., the costs of the arbitration between the owners of the steamship Steady and Sutherland and Co., and what we are anxious to understand is as to whether that was intended to cover the costs which Sutherland and Co. have to pay the owners, and Sutherland and Co.'s own costs of that arbitration as well as the arbitrator's fees. For your guidance we enclose herewith the original award, and shall be glad to hear from you on the point."

A few days later, the umpire informed a member of the firm of the respondents' solicitors that he certainly had made an error in writing his award and had amended his award so that it should read as he originally intended to state it. The umpire then issued an amended award in which the clause dealing with costs read as follows: "I further find and award that the costs of this arbitration, which I assess at 130*l.* and taxed costs as well as costs of the arbitration and the taxed costs of the owners against Sutherland and Co., and Sutherland and Co.'s own costs of the arbitration between the owners and Sutherland and Co., on the same subject . . . shall be paid by the charterers" (i.e. in this case) Hannevig Brothers Limited.

The applicants refused to pay the costs added by the amended award, and they moved to set aside the award on the ground that such an amendment was not within sect. 7, sub-sect. (c) of the Arbitration Act 1889, which provides that: "The arbitrators or umpire acting under a submission shall, unless the submission expresses a contrary intention, have power . . . (c) to correct in an award any clerical mistake or error arising from any accidental slip or omission."

The applicants contended that the umpire was functus officio and had no power to alter his award.

D. C. Leck, K.C., and Hildesley for the applicants, Hannevig Brothers Limited.

Le Quesne for the respondents, Sutherland and Co.

Rowlatt, J.—In this case an extremely difficult and important question has arisen with regard to the extent of the powers conferred on arbitrators by clause (c) of sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889. Sect. 7 of the Act of 1889 provides that: "The arbitrators or umpire acting under a submission shall, unless the submission expresses a contrary intention, have power . . . (c) to correct in an award any clerical mistake or error arising from any accidental slip or omission."

On the construction of those words as a matter of grammar "clerical" belongs to "mistake" only, and "error arising from any accidental slip or omission" is a second and independent limb of the clause. The words of the clause are similar to those found in Order XXVIII, r.11, R. S. C., and, in my opinion, the greater part of the difficulty has arisen owing to the extent of the meaning which has been given to the words of that order. I cannot help feeling that, as applied to arbitrators, the words ought to be construed rather strictly.

Before the passing of the Arbitration Act 1889, it is clear that the courts regarded it as very dangerous to allow arbitrators to alter or amend their awards after they had made them. The well-known case on that point is Mordue v. Palmer (23 L. T. Rep. 752; L. Rep. 6 Ch. 22). In that case the error corrected by the arbitrator arose from the mistake of a clerk in copying the draft award, and it was held that the arbitrator could not put the mistake right, being functus officio. Such a state of things as that has been clearly altered by sect. 7, clause (c) of the Arbitration Act 1889. The difficulty, however, which still remains is to see how far the alteration has gone.

In the present case, the arbitrator made an award, and he included in his award certain costs incurred in a matter between one of the parties and a third party, and the question arose whether the words he had used included all those costs or only some of them. The award was sent back to the arbitrator and he told Mr. Lewis, of the firm of solicitors representing the respondents, that he certainly had made an error in writing his award, and he amended it so that it read, as he said, as he had originally intended that it should read.

Now that was not correcting a clerical mistake within the meaning of clause (c) of sect. 7 of the Act of 1889. What is meant there is something almost mechanical—a slip of the pen or something of that kind. Then the question is did the arbitrator correct an error arising from an accidental slip or omission? Here we get upon ground which is almost metaphysical. An accidental slip implies that something has been wrongly put in by accident, and an accidental omission implies that something has been left out by accident. That raises a further question, namely: What is an accident in this connection, an accident affecting the expression of a man's thought?

Such an accident is a very difficult thing to define, but I am of opinion that what took place in connection with the award in this case was not an accident within the meaning of the clause. I cannot pretend to give a formula which will cover every case, but in this case there was nothing omitted by accident. The arbitrator, in fact, wrote down exactly what he intended to write down, although it is doubtful what that really meant when considered from a legal point of view; and he has now really assumed a jurisdiction to expound what he had purposely written down. That is a thing which he has no jurisdiction to do.

Mr. Le Quesne, counsel for the respondents, has contended that it was by inadvertence that the arbitrator did not put down all that he meant to put down. I am of opinion that inadvertence is not the right word to use in this case. A man may inadvertently write down a word which if he had thought more about the matter, he would have written differently, but that merely means that he has gone wrong. I am of opinion, that, in substance, the arbitrator assumed a jurisdiction which he did not possess, namely, to insert in the award an exposition of his words, because he found the words that he had used were not so well chosen as they might, and ought, to have been if chosen after further deliberation. The motion succeeds, and the award must be set aside.

McCardie, J.—I agree that this motion raises a difficult and important question, and my mind has fluctuated a good deal in the course of the argument.

This alteration of the award by the arbitrator was a serious matter, and it involves an important and serious point of law. It is quite clear that under the old law as it stood before the Arbitration Act 1889, the arbitrator could not have made this alteration in his reward, for the law was most rigorous with regard to the limitation of the powers of an arbitrator, and from the moment that he put forward a paper as his award he was functus officio, and could not put right any mistake at all; any alteration was nugatory, and the original award stood—Henfree v. Bromley (6 East 309).

The question for our decision is how far the law has been altered by sect. 7 (c) of the Arbitration Act 1889, which empowers an arbitrator "to correct in an award any clerical mistake or error arising from any accidental slip or omission." I think that the word "accidental" in clause (c) applies both to "slip" and to "omission." The clause is taken from Order XXVIII, r. 11, and decisions under that rule are in point in so far as they are decisions on the rule and not, as many of them are, decisions based rather on the inherent jurisdiction of the court.

In Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Hunter, Scrutton, J. (as he then was) said (110 L. T. Rep. 825; (1914) 3 K.B. 423, at p. 428): "A referee, having once issued his award, cannot issue another without the consent of both parties." In saying that I do not think that the learned judge could have had present to his mind sect. 7 (c) of the Arbitration Act 1889. In Oxley v. Link (110 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) 2 K. B. 734), the Court of Appeal imposed a most stringent rule. In an action against a married woman sued in respect of her separate estate, judgment was by mistake drawn up in the ordinary form against the defendant personally, instead of in the form settled by the Court of Appeal in Scott v. Morley (57 L. T. Rep. 919; 20 Q. B. Div. 120.). It was held that the plaintiffs were not wanting to correct a slip, but were seeking to substitute one form of judgment for another, and that consequently Order XXVIII, r. 11 did not apply.

In this case, the arbitrator clearly did not make a clerical mistake, and the question is: Did he make an accidental slip? I do not think he did. He appears to have put down precisely what he meant to put down, and he did not put in anything that he did not intend to put in, nor did he omit anything that he intended to put in.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the arbitrator was not entitled, under sect. 7 (c) of the Act of 1889, to make the alteration which he did in this case. I may add, that in my view, the court in Doswell v. Norton (18 Times L. Rep. 228) took a very liberal view in interpreting Order XXVIII., r. 11, and I think that it is very doubtful whether that case should be followed.

I agree that the motion succeeds, and that the award must be set aside.

Award set aside.

BROOKE v. THE KING. (a)

Requisition — Undertaking to pay market rate of hire—Limitation order effect—Indemnity—Limitation of Freights (French) Ports Order 1918—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), ss. 1, 2.

At the outbreak of the war with Germany, in 1914, a number of ships, British and neutral, were in the Baltic Sea, and owing to the risk of capture and destruction in attempting to escape from the Baltic, these vessels remained there. But after a time the scarcity of shipping became greater, and it was decided to make every effort to get these ships out of the Baltic. Accordingly, in July 1916, the Board of Trade made a general offer, which was addressed to the Baltic Exchange and communicated to the public, as an inducement to the owners of such vessels to attempt to escape, to the effect that the Admiralty had informed the Board of Trade that they were prepared to guarantee that any British vessel escaping from the Baltic up to March 1917, would either not be requisitioned, or if through some special emergency they had to be requisitioned, they would be paid market rates and not Blue Book rates. The guarantee was to apply also to ships bought by British owners from neutrals. The rates, known as Blue Book rates, on which the Admiralty began to requisition ships in Aug. 1914, were much lower than the current market rates. B., the suppliant, was a shipowner, and, relying on the Board of Trade guarantee above mentioned, purchased two ships at prices far in excess of the value of such ships if they were requisitioned at Blue Book rates, and he took the risk of getting the ships out of the Baltic. In Feb. 1918, the two ships were requisitioned on the express terms that the rate of hire to be paid should be in accordance with the undertaking of July 1916. The Government, however, only paid the suppliant at Blue Book rates, and the suppliant, by a petition of right, claimed the difference between the Blue Book rates paid by the Government and the full market rate of freight. The Crown, by their answer, admitted the undertaking, but relied on the Limitation of Freights (French Ports) Order of the 5th Feb. 1918, and said that that Order fixed the market rate and that the suppliant had been paid the full rate allowed by such Order. They also relied on the Indemnity Act 1920.

Held, that the Limitation of Freights Order did not fix a market rate. The meaning of the undertaking of July 1916, was that the Government would not impose a rate of their own, but would pay what could be obtained in a free market.

Held, also, that the defence of the Indemnity Act 1920 failed, and that the suppliant was entitled to be paid hire at the market rate.

PETITION of right tried by Roche, J.

The suppliant's claim was in respect of the hire of two vessels requisitioned by the Government during the war.

The suppliant, T. E. Brooke, carried on business as a shipowner under the style of T. C. Beatley and Sons. He claimed to recover from the Crown a sum of 69,257*l.*, alleged to be due to him in respect of the employment on requisition of two ships, the Duva and the Cumbrian, from the 5th Feb. 1918 to the 23rd March 1918 in the case of the Duva, which was sunk on that date, and to the 4th March 1919 in the case of the Cumbrian, which was released from requisition on the last-named date. The sum claimed represented the difference between the maximum rate of 28*s.* per deadweight ton per month allowed under the Limitation of Freight (French Ports) Order 1918 (which had been paid by the Crown) and the rates which the two vessels could have earned in an unrestricted market which, according to the suppliant's contention, would be 4*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.* per month.

Immediately after the outbreak of the war with Germany in Aug. 1914, the Government began to requisition ships as required, paying the owners therefor at Blue Book rates, which were considerably lower than the market rates for unrequisitioned tonnage. There were at the outbreak of the war a considerable number of ships, British and neutral, in the Baltic, escape from which was rendered difficult and dangerous by enemy action. Later, when the scarcity of shipping became more acute, the Government offered inducements to the owners of these ships to attempt to effect their escape. The following letter was sent by the Board of Trade at the request of the Admiralty to the Secretary of the Baltic Exchange, and communicated to the public:

Board of Trade, Whitehall, S.W., the 4th July 1916. —Dear Sir,—British shipping in the Baltic.—The Admiralty have informed the Board of Trade that they are prepared to guarantee that any British ships which escape from the Baltic up to the end of March 1917 will either not be requisitioned or if through some special emergency they have to be requisitioned, they will be paid market rates and not Blue Book rates.—Yours faithfully, C. Hipwood.—P.S. It will be remembered that this guarantee applies also to ships bought by British owners from neutrals.

Among the ships then detained in the Baltic were the Duva and the Cumbrian, which were the property of British owners and were the two ships in question in this petition of right. The owners of those two ships, relying on the guarantee contained in the above letter dated the 4th July 1916, at considerable risk procured their escape from the Baltic before the end of March 1917. The suppliant purchased both ships, the one in Jan. 1917, and the other in June 1917, and relying on the terms of the letter of the 4th July 1916, he paid for both vessels much higher prices than he would have done if they had been subject to requisition in the ordinary way. The suppliant then let the two ships on charter, at the rate of 7*l.* 1*s.* per deadweight ton per month, for the carriage of coal to France, as they were best adapted for the French coal trade.

In Feb. 1918, the Ministry of Shipping requisitioned the suppliant's two ships and at the same time addressed to the suppliant a statement that the rate of hire would be "in accordance with the undertaking given in respect of vessels which were formerly in the Baltic."

On the 5th Feb. 1918, there was issued an order called the Limitation of Freights (French Ports) Order 1918. This order came into force on the 11th Feb. 1918, and it fixed 28*s.* per ton as the maximum rate of freight chargeable by British ships engaged in the French coal trade. This rate was paid by the Crown to the suppliant, who claimed that he was entitled to be paid the rate which he could have earned in an unrestricted market. There was some conflict of evidence as to what this would in fact be, but Roche, J. found that 41*s.* per deadweight ton per month was the proper figure.

The Crown filed an answer admitting the facts but contending (1) that the undertaking of the 4th July 1916, could not exempt the suppliant from the operation of the Limitation of Freights Order, and that he had been paid the full rate applicable thereunder; (2) that the claim was not maintainable by reason of the Indemnity Act 1920, and the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceedings.

The Indemnity Act 1920, provides as follows:

Sect. 1, sub-sect. (1) No action or other legal proceeding whatsoever, whether civil or criminal, shall be instituted in any court of law for or on account of or in respect of any act, matter, or thing done, whether within or without His Majesty's Dominions, during the war before the passing of this Act, if done in good faith, and done or purported to be done in the execution of his duty, or for the defence of the realm . . . by a person holding office under or employed in the service of the Crown in any capacity . . . and, if any such proceeding has been instituted . . . it shall be discharged and made void. . . . Provided that except in cases where a claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of this Act this section shall not prevent . . . (b) the institution or prosecution of proceedings in respect of any rights under, or alleged breaches of, contract, if the proceedings are instituted within one year from the termination of the war or the date when cause of action arose, whichever may be the later. . . . Sect. 2, sub-sect. (1) Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing section . . any person . . . (a) being the owner of a ship or vessel which . . . has been requisitioned at any time during the war . . . shall be entitled to payment or compensation for the use of the same. . . .

Sect. 2, sub-sect. 2 (ii.). Where the payment of compensation is claimed under par. (a) of sub-sect. 1 of this section, it shall be assessed in accordance with the principles upon which the Board of Arbitration constituted under the Proclamation issued on the 3rd day of August 1914 had hitherto acted, which principles are set forth in Part I. of the schedule to this Act.

Sect. 2, sub-sect. 2 (iii.). In any other case the compensation shall be assessed as follows: (a) If the claimant would apart from this Act have had a legal right to compensation the tribunal shall give effect to that right. . . .

Sect. 2, sub-sect. 4. The tribunal for assessing payment or compensation shall, where by any of the Defence of the Realm Regulations any special tribunal is prescribed, be that tribunal, and in cases where the claim is made under par. (a) of sub-sect. 1 of this section be the said Board of Arbitration, and in any other case be the said Defence of the Realm Losses Commission.

Schedule, Part 1. The payment or compensation to be awarded for the use of a ship . . . and for services rendered shall be based on the rates and conditions contained in the Blue Book reports, or in cases of a class where those rates and conditions have not been applied on some other liberal estimate of the profits which the owner could have made if there had been no war, and shall be assessed without taking into account any increase of market values of tonnage or of rates of hire due to the war. . . . For the purposes of this part of the schedule the expression "Blue Book reports" means the reports as to rates and conditions published in Oct. 1914 by the sub-committee of the Board of Arbitration, subject to such increases or modifications thereof as may have been agreed to before the 1st day of Jan. 1920.

Sir John Simon, K.C., R. A. Wright, K.C., and C. T. Le Quesne for the suppliant.—The suppliant's two ships were requisitioned on the 5th Feb. 1918, and by the requisitioning letter of that date the Government contracted to pay hire in accordance with the undertaking given by the letter of the 4th July 1916 that the suppliant should be paid hire at market rates instead of Blue Book rates. That contract could not be affected by the Limitation of Freights (French Ports) Order 1918, which did not come into force until the 11th Feb. 1918. Moreover, the Indemnity Act 1920 does not apply. Sect. 1 of that Act does not prevent the institution of proceedings in respect of breaches of contract. The present proceeding comes within that exception, and is not a claim for compensation within sect. 2 of the Act.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Crown.—The undertaking relied on by the suppliant was that these ships should not be requisitioned except in case of emergency. The emergency arose in connection with the shortage of coal in France. The suppliant was given an option, either to charter the vessels to the French Mission of the Inter-Allied Executive, or to have them requisitioned. He chose to have them requisitioned. Then came the Limitation of Freights Order, dated the same day as the requisition. The rate fixed by that order constituted the market rate at the date the order came into force, because if the vessels had not been requisitioned they would not have been able to obtain a higher rate. The Indemnity Act 1920 renders these proceedings void. The right to requisition ships is a part of the prerogative of the Crown, and therefore its exercise carries no legal liability to pay compensation, but it has been the practice to pay compensation ex gratia. When the Indemnity Act of 1920 was passed there were already two tribunals, the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board and the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission dealing with ex gratia payments. This is a case under sect. 2 of the Indemnity Act 1920, and the suppliant ought to have taken his claim before the Admiralty Board of Arbitration. The court has no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding. Further, the maximum rate fixed by the Limitation of Freights (French Ports) Order 1918 became the market rate for vessels engaged in that trade.

Sir John Simon, K.C. replied.

ROCHE, J.—This is a petition of right. The suppliant carries on business under the name of T. G. Beatley and Sons, shipowners. By his petition he prays from the Crown a sum of money in payment for the use of two of his ships, and he claims that sum under a contract. On the 4th July 1916 His Majesty's Government, being anxious to increase the amount of British shipping, or shipping available for the use of Great Britain, desired to encourage shipowners to bring out of the Baltic a number of ships which were interned there by fear of the blockading forces of the German Empire. Accordingly, on that date a letter was addressed to the shipping world in general to the following effect: [His Lordship read the letter set out above, and continued:] The suppliant, in Jan. and June 1917, bought two vessels called the Duva and the Cumbrian which satisfied the conditions laid down in that letter. By methods which have not been gone into in this case because they were not material, but with considerable skill and courage, a large number of ships were brought out from the Baltic, and the Duva and the Cumbrian fell within that class, and were bought by the suppliant with the benefit of that undertaking attaching to them: that they would not be requisitioned unless in the event of some special emergency, and that if they were requisitioned they would be paid market rates and not Blue Book rates; and, of course, it naturally follows that a larger price was given for the vessels than would have been given if a clog attached to them of the ordinary liability of a British ship to requisition. The ships ran free of requisition until the month of Feb. 1918. They were then requisitioned by the Shipping Controller under the Defence of the Realm Regulations by reason of some special emergency. The emergency indicated was the great need of the Allies, particularly the French people, for shipping tonnage to take coal and other things to France.

I assume that the vessels were properly requisitioned and that that is not a matter in question. The matter in question is the rate applicable for the payment for the use of these vessels.

It is not, of course, questioned by the Crown that this guarantee or undertaking is in general one that they are bound and pleased to honour. The dispute is whether in the particular circumstances of this case there has been paid a sufficient remuneration to comply with the undertaking. What has been paid is a sum of 28*s*. per dead weight ton per month, that being the rate which was laid down as applicable and payable to ships engaged in certain trades with France under and by reason of an order known as the Limitation of Freights (French Ports) Order of 1918 dated the 5th Feb. 1918. It is said that that rate was the market rate within the meaning of the agreement.

Before dealing with that point I must deal with an objection which is made in point of law in the answer and plea of the Attorney-General to the petition.

That point is this. In par. 8 of the answer and plea it is said: "That since the commencement of these proceedings, to wit on the 16th Aug. 1920, the Indemnity Act 1920 came into force and the Attorney-General relies upon the said Act and submits that by the operation of the same the petition is discharged and made void." The Attorney-General has laid great stress on that point and developed it very fully before me. I am of opinion that the plea and answer fails, and I will shortly express my reasons. I will assume for the present purpose (but I do not decide) that the first paragraph of sect. 1 (1) of the Indemnity Act 1920 bars or restricts the right of the suppliant to bring these proceedings. I say I do not decide that because it is not at any rate certain that an action or petition based upon a contract, as this is based, is an action or legal proceeding on account or in respect of an act matter or thing done during the war within the meaning of that clause, and I say that for the purpose of the present case I will assume in favour of this answer and plea that that paragraph standing alone would bar or restrict the right of the suppliant to bring these proceedings.

But the matter does not rest there. There follows a proviso that this section shall not prevent, among other things, the institution or prosecution of proceedings in respect of any rights under, or alleged breaches of, contract; and a petition of right is, for the purpose of the section, to be deemed a legal proceeding. Now, resting the matter there, having regard to that proviso, it would be clear that these proceedings, being based upon a contract (a contract which indeed is undisputed) would not be debarred or defeated by the Act; but the proviso states that it (the proviso) does not apply in a case where a claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of the Act; and one then turns to sect. 2 of the Act and finds that sect. 2 deals in sub-sect. (1) (a) with the case of the requisition of a ship or vessel or space or accommodation therein, and to a case where there is a requisition and the owner is entitled to payment or compensation for the use of the same, and it goes on to provide that it applies to a case where such payment or compensation is to be assessed on the principles and by the tribunal thereinafter mentioned. I am intentionally paraphrasing these clauses because they have been read once or twice already. When one turns to the schedule which is mentioned as the place where one finds the principles of assessment of compensation, it is there provided that the payment or compensation to be awarded for the use of a ship or vessel shall be based on the rates or conditions contained in the Blue Book in force or, in cases where those rates and conditions have not been applied, on some other basis and shall be assessed without taking into account any increase of market values of tonnage or of rates of hire due to the war; and, finally, by another paragraph in the schedule, Blue Book reports are defined to mean the reports as to rates and conditions published in the order of Oct. 1914, subject to such increases or modifications thereof as may have been agreed to before the 1st Jan. 1920.

The substance of the Attorney-General's argument on this part of the case is that the special agreement relied upon by the suppliant in the present case, that is to say the agreement contained in the letter of the 4th July 1916, that market rates and not Blue Book rates are to be paid, is an increase or modification of the Blue Book rates. I do not agree. I think it is inapt to say that a provision that Blue Book rates shall not be applied, but that some other rates shall be applied, is a provision for the increase or modification of the Blue Book rates. And apart from that consideration, when one examines the schedule it is plain that the sentence as to the increase or modification of Blue Book rates really applies only to a case where Blue Book rates are themselves applicable under the first limb of the main part of the schedule, and that this would be a case, if it fell within the schedule at all, where those rates and conditions could not be applied. That branch of the schedule is obviously inapplicable to this case because there is special provision that in that event no attention whatever shall be paid to market rates. Accordingly I hold that that part of the Attorney-General's argument was not sound and that that contention fails.

Alternatively it is said that the case falls within sect. 2 sub-sect. 2 (iii) of the Act, and is a case within these words: "In any other case compensation shall be assessed as follows"; then it goes on to provide for the cases and the assessment of compensation in such a case. I hold that that sub-section does not apply at all to the case of a requisitioned ship, and is not intended so to apply. I also hold that this present case is not a case at all where compensation is claimed within the meaning of that sub-section. It is a case where payment is claimed under a contract, and for the recovery, not of compensation but of due and proper payment under a contract; and I think the comment of the suppliant's counsel is abundantly justified that if this argument were good that all other cases of compensation were to be assessed as provided in that sub-section, and if this were a case to be so assessed, it is difficult, if not impossible, to see that the main provision contained in sect. 1 would have any meaning or effect whatever. It would simply mean that all claims against the Crown of whatsoever kind or nature were to be swept into sect. 2, and to be dealt with in the manner there indicated. I hold that that is not the meaning or effect of the Act, and that the objection to the jurisdiction of this court fails.

I should have added, of course, that the point of this answer and plea is not that the suppliant is not entitled to recover, or rather to ask for, somewhere what he is asking for here, but that this is not the right place, and this is not the right tribunal before which he can ask to be given it—and that he is relegated to one of the arbitration tribunals which existed before the Act, and are continued (in a somewhat modified form in one case) under the Indemnity Act itself. I therefore pass from that plea and that objection.

It remains to consider, first, whether the suppliant is entitled to anything more than he has already been paid, and if so, how much. At first the argument would seem plausible, and did seem plausible, that when the Limitation of Freights Order came into force, that did fix a market rate for the trade which was not only appropriate to those two ships, but was the trade in which they were actually engaged, and that that became and was the market rate, and that accordingly, if the suppliant was paid for the use of his ships at that rate, he had no cause of complaint, or at any rate no cause of action, or no ground of petition under the agreement of the 4th July 1916. That is to say, that you may have a fixed market rate as well as a market rate which is determined by competition; but I think that is not giving a fair meaning to the agreement of the 4th July 1916. The emphasis, I think, is upon the words "market rate," as contrasted there with "Blue Book rate." But I think, and I hold, that the meaning and intention of that document is to say in substance and in effect: We will leave you free in the market, and if we have to requisition you we will not impose upon you rates of our own, but we will pay you the rate which you would get under free and open competition; and I therefore hold that the limitation rate is not, within the meaning of that agreement, a market rate, or the market rate to be paid for the use of these ships.

[His Lordship, having found on the evidence that 41*s.* per dead weight ton per month was the "market rate," gave judgment for the suppliant for an amount based on the difference between the 28*s.* per ton already paid by the Crown to the suppliant and the 41*s.* per ton found to be the "market rate." The judgment to be in the form provided by the Petition of Right Act, with costs.]

Carriage of goods—Shipping and forwarding agents—Casual transaction—Contract to collect and lighter goods—No express terms—Usual terms—Loss of goods by pilferage — Lightermen's liability — Common carrier.

The plaintiffs employed the defendants, who were shipping and forwarding agents, in Oct. 1919, *to collect and carry a quantity of goods, including tin, from certain wharves where they were lying to a ship on the Thames. The defendants were not lightermen, having wharves and barges of their own, and nothing was said about the terms on which this lighterage was to be done, except that the defendants were to be paid a flat rate for their services. defendants employed carters to cart the goods from the wharves where the goods were lying to a wharf which they used under an arrangement with the wharf owners,, and which they described in their correspondence with the plaintiff as "our wharf." They then employed a firm of lightermen to lighter the goods from the wharf to the ship in the river. Owing to the watchman's negligence a quantity of the tin was stolen. The plaintiffs claimed to recover the value of the stolen goods. The defendants relied on a custom that all contracts for lightering goods in the Port of London were subject to the terms of the London Lighterage clause, which exempted lightermen from liability for any loss in any circumstances whatever, howsoever, whensoever any such loss might be caused, and whether caused by negligence or the wrongful act or default of the servants or agents of the lightermen, or other persons for whose acts the lightermen would otherwise be liable. The transaction was of a casual nature, and the defendants did not act strictly as shipping agents but were contractors to employ carriers at a rate which included their own remuneration.

Held, that no express terms with regard to lighterage having been arranged, the defendants must be taken to have been employed on the usual terms. They were, therefore, exempt from liability for loss by pilferage, and the plaintiffs could not recover.

ACTION in the Commercial List tried by Rowlatt, J.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover from the defendants the value of a quantity of tin which was stolen while being lightered from a wharf to a ship lying in the River Thames, by a firm of lightermen employed by the defendants.

In Oct. 1919 the plaintiffs employed the defendants, who carried on business in London as shipping and forwarding agents, and so described themselves, to collect and carry a quantity of goods, including 111 slabs of tin, the property of the plaintiffs, from the wharves where they were lying to a ship lying in the River Thames. The defendants were not lightermen, and had no wharf or barges of their own, but they had an arrangement with a firm for the use of a wharf, which they described in their correspondence with the plaintiffs as "our wharf," and they also referred to barges as "our barges." The defendants were to be paid a flat rate for their services, but no express terms were agreed with regard to the lighterage.

The defendants duly collected the goods. They employed carters to cart the goods from the three wharves where the goods were lying to their own wharf, and they then employed a firm of lightermen to take them from the wharf to the ship in the river on which the goods were to be shipped. Owing to the negligence of the watchman employed by the firm of lightermen, in leaving the barge unattended, the 111 slabs of tin were stolen. The plaintiffs now claimed the value of the stolen tin from the defendants.

The defendants, by their defence, said (inter alia) that the goods were stolen or lost without any negligence on their part or of any person for whom they were responsible. They said that they had to employ lightermen on the usual terms for the collection, carriage, and shipment of the goods, and that by the custom of the Port of London lightering was only done on the terms of the London Lighterage clause, and that under that clause lightermen were not liable for any loss in any circumstances whatever, whether such loss was occasioned by negligence or wrongful act or default of the servants or agents of the lightermen or other persons for whose acts the lightermen would otherwise be liable. They alleged further, or in the alternative, that the provisions of the London Lighterage clause were an implied term of any contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants for the collection and shipment of the goods, and further that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the defendants were not to be liable for loss or theft of any of the plaintiffs' goods, for which the shipping and forwarding arrangements should be placed in the hands of the defendants, and that the plaintiffs should insure against such risks.

MacKinnon, K.C. and T. Mathew for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable for negligence. They were not employed as agents, but they contracted as principals. To protect the defendants from liability in respect of pilfering there should be a clause to that effect in the contract, and the words relied on must be clear and unambiguous. Here there was no such clause and the plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to succeed. See:

Hill v. Scott, 73 L. T. Rep. 458; (1895) 2 Q. B. 713;

Price and Co. v. Union Lighterage Company, 89 L. T. Rep. 731; (1904) 1 K. B. 412;

Rosin and Turpentine Import Company v. Jacobs and Sons, 102 L. T. Rep. 81;

Travers v. Cooper, 110 L. T. Rep. 159; 111 L. T. Rep. 1088; (1915) 1 K. B. 73.

Alex Neilson, K.C. and Sir Robert Aske for the defendants.—It is universally known that the London Lighterage clause applies to all contracts for forwarding goods in the Port of London. It is always implied. In Armour and Co. v. Tarbard Limited (37 Times L. Rep. 208) it was held that the clause is to be taken judicial notice of. [ROWLATT, J.—I do not know that it is meant to be taken judicial notice of in all cases.] In that case the defendants were not common carriers. The only contract that the defendants could make in this case would be one subject to the London Lighterage clause. The defendants are protected. See:

Jones v. European and General Express Company, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; 124 L. T. Rep. 276;

Lawrence v. Produce Brokers, 4 Lloyd's List, 231.

ROWLATT, J.—In this case the plaintiffs are a firm carrying on an export business, and the defendants are shipping and forwarding agents carrying on business in the City of London, having an office in Fenchurch-street, where they so describe themselves. They have no wharf nor barges of their own, but they have relations with a wharf which they refer to in their correspondence with the defendants as "our wharf," and barges described by them as "our barges." In so describing the wharf and barges they merely meant a wharf or barges for the use of which they had facilities, and they did not mean that the wharf and barges were their own.

The plaintiffs arranged with the defendants for the conveyance of some goods to a ship in the river. The goods were at three wharves, and they were to be carted to the defendants' wharf, and thence conveyed by lighter to the ship's side. The defendants were to be paid a lump sum for their services in collecting and carrying the goods, according to the principle which had been followed in previous dealings of a similar nature which had occasionally taken place between the parties. The defendants did not know the value of the goods, and, as to some of them, they did not even know what they were. Among the goods to be carried to the ship were 111 slabs of tin, a very valuable commodity, the loss of which is the substance of this action.

The defendants employed carters to cart the goods to their wharf—thence they employed a firm of lightermen to take them to the ship. The watchman employed by the firm of lightermen left his post and the tin was stolen. The firm of lightermen pleaded a clause in their agreement with the defendants which exonerated them from liability for the loss. The trouble in this case arises out of the casual nature of the transaction, which makes it difficult to ascertain with accuracy the rule of law applicable to the facts. There was some evidence on the part of the defendants, denied, however, by the plaintiffs, that at some period on the occasion of a previous transaction, the defendants had mentioned insurance to the plaintiffs, and that they must cover themselves, and that the plaintiffs had agreed to insure against all risks. I have some difficulty about that. I do not think, however, that it was intended to mislead me, but this point is not proved to my satisfaction. I am quite clear that what the plaintiffs' representatives thought was, that the plaintiffs had sufficient protection under a clause in their policy by which they were protected from risk. They were protected in their ocean policy against risks of craft, but they were disappointed in finding that this sort of pilfering before shipment was not included in the clause. I have no doubt that the plaintiffs never thought about it at all. They did not think of the defendants as carriers. In what capacity did the defendants undertake this work? Mr. MacKinnon has argued that these people are to be looked on as carriers and are responsible as carriers unless a special contract can be properly proved between the parties. A clause sufficient for this purpose was brought to the attention of the plaintiffs. I think it is clear that the defendants did not act strictly as shipping agents and did not undertake to act as agents. If they had so acted the present difficulty would not have arisen. But were the defendants assumed to be common carriers? I think they are best described as contractors to procure carriage; to make a contract, to employ carriers, and they were to receive for their services a lump sum payment, out of which they would keep what they could for their own profit. I think they were employed on what may be called the usual terms. Mr. MacKinnon contends that the defendants must prove a special contract in order to escape liability. Everyone knows that a bill of lading will be issued; probably the same bill of lading as will be issued to other consignors. The bill of lading is posterior and not anterior to the actual arrangement. He referred to the case of Hill v. Scott (sup.), in which there was no bill of lading, and where the defendant was held to have undertaken a liability equal to that of a common carrier.

Here, the whole point is that lightermen are employed without regard to any bill of lading system. Lightermen do not issue any documents. I have to decide this simply as a case where a man goes into an office and says, "get this done for me." What are the usual terms? I think the usual terms are those which protect the wharfinger from liability for loss by pilfering from lighters. The lighterman always has that clause put in when the matter is gone into. It is quite clear that lightermen do not do business in the River Thames on the terms that they are to be liable for loss of goods by pilferage from the lighters. Broadly speaking, it seems abundantly clear that, so far as a pilfering risk is concerned, a lighterman will not undertake it. The clauses exempting liability are not all in the same words, but they are all wide enough to exempt lightermen from pilferage risks, and lightermen always refuse the risk of loss by pilferage. Where, as in the present case, a man asked for lighterage work to be done for him without making any stipulations with regard to the terms on which it is to be done, he must be taken to have agreed that the work is to be done on the usual terms, and the usual terms include exemption from liability for loss by pilferage. I must hold that the plaintiffs, in employing the defendants, have impliedly assented to that exemption and therefore they cannot recover for the loss of these goods. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

The Kim and other Vessels (Part Cargoes ex). (a.)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT, ENGLAND.

Conditional contraband—Application for release of goods seized—Evidence of ownership—Documents not put in evidence in court below by an oversight—Admission of documents on appeal.

The onus of proving an innocent destination of goods seized as conditional contraband rests upon the owners under the Declaration of London Order in Council, No. 2, of the 29th Oct. 1914. Receipts of prior payment for such goods by the claimants on their own behalf and not as sale agents for consignors are evidence which would have a material bearing on the question; and therefore an opportunity should be allowed the claimants of putting in such receipts on the hearing of an appeal which were not put in at the trial in the court below, such documents having been in existence and disclosed before the trial, and the omission to put them in being the result of a mistake.

Appeal, heard with three connected appeals, from a judgment of Evans, P., reported 14 Asp. 65; 113 L. T. Rep. 1064; (1915) P. 215.

The cargoes which had been seized and which were claimed in the Prize Court proceedings were laden on four steamships belonging to neutral owners, but under time charters to an American corporation, the Gans Steamship Line. Mr. John H. Gans, the president of the company, was a German. He had resided in America for some years, but he had not been naturalised. The general agent of the company in Europe was one Wolenburg, of Hamburg. The four ships were the Kim (Norwegian), the Albert Nobel (Norwegian), the Bjornstjerne Bjornson (Norwegian), and the Fridland (Swedish). They all started within a period of three weeks in Oct. and Nov. 1914 on voyages from New York to Copenhagen with very large cargoes of lard, hog and meat products, oil stocks, wheat, and other foodstuffs. Two of the vessels had cargoes of rubber, and one of hides. They were captured at sea, and proceedings in the Prize Court with reference to the cargoes resulted in their being condemned as lawful prize on the ground that their ultimate destination was an enemy source of supply.

In the case of the Kim, the appellant, a Danish subject, claimed two parcels which had been consigned to the shippers' agents at Copenhagen. He alleged that he had paid for the goods and taken up the documents before the seizure, and that he thereupon became owner. The President held that the evidence before him failed to prove this allegation, and gave judgment against the claim.

By a petition, which was heard at the hearing of the appeal, the appellant prayed that there might be admitted in evidence documents, including two receipts, which were not put in evidence at the hearing in the Prize Court. By an affidavit in support of the petition it was stated that the documents in question had been submitted to the Procurator-General for examination before the date of the trial; that they had been produced in court and remained there throughout the hearing; that they had on several occasions been handed to the officers of the Crown at their request; and that the reason they were not put in at the hearing was that the appellant's claim, which formed one of several separate claims which were being dealt with in a long trial, was reached unexpectedly and in the absence of the representative of the appellant's solicitors.

Sir Erle Richards, K.C. and Darby for the appellant.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), R. A. Wright, K.C., James Wylie, and Pearce Higgins for the Crown.

After consideration their Lordships granted the petition and allowed the appeal in the case of the Kim and dismissed the appeals in the other three cases.

The considered opinion of the board was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—These appeals relate to various consignments consisting chiefly of oleo stock, lard, and fat backs, which were carried on the steamships Kim, Alfred Nobel, Bjornstjerne Bjornson, and Fridland from New York to Copenhagen. The Kim was a Norwegian steamship which sailed from New York to Copenhagen on the 11th Nov. 1914, and was seized at Falmouth on the 1st Dec. 1914. The Alfred Nobel was a Norwegian steamship which sailed from New York to Copenhagen on the 20th Oct. 1914, and was captured on the 5th Nov. 1914. The Bjornstjerne Bjornson was a Norwegian steamship which sailed from New York to Copenhagen on the 22nd Oct. 1914, and was captured on the 11th Nov. 1914. The Fridland was a Swedish steamship which sailed from New York to Copenhagen on the 28th Oct. 1914, and was seized on the 10th Nov. 1914.

All the goods in question in the appeal were at the time of seizure conditional contraband. They were suitable for the provisioning of troops, and the lard and fat backs yielded glycerine, a component of high explosives. The consignments were part of a larger number of consignments—more than 600 in all—shipped by various firms of American packers. It is not necessary to consider the conditions, under which all these numerous consignments were dispatched, in order to determine whether the appellants are entitled to the release of the goods they claim. It is right, however, to say that their Lordships do not dissent from the summary contained in the case of the respondent: "Consequently in the case of every consignment there was a presumption that goods were destined for the use of the armed forces, or for a Government department of an enemy State, and that the onus was upon the owners to prove that their destination was innocent." It is necessary to consider in each case whether the appellant has established his ownership of the goods claimed, and, if so, whether he has discharged the onus of proving that their destination was innocent.

There are certain general considerations which apply to the claims in all the appeals. It will be convenient to deal with them at the outset. Subject to any special conditions, which attach to any of the consignments claimed, the consignments were carried on terms in accord with a course of business practice which had for some time been in operation. The usual practice was for the American consignors to draw bills of lading to order, and to indorse them in blank, inserting in some cases, though not in all, the name of the sale agent as the person to be notified. The bills of lading were then sent through a bank to Copenhagen with drafts for acceptance by the agent, or by whomsoever might be the purchaser in Copenhagen or Denmark. In some instances the goods were shipped in response to specific conditions made by the agent to fulfil the requirements of particular customers. In other instances the goods were shipped either to order of the agent as purchaser, or as goods to be sold by him, as sale agent, in the Copenhagen market. Under this course of business the property in the consignments purchased would pass on payment of the price, and on the taking up of the shipping documents In all cases the first question to be determined is whether the appellants prove that they have paid for the goods seized, and have thus become entitled to claim as owners. The learned President decided this question adversely to all the appellants. The respondent further contends that, whether payment can be proved or not, the goods in question were consigned to the appellants, not as independent purchasers, but merely as sale agents for the consignors. There is, however, evidence that the sale agents were allowed to purchase on their own behalf with certain limitations, and the appellants claim to have proved that the goods seized were purchased by them on their own behalf, and that they were not acting, in respect of those goods, as the sale agents of the consignors. It is only in the event of both these issues being decided in favour of an appellant that the further question will arise, whether the appellant has discharged the onus, placed upon him, of proving that the destination of the goods was not such as to render them liable to seizure and condemnation.

ERIC VALEUR.

The claimant Eric Valeur is a Danish subject, a dealer in lard, oleo and oils, used in the manufacture of margarine. There is no allegation made against his character as a merchant. He was entitled as a neutral to trade with Germany, subject to the risk of the capture and condemnation of his goods by a belligerent in exercise of belligerent rights. He claims two consignments from the cargo of the Kim: 140 tierces oleo stock marked "M.P. 208 Copenhagen"; 100 tierces oleo stock marked "M.P. 218 Copenhagen."

The oleo stock marked "M.P. 208 Copenhagen" was shipped by Morris and Co., a company incorporated under the laws of the State of Maine (U.S.A.). The bill of lading contains the following terms: "Consignee and destination order, Morris and Company, Copenhagen, Denmark. Party to be notified, Morris Packing Company, Christiana, Norway." Morris and Co. had head offices in many of the principal towns in Europe, but not in Copenhagen. Their head office in Scandinavia was in Christiana, where the Morris Packing Company have been established for several years. The goods are to be delivered as consigned, or to consignees' assigns, upon payment of the freight charges. The conditions as to delivery and payment in the case of the two consignments of oleo stock M.P. 218, aggregating 100 tierces, are substantially the same as in the case of consignment M.P. 208. There is a note attached to the bill of lading that the merchandise covered thereby is the sole property of Morris and Co., but the case for the claimant is that, prior to the date of seizure, the property in the goods had passed to him, by payment of the price and delivery of the documents. The affidavit filed on behalf of the claimant states that his agency on behalf of Morris and Co. comprehends Denmark only, and a schedule is attached differentiating between goods sold by the claimant as agent and those bought by him on his own account. Among the goods stated to be bought by him on his own account are the goods in question, being the consignments M.P. 208 Copenhagen and M.P. 218 Copenhagen. In confirmation of this statement a sale note was produced purporting to show that the oleo stock M.P. 208 was sold to the claimant on the 13th Oct. 1914 for prompt shipment upon the terms "cash less 1 per cent. against documents, destination Copenhagen." This document is not dated, but the price payable is calculated at kr. 26,561.54. A sale note is produced in similar terms relating to the consignment M.P. 218, dated the 19th Oct. 1914. In this case the document is dated the 16th Nov. 1914, and the invoice price is calculated at kr. 14,212.23.

There is nothing unusual in the form of these documents, and there is no reason to doubt their genuine character. They support the contention of the claimant that in the business of these consignments he was acting as purchaser, and not merely as sale agent. They are not sufficient in themselves to prove that payment had been made or that the property and the goods had passed to the claimant before the date of seizure. A petition was, however, presented on the hearing of the appeal asking their Lordships to allow the production and admission of two documents which were said to be the receipts for payment, but which had not been formally put in at the trial.

After the learned President had given his decision an application was made that two documents, purporting to be the receipts for payment, might be included in the record, although these documents had not been put in during the hearing in the Prize Court. This application was dismissed by the registrar, whose decision was upheld on appeal by the President. In support of the application to their Lordships, an affidavit was filed by Thomas H. Warland, managing clerk for the solicitors of the appellant. It was sworn in the affidavit that the two receipts marked respectively "T.H.W. 1" and "T.H.W. 2," produced and shown to him were received by him from Messrs. Botterell and Roche on the 12th March 1915, and that he was informed and verily believed that the said receipts were received by Messrs. Botterell and Roche from Mr. Drexell, the agent in this country of a Danish war risk insurance, for goods, in the month of March 1915, after they had been amongst other documents submitted to H.M. Procurator-General; that these receipts were included in documents referred to in the affidavit sworn in this cause on the 10th Dec. 1917, and included in the record. This affidavit states that all the said documents "were produced in court and remained there during the whole period at the trial, and were on several occasions handed to the law officers of the Crown at their request so as to enable them to offer any criticism which they might desire to make upon any or all of the documents, which had been sent to this country by the claimants in support of their respective claims."

The affidavit then states in pars. 5 and 6 the reasons why the documents were not put in at the trial. "(5) The reason why the documents set out in Supplemental Record 'A' were not put in on the hearing of these cases in the Prize Court is, the deponent attended in court with the documents printed in Supplemental Record 'A' for nine days, but the cases involved in this appeal were not reached. On the closing of the court on each of the said nine days the deponent left the documents printed in Supplemental Record 'A' in a bag in the care of the usher of the court.

"(6) On the morning of Wednesday, the 28th of July 1915, the deponent had an important engagement in the City, and, being under the impression that these cases were not likely to be taken for another day or two, did not attend in court until 2 p.m. When he arrived in court he was informed by the counsel briefed in the cases, on behalf of the claimants, that they had been called on suddenly and that he had not been able to communicate with the deponent's office."

The effect of this affidavit is to show that the documents in question were in existence and had been submitted for examination to H.M. Procurator-General before the date of the trial, that they had been produced in court, remaining there during the whole period of the trial, and that they had on several occasions been handed to the law officers of the Crown at their request, so as to enable them to offer any criticism which they might desire to make; and that the reason they were not put in at the hearing was that a mistake was made as to the date at which the case of the claimant would be called on in court, during the course of a long trial, including a number of parties whose claims were separately heard, and which depended largely on different considerations and special evidence.

Under these special circumstances their Lordships decided, during the hearing of the appeal, that the documents having been in existence before the date of the trial, and open to the inspection of the respondent, and the omission to put them in being the result of a mistake, as explained in the affidavit, it was in the interests of justice that the documents should be produced and admitted. The case is clearly distinguishable from one in which evidence is alleged to have been discovered subsequently to the hearing in the Prize Court and not open to the objections which arise in such cases. In several instances their Lordships have refused an application to admit such evidence. The documents were thereupon produced before their Lordships, and no question was raised as to the genuineness of their character. They are receipts for payment by the claimant on the 13th Nov. 1914 of the sum of kr. 26,561.54 in exchange for documents covering 140 tierces extra oleo stock, being the 140 tierces M.P. 208; and for payment by the claimant on the 16th Nov. 1914 of the sum of kr. 12,204.23 in exchange for documents covering 100 tierces peerless oleo stock, being the 100 tierces M.P. 218.

These receipts are evidence sufficient to prove that payment was made at the respective dates in exchange for the attached documents. On such payment the property in the goods in question passed to the claimant, and the payment was made prior to the date of seizure. Their Lordships therefore find, on evidence which was not before the learned President, that the claimant, Mr. Eric Valeur, has proved that he was the owner of the goods claimed at the date of seizure. Having regard, however, to the failure to put these documents in at the trial in the Prize Court, their Lordships propose to make a special order as to costs, which will be referred to later.

The further question, therefore, as to the effect on the appellant's claim of the provisions of the Declaration of London Order in Council No. 2 of the 29th Oct. 1914 arises for decision. These provisions clearly apply. They were in operation both at the date when the Kim sailed and at the date when she was seized. The Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914 repealed the earlier Order in Council of the 20th Aug. 1914, and provided that, notwithstanding the provisions of art. 35 of the Declaration of London, conditional contraband shall be liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port, if the goods are consigned to order, or if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods; and that in such cases it shall lie upon the owners of the goods to prove that their destination was innocent. Therefore in this appeal the question is whether the appellant has discharged the burden which the Order places on him of proving the innocency of the destination of the goods. In order to discharge the burden which lies upon him, the appellant states that the goods were required for consumption in Norwegian and Danish margarine factories. Primâ facie there is no improbability in this allegation, and it is not inconsistent with the statistical evidence produced on behalf of the respondent. The evidence of the claimant is that out of the 140 tierces oleo stock M.P. 208 eighty tierces were sold to Danish margarine makers, but that these orders were cancelled, so that the whole lot became unsold; and that out of the 100 tierces peerless oleo stock M.P. 218, fifteen tierces were sold to Margarine Fabrik Samhold, Stavanger, Norway, and thirty tierces to Odense Margarine Fabrik, Odense, Denmark, but that this latter order was cancelled, so that eighty-five tierces were unsold. In support of this case a document is produced of the 23rd Oct. 1914, before the date of the sailing of the Kim, directed to the appellant, and confirming a purchase of seventy tierces Morris extra stock on terms of nett cash against documents, shipment first half of November from factory in America, including sea insurances. On the 28th Nov. 1914 there is a sale note of seventy tierces extra stock to Faellesforenngen, &c., Margarine Factory, Viby, identified as part of M.P. 208, nett cash against documents. There is no reason for holding that these documents are not genuine, and they corroborate the statement made in the affidavit of the claimant. Under these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that the appellant has discharged the burden which the order places upon him of proving the innocency of the destination of the goods. In the result the appeal of Eric Valeur succeeds. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly. There will be no costs of the appeal.

PAY AND CO.

The firm of Pay and Co. consisted of Carl Marius Pay, a Norwegian, carrying on business in Copenhagen since 1901 as a dealer in provisions, raw materials of butterine and margarine. It is alleged that the greater part of the purchases of the firm were made for the purpose of keeping up stock, in order to comply with orders from customers who were all resident in Scandinavia. The shipments of the appellants were mainly in lard products. There were four shipments on the Kim, two on the Alfred Nobel, three on the Bjornstjerne Bjornson, and one on the Fridland. The learned President has decided that in the case of all these shipments the appellants acted as agents for the consignors, and that they had failed to satisfy him that in any instance they were the owners of the goods claimed. The shippers were Sulzberger and Sons, Morris and Co., and the Southern Cotton Oil Company. The consignments were shipped to order of the shippers, but in the case of Sulzberger and Sons there was a direction to notify the appellants. The firm of Sulzberger and Sons had for many years, prior to the war, maintained a resident agent in Denmark for sale of its products on commission, and the appellants had acted as such sale agents. The practice of Sulzberger and Sons did not differ from the usual practice followed in the case of consignments dispatched to Denmark by American packers. They drew bills of lading to order, endorsed them in blank, and inserted the name of the agent as the person to be notified. The bills were then sent through a bank at Copenhagen, with drafts for acceptance by the agent, or by whomsoever might be the purchaser in Copenhagen, or in Denmark. In some instances goods were shipped to Copenhagen in response to specific requisition by the agent, in other instances they were shipped to the agent to be sold on the open market in Copenhagen. The appellants state that on or about the 1st Aug. 1914 their agency for the firm of Sulzberger and Sons was cancelled, and that since that day Leopold Gyth had been the agent of the firm for the sale of its products in Denmark; the evidence, however, shows that the agency continued to a later date, and did not terminate earlier than Jan. 1915.

On the 6th Dec. 1914, five days after the capture of the Kim, the appellants wrote a letter to H.M. Procurator-General inclosing letters, telegrams, invoices, and bills of lading which were said to tell their own tale, and to prove that the goods in question were intended for the firm of the appellants. On the 13th Feb. 1915 the appellants wrote a second letter to H.M. Procurator-General, stating that all the goods, including those shipped by Sulzberger and Sons, had been bought by them as customary c.i.f. Copenhagen, and that they had no knowledge whatever as to by what ships these parcels would be shipped, that most of the goods were insured in British Lloyd, and the remainder in Danish and Norwegian companies. Is there sufficient evidence that the goods referred to in the above letter had become the property of the appellants at the date of seizure? The course of business pursued is not in itself unusual, and there seems no reason for doubting the character of the letter, but the goods would not become the property of the appellants until payment, and the question to be determined is whether the appellants have proved payment. It is the more essential to examine carefully the evidence adduced by the appellants in proof of payment as purchasers, seeing that it is alleged that in all these transactions they were acting, not as purchasers, but as sale agents on behalf of their principals.

The evidence adduced by the appellants in proof of payment consists of a letter written by them to Danske Landmandsbank Hypothek and Vekselbank on the 21st Nov. 1914, of the answer thereto of a letter of the 24th Nov. 1914, and of a further letter from the Danske Landmandsbank to Botterell and Roche of the 6th April 1915. The first letter in the correspondence incloses a list of shipments on the Alfred Nobel, the Fridland, and the Bjornstjerne Bjornson between the 24th Oct. 1914 and the 16th Nov. in the same year, and in regard to these shipments includes a bank statement of drafts drawn at sight by the various shippers. The answer of the bank on the 24th Nov. 1914 states "that for your account we have paid and placed to your credit the following amounts for shipments." It was suggested on the hearing of the appeal that "credit" had been wrongly inserted and that "debit" should be substituted. Then follows the list of shipments set out in the letter of the 21st Nov. 1914. The letter further states: "The bills of lading in question are de-deposited in this bank, and in accordance with same, the destination of all these goods is Copenhagen. We further beg to state that hitherto we have not from your esteemed firm received any instructions to transfer these bills of lading to any other receiver than your esteemed firm." It will be noted that none of the shipments on the Kim are included in the correspondence, but the explanation given is that the shipments were of later date. In the further letter from the Danske Landmandsbank, the 6th April 1915, the bank incloses original and duplicate bills of lading covering five of the shipments referred to above, and says: "We would add that these documents have been taken up under a documentary credit opened by us for account of the said firm, and consequently proceeds of the shipment or fresh documents covering the shipments or similar shipments in substitution are to be handed to our bank." Are these letters sufficient evidence of payment by the appellants before the dates of seizure?

The answer must be in the negative. The most important letter is that of the 24th Nov. from the Danske Landmandsbank to the appellants. It is difficult to understand the true meaning of this letter, but it clearly cannot be accepted as proving that the shipments referred to had in fact been paid for by the appellants before the dates of seizure.

At the hearing of the appeal an application was made that leave should be granted to refer to certain documents included in the supplementary record "B," containing, inter alia, certain letters between the Danske Bank and the appellants. This petition was not granted. The result is that the appellants fail to establish their ownership of the goods claimed at the dates of seizure. In the case of the shipments on the vessels other than the Kim, the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914, although not promulgated at the date of sailing, had been promulgated at the date of seizure, and therefore would apply to the goods captured; but, except as regards one consignment on the Kim, all the goods remained unsold at the date of capture. It would not be possible under these circumstances to say that the appellants, even if they had established their right to claim as owners, had discharged the burden which the Order in Council places upon them. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to dismiss the appeal with costs.

BRODRENE LEVY.

The firm of Brodrene Levy consists of two partners, Herman Levy and James Levy, both of whom are Danes. The firm was established in Copenhagen in the year 1888, and has carried on business as merchants, dealing in herrings, codfish, and provisions. The business is with customers all over Denmark.

The appellants claim in repect of goods carried on the Kim, the Bjornstjerne Bjornson, and the Alfred Nobel. The dates of purchase are alleged to have been the 3rd and 4th Oct. 1914, and the goods are said to have been purchased for the purpose of furnishing regular buyers, and to have been placed with ordinary stock, so that the firm might be in the condition to comply with the orders of customers, from time to time, when received. It is not necessary to examine the consignments in detail. The two parcels shipped on the Alfred Nobel were included in a list of consignments claimed by Morris and Co. The second consignment on the Alfred Nobel, as well as the consignment on the Bjornstjerne Bjornson, was shipped by Morris and Co. to order of Morris and Co., Copenhagen. Party to be notified, Morris Packing Company, Christiana. The same practice was followed in the shipments on the Kim, both in regard to the parcel said to have been bought from Backstrom of Stockholm, as well as in the case of the parcels said to have been purchased from Armour and Co. It is clear, therefore, that evidence of payment is necessary in order to prove ownership. This fact is recognised by the appellants.

In the affidavit of Hermann Levy it is stated that the firm have paid for the goods and taken up the shipping documents, and that they have become the property of the firm. No document is, however, produced to support this contention, and no receipt is forthcoming.

In the absence of such evidence their Lordships are not satisfied that the appellants were at the date of seizure owners of the goods claimed or that there is any reason for dissenting from the judgment of the learned President. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal shall be dismissed with costs.

THE KORSOR MARGARINE FABRIK.

The appellants are a margarine factory carrying on their business at Korsor in Denmark. They claim thirty tierces oleo oil M.P. 190 on the Kim, said to have been bought from Eric Valeur, and thirty tierces of oleo stock M.P. 191 on the Fridland, also said to have been purchased by them from Eric Valeur. Both consignments were shipped by Morris and Company to order of Morris and Co. Copenhagen (party to be notified, Morris Packing Company, Christiana), and were claimed to be the property of Morris and Co. In the documents attached to the affidavit of Eric Valeur the thirty tierces oleo stock M.P. 190 are stated to be sold by them, not on their own account, but as agents to the Morris Packing Company, and in a later letter attached to the same affidavit on the 19th Oct. 1914 the contracts for purchase were forwarded, including both consignments from the Morris Packing Company, with the request that the appellants would kindly return the copies duly furnished with their signature. There were no further documents produced to support the claims of the appellants, and no attempt was made to prove payment, prior to the date of seizure.

It is clear, therefore, that the appeal fails, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that it should be dismissed with costs.

THE OSCAR II. (No. 2). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Property found to be enemy property under Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915*—Subsequent sale by enemy owner to neutral purchaser—Treaty of Versailles, art.* 297.

In 1915 the O. II., a neutral vessel, carrying (inter alia) 350 bags of clover seed consigned to Copenhagen, touched at a British port, when the seed was ordered to be seized as prize. The O. II., however, was allowed to proceed upon the undertaking of her owners that the seed should be returned. In 1917 the claimant, with knowledge of these facts, purchased the interest in the seed at Copenhagen from the agent of the enemy owner for 42,000 (odd) kronen, and paid into court 52,000 (odd) kronen as a condition of the release of the goods and as representing their proceeds. On the 10*th Jan.* 1920 the Treaty of Versailles was ratified. By art. 297 (b) this country reserved "the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals. . . ."

Held, that, the effect of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915 not being to divest the original German owner of the seed of his right of disposal thereof, the fund was not within art. 297 (b), and must be paid out of court to the claimant, the neutral purchaser.

MOTION for payment out of court.

The facts and contentions are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and J. Wylie for the Procurator-General.

R. H. Balloch for the claimant.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—This is a claim by Peter M. Kaae, a trader of Copenhagen, a Danish subject, for payment out to him of a fund in court of between 3000*l.* and 4000*l.*, which represents 52,919kr. paid into court as a condition of the release to him of 350 bags of Alsyke clover seed. The goods had been seized in course of transit from New York to Malmo in December of 1915. By an amendment, dated the 11th Jan. 1918, to a writ in prize which had been issued by the Procurator-General in Feb. 1916, the Procurator-General claimed condemnation of the goods as prize, or alternatively detention under the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915. That cause of condemnation was pending until March 1919, when it came to trial. A claim had been interposed on behalf of a firm in New York, Herbst Brothers and Co., who claimed to be the owners of the goods which had been consigned by Bushnell and Co., a firm of forwarding agents, to Hermann Lindberg. In March 1917, when the cause was pending on the claim of the Procurator-General for condemnation or detention, the claimant, under the circumstances stated in his affidavit, purchased whatever property there was in the vendor of these goods, one Rasmussen, and purchased them at a price of 42,000 odd kronen. It is said quite truly on the part of the Crown that he took his chance—if the goods were subject to condemnation as prize he lost his money; if the goods were not subject to condemnation as prize, but were liable to the fate which awaited goods by virtue of the clauses of the Reprisals Order of March 1915, then his ultimate right to demand delivery of the goods—or of the fund which he brought into court to be the substitute for the goods—must depend upon the proper effect of the Reprisals Order on a transfer of goods brought in under that order, and purchased, after being brought in, by a neutral claimant. No question has been raised that the claimant honestly bought the rights of his vendor in the 350 bags of clover seed, and that—subject to the effect of the Reprisals Order in Council, of the judgment of Lord Sterndale at the hearing of the cause, and of the provisions of the Treaty of Peace—the purchase by the claimant was effectual to transfer to him such rights as his vendor could transfer at the time of the transaction. I dwell upon this part of the matter because it has been made clear to me on the part of the Crown that what is desired in this case is not to defeat the claim upon some collateral ground, but to have the question decided as to what is the effect of the Treaty of Peace upon such a purchase as has been made by the claimant in this case. I therefore limit what I propose to say to that question, and I put aside all collateral questions which might conceivably have arisen.

I have to consider first of all what was the effect of the Reprisals Order? That is necessary in order to see what was the right of an enemy owner of goods at the date, March 1917, when the owner of these goods, whom I must take to have been an enemy owner, sold them to the present claimant. The Reprisals Order of March 1915 does not appear to me to be designed, of its own effect, to divest any enemy of his property. It leaves rights in prize to be determined in prize—questions of enemy goods under an enemy flag, enemy goods captured by various means, contraband, and all questions of that kind it leaves where it found them. But it makes provision for the lawful interception of goods coming from German ports which are enemy property, and of goods proceeding to German ports, and it provides with regard to vessels sailing from ports other than German ports after March 1915—and having on board goods which are enemy property—that such vessels may be required to discharge their goods in a British or allied port; that the goods so discharged are to come into the custody of the marshal; if they are not requisitioned, they are to be detained or sold, and, if sold, the proceeds are to be paid into court and dealt with in such manner as the court may in the circumstances deem to be just. Then there is this proviso, that no proceeds of the sale of such goods shall be paid out of court until the conclusion of peace, except on the application of the proper officer of the Crown, unless it be shown that the goods had become neutral property before the issue of the order. I do not find anything in the terms of the relevant articles of the Reprisals Order which purports to divest enemy property or subject it to confiscation. It provides for detention, and it creates the jurisdiction in the Prize Court to deal with detained enemy goods in the way in which goods brought in as prize may be dealt with in a Prize Court; but it leaves the ownership in those goods as it found the ownership. It subjects the goods to be detained and to be kept in court, or their proceeds to be detained and kept in court, and neither the goods, nor the proceeds, are to be parted with except upon the application of the Crown, or with the consent of the Crown. That was the state of affairs as to these 350 bags of clover seed when the present claimant made his purchase from Rasmussen. Rasmussen represented the owners of goods lawfully detained in this country until the close of the war. The claimant purchased their interest in those goods. Everything Rasmussen could grant to the claimant he got; Rasmussen was not disabled by any means known to British law, or to international law, from making his bargain with the claimant. That was the event of March 1917.

In March 1919, as I have said, the cause of condemnation instituted by the Procurator-General, with the claim raised in it by Herbst Brothers, came on for determination. There was no condemnation, and condemnation was not then sought, so that these goods were not prize, and were not confiscated. But there was a decision that the 350 bags of clover seed (identifying them) had an enemy destination, and they were pronounced to be enemy property. It is suggested that that decree determined some question relevant to the issue which I have to determine. In my judgment, the decree determined only that at the time when these goods were seized and brought in they were enemy property. That clearly was the intention of my predecessor, Lord Sterndale, as appears from the language used by him in delivering his judgment. It not only was his intention—it was the necessary limitation of the judgment—because the only question which had to be decided was whether, when these goods were seized and brought in, they were enemy property, and that was determined. The decree of the 21st March 1919 does not, in my judgment, determine any question which comes before me to be decided. I have, therefore, these facts: goods detained under the Reprisals Order adjudged to be properly held under the Reprisals Order and adjudged to have been, at the time of seizure, enemy property; and, pending the determination of the court, a sale by the enemy owner to a neutral purchaser—the claimant.

It is to that state of facts that I have to apply the terms of the Peace Treaty, and, in particular, of art. 297. If the fund at the time of the Peace Treaty had been the property of any German subject, art. 297 would have been effective to transfer all proprietary interests in it to His Majesty the King. Art. 297 effectually provides by treaty between the Sovereign Power of Germany and the Sovereign Powers of the United Kingdom and her allies, that assets such as this fund, which belong, at the time of the coming into force of the treaty, to German nationals, or companies controlled by them within the territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates of the allied Sovereigns, shall vest, for the purposes named in the treaty, in the respective allied Sovereigns. The goods are claimed by the Crown as having passed under the treaty. It is said, however, by Mr. Balloch on the part of the claimant, that when the limitation in the treaty is examined, this fund, the proprietary interest in which had been purchased by a neutral purchaser in 1917, clearly was not property, rights, or interests, belonging at the date of the coming into force of the treaty to German nationals. I have examined the question whether the effect of the Reprisals Order was to divest the original German owner of this fund of his right of disposal of it; and, in my opinion, as I have said, it was not. I have examined the judgment of Lord Sterndale to ascertain whether he had made any determination which affects this claim, and I am satisfied that he had not. I now have examined the Peace Treaty, and I am satisfied that this fund is not within the description of "property," "rights," and "interests," which are dealt with by art. 297 (b) of the Peace Treaty. It was not a fund belonging to a German national at the time there named. This, therefore, is a fund which ought to be paid out of court to the claimant.

The Procurator-General appealed.

James Wylie (Sir Gordon Hewart, A.-G., with him) for the appellant.

Balloch, for the respondent, was not called on.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—The respondent in this case trades under the firm name of Joergen Jensens Successors, Copenhagen. In March 1917 he bought from Knud Rasmussen, of the firm of Levysohn and Rasmussen, Copenhagen, the bills of lading for a consignment of clover seed shipped at New York on a Danish ship, which sailed on or about the 4th Dec. 1915 from New York for Copenhagen. On the arrival of the ship at Kirkwall in December the clover seed was seized as prize, but permission was given to take it to Copenhagen, on an undertaking, by the owner of the ship, that it would be returned to the United Kingdom for the purpose of being placed in the Prize Court. The respondent, on the 25th March 1917, paid for the bills of lading kr. 42,335.20, and applied to the British Legation at Copenhagen for permission to have the goods delivered. It was made a condition that a sum of kr. 52,919.00 should be deposited, and thereupon the respondent received delivery of the clover seed. The amount deposited was transmitted to the Admiralty marshal, and paid into the Prize Court by him for adjudication. This is the sum of 3639*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.* now in dispute.

On the 11th Jan. 1918, by an amendment to a writ, which had been issued in Feb. 1916, the Procurator-General claimed condemnation of the clover seed as prize, or, in the alternative, detention under the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915. The cause came on for trial in March 1919, when a claim was made on behalf of a firm in New York, Herbst Brothers and Co., who claimed as owners and shippers of the goods. The Procurator-General did not ask for the condemnation of the goods (or their proceeds) as contraband, but for an order of detention under the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915, on the ground that the goods had an enemy destination and were enemy property. The learned President, Lord Sterndale, decided that Herbst Brothers and Co. were acting as agents and intermediaries for the German firm of Ernst und von Spreckelsen, passing the goods through one Hermann Lindberg, and that they never really had the property in the goods. He accordingly pronounced the goods to have had an enemy destination, and to be enemy property, and ordered the proceeds of sale thereof to remain in court until the end of the war or pending further order of court. The only question which came before him for decision, and which he decided in his judgment, was that the goods when seized were enemy property. The respondent is not concerned to question this decision, and it does not affect the claim which he makes.

It is not disputed that the respondent purchased from an enemy. The purchase was honestly made, but subject to the risk of all belligerent rights, consequent on the seizure of the goods. The learned President states in his judgment that it had been made clear to him on the part of the appellant that it was not desired to defeat the claim on some collateral ground, but to have the question decided of the effect of the Treaty of Peace upon such a purchase as the respondent had made, and that he proposed to limit his judgment to that question, and to put aside all collateral questions which might conceivably have arisen. Having regard to this statement, it is not open to the appellant to raise collateral questions on the hearing of the appeal.

It was argued on behalf of the appellant that the decision of Lord Sterndale affected adversely the claim of the respondent. Their Lordships are unable to accept this contention. No doubt Lord Sterndale found that the goods at the time of seizure were enemy property, but they were not condemned as contraband, and the only order made was an order for detention of the proceeds of the sale of the goods until the end of the war, or pending further order of the court. No question was raised at the hearing before Lord Sterndale as to the effect of a detention order in the case of goods which at the date of seizure were enemy property, but which had subsequently been transferred to a neutral.

It was further argued that the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915 operated to restrict the rights of the neutral purchaser in March 1917. The relevant article of the Reprisals Order provides that every merchant vessel sailing from a port, other than a German port, after the 1st March 1915, having on board goods which are of enemy origin, or of enemy property, may be required to discharge such goods in a British or allied port. The steamship Oscar II. is a vessel within the terms of this article, and at the time of seizure was carrying goods of enemy property. The article proceeds: "Goods so discharged in a British port shall be placed in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court, and if not requisitioned for the use of His Majesty, shall be detained or sold under the direction of the Prize Court. The proceeds of goods so sold shall be paid into court and dealt with in such manner as the court may under the circumstances deem to be just. Provided that no proceeds of the sale of such goods shall be paid out of court until the conclusion of peace, except on the application of the proper officer of the Crown, unless it be shown that the goods had become neutral property before the issue of the order."

In international law there is no rule which forbids the purchase of goods by a neutral from an enemy after seizure by a belligerent. Such a purchase is no doubt subject to all rights which accrue to a belligerent as a consequence of the seizure. For instance, if the goods purchased by a neutral are condemned as prize in a Prize Court, this is a risk which a neutral must have known would attach to his purchase at the time when he made it, and defeats any right which he otherwise might have to claim the goods. On the other hand, if, apart from the operation of some special order such as the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915, the purchased goods are liberated by the Prize Court, the ownership of the neutral purchaser becomes effective, if, as is admitted in the present case, the transaction has been carried through by a bonâ fide transfer which in itself is not open to question, and which the appellant does not question.

In the present case the only special order which can in any way affect the claim of the respondent or restrict his rights is the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915. The question therefore arises, whether this Reprisals Order operates to defeat the claim of the respondent to the proceeds of the goods. The order was passed alio intuitu. The object was to provide in specified cases for the detention of goods seized, or their proceeds, until the close of the war, in order to insure that, during the war, the enemy should not be benefited, either by obtaining possession of the goods, or of their proceeds. The order does not affect the ownership of property. It leaves the ownership just as it would have been if the order had not been passed. It does not purport to deprive a neutral purchaser of a right, to which he would otherwise be entitled, and which does not conflict with any belligerent right. There is not a word in the order which can be construed as depriving an enemy owner of the right which he otherwise would possess to transfer the goods seized or their proceeds to a neutral purchaser, or as invalidating the title of the neutral purchaser. Whatever interest in the goods therefore Rasmussen possessed at the time of sale, as representing the owner of goods detained until the close of the war, passed under the terms of the purchase to the respondent; and the respondent, as a neutral purchaser, is entitled to claim payment of the proceeds of the goods after the close of the war, unless he is placed under a disability either by the terms of the Treaty of Versailles or of the Treaty of Peace Order of the 18th Aug. 1919.

If the effect of the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915 has been accurately stated, it is impossible to maintain that art. 297 of the Treaty of Versailles and the Treaty of Peace Order of the 18th Aug. 1919 can operate to defeat the claim of the respondent. Art. 297 reserves to the Allied and Associated Powers the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the treaty. Germany undertakes to compensate its nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property, rights, or interests in allied or associated States.

The money claimed as proceeds of the sale of Alsyke clover did not belong to a German national at the date of the coming into force of the treaty, but to a neutral. The contention on behalf of the appellant involves therefore a claim to confiscate, under the terms of the treaty, property at that date vested in a neutral owner, a contention which is negatived by the words of limitation in the terms of the treaty, and which is not capable of serious argument. The same limitation is to be found in the terms of the Treaty of Peace Order. The property charged under that order is all property, rights, and interests belonging to German nationals at the date when the treaty comes into force (not being property, rights, or interests acquired under any general licence issued by or on behalf of His Majesty), and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation, or other dealings therewith. It does not affect in any way property which at the date when the treaty came into force, was the property of a neutral. The appeal must be dismissed with costs. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE VALERIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT, ENGLAND.

Enemy ship—Capture of German vessel in Norwegian waters — Subsequent loss of ship — Claim for restoration in money—Restitutio in integrum.

On the 19th March 1918 a British cruiser captured the V., a German steamship, in Norwegian territorial waters. The cruiser was unaware that she was within the territorial limit. On the way to Lerwick, under escort, the V. had to be abandoned owing to very bad weather, and as she would have been dangerous as a derelict, she was sunk by gunfire. The Norwegian Government claimed restoration of the vessel in money.

Held that, though the Norwegian Government might be entitled to have the V. released to them had she been in existence, because the sovereignty of the King of Norway had been wronged by her capture in territorial waters, it did not follow that if she was not in existence her value in money must be restored to them. The principle of redress was restitutio in integrum not reparation. The Government of Norway had no property or interest in the ship nor possession, nor did it appear that the Government had come under any liability or incurred any expense, except for costs in respect of the capture. Payment of the value of the ship would either leave in the hands of the Norwegian Government a profit on the whole transaction or would constitute the Government a trustee for the enemy owners, and in neither case would the payment come within the principle of an indemnity.

The considered opinion of the board was delivered by

Lord SUMNER.—This is a "claim of territory" made by the appellant on behalf of His Majesty the King of Norway. It is preferred in a cause in prize instituted by the Procurator-General in order that all outstanding questions as to the Valeria might be disposed of. On the 19th March 1918 H.M.S. Glendale captured the Valeria, a German vessel, about fifty yards within the limits of the territorial waters of Norway. The captors had no intention of intruding on those waters and believed, though erroneously, that they were outside of them, nor was their mistake due to negligence or rashness. The Glendale proceeded to escort the Valeria towards Lerwick, but encountered very bad weather, and had to take the officers and crew off the prize and to abandon her. As a derelict she would have been a danger to navigation and she was properly sunk by gunfire. This is common ground between the parties to the appeal. It must be taken that the ship was lost by natural causes, and not by the conduct of the captors, though she was sailing under their direction. The personal claim of the Norwegian pilots is to be dealt with elsewhere and is not now in dispute. Accordingly the sole question raised is one of law.

The appellant's case is that, having done wrong in seizing the ship, the captors ought to restore her in specie. As they cannot do that they must restore her in money. This involves the proposition that, having seized her in neutral territorial waters, they became insurers of her against all risks and in all events whatsoever for the benefit of the neutral Sovereign. The appellant's counsel did not shrink from putting the case.

Both authority and principle were appealed to. For the former The Dusseldorf (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478; 15 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 84; 123 L. T. Rep. 732; (1920) A. C. 1034) was relied on. In that case their Lordships observed: "Simple release of the ship in this country to the claimant Sovereign may be an inadequate redress. The fact that the court has duly received into its charge and jurisdiction a ship, which ought not to have been seized at all, leads to the conclusion that the true claim of the appellant" (who was the same official as the appellant in the present case) "is for a restitutio in integrum so far as the Government of Norway are concerned."

From this the conclusion was drawn that restitutio in integrum involved the payment of money in case of the fortuitous loss of the ship. Their Lordships do not agree. No such consideration arose in The Dusseldorf. There the ship existed in specie and the right of the claimants to her release was uncontested. What was in debate was, whether it was sufficient to place the ship at the disposal of the Norwegian Government in a British port or whether, as the equivalent of returning her to the waters from which she had been taken, the cost of transporting her from England to Norway should be paid. If this were not done, however venial and trivial the captors' original error might have been, the Government of Norway might be put to unmerited inconvenience and expense by reason of an act of which they had the right to complain. This was the connection in which the expression restitutio in integrum was used. The case had no analogy to the technical restitutio in integrum of Roman law, nor to the measure of damages for injury to property wilfully or carelessly inflicted, nor were such matters considered. The plain fact is that no money can restore this ship, and to claim money, with which to buy another ship, or as a solatium for her loss, is to shift the ground of the claim from restitution to reparation.

The judgment in The Dusseldorf further observed: "It may therefore well be that the rules which apply to capture on the high seas are by no means closely applicable to capture in neutral territorial waters."

One of such rules, apart from questions of probable cause for the original seizure, is that the court does not hold captors liable for damages and costs where their dealings with the prize have been reasonable and prudent and where, if she has been lost, it has not been through their neglect or default. The passage above quoted does not imply that in case of a claim of territory the exact opposite must be the rule, and that the captors must be decreed to pay for the ship, if, however excusably, they are unable to produce and return her. Their Lordships find in the language used in The Dusseldorf no warrant for the present contention.

Although this matter arises virtually, if not formally, between Sovereign and Sovereign, their Lordships, as a court, are bound to act judicially. It may be right that such claims should be encouraged, so that all sense of grievance in neutral Sovereigns may be peacefully and regularly removed, but their Lordships, however disposed to the fullest liberality of treatment, must be guided by settled rules and decisions. Anything in excess of this must be sought, if at all, through diplomatic channels. The Government of Norway had no property or interest in this ship; they had no possession of her nor, so far as appears, have they come under any liability or incurred any expenses, other than costs, in respect of her capture. Alike in vindication of their Sovereign's territorial right and of his high obligations of impartiality as a neutral in time of war, they claim on his behalf that the steps which the captors took should be retraced, that what was done should be undone, and that the belligerent should retain no advantage from the captor's mistaken action. This is His Norwegian Majesty's right, but compensation in money for the loss of the ship under circumstances such as these can only be asserted in the interest of the owners of the vessel. It is not as though Great Britain had profited by what happened. If the Norwegian Government be really entitled to recover money, no one is entitled to inquire into the use to which they may choose to put it; but, for the purpose of testing the right, it is germane to ask in what title that money would be recovered. Even though it is measured and described as the value of the vessel, it is money still, and would be recovered only on behalf of the German shipowners, who have no rights in the matter. The appellant conceded that the decision in The Dusseldorf precluded any claim for damages, as such, in a case where the captors were not guilty of any intentional offence or of any negligence or want of skill, and, in this case, between restoration and damages there is no middle term. It is argued that, if so, in spite of the fact that within the territorial waters of Norway no capture should have been made at all, the claimant will under the circumstances of the case have no more redress than in the case of an honest but mistaken capture on the high seas. It may be so. In the latter case the claimant shipowner is met by the rights which attach to the captor's bonâ fide possession and can vindicate his ownership only by obtaining the release of the ship, unless the misconduct of the captors give him exceptionally a claim for costs and damages. In the former, the same result is reached by a different road. The rights of the territorial Sovereign, vindicating neither ownership nor possession, but his claims of territory only, are satisfied in the absence of such misconduct by the restitution of the ship herself, in the sense and under the conditions laid down in The Dusseldorf. He has, as a Sovereign, no alternative or additional claim to receive another ship or the means of buying one. If the ship had been neutral-owned, the owner could have made his claim directly and in his own name, and the Norwegian Government would have been independent claimants in another and separate right. From the fact that there was an enemy owner they can be no better off. In his own name the enemy owner cannot be heard, nor in his name or in his behalf can the Norwegian Government be heard either, but only on behalf of the Norwegian Crown.

It is unnecessary to re-examine the authorities generally, which were so recently discussed in The Dusseldorf. In the case of The De Fortuyn, in 1760, cited from Marsden's collection of Burrell's Reports, p. 175, it may be pointed out that the violation of neutral waters was intentional, the claimant himself was before the court in his own proprietary right, and the prize was apparently still existent in specie in the hands of the captors or of purchasers from them. It has therefore no bearing on the present appeal.

Two points, however, were made upon expressions to be found in the decided cases, which ought to be briefly considered. In The John (2 Dods. 336, at p. 339) Lord Stowell distinguishes cases of unjustifiable seizures which have been made in an ignorance which is "vincible" from those in which the ignorance is "invincible," and it is said that, at this point at least, decisions upon capture on the high seas ought to apply in favour of claims of territory, and the error of the present captors, being due to "vincible" ignorance, ought to be compensated with costs and damages, as if the capture had been on the high seas. The coast of Norway was fixed and three miles to seaward from that coast could have been fixed too. There was no uncertainty in the limits of the territorial waters, but only in the navigating officer's mind. He was ignorant of the fact of his precise position, not because it was doubtful but because he was. With better charts or better instruments his ignorance would have been vincible. Their Lordships think that this argument is a mere metaphysical subtlety. The invincible ignorance spoken of by Lord Stowell arises at any rate when a captor, making reasonable use of all the means of information at his disposal, is yet misled. He was discussing cases where it is impossible to tell from the ship's register, sea pass, or bills of lading on board what her national character or what not may be. How is the proposition any less applicable when it is impossible with the ordinary charts and instruments to tell exactly how many scores of yards distant the shore may be? If there is no want of diligence and skill in using the instruments or other means of observation at their disposal officers are just as invincibly ignorant or the reverse when they investigate the geographical position as when they investigate the legal status of a ship under search. There seems therefore to be nothing in this distinction.

The other point arises out of the use of the word "indemnification" in The Hendrick and Jacob, decided in 1790 by the Lords of Appeal. It is relied on as deciding that a general rule exists, whereby captors who have seized a vessel wrongfully are bound to restore her in specie or, if they cannot do that, to indemnify in money those who suffered wrong by her capture.

Their Lordships have made extensive inquiries in order to ascertain whether any record exists of the reasons given by the Lords of Appeal in this case, but without success. Although collections are to be found, though by no means complete, of the printed papers laid before the Lords of Appeal by the parties in cases heard during the latter part of the eighteenth century, and in some cases at least the original documents connected with the ship and cargo captured have been preserved in the Record Office, no note or report has been found of the reasons for the judgment, if any were given. They may well have turned on the facts of the case, for the captors alleged and the claimants denied that those on board avowed the ship's Dutch enemy nationality when challenged, and endeavoured to destroy some of the ship's papers. What is known of them is to be found in Sir W. Scott's judgment in The Betsey (1 C. Rob. at p. 96), and this account was probably taken from one of the MS. collections formed by advocates practising in prize cases from time to time, and possibly from the notes of Sir W. Scott himself, as he signed the respondents' case on the appeal. The actual decree is thus indorsed on the appellant's case in the Library of Lincoln's Inn—"the Lords pronounced against the seizure and decreed the value to be paid to the claimants for the use of the owner."

The case is one of a vessel taken on the high seas without any justification. On demand for restitution by her owners against the original British captors the Lords of Appeal decided that the owners were entitled to restitution from some quarter, and, as the ship had been lost when in the justifiable possession under prize of French re-captors, that quarter could only be the original British captors. The ship no longer existed in specie so that it could be followed into French hands, and since that claim was absolutely extinguished by the loss, the proprietor was entitled to his indemnification from the original captor.

Without discussing this case, their Lordships need only point out that it is distinguishable. It was a case of capture on the high seas of a ship supposed to be an enemy but really a neutral ship, so that the only wrong was one to her owners, and that a wrong in respect of proprietary right. In the present case the capture was within territorial waters and the only wrong that can be vindicated is the wrong to the sovereignty of His Majesty the King of Norway. Whether indemnity be an apt term or not in the case of captures, it is at any rate plain that it is a term which would preclude the appellant from recovering anything in respect of the proprietary interest in the ship. Restitution of the vessel is a restoration of the status quo, but payment of her value in money would either leave in the hands of the Norwegian Government a profit on the whole transaction, which is a contradiction of the whole idea of indemnity, or would constitute them agents or trustees for the German owners, who, on receipt of the money, would be recompensed for that which was no wrong to them, so that again the principle of indemnity would be departed from.

Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs, and so they will humbly advise His Majesty.

THE AXEL JOHNSON; THE DROTTNING SOPHIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE) ENGLAND.

Contraband—Wool going to enemy country for combing—Combed wool to be returned to neutral country—By-products kept in enemy country—Doctrine of infection—Doctrine of Prize Court.

Certain bales of wool, absolute contraband of war, were shipped in two Swedish vessels from Buenos Ayres in 1916. The wool was consigned to a neutral firm in Sweden, but was seized by the British authorities at Kirkwall whilst on its way to Gothenburg. The evidence clearly showed that it had an enemy destination, and was intended for Germany. The claimants, the Swedish firm, asserted that even if the wool was going to Germany (which was denied) it was only being sent there for the purposes of combing, and was to be returned to Sweden as combed or spun wool, and that, therefore, although the waste wool with its by-products might be retained in the enemy country, the wool itself was not the subject of condemnation.

Without deciding whether there were any circumstances in which goods sent to be worked upon in an enemy country and returned to their neutral owners would be exempt from condemnation:

Held, that on the facts of this case there were no grounds shown for the contention of the claimants, and that the wool was good and lawful prize.

Decision of Evans, P. (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 117 L. T. Rep. 412: (1917) P. 234) affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of Sir Samuel Evans, P., reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 117 L. T. Rep. 412; (1917) P. 234.

The appeal was by the claimants, a neutral firm in Sweden, against the condemnation, as having an enemy destination of certain parcels of wool (absolute contraband).

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.) and Theobald Mathew for the Procurator-General.

The judgment of the board was delivered by:

Lord SUMNER.—This appeal, with a very small exception to be mentioned shortly, raises only questions of fact, and after considering the evidence with care, and with the great assistance of counsel for the appellants, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that there is no reason to differ from the conclusions at which the learned President arrived. They do not consider it necessary to review all the steps by which he reached that conclusion, nor do they affirm their own agreement with all the propositions of fact that he mentions in his judgment, but not only do they think that there was evidence upon which he could conclude that the wool in question had a German destination, and being absolute contraband whould therefore be condemned, but, for reasons to be shortly given, they have arrived at the same conclusion themselves. It seems to them clear that, as regards the wool purchased from Messrs. Staudt, there was an intention on the part of the claimants, clearly arrived at in Nov. of 1915, that it should be sent to Germany or Austria to be combed. It is quite true that a purchase from Messrs. Hardt had taken place earlier, and no such letters had passed with Messrs. Hardt as passed in the case of Messrs. Staudt, but the way in which the matter is dealt with by Mr. Engberg draws no sufficient difference between the two consignments, and there is no reason except his statement to suppose that the intention formed with regard to Messrs. Staudt's wool did not equally apply, as naturally it would under the circumstances, to the wool purchased from Messrs. Hardt.

The intention is clearly proved, because the action taken by the appellants in increasing the quantity, which they purchased upon the direct suggestion of Messrs. Staudt, is consistent only with their making provision for what was represented to them as a satisfactory commercial transaction, namely, sending their wool to Germany to be combed upon the understanding that certain waste portions of it, which would be retained, would be paid for. There are circumstances spoken to by Mr. Engberg, which shortly before the seizure of the two consignments might have explained a change of intention, but their Lordships think that his account of the letter, and the transaction with Messrs. Staudt, if not uncandid—for probably he endeavoured to be candid—was at any rate an understatement of his firm's position, and, on closely examining the reasons he gives for saying that no such intention existed at the time of the seizure, their Lordships are unable to suppose that the intention had been changed. There were no doubt some facilities for having wool combed in Sweden, which had previously not existed, and there is an arrangement with the Norrkoping Company made by the appellant company for availing themselves of those facilities, but the affidavits dispose rather too summarily of the suggestion that it would still have suited the appellants business to carry out their former intention of sending the wool to Germany to be combed. Although it is possible that the appellants' business might have been carried on without sending the wool to Germany, one would have expected much more detail and much more firm ground in the affidavit before concluding that what had been a satisfactory arrangement in November had been abandoned in May or June of the following year. If that is so, the conclusion follows that at the time when the wool was seized on both vessels those who were the owners of it—and their Lordships think the appellant company were the owners—and who certainly had full control over it, intended for the purpose of their business, and not in any way wrongly, to send it to Germany to be combed, and part of it to be retained.

So much for the question of fact. It is then suggested that on two points the wool, which on those facts would be absolute contraband, would not be subject to seizure, because first of all it was intended to be sent to Germany for a temporary purpose only, and secondly because, as is contended, it was to be sent to Germany for the purpose of being returned to Sweden after treatment, under such a binding engagement between the German Government and the Swedish Government as would constitute a clog upon the German Government's power to requisition or detain it, and would ensure that it would never augment the resources of the enemy or form part of the German stock of wool.

It is to be observed with regard to the first point that we do not know how long the combing of the wool would involve its remaining in Germany, but it is clear that it is a process of some elaboration and some time. It would involve unbaling it, passing it through the combing machinery, and repacking both the combed wool and the waste wool, and therefore, although it might be a temporary matter in the sense that some wool was ultimately to be returned, it is not a question of mere passing through the enemy country, or of a sojourn clearly shown to be unimportant or short. Their Lordships do not feel called upon to decide one way or the other whether there are any circumstances in which the temporary character of the stay of the supposed contraband goods in the enemy country would prevent the goods from being contraband, and would therefore deprive a belligerent of the right to seize them, but they are clearly of opinion—and no authority whatever was cited to the contrary—that, where wool is to be sent into the enemy's territory for treatment like this, during a considerable stay, and with no small amount of alteration of identity, it is impossible to say that the temporary character of the proceeding, such as it is, distinguishes the case from that of goods permanently sent into enemy territory with the intention that they should there remain or be consumed.

With regard to the other question, whether such an international agreement as is suggested would of itself prevent goods, which were otherwise condemnable as contraband, from being condemned, upon the ground that faith must be given to the solemn promise of the other belligerent, and therefore that the goods are not going to augment his stock—it is unnecessary to express any opinion, because the facts do no raise it. On a close examination of the affidavit of the one deponent, who speaks to this matter, it is clear that, although the Swedish Government at the time in question required that the Swedish exporter should, as a condition of obtaining a licence to export, give his promise to bring the wool back, there was no proof of a promise on the part of the German Government either to the Government of Sweden or to the individual Swedish exporters to ensure this return. The evidence as to the German Government's arrangements stops short with that given by Messrs. Staudt in Nov. of 1915, the gist of which was that the German Government would only insist upon the retention of the waste wool, and even this was to be without engagement, and as a matter of what is called "exceptional obligingness."

Their Lordships therefore think that on these grounds, which have been sufficiently outlined and need not be further developed, the conclusion at which the learned President has arrived was the right conclusion and is justified by the evidence. They will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

THE NORNE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Contraband—Enemy destination—Onus of proof—Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914.

When goods declared conditional contraband are seized proof of an intention to submit the goods to public auction in the neutral country to which they are shipped does not necessarily discharge the onus upon the claimants of establishing that they were not destined for an enemy Government or an enemy base of supply.

Judgment of the Prize Court affirmed.

APPEAL by neutral claimants against a judgment of the President (Sir Henry Duke) condemning consignments of oranges by the steamship Norne and other ships on the ground that the claimants had failed to establish that the goods, which were conditional contraband, were not destined for an enemy base of supply.

Sir Erle Richards, K.C. and Darby for the appellants.

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.) and Sir Harold Smith (Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) with them) for the respondent, the Procurator-General.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—The appellants are an import and export company claiming on behalf of Enrique Rubio, who was the shipper and consignor of certain boxes of Valentia oranges seized on the Norwegian steamships Norne, Grove, and Hardanger, during Dec. 1915, while on voyages from Valentia, in Spain, to Rotterdam, in Holland. The amount involved is not considerable, but it was stated that the case had been selected as a test case which would govern a number of other cases.

The first point raised on behalf of the appellants is that the ship's papers in each case disclose a consignee who has the real control of the goods, and that, therefore, the seizure comes within the protective provisions of the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914. If this contention can be maintained the appellants would succeed. The consignee named in the bill of lading covering the oranges shipped on the Norne was J. de Graaf, and the consignee named in the other two bills of lading, covering the oranges shipped on the Grove and Hardanger, was Van Hoeckel. Both consignees were members of a syndicate composed of dealers at Rotterdam with the intention of importing fruit direct from Spain. The operations of this syndicate were controlled by an agreement of Sept. 1915, but in the view of their Lordships it is not necessary to express any opinion on the relationship created by the agreement between the syndicate and the constituent members whose names were inserted as consignees in the bills of lading. In any event the syndicate is not the consignee named in the bills of lading, and therefore cannot be regarded as the consignee within the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914. The true position of the parties appears to be accurately stated in the affidavit of Rubio sworn on the 13th July 1918. He states that Schrevel and Co. were to arrange freight, space and insurance, and that the fruit shipped by him was to be sold on his behalf at Rotterdam by Schrevel and Co. on a commission of 5 per cent., that the bills of lading were signed by Enberg and Co., duly representing the captain of each ship, and that, by indication of Manuel Mas, who at that date was acting as agent for the syndicate in Valentia, they were endorsed to order of de Graaf and Van Hoeckel, genuine Dutch fruit firms associated with Schrevel and Co. for selling fruit on his account, and that all fruit shipped in the three steamers was the property of the Spanish fruit exporters, no cases being sold to anybody, but being consigned on their account to be sold by auction at Rotterdam. The effect of this statement is that the boxes of oranges in question were consigned to sale agents in Rotterdam, whose authority—apart from any special provision—was revocable at any time by the consignor and shipper. Sale agents, whose authority is revocable by the consignor, are not consignees who have a real control of the goods consigned within the terms of the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914: (The Urna, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.; 123 L. T. Rep. 481; (1920) A. C. 899). The result is that the contention of the appellants under the first head cannot be maintained.

At the date of the seizure the oranges had been declared conditional contraband. It is therefore for the appellants to prove that they were not destined for an enemy government or an enemy base of supply. The question to be determined is whether they have satisfactorily discharged the burden which rests upon them.

It was suggested in the affidavit filed on behalf of the respondent that Enrique Rubio was not in reality a fruit dealer or exporter, but a shipping clerk in the branch house of a German firm. In his affidavit in reply of the 24th Nov. 1919, Enrique Rubio swears that he is not and never has been a shipping clerk, or employed as such, but that he had carried on business as a fruit merchant at Sagunto, in the province of Valentia, since 1908. The learned President was satisfied that Enrique Rubio was a fruit grower and dealer, or a fruit grower only, and that there was a mistake in the suggestion that he was a mere pretended or invented owner of fruit who had come out of some mercantile office in order to figure as a consignor. There appears to be no ground to differ from this finding, and the respondent on the hearing of the appeal did not allege that Enrique Rubio was a pretended or invented owner of fruit.

It is not sufficient for the appellants to establish that Enrique Rubio was a Spanish fruit exporter who had no intention of sending his goods either to an enemy government or to any enemy base of supply. The voyage is not limited to that which a shipper of goods sets in motion. Whether goods in any particular instance are contraband, by application of the doctrine of continuous voyage, is a question of fact. Under the terms of the Order in Council the appellants must discharge the burden of proving that the destination, if the voyage had not been interrupted, would have been innocent. When an exporter ships goods under such conditions, that he does not retain control of their disposal after arrival at the port of delivery, and the control but for their interception and seizure would have passed into the hands of some other persons, who had the intention either to sell them to an enemy Government or to send them to an enemy base of supply, then the doctrine of continuous voyage becomes applicable, and the goods on capture are liable to condemnation as contraband. The case for the respondent is that the cases of oranges on arrival at Rotterdam would have passed under the control of Lutten and Sohn, of Hamburg, whose intention it was to send them to the enemy base of supply at Hamburg. The next question, therefore, to consider is whether this contention is established.

The learned President has found as a fact that Lutten and Sohn, of Hamburg, had a substantial part in the control of the business which was being carried on and a substantial interest in the transactions involved, which went beyond a mere commission of 10 cents per case upon oranges which might be forwarded; but the issue remains to be determined whether this interest was sufficient to give them control over the disposal of the cases of oranges and to determine Hamburg as the place of destination.

There seems to be no reason for not accepting the evidence, given on behalf of the appellants, as to the conditions under which the syndicate, referred to in the case as Schrevel and Co., was started. In 1913 a ring of fruit dealers interested in the fruit trade between Valentia and Rotterdam had a contract with the Royal Nederlands Steam Navigation Company, under which the ring were entitled to all the space for fruit on the ships of that company, which owned the only direct line by which perishable goods could be carried direct from Spain to Holland. The syndicate, composed of fruit growers, was formed in Feb. 1913 to fight the ring, and with the intention of breaking the monopoly of the ring. In 1914 the syndicate endeavoured to import oranges into Rotterdam via London, but, owing to the perishable character of the fruit, it was not successful, and the syndicate ceased to operate in Jan. 1915. In the summer of 1915 the syndicate was reformed with the intention of importing fruit direct from Spain to Holland, and the operations of the syndicate were regulated under articles of partnership signed at Rotterdam on the 13th Sept. 1915. As early as Aug. 1915 the steamship Norne had been chartered for the purposes of the syndicate, and it is material to observe that this charter was arranged some time before Lutten took any part in the business. After the formation of the syndicate, Van Ronnen was sent out as agent of the syndicate to Spain. Subsequently this agency was terminated, and Manuel Mas was appointed in his place, who had acted for many years as agent for Lutten. There are a number of cablegrams which show that Van Ronnen objected to the transfer of the agency to Manuel Mas, but finally the matter was arranged. In Sept. 1915 Lutten had an interview with Hechterman at the town of Bentheim, in Germany. Manuel Mas was also present. No document containing any record of the meeting was found, but Mr. Lutten, on behalf of Lutten and Sohn, made proposals with regard to fruit import from Spain to Holland, and to the chartering for this purpose of a series of ships. The learned President accepts the statement of Mr. Hechterman that he did not bind himself at this interview to Mr. Lutten, and that whatever expectation Mr. Lutten may have formed, Mr. Hechterman kept himself free. At this time there were negotiations with the British Government on behalf of the syndicate that the vessels chartered by them and carrying fruit should be allowed to proceed direct to Holland with their cargoes. In Oct. the British Government refused this request, and negotiations were resumed between Mr. Hechterman and Mr. Lutten. When Mr. Lutten was unable to import into Hamburg, owing to the war, he had a valuable connection in Valentia. The case of the appellants is that he sold his goodwill and agencies to the syndicate for a consideration, and that there was no arrangement which placed the oranges in the control of Mr. Lutten at Rotterdam so as to enable him to direct that they should be forwarded to Hamburg The facts are stated in the second affidavit of Mr. Hechterman sworn on the 18th July 1919. He says that one of his company's German relations, Messrs. Lutten and Sohn, of Hamburg, were large importers of oranges, &c., but that owing to the war their business had been entirely brought to a standstill, and that their interest was to prevent their competitors from getting hold of their relations such as agents, growers, &c. On the other hand he states that it was to the advantage of the company to obtain control of a well-founded organisation, as this would place them in a position to oppose the ring with greater success, that accordingly an agreement was arrived at between the company and Lutten and Sohn that so long as the latter would be unable to resume business, his company should take over their agents on its own account and employ them for its own business, that in this way his company established relations in Spain and that those persons who had previously been in the employment of Lutten and Sohn became the employees of his company, and have since 1915 been working as agents of his company. Mr. Hechterman further states that under this agreement Manuel Mas became the agent of his company, and that telegrams and letters exhibited to his former affidavit sworn herein on the 4th Dec. 1918, relate to his employment, and that it was the business of Mas to find persons willing to consign their goods to his company. No doubt the exact nature of the arrangement may not be capable of accurate ascertainment, and, owing to the capture, there is no evidence how the arrangement would have been carried through had the oranges arrived at the port of Rotterdam in the ordinary course of business. It is sufficient to say that their Lordships can find no evidence to support affirmatively the contention that Lutten and Sohn would have had the control of the destination of the oranges after their arrival at Rotterdam or that it would have been within their competency to order that the oranges should be sent from Rotterdam to Hamburg.

The question still remains whether having regard to all the facts the appellants have discharged the onus which the Order in Council places upon them of establishing that, at the time when the oranges were intercepted and seized, their destination was not an enemy base of supply. The contention of the appellants is that the destination of the voyage was Rotterdam, and that if the voyage had been carried through without interruption the oranges would in the ordinary course of business have been offered to local dealers at public auction, thereby becoming part of the common stock of a neutral country, to whatever consumers they might ultimately be sold. It was said that if this contention is not accepted, and it is held that the anticipation that a large proportion of the oranges may go for consumption in Germany is sufficient to make them contraband, the consequence is that goods within the category of conditional contraband would be liable to seizure and condemnation wherever there was anticipation that they might be largely sold to enemy customers. The answer is that the anticipation of a large sale to enemy customers is not sufficient to make goods liable as articles of contraband, but that there must be anticipation of sale either to an enemy Government or an enemy base of supply. For instance, in the present case there must be anticipation that a large number of oranges sold would find their way to Hamburg, which has already been held in many cases to be an enemy base of supply. Whether the appellants have negatived the suggestion that the destination of the voyage was Hamburg must be determined on the documents and oral evidence produced at the trial. Their Lordships are unable to hold that the mere fact that goods will be offered for sale by auction at the port of arrival is in itself conclusive of the innocency of their destination. It would appear to them to be too wide a generalisation that whatever the special conditions may be, the goods could never be condemned as contraband if once it is established that they would be offered at public auction in a neutral market. It is no doubt necessary to draw a distinction between a case of contraband which depends on destination to an enemy government, or enemy base of supply, and a case under the Reprisals Order in which a destination to an enemy country is sufficient. It appears from the judgment of the learned President that an argument was brought forward in the Prize Court that if the contention that the oranges were contraband could not be established, nevertheless it could be established that they were destined for an enemy country, and were therefore goods which should be stopped under the Reprisals Order, to be dealt with at the expiration of the war. The learned President expressed the opinion that if the case of the respondent failed in Prize, they could not succeed under the Reprisals Order, and no alternative claim under that order was brought before their Lordships on the appeal. It appears, however, to be evident in the present case that if the destination of the voyage was Germany, the place of destination was Hamburg, and oranges destined for Hamburg would undoubtedly be liable to condemnation as contraband.

The learned President, after examining the documentary evidence with great care, and after hearing the important oral evidence of Mr. Hechterman, found that Lutten and Sohn at Hamburg had a substantial interest in the business of importing oranges from Valentia, carried on through the syndicate under this interest, and that this interest went beyond their interest as agents in respect of which they were paid a commission of 10 cents per case of oranges forwarded. He further found that the interest of Lutten and Sohn was not to sell oranges in Holland, but to make the trade a part of the Hamburg trade, which they had carried on before the outbreak of the war. The learned President further found, on evidence which was sufficient to warrant such a finding, that a scheme was arrived at between Hechterman and Lutten, prospectively in September and definitively early in November, of which Mr. Hechterman gave him an inadequate and uncandid account. He thought it clear that the object of this scheme was to give Lutten an interest and a share in the business, such as would result from a common desire that the oranges should proceed to and reach Hamburg. It was for Mr. Hechterman to displace the possibility of any such destination being reconciled with the contemplated auction in Rotterdam, not for the court to speculate by what means (of which there are obviously several) an auction might be made to play a part in the transmission of the cargo to a predetermined destination in Hamburg. The President held that Mr. Hechterman, whom he had seen and heard, had failed to discharge the burden of proof in this matter.

Their Lordships having examined the documentary and oral evidence, with the assistance of counsel, are not prepared to differ from the learned President on these questions of fact, or to differ from him in the conclusion that the appellants have not discharged the onus placed upon them of proving that the oranges were not destined for an enemy base of supply. Moreover, the learned President has found that the appellant syndicate withheld from the Prize Court the fact of the existence of a substantial foreign interest which it was their duty to disclose, and for the non-disclosure of which they must accept all consequent liability. On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

Held, that the insurers could not avoid the policies because under the circumstances they had waived disclosure of the freight contract by not making inquiry.

Query, whether on the facts of the case the freight contract was a material circumstance requiring disclosure.

Judgment of Greer, J. reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the judgment of Greer, J., sitting without a jury.

In Feb. 1919, the plaintiffs, Mann, MacNeil, and Steeves Limited, a firm of insurance brokers, effected with the defendants, the Capital and Counties Insurance Company Limited, an insurance to the amount of 1500*l.* (and subsequently a second insurance for 974*l.*) at a premium of 5*l.* per cent. upon the auxiliary schooner Elmir Roberts. The insurance was subsequently embodied in a policy dated the 17th April 1919, which declared it to be an insurance lost or not lost at and from "any port and/or ports, place and/or places in the United States Atlantic and/or Gulf to any port and/or ports place and/or places in France while there and thence return to port and/or ports in the United States Atlantic and/or Gulf with privilege to use ports en route." It was also agreed that the subject-matter of the policy should be "Hull and machinery, &c., valued at $175,000. Subject to Institute Time clauses attached. Hulls (internal engines) combustion form as original." The perils insured against included perils of the seas, fire, "and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have come or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the aforesaid subject matter of the insurance of any part thereof." The Institute Time clauses included the following clause: "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty as to cargo, trade, locality, or date of sailing provided notice be given and any additional premium required be agreed immediately after receipt of advice."

(a) Reported by W. C. SANDFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs effected a third insurance with the defendants, the General Marine Underwriters Limited, for 2000*l.* upon similar terms.

The plaintiffs sued both defendants upon their respective policies, and the actions were tried together.

The Elmir Roberts was an American wooden four-masted motor schooner, built in 1918, of 784 tons gross and 695 tons net registered tonnage and of 1461 tons dead-weight capacity. Her certificate of registry described her as a gas screw auxiliary schooner. On the 24th Jan. 1919, her owners had engaged her to carry from New Orleans to Bordeaux for the Michelin Tyre Company 2500 drums of gasolene, an explosive substance and very dangerous when exposed to the air. On or about the 22nd Feb. the vessel started on her voyage having loaded the 2500 iron drums, each drum containing about 40 gallons of gasolene. She also carried barrel staves, called French claret staves, to the number of 103,245 under deck and 47,841 on deck. She had also on board for fuel 540 gallons of gasolene in iron drums, 450 gallons of oil in barrels, 330 gallons of crude oil in tanks, and 330 gallons of kerosene. She arrived at Bordeaux on the 25th May and there discharged her cargo.

On the 23rd July she was chartered to the United States Government. Under this charter-party she loaded a cargo of empty shells and mixed ammunition and sailed from Bordeaux for New York on the 26th July. On the 22nd Aug., while she was on this voyage, a kerosene lamp burst in the hands of an engineer. The engine-room floor caught fire, then the fuel oil. The fire then spread to the rest of the vessel which was abandoned by the crew and, after burning for some hours, exploded and was totally lost.

The defendants pleaded that at the time when the insurances were effected the plaintiffs wrongfully concealed from the defendants the material fact then known to the plaintiffs and unknown to the defendants that the owners of the Elmir Roberts had entered into the freight engagement with the Michelin Tyre Company for the carriage of the 2500 drums of gasolene to Bordeaux.

Greer, J. held that the fact that this freight engagement had been made was a material circumstance within the meaning of sect. 18, sub-sect. 1 and 2, of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and that it was not one of those material circumstances which under sub-sect. 3 need not be disclosed. He therefore gave judgment for the defendants in each case.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20, 1920, the following judgments were read:

Bankes, L.J.—The claims in these actions, which were tried together, were upon two policies of marine insurance both dated the 17th April 1919, upon the hull and machinery of the auxiliary schooner Elmir Roberts for a voyage from places in the United States and elsewhere to places in France and back again. The vessel completed her voyage from the United States to Bordeaux safely, but was totally destoyed by fire on the return voyage to the United States. The claims were for a total loss. The defences included a plea of concealment of a material fact—namely, that the owners of the Elmir Roberts had, before the insurance was effected, entered into a freight engagement for the carriage in the said vessel of 2500 drums of gasolene from the United States to Bordeaux. Greer, J., who tried the actions, held that the plea of concealment of a material fact was made out, and he gave judgment for the defendants. All parties called evidence at the trial. The question for this court is whether the learned judge came to a correct conclusion upon the evidence. With regard to the vessel herself there was no dispute. She was one of a class built in America during the war. She was a wooden vessel of about 690 tons net register tonnage with auxiliary motor engines. The engines of such a vessel are run with fuel oil, and a considerable quantity of petrol is carried in tanks in the engine room, for the purpose of heating the hot bulb of the engines, and for working the small petrol engines which drive the winches. The quantity of petrol so carried by this vessel would probably be from 300 to 400 gallons.

It is conceded by all parties that this class of vessel is regarded as an extremely hazardous risk, owing to the use of petrol under the above circumstances. Quite a number of witnesses said that they would not take a line on such a vessel, whatever her cargo might be. The gasolene, or petrol as it is called in England, which formed part of the cargo of this vessel was contained in 2500 iron drums. Each drum contained about 40 gallons, so the total quantity carried was about 100,000 gallons. The owners of the vessel had entered into a contract to carry these drums before the proposal for the insurance was made. Petrol contained in iron drums was proved to be quite ordinary and common form of merchandise to be included as part of a general cargo to be carried across the Atlantic.

The plaintiffs' case was that in the case of an insurance upon hull it was no part of the duty of the assured to make any disclosure to the under writer with reference to the cargo. but that it was the underwriter's business, if he wished to know anything as to the nature of the cargo, to make the necessary inquiries. The defendants' case, on the other hand, was that even in the case of an insurance upon hull it was the duty of the assured to make full disclosure of every material circumstance connected with the cargo to be carried. In cross-examination the witnesses for both parties had to modify the general proposition contained in these contentions. For instance, the plaintiffs' first witness admitted that he could not contend that there would not be a duty to disclose the fact that dynamite formed part of a cargo, or that an entire cargo consisted of petrol; and several of the defendants' witnesses admitted that if quite small quantities of such articles as matches or cotton formed part of a cargo there would be no duty to disclose that fact, though there would be a duty to disclose the fact if considerable quantities of either were to form part of a cargo.

It appears to me to follow from this evidence that so far as the present case is concerned it must be accepted that the question whether disclosure must be made or not is one of degree, depending upon the circumstances of each particular case. Certainly upon the evidence given in this case it would appear that no rule can be laid down that under no circumstances where the insurance is one upon hull is there any duty upon the assured to make any disclosure as to the nature of the cargo. It does, however, appear from the evidence that the general rule prevailing in reference to insurances upon hull is that no disclosure in reference to the nature of the cargo to be carried is either made by the assured, or expected by the underwriter. This appears to be quite in accordance with what Lord Ellenborough conceived should be the rule: (see Boyd v. Dubois, 3 Camp. 133; Lubbock v. Potts, 1806, 7 East. 449); and it seems to me from the nature of things that no other practice could be expected to prevail. The duty, if duty there be, to make any disclosure can only be a duty to disclose some matter in relation to cargo already fixed or undertaken to be carried. In order, therefore, to qualify himself to make a valid contract of insurance the broker must keep himself posted as to what freight engagements have been entered into up to the moment of making the contract of insurance, and he must have sufficient information as to the exact nature and quantities of each parcel covered by those engagements to to enable him to decide what disclosure he should make. The inconvenience, not to say practical impossibility, of carrying on this class of business under such conditions, particularly where a broker is acting for a client abroad, convinces me that some such general rule as that spoken to by the plaintiffs' witnesses must be in existence. This conclusion is strongly supported by the fact that no reported case can be found in which the suggested duty to make the disclosure contended for by the defendants has been held to exist.

In deciding this case the learned judge had to apply sect. 18 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 to the facts before him. He decided that the fact that a freight engagement had been entered into for the carriage of this very considerable quantity of gasolene upon this particular vessel before the proposal for insurance was made was a circumstance which was material as being likely to influence the judgment of a prudent underwriter in fixing the premium, or determining whether he would take the risk. I cannot say that he was wrong in so deciding. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider the second branch of the learned judge's finding in reference to the question whether the assured was excused from making any disclosure of this material circumstance under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 18, either because the insurer must be presumed to have known it, or because under the circumstances he must be taken to have waived it. The learned judge has not dealt with the question of waiver, presumably because the point was not made in argument before him, and he has held that though the insurer must be presumed to have known that some portion of the cargo of this vessel would very possibly consist of drums of gasolene, he did not know, and must not be presumed to have known, that 2500 drums had actually been fixed at the time that he entered into the contract of insurance. This fine distinction leads one to doubt the soundness of the view that the circumstance of these drums being actually fixed was a material circumstance; but as I have already said I do not think it is possible upon the evidence to interfere with that part of the judge's judgment.

I do, however, consider that the appellants are entitled to succeed upon either of two grounds with which the learned judge does not deal. In the first place, I think that the evidence as to the practice in relation to the non-disclosure of the character of cargo when effecting a policy on hull does not only justify, but requires, the court to hold that an underwriter waives any information in relation to what may be fairly described as a parcel of ordinary cargo of lawful merchandise, which this parcel was. In the second place, I think that the plea of waiver can be supported on the ground indicated by Lord Esher, M.R. in Asfar v. Blundell (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 40, 106; 73 L. T. Rep. 648; (1896) 1 Q. B. 129), where in dealing with the question of concealment he says: "But it is not necessary to disclose minutely every material fact; assuming that there is a material fact which he"—the assured—"is bound to disclose, the rule is satisfied if he discloses sufficient to call the attention of the underwriters in such a manner that they can see that if they require further information they ought to ask for it." In my opinion the disclosure in the present case that this vessel was a wooden vessel with auxiliary motor engines was a disclosure of the fact that it was proposed to carry cargo from the United States to France in a vessel specially and dangerously liable to fire damage, and that such a disclosure was, within Lord Esher's language, a sufficient disclosure to put the underwriter on inquiry. Having regard to the language of the material section of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, in which the law relating to concealment is now contained, the conclusion is rather that disclosure had been waived than that it had not been made; but the result is the same, so far as the appellants' case is concerned.

On these grounds I think that the appeal succeeds and that the judgment entered for the defendants must be set aside and judgment entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed with interest, with costs here and below.

Atkin, L.J.—The subject of insurance in this case was the schooner Elmir Roberts, a wooden ship built in 1918 having auxiliary internal combustion engines. Her net register tonnage was 695, and her dead-weight capacity 1461 tons. She was insured on hull with the defendants. The plaintiffs who effected the insurance in their own names as well as for whom it might concern, are a firm of Liverpool insurance brokers who were acting for the American owners. The ship was insured at and from any port or ports in the United States of America to any port or ports in France, whilst there, and thence returning to any port or ports in the United States of America. The vessel was lost by fire and explosion consequent thereon on her return voyage from Bordeaux to New York. The defendants rely on concealment by the plaintiffs of the fact that at the time the contract of insurance was made the owners had made a freight engagement whereby the vessel was bound to carry on her outward voyage from the United States of America to France a part cargo of gasolene in drums, which they allege was a dangerous cargo. In fact the vessel did carry this cargo in safety to France. I mention the fact to discard it, for it appears irrelevant to the question whether the existing contract to carry the cargo was a material fact which ought to have been disclosed.

The law upon the matter is to be found in sect. 18 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. The learned judge had found that the freight engagement was a material circumstance within the definition in sub-sect. 2, for he thinks that it would have influenced the mind of a prudent insurer both in fixing the premium and in determining whether he would take the risk. I am not sure that I should have come to the same conclusion, in view of the fact that this small wooden cargo vessel possessed auxiliary internal combustion engines and therefore had to carry in the engine-room a store both of crude oil and of petrol, facts which were known to the insurers and would seem to indicate more peril than the cargo in question. But there certainly was evidence upon which the judge could so find, and I am not at all prepared to say that I am satisfied that the finding was wrong.

The question remains whether the assured was excused from disclosure by the provisions of sub-sect. 3. I have come to the conclusion that this was a circumstance as to which information was waived by the insurer, and, therefore, under sub-sect. 3 (c) it did not need to be disclosed. It is a remarkable fact that in the long history of the English law of marine insurance in which the doctrine of concealment has played a prominent part, there is no record of any decided case in which an underwriter on hull has ever successfully relied on a concealment with reference to the kind of cargo contracted to be carried. In spite of some suggestion to the contrary, the evidence in this case, especially that of Mr. Ashley, the only independent underwriter called for the defendants, satisfies me that in ordinary practice the assured does not give, nor does the insurer demand, information on this topic. This would correspond, I am convinced, with the general experience of those engaged in marine insurance work. One of the reasons no doubt is that insurance on hull is frequently, perhaps usually, effected before particular freight engagements are made, or, at any rate, are completed; and in insurances for time, often before any forecast could be made of the nature of such engagements. The insurer knows that cargo will be carried and he is prepared to take the chance of what the cargo will be. Another reason probably is that from the nature of the business any complete disclosure is from a business point of view impossible. Marine insurances are effected in ordinary course by agents, insurance brokers, whose knowledge and duty to disclose is in substance deemed to be co-extensive with that of their principals. Shipowners and others interested in hull would have to prepare and hand over to their brokers full particulars of freight engagements, including in the case of a general ship possibly hundreds of items lest one of them should in nature and extent be capable of being deemed a material circumstance; these particulars or the doubtful items would have to be shown by a prudent broker when offering the note to each underwriter. Whether the doctrine of waiver be based on a collateral contract expressed or implied, or upon a representation express or implied acted upon by the person to whom it is addressed, it appears to me that the nature of the business relations between the respective parties leads necessarily to the inference that the insurer waives disclosure of the nature of the cargo contracted to be carried. He is presumed to know matters of common knowledge and matters which an insurer in the ordinary course of his business as such ought to know. Amongst such matters would be, in the present case, that the vessel insured was a cargo vessel, that she would be carrying cargo from the United States of America to France, and that the cargo might consist of petrol in drums. If he objects to insuring such a cargo he can protect himself by making an inquiry, or by insisting on a warranty against such cargo. If he does not, it appears to me that the nature of the transaction demands the inference that he must be deemed to represent to the assured that the nature of the cargo need not be stated. Greer, J. says with force that while the insurer may be prepared to risk the chance of a hazardous cargo, he must not be taken to be prepared to incur the certainty of a hazardous cargo. I feel the weight of this, but I think the answer is that included in the risk he takes is the risk that there is an already concluded engagement for hazardous cargo, just as there is the countervailing possibility that he runs no risk of a hazardous cargo at all, by reason of an absolutely safe cargo having been agreed. In truth this view seems to be disposed of by authority. If an insurer insures a private warship from port to port he need not have disclosed to him the special adventure, "because he knows some expedition must be in view; and from the nature of the contract, without being told, he waives the information": per Lord Mansfield, in Carter v. Boehm (3 Burr. 1911). If he insures a ship "at and from" a foreign port he need not have disclosed to him the fact that the ship has needed in that port substantial repair, for he knows that such a circumstance is probable: Beckwith v. Sydebotham (1 Campb. 116). So on a similar insurance "lost or not lost" the assured need not disclose that the ship at the date of the insurance has left the port on the insured voyage for some considerable period: Fort v. Lee (3 Taunt. 381), a decision of the court of Common Pleas when Sir James Mansfield was Chief Justice and Sir Souldan Lawrence one of the judges. The period in that case was twenty-four days. In all the above cases disclosure was held unnecessary, though in all of them the circumstance appears to have been material, and to be a fact known to the assured at the time of making the contract. I do not think that the reasons I have given for this decision necessarily apply to the case of a cargo which is unusual and of exceptionally hazardous character, such as the case put in argument of a cargo of dynamite. I should like to consider the circumstances of such a case when it arises. In the present case, though I always hesitate before differing from the learned judge, I have formed the opinion that he should have given judgment for the plaintiffs, and I think that the appeal should be allowed.

YOUNGER, L.J.—We are here concerned with insurances upon the hull of an oil-driven auxiliary wooden schooner, the Elmir Roberts, on a round voyage from any port or ports in the United States to any port or ports in France, there, and back. At the date of insurance a freight engagement had been made, by virtue of which the vessel was to carry as part of her cargo on her outward voyage some 2500 drums of gasolene said by the defendant underwriters in these proceedings to be dangerous merchandise. No mention of this engagement was made to the underwriters by the plaintiffs, the brokers effecting the insurance; they were in truth themselves ignorant of the transaction at the time, although that fact is not in the circumstances relevant or material. The respondents seek by reason of the non-disclosure to escape liability from the claims made against them in these actions in respect of the subsequent loss of the schooner on her return voyage. Greer, J. has held that they are entitled to relief, and the plaintiffs appeal to this court.

The learned judge found that there was in the circumstances stated a concealment by the brokers of a fact that was material, and that the non-disclosure was not excused by any circumstance known or presumed to be known to the underwriters. His judgment goes no further. He did not in it consider or discuss the question fully canvassed before us—namely, whether the circumstance relied on was not one as to which information was waived by the defendants. That topic was not, I gather, definitely raised before him in argument.

With reference to the matters with which the learned judge did deal in his judgment, while I express the opinion with much diffidence, I do gravely doubt whether the reasoning by which he reached his conclusion that the non-disclosure of this freight engagement was so material as he held it to be really had regard to the true criterion by reference to which in relation to this marine risk the issue of materiality falls, as I think, to be determined. The learned judge, as I read his judgment on this issue, is not influenced directly or otherwise by the character and construction of the vessel on which the drums of gasolene were to be carried, and on whose hull the insurances were effected, the most material circumstance, as it seems to me, in the case. He has, so to speak, labelled this gasolene as dangerous cargo in the abstract, as merchandise which when included in a general cargo from America by any vessel open to carry such cargo, substantially increases the risk of an insurance upon her hull, as goods so attended with hazard beyond the common that their certain inclusion as part of cargo to be carried deprives the insurer of this useful chance that nothing so dangerous to the safety of the ship will be on board during the voyage insured. Not that the learned judge was not well entitled to deal with this question as he did; much of the evidence given before him seemed plainly to convey that everything that could be said against these gasolene drums on a steel or iron ship would a fortiori apply to them when on a wooden ship, and perhaps most of all on an auxiliary wooden vessel like the Elmir Roberts. But a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case, the testimony from all sides, impresses me with the conviction that the only aspect of the matter with reference to which the statements just referred to are well-founded has little, if any, relevance to the question of materiality in relation to this particular risk when looked at from what I conceive, upon the whole evidence, to be the only proper standpoint. For while it is undoubtedly true that the presence of such a cargo, whether on a well-found iron or steel ship or on a wooden sailing, steam, or auxiliary oil vessel, may seal the fate of the vessel should the gasolene caught by the fire explode, and doubtless will with greater certainty in the case of a wooden vessel than in the case of one otherwise constructed, the relevant distinction for present purposes between the well-found iron or steel ship, and such a vessel as the Elmir Roberts is that the first class of ship need not, in the event of fire, be at risk of destruction at all, apart from the presence of the gasolene amongst her general cargo, while in the case of a vessel like the Elmir Roberts it approaches certainty that in the event of a fire breaking out sufficiently serious to reach, if unimpeded, the drums in the hold, her fate would be irrevocably sealed, long before the flames got so far, by the intermediate burning of her own stores of oil fuel and of any other general cargo—in the present case, for instance, the 600 tons of claret staves stowed in the near hold and on deck—more immediately inflammable than gasolene itself and equally effective to bring about the total destruction of this vessel. In other words, the evidence I think clearly shows that if the vessel was to be lost at all by fire it would be only in the remotest contingency that these gasolene drums, stowed away in her hold as they were, would play any effective or other part in bringing about her destruction. That this is so appears, as it seems to me, from a consideration of the evidence both with reference to this type of vessel and with regard to the nature of these gasolene drums.

Bankes, L.J. has just described the Elmir Roberts type of vessel, an American product of the war. I will not repeat his description. The evidence with reference to these vessels demonstrates, as I think, their faulty construction, their grave liability to destruction from fire breaking out in the engine-room, the danger spot, saturated in its woodwork with oil, and the extreme difficulty of preventing the spread of such a fire if it once established itself. The story of the Elmir Roberts's final destruction recorded in the correspondence supplies a striking corroboration of these conclusions, which were so strongly held by many underwriters that they would take no line on such vessels at all, their record of loss, apart from all questions of cargo, being during the war abnormally high; and the great bulk of the evidence went also to show that it was the oil carried by these vessels for their own purposes that constituted their principal danger. The Elmir Roberts herself on her outward voyage carried 540 gallons of gasolene, 450 gallons of oil in barrels, 330 gallons of crude oil in tanks, and 330 gallons of kerosene for use in her engines and pumps, seriously imperilling her safety by reason of regular recourse being had to it for use. Gasolene as cargo in iron drums, on the other hand, was, it appears from the evidence, carried across the Atlantic during the war in great quantities as ordinary merchandise in these as well as in other vessels. No disaster traceable to it is on record, very possibly due to the fact deposed to by Mr. Harry Gray that the drums containing the gasolene are substantial things, welded and not riveted, and strengthened against crushing by stiff rims, with the hole for filling fitted with a screw tap, and jointed and tightened up so that no gasolene can leak out. The drums, moreover, were, Mr. Gray says, usually tested and stamped. It further appears clearly from the evidence that gasolene is in the normal course of events quite innocuous while contained in the drums. Mr. Gray's opinion was that with these drums containing it stowed in the hold there was about them no particular danger, while Mr. Shore, a director of the plaintiff company, said, and so far as I can see, said with good reason justified by experience, that so enclosed the gasolene was a perfectly safe article for carriage

Now in all these circumstances it is important to note the exact findings of the learned judge. It seemed to him quite clear that the existence of the engagement to carry the 2500 drums of gasolene was a material fact, and that the insurers could not be presumed to know it. What he held they must be presumed to know was that the vessel would be open to carry that quantity if she had not been already fixed, but not that she was already fixed to carry it, and he proceeds as follows: "It seems to me that the fact that she was then definitely fixed to carry these dangerous goods makes all the difference, because any insurer who was told that would know at the time definitely that he was not going to get a cargo which may be partly composed of other goods, and that he was being asked to make an insurance on a cargo which had been definitely fixed to the extent of 2500 drums of this dangerous material." In this passage the learned judge adopts the suggestion made to us by Mr. Van den Berg in his very able argument. I think it fails on the facts. This cargo may in the abstract be properly described as dangerous. So far I am content to accept the learned judge's finding. In relation to this adventure, however, the result of the evidence is, I think, clearly to show that as a part of any normal average general cargo from America, it cannot be so described. In my view, in this connection, it was probably less and certainly not more dangerous than were the claret staves to which, it was admitted, no objection could have been taken if even they, like the gasolene, had been at the date of insurance the subject of an agreement for carriage on this outward voyage.

Speaking for myself, therefore, I should for these reasons be prepared to allow the appeal on the ground that, as the defendants must be presumed to know that the vessel would be open to carry the gasolene in question, the additional fact that a contract to carry these drums had been entered into made no material difference to the risk they are presumed to have undertaken. But if I be wrong so far, the considerations already stated add further force to the circumstances immediately relevant on the question of waiver, with which Atkin, L.J. has just dealt so fully. I have had the advantage of reading his judgment, and if I may say so, I concur entirely with it on this point, both in its reasoning and in its conclusions. I would only, for myself, venture to add one further word upon it. I do not conceive that the conclusions reached both by my Lord and Atkin, L.J. on this question of waiver have the effect of weakening the governing statutory principle that a contract of marine insurance is a contract based upon the utmost good faith. I do not doubt that the courts must be at all times instant to see that this essential principle is never impinged upon. The views now expressed are, however, called for not only by the practice but by the necessities of marine insurance business as now conducted; they do little more than extend to voyage policies principles which must ex necessitate rei obtain in connection with time policies, and they are so far justified not only by the absence from the books of any decision to the contrary of them, but by the existence in America, if we may judge from the passage from Duer cited by Mr. Mackinnon (Vol. II., sect. 13, s. 41, p. 446), of an absolute rule there to the same effect. Nor, as it seems to me, is the principle adopted in these judgments, while necessary for the due conduct of business, injurious to any interest that requires protection even under these contracts uberrimæ fidei. Every nervous or sceptical underwriter can always protect himself by a clause of warranty or by inquiry; and if there be on the part of the insuring broker, even in such a matter as we are here dealing with, any fraudulent concealment, the underwriter will, of course, be relieved unless the fraudulent broker discharges the very heavy burden of establishing affirmatively that the fraud which he perpetrated for the purpose of influencing the underwriter's judgment was in fact in no way effective to lead him to accept the risk on the terms agreed.

In my judgment these appeals should be allowed.

Owners of Steamship Magnhild v. McIntyre Brothers and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Cesser of hire—"Or other accident preventing the working of the steamer"—Ejusdem generis rule—"Shallow harbours, rivers, or ports, where there are bars"—Liability of charterers for hire.

A steamer was chartered to load at Sunderland and to discharge at a French port. The French Government ordered the steamer to discharge at Marans, which was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. She arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, and got aground on soft clay while going up the river. She remained aground till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. and was damaged in consequence of the grounding. Repairs began about the 8th Nov. and took a considerable time. There was no bar in the harbour, river or port. By clause 12 the charter-party provided: "That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." The umpire found that hire ceased (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16*th Oct.* 1916 till 1 p.m. on the 24*th Oct.;* (b) during the time occupied for repairing the damage done to the steamer. McCardie, J. affirmed the award.

Held, that the ejusdem generis rule was not applicable to the words "or other accident" in the first part of clause 12*, and that those words included any accident to the vessel preventing her from working for more than twenty-four consecutive hours. Judgment of McCardie, J. affirmed on this point. But held that the words "where there are bars" in the latter part of clause* 12 applied only to ports, and not to shallow harbours or rivers, and that as the grounding which caused the detention occurred when the vessel was trading to a river, the time lost was for charterers' account.

Judgment of McCardie, J. (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 107; 124 L. T. Rep. 160; (1920) 3 K. B. 321) reversed.

APPEAL by the owners from the judgment of McCardie, J., upon an award stated in the form of a special case.

The charter-party was dated the 7th Aug. 1916, and contained, inter alia, the following clauses:

Clause 1. The said owners agree to let, and the said charterers agree to hire the said steamer for the term of six calendar months fifteen days more or less from the time . . . the said steamer is delivered and placed at the disposal of the charterers ready to load . . . to be employed in lawful trades . . . between good and safe ports or places within the following limits—United Kingdom, Continent, Calais-Sicily limits—where she can always safely lie afloat or safe aground as charterers or their agents shall direct.

Clause 12. In the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account.

Clause 16. The steamer shall not be ordered to any port where fever or pestilence is prevalent or any ports blockaded or where hostilities are being carried on or any ice-bound port or any ports where lights or light-ships are or are about to be withdrawn by reason of ice or war, or where there is risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer will not be able on account of ice to enter the port or to get out after having completed loading or discharging, nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice. Should the steamer be detained by any of the above causes such detention shall be for charterers' account. Nevertheless, if on account of ice captain should consider it dangerous to remain at port of loading for fear of steamer being frozen in and/or damaged, he shall have liberty (but not be obliged) to sail to a convenient open place and await charterers' fresh instructions.

The facts as found by the umpire were shortly as follows: The steamer loaded at Sunderland and was fixed by the charterers to discharge at La Rochelle, La Pallice, Rochefort, or Tournay Charante in France. By the instructions of the French Government the steamer was ordered to proceed to the Ile d'Aix for orders. She was then ordered by the French Government to discharge at Marans, which was situated up a river. She arrived at Marans Roads at 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, and she got aground on soft clay whilst proceeding up the river at a little bend between two buoys. She remained so aground till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916. She then got off. She was damaged by the occurrence. Repairs commenced on or about the 8th Nov. and they occupied a substantial time. Marans was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. There was no bar in the harbour, river, or port which caused detention through grounding or otherwise. The arbitrator awarded that hire ceased, (a) as from 6 p.m. on the 16th Oct. 1916, till 1 p.m. on the 24th Oct. 1916, while the steamer was aground as aforesaid, and (b) during the time occupied while the damage to the steamer, consequent upon such grounding, was being repaired; and he awarded that the owners should pay to the charterers as return of hire a certain sum.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the umpire was right in his award. If the court should be of opinion that he was wrong, then he awarded that the charterers should pay to the owners a certain sum.

McCardie, J. held (affirming the award) that the ejusdem generis rule was not applicable to the words "or other accident" in the first part of clause 12; and that those words included any accident to the steamer which prevented her from working for more than twenty-four consecutive hours.

The owners appealed.

Leck, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt for the appellants.

Stuart Bevan, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the respondents, the charterers.

Cur. adv. vult.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of McCardie, J., who affirmed the view of the umpire in an arbitration as to the proper construction of a clause in a time charter. The charter was dated the 7th Aug. 1916, whereby the charterers hired the vessel for a period of six calendar months at the rate of 3400*l.* per month. [The Lord Justice stated the facts as found by the umpire.] The question in dispute between the parties is whether, during the time when the vessel was aground and in dock undergoing repairs occasioned by the grounding, hire ceased under the terms of the charter-party, or whether the charterers still remained liable to pay hire.

The question depends upon the proper construction of clause 12 of the charter-party, which is in the nature of an exception clause, and deals with cesser of hire. The first part deals with the circumstances under which, if there is loss of time, the hire shall cease; and the second part, which to some extent is an exception upon the exception, enumerates circumstances in which time lost shall be for charterers' account. The first part of the clause is in these terms: "In the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." Three matters are there specifically mentioned which may occasion loss of time: Deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, damage to hull; and then there is added "or other accident." The judgment of McCardie, J. is entirely devoted to a consideration of the question whether the ejusdem generis rule applies to that language, and whether the particular accident which befell this vessel, the grounding in the river, was an "other accident" within the meaning of the first part of this clause. He held that the ejusdem generis rule did not apply, and for that reason he considered that the loss of time fell upon the shipowners. He gave his reasons at length and referred to a number of cases, and at the end of his judgment he gives this as one of the reasons for so holding: "The latter part of clause 12, I also think, seems to assume a wide meaning of the first part." To my mind it is clear that the ejusdem generis rule cannot be applied, partly because of the language of the first part of the clause, and partly also for the above-mentioned reason given by McCardie, J.

The learned judge does not refer to what seems to me to be the material part of this clause, the proper construction of which has caused me personally great difficulty. It certainly is not very happily worded; and does not clearly express what was the intention of the parties. The second part of the clause is an enumeration of the circumstances under which a loss of time is to be for charterers' account. It runs: "But should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." It is plain from that language that it is to some extent, but only to some extent, an exception upon exception, because it includes some matters which do not come within the first part of the clause. It is therefore not only an exception upon an exception, but it is an express enumeration of events, as to which presumably it was thought that some question might rise unless it was made plain that they were all for charterers' account. The circumstances are very diverse in character. "Should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by" certain events, then "time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." Those events are stress of weather or any accident to the cargo. Then follow the words which cause so much difficulty. There are two possible constructions of those words. One is to read them as meaning that if the vessel trades to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports in any of which places there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, then time so lost and expenses incurred shall be for charterers' account. The other is to read them as providing that, in the event of the steamer trading to either of these three classes of places, (a) shallow harbours, (b) rivers, or (c) ports where there are bars, and the trading there causes detention through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred shall be for charterers' account. One must try to give a meaning to all the words used, so as to realise the intention of the parties in inserting the clause. Having regard to the language used, it seems to me that the meaning of the parties may properly be taken to be that, in the event of the detention of the steamer through grounding or other similar accident owing to the charterers ordering her to trade to a shallow harbour, or to a river, or to a port where there is a bar, time so lost and expenses incurred shall be for charterers' account. I think that is what the parties must have intended by using this language, and I think their intention is sufficiently indicated if one gives a meaning to all the parts of the clause. I infer from the form of the umpire's finding that he read the clause as though, in order to give the owners the benefit of this part of the clause, there must have been a grounding upon some bar; and I assume that McCardie, J. took that view also, although he does not mention it in his judgment. In my opinion, that view does not give any meaning to the expression "shallow harbours." There was no need to use the word "shallow" in reference to "harbours" if what was contemplated was merely a grounding upon a bar. I think the meaning of the clause is that which I have already stated.

It is unnecessary to decide what meaning ought to be attached to those very general words "or otherwise" which follow "grounding." It is sufficient to say that my present opinion is that the ejusdem generis rule should be strictly applied to those words. We have, however, only to deal with a grounding, and giving my best consideration to this clause it appears to me that this grounding in the river causing detention to the steamer and occurring when the steamer was trading to the river, comes within the second part of clause 12, and the time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) are to be for charterers' account.

For these reasons the appeal must be allowed, and the answer to the question in the special case must be in accordance with my judgment.

Warrington, L.J.—I agree. The question turns on the construction of one clause in a time charter—namely, "In the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores," which is one thing, "breakdown of machinery," which is a second, "or damage to hull," which is a third, "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." I think the construction of that clause so far is fairly plain, and I agree with the extremely elaborate judgment of McCardie, J. on that point, though I think the result might have been obtained in a shorter and more direct way. The words on which so much discussion turned are "or other accident preventing the working of the steamer."

I think that there is no difficulty in construing those words, and that they cover any accident which prevents the working of the steamer. So far I agree with the judgment of the learned judge, and had there been nothing more in the clause the grounding of the vessel in the river to which she was directed to go would have been, within the meaning of that part of it, an "accident preventing the working of the steamer." But that exception from the time which is to be paid for by the charterers is qualified by the words which follow, which begin in this way, "but should the steamer." It seems to me that the mode in which that clause commences clearly shows that it is intended as a qualification of the wide provision contained in the previous words. The clause reads, "but should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." The events there referred to as causing detention are, first, the steamer being driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or from any accident to the cargo. With those we are not concerned. We are only concerned with the second class of events referred to—namely, "or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars" causing detention through grounding. We are not concerned with anything but the detention caused by grounding.

The first thing to be determined is, what is the meaning of the words "trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars." The umpire has clearly taken the view that the words "where there are bars" qualify "shallow harbours, rivers, or ports"—that is, all three of the places mentioned; and it was so contended before us on the part of the charterers. In my opinion, that is not the grammatical construction of this part of the clause. I think the place of the word "or" indicates that there are three categories of places all put under the same conditions, and those are "shallow harbours," "rivers," and "ports where there are bars." All those places are treated by the parties as places where detention may be caused to a ship trading thereto. In shallow harbours the detention may be caused by the ship getting aground in the harbour; in rivers by the ship having to go in a shallow channel, or in a narrow channel round what the umpire has described as "a little bend" in the river; in ports where there are bars the detention may be caused by the ship going aground on the bar, or, possibly having to wait until there is sufficient water for her to cross the bar. I think, therefore, that the word "rivers" is not qualified by the subsequent expression "where there are bars." That being so, we have still to consider what it is that is described as "causing detention," and I agree with Bankes, L.J. that what is there referred to as "causing detention to the steamer through grounding" is the fact of her trading to one or other of the three categories of places described. If she is ordered to trade to a river, and the result of her being so ordered is that detention is caused through grounding, then the charterers are to be the parties who are to suffer by the detention so caused.

For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree, though I have had great difficulty in putting a reasonable construction upon this clause, which seems to me so framed as to give rise to very serious difficulty in the way of construction. As to the first part, on which McCardie, J. concentrated his judgment, I do not find it necessary to say anything. I think it is sufficient to assume that the words "other accidents" there are words of large import and need not necessarily be construed with reference to the preceding words upon the ejusdem generis doctrine, as to which I find it quite unnecessary to speak with any kind of disrespect.

To my mind the real difficulty arises out of the second part of the clause, and it is unfortunate that we have not been assisted in that difficulty by the opinion of the learned judge. The words of the second part are intended to be an exception to the first part of the clause, but only in part, because it is plain to my mind that they go beyond the scope of a mere exception, and, for extra caution no doubt, provide that in certain events detention shall be for charterers' account, even though there is no previous provision excepting such accidents from being for charterers' account. The second part of the clause begins as follows: "Should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo"—then the form of language changes—"or in the event of the steamer trading," &c., to the antecedent, "Should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo," the consequence is "time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account." So far that clause, it seems to me, has no reference to grounding. "Or in the event of the steamer," &c. How is the event defined in that part of the clause? It has been read by the umpire and McCardie, J. presumably as being this, that if a steamer trades to shallow harbours where there are bars causing detention to the steamer, or to rivers where there are bars causing detention to the steamer, or to ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer, then time so lost shall be for charterers' account. Now that does not seem to me to be a reasonable construction, because a reference to a shallow harbour having a bar is something which would never have occurred to anyone to provide against specially, and I find it very difficult to picture what could be meant by such a combination as that even by persons who are well versed in nautical matters. There certainly is nothing before us to show that there was some special class of shallow harbour with a bar which the parties would have been likely to guard against. On the contrary, I think that what the parties are guarding against is not the bar of a shallow harbour, but the shallowness of the harbour; and if that is so, then the qualifying words, "where there are bars," must be read, not as applying to shallow harbours or to rivers—though in many cases a river has a bar—but as applying only to ports. Therefore the clause would read grammatically in this way: "In the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, or in the event of the steamer trading to rivers causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, or in the event of the steamer trading to ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise." In all those cases there is a common differentia in respect of each of the subjects enumerated, namely, an increased peril of grounding either by reason of the shallowness of the harbour, or by reason of the well-known attribute of tidal rivers where there is at any rate a narrow channel, or by reason of the fact that there is a bar; and it appears to me that the object of the clause must have been to protect the owners from the extra risk involved by the ship being ordered to such places as are mentioned. Where there is that extra risk I think it is meant that the charterers should take it.

I am confirmed in this view by reference to clause 16, which again is not a well-constructed clause, because it begins by excluding certain ports: "The steamer shall not be ordered to any port where fever or pestilence is prevalent or any ports blockaded or where hostilities are being carried on or any icebound port or any ports where lights or lightships are or are about to be withdrawn by reason of ice or war, or where there is risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer will not be able on account of ice to enter the port or to get out after having completed loading or discharging, nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice." Then the clause continues: "Should the steamer be detained by any of the above causes such detention shall be for charterers' account." That is a provision that might very well have been brought into the clause which is an exception to the cesser of hire clause, but it is put into clause 16 and it makes it plain that, in the case of those ports where there is an extra risk to the ship, in the first place the ship is not to go there at all, but if the ship does go there the detention is to be for charterers' account.

In my view, therefore, the latter part of clause 12 means that in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours time lost and expenses incurred by reason of such trading to a shallow harbour causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise shall be for charterers' account, and so as to rivers, and so as to ports where there are bars. That construction gives full effect to the clause and to every word in it; it does not strain the grammatical meaning; and it avoids a meaning which it appears to me the words are incapable of bearing, namely, making "where there are bars" apply to shallow harbours. On these grounds it seems to me that in this case the award was wrong. The question for the opinion of the court put by the umpire is "whether I am right in my award." The answer, I think, should be that the court is of opinion that the umpire is wrong, and upon that answer the umpire has proceeded to make this alternative award, and that award will take effect.

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Limitation of liability—Dock owners—Dock owners also ship repairers—Damage to ship under repair in dock—Dock not owned by ship repairers—Limitation claimed on repairers' dock—Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32), s. 2.

The plaintiffs were ship repairers and also owned a dock at Garston. The defendants were the owners of the steamship C. and of her cargo, and all other persons claiming to have sustained damage by reason of a fire which occurred on the C. on the 27*th June* 1918, owing to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants. The fire occurred while the C. was lying in a Liverpool dock not belonging to the plaintiffs, and was being fitted by the plaintiffs with mine-defence apparatus. The plaintiffs brought this limitation of liability action under sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, which provides that: "The owners of any dock or canal or a harbour authority or a conservancy authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any vessel or vessels, be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which such dock or canal owner . . . performs any duty or exercises any power." The plaintiffs sought to limit their liability to 30,281*l.*, which was the aggregate amount at 8*l. a ton on the tonnage of the* B., which was the largest registered British ship which within the period mentioned in the section had been within the area over which they performed any duty or exercised any power. Hill, J. held that the plaintiffs had incurred liability as ship repairers and not as dock owners, and not within any dock over which they exercised any power, and that they were not protected by the section merely because they owned a dock elsewhere. The plaintiffs appealed.

Held, that, as the plaintiffs' liability was not connected with the fact that they were dock owners, they were not entitled to a decree of limitation of liability.

Judgment of Hill, J. (infrà; (1921) P. 70) affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Hill, J. in an action brought by shipowners to limit their liability under sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900.

The plaintiffs were H. and C. Grayson Limited. The defendants were the Ellerman Lines Limited, the owners of the steamship City of Edinburgh, and others.

In June 1918 the City of Edinburgh was lying in the Hornby Dock, owned by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, where the plaintiffs, a firm of ship repairers, were engaged in work upon her. While so lying in dock, the vessel and her cargo sustained damage by fire, owing to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants. In an action instituted by the Ellerman Lines Limited the plaintiffs were held liable for the damage. The plaintiffs, who are the owners of a dry dock at Garston, brought the present action under sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act of 1900, claiming to limit their liability to 30,281*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.*, being the aggregate amount of 8*l.* per ton of each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which at the time of the damage in question was, or within the period of five years previous thereto had been, within the area over which they performed any duty or exercised any power, that is to say, in their dock at Garston.

The defence was that sect. 2 only applied where the damage was caused within a dock or area over which the plaintiffs claiming relief performed any duty or exercised any power; and that the plaintiffs had incurred liability as ship repairers and not as dock owners.

Hill, J.—This is a novel application for limitation of liability. I do not mean novel merely because it is brought by somebody not a shipowner, and under sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900; but novel because of the extraordinary results which would follow if I accepted the plaintiffs' contentions.

The steamship City of Edinburgh was lying in the Hornby Dock, Liverpool, which belongs to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and is several miles from Garston. The plaintiffs were engaged in work upon the City of Edinburgh as she lay in the Hornby Dock. By the negligence of their servants the City of Edinburgh was set on fire, and it has been finally determined by the House of Lords (Grayson (H. and C.) Limited v. Ellerman Lines Limited, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 605; 123 L. T. Rep. 65; (1920) A. C. 466) that the plaintiffs are liable for the damage so caused. The plaintiffs are Messrs. H. and C. Grayson Limited, the very well-known firm of ship repairers, who had received their instructions to do the work upon the City of Edinburgh—instructions addressed to their North End Works. They also have works at Birkenhead, and at Garston, and at Garston they have a dry dock.

By this action they seek to limit their liability for damages caused by negligence for which they are responsible—negligence happening in the Hornby Dock. They seek to limit that liability by saying that they are entitled to the benefit of sect. 2 of the Act of 1900, which limits the liability of, among other people, dock owners, to damages ascertained on the basis of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which the dock owner "performs any duty or exercises any power." The contention for the plaintiffs is that the words of the section are plain; that, however absurd the results of the construction they contend for, it is not for the court to disregard the plain meaning of the words; it is for Parliament to set them right.

Sub-sect. 1 of the section is as follows: "The owners of any dock or canal, or a harbour authority or a conservancy authority, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any vessel or vessels, be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which, at the time of such loss or damage occurring, is, or within the period of five years previous thereto has been, within the area over which such dock or canal owner, harbour authority, or conservancy authority, performs any duty or exercises any power." Then there are some words which apply only to harbour authorities and conservancy authorities. By sub-sect. 4, the term "dock" is to include "wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks, gridirons, slips, quays, wharves, piers, stages, landing-places, and jetties." And by sub-sect. 5, the term "owners of a dock or canal" shall include "any person or authority having the control and management of any dock or canal, as the case may be."

There is no doubt that Messrs. Grayson Limited own a dock within the meaning of sub-sect. 1, because they own and have the management of a graving dock. But are they, under this sub-section, entitled to the limitation of liability prescribed by the sub-section in respect of liability which they have incurred, not at or near or in any way connected with their graving dock, but while they were performing work as ship repairers upon a ship several miles away from their graving dock? If the plaintiffs' contention is right, if Messrs. Grayson were doing ship repairs to a ship at Pernambuco or at Singapore, they would be equally entitled to the limitation of liability which they claim. And, indeed, if instead of owning a graving dock at Garston they owned a slip, or even a jetty, they would be entitled to a limitation based upon the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which had ever been on that slip or at that jetty. It would be a very economic form of insurance against liability for anybody who was connected with ships and likely by himself or his servants ever to do any damage to those ships to maintain a jetty or a slip at which "the largest registered British ship" should be of the least possible tonnage; he would reduce his liability under this sub-section to a minimum. The result of the contention for the plaintiffs is so absurd that, unless I am absolutely forced by words that I cannot evade, I refuse to suppose or to hold that Parliament ever intended anything of the kind.

I start with this: that this sub-section, like all other statutes of limitation, limits a common law right of an injured person, and therefore the statute is to be construed strictly against the person who sets it up, in this sense, that it is to be carried no further than the plain words of the sub-section necessarily require. For that I refer to Gale v. Laurie (5 B. & C. 156), which was a case under another Merchant Shipping Act. Do the words of the sub-section necessarily import that which the plaintiffs contend? The sub-section deals with liability and limits it, liability of dock owners, canal owners, and so on. In fixing that liability, it has regard to an area, namely, the area over which the dock owner "performs any duty or exercises any power." I see nothing in the sub-section to compel me to say that a man who becomes liable, not because he is a dock owner, or because the ship is at the time in the area of his dock or at or near the dock—the place in which he "performs any duty or exercises any power"—is entitled to limit his liability on the mere ground that he happens to own also a dock or quay or a pier or a jetty. It would seem to me to be reducing the Act to an absurdity if I were so to hold. The liability is one which Messrs. Grayson incurred as ship repairers, not as dock owners, nor at or near or anywhere about their dock. It is a mere accident quâ that liability that they happen to own a dock. I am satisfied that no interpretation of the sub-section forces me to the conclusion that, because they happened to own a dock at the same time as that at which they incurred a liability neither as dock owners nor at the dock, they are entitled to limit their liability.

I therefore dismiss the action with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

A. T. Miller, K.C. and James Dickinson, for the respondents, the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—I think this appeal should be dismissed.

It is an appeal from Hill, J. in an action brought by the plaintiffs to limit their liability in respect of injury done to the steamship City of Edinburgh, upon which they were doing repairs. The ship was being repaired in the Hornby Dock, Liverpool. The plaintiffs, a well-known firm of ship repairers in Liverpool, had a dry dock at Garston, not under the control of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, but situated a long way up the river, about ten miles from the place where the repairs were being done. According to the plaintiffs' contention, it does not matter, however, if it is ten miles or 10,000 miles distant; the work may be in the course of being done anywhere, and the plaintiffs would still be entitled to the protection of the statute.

What happened was this: a boy in the employ of the plaintiffs stumbled and accidentally dropped a red-hot rivet into one of the holds of the City of Edinburgh, causing a very disastrous fire. Litigation ensued, which went to the House of Lords (Grayson (H. and C.) Limited v. Ellerman Lines Limited (sup.), and the present plaintiffs were held responsible for the damage. They now come to this court and ask for a limitation of their liability under sect. 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, which provides that: [The Master of the Rolls read sub-sect. 1 of sect. 2, and continued:] Sub-sect. 4 of the same section defines the term "dock." It is to "include wet docks and basins, tidal docks and basins, locks, cuts, entrances, dry docks, graving docks, gridirons, slips, quays, wharves, piers, stages, landing-stages, and jetties."

The contention of the plaintiffs is that sect. 2 enables the dock owner to limit his liability for any damage done to a vessel, however caused and wherever caused, because he happens to be the owner of a dock, and, as Hill, J. points out, inasmuch as a dock is defined as including a slip or jetty, it would be a very easy method of insurance to become possessed of a very small slip or jetty to which only a very small vessel could come. No liability could then accrue for any injury done by the owners of the slip or jetty to a vessel or goods on board a vessel beyond 8*l.* on a tonnage of perhaps five or ten tons, according to the size of the small vessel which could get or had got to their jetty. I am prepared to say that such a result would be absurd. I agree that if Parliament has chosen directly in so many words to produce an absurd result, then that absurd result must be produced, but the court is entitled and indeed bound to look at a statute from this point of view, that if there is a reasonable and sensible construction of it and also an absurd one, the court should lean to the sensible construction.

Under these circumstances I should have said, without the assistance I am going to refer to in a moment, that the section must refer to a limitation of liability, as one of my learned brothers has suggested, of the dock owner as such—i.e., in respect of something in some way connected with his dock. I do not attempt to define everything to which it does apply; I have only to decide for the moment to what it does not apply. I should have said that it must be limited in the way suggested, and Mr. Aspinall has helped me to that conclusion by referring to the previous legislation, and by suggesting that the intention was to put the dock owner in the same position, or, at any rate, in as responsible a position, as the shipowner who limits his liability under the Merchant Shipping Act. Now the shipowner only gets a decree of limitation of liability in respect of some injury or damage caused by other persons in some way relating to his ship; the damage must be to somebody or something in the ship or damage caused by the ship. I do not know that it is necessary to put it as narrowly as that with regard to the dock owner, but when a shipowner gets a decree of limitation it is in respect of something connected with his ship, and I think a dock owner should only get a decree in respect of damage in some way connected with his dock. The losses in this case were in no way connected with the plaintiffs' dock. The decision of Hill, J. that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the decree of limitation claimed in this action was quite right, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Scrutton, L.J.—But for hearing the argument addressed to us I should have thought that this case was unarguable; having heard it I remain of the opinion that it was unarguable. It is one of those cases where Parliament has used very wide words which interpreted in their widest sense lead to absurdity, and interpreted in their limited sense are reasonable. It appears to me that to read these words as limiting the liability of a man who owns a dock for anything which he chooses to do in any other capacity is to lead to an absurdity. The repairs in the Hornby Dock had nothing to do with the ownership of a dock at Garston, and for that reason the Garston dock owners cannot limit their liability for what their boy did in the Hornby Dock ten miles off.

Younger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

The Ibis VI. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Costs—Party and party costs—Witnesses—Seafaring witness detained on shore pending trial—Order LXV., r. 27.

Where a seafaring witness has been detained on shore pending trial, the amount which he would otherwise probably have earned on a voyage is a guide to, but is not the sole basis of, determining what allowance for his attendance should be made on a party and party taxation, especially in the case where the voyage contemplated was risky or speculative in its nature. Reasonable compensation should be allowed, regard being had (inter alia) to the wages which a person of his class was earning at the time, to the value of his evidence, and to the question whether it could properly have been taken on commission. The fact that the witness could have been called to attend on subpœna and paid only a nominal sum should not be wholly ignored.

Appeal from a decision of Duke, P. affirming an order of the assistant registrar.

On the 5th Jan. 1916 a steam trawler of the plaintiffs' came into collision with the defendants' trawler, the Ibis VI. The plaintiffs sued the defendants to judgment, damages being agreed at 300*l.* Arthur Burton, who was mate of the plaintiffs' trawler at the date of the collision, had afterwards become mate of a Belgian trawler, whose owners consented that he should give evidence at the trial of the collision action, which was fixed for the 27th Nov. 1918. The Belgian trawler went on a trawling trip from the 9th Nov. until the 3rd Dec. 1918; and Burton's substitute's share of the earnings was 280*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* The plaintiffs paid that amount to Burton as being the amount he would have earned if he had gone on the trip. On two previous trips Burton's earnings had been nearly 100*l.* a week. The assistant registrar on the party and party taxation allowed 280*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* against the defendants in respect of compensation to Burton.

Duke, P. dismissed an appeal, but gave leave to appeal.

The defendants appealed.

Stranger for the appellants.—The amount allowed in respect of Burton was so large as to be unreasonable. It is not a question of quantum, but of principle. The normal earnings of a mate should be considered, and not exceptional earnings. If the earnings of witnesses in exceptional circumstances were allowed, the costs might enormously exceed the sum at issue in an action. A mate's large earnings at that period was in proportion to the risk, and due to the high price of fish. By staying on shore Burton escaped war risks. Roscoe's Admiralty Practice (4th edit., p. 424) says: "If a witness is necessarily taken out of a ship he is entitled to a reasonable sum during the time that he is detained from his regular employment." Burton could have been subpœnaed, and paid a mere nominal sum. The taxing master applied a wrong principle.

Dumas for the respondents.—Under Order LXV., r. 27, the plaintiffs were entitled in respect of Burton to just and reasonable charges and expenses. It was a matter for the registrar's discretion. A witness should be paid what he could reasonably have been expected to earn:

Turnbull v. Janson, 26 W. Rep. 815; 3 C. P. Div. 264.

What Burton would have earned is not a matter of guesswork, but of practical certainty. The plaintiffs were justified in paying Burton the earnings which he lost by giving evidence, and can recover them from the defendants.

Stranger in reply.

Order LXV., r. 27, provides:

The following special allowances and general regulations shall apply to all proceedings and all taxations in the Supreme Court of Judicature: . . . (9) As to evidence, such just and reasonable charges and expenses as appear to have been properly incurred in procuring evidence, and the attendance of witnesses, are to be allowed.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—The following judgments were read:—

Lord Sterndale, M.R. stated the facts, and continued:—The allowances to other witnesses were as follows: The steward was allowed 13*l.* 9*s.* for eleven days' detention; the master was allowed 21*l.* for three days; the chief engineer was allowed 23*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* for twenty-seven days; and the deck hand was allowed 3*l.* for three days. These amounts work out approximately at the following daily rates: the steward, 25*s.*; the mate, 11*l.* 4*s.*; the master, 7*l.*; the chief engineer, 17*s.* 6*d.*; the deck hand, 1*l.* It will be noticed that the mate is enormously higher than anybody else. The amount paid to this witness, as compared with the amount of the damages, is no doubt startling, but to a certain extent it is due to the startling gains which were made by some persons during the progress and by reason of the war. The witness had taken an engagement as mate of a Belgian trawler, and was to be paid, as masters and mates of trawlers often are, by a share of the catch. One consequence of the war was that the value of the catch had appreciated enormously, and it was proved, by evidence which satisfied the assistant registrar and the President, that persons paid by shares of the catch were at the material time earning remuneration far out of proportion to anything they had earned before the war. It was also proved to the satisfaction of the assistant registrar and the President that the witness, if not detained for the purposes of the trial, would have sailed on the 9th Nov. 1918 as mate of the trawler J. Baels Maurieux; that in consequence of his being detained and unable to sail, another mate was engaged in his place on the same terms, and that the share received by that mate was the sum of 280*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* The witness therefore, in fact, lost that sum, and other questions which arise are: (1) Were the plaintiffs bound to pay him that sum? (2) If so, can they charge it against the defendants as part of the costs of the action? I think we must accept the facts as proved before the assistant registrar and the President, and indeed they were not challenged before us.

The question of the detention of witnesses for the purpose of giving evidence is of greater importance in the Admiralty Division than in any other division of the High Court, although the rule upon the matter, Order LXV., r. 27, applies to all divisions, and expert nautical witnesses have always been treated rather differently from others. In the other divisions the witnesses are generally in this country, and can return to or remain in their ordinary avocations until a short time before the trial, when they can be summoned by notice or subpœna, and are readily available. There is also a scale of allowances to witnesses which, modified by the discretion allowed to the taxing master, works on the whole quite well, although not always to the satisfaction of the witnesses. In the Admiralty Division the position is different. If nautical witnesses are allowed to join their ships and resume their ordinary avocations, the chances of their being able to be present at a trial on a date to be fixed in the future are small, and it has, therefore, always been held permissible to detain them on shore, and to pay them proper compensation for such detention; and the amount of the compensation has been considered as an expense in the costs of the action. This was laid down as long ago as 1857 in the case of The Olive (1857, Swabey, 292), where Dr. Lushington pointed out that the rules of other courts as to witnesses did not apply to such a detention. It has always been considered that the rate of wages which the witness was earning at the time is an important factor in ascertaining the proper amount of compensation, and generally the course is taken of paying him for the period of detention at the rate of his wages: (see Roscoe's Admiralty Practice, 4th edit., p. 424). The rate of wages, however, is not an absolute measure, but a valuable guide. The actual amount of compensation is fixed by the registrar, and I think this long continued practice raises an implied contract on the part of the litigant who detains a witness without further bargain to pay the compensation fixed by the registrar. It was argued in this case that the plaintiffs ought to have made a special bargain with the witness, but I am not at all satisfied that they could have made such a bargain, at any rate to pay a less sum than the registrar might fix. The plaintiffs cannot charge against the defendants more than they themselves were bound to pay to the witness. I think the circumstances of the payment in this case might throw some doubt on the payment being made in consequence of such a liability, but I take that as decided in the plaintiffs' favour by the assistant registrar, a decision which we must accept.

Whether the litigant paying that sum can recover it as costs from his defeated opponent depends on one or two considerations. The witness must be one, I think, whom it was necessary to produce in person at the trial, and whom it was not reasonable to expect the litigant to examine on commission. It was decided as long ago as the case of The Karla (1865, 13 W. Rep. 295; Br. & Lush. 367), before Dr. Lushington, that a litigant cannot in all circumstances, and could not in those of that case, be obliged to examine a witness beforehand, and is in those circumstances entitled to call him personally at the trial. But when he seeks to charge his opponent with the expense of doing so, I do not think that authority precludes the question whether he acted reasonably in incurring the expense. The answer to that question must depend upon the importance of enabling the court to hear the witness give evidence in person, the nature and importance of his evidence, and the expense incurred as compared with the importance of the case, which is not necessarily measured solely by the amount of money involved. In this case no such question was raised before the assistant registrar or the President, or indeed by the appellants before us, although I think I suggested the possibility of it during the argument; and I think we must take it, for the purposes of this appeal, that it was reasonable for the plaintiffs to detain this witness for the trial. In that case, for the reasons I have given, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to charge the proper expense of such detention against the defendants, and the only question remaining is whether the assistant registrar has allowed an unreasonable amount to the witness.

Speaking generally, this is a matter for the discretion of the registrar, and the court will not interfere, unless he has proceeded on a wrong principle. The assistant registrar's answer in this case to the objections was as follows: "In my opinion the basis upon which a witness necessarily detained for a trial should be remunerated is the amount he would have earned during the period of detention, if he had not been detained. There is nothing in the quotation from Mr. Roscoe's book to which reference is made in the objections to controvert this proposition. The evidence was perfectly clear in this case (1) that the witness was necessarily prevented from taking part in the voyage in question (this is not now questioned), and (2) that in consequence of his detention the witness lost the amount which I have allowed. In my opinion the contention put forward in the objections that in cases of detention a witness is not to be remunerated on the basis of what he has lost, but upon some other fictitious basis, is unsound. Of course it may be necessary in some cases where the precise amount of the loss cannot be ascertained to make an allowance based upon average earnings, but where, as here, the actual loss can be accurately determined it should be allowed." I cannot assent to this as accurate. I do not think the compensation can depend upon the actual result of an adventure undertaken during the time of the detention. To adopt such a rule would be to involve the litigants and the witness in the results of an adventure possibly speculative. In this particular case the trawler might have been lost on the voyage, and no catch secured, and in that case the witness—apart from the question of insurance—could have earned nothing; and, if the assistant registrar's principle be logically applied, would be entitled to no compensation, because he had suffered no loss. I do not think the actual loss in a particular period can be said to be necessarily the measure of compensation, and I think the only direction that can be given is that the assistant registrar must award the reasonable compensation to a person of the class of the witness, taking into account all the circumstances, and considering the wages which the witness was earning about the time of detention, not as an absolute measure, but as an important indication and guide to what is fair. The fact that all persons are under an obligation to give evidence when called upon should also not be ignored. As I cannot consider the principle appled by the assistant registrar to be correct, I think the case must go back to him to award compensation to the witness and costs to the plaintiffs on the principles I have stated above.

The appellants argued that the witness should only be paid conduct money with a subpœna, or, at the outside, only such charges as are contained in the scales of charges as witnesses' allowances. This, I think, ignores the special conditions I have mentioned as to nautical witnesses, such as give evidence in the Admiralty Division, and is incorrect. They also argued that, at the outside, he should only be allowed the wages paid to men of his class, and that the engineer of the trawler was the man nearest to his class, and probably superior to him in education and skill. Therefore they contended the witness should not be paid more than the wages paid to the engineer according to the articles. I think there is no foundation for this argument. I do not feel myself capable of comparing the education, skill, and attainments of the engineer of a trawler with those of a mate, and I am not satisfied that it is conclusively established that anywhere the amount of payment is always in strict proportion to the merits of the payee. But I think the short answer is that a mate is not an engineer, and an engineer is not a mate, nor are a mate and an engineer in the same class of employees. Without considering which is superior, it is enough to say that they are different. Their duties are different; they are paid not only different amounts, but by a different method; and, in inquiring into compensation to a mate, it is a mate's wages, and not an engineer's, which are a guide. The authorities on the subject are discussed in the judgment to be delivered by Younger, L.J., and I do not propose to repeat the discussion.

The appellants must have the costs of the appeal, and of the hearing before the President. The costs of the past and future hearings before the assistant registrar should be dealt with by him.

Warrington, L.J. requests me to say that he agrees with this judgment.

Younger, L.J.—I entirely concur in the order just intimated by my Lord, and I would for myself add nothing to the judgment he has delivered were it not that I find, in the grounds given by the learned assistant registrar for allowing this large sum of 280*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, as the expenses of a single seafaring witness in this comparatively trifling case, grave reason for the apprehension that allowances of an amount equal to, and in many cases indefinitely exceeding, that impugned on this appeal may, in the Admiralty Division, come to be made on a party and party taxation, almost as a matter of course, unless some attempt be made here and now to recapture and restate from the authorities upon the subject some of the principles with reference to which the wide discretion of the registrars in these matters ought to be exercised. It would, in my judgment, be a grave misfortune if an excessive liberality in the matter of such allowances were to become normal in any division of the High Court. The true attitude with regard to them is, I think, that described by Bovill, C.J. in Potter v. Rankin (1870, 22 L. T. Rep. 347; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 521) with reference to just such an allowance as that now in question. It may be salutary to recall it: "It is the duty," the Chief Justice says, "of the master to watch most jealously and exercise the most scrupulous care in dealing with such a claim." In the same connection I would recall the observations taken from the judgment in Smith v. Buller (1875, 31 L. T. Rep. 873; L. Rep. 19 Eq. 475), as enunciating a sound principle, especially valuable in these times of pervading financial stress: "It is of great importance to litigants who are unsuccessful that they should not be oppressed by having to pay an excessive amount of costs. . . . I adhere to the rule which has already been laid down, that the costs chargeable under a taxation as between party and party are all that are necessary to enable the adverse party to conduct the litigation, and no more. Any charges merely for conducting litigation more coveniently may be called luxuries, and must be paid by the party incurring them." These warnings are as applicable to proceedings in the Admiralty Division as in any other division of the High Court. True it is that special considerations are, and, so far as I can find, always have been, applicable to the remuneration of seafaring witnesses detained to give evidence in courts of justice; and it is of course a trite observation that the testimony of such witnesses constitutes the bulk of that adduced in Admiralty, so that the question of the proper allowances to be chargeable on taxation in respect of their attendance arises far more frequently than that in any other division.

But what is a proper allowance for such a witness must depend upon similar considerations, whatever be the court in which he testifies, and it will not, in this connection, be forgotten that the only existing rule upon the matter is expressly applicable to every branch of the Supreme Court. [His Lordship read Order LXV., r. 27 (9).] That is the rule which governs the present question, and the relevant circumstances which raise it may now be shortly stated. [His Lordship stated the facts of the case, and continued:] The amount charged in respect of the attendance at the one day's trial of a single witness in such a suit as this, and that witness a mate in a steam trawler, is sufficiently startling. It represents almost as much as the whole amount involved in the action, and more than half of the plaintiffs' entire costs of suit from beginning to end, extending as it did from Trinity 1917 to Hilary 1920. The assistant registrar has allowed the claim in full, and he has given the following reasons for so doing. [His Lordship read them.] The ominous features of that finding consist, to my mind, in this: that the assistant registrar expresses it in general terms, as embodying a principle applicable to every class of seafaring witness, irrespective of his status or condition; nor is there any reference, at least in terms, to the vital distinction between the remuneration which a litigant may, if he chooses, agree to pay a witness whom he calls and the sum with which, in respect of that witness's attendance, he may properly charge his opponent. The learned President did not feel himself at liberty to interfere with that finding, but to my mind, if such be its purport and effect, it has, as I think, no true warrant either in principle or authority; while if unchallenged or accepted, it would, in my judgment, carry with it the seeds of much future mischief.

I agree, however, with my Lord that, so far as the actual determination of this appeal is concerned, there are at least two very relevant considerations normally applicable to such a case, which, although not in terms referred to by the assistant registrar, were, we must assume, duly weighed by him, and resolved in a sense favourable to the plaintiffs. Accordingly, if I refer to them now before discussing the questions which are open to us, it is not because they affect our present decision, but because I desire to emphasise their importance in all such cases when they arise, and I do not desire it to be supposed that they have here been overlooked.

The first is that although this sum of 280*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* would presumably have been receivable by Burton had he sailed on the J. Baels Maurieux at some date shortly after the conclusion of the fishing voyage on the 3rd Dec. 1918, no payment was made to him by the plaintiffs in respect of it until nearly nineteen months later, and on the eve of taxation. Now the rule in this matter, as between a witness and a party calling him, is well settled. The reasonable expenses of a witness, whether intended to be charged against the other side or not, ought to be tendered to him when he is served with the subpœna, and if he is to be remunerated for loss of time, such remuneration ought also then to be tendered to him. The witness's remuneration in the present case, having regard to the basis on which it is arrived at, could not of course have been tendered with his subpœna, but if it was to be paid at all, it should, in the ordinary course, have been paid at the earliest moment after its amount had been ascertained. It was not so paid. Now arrangements in connection with such a payment as this, similar to that so severely animadverted upon in Hale v. Bates (1858, 6 B. & E. 575; 13 W. Rep. 295), are, I suspect, not yet uncommon. A payment on the eve of taxation is made on an understanding that so much of it as is disallowed shall be returned. Of course, I do not in the least suggest that anything of the kind happened here. On the contrary, I assume that the assistant registrar satisfied himself that it did not. I allude to the matter, as I have said, by reason of its extreme importance in all such cases. A suitor claiming to charge such a sum against his defeated opponent should be required to establish as an indispensable preliminary that he has irrevocably himself made the payment, or that he is liable to make it. This, in my judgment, to use Bovill, C.J.'s words, is one matter which every taxing officer should watch most narrowly.

The second matter to which I desire to refer is this. No application was, in the present case, made by the plaintiffs to have this potentially most expensive witness examined on commission before the trial. To my mind this is a consideration which should always be most carefully weighed by a taxing master before he allows a charge for that witness's attendance so disproportionate as the present charge is, whatever be the angle from which it is regarded. I am disposed to think that in the Admiralty Court the importance of this aspect of the question at issue has become somewhat obscured by reason of the statement attributed to Dr. Lushington by the headnote in The Karla (1865, 13 W. Rep. 295; Br. & Lush. 367), and from there transferred to the books of practice: (see Roscoe's Admiralty Practice, 4th edit., p. 424). The statement is, "A party is not bound to examine a witness before the trial." But if that case be examined, it will be found that Dr. Lushington's actual statement on this subject is much more guarded than that, so attributed to him. Dealing with the facts of that case, what he said was this (Br. & Lush. 369): "I cannot conceive that it is ever incumbent upon the owner of a vessel, who is defendant in the cause, to proceed to the examination of foreign witnesses by affidavit, or by commission or oral examination, before the petition is examined upon, or, in other words, before the witnesses for the plaintiff have been examined"—I desire to emphasise those words—"He is not bound to pursue such a course." These words are, it will be noted, carefully guarded, and fall short of the statement compendiously imputed to Dr. Lushington, and that in two respects not here applicable, which are of real importance in matters relating to the attendance and examination of witnesses. The first is that the witnesses there were the defendant's witnesses, the other that they were foreigners, whose further attendance the court might be quite powerless to enforce.

But the importance of this matter in the general aspect of it is dealt with in other cases. I will only mention two. In Temperley v. Scott (1832, 8 Bing. 392), where a claim was made by the plaintiff in respect of the detention, as a witness, of a master of a ship at the rate of 10*l.* a month, on the ground that he had, by reason of his detention, lost profitable employment, the taxing master allowed 8*l.* It was proved that the plaintiff had offered beforehand to have the master examined on interrogatories; the defendant had refused. The defendant appealed from the allowance of 8*l.*, and argued the general principle, to which I shall refer later, that he could not be charged with any sum in respect of the witness's loss of time. But Tindal, C.J. said (8 Bing. 393): "It is unnecessary in this case to agitate the general principle as to the allowance of costs for loss of time; for, in the first place, the sum which has been allowed in this case for subsistence is not extravagant very little, if any at all, more than was necessary for the board and lodging of a witness in Grewcock's station; and then an offer was made to the adverse party to examine the witness on interrogatories, and warning was given of the expense that would attend his refusal. Perhaps he made a prudent election; but it reduces the case to a bargain between the two parties, which precludes the necessity of any interference on the part of the court." The second case is Evans v. Watson (1846, 3 C. B. 327). There a claim was made of 10*s.* a day in respect of loss of time of a captain witness for 300 days; 7*s.* for 300 days was allowed. In that case Tindal, C.J. said (3 C. B. 329): "This action is brought to recover a large sum of money; and, after having obtained an order for the postponement of the trial on the ground of the absence of material witnesses, the defendants have thought fit to pay the sum demanded, and now complain that the plaintiff has done all that he reasonably could and ought to have done to insure success. The postponement of the trial was a favour to the defendants; it was for them to ascertain, when they asked it, whether the price at which they purchased that favour was not too great. If the witness had been wantonly and unnecessarily kept here by the plaintiff, the case would have been very different. But I am of opinion he was, under the circumstances: very properly detained for examination viva voce, in consequence of the intimation from the defendants that they meant to impugn his conduct." Maule, J. said (3 C. B. 330): "I also think the allowance of subsistence money to the witness in this case was properly made. It cannot be laid down as a general rule, that, in all cases where a witness may be examined on interrogatories, the party for whom he is to be called may at his option detain him for examination viva voce. But still he must be allowed a reasonable exercise of discretion; and, where the matter is doubtful, I think the party detaining him should have the benefit of the doubt." And, to my mind, it stands to reason that in many cases this consideration should be decisive against the right of a party to make upon his opponent on taxation such a claim as the present. Unless the presence of the witness at the trial is of really serious importance to the plaintiffs' case, such entirely disproportionate expense as is here involved in detaining him, and not examining him on commission, is surely a luxury, for which, primâ facie, the plaintiff should himself pay, unless on application made to the defendant the latter has objected to the witness being so examined. If due regard be paid, in proper cases, to this consideration, such difficulties as emerge in the present case will, I am satisfied, rarely arise. Here, however, I again assume that this matter has been sufficiently considered by the learned assistant registrar, although on the assumption which I fully make, that this claim is a genuine claim, I must say that I can myself see no ground, nor was any suggested, beyond the statement imputed to Dr. Lushington, why this witness Burton should not have been examined at any time during what we were told was his long stay ashore prior to the 8th Nov. 1918.

I come now to the real ground upon which the issue of the appeal must turn. Has the learned assistant registrar, when he allowed this claim, proceeded on a wrong principle? As I have said, I think he has. The question at issue has a long history. We may take as a convenient starting point the principle enunciated in Collins v. Godefroy (1831, 1 B. & Ad. 950)—a principle still the law of the court, although its application has been softened by later rules of procedure—namely, that there being a duty imposed by law upon a person regularly subpœnaed to attend from time to time and give his evidence, a promise to give him remuneration for loss of time incurred in such attendance is a promise without consideration, and the fact that allowances are given as between party and party in respect of the attendance of professional witnesses does not alter the law. Remuneration for loss of time by professional witnesses was apparently, as is recognised in Collins v. Godefroy (sup.), always an exception to the general rule laid down in that case. It would also appear that seafaring witnesses at all times held a similar position of advantage, for reasons which may conveniently be taken from the judgment in Berry v. Pratt (1 B. & C. 276): "Upon principle, the master was justified in allowing the subsistence money in question. Although the witness was an Englishman, yet he was a seafaring man; and, unless detained for the purpose of giving evidence, might again have gone to sea, and then the parties might have been put to a far greater expense by the postponement of the trial, on account of his absence. There would also have been some danger of his evidence being altogether lost by the various casualties to which seafaring men are exposed."

Moreover, it is, I think, true to say that as regards a seaman, as was stated in The Olive (Swabey, 292), the rate of wages is a fair criterion on which the allowance to him may be based, presumably because the normal wages of an ordinary seaman are no more than a decent living wage. But there is no warrant contained in any of the authorities I have been able to find for the proposition that this statement is true of captains, or other lower grade officers; any more than for the proposition that, in the case of professional witnesses, it is ever applicable so as to justify an allowance to one in excess of that made to another because his business was more prosperous, or because his absence from business involved him in greater loss. On the contrary, it will be found in Stewart v. Steele (1842, 4 M. & G. 669), to take one instance of a captain of a ship, that remuneration of 400*l.* in respect of a detention of 370 days was only allowed in respect of his attendance as a witness, although the evidence was that the earnings of which he had been deprived by his detention were 1000*l.* a year, exclusive of board and lodging. Again in Evans v. Watson (1842, 5 Scott N. R. 517; 3 C. B. 327; M. & G. 669), another captain's case, where a claim of 150*l.* in respect of 300 days' detention was made, but only 97*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*—7*s.* a day—for the 300 days was allowed.

For the principle adopted by the learned assistant registrar—ignored, if it existed, in these cases—I can find no warrant anywhere; and, on consideration of its general character, it stands, in my judgment, self-condemned. Take the present case. There its application would, according to the event, have justified an allowance of thousands of pounds, or one reduced to nothing at all. If the fishing trip, which, as it was, extended for five days after the trial, had been prolonged for five weeks, the defendants would, I presume, have been necessarily chargeable on this principle with the further profits earned by Burton's substitute during that extended period, had no other employment been found by Burton in the interval. In other cases the application of the principle might necessitate an examination of books and accounts yielding results purely arbitrary in relation to a witness's importance as such. And these consequences are not imaginary, because the truth is that the supposed principle is untenable, in that it ignores entirely the initial obligation of every citizen and every sojourner within reach of the court's process to give evidence in the courts of this country when duly summoned for the purpose; it ignores the fact that the provisions of the rules of court, under which compensation may be charged against the opponents of those who require his attendance, are, on the basis of a strictly reasonable allowance, made on the footing that the witness's obligation to testify, while it remains an obligation, never becomes a sacrifice on the one hand, or a profit on the other. It would, in my judgment, be pessimi exempli if this principle enunciated by the learned assistant registrar, now that it has been challenged, were held by this court to be tenable. If it were so held, the result would be that to the uncertainty of litigation in its issue would inevitably be added increased uncertainty as to its cost, necessarily involving such a risk to many a plaintiff with a good cause of action and to many a defendant with a good defence as would deter them from further prosecution or resistance, and so in effect bring about a denial of justice in their cases.

In my judgment, the initial obligation on the part of a witness duly summoned to attend, and, in the interests of parties, give evidence, should never be forgotten in fixing on a party and party taxation any payment in excess of his actual expenses chargeable in respect of his attendance against the defeated party. It is no part of the duty of the court to minimise or ignore that obligation; rather is it the privilege of the court to proclaim it and insist upon its observance. If in matters of taxation it be forgotten, the results must, in all cases, not absolutely normal, be arbitrary; in most, excessive; in some, extravagant. And while remuneration for his loss of time may, in respect of a seafaring witness, be now, as always, properly allowed by the registrar on taxation, and while, in the case of an ordinary seaman, his wages may still supply a fair criterion on which the allowance may be based, that criterion has not, as has been seen, any necessary application to other ratings; nor can it be applied, as it seems to me, so as to extend either for better or for worse to the purely speculative share of profits of a fishing voyage from the prosecution of which the witness was, by his attendance at the trial, detained, but the necessary risks or hardships of which he was not called upon to undergo.

It is not within my capacity, nor if I possessed the wit would it appear to me to be right, to suggest any formula for the governance of a taxing officer in such a case as this. His discretion is and ought to be wide; any attempt to fetter it in advance would be mischievous. But this much I feel that I may say after an examination of the cases, and bearing in mind the proper attitude of the registrar towards all such claims. Little objection, in the bulk of such cases, could, I think, be raised to an allowance for the detention of a necessary seafaring witness, if that allowance be based upon a reasonable subsistence payment, suitable to a person in his station of life, while not exceeding any loss actually incurred by him by reason of his detention, or any real remuneration which, but for that detention, the witness would have earned, or of which by reason thereof he may have been deprived. If the witness is to receive more, he may be left to get it from the party who detained him. Even that party is, on the principle of Collins v. Godefroy (1 B. & Ad. 950), liable for no more. If he thinks fit to pay more, he does so as a luxury of litigation in which it has pleased him to indulge.

For these reasons, I concur in the view that this appeal should be allowed, and this item in the plaintiffs bill of costs be referred back to the learned assistant registrar for reconsideration.

A ship guilty of initial negligence is bound to do everything she can to prevent the consequences of that negligence, and the burden upon her is to show that she has done so before she can claim that the negligence of another ship is the sole cause of an accident.

Per Lord Moulton.—There is great danger of misapplying the doctrine for which Radley v. London and North-Western Railway Company (1876, 1 App. Cas. 754) is quoted as an authority. The language sometimes used by the courts on this point would seem to imply that a ship guilty of the initial negligence is relieved from all responsibility, and that the other ship alone has to bear that task of avoiding the consequences, and that if she could have done so by proper navigation she is solely to blame. This is not the true rule. The ship guilty of the initial negligence remains bound to do everything that she can to prevent the consequences of that negligence, and the burden upon her is to show that she has done so before she can claim that the negligence of the other ship is the sole cause of the accident. Otherwise, we should be putting a premium on taking the initiative in negligence. In the present case, the Gothland continued to be negligent until the moment of the collision with the Larenberg, and thereby aggravated if she did not wholly cause the danger, and although the Larenberg was also negligent, she must share the blame.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

"Not under command"—Keeping course and speed—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, arts. 4, 21—Concurrent findings.

A cruiser not under normal effective control, and with a useless whistle, exhibited two black shapes to indicate that she was from an accident "not under command." She collided with a steamship approaching at a speed of about ten knots on a crossing course, whose duty under ordinary circumstances of navigation would have been to keep course and speed. The steamship saw the cruiser's signal. If the cruiser had been under effective control it would have been her duty to keep out of the way of the steamship.

Held, (Lord Wrenbury and Lord Phillimore dissenting) that the steamship should have kept out of the way as the cruiser was in fact in such a condition owing to an accident that she could only get out of the way of the steamship after great and unusual delay, and that she was "not under command" within the meaning of art. 4 of the Regulations for Prevention of Collisions at Sea, and that the duty cast upon the officer navigating the cruiser was no more than a common law duty to navigate with such care, caution and skill as was reasonable under the circumstances.

Held also, (Lord Wrenbury and Lord Phillimore dissenting) that even though the question whether the cruiser was guilty of negligence leading to the collision was one of extreme difficulty, the facts facts were not clear enough to justify the House in disregarding the advice of their nautical assessors and setting aside the concurrent judgments of two courts which had each of them the assistance of nautical assessors.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 554; 122 L. T. Rep. 505: (1919) P. 362) affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of the Court of Appeal, reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 554; 122 L. T. Rep. 505; (1919) P. 362, which affirmed a judgment of Roche, J.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Mendip Range. The defendant was Captain Stephen H. Radcliffe, R.N., commanding His Majesty's Ship Drake.

The litigation arose out of a collision between the Mendip Range and H.M.S. Drake about 11 a.m. on the 2nd Oct. 1917 near Rathlin Island. On the morning of the collision the Drake had been torpedoed and seriously damaged, and she was making for a place of safety. The case for the plaintiffs was that the Mendip Range was in Rathlin Sound, on a course of S.E. ¾ E. magnetic, making about ten knots an hour, when the Drake was observed about three miles away and three points on the port bow of the Mendip Range, in the company of some destroyers and enveloped in smoke-clouds, steering south-west, and that shortly afterwards she exhibited two discs, indicating that she was not under command. When the vessels were about a mile distant the helm of the Mendip Range was starboarded and two short blasts sounded; and, while she was going off under starboard helm, the Drake, being then on the starboard bow of the Mendip Range, was seen turning to starboard. As it had become impossible to clear by porting the Mendip Range, her helm was put hard-a-starboard, her engines full speed astern, and three short blasts were sounded. The Drake, however, continued to turn to starboard, struck with her ram the starboard side of the Mendip Range, and rendered it necessary for the Mendip Range to be beached. The plaintiffs also alleged that the defendant and those on board the Drake (inter alia) failed to keep their course and speed, improperly exhibited the "not under command" signals, and ported her helm or allowed her head to go to starboard after displaying those signals.

The case for the defence was that the Drake was south-east of Rathlin Island after being torpedoed, and was heading southward in a disabled and damaged condition, with a heavy list to starboard. She was then making about five or six knots an hour, and swinging under a port helm with the object of rounding Rue Point and reaching, if possible, Church Bay. The Mendip Range, one of the Drake's convoy before she was torpedoed, was seen about three or four miles distant, and about six points on the starboard bow. The Drake then exhibited two black discs to show that she was not under command, and kept her helm a-port, and, her whistle having been damaged in the explosion, sounded a short blast on the fog-horn. The Mendip Range, when crossing ahead of the Drake, altered her course to port, and, although the Drake signalled by flags and waved to her to keep clear, and the engines were stopped and put full speed astern and the helm put amidships, came on with considerable speed under starboard helm, recrossing the bows of the Drake from port to starboard, and with her starboard side struck the stem of the Drake. It was further alleged by the defendant that those on board the Mendip Range were negligent in (inter alia) starboarding, and in not keeping clear of the Drake.

Roche, J. found that neither ship was to blame for the collision, with the result that he gave judgment for the defendant, each party to bear their own costs.

The plaintiffs' appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed on the ground that the evidence established that the case was one of inevitable accident, and that the judgment of Roche, J. was therefore right.

The Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1910 provide:

Art. 4. (a) A vessel which from any accident is not under command shall carry [lights] . . . and shall by day carry in a vertical line one over the other not less than 6ft. apart, where they can best be seen, two black balls or shapes each 2ft. in diameter. (d) The lights and shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other vessels as signals that the vessel showing them is not under command and therefore cannot get out of the way. . . .

Art. 21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Laing, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the appellants.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and Dunlop, K.C. for the respondent.

The following cases were referred to:

The House, having taken time to consider, gave judgment dismissing the appeal, Lords Wrenbury and Phillimore dissenting.

Viscount HALDANE.—The evidence in this case shows that the Drake, the cruiser commanded by the respondent, came round the northern side of Rathlin Island, and was compelled, as the result of the damage done by the torpedo which struck her, to abandon her original intention to try to proceed on a south-east course to Belfast. It was finally determined to take her round the island at its southern point, and to bring her to anchor in shoal water in Church Bay, on the west side of the island. This the cruiser endeavoured to do, first turning round, east or south-east of the island, under starboard helm, so as to get into position, and thereafter being navigated under port helm. Her condition was bad. Two of her boiler rooms were out of action and full of water, and her speed had been reduced by a half. The steam steering gear had been carried away, as had been also the telephonic communication to the hand steering gear, which was in the after-part of the ship, below the water line. The steering orders from the bridge had consequently to be given by transmission through a row of men, probably about twelve, and the management of the helm was, therefore, slow and ineffective. She had also a list to starboard, and was not under anything approaching to normal effective control, but had a tendency to yaw. The captain seems to have decided that he must somehow get her round the southern point of the island, which is known as Rue Point. Her syren or whistle had been rendered useless by the explosion. She was kept under port helm as soon as she was got into position, and she continued to be so kept, the helm being about 20 degrees to port. She was thus approaching Rue Point slowly, at a speed of about seven knots. As she was so approaching the point she exhibited two black shapes, to indicate that she was not under control or command, and these were seen by those on board the Mendip Range, which was approaching to near Rue Point from the other side of the island. At this time the Mendip Range was about three miles distant from the Drake. This was on the 2nd Oct. 1917. In the end a collision took place between two ships somewhere between 10.25 and eleven in the forenoon of that day.

The Mendip Range was directing her course so as to pass between Rue Point and the Mainland of Ireland, which was about two miles off. The scene of the collision was somewhere midway between the island and the mainland, possibly nearer to the former. The Mendip Range, which had been among a group of vessels which the Drake had convoyed until they were near Rathlin Island, was proceeding westwards at a speed of about ten knots. It was prudent for her to go at this speed because there was reason to suppose that more German submarines might be in the vicinity. The courses of the Drake and the Mendip Range were in the first instance respectively roughly south-west and south-east. The collision took place at about right angles, the ram of the Drake striking the starboard side of the other vessel. By this time the Drake was veering in her direction to a little north of north-west, and the Mendip Range to about north-east.

The action was brought by the appellants as owners of the Mendip Range, against the respondent as officer in charge of H.M.S. Drake, for damages caused by his negligent navigation. The defence was no negligence on his part, but negligence on the part of those on board the Mendip Range. The trial judge (Roche, J.) held that there was no negligence in the navigation of either ship, so that neither was to blame. The Court of Appeal took the same view. There was no counter-claim, for an obvious reason. The captain of the Drake, who could only be sued personally, had suffered no damage individually. There could, therefore, be no cross-appeal as to the finding of Roche, J. that the Mendip Range was not to blame. Having regard to the form of the proceedings and of the judgment, I do not think that this causes any difficulty. The only point which the respondent has to establish is that he was not to blame, and he is not estopped, in my opinion, from raising any argument which is relevant to this point, even though it may involve some reproach to those on board the other ship. However, no such question, in the view which I take, arises.

It must be assumed that those on board the Mendip Range, having seen the special signal, knew that the Drake was not under control or command, and that an obligation, therefore, rested on themselves to keep out of her way. I think that if the special signal was justified by the condition of the Drake, it exempted her captain from the duty of carrying out the provisions of the collision regulations as to ships on crossing courses. That the facts warranted the giving of the signal I entertain no doubt. The state of the steering gear and of the shattered cruiser generally was such that the captain was warranted in thinking that he could at least do little more than get round the Point before she was in danger of foundering. His control over her course had ceased to be effective. I think that, as a consequence, his duty was no more than the common law duty of care in navigating his ship in the condition in which it was.

The case made against the Drake was that the master of the Mendip Range observed her to be so heading that it was not safe to attempt to pass across her bows, and that in order to pass astern of her he starboarded his helm. It is said that after he had so starboarded for an appreciable time, two or three minutes, the Drake suddenly ported her helm, with the result that she rammed the other ship.

Both of the courts below have found the facts differently from this. The view they took was that the Drake had been, since the time when she was first sighted, continuously under a port helm without alteration, and was keeping her course. She could steer only imperfectly, and she was not in a position to alter her helm rapidly. Her object was, by keeping a port helm, to manage to get round the Point to the bay, taking care, as she could not deflect her course, excepting very slowly, and might yaw, not to approach too closely to the land. Her case is, in short, that such as her course was, it was one already adopted when she was first sighted by the Mendip Range, and that from this course she never deviated. Roche, J. found that she did not, after the Mendip Range had committed herself in the final minutes to a starboard helm, herself turn her helm to port. If her direction altered at all at the last moment, and this is not clear, it was not as the result of a change of helm, but would, if it happened, be due to uncontrollable yawing.

This is a concurrent finding, and even if I felt myself free to dissent from it, there is nothing in the evidence which inclines me to do so. I think further that the fact so found is a cardinal one, which disposes of the real foundation of the argument of the appellants. Those on board the Mendip Range may have been justified in taking the steps they did just before the collision, although they did not succeed in averting the collision. But those on board the Drake were not shown to have been in any way to blame.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal fails.

Viscount FINLAY.—In this case a collision took place on the 2nd Oct. 1917, in Rathlin Sound, between the steamship Mendip Range and H.M.S. Drake. An action was brought by the owners of the Mendip Range to recover damages on the allegation that the collision was caused by the negligence of those in charge of the Drake, the commanding officer being the nominal defendant. The defendant denied negligence on the part of the Drake, and pleaded that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of those on board the Mendip Range.

The case was tried before Roche, J. with the Elder Brethren, and it was found by him that there was no negligence in the navigation of either of the vessels. His decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. The present appeal is brought by the owners of the Mendip Range to have it decided that the collision was caused by negligence in the navigation of the Drake. There was no appeal against the decision that the Mendip Range was not to blame. The counsel for the respondent, whilst submitting that he was at liberty to attack for the purposes of this appeal the finding that there was no negligence in the navigation of the Mendip Range, disclaimed doing so.

The collision took place at a point distant from half a mile to a mile in a southerly direction from Rue Point in Rathlin, an island off the north-east coast of Ireland. The Mendip Range was bound for Glasgow from Philadelphia, and was on a course of S.E. ¼ E. magnetic, making about ten knots, when she sighted the Drake distant about three miles on the port bow, and with her starboard side open to the Mendip Range. In this position it would ordinarily have been the duty of the Drake to keep out of the way, and the duty of the Mendip Range to keep her course (arts. 19 and 21 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea), but the Drake, after sighting the Mendip Range, displayed two black balls or shapes, which, under art. 4 of these regulations, are required to be carried by a vessel which from any accident is not under command. The Drake was a cruiser of 14,000 tons displacement and about 500ft. in length, and, together with some destroyers, had been escorting a convoy of vessels proceeding eastward by the north side of Rathlin Island. About 9 a.m. on the 2nd Oct. she was torpedoed about five miles westward of Altacarry Head. The damage done by the torpedo was very considerable. The Drake took a list to starboard, the steam-steering gear was put out of action and the telephonic communication was broken, so that the vessel had to be steered by means of a hand wheel, which could be worked only with great slowness and with the help of twelve men, while the orders had to be transmitted through a number of other men stationed at intervals between the bridge and the hand wheel. It was contended for the Drake that she was "not under command" within the meaning of art. 4, and bound to hoist the black balls, and that it was therefore the duty of the Mendip Range to keep out of her way.

After being torpedoed, Captain Radcliffe, who was in command of the Drake, determined to take her to Belfast, and she proceeded on her course for Belfast in a south-east direction from Altacarry Head. But on the report of the engineer commander that the vessel could not hold out so far as Belfast, Captain Radcliffe determined to take her round Rue Point into Church Bay. For some unexplained reason (possibly on account of the suspected presence of hostile submarines) the captain brought the vessel round to her new course, not by porting but by starboarding and coming round the greater part of a circle, an operation which is said to have taken forty minutes. When this turning was completed and the vessel was steadied on her new course she is stated to have been at a point three miles distant from Altacarry Head in a south-east direction. She proceeded for some time on her new course and afterwards ported for the purpose of rounding Rue Point and so getting into Church Bay.

The Mendip Range and the Drake sighted one another at a distance of some three miles. The Preliminary Act, on behalf of the Mendip Range, stated the distance of the other vessel when first seen as about three miles and the bearing as about three points on the port bow, while the Act on behalf of the Drake put the Mendip Range at about three or four miles distant and about six points on the starboard bow; these statements may be taken as approximately correct. The Mendip Range was making about ten knots, and the Drake about seven. The Mendip Range starboarded intending to pass under the stern of the Drake, sounding two short blasts, but the Drake came round under the port helm with the result that the two vessels converged, the ram of the Drake striking the starboard side of the Mendip Range. The evidence for the Mendip Range was that the Drake suddenly ported, thereby bringing about the catastrophe. On behalf of the Drake, it was contended that there had been no such sudden porting, and it was asserted that the Drake had been for some considerable time under the port helm, and had been gradually coming round.

It is admitted that the Mendip Range was not to blame for starboarding, as those on board of her might not have been able at the distance to see that the Drake was then coming round under the port helm. The question of the navigation of the Drake is, to my mind, a very difficult one. According to the oral evidence from the Mendip Range, which is strongly corroborated by the photographs taken at the time of the collision by the young man Potts on board the Mendip Range, the Drake came suddenly round under the port helm directly before the collision. Roche, J. found that the order for port helm action was given on board the Drake before there was any alteration on board the Mendip Range, by which I understand the learned judge to mean before the Mendip Range had come round under her starboard helm. He adds that he is satisfied that port helm action was taken not for the Mendip Range, "but for the general purposes of the Drake in directing her course to the beach where she desired to anchor in shoal water." Roche, J. stated his conclusion as follows: "In these circumstances, I am unable to find the Drake guilty of negligence because she took that action, she thinking that the Mendip Range, having regard to the 'not under command' signal, would shape to pass and would be able to pass clear of her on her port side and to the southward of her, and I do not find the course taken, not for the Mendip Range, but for the general purposes of the Drake, a negligent or improper course."

Earlier in his judgment the learned judge described the situation thus: "Therefore it is obvious that a good deal, and, as I find, the greater part of the alteration of the Drake occurred at quite a late stage, as I am advised that it is a nautical probability, and I find, as a fact, that although the action of the Drake under port helm was taken before the Mendip Range herself altered under starboard helm its effect was not such as to become apparent to those on board of the Mendip Range; that the Mendip Range thereupon starboarded, and the port helm of the Drake was adhered to, and that the one vessel so starboarding, and the other vessel so porting, the collision was brought about in the manner previously described."

The finding of Roche, J. acquitting the Drake of negligence was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. Bankes, L.J., after referring to the terms of the judgment given in the court below, says: "I think the general conclusion which I draw from the learned judge's judgment is that he did intend to decide, and did decide, this very material question as to whether the Drake took port helm action after the Mendip Range had starboarded; he intended to decide that in favour of the Drake. It is suggested, no doubt, that the action of the Drake under her port helm was more marked; she turned more rapidly, or she moved more rapidly under her port helm at the last than she had done at an earlier stage, in the time during which she had been in sight of the Mendip Range, but I do not think that he intended to find, and personally I do not think he would have been justified in finding, that there was an alteration of helm in the sense that anyone in charge of the Drake gave any fresh helm orders. That is the conclusion at which I have arrived upon this evidence, and, in my opinion, the view taken by the learned judge, as I understand his view, as expressed by him, was right, and I think that the Mendip Range cannot be charged in this case with having in any way contributed to the accident, and I think those in charge of the Drake were not negligent and were not to blame. The case is one in so far as she is concerned of inevitable accident. I think the judgment of the learned judge below was right."

The judgment of Scrutton, L.J. is devoted chiefly to the examination of the question whether the Drake was justified in hoisting the "not under command" signal, and I think the only passage in his judgment which is relevant to the point which I am now considering is the following: "The judge has found that the Drake, before the Mendip Range altered her course, and when the Drake hoisted her two black balls, had an order for port helm, an action not taken for the Mendip Range, but for the general purposes of the Drake in directing her course to the beach where she desired to anchor in shallow water. That is to say, being injured, she was taking the course necessary to save herself from injury. That, in my view, was a perfectly proper course for the ship to take even though she had hoisted two black balls, to try and save herself, even though her means of saving herself were unreliable, and it was under those circumstances the exact course she should pursue when she tried to save herself in that way. Now, so far as one can see, the evidence amply justifies that finding of the judge. If one looks at the chart, and sees where the Drake was torpedoed and the course she was proposing to make round, out of the Altacarry Head and Rue Point, one looks at the course of the Mendip Range heading towards Fair Head and sees the place where the Mendip Range must have been when she saw the Drake clear of Rue Point about three miles off, it seems to me an irresistible conclusion that the Drake seen at this place and being known to be going to Church Bay, must have been then under port helm. It was the only thing she could be doing reasonably to carry out her very proper plan of getting into Church Bay to try and save herself. If so, it is not a case where the Drake has, after the Mendip Range has committed herself to a course of action, taken an unnecessary course which led to the collision. The Drake is carrying out the course necessary to save herself, and the Mendip Range has misunderstood it. I agree with the finding that under the peculiar circumstances the Mendip Range is not to blame, but I also agree with the judge's finding that the Drake was entitled to hoist the two black balls showing she was out of command and entitled to continue the course which she was on before the Mendip Range acted in the way she did, to save herself. She was unable, not through negligence, to avoid the collision, but because there was no step that she could have properly taken in the short time that elapsed between the two periods, each observing what the other was doing."

The third member of the Court of Appeal, Eve, J., said that he was not prepared to say that he would have come to the same conclusion as the trial judge, but that, whatever his own leaning, the learned judge's decision was as likely to be right as a finding the other way.

It therefore appears that in deciding this part of the case the decision of Roche, J. and that of the Court of Appeal amount to concurrent findings upon a question of fact substantially on the same grounds.

Our nautical assessors take strongly the view that the Drake was in no way to blame. This is, of course, a most important factor in our consideration of a question of navigation. I should, however, add that I think that this opinion was to some extent influenced by the view of the assessors that the Mendip Range ought to have been found to blame for starboarding.

The question whether the Drake was guilty of negligence leading to the collision is, to my mind, one of extreme difficulty. It does not, however, come before us as if we were a court of first instance. We have to deal with the concurrent findings by Roche, J. and the Court of Appeal on a matter of fact. I do not think that the facts are clear enough to justify us in disregarding the advice of our nautical assessors and setting aside the concurrent judgments of two courts which had, each of them, the assistance of nautical assessors. In my opinion, therefore, the appeal against the acquittal of the Drake for negligence in navigation should fail.

There remains for consideration the question whether the Drake was justified in hoisting the signal that she was "not under command."

The fourth article of the Regulations so far as applicable to the present case is as follows:

"(a) A vessel which from any accident is not under command . . . shall by day carry in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 6ft. apart, where they can best be seen, two black balls or shapes, each 2ft. in diameter.

"(d) The . . . shapes required to be shown by this article are to be taken by other vessels as signals that the vessel showing them is not under command and cannot therefore get out of the way."

It was contended for the Mendip Range that the Drake was in fact under command and that the signal of the two shapes was therefore improper and misleading. Art. 4 requires that a vessel which from any accident is not under command shall exhibit the signal. The test is the condition of the vessel in point of fact. Is she or is she not under command?

Two views have been taken of the construction of the article on this point. They are stated by Lord Herschell in The P. Caland (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 317, at p. 318: 68 L. T. Rep. 469; (1893) A. C. 207, at p. 212-3) as follows:

"In the Court of Appeal the Master of the Rolls expressed himself as follows: 'Now looking at the words of the statute, at the first part of the clause, which speaks of her not being under command, and the second part her not being under command so that she cannot keep out of the way—taking those two together, it seems to me that the real construction of the rules is that she must, through some accident, be in such a position that she is not under command in this sense, that she could not keep out of the way of another vessel coming near her. But if she can be steered, and can be stopped, and can go ahead—which is necessary in order that she may be steered—then she is under command, and the apprehension of her being likely (however well founded) to be in a few moments out of command does not show that she is out of command at the moment spoken of.' And the other learned judges concurred in this view. I cannot but think that this construction is somewhat too narrow. Suppose the vessel, though having steerage way on her and capable of being steered to port or starboard, yet, owing to some disablement, answered her helm but very slowly, so that if an occasion for doing so should arise she could not get out of the way of another vessel in the manner which such vessel would have reason to anticipate. And suppose, though she can stop and reverse, she can only do so after great and unusual delay. I am not satisfied that in either of these cases she might not be properly described as not under command, and not able to keep out of the way of other vessels. It is not necessary to dwell upon the point, as it has no application to the present case, but I wish to guard against being supposed to assent to so narrow a construction as appears to me to have been adopted by the court below."

It was not necessary for Lord Herschell in that case to decide this question of construction, but he clearly indicated the inclination of his opinion. It is now necessary that we should decide the point, as on the construction depends the answer to the question whether the Drake was "not under command."

I think that the view indicated by Lord Herschell in the passage which I have quoted is correct. If a vessel is in such a condition owing to an accident that she can only get out of the way of another after great and unusual delay I think she must be considered as "not under command" for the purpose of art. 4. She is not able to behave as those on board other vessels meeting her would reasonably expect. Both courts below, with the assistance of their nautical assessors, arrived at the conclusion that the Drake was in such a condition. We have consulted our own nautical assessors on the point and they take the same view, and entertain no doubt whatever that this vessel was in such a state that the signal ought to have been hoisted. The construction of the rule is, of course, not for the assessors but for the House. But when that construction has been ascertained the question whether on the facts the disability which the accident entailed on the vessel was such as to put her out of command is one of fact; in most cases it is largely a matter of degree.

In my opinion the Drake was not under command within the meaning of art. 4 and the signal was properly hoisted.

It was also argued on behalf of the Drake that, whether she was in fact out of command or not, those in control of her in good faith and on reasonable grounds believed that she was, and that this justified the hoisting of the signal.

Reference was made in support of this contention of the respondent to what was said by Lord Bowen in The Beryl (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321, at p. 325: 51 L. T. Rep. 554; (1884) 9 P. Div. 137, at p. 144) in considering the effect of the old art. 18 (now art. 23) as to the duty, "if necessary," to stop and reverse. Lord Bowen said it might be a matter for consideration whether "if necessary" meant if it is actually necessary or only if the captain should reasonably think the necessity had arisen, and in the subsequent case of The Ceto (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479, at p. 487; 62 L. T. Rep. 1; (1889) 14 App. Cas. 670, pp. 693-4) Lord Herschell said with reference to this article that he agreed "that the necessity must not be such as to become manifest only when all the facts are ascertained, but must be such as would be apparent to a seaman of ordinary skill and prudence with the knowledge he possesses at the time."

The doctrine so laid down by Lord Herschell appears to me not relevant to the construction of art. 4. It is quite reasonable to construe a direction to stop and reverse if necessary as having reference to the facts as apparent at the time, and it would be unreasonable to hold the captain in fault because it appears by the light of facts afterwards ascertained that another course would have been better. But such considerations are not applicable to an article which prescribes that if the vessel is not under command a certain signal shall be hoisted. The question is of the condition of the vessel in point of fact and if she is out of control the signal is to be hoisted. Those in control of the vessel are in the best position for knowing whether she is under command or not. If they come to a wrong conclusion on the question of fact the action taken thereon is not justified. That they acted bonâ fide and on reasonable grounds may affect the question of blame to be attributed to their action or inaction; it has no bearing on the question whether under art. 4 the proper course was taken. The question whether the signal should be made is one between the vessel and other vessels, and their rights inter se depend on the language of the article coupled with the facts as they exist. It is a question not whether there was negligence, but whether the signal was required by the article.

In the present case indeed this point of the respondent's is not very intelligible. All the facts as to the condition of the Drake were perfectly well known to those on board of her. The real charge made against her by the Mendip Range was that she acted in hoisting the signal "not under command" on the view of the meaning of the article taken by Lord Herschell and not on the narrower view of its effect which had been adopted in The Ceto (sup.) by the Court of Appeal. If a rule has been misconstrued, it is immaterial to inquire whether there was good faith or reasonable ground for the misconstruction. In fact, the article was rightly construed by the captain of the Drake.

In my opinion this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord ATKINSON.—During the course of the argument in this case, three questions have emerged for decision by your Lordships. First, whether the ship-of-war, the Drake, from the time she was torpedoed up to the time of her collision with the Mendip Range, was, by reason of an accident, out of control within the meaning of art. 4 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which came into force on the 1st July 1897. Second, whether the respondent was guilty of negligence in hoisting on his ship the signals prescribed by that article as soon as he had sighted the Mendip Range. Third, whether the respondent was guilty of negligence in rapidly turning his ship to starboard while the Mendip Range was acting under her starboard helm, so as to make it impossible for the Mendip Range to clear her. Each of these questions is a question of fact. It is, in my opinion, absolutely clear that there was abundant evidence given before the learned judge, Roche, J., who tried the case, to justify his finding in favour of the respondent on each of the issues of fact thus raised. The second and third questions may readily, for all practical purposes, be condensed into one, namely, did the respondent on this occasion navigate and manage his ship, even if not under command, in such a faulty, unseamanlike, and improper manner as amounted under the then existing circumstances to the negligent management and navigation of her. Mr. Laing, on behalf of the appellant, urged in reply, if not before, that there were not concurrent findings in the courts below on each of these three questions of fact. It is not necessary that the decision of a judge on any question of fact should be couched in any particular form of words. It appears to me to be quite enough if he uses language which clearly conveys the meaning that he decides the question one way or the other; and in my view a judge equally finds upon an issue of fact if he clearly expresses his concurrence with the decision of another judge who has decided that issue.

In his judgment Roche, J. says: "I am unable to find the person responsible for the navigation of the Drake guilty of negligence, because he has taken the view he did and has hoisted the two black balls. Therefore I arrive at the negative conclusion that I am unable to find, and do not find, the captain of the Drake or the navigating officer guilty of negligence for hoisting the 'not under command' signals. Had I found that she was wrongly exhibiting the non-command signals I should have found that it contributed" [to the collision he evidently means]. "Mr. Aspinall argues that it did not, but I should have so found because I think it was the cause of the other vessel starboarding." This last statement would appear to me to amount to a clear expression of opinion that the Drake was not under command. He then goes on to deal with what he calls the main charge against the Drake, "namely, that she failed to keep her course and speed, that is to say, that she improperly ported her helm and allowed her head to go off to starboard. . . . In these circumstances I am unable to find the Drake guilty of negligence because she took that action, she thinking that the Mendip Range, having regard to the 'not under command' signal, would shape to pass, and would be able to pass, clear of her on her port side and to the southward of her, and I so find the course taken, not for the Mendip Range, but for the general purposes of the Drake, a negligent or improper course." By the words, "general purposes of the Drake," the learned judge meant the purpose of the Drake to get into shoal water where she might anchor in safety.

It is in my mind clear that, by these passages from the judgment which I have cited, the learned judge conveyed, and meant to convey, that he intended to decide, and did then decide, each of the three questions of fact I have mentioned in favour of the respondent. It is next contended that Bankes, L.J. did not express himself in such a way as to indicate that he concurred with Roche, J. in the decisions on each of those questions of fact. I think that that contention is as unsustainable as the other. He says it appeared to him that there was amply sufficient evidence to justify a finding that the vessel was not under control; that he himself should so find. That he then asked of his assessors the question whether, having regard to the injuries to the Drake, did they consider the hoisting of the out of command signals was justified? That they answered "Yes," and that he entirely agreed with them, adding that it was unnecessary he should add anything more on the question raised by Mr. Laing as to whether the vessel was or was not under control within the meaning of art. 4.

He then adds: "Mr. Laing seems to draw a distinction between the fact of whether she was not under command and whether those in charge of her were justified in considering that she was not under command, but, personally, I cannot see any real distinction. If this court, or any other court, were of opinion that the vessel was not in such a condition as to be properly described as not under command, they would not come to the conclusion that those on board were justified in considering that she was in that condition. The court comes to the conclusion as to whether the officers were justified upon the opinion that they themselves formed as to the actual condition of the vessel."

This passage makes it plain, I think, that the learned Lord Justice concurred with Roche, J.'s findings on the first and second questions of fact. He then proceeds to deal with the third question of fact, and after criticising Roche, J.'s words, says that he does not think that the learned judge intended to find that there was any alteration of the helm of the Drake in the sense that anyone in charge of the Drake gave port helm orders, and then says that those in charge of the Drake were not negligent and were not to blame, that the case was one so far as the Drake was concerned of inevitable accident, and that he thought the judgment appealed from was right. It was not suggested even that Scrutton, L.J. did not come on these three questions to conclusions practically identical with those arrived at by Roche, J. The case, therefore, is one in which there are concurrent findings on the three decisive questions of fact. The principle which should guide your Lordships in dealing with such a case is laid down by Lord Herschell with his accustomed clearness and precision in the case of The P. Caland (sup.) in these words: "I quite agree with what has been said in previous cases as to the importance of not disturbing a finding of fact in which both the courts below have concurred. I think such a step ought only to be taken where it can be clearly demonstrated that the finding was erroneous. In the present case, although I might probably myself have come to a different conclusion, I cannot say that any cardinal fact was disregarded or unduly estimated by the courts below. I can lay hold on nothing as turning the balance decisively one way or the other. I think the decision of the question of fact at issue depends upon which way the balance of probability inclines, and I am not prepared to advise your Lordships that it so unequivocably inclines in the opposite direction to that indicated in the judgment of the court below that this House would be justified in reversing the judgment appealed from. Lord Watson concurred." I think the passage applies strongly to the present case. Even if I felt, which I certainly do not, that if I had been in the place of Roche, J. or of that of the learned judges in the Court of Appeal I might have come to conclusions different from those at which they arrived, I should, on these three questions of fact, applying the principle so laid down by Lord Herschell, have felt myself bound not to concur in reversing the judgment appealed from.

In The Ceto case (sup.) Lord Herschell lays down another principle which, in my opinion, is particularly applicable to the present case. He said: "I quite agree with the Master of the Rolls that rigorous accuracy is not to be expected in the evidence of seamen in cases of this description (i.e., collision cases). It would be a mistake to tie them down to the letter of their evidence, to the exact number of points that are mentioned, either in relation to the bearing of other vessels or to the alteration of their courses. I think one must deal with the matter broadly." If that principle be applicable even where duty requires that such matters as those mentioned should be accurately ascertained, how much more forcibly must it apply where accuracy in respect of them is comparatively immaterial. For instance, how can it possibly affect this case whether the Drake turned Altacarry Head at a distance from it of three miles or five miles, or whether when she completed her large circle and steadied momentarily she steered a course of S. or S.E. or S.S.E.? She was steered to turn Rue Point and seek for safety in shallow Church Bay, and care was taken by those in charge of her that, owing to her condition, she should not approach the shore of Rathlin Island too closely. The broad fact is that all her officers and others who were examined on her behalf swore that her helm was ordered to be put 20 degrees to port, and that she came slowly to starboard continuously. It is true that no person was examined to prove that this order was actually carried out, but these witnesses cannot be mistaken as to whether their ship was slowly turning to starboard as if on a port helm, all along from the time she had completed her large circle, steadied, and made for Church Bay up to the collision. That is an entirely different thing from fixing distances or bearings, or measuring time. If their evidence on this point be untrue, then they must be deliberately forswearing themselves. No judge who has considered this case has accepted this latter theory, and, speaking for myself, I do not accept it. Again, it was suggested that if the Drake was slowly coming to starboard, during all the time deposed to, she must have gone aground on Rathlin Island or been much nearer to the coast of that island than the place of collision. The place of collision would appear to depend very much on the distance, eastward of this island, of the spot where the Drake finished her long circle. There was no object to be gained at the time by fixing the distance of that point from the shore with accuracy.

Of course once the Mendip Range was sighted the captain and crew of the Drake were bound to navigate their ship with such care, caution, and skill as was reasonable under the circumstances, despite terrors and apprehensions and anxieties which must have beset them in their perilous endeavour to reach a place of safety.

The captain and crew of the Drake were, I have no doubt, like all their fellows in the Royal Navy, cool and courageous men; but they were, after all, human beings, and to most, if not all, human beings life is sweet; and it is in my view not only unjust to them but misleading to ignore the special circumstances under which they acted and treat them as having no perils to encounter, save those which attend in peaceful times ordinary navigation. Yet it appears to me that the argument for the appellants has proceeded very much upon these latter lines.

Mr. Laing insisted very strenuously that a ship to come within art. 4 must, in fact, be out of command and not merely out of command according to the opinion and bonâ fide belief of her captain, even though in forming that opinion and belief he should have made all reasonable inquiry and examination to ascertain the true condition of his ship, and brought to bear upon the facts so ascertained all the skill and knowledge of a fully competent seaman, so that his opinion and belief were in the result based upon reasonable grounds.

It is obvious that the captain must act on the facts he has ascertained in the manner mentioned, and not on facts not known to him, and hoist the signals prescribed by art. 4. He cannot send for experts to examine his ship and advise him if his diagnosis of her condition is sound and right or erroneous. If the captain's diagnosis was right he would be held justified in putting up the authorised signals and treating his ship as not bound to keep out of the way of a crossing ship. If his diagnosis of his ship's condition at the time should possibly twelve months afterwards be in a judicial inquiry proved by the evidence of experts to have been erroneous, then his action, based on the assumption it was not erroneous, would necessarily be held to be wrong and blameable notwithstanding that he acted on a belief and opinion carefully formed and based on reasonable grounds. For instance, in the present case one of the matters upon which he based his opinion of his ship's condition, was that as her bulkheads were leaking they might under pressure give way, when his ship would sink or turn turtle, as she afterwards did. But according to the argument, if the Drake reached Belfast and, on being examined in dock by the dock's experts, they disagreed with the captain as to the dangerous and threatening condition of the bulkheads of his ship, he must be held in a court which tried the question and accepted the expert's evidence, to have acted wrongly in hoisting the prescribed signals.

Again, I am not quite sure whether Mr. Laing contended that the captain's culpability must be judged by the facts as they appeared to him at the time he acted or by some new facts subsequently disclosed. Some light may be indirectly thrown upon this latter point if not upon the preceding one by the provisions of art. 23 of these same regulations, and the judgment of this House in the Ceto case (sup.). This art. 23 provides that "Every steam vessel which is directed to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching that other, if necessary, slacken her speed, or stop, or reverse." The regulation corresponds with the art. 18 of the regulation of 1884. A question was raised upon the construction of this latter article as to who was to be the judge of "the necessity of doing one or more of these things." In the case of the Beryl (sup.) Bowen, L.J., as he then was, said: "It may therefore be a matter of construction whether 'if necessary' is to be construed as meaning 'if it is actually necessary,' or only if the captain should reasonably think that a necessity has arisen, but even if we were to take the latter as the construction most favourable to the master of the Beryl, the answer of our assessors to the question put to them, which the Master of the Rolls has already referred to puts him clearly in the wrong and obliges us to hold that the Beryl was also to blame for the collision." Fry, L.J., at p. 145, says: "It has been argued that the necessity is to be estimated by the event and not by the judgment of a seaman acting reasonably under the circumstances. It is not necessary to decide this point, for from the latter point of view the answer of our assessors shows that the captain of the Beryl broke the rule."

In Marsden on Collisions the decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Ceto is treated as having decided this question, and held that the rule was to be construed as bearing the latter of these two meanings.

Lord Halsbury, in that case, said: "The question, shortly stated, is whether two vessels approaching each other and knowing that they were approaching each other, in a dense fog through which it was impossible to see lights or signals or any part of the vessels by either of them were not both to blame for not stopping and reversing until they had ascertained more distinctly their respective courses. I quite agree that the solution of that question must not depend on the state of facts afterwards ascertained unless there was enough to tell both parties at the time what the condition of facts was. . . . Each of them was aware or ought to have been aware, that this approach did involve risk of collision, and the question is whether the facts were such in the knowledge of each that as prudent and reasonable persons those responsible for the navigation of the ship should have stopped and reversed."

Lord Watson said: "Whether it was in a reasonable sense necessary for the master of the Ceto to stop and reverse her engines before the Lebanon hove in sight is a question not of law but of fact. His duty in that respect must depend not upon the result of the whole facts now disclosed in evidence, but upon his own observation of the Lebanon fog signals, and the indications of the position and course of the Lebanon relatively to his own vessel, which those observations ought to have conveyed to a prudent seaman of ordinary skill."

Lord Herschell said: "The sole question is whether the Ceto should be held to blame in respect of having disobeyed the requirements of art. 18 . . . This resolves itself into the further question whether under the circumstances, in a dense fog with the indications which the master of the Ceto had of the position of the other vessel he ought, by the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, to have known that it was necessary to stop. For I agree that the necessity must not be such as to become manifest only when all the facts are ascertained, but must be such as would be apparent to a seaman of ordinary skill and prudence, with the knowledge which he possesses at the time."

In the case of the Beryl (sup.), Lord Esher said: "But when you speak of rules which are to regulate the conduct of people, those rules can only apply to circumstances which must or ought to be known at the time. You cannot regulate the conduct of people by unknown circumstances. When you instruct people you instruct them as to what they ought to do under circumstances which are or ought to be before them." This statement of the law was approved by Lord Herschell in the Theodor H. Rand (sup.). Having regard to this decision, I confess I have difficulty in seeing on what principle, if the captain of a ship injured by accident comes, after due and reasonable examination and inquiry to the conclusion that the facts then by him ascertained constitute reasonable grounds for the belief and opinion that his ship is not under command, he would not be held justified for having hoisted the appointed signals, at all events if the court before which the question comes for decision concurs with him in thinking that the facts at the time so discovered do afford reasonable grounds for the opinion he has formed, even though facts should subsequently be discovered which would show that the supposed facts upon which he forms his opinion were erroneous, it may well be that the captain's protection is still wider than this and that under the circumstances mentioned he should be held justified in his action, although the court should hold that the fact known to him at the time he hoisted these signals did not in fact afford reasonable grounds for his act.

It is not necessary to decide either of these questions in the present case, inasmuch as I not only think that the concurrent finding of the courts below on the three questions of fact I have already mentioned ought not to be disturbed, but in addition because I am of opinion that each and every one of these findings was right, I need hardly say that I thoroughly concur in the opinions expressed by Lords Herschell and Watson in the case of the P. Caland (sup.), as to the proper construction of art. 5 of the regulations. Too much reliance was, I think, placed by the appellants on the enlargements produced of two photographs taken by an apprentice on board the Mendip Range, named Potts, as proof of the charge made by the appellants that the Drake just before the collision rapidly turned to starboard and made it impossible for the Mendip Range by porting to clear her. The sequence of the events stated by Captain Thacker was not accepted by any of the learned judges who dealt with the case. The suggestion that this turning movement was made deliberately by the Drake was rejected by all of them. Had it been made deliberately by order it would not only have been wrong and reckless, but in my view almost insane in character on the part of those in charge of the Drake; and if it took place without any change of helm it proves all the more conclusively that the Drake was not under command, else why would she answer her unaltered helm so irregularly. Roche, J. endeavoured to reconcile the evidence of the officers of the Drake with the statement made by the captain of the Mendip Range by suggesting that the porting of the Drake was not so effective in the early part of her progress as at the end of it, that most of the effect of the porting took place at the end; and that the effect of the porting at the earlier stage was not so marked as was or ought to have been apparent to those on board the Mendip Range. I cannot say that I regard this explanation as very satisfactory. I do not know if the learned Lords Justices did so. The story of the apprentice was most extraordinary. If it be true, it is not to be wondered at that many ships were lost. The Mendip Range carried a gun, or guns, presumably to protect herself against hostile attack by submarines amongst other craft. Potts was one of the crew of one of the guns. John Gemmel was the foreman gunner. His business apparently was to watch for submarines, and presumably to help to fire on them if they appeared. In reply to a question he said he "was supposed to be looking after submarines." He assumed when he saw the Drake that she had been torpedoed. "She was," he says, "on the Mendip's starboard bow and appeared to be turning, and then other members of the gun's crew cried out 'She is turning; there is going to be a collision,' and then the chief gunner made the remark 'you will catch her on "the turn,"'" but neither the demands of duty, nor the danger of being torpedoed and sunk by one of the submarines he was employed to shoot at, nor the danger of his ship being sunk in a collision, could chill his devotion to the photographic art. The only effect of these dangers upon him was to make him think that it would be an interesting thing to take a snapshot of this torpedoed cruiser coming round. The Drake, he says, was about three miles away when he first saw her bearing about three points on the Mendip's port bow, but was not under a port helm (in this he contradicts all the officers of the Drake with, at most, one exception). She was about 2800ft. away—a little over a quarter of a mile, not quite half a mile—when the chief gunner shouted the Drake was a mile away. But the most important point of all is that no evidence is given as to the time which elapsed between the taking of the photos. The witness is asked: "How long an interval would be between the two photographs, do you think?" That question is never answered. But the witness is asked: "Is the churning up of the water in the second photograph due to the reversing of the engines?" He replies: "I do not know." Then he is asked: "It looks like it, does it not? You know more about the photographs than I do?" And he replies: "It is hard to say because it probably may have been made by the ship meeting up against the water as we were under a starboard helm." But the Drake herself was under a port helm. How the starboard helm of the Mendip Range would cause the churning shown at the stern of the Drake is a mystery to me. Now the Drake, the witness says, was about a quarter of a mile away when he took the first photo. At the rate of seven knots per hour, which is the speed of the Drake, as found by Roche, J., she would traverse one mile in $8\frac{4}{7}$ minutes and a quarter of a mile in $2\frac{1}{7}$ minutes. If the two ships were approaching each other end on, i.e., at seventeen knots per hour, as the Mendip Range's speed was ten knots they would traverse a mile in $3\frac{6}{17}$ minutes, a little more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ minutes, and a quarter of a mile in 52 seconds. Of course they were not approaching end on, but they were approaching to some extent sideways, and the inference I draw from these figures is that the second photo was taken in the very jaws of the collision after the Drake and the Mendip Range had each reversed their engines and gone full speed astern and the relative positions of the two ships had completely changed. Neither Gemmel nor any of the members of the crew who made the alleged remark to Potts were examined. Neither Roche, J. nor the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal appear to have attached any importance to these photographs. I think they were right in taking that course. For these reasons I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs.

Lord WRENBURY.—The construction of the rules relevant to this case is important for its decision, and I shall at the outset express my opinion upon it. Art. 19 provides that where steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve the risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other. Art. 21 provides that "Where by any of these rules one or two vessels is to keep out of the way the other shall keep her course and speed." These rules govern the movements of the keep-out-of-the-way (or giving-way) ship, and of the course and speed (or stand-on) ship. Art. 4 provides for the case of a ship "which from any accident is not under command." She is to indicate her condition by certain signals, and (d) other vessels are to accept them as signals showing them that she is "not under command and cannot therefore get out of the way." The whole effect of art. 4 is to relieve the ship not under command if she be the giving-way ship from the obligation of keeping out of the way. The rules say nothing as to any obligation then arising in the other ship to keep out of the way, but as a matter of seamanship if the one vessel is not able to get out of the way it is the duty of the other to do so. She is not, however, one which "by any of these rules is to keep out of the way" within art. 21. She owes a duty to keep out of the way of a ship which (being not under command) "cannot therefore get out of the way" within art. 4, but her duty in that respect arises not from anything in the rules, but from the duty of good seamanship and from the common law duty of not being negligent.

Then what is the duty of the ship not under command? She (if she was the keep-out-of-the-way or giving-way ship) is relieved from the duty of keeping out of the way (art. 4). But there is nothing in the rules to provide that she is to keep her course and speed—or, in other words, to become the stand-on ship. In the nature of things it would be unreasonable that the rules should provide that she should keep her course and speed, when ex hypothesi she is not under command and may not be in a position so to do. So far as the rules are concerned her duty also is undefined. Her duty arises apart from the rules, and is a duty not to be negligent, to use good seamanship, to do nothing to foil the other vessel in doing the duty which she, as above stated, now owes to keep out of the way.

To apply these observations to the present case. The Mendip Range, when she saw the two black balls of the Drake, was bound to know that the Drake was relieved of the obligation to keep out of the way, and that she (the Mendip Range) had to accept the responsibility of becoming that which otherwise she was not, namely, the keep out-of-the-way ship. The Drake, for her part, did not become a stand-on ship, but owed a duty which, so far as the rules are concerned, was not defined, but which was the duty of good seamanship and of not being negligent. She owed the duty not to do anything to obviate or annul or render dangerous the manœuvre, which the Mendip Range now owed the duty to make, to keep out of the way.

Importance was attached below to the question whether the Drake was really out of command—whether she acted rightly in hoisting the two black balls. It is a question which has no bearing in forming a judgment upon the manœuvres of the Mendip Range. By hoisting the signal the Drake had said that she was—and the Mendip Range was entitled and bound to assume that she was—not under command. As between the two ships the Drake must be taken to be that which she said she was. She was bound to play the part of the character which she had assumed. Her duty was not to foil the manœuvres of the Mendip Range.

It has been decided (and it is a cardinal fact in the case) that the Mendip Range was not to blame, the contention was technically open to the respondent, and he has not waived it. I have to start therefore with the established fact that the Mendip Range was right in starboarding, was right in continuing to starboard, and was right in being where she was and as she was when the collision took place. The whole question, therefore, is whether the Drake was to blame for so acting that she was at the moment of the collision found at the same place.

Roche, J. found that the Drake was not under effective port helm for anything like ten minutes before the collision. He does not, it is true, find affirmatively that she had during those ten minutes altered her helm, but he does find that "it was impossible that there could have been an effective porting for anything like the long period alleged." He finds that "at the time the vessels were at a distance of about a mile there had been no effective porting of the Drake from a course of south-west such as would be, was or ought to have been, apparent to those on board the Mendip Range. Our assessors tell us that looking at photograph No. 1 and judging by the apparent size of the Drake she was about a mile away when that photograph was taken. Up to that time, therefore, according to the learned judge's finding, there had been no effective porting on the part of the Drake. Our assessors also tell us that looking at photograph No. 2 and having regard to the speed, the time that must have elapsed between the two photographs must have been about a minute and a half. In photo No. 1 the funnels of the Drake are closed and from the Mendip Range they are seen in a continuous line showing their port sides. The motion of the Mendip Range would tend to keep the funnels closed and to cause them to tend to show their starboard sides. In other words the motion of the Mendip Range would tend to counteract the opening of the funnels showing their port sides. Notwithstanding this the Drake in (say) a minute and a half so altered her heading that the funnels were entirely open, showing their port sides. She had gone round to starboard through a right angle or a little more. This must have been a most effective port helm."

Bankes, L.J. does not find the same facts as Roche, J. He agrees with him that the action of the Drake under her port helm was not so appreciable as to throw any blame upon the master of the Mendip Range for not realising when he gave the order to starboard that he was starboarding to a vessel then already committed to a port helm. In other words he finds that the Drake was not in the earlier stage turning to starboard at anything like the rate at which she was turning in the last minute and a half. He also finds that there was no alteration in the helm of the Drake in the sense that anyone in charge of her gave any fresh helm orders. But he does not agree with the trial judge as to the Drake not being under effective port helm for ten minutes before the collision unless the word effective is to be understood as used for vindicating the Mendip Range rather than for indicating his view as to the action of the Drake. In my judgment Roche, J. plainly meant, as indeed he said, that the Drake had been discontinuously acting under port helm and that her story of an effective porting for anything like the time alleged was impossible. Bankes, L.J. believed and Roche, J. did not believe the Drake's story of a continuous circuit under a port helm to round Rue Point.

In this state of circumstances the question to be answered is whether the Drake so acted as to foil a proper manœuvre of the Mendip Range. It is a possible view of the matter that when a ship has declared herself to be not under command the other ship must be prepared for any extravagant and dangerous action on the part of the ship not under command for that she ought to contemplate that possibly the disabled ship cannot control her movements, and from the necessity of the case may do anything extraordinary. If this were so it might result that the Mendip Range ought to have contemplated that the Drake either because she could not control her helm or because she was in a sinking condition might be compelled to hug the shore, and that she (the Mendip Range) must act accordingly. But this consideration is not open. It is a consideration which if well founded would go to show the Mendip Range to be to blame, and she has been held not to blame, and no one has contended the contrary before us. What then caused the collision?—the answer must be that it was caused by the Drake porting to a ship which she knew was starboarding. That she knew it is not disputed. She did not, it is true, hear the sound signal given by the Mendip Range, but she saw the two whiffs of steam as the whistle was blown. Her helm was such as to cause her to go round through at least a right angle to starboard in the last minute and a half. Had her helm been even amidships when the first photograph was taken, there would have been no collision.

The question whether the Drake was right in declaring herself not to be under command is, as I have said, immaterial in my opinion in judging the Mendip Range. It is not necessarily immaterial in judging the Drake. She knew in what respects and to what extent she was not under command. She knew that she had an effective helm, but that it took time to give orders to the helm. She knew that she had the power, and she was using the power to take a course which she thought expedient, namely, a course to starboard to run round Rue Point into Church Bay. But by her signal of "not under command" she had told the Mendip Range that she was not a vessel who could command herself. The rules do not leave wholly undefined the meaning of "not under command," for those words are followed by the words "and cannot therefore get out of the way." The fact was that the Drake could and did command her course. She unfortunately so commanded it as to produce a collision by porting and continuing to port to a vessel which she knew was starboarding. She was misleading the Mendip Range by telling her that she (the Drake) could not command her course, while all the time she was commanding it. The appellant's case may be briefly stated thus: "You (the Drake) told me you were not under command. But your case is that you were under command in the material particular, that you could and did command your helm and deliberately steered a starboard course to round the Rue Point and get into Church Bay. By so doing you foiled my manœuvre to pass under your stern and so caused the collision." I do not see the answer to this contention.

I think the appeal should be allowed and the Drake held to blame.

Lord PHILLIMORE.—The first matter to be determined is whether or not H.M.S. Drake was right in hoisting the two black shapes as a signal that she was out of command and could not get out of the way.

On this point I feel in some difficulty. The primary step to be taken to get out of the way is to use your helm to turn the course of your ship; and this ship could, slowly perhaps, but still effectively, use her helm, as is shown by the fact that between the time of sighting the Mendip Range and the collision, she turned eight points or a right angle. Having regard to this fact and what was said by Lord Herschell with the approval of Lord Watson in the case of the P. Caland (68 L. T. Rep. 469; (1893) A. C. 207), if I were to act on my unguided judgment, I should say that this vessel was under command, but the great majority of nautical assessors who have advised the three tribunals, is of an opposite opinion, and the judges in the courts below have concurred with them; and this being so, I hesitate to advise your Lordships to act upon my uncorroborated opinion. Before, however, I pass from this point, I have to say that, with all respect for those who maintain the contrary, I cannot accept the contention which makes the test of the right and duty to hoist the black shapes, not the very truth of the case, but the opinion which the officer in charge of the damaged ship may form. Here it is to be observed that the rule does not give a licence or permission of which the officer in charge may or may not avail himself, but imposes a duty. If the ship is by any accident out of command, the officer must hoist the black shapes, and must thereby signal to other vessels that he cannot keep out of their way. The language of the rule is express that the condition of hoisting the black shapes is the fact and not the opinion of the fact, and this is the way that this very point was dealt with by the noble Lords who gave their opinion in the P. Caland. The opinion of the experienced nautical man that his ship was out of command is an element to be considered in arriving at the conclusion whether she was or was not, but has no further importance.

With these preliminary observations I propose to accept for the purpose of my opinion, the position that the Drake was right in hoisting the two black shapes. Perhaps I do so the more easily because it appears to me comparatively immaterial whether she was right or wrong in so doing. If she was right in intimating that she was a vessel out of command, she had to behave as such.

Now it has been said that with regard to the rest of the case, it is wholly a question of fact, as to which there have been concurrent findings in the two courts below, and therefore one upon which your Lordships would be exceedingly slow to form a different opinion. To me it is not a question of fact, but one of law.

For the purpose of deciding this case I am content to take as the only necessary materials (1) the agreed facts, (2) the evidence of the captain of the Drake, qualified only by the conclusions to be drawn from the photographs and the place of the collision, (3) coupled with the findings of both courts below that the Mendip Range was not to blame, and (4) the reasons for holding her not to blame.

Now the captain of the Drake, after describing how he had been torpedoed, and the injuries which he had received, and his original idea of going to Belfast, and his giving that up, says that he made a large sweep, nearly a circle under a starboard helm, thus bringing him heading to the southward. When he had finished this sweep under a starboard helm, he does not specifically state where he was with regard to Rue Point, but he must have been to the eastward of Rathlin Island, in the sense that he was not as far south as Rue Point; and this is confirmed by the evidence from the Martin, who picked the Drake up just east of Rue Point and found that she was at that time already heading south; and by the captain's own idea, though it is admittedly an incorrect one, of the place of the collision. He would therefore have to head for a time to the southward, till he got sufficiently south to clear the point and to be enabled to port to round it, and accordingly he says as one would expect, that after starboarding, he steadied as near as he could on a starboard course. He adds that when he first saw the Mendip Range his heading was south or south by west true. If therefore at that moment he was under a port helm he can only just have begun to be under it, because he was at that moment approximately on the course on which he steadied.

Parenthetically it may be observed that this heading which he gives for himself at that moment is the heading which the Mendip Range attributes to him when she first saw him, and that the distances and bearings as given by the two ships work out in substantial harmony.

Being thus heading approximately south by west and having only just begun, if at all, to swing under his port helm after he had steadied on a southerly course, he continues, generally speaking, under a port helm till the collision, and turns a right-angle. I have said "generally speaking," because Roche, J. thinks that it cannot have been a continuous port helm, but only such a port helm as would make that which the captain describes himself as wishing to make a wide sweep round Rue Point, so as to get into Church Bay, a manœuvre which, at any rate with a sound ship, would not be accomplished by a continuous port helm, but would require a porting, an easing, a porting, an easing, and so forth action. On the other hand, the Court of Appeal has accepted his statement to the effect that there was one order to port 20 degrees, never varied or checked till just the moment before the collision, when the helm was put amidships. I am, though sceptical, even prepared to accept this statement, only it must be coupled with the agreed facts, which are that in the quarter of an hour or twenty minutes which the captain says elapsed from first sighting the Mendip Range to the collision she had not turned more than a right-angle, and had not turned so short as to defeat her intention of rounding the Point, but came into collision almost due south of the Point, and at least half a mile, if not more, from it, and that, as the photographs show, the alteration at the last was rapid and considerable. leaving, therefore, comparatively little alteration to be made in the first stages. I may add that on the findings of both courts, and the statement by counsel for the respondent before your Lordships, that he was not going to invite you to say that the Mendip Range was to blame, the porting during the earlier stages must have been so gradual and so slight as to be imperceptible. Otherwise the Mendip Range would have been to blame. either for starboarding or for continuing to starboard.

If it be the case, as suggested for the Drake, that the operation of passing the orders was slow, and the operation of complying with the order and getting the wheel over was slow also, it may be thought that if the captain of the Drake had just given the order to port 20 degrees when he saw the Mendip Range, she would not have turned more than to the extent that she did, even under a continuous port helm, and therefore it might be possible to accept, as the Court of Appeal has done, the statement of the captain of the Drake with hardly any or with no qualification.

Now one has to consider whether this continuous porting, developing as it did, was right. When the two vessels first sighted each other the Drake had not her black shapes up; and if she had any particular vessel in her mind for which she put them up it must have been the Mendip Range. If she had not put up the black shapes the officer in charge of the Mendip Range would have acted upon the rule with regard to crossing steamships, which imposed upon the Drake the duty of getting out of the way, and he would have expected her to get out of the way by porting, his duty would have been to have kept on his course and he would have kept on it. There would have been no collision, and the porting of the helm of the Drake in order to reach Church Bay and the porting to avoid the Mendip Range would have coincided. As it was, however, the Drake, having put up the black shapes, the officer in charge of the Mendip Range thought, and has been held to be justified in thinking, that it was his duty to get out of the way of the Drake, and thought also, and has been held to be justified in thinking, that with the directions of art. 22 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea before him his proper course was to get out of the way by avoiding crossing the head of the Drake, that is to say by starboarding. This manœuvre was defeated by the Drake, I will not say porting, but, I will say in her favour, continuing under a port helm. This continuance, however, under a port helm was so gradual, in the view of the courts below, so imperceptible till the last, that there was no negligence on the Mendip Range in not observing it, and therefore the collision happened. Now if the Drake had not put up her black shapes and had continued under her port helm there would have been no collision. If, having put up her black shapes, she had relaxed her port helm and kept or even approximately kept the heading at which she was on when these vessels first came in sight of each other there would have been no collision. It was the unfortunate coincidence of these two things that brought it about.
