Both courts below have found the facts as I have described them, but have nevertheless held the Drake not in fault. Roche, J., on the ground, as I understand him, that the porting and continuing to port of the Drake was not a manœuvre taken under the regulations to avoid the Mendip Range, but a course of navigation taken on her own account and irrespective of the Mendip Range, to reach her destination. But when the rules provide that a ship shall keep her course—I except cases where the vessels are travelling in a river or narrow channel with sinuous banks—they mean that she shall keep her compass heading till the danger has gone by. Otherwise the other ship could not know what manœuvre to take to avoid her. The Drake was not carrying a huge board with a notice that she was going round Rue Point or signalling by flags that she was. Those on board the Mendip Range had no reason to think that she was. The master thought that she had been injured, but that she was making for Ballycastle Bay on the mainland, which would have meant the Drake keeping on to the southward and not porting. If a ship, however, injured and in a haste to get to a place of safety manœuvres in a manner that would not have been expected in the presence of another vessel, that will probably happen which did in this case. The Court of Appeal decided upon very sweeping grounds. Bankes, L.J. and Scrutton, L.J. appear to have held that a vessel out of command is under no duty except to notify that she is such. That, if she can manage it, she can port or starboard, go ahead or astern, as suits her convenience, and all other vessels must give her the widest berth. It is a preliminary comment upon this view that their Lordships should have been logical and held the Mendip Range to blame. But there is a more serious observation.

It was observed by one of your Lordships that there is no article in the regulations directing the navigation by two ships approaching one another so as to involve risk of collision when one is out of command and is showing the proper signals. But as the phrase "out of command" is explained in the regulations as meaning out of command so that she cannot get out of the way, it is obvious that if a risk of collision be imminent, and a collision is to be avoided, the other vessel must get out of the way; and if her duty be not one specifically imposed by the regulations it certainly is to be inferred from them. If it is not specifically imposed it may also be the case that art. 21, "Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed" does not also specifically apply, and if it is not under the rules that the uninjured ship is to keep out of the way there may be no article requiring the broken-down vessel to keep her course. But just as rules of good seamanship and the inference from the regulations require the other vessel to keep out of the way of the broken-down one, so they require the broken-down one not to defeat the action of the other ship; and the only way in which she can be certain of not defeating it is by keeping her course, meaning by that the direct line of her compass heading at the time when the vessels ought to begin to act for each other. I am not speaking of cases where a ship owing to her broken-down condition cannot keep her course and will yaw about. Such a ship is to be excused and any approaching vessel should give her a sufficiently wide berth to avoid any danger from a yaw. But if a ship, because she hoists the broken-down signals, is to be enabled voluntarily to alter her course as much as she likes even to the extent of a right angle, regardless of other ships which have to navigate for her, all that is to be said is that she becomes a chartered libertine. "Faenum habet in cornu. Longe fuge." She is a mad animal, from which all other ships must flee.

In my view the Drake should be held to blame and alone to blame for this collision.

MOUNTAIN v. WHITTLE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL, ENGLAND.

Marine Insurance — Time policy on houseboat at anchor—Liberty to shift—"Including all risk of docking"—Houseboat lost while being towed to dock—Abandonment of insured adventure.

The respondent insured his houseboat, the D., by a time policy "whilst anchored in a creek off Netley, however employed, with liberty to shift." The policy contained a clause, "Including all risk of docking, undocking, changing docks, and going on gridirons, or graving docks, as may be required during the currency of this policy." During the currency of the policy he wished to have the D. cleaned, and she was taken from the river Hamble up Southampton Water to a yard on the Itchen (a distance of about seven miles), which was the nearest and most convenient yard. The D. was lashed alongside a tug, and thus towed up the Itchen, and on arrival it was found that some of the side seams above the water-line were defective, and the bow wave made by the tug raised the water to the level of the defective seams, with the result that water entered and she sank. The respondent did not know that the seams were defective, and the towage was performed in the manner usual in Southampton Water. At the time when the houseboat left the Hamble the respondent did not intend to take her back during the currency of the policy but to lay her up in the Itchen.

On an action on the policy brought by the respondent: Held, that the taking of the houseboat to the yard was authorised by the docking clause in the policy, and therefore the vessel was covered when the loss occurred; that the vessel was lost through a peril of the sea; and the respondent had not at the time of the loss abandoned the insured adventure.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 534; 122 L. T. Rep. 300; (1920) 1 K. B. 447) affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendant, an underwriter at Lloyd's, from an order of the Court of Appeal (reported 122 L. T. Rep. 300; (1920) 1 K. The action was brought on a time policy of marine insurance on the respondent's houseboat Dorothy, which was lost under circumstances that sufficiently appear from the headnote and the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

After consideration their Lordship's dismissed the appeal.

Lord BIRKENHEAD, L.C.—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal dated the 7th Nov. 1919, affirming the judgment of Bailhache, J. in favour of the respondent.

The respondent's claim was for a partial loss under a policy of insurance subscribed by the appellant and covering the houseboat Dorothy.

The issues which require decision are, in general, whether the damage sustained by the Dorothy was caused by a peril insured against and whether the Dorothy was covered by the policy at the time of the loss.

The facts are simple and may be shortly stated. The Dorothy was bought by the appellant in the summer of 1915, fitted out as a houseboat, and used as a residence for himself and his family. In Jan. 1918, she was let to Messrs. James, a firm of contractors who had undertaken to raise a sunken vessel, and who required accommodation for the men engaged in this task. Messrs. James towed the Dorothy to the Hamble River, where she remained with their men on board till the early autumn of 1918, when they gave up possession in pursuance of a notice from the respondent dated the 22nd June. When the workmen left, the Dorothy, being in a dirty condition, required cleansing and renovation before the respondent could reoccupy her. The necessary repairs required that she should be docked and put on the gridiron. Messrs. Camper and Nicholson's yard at Northam, about seven and a half miles away, was the nearest place where the Dorothy could be docked. There was no place nearer or more suitable.

The respondent had engaged a small tug called The Test to tow the Dorothy to the repairing yard above-mentioned, but at the appointed time The Test broke down and the deputy dockmaster sent the tug Dorrington, a much larger and more powerful tug, to tow the Dorothy. The contention was abandoned before your Lordships that the method of towage adopted was unusual or unseamanlike. But during the towage the unusual height of the breast wave, thrown up by the Dorrington and the Dorothy together, caused the water to reach the top-side seams of the Dorothy, invade the interior through the seams, and cause the Dorothy to sink shortly after her arrival off the gridiron at Messrs. Camper and Nicholson's yard.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants; first that there was no clear finding of fact that the cause of the casualty was the unusual height of the breast wave, or indeed that the breast wave was unusually high, and it was contended further that, if there were such findings, there was no evidence upon which they could properly be found. In my opinion these contentions fail. Commander Whittle, in his evidence, speaks of the heavy wash of both vessels. Mr. Simey, who argued the case for the appellants extremely well, admitted, what indeed is obvious, that the larger the tug, the greater the resultant wave, and he could not dispute, having regard to the evidence, that the tug actually employed was of disproportionate size and power. The judgments below seem to me to embody the necessary conclusion of fact in reasonably clear language. Bailhache, J. expresses himself as follows: "I am satisfied that what happened was that the breast wave, the bow wave from the Dorrington, raised the level of the water and caused the water to reach these leaky and defective seams. . . . It must be borne in mind that there was a rather unusual danger about this particular operation by reason of the comparative size and power of the Dorrington as compared with this houseboat." Bankes, L.J. used language even plainer: "It seems to me that the unusual height of this breast wave caused by using this very powerful tug to tow this houseboat in the way in which she was towed, may properly be called an unexpected occurrence, and properly be found as it has been found by the learned judge, to be a peril of the sea."

It should be added to this short statement of the facts, that the Dorothy was found, and rightly found, to be unseaworthy on the ground that her seams above the water side were leaky and defective. But the policy was a time policy and therefore the unseaworthiness of the vessel of itself afforded no defence to the claim. Nor was it contended that the defence under sect. 39 (5) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, was open to the appellant, as it could not be and was not shown that the respondent was aware of the vessel's unseaworthiness.

The questions which arise upon these facts, and upon those submissions of the parties which survive the argument, are the following: (1) Was the loss caused by a peril insured against? (2) Was the Dorothy covered by the policy during the shifting from her anchorage to Camper and Nicholson's yard for the purpose of docking and being put on the gridiron? (3) Had the insured adventure been abandoned?

In order to answer these questions, it is necessary to consider the terms of the policy. This instrument was dated the 19th Aug. 1918, and was expressed to be for the space of six calendar months, commencing the 14th July 1918 and ending the 14th Jan. 1919, for 400*l.* on hull and material, machinery and boilers of the vessel Dorothy "whilst anchored in a creek off Netley, however employed, with liberty to shift." The words just quoted are typed at the beginning of the printed form. Additional clauses are annexed to the instrument in print, while at its foot is stamped a short clause to the following effect: "Including all risk of docking, undocking, changing docks and going on gridiron or graving docks as may be required during the currency of this policy." The perils insured against were perils usual in a Lloyd's policy, including perils of the seas.

I have made it plain that there are concurrent findings of fact in the courts below to the effect that the unusual size of the breast wave either caused the entry of the sea water or effectively contributed to its entry. I see no reason for differing from these findings, and I adopt them as the basis of the conclusion which I have reached. In my opinion, the nature of this wave constituted a "sea peril." The elements which are necessary to form a sea peril have frequently been collected and explained in this House. But it is no longer necessary, unless for the purposes of illustration, to go further than the statutory provisions of the Marine Insurance Act; that the term "perils of the seas" refers only to fortuitous accidents or casualties of the seas, and does not include ordinary action of winds or waves. In my opinion, the incidence and dimensions of the wave in question amounted to a fortuitous casualty of the seas and were not accounted for merely by the ordinary action of winds or waves. Upon the first point, therefore, I reach the conclusion that the loss was caused by a peril insured against.

It is in the next place contended that the Dorothy was only protected whilst anchored in a creek off Netley; that there was a deviation; and that she was unprotected at the moment of the casualty.

It is worth noticing that the parties apparently acquiesced in the view that the Hamble River, though not in fact a "creek off Netley," was to be treated as though it were. The appellants, however, disputed the reasonableness of founding upon this agreement a more extensive construction of the words "in a creek off Netley" than they would naturally bear. For the purpose of this opinion I draw no general inference from the tacit agreement to vary in this particular the scope of the original policy.

The respondent contended that two clauses of the policy extended its scope sufficiently for his purposes. In the first place he points out that he is given "liberty to shift." In the second place he relies upon the docking clause which I have already set out. Bailhache, J. has found in his favour on the shifting facility, but against him on the docking clause. The Court of Appeal reversing this conclusion rejected his submission upon the first point, but decided in his favour upon the docking clause.

I agree with the view of the Court of Appeal.

I think that the words "with liberty to shift" are to be construed as an extension of the scope of the policy, which would otherwise only protect the vessel while it was actually anchored in the creek. In other words, if the freedom to shift had not been stipulated for the vessel would have been unprotected during the innumerable small movements which circumstances may from time to time have required. I do not think that the words were intended to cover a voyage of seven or eight miles to a different part of the coast.

But the docking clause must be determined in reference to quite other considerations. In the first place it must be given a clear meaning. Counsel for the appellant attempted to attenuate its importance by pointing out that it was merely a stamped clause. I find myself quite unable in any case in which the circumstances are not altogether singular to treat some clauses of a contract as of primary and others as of secondary validity. The clause either is part of the contract or it is not. If it is, it must be construed in the same way as any other clause. It may sometimes be necessary in cases where the clauses of an instrument appear on the face of them to be contradictory to admit speculative appraisements of their comparative weight. But these ought always to be undertaken with hesitation, and applied with extreme caution. In the present case we are to give a meaning to a clause which protects the insured vessel against all risk of docking, changing docks, and going on the gridiron. It is conceded that there is no dock and no gridiron in the Hamble River or in any creek off Netley. But it is nevertheless contended by the appellants that in spite of the plain language of the clause protection ceased the moment the Dorothy left the Hamble River for Camper and Nicholson's yard at Northam, in other language that the words "now anchored in a creek off Netley" so completely dominate the whole policy as to override the docking clause altogether. I cannot accept this contention. No reasonable meaning can be given to the docking clause, unless it is construed as extending the protection to the course of a voyage to a dock or gridiron such as a reasonable owner might, under all the circumstances of the case, be expected to employ and be justified in employing. I am not impressed by the arguments used in order to illustrate the supposed extravagant consequences of this construction. If an insurer extends the protection of the vessel insured to a voyage for the purpose of docking the vessel, he may be expected to acquaint himself with the measure of his liability by ascertaining where docks are reasonably to be found and how far the "changing docks and going on gridiron" to which he has assented will increase his liability, and ought to be reflected in the rate to be charged. For these reasons I am of opinion that the second question must equally be answered in favour of the respondent.

The only remaining point may be very shortly dismissed. It is contended for the appellant that the insured adventure had been abandoned. This contention is founded upon the evidence of the respondent at p. 45 of the Record. Commander Whittle there stated that it was his intention to spend the winter living on board the Dorothy at Northam, thereby (so it is claimed) abandoning altogether his anchorage in a "creek off Netley." It is sufficient upon this point to observe that it is not alleged that such an intention was ever communicated to the insurers; that it is not contended that the respondent did any act which made his intention irrevocable; and that it is extremely improbable that he would have reached, without any consideration whatever, a decision which might conceivably have deprived him of a protection which in certain contingencies he might still need and for which he was bound to pay.

I am of opinion that the appeal fails on every ground and that it ought to be dismissed.

I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord CAVE desires me to say he concurs in the opinion I have just read.

Lord HALDANE.—I have also had the advantage of previously seeing the proof of the opinion delivered by the Lord Chancellor. I concur in the conclusion at which my noble and learned friend has arrived, and there is nothing that I desire to add.

Lord FINLAY.—The action in this case was brought upon a policy of marine insurance on the Dorothy, a houseboat, to recover for a partial loss by perils of the seas alleged to have been sustained during the currency of the policy.

The policy was expressed to be for six calendar months, commencing the 14th July 1918 and ending the 13th Jan. 1919, "whilst anchored in a creek off Netley, however employed, with liberty to shift." It covered perils of the seas and contained the following clause: "Including all risks of docking, undocking, changing decks and going on gridiron or graving docks, as may be required during the currency of this policy."

The Dorothy had been lying in the Hamble River on Southampton Water. She belonged to the plaintiff, Commander Whittle, and had been used by him as a dwelling-house for himself and his family, but for some months before the 21st Sept. 1918 had been occupied with his leave by the workmen employed in some urgent work on Southampton Water. He desired to resume occupation of the houseboat, and finding that she was not in a fit state for habitation by himself and his family he arranged that she should be towed up to Messrs. Camper and Nicholson's yard at Northam on the River Itchen to be thoroughly cleaned and re-painted. A small tug, The Test, had been engaged for the towage, but owing to an accident The Test could not come, and a much bigger tug, the Dorrington, was sent instead. The master of the Dorrington lashed the Dorothy alongside the tug. Bailhache, J. before whom the case was tried, found that she was lashed alongside in the ordinary way with fenders to keep her off from the tug and fastened ahead and astern. On arriving at Northam, eight miles off, it was found that a great deal of water had entered the Dorothy during the voyage. At Northam the Dorothy was cast off from the tug, and made further water until she sank.

The damages claimed were 400*l.* for partial loss in consequence of the sinking and 148*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* under the suing and labouring clause. Bailhache, J. gave judgment for 548*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.* accordingly, and the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from his judgment by the underwriters. Three questions arise upon this appeal: (1) Whether the Dorothy was covered by the policy at the time of the loss; (2) whether the policy was abandoned; and (3) whether the loss was by perils of the sea.

1. The underwriters contend on the present appeal that the insurance covered the Dorothy only while anchored in the Hamble River and while shifting within the limits of the Hamble River, and that they are not liable as the loss took place while she was proceeding up the Southampton Water on her way to the Itchen.

It is by no means easy to put a definite meaning upon the expression in the policy "whilst anchored in a creek off Netley." The underwriters assert that the Hamble River had been selected as the creek off Netley where the Dorothy was to lie at anchor, and that the shifting clause gave power to shift only within the limits of the Hamble River. The assured, on the other hand, contends that the insurance applied to the Dorothy while in any creek off Netley and that the shifting clause covered her while moving from one such creek to another.

The expression "a creek off Netley" taken by itself seems equally applicable or equally inapplicable to the Hamble River and to the Itchen. There was no evidence given of any special meaning attributed by usage to this expression. What is clear is that both sides regarded this expression as covering the Hamble River. Bailhache, J. must have regarded it as covering also the Itchen. He decided that the Dorothy was covered by the shifting clause at the time of the loss. The liberty to shift must be to shift within the limits of the policy, and could not cover the Dorothy unless she was shifting to a place which the policy would cover. Bailhache, J. was of opinion that the Dorothy would not have been covered at the time of the loss by the "docking and undocking" clause.

The Court of Appeal did not agree with Bailhache, J. that the shifting clause covered the Dorothy at the time of the loss, as they were not prepared to hold that shifting to the Itchen would be within the terms of the policy. It is not necessary for your Lordships to decide between the views taken on this point in the Court of Appeal and in the court of first instance respectively. In my opinion the Court of Appeal were clearly right in holding that, whether the shifting clause did or did not apply, the Dorothy was covered by what has been termed the docking and undocking clause.

It was argued for the underwriters that the liberty to dock, &c., must be confined to doing so within the limits of the Hamble River, and that the Dorothy could not go on gridiron or graving dock unless it was situate within these limits. As there are no such conveniences in the Hamble River this construction would prevent the clause from having any operation whatever in the case of the present policy. I cannot so construe its terms. In my opinion this clause applies whether the dock or gridiron was itself within or without the limits of the policy protecting the Dorothy while anchored, and it would also cover the vessel while proceeding to the dock or gridiron and while returning from it. If this view be correct it follows that the Dorothy was covered while she was proceeding up the Southampton Water to the gridiron at Northam, even if the policy would not have applied to the Dorothy if anchored in the Itchen. The conclusion arrived at by the Court of Appeal upon this clause seems to me to be right on the natural meaning of the words, and to be in conformity with the decision in Pearson v. The Commercial Union Assurance Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; 35 L. T. Rep. 445; 1 App. Cas. 498). It would very much restrict the operation of such a clause if the vessel could not go to any graving dock or gridiron beyond the limits covered by the policy for ordinary purposes. In the present case there was no place nearer or more suitable for taking the vessel to than Camper and Nicholson's yard.

2. A second point was made by the defendants with reference to the voyage to the Itchen. It appears from the evidence that the practice of Commander Whittle had been that the Dorothy should be laid up during the winter in Camper and Nicholson's yard, and that his family should live on board her there, and he said that it was his intention to do the same during the winter, which was approaching at the time when this loss was sustained. He said that he meant to re-decorate her and then live on board. The defendants contend that Camper and Nicholson's yard at Northam was beyond the limits of the policy. On this point it is not necessary for your Lordships' House to express any opinion. Even if Camper and Nicholson's yard were beyond the limits of the policy, so that keeping the vessel anchored there would have amounted to an abandonment of the policy, Commander Whittle, whatever he intended, had not communicated any such intention to the underwriters, and was absolutely at liberty to change his mind. He might, as soon as the decoration was completed, have taken the vessel back to the Hamble River if he were tempted to do so by specially fine weather. The mere fact that he had a certain intention in his own mind cannot amount to an election which would affect him as between himself and the underwriters.

I agree with both courts below in thinking that this point entirely fails.

3. There remains for consideration the question whether the loss was by perils of the seas.

It appears that the Dorothy was not seaworthy owing to some opening of the top side seams. As the policy was a time policy there was no warranty of seaworthiness and there is nothing to show that Commander Whittle was aware of the unseaworthiness. It is, however, necessary for the assured to establish that the loss was due to a peril of the seas. If the water was in a normal condition and got into the houseboat simply owing to the defective character of the seams there would be no loss by peril of the seas—the loss would have been by the defective condition of the vessel. A loss caused by the entrance of sea water is not necessarily a loss by perils of the seas. There must be some special circumstance, such as heavy waves causing the entrance of the sea water, to make it a peril of the seas. Was there such a peril here? Both Bailhache, J. and the Court of Appeal find that there was, and upon the evidence I cannot doubt that they were right. It seems to be quite clear that the Dorothy was exposed to a wash of an extraordinary character from the great size and power of the Dorrington, the tug to which she was lashed. The breast wave so occasioned amounted to a peril of the seas just as much as if it had been occasioned by a high wind. No attempt was made on behalf of the underwriters to show that the water would have made its way into the houseboat to the same extent if the wash and breast wave had been normal. The wash occasioned by passing vesels at sea may constitute a peril of the seas if of an extraordinary character, and if the wash here was occasioned by something abnormal in the strength and size of the tug or the mode of towage it was equally a peril of the sea. The fact that it was due to some negligence in the management of the vessel on the part of those to whom the owner had confided her does not prevent such an accident being covered by the policy.

Bailhache, J. and the three judges in the Court of Appeal all agree in finding that there was an abnormally high breast wave caused by the size and strength of the tug to which the houseboat was lashed, and that this breast wave was responsible for the water reaching and entering through the defective seams. Apart altogether from the effect to be given to the concurrent findings of the two courts it appears to me upon perusal of the evidence that these findings were manifestly right, and that the appeal fails also upon this point.

I am therefore of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord SUMNER.—The subject matter of this time policy is the houseboat Dorothy, however, though not wherever, employed, for she is covered only "while anchored in a creek off Netley," with liberty to shift and with such other liberty as is involved in the docking clause.

"In a creek off Netley" limits the area within which the Dorothy is to be insured. What then is this area? The word is not "at" or "opposite"; and to speak of something being "off" a point on shore is very vague. The word "off" is not to be measured only by the distance straight off shore to the exclusion of the waters up or down the estuary. There is a further indefiniteness. Most creeks in the south of England have names; this creek is nameless. Moreover, is it the houseboat or the creek that is to be "off" Netley? I can only say that I do not know when a creek, which is itself an indentation in or on a shore, can properly be said to be off that shore.

At the date of the policy the Dorothy was actually at anchor in the River Hamble. The underwriters forebore to argue at the trial that, if so, she was not "anchored in a creek off Netley." Not that there was any agreement between the parties that the River Hamble was such a creek, though I think it would probably have been so held, but the point was not taken. The underwriters may have thought that to such a contention a claim for rectification would be a successful answer, for, if not, the policy never attached. At any rate, the policy is now to be construed as it stands, and not as if it had been expressed "while anchored in the River Hamble."

When the Dorothy sustained the loss sued for she was off Messrs. Campion and Nicholson's yard on the River Itchen and was still in tow, that is she was too far from Netley to be "off Netley" or "in a creek off Netley," and further, was not at anchor. Was she then exercising her liberty to shift? I think not. Whatever the area be within which she was laid up, it is within that area that she can shift, and not beyond it. Liberty to shift is not unlimited liberty to cruise or to anchor wherever the owner likes. The liberty must be confined to the limits of the lying up, to which the liberty to shift is ancillary.

What then is the effect of including "all risk of docking . . . changing docks and going on gridiron as may be required" during the six months covered? As an addition to the perils insured against it may be that these words have no effect on the area within which those risks are to be incurred; but so read, the words are idle, for there are no docks, graving docks or gridirons in any creek off Netley. No one supposd that there were. However urgently docking might be required, the Dorothy on this construction would be at owner's risk on passing the indeterminate limit of her laid-up area, and her owner might have to choose, and quickly too, between sinking at anchor in a creek at underwriters' risk or towing to a gridiron elsewhere at his own. This is not a practical view to take of the matter.

Further, risk of docking and undocking in any case includes some navigation outside the dock, the proximity involved being a question of fact. A fortiori is this true of "changing docks," and this involves a still wider area outside of any dock. If so much navigation outside of any dock is implied, because otherwise the clause would defeat its own object, I see no difficulty in implying that she was covered during the two or three miles at most by which she departed from her "creek off Netley." I do not understand it to be contested that she would have been covered while going from her anchorage to the gridiron, if there had been one within the area of the insurance, though that would have been implied from the docking clause, since the shifting would not be from anchorage to anchorage. Of course, this clause would not hold her covered while going to any dock, however far off or under whatever alteration of circumstances; but here the dock lay but a short distance beyond the limit, the passage was through similar waters, involving no different kind of risk from that of the passage within the specified area, and the ancillary character of this addition is strictly preserved. Even the point that in dry dock or on gridiron the craft is not waterborne is not enough to make the risk wholly dissimilar, for the houseboat, grounding at ebb-tide, might run much the same risk of being wrung as if unskilfully put on a gridiron or in dry dock. The clause is not a new and independent insurance, but is in support of the laid-up or port risk. As she was not in a port at all, except perhaps in the administrative sense, if the clause did not entitle her to go to Messrs. Campion and Nicholson's yard, it meant nothing.

The underwriters argue that it did mean nothing; yet it is a part of the contract. It is not part of the old form of Lloyd's policy; it is purposely added, however humble the hand by which it is stamped on the policy, and however much it is a matter of course to do so with laid-up risks. There is no evidence of any usage; no suggestion of mistake; no counter-claim to rectify the policy by striking it out. The fact that it is added to the form when the blanks are filled in and the form is made up for signature as a contract, shows that the words are words of contract, to which effect is to be given, if that can reasonably be done. Even if the docking clause were now part of the Lloyd's form, in this connection they would be part of this contract, for docking may be as needful to a laid-up vessel as to one making voyages. There are some expressions in this form of policy which have no application to this risk, such as the liberty to touch and stay. This results from expressing a laid-up risk for time on a voyage form. Similar results always follow from expressing insurances on ship alone on a Lloyd s form, which is also used for insurances on goods. Some words in the common form are always found to have no application to the insurance actually effected. Everyone who is at all familiar with the way in which insurance policies are and long have been framed in practice and have always been interpreted in the courts for a century and more before this policy, must know that an attempt to construe a ship risk by reference to words which really belong to the goods form, is to disregard, and not to give effect to, the intention of the parties, but such is not the case here. The docking clause can have some meaning here; the only question is what that meaning is.

Two matters of fact alone remain, namely, (1) was there evidence of a loss by perils insured against, and (2) had the insured adventure been abandoned by the assured before loss? As to the first, the decision of Bailhache, J. was affirmed by the Court of Appeal, and I should not myself presume to differ from the conclusions of four authorities so learned and so experienced in this subject as Bailhache, J. and Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ., and I think there was clearly evidence on which they could so find. In fact, my own conclusion would be the same, for the bow wave must have been indeed an exceptional one for 4ft. of water in 100 minutes' towing at a moderate speed to have been forced through seams which were not open enough to have attracted attention, and sinking by such a wave seems to me a fortuitous casualty; whether formed by passing steamers or between tug and tow, it was beyond the ordinary action of wind and wave, or the ordinary incidents of such towage.

I also think that the adventure was not abandoned in fact. What deviation would be as applied to this insurance I do not know, but, apart from the assured's being free to change his mind, I think he only meant that he did not intend to take the Dorothy back to the Hamble River, not that he did not intend that she should be anchored again "in a creek off Netley" at all during the residue of the term insured. The appellant s argument assumed that the policy was to be treated as if it had been expressed simply "whilst anchored in the Hamble River." I therefore agree that the appeal fails.

THE EDNA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize—Neutral ship—Purchase from enemy—Claim for damages for deterioration while commandeered by Crown — Validity and competency of sale—Declaration of London 1909, art. 56.

Prior to the outbreak of war with Germany in 1914 a vessel which was registered in a neutral country N. was transferred to a company in a neutral country M., and registered in M. She was in fact of German character and rendered services to a German cruiser in the supply of coal and in other respects. She, however, took no direct part in hostilities, and was not in the employment of the German Government nor under the control of an agent placed on board by that Government. In Oct. 1915 she was bought bonâ fide and paid for by a neutral firm and her name changed. She was seized during her new ownership by a British cruiser and afterwards requisitioned by the Crown.

Held, that the purchase was valid and complete as the vessel could not be regarded as having been an auxiliary to the German fleet so as to be subject to the disability of transfer attaching to warships.

Held, further, on a cross-appeal, that the captors were not liable for damages or costs in respect of the seizure, since there was substantial ground for questioning the neutral character of the ship, and the claimants' case had been supported by flagrantly false affidavits which rendered a judicial inquiry necessary; and that in any case the claimants were not entitled to an account of profits earned by the vessel while under requisition.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—These are consolidated appeals from a decree of Lord Sterndale, P. ordering the release of the Edna. Her owners, the claimants, ask for costs and damages as well: the Crown asks for condemnation.

The Edna changed hands and flags and names several times in about eighteen months. Before March 1914 she was the Jason, a Norwegian ship belonging to the Aktieselskabet Dampskibet Jason. Then a Mexican company, the Lloyd Mexicano Societa Anonyma, bought her, and she became the Mazatlan on the Mexican register. The moving spirit in this transaction was a German named Friedrich Jebsen, who had incorporated the Lloyd Mexicano. His interest in its capital was so preponderant and his control over it and the Mazatlan was so complete that she thereby became a ship of enemy character on the outbreak of the war. The learned President's finding of this fact is not now contested. In Oct. 1914 the Mazatlan was requisitioned as a military transport in Mexican waters by persons acting on behalf of a Government, whether existing de facto or de jure, on some part of the Pacific coast of Mexico, and they had possession of her for about a year. Meantime there was in San Francisco a company called the International Banking Corporation, managed by a Mr. Wilson, which had lent money to the Lloyd Mexicano in 1913 and 1914, and a company called the Executive Company had also been in existence there since 1907, which was not a shipowning company, whatever else it may have been, and had a paid up capital of only $300. In Feb. 1915 Jebsen agreed to sell the Mazatlan to this Executive Company for $1000 down and $114,000 payable by instalments, when the ship could be got out of Mexican hands and delivered at San Franciso. While awaiting that event the Executive Company by amending its articles took powers to own a ship and manage her. Not satisfied with this, Jebsen in May founded a company in San Franciso called the Western Pacific Steamship Company, with the above-mentioned Mr. Wilson as its treasurer. In April the Lloyd Mexicano transferred the ownership of the Mazatlan to him for a purported consideration of $115,000 then paid, and in July he re-transferred her to this Western Pacific Steamship Company for a nominal consideration of $10. He was also allotted all the last-named company's share capital except three shares of $100 each. Somehow or other the authorities in Mexico who had control of the Mazatlan were then induced to release her. If, as is probable, somebody had to be paid a consideration for this purpose, the money seems to have come, not from the Executive Company or the Western Pacific Steamship Company, but from the International Banking Corporation.

In Oct. 1915 the Mazatlan, still flying the Mexican flag, returned to San Francisco. By this time an agreement had been arrived at with the present claimants, a firm of United States citizens carrying on business there, for the purchase of the vessel at the price of $125,000, and eventually a bill of sale in their favour from the Executive Company was duly executed and recorded. They received possession of the ship, changed her name to the Edna, placed her on the United States Register of Shipping, and paid over their purchase money, of which the Executive Company got $11,000 and the Lloyd Mexicano $114,000. Fifty thousand dollars of this were promptly remitted to Germany on Jebsen's account. The Edna thereafter traded under charter for the benefit of the claimants till Jan. 1916, when she was captured at sea by H.M.S. Newcastle. She was afterwards duly requisitioned for the use of His Majesty by order of the Prize Court.

How the Mexican steamship Mazatlan became in 1915 the United States steamship Edna would have involved a critical examination were it not that the Crown does not now dispute that the claimants bought and paid for the ship in entire good faith. This view was only adopted at a late stage. After a member of the claimants' firm had been eventually called as a witness at the trial and had been cross-examined, the advisers of the Crown confessed themselves satisfied. Accordingly two grounds only are now relied on for the captors, both going to the validity of the title acquired by the claimants —first, that such a transfer cannot be valid unless the claimants show that not only they but also their transferor acted in good faith, that is, without any purpose of defeating the belligerent rights of the Crown; second, that in the autumn of 1914 the Mazatlan was not only a ship of enemy character, but also stood in such a relation to the enemy Government that during the war no transfer of her at all would be competent or recognisable in a Court of Prize.

It is not enough to show that she was then engaged in carrying contraband of war or in rendering services to His Majesty's enemies, which, if followed sufficiently closely by capture, would have made her liable to condemnation in spite of her Mexican registry. Many months had passed since the autumn of 1914 before she was seized, and that chapter in her adventures had long been closed. Of course, if she still bore an enemy character in Jan. 1916, that in itself made her good prize, but neutrals like the claimants are entitled to purchase and take delivery of a private enemy merchantman in a neutral port, and if the transaction is complete and without reservation, as this transaction was, it stands and the ship is thereafter neutral. Accordingly the curious intervention of the companies above described between Jebsen and the claimants before the Mazatlan was sold in 1915 and her adventures in 1914 are relied on as showing the imperative reasons which Jebsen had for getting rid of her, and the consequence is said to be that while his object was to defeat the capture, which he knew to await her, that object was itself defeated by the fact that she had been in 1914 part of the enemy's resources for war.

There is evidence given by Admiral Sir W. R. Hall, then director of the Intelligence Division of the Admiralty, that: "Before the outbreak of the present war the German Government had made plans and arrangements whereby at various ports on the western coast of North and South America merchant ships were to be provided to act as fleet auxiliaries to the German cruisers operating in the Pacific." And it is contended that Jebsen was a German agent, who arranged that the Mazatlan should so act. No definition is given of a "fleet auxiliary," nor is it shown to be a term of art. It does not appear to have been considered by any court before this case. Doubtless a fleet auxiliary renders help to a fleet, but what help, or what fleet, is in this connection another matter. The evidence above quoted is not contradicted and is entirely probable in itself.

Jebsen was a person of zeal and ability. He was determined to help his country in the war and was not too particular how he did it. It is, however, by no means obvious that such a determination involved his making his own ship a "fleet auxiliary" and taking the consequences himself, nor is it clear that to do so was the best way of giving assistance. The story begins with a German consul in San Francisco overreaching himself. The German cruiser Leipzig, then operating in the North Pacific, came into San Francisco to bunker. The consul, unwarrantably presuming on the indifference of the United States officials, ordered for her the very large quantity of 1000 tons of coal, but they refused to allow more to be shipped than enough to take her directly to Apia, the nearest German port. The Leipzig, however, was not bound for Apia. She was cruising in search of British merchantmen, a much longer voyage. At this point Jebsen showed himself a man of resource. The Mazatlan was then engaged in trading down the coast, calling at Mexican and other ports, where it was hoped (though doubtless without justification) that the local officials might be less incorruptible or more supine than those of the United States. In addition to her general cargo she obligingly loaded 500 tons of this coal for Guaymas, and also took on board what was believed to be a wireless telegraphic apparatus, with its operator, a German naval reservist, and some bags of letters. On her way down she called at San Pedro and there picked up Jebsen and some ladies, and three days later she happened to find the Leipzig in Ballenas Bay, anchored near her, and transferred to her the operator and the apparatus, the reservist and the bags. At Guaymas she found a German vessel called the Marie, which belonged to a relative of Jebsen's and was clearly a tender to the Leipzig. Here Jebsen went ashore and the coal was discharged into lighters, and no doubt has been suggested that it was duly transferred, directly or indirectly, to the Leipzig. The Mazatlan then proceeded to her next port of call, Topolobampo, where Jebsen again joined her, and soon afterwards she was requisitioned for a short time for Mexican use. Attempts had been made by him and by her captain to get into wireless communication with the Leipzig throughout the voyage, which the English operator thwarted by putting the apparatus out of order. His courage and resource no doubt deprived the Leipzig of much information, and his vigilance in communicating with the British consular authorities as opportunity served had probably the result that the operations of the Mazatlan were well known on the station and long remembered against her.

Jebsen was obviously a willing party throughout to the assistance that was being arranged for the Leipzig, and no doubt the proceedings were concerted with the Leipzig's officers, for otherwise they might have proved abortive. There is, however, no ground for supposing that the Mazatlan was under the orders of the Leipzig or was otherwise connected with her than as rendering the service of placing coals and other things where she or the Marie could get them, and as volunteering information, of which it was hoped that she would make use. Had the Mazatlan's character been Mexican, as her legal ownership was, what she did would have been a highly unneutral service. It is, however, a totally different thing to establish that these proceedings, which primâ facie were those of a private merchantman, though controlled by a person of accommodating and zealous disposition, really prove that she was a ship which could not be transferred to neutrals at all during the war, any more than a German man-of-war or a mail-steamer owned by the German Government or any other portion of the public property of the German Empire destined to its public use: (Parlement Belge (sup.). It must be possible to draw a line between unneutral service and "fleet auxiliaries" and between the cases in which neutrals can validly buy and take delivery of enemy ships and the cases in which they cannot; otherwise transactions which are expressly permitted to neutrals might be invalidated by circumstances of which they had no notice and could form no estimate.

That a vessel which is or has been a portion of the armed forces of a belligerent cannot by a mere private transaction be placed beyond the reach of capture on the high seas is well settled (The Minerva, (sup.); United States v. Etta, 4 Am. L. Rep. (N. S.) 387; The Georgia, 1868, 7 Wall. 32), and there is authority for the proposition that while a vessel formally incorporated in the enemy forces is and continues to be, for this and cognate purposes, a public ship of war, her mere actual employment in that capacity without formal incorporation or commission will also bring upon her the like disability: (The Ceylon (sup.), and cf. H.M. Submarine E 14 (sup.). Various reasons have been given for this rule, as that transferability is an exception granted to enemy property in favour of commerce and that ships of war are not articles of commerce, or that such transfers would enable a belligerent to rescue himself from the disadvantage into which he has fallen and so to shift the disadvantage to his opponent, or that the ship sold might afterwards find its way back into the service of the flag to which she had belonged. If a public man-of-war remains in a neutral port for more than the limited time permitted to her by recognised rules, she has to be interned, for otherwise the neutral State would be rendering an indirect service to a belligerent as such. It it were open to a subject of that State to buy her under such circumstances, the payment of the price would be a direct service to the belligerent of a very real character, for instead of a ship which he could not use, he would get cash, which he could. The precise foundation of the rule, however, need not now be determined.

In the case of a ship which is not and never has been a part of the armed forces of a belligerent, other tests may be applicable. Ships which enlist in the service of such armed forces, though not armed themselves, may naturally be the subject of rules more stringent than those which govern ordinary merchantmen. The forces assisted may consist of single ships or of whole fleets. Assistance may be rendered when in company or when detached; it may consist in the supply of coal and stores, or in the collection and forwarding of information. An unarmed ship may be of service as a decoy or as a screen; the assistance may be rendered casually or on a system, voluntarily or under orders, gratuitously or for hire. Such service is not necessarily confined to ships of the country to which the fleet assisted belongs or of a country engaged in the war at all. Again, such a ship may be captured in delicto and while rendering the service or after the service has come to an end. In the latter case different considerations may well arise, unless she is to be clogged perpetually for a single transgression and be incapable of valid transfer however long she may have mended her ways.

There seems to be no authority in point. Their Lordships considered the case of The Alwina (sup.) as one of the carriage of contraband only. The neutral vessel there was released and not treated as if she were a fleet auxiliary, although it was not disputed that the ship and her cargo had been despatched with the object of succouring a German squadron at sea, and if no services were actually rendered this was due to circumstances equally unforeseen and unwelcome, so far as her Dutch owners were concerned. The case, however, at most throws light on the liability of such an assistant to be subsequently captured while in the same ownership, and does not purport to decide anything as to the validity of an intervening change of ownership.

So much for the character of the assistance, which is material. Regarding the Mazatlan as a ship of enemy character, those in command of her nevertheless held no personal commissions from the German Government; she was not even such a "private ship of war" as was commissioned in the days of privateering; she took no direct part in hostilities; it is not shown that she was under the orders or control of any agent placed on board by the enemy Government; she was not even in the employment, still less in the exclusive employment, of such Government; she was not under requisition to them; she did not fly the colours of the German Navy, nor were her crew subject to military law. Regarded as a vessel on the Mexican register she had no immunity from visit and search or from arrest by appropriate legal proceedings in a municipal court, say of the United States, nor in such proceedings could the German Government, if they had chosen to submit to the jurisdiction, have been made liable for private civil wrongs done by those on board of her.

Their Lordships are not prepared to entertain a proposition so wide as that any help whatever rendered to a German man-of-war by a German merchantman would disable her owners from validly transferring ownership to a neutral under all circumstances for the remainder of the war. Such a proposition would go far to make the term "unneutral service" a mere name and to enhance to a surprising extent the consequences hitherto imposed on that form of misconduct. The communication to the Leipzig of the movements of British vessels by wireless telegraphy, in itself one of the gravest of offences, rested in intention only; the achievement was frustrated, and mere intention without more cannot in principle be followed by any such disabling consequence. Furthermore, the services actually rendered were confined to what passed at Ballenas Bay and at Guaymas, and were put an end to at any rate by the requisitioning of the ship a little later on the same voyage.

It is probable enough that, if things had prospered with the Leipzig, Jebsen meant the Mazatlan to render similar services on future voyages, but such services would be most usefully, because most unobtrusively, rendered by a peaceful merchantman continuing her regular voyages under the Mexican flag. Besides, whatever the title "fleet auxiliary" may mean, it seems to fit the Marie better than the Mazatlan, and Jebsen may have thought that in exposing his relative's ship to peril he had done enough. Two "fleet auxiliaries" were not needed, nor was it indispensable that the Mazatlan, having once engaged in such services, should be always so engaged. With the Marie serving as a link between the Leipzig and the shore, it might well be safest to employ now this ship and now that, as opportunity served, to bring the required cargo to the appointed rendezvous.

Their Lordships have accordingly come to the same conclusion on this point as the President. Though the captors had a case of substance, affording ground for inquiry, they did not show that the Mazatlan could not be validly sold to the claimants at the time when she was transferred.

In the alternative, the captors allege that the sale was one which, if not incompetent, yet ought not to be sustained. It is said that such a transaction must be tested by the state of mind in which it is conceived and carried through, and that in the nature of things the relevant state of mind is that of the transferor. The transferee's mind may be honest and yet the impropriety of the transferor's motives may defeat the whole transaction. For this authority is sought in art. 56 of the Declaration of London as being a considered and correct formulation of the law of nations on the point. Arts. 55 and 56 deal with transfers of enemy ships before and after the outbreak of war respectively. In the first case the transfer of an enemy ship is declared to be valid, unless it is proved to have been made in order to evade the consequences to which as an enemy ship the outbreak of war would expose her. In the second the transfer is declared to be void, unless it is proved that it was not made in order to evade those consequences. Transfers are effected by the combined action of two parties, the seller and the buyer, and the word "evade" suggests something more than "escape," for the latter is a result, while the former is a means by which a result is brought about. These considerations, coupled with the fact that art. 56 is linked with art. 55, point to the conclusion of Lord Sterndale that the article deals only with colourable or fictitious transfers, devised by both parties in combination. If, then, as the learned President thought, art. 56 does not conflict with the decision of this Board in The Baltica (sup.), it does not affect the present case, for, apart from the burden of proof, which does not now matter since the evidence is complete, there was an actual transfer, not colourable nor subject to any reservation, and this in the case of a private merchantman is sufficient when completed by delivery. The contention, however, is that the claimants have to prove that the transfer was made by the transferor, the person who makes it, otherwise than for the purpose of evading capture and condemnation. If this construction is the true one, the article very considerably alters the law as laid down in decisions which bind or have been accepted by this Board, and the alteration is an enhancement and not a waiver of belligerent rights. If pressed to its logical results, it would in practice invalidate most transfers to neutrals, for how could a neutral command the evidence of his transferor, who alone could make a clean breast of his motives and objects in entering into the transaction? If the enemy's testimony were not forthcoming, how could it ever be inferred from circumstances alone that among the many objects with which men sell their chattels, the object of escaping the harassing peril of capture may not have been one? If, on the other hand, that evidence was given, what is the state of facts in which any court would believe that the vendor was wholly innocent of such a desire? It is better to adhere to the settled rules laid down in The Ariel (sup.) and The Baltica (sup.). Of course, a vendor may be shown to be so interested in getting rid at all hazards of the appearance of ownership as to lead to the conclusion of fact that he really did what he was most interested in doing, and shed the apparent title while retaining the property. A court would then hold that there was no real sale, not that the sale was real and effectual, but that the vendor's reprehensible state of mind caused the buyer to lose the ship for which he had paid his money. The article is in all probability an endeavour to find an acceptable compromise between English and Continental views on the point, and if so, is not an authority to be followed now.

The claimants, on the other hand, contend that it is the state of mind of the buyer that alone can matter. If he honestly intends to buy and does buy, the seller's reasons for selling are immaterial. He has his reasons or he would not sell, but what they are is of no consequence. This again will not do. To say that no regard need be had to the mind of the seller goes too far. No doubt, when once the question, whether the sale is a real sale, is answered in the affirmative, the prior motives and objects of both parties become merely antecedent and preliminary matter, but in ascertaining how that question is to be answered great light is thrown on the transaction by considering the situation of both parties, so as to test what they purported to do by what they must really have intended. Plainly, however, the mere fact that to uphold the sale might prevent the Crown from obtaining a condemnation cannot affect the matter, for that would mean that a judgment upon a question of fact should be given one way or another, according as the upshot affected the interest of the British Crown.

In the present case it is now clear that what the claimants meant to do was what they purported to do, namely, to buy the ship without reservation, and what they did was to perform their part of the contract so made by paying the price and taking delivery. Beyond the fact that they changed her name, a circumstance immaterial as things stand, though had other facts been proved against them it might have had some importance, nothing has been done on their side to raise any doubt against them. The ship was not left in Jebsen's service or at his disposal, but was chartered to third parties for account of the claimants. Their evidence is that when they bought her they had heard nothing of the earlier adventures of the Mazatlan. On Jebsen's side there were circumstances which give rise to much suspicion, but it is now accepted that the claimants had no cognisance of or participation in them. Their Lordships are of opinion that the evidence, viewed as a whole, disclosed no ground on which it could have been held that the Edna was, when captured, still a ship of enemy character. There is no other way in which the captors' appeal can be supported. The interval which elapsed between the carriage of contraband and the conduct, which in a vessel of neutral character would have been unneutral service, and the capture of the Edna, namely, from the autumn of 1914 to Jan. 1916, would have been too great and the change of circumstances too complete to support a condemnation, if the Mazatlan were regarded as not being of enemy character in 1914. As, however, her enemy character down to the sale to the claimants in 1915 is not now in dispute, the whole question turns on the validity and on the competence of the sale. In their Lordships' opinion the appeal fails.

The cross-appeal depends on the question whether there was adequate ground for seizing the Edna and pressing the claim for her condemnation till the trial. All the proceedings were in themselves regular. The ship was requisitioned pursuant to the rules, and it is not suggested that the case was persisted in for the purpose of prolonging the period of profitable requisition. Their Lordships cannot regard so improper a course as anything but a theoretical possibility, which in the present case has, fortunately, not even been discussed.

The law relating to claims for costs and damages against captors was fully stated by their Lordships' Board in The Ostsee (sup.), when all the authorities were considered. There no question of the reality or validity of a transaction or of its good faith arose, and against the ship and her conduct and that of her owners, who had been her owners all through, nothing was alleged. The ground given for seizing her, in fact, did not exist, and it was held that the actual captors' honest belief that it did could not by itself serve as a probable cause for seizure. Here the acts of the ship, which are relied on, were real enough, though they ceased before the title of the claimants arose and without their participation or knowledge, but they are material to the critical question whether the ship could validly be seized. It was suggested that in the present case the seizure was due to the captors' mistake of law, namely, as to the nature of those public ships of war which are not transferable during war; while in The Ostsee (sup.) it was due to the captors' mistake of fact, namely, as to the issue of a proclamation of a blockade, and that equally in either case the owner of the ship captured should not suffer for their mistake. This is really fallacious. On the question of the existence of the blockade there was nothing to be inquired into; on the question what the character of the Mazatlan was, her undisputed action raised a real subject for inquiry. There can be no doubt that when the ship was taken, those, at any rate, who directed the action of the cruiser, had substantial ground for questioning her neutral or her private character. She had been so employed on the voyage above described as to justify inquiry, and after the first and before the second requisitioning by the Mexican authorities she was sent on another voyage along the same coast. Either requisitioning might under the circumstances have been really not unwelcome to her owners, for, till things had blown over, it would afford an unobtrusive seclusion for a ship that had earned for herself a certain amount of evil notoriety. The termination of this retreat was quickly followed by a transfer to the United States Registry, and an intercepted letter revealed the fact that a German Government official had forwarded to Germany part of the purchase money paid for her. It is quite impossible to say that there was not probable cause for supposing that she had been a German "fleet auxiliary" and so was liable to seizure with a view to condemnation.

It has long been assumed as good law that captors can rely at the trial on facts unknown to them at the time of capture (The Elize, 1854, Spinks, 88), nor did the respondents attempt to contest this. The evidence as it developed showed much that was provocative of doubt and suspicion. The financial circumstances preceding and attending her sale showed a reasonable case for believing that Jebsen was engaged in creating a screen of United States intermediaries between himself and the actual buyers, such as would disarm the suspicions or defeat the investigations of a captor and make it possible to find a complaisant neutral, who would willingly and successfully act for his protection. Even when the claimants came to give their own account of the matter on affidavit, they did not explain away this mystification, but only disclaimed participation in it. It is true that they proved actual payment of the price, but cross-examination might prove that they had a greater connection with Jebsen's acts than was consistent with good faith or the reality of the sale. The captors might well desire to have their evidence given orally in open court. Furthermore although the oral evidence given in 1919 ultimately confirmed the account of their conduct which the claimants had given in affidavits before the end of 1916, they also put forward numerous other affidavits so flagrantly false that the learned President expressed his surprise at their using them at all. Instead of contenting themselves with a completed title as neutral buyers and with proving their independence and ignorance of the Mazatlan's earlier proceedings, they advanced a case, which was really Jebsen's case, and was untrue. The captors could not be expected to sift out the false affidavits from the true and apply for the release of the ship on a case better than that which, as a whole, the claimants made for themselves. Those who put forward a case of which so large a part was disingenuous, must not complain if the whole of it, with their own oral evidence, was submitted to the judgment of the learned President, as a matter which only the court could decide. It is true that he states that he arrived at his conclusion in favour of the captors with much doubt, though his examination of the facts was careful and thorough. It is not necessary for their Lordships to indicate whether they have shared his doubts or not. If it were so, that would be no reason for reversing his decree. Similarity of doubt is not a ground for dissimilarity in conclusion. The allowance of damages and costs is largely a question of discretion, which in past times has but rarely been answered unfavourably to captors, and it is enough to say that their Lordships see no sufficient reason for differing from his opinion.

The claimants further indicated a somewhat singular argument, namely, that the Edna should not have been detained at all, for her papers were in order, nothing on board of her or connected with her then ownership or employment awakened any just suspicion, and those who seized her are not shown to have had at the time any knowledge of such circumstances of suspicion as have since been elicited on a scrutiny of the evidence. Their Lordships think that such a contention unduly narrows the right and utility of seizure as a preliminary to trial and condemnation. Even under the old practice the allowance of further proof rested in the discretion of the court. It is true that it was not the practice to exercise that discretion in favour of such an order under the circumstances prevailing in the wars at the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth centuries. The likelihood of further evidence of value being obtainable was so small in proportion to the delay that it would involve, as to disincline the court to allow a more remote investigation than the examination of the ship's papers and the administration of the standing interrogatories already provided for. Now, however, under modern conditions, when the facilities for ascertaining the truth by subsequent investigation and the introduction of various kinds of evidence make even a considerable delay so well worth incurring, it can hardly be doubted that the same judges would have freely exercised their discretion in the contrary direction. This would be peculiarly so if the question in debate were the validity and genuineness of the ship's apparent nationality. If inquiry on such a subject were to be limited to the regularity of her papers and register, it would not be worth while to embark upon it, for nowhere would it be less likely that captors would find proof of or even ground for suspecting the unreality of a transfer to a neutral flag than among the formal documents required to protect and conceal it. Unless search after the truth is to be abandoned in such cases or denied altogether, it must follow that, on grounds wider than the mere practice of the Prize Court as settled under the authority of the present statute, captors are entitled to justify detention of a ship, even though she is ultimately released, on grounds only made apparent upon an examination of subsequent evidence given on either side.

The conclusion therefore must be that on no ground are the captors liable in damages or costs. The claim for something in the nature of an account of profits, earned by the use of the vessel while under requisition, is equally unsustainable. There is no theory of the relations between captors and claimants, still less between His Majesty, for whose use the ship was requisitioned, and the shipowners, which would support a claim of such a kind. No issue has been raised as to unrepaired injury sustained by the ship; the claim, if any, must be for damages and costs only. It is right to recognise that a result which restores the ship to her owners but leaves them without recompense of any kind for the loss of the use of her between 1916 and 1919 must be profoundly disappointing to them, and may seem to be not without some suspicion of paradox in law. It would be unsatisfactory that so long a time should have elapsed before this cause could be brought to an issue, were it not that the claimants do not seem to have taken any active steps to accelerate it and may well be supposed to have recognised that the delay was one which they could not fairly complain of. It is to be hoped, however, that, whatever the conditions of future wars may be, this case may never be regarded as anything but highly exceptional in this particular.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that both the appeal and the cross-appeal should be dismissed with costs.

THE ZAMORA (No. 2). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize—Neutral ship—Contraband cargo—Condemnation of ship and entire cargo—Knowledge of owner.

Where the owner of a neutral ship knowingly carries a cargo which is in whole or in part contraband, he is liable to forfeit his ship, but there can be no confiscation of the vessel unless there is evidence from the shipowner's conduct and other circumstances that the owner or possibly the charterer or master knew of the true nature of the cargo.

Lord Parker's observations on the evidence of knowledge on the part of the shipowner which would establish the liability of the cargo to condemnation, in The Hakan (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 161: 117 L. T. Rep. 619; (1918) A. C. 148), discussed.

Judgment of Lord Sterndale, P. affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Admiralty Division in Prize, dated the 31st March 1919, whereby the President, Lord Sterndale, condemned the appellants' steamship Zamora and her entire cargo.

Mackinnon, K.C. and Balloch for the appellants.

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.), Stephens, K.C., and Lilley for the respondent, the Procurator-General.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—This was a case of condemnation of a ship and its entire cargo. The latter was contraband and had an ulterior enemy destination; and of this it was held that the shipowner had sufficient knowledge. The ship was Swedish, the voyage New York to Stockholm, and the cargo consisted of 400 tons of copper, 101,494 bushels of wheat, and 69,379 bushels of oats. It was purchased on f.o.b. New York terms from sellers unconnected with the contraband adventure. The date of the capture was the 19th April 1915.

At the outset the grounds of suspicion against the cargo were not great. The contraband trade had not then attained the magnitude which characterised it later on in the war. Copper and cereals were no doubt in demand in Germany, but they were also required for common consumption in Sweden and that in large quantities. The proximity of Sweden to Germany was therefore of less importance; unless the case against the cargo succeeded, there was none against the ship.

Claimants duly appeared, and a large body of documents relating to the cargo was soon forthcoming. The purchases, the shipment, the taking up of documents and the destination of the cargo were fully set out and minutely vouched. Though the copper and the cereals were alleged to belong to different consignees, unconnected with one another, they were all insured by the same policies, a singular circumstance in itself, and the further fact that they were insured f.p.a. raised further suspicion. There for a considerable time the matter rested. It remained a case of the importation of commodities in common use in a neutral ship from one neutral country to another by neutral merchants for consumption in their own country.

Appearances, however, were deceptive. The consignees of the copper were a Swedish company which might well have been above suspicion, for, as Lord Sterndale records, there were upon its board of directors the Minister for Foreign Affairs in the late Swedish Government, an ex-Minister of Finance, and an ex-Minister and late member of the Supreme Court; yet behind the screen of these highly respectable personages there was being carried on a speculative adventure, which involved a continuous scheme of deception, to be supported, in case of need, by much hard swearing. The whole cargo, in fact, belonged to the Austrian Government, and was imported into Sweden en route for Austria. The ship was chartered to a German, who was acting as agent for the Austrian Government, and the Swedish consignees were merely playing a part in the transaction. The documents were genuine enough; that is to say, they came into existence at the time and for the purposes for which they were ostensibly created, but behind them all and behind the charterer and the consignees, who were puppets, handsomely paid, stood an enemy Government. No more striking instance has occurred of a contraband transaction, which all but succeeded; none which proves more conclusively what patience and tenacity are needed in probing to the bottom an apparently straightforward case, or how liberal and even indulgent a court of prize must sometimes be in granting the time required to exhaust all the means at the captors' disposal for discovering the truth.

How that truth became known to the Procurator-General, it is not now material to inquire. It was disclosed by him on affidavit in Aug. 1918, and proved to be conclusive. The claimants of the copper withdrew their claim without a contest. The claimants of the cereals made shift to fight their case and lost. The President condemned both the copper, the wheat and the oats. There remained the case of the Zamora. After hearing the evidence of Mr. Banck, the managing director of the company which owned her, the President condemned the ship. It is from this condemnation that her owners now appeal.

The case made was that even where the whole cargo consists of contraband, nothing less than actual knowledge of its character by the carrier will forfeit the ship. It was not denied that circumstances may raise a presumption of knowledge such that the carrier must rebut it or fail. It was not contended that a person who had knowledge of facts sufficient to point the mind of a reasonable man to the truth could escape by wilfully shutting his eyes to fuller information, but the presumption of knowledge was said to be one only of fact and not of law, each case therefore depending on its own circumstances, so that, if cargo is bound to a neutral port and consists of unwarlike commodities in substantial demand and common use there, only proof and not presumption of knowledge of its ulterior destination will condemn the ship. If the President held that a decree condemning the entire cargo would in itself warrant a decree condemning the ship also, he was wrong in spite of the judgment of Sir Samuel Evans in The Hakan (sup.) and The Maracaibo (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 522; 115 L. T. Rep. 639; 1916, P. 266). The true proposition was one quoted from the judgment of this board in The Hakan: "There can be no confiscation of the ship without knowledge on the part of the owner, or possibly of the charterer or master, of the nature of the cargo."

It may be admitted that knowledge of the character of the cargo is more obviously natural when the ship is being loaded for her owners' account than when she is only chartered, and when she is chartered at a rate of freight on the quantity delivered with a cesser of liability in favour of the charterer than when she is chartered for a lump sum freight payable in advance. Conversely a voyage to an enemy port is more significant than one to a neutral country, even though it is a neighbour of enemy territory, and the loading of a cargo of arms and ammunition than the loading of commodities no less indispensable to neutrals than to belligerents. So far the circumstances of each case may vary and modify the conclusion almost indefinitely, but one circumstance is common to all the cases and can never be forgotten—that is the existence of a state of war with the temptations and the profits which contraband traffic holds out to complaisant traders. It does not follow that every case stands by itself and is independent of authority, nor need captors make out the knowledge of the shipowner as prosecutors have to bring home a charge to a person accused in an English criminal court. In any case there is no immunity to a shipowner, because he charters his vessel and does not concern himself with the cargo. Indeed, in one respect at least this case requires a sharper degree of scrutiny, for such a course is so easily made a screen for the schemes of others, and so easily becomes deliberate blindness.

It is clearly settled that a shipowner who carries an entire cargo of contraband knowingly forfeits his ship in prize. What constitutes knowledge and what suffices as evidence of it may be matters of difficulty. During part of the eighteenth century the rigorous doctrine still prevailed that any carriage of contraband involved as a penalty the confiscation of the carrying ship. By the end of that time, Sir William Scott records, in The Ringende Jacob (1 C. Rob., p. 89), and in the Neutralitet (3 C. Rob. 295), that the practice of the great powers had greatly relaxed that rule. In The Hakan and The Maracaibo (sup.) Sir Samuel Evans did not inquire whether the carrier knew the contraband character of the cargo. He took it that the ancient rule was suspended only and was still in existence and capable of being revived, so that, except in so far as the Crown had waived its rights by adopting art. 40 of the Declaration of London, the old rule must still be enforced. The objection to this is that Sir William Scott records a change founded on the agreement of nations, one of the most important sources of international law. After over a century of recognition, can it be said that the relaxation is a mere revocable waiver which a single Sovereign can withdraw? Lord Parker of Waddington, in pronouncing their Lordships' judgment on appeal in the Hakan, pointed out that the common element which unites the varying practices of different nations is knowledge on the carriers' part of the character of the cargo carried, and that a presumption of knowledge, sometimes rebuttable and sometimes not, is the feature which makes relevant the proportion of the contraband cargo to the whole. Some countries attach to certain proportions a presumption of knowledge in all cases, irrespective of the extent to which the mind of the particular carrier or shipowner may consciously have been privy to the carriage of contraband. The English Prize Courts, at any rate, have long held that if a shipowner knowingly carries a cargo which is in whole or in large part contraband, he is liable to forfeit his ship. It accordingly becomes necessary to examine the facts of this case somewhat at length, for if they warrant the inference that the shipowners knew that they were carrying contraband, the decree of condemnation should be affirmed without further inquiry.

The Rederiaktiebolaget Banco, of Stockholm, owned two steamers, the Zamora and the Augusta. Most of the shares were held by the family of Banck, and Mr. Bror Banck, its head, was the largest shareholder and managing director of the company. He was also managing owner of another ship, the Orion, managing director of the Orient Company, which also owned a vessel, and had a good deal of house property. He must, therefore, be credited with much business experience, and his affidavit and oral evidence testify to his good education and his extensive knowledge of English.

To Mr. Bror Banck there came one day in 1915 a Mr. G. Pott, who introduced himself as a shareholder in the Orient Company, seeking a disengaged ship, as he wished to charter one for grain and general merchandise from New York to Stockholm. He came twice. Mr. Banck looked him up in the directory, and found that he had a good address and a large income, and spoke about him to a friend or two, "who had only good to say of him." Accordingly he obtained the Zamora. Pott was in fact a German, who previously had had something to do with goloshes. He had now gone into shipping. There was no correspondence. The charter-party, though made out on a form which was ill adapted to a lump sum freight, provided for a hiring for the voyage for "14,500*l.*, all in British sterling, payable before signing bills of lading at current rate of exchange for bankers' sight bills on London bank." It is dated the 20th Feb. 1915.

The ship was then two days out from the Tyne bound for New York. On reaching that port his agents told the captain that they had a cable from Mr. Banck giving the names of the shippers and receivers for the grain, and later on another cable gave the same information for the copper, and added "instruct Ohlson proceed direct home north of Shetland." Mr. Banck must have surmised that Pott had sub-let the entire steamer to other parties, who were to provide the cargo, and when Pott afterwards told him so, he seems to have expressed no surprise. He says that he thus prescribed the route for fear of mines, and to the suggestion that the real reason was to escape search by British ships, he replied "Not particularly." From whom he learnt the names of the shippers and receivers of the cargo he does not say. Thus, when his own company's interest would have suggested inquiry as to the character of those concerned in an adventure which might involve an ulterior enemy destination, he knew little of his charterer, and of the shippers and consignees he knew and asked nothing at all.

The bills of lading for the grain were dated the 18th March and made it deliverable to B. Ursells Eftertraedare, paying freight as per charter-party. There is no charter to which this term could apply. The bill of lading for the copper was dated the 20th March, and provided for payment of freight in cash immediately on discharge in the usual money of the country, but it named no rate. Pott should have paid Mr. Banck 14,500*l.* at least by the 20th March, when the Zamora sailed. Mr. Banck produced his company's books to show that in point of fact 7500*l.*, or its equivalent in kroner, was paid to the company on the 17th March, for which he said a receipt was given, though no counterfoil was produced nor does the name of the payer appear. The balance only appears in the day book as paid on the 30th April. Mr. Banck said that it was Pott who paid both sums.

According to Mr. Banck, 14,500*l.* for a voyage of some six weeks or so was just a normal freight at the time, a few pence over the last fixture he had seen, but he produces no charters or evidence to corroborate his statement. It is true that the Crown gave no information upon the point either, but, on a question of freights in Sweden, there can be no doubt which side was best able to develop the evidence. Now the Zamora had been bought by the Rederiaktiebolaget Banco in 1912 for only 11.250*l.*, being then thirty years old and in need of repairs, but what they cost is not stated. For insurance purposes she was estimated as being worth 20,000*l.* in 1915, though the sum insured was only 16,000*l.*, and, in consideration of a bail of 14,000*l.*—which the President's judgment states to have been the result of a valuation made for the purpose after the seizure—was released to her owners. When the company was incorporated in 1905 its joint capital was fixed at 335,000 kroner as a minimum, and 1,000,000 as a maximum. In 1918 the shares issued, assuming that they were all fully paid, accounted only for 415,000 kroner. Accordingly, the freight for a voyage of two months at most exceeded the purchase price of the steamer three years before and exceeded the amount of her valuation for bail. It fell little short of the amount for which she was insured, and it was very much more than half of the paid-up capital of the company. In favour of Mr. Bror Banck their Lordships will suppose that during the war neutral shipowners regularly made handsome profits, but these figures appear to them to be more than normal. They were, at any rate, big enough to make it worth Mr. Banck's while to put himself about unless he was assured that his freight was in no peril.

He had another reason for concern. His hull insurance against war risks was void if the ship carried contraband of war to a belligerent Power, and, of course, as his lump sum freight was to be prepaid, he had no policy on freight at all. Now, of Pott he knew little, and of the consignees less, if he knew anything at all. The welcome awaiting American copper and cereals in Germany, if forwarded from Sweden, would obviously be so warm, that the unknown consignees might quite probably be importing them for the purpose of sending them on, but if they left New York by the Zamora with an ulterior destination, his war-risk policy on the ship would be void. Nevertheless he remained unconcerned as to the cargo and its consignees, and, even when nearly half his freight remained unpaid until after the ship was in the captors' hands at Barrow, he took it almost as a matter of course. He asked Mr. Pott the reason for the capture, but he was not anxious. "I felt myself as strong as anything," he says, "and I knew there was nothing incorrect." How he knew this he does not say, but he leaves it to be inferred that this was the result of the confidence with which Mr. Pott or perhaps the directorate of the Swedish Trading Company had inspired him. Of the balance of his freight he said nothing: his trust in Mr. Pott's ability to pay was complete. He had heard nothing up to that time of any connection between Pott and contraband German trade. He did not associate high freights, if this was a high freight, with contraband. As he says: "This was only just in the beginning of the war, and we never thought anything of it." He had no reason to doubt that both the copper and the grain were destined for Swedish use, and, further, the export of both commodities from Sweden was prohibited by the Swedish Government. It has been suggested on his behalf that he was just an old ship's captain, a very simple person.

Mr. Bror Banck's confidence in his new acquaintance, Pott, went considerably further. When the second instalment of the Zamora's freight was already some four or five days overdue, he actually chartered to him a second ship, the Augusta, and again for a lump sum on the same form of charter. This time, however, the freight was paid all at once on the 30th April, but the charter was somewhat departed from since instead of drafts in New York, cash was forthcoming in Stockholm.

If these deviations from the strict language of the charters stood alone, they might be explicable on the ground that printed forms of charters were used more suitable to freights payable on the quantity delivered at rates agreed than to a lump sum payable in advance. There is, however, a further deviation which is quite inexplicable. This was put to Mr. Banck, who professed to be taken by surprise and said it was a puzzle, a term which the President somewhat ironically adopted. Argumentative explanations were offered, of which it is enough to say that they do not fit the facts. The one person who ought to have explained the matter was not called. This person was Mr. Carl Banck, who was associated in the management of the appellant company's business with his father, Mr. Bror Banck, and had control of it during the latter's not infrequent visits during March and April 1915 to his house property at Trelleborg and Helsingborg. This gentleman either was unaware of the existence of the lump sum charters for the Zamora and the Augusta or he treated them as shams. In each case he gave the consignees of the cereals receipts for freight due on those parcels on shipment, in the former case at the rate of 72 kroner per ton of 20 cwt., in the latter at the rate of 60 kroner only. The first was dated the 17th March, that is before the date of the bill of lading; the second the 7th April, three weeks before the lump sum freight was paid, if paid it was. The sum mentioned in the Zamora receipt cannot be made to correspond with the sums entered in the day book as received for chartered freight, and the amount of money exceeds by more than 100,000 kroner the sum which it was Mr. Bror Banck's case that he received from Pott on that very day. Who paid these bill of lading freights, and how the weights of the cargo came to be known in Stockholm at or before the dates of shipment in New York does not appear. Mr. Sten Stendahl, who carries on business as B. Ursells Eftertraedare, the consignees of the cereals, swore that these receipts represented the conditions of his freight engagements with Pott and were given when the money was paid to the appellants for account of Pott, but Mr. Bror Banck evidently professed to be quite unaware that his company had been receiving Pott's freight at all.

The appellants, are, therefore, in a dilemma. If what Stendahl says is true, the appellants, by one of their managers, were assisting in the creation of that screen of mercantile documents with which the cargo claimants disguised the truth of the transaction, and in default of explanation must be taken to have done so deliberately, for they were taking charge of Pott's profits, though Pott was in default in paying what he owed them. The accounts which such a transaction must certainly have involved have not been disclosed, doubtless for good reasons.

If, on the other hand, what Stendahl says is false, as in other matters it mainly is, then the lump-sum charter is a sham and the appellants were receiving on their own account a higher freight than they profess to have contracted for, differently calculated and concealed by false book entries. It is not necessary to consider whether old Mr. Banck was in some respects hoodwinked by young Mr. Banck, for the appellants must be affected by the knowledge and conduct of both their managers, but Mr. Bror Banck's attitude in the witness-box was that of a man who was not so much astonished as surprised. The production of these receipts was something that he had not reckoned on, and an explanation was beyond his power to improvise.

In his judgment Lord Sterndale uses the expression, "If Mr. Banck had not actual knowledge, he could have had it if he had taken the steps which he should have taken to acquire it." This proposition does not really lend itself to any misapprehension, but it may be as well to say something as to the nature of the duty to which it refers. Mr. Banck's position involved two kinds of obligation; the one towards his company, the appellants, and, in respect of his own large holding in it, to himself, and the other towards the Prize Court. His duty to his own company required that he should, among other things, make proper inquiries to safeguard its interests and to avoid exposing its property to risks which he did not mean to take in the transaction to which he was committing it. If he neglected this duty, he was disregarding alike his interest as a capitalist and his obligation as a director, and he is open to the inference of fact that after all he knew what he was about, and with a full apprehension of the risks run had made up his mind that the freight made it worth while to run them. To the court his duty is, as representing the claimants, to present their claim frankly and to make such full inquiries as would enable him to put the court in full possession of the truth as to the claim, so far as it lay in his power to do so. If this duty was neglected, his company is again exposed to the inference that it was not neglected for nothing; that he had at least got upon the track of matters which he thought it better not to pursue, or that the claimants were in possession of information which it did not suit them to divulge. The judgment of Lord Sterndale was not intended to convey and does not convey that Mr. Banck owed a duty to the belligerents to avoid carrying this cargo, but it was carried at his company's risk and to his company's profit, and in exercising their right to prevent contraband traffic belligerents are entitled to the full protection of Courts of Prize in penetrating the disguise of a feigned or deliberate ignorance on the part of neutral claimants.

Lord Sterndale thus expressed his final conclusion: "I think the true inference is that, if Mr. Banck did not know this was a transaction in contraband, it was because he did not want to know, and that he has not rebutted the presumption arising from the fact of the whole cargo being contraband."

Their Lordships have been invited to read this as saying that Mr. Banck is not proved to have known the contraband character of the adventure; that if he did not know, because he did not want to know, he was within his rights and owed no duty to the belligerents to inform himself; and that the Zamora is condemned contrary to the passage above cited from the Hakan upon a legal presumption arising solely and arbitrarily from the fact that the whole cargo was contraband. It may be that, in his anxiety not to state more than he found against Mr. Banck, the learned President appeared to state something less, but there are two senses in which a man is said not to know something because he does not want to know it. A thing may be troublesome to learn, and the knowledge of it, when acquired, may be uninteresting or distasteful. To refuse to know any more about the subject or anything at all is then a wilful but a real ignorance. On the other hand, a man is said not to know because he does not want to know, where the substance of the thing is borne in upon his mind with a conviction that full details or precise proofs may be dangerous, because they may embarrass his denials or compromise his protests. In such a case he flatters himself that where ignorance is safe, 'tis folly to be wise, but there he is wrong, for he has been put upon notice and his further ignorance, even though actual and complete, is a mere affectation and disguise. It is in the latter sense that their Lordships take the President's words. So far from finding that Mr. Banck was devoid of knowledge of the contraband character of the adventure, he thought, and they agree, that Mr. Banck understood it very well, so well that he knew where to draw the judicious line between scanty but sufficient information and undeniable complicity. Knowledge being proved, no opinion need be expressed as to the effect of presumptions in the present case. The evidence fully bears out the conclusion that the transaction was in its inception ambiguous; that any doubts about it were resolved in favour of an illegitimate complexion, so far as Mr. Banck was concerned, by his incuriosity, his reticence and his detachment. So far from showing that he was truly ignorant, he has only involved his company, the claimants, in the consequences which follow from the hazardous possession of sufficient knowledge to condemn them. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

HARRISONS LIMITED v. SHIPPING CONTROLLER. (a)

Charter-party — War risks — Stranding of ship— Sailing in convoy—Consequences of hostilities or warlike operations.

The steamship I. was at all material times under requisition by the Admiralty under the terms of the charter-party T. 99. Under this charter-party the Admiralty were not liable for ordinary risks at sea, but undertook to be liable for risks from all "consequences of hostilities or warlike operations." The I. was under orders to sail and did sail from Salonica to Taranto, in Italy. She had on board hospital stores for the British Government, and carried a few British troops and officers. When nearing Taranto she was navigated without lights, being then in the war zone. She was escorted by a British destroyer. No lights on shore were visible, and she was ordered by the commander of the destroyer to follow a pilot escort which had come out of Taranto. This order she complied with, although without such an order the master would not have attempted to enter the port. Almost immediately after being ordered to follow the pilot escort the I. lost sight of her lights and was stranded on the rocks just outside the port of Taranto.

Held, following the decision of the House of Lords in Green v. British India Steam Navigation Company (The Matiana) (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 513; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) A. C. 104), that, though the stranding of the I. took place while she was being navigated under war conditions, the damage done to her did not arise in consequence of warlike operations, and the Admiralty were not liable.

AWARD in the form of a special case stated by the arbitrator, Mr. R. A. Wright, K.C. The case raised an important question upon the construction of clauses 18 and 19 in charter-party T. 99.

The two clauses were as follows:

Clause 18. The Admiralty shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost, wrecked, or driven on shore, injured or rendered incapable of service by or in consequence of dangers of the sea or tempest, collision, fire, accident, stress of weather, or any other cause arising as a sea risk.

Clause 19. The risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following or similar but not more extensive clause: Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention and the consequences thereof or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after the declaration of war. Such risks are taken by the Admiralty on the ascertained value of the steamer if she be totally lost, or, if she be injured, on the ascertained value of such injury. Should a dispute arise as to the value of the steamer, the same shall be settled as laid down by clause 31.

A dispute arose between the owners and the Admiralty as to whether the Admiralty were liable to the owners for damage caused to the steamship Inkonka in consequence of her stranding on Capo St. Vito, in Italy, on the 17th Nov. 1917. The arbitrator found that the stranding was occasioned by the inefficient lights of the pilot escort, and was not a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations within clause 19 of charter-party T. 99, and that therefore the Admiralty were not liable.

The following facts were set out in the judgment of the learned judge:—

On the 14th Nov. 1917 the Inkonka sailed under Admiralty orders from Salonica, bound for Taranto, in Italy. She was laden with hospital stores for the British Government, and had on board a few British troops and officers. Before sailing she was furnished with a printed book (D.P. 20) which purported to describe the lights and entrance to the port of Taranto. This book, owing to recent changes, turned out to be incorrect.

On the 15th Nov. the Inkonka passed through Corinth Canal and proceeded towards Taranto. She was navigating in the war zone and therefore sailed without lights. She was escorted by a destroyer, H.M.S. Pincher. The weather was stormy. The master trusted to dead reckoning, but on the 17th Nov., about 6 p.m., he was enabled, through sighting three stars, to get a more accurate position. He then put his course N. ¾ E. At 9 p.m. he signalled H.M.S. Pincher, and said that he ought to have run his distance and should stop then if no lights were seen. At about 10 p.m. no shore lights were seen, but he was ordered by H.M.S. Pincher to follow a pilot escort which had come out of Taranto to escort vessels into the port and which exhibited two violet lights astern. The master thought he was about ten miles from Capo St. Vito (guarding the southern entrance to Taranto), which he thought was bearing N.E. This view was erroneous, but he had no light to guide him. The shore leading and other lights were not lighted in war time, unless ships were entering and then signalled. The night in question was dark and stormy. The master would not have tried to enter the port if he had not been ordered to do so by H.M.S. Pincher. Disobedience to those orders entailed a severe penalty. In view of the peremptory order he received, he relied, and could only rely, upon the pilot escort, and he followed her about two cables distant.

H.M.S. Pincher followed about one and a half cables behind the Inkonka. Another ship's light had been sighted by the Inkonka, and in fact, though the master did not know it, it was the light of H.M.S. Isonzo, which was also approaching Taranto, and which proceeded to follow astern of H.M.S. Pincher. At 10.30 p.m. certain shore lights appeared. In fact (though the master did not know it) these shore lights were the leading lights of the defended port of Taranto and had been turned on in response to signals from H.M.S. Isonzo. The master could not identify these lights by reason of the defective information in book D.P. 20. He therefore continued to follow the pilot escort ahead till he suddenly lost sight of her lights and could hear no whistle or signal from her or make out her hull. Two minutes after he had lost sight of the pilot escort a red light suddenly flashed on the port bow of the Inkonka, the master of which was still on the same course as when he had actually seen and been following the pilot escort lights. The master, seeing the red light on his port bow, immediately put his helm hard-a-port, and the Inkonka swung to starboard, and almost immediately afterwards ran ashore off Capo St. Vito; the red light was in fact the light on Capo St. Vito, though the book D.P. 20 did not indicate any such light. The master ported away from the light, hoping to swing round away from it, but in fact there was no room to turn, and porting brought the vessel right on the rocks. The master immediately signalled to H.M.S. Pincher that he was ashore, and H.M.S. Pincher got clear. H.M.S. Isonzo also picked up a pilot escort and, like H.M.S. Pincher, proceeded into port. It was not clear whether their pilot escort was the same pilot escort as that which had been leading the Inkonka.

By par. 7 of the award, if and so far as it was a question of fact the arbitrator found that the stranding of the Inkonka was caused by the inefficient lights of the pilot escort, and that, if the lights had been adequate having regard to the low visibility of the night, there was no reason why the Inkonka should not have safely followed the escort into Taranto, or should have been stranded.

By par. 8 he accordingly found (if and in so far as it was a question of fact) and he decided (if and in so far as it was a question of law and subject in that case to the opinion of the court) that the stranding was not a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations within clause 19 of T. 99.

Subject to the opinion of the court on any question of law, the arbitrator awarded that the Shipping Controller was not liable in respect of the matters in question to the owners. If the court should be of opinion that the award was not erroneous in law it was to stand; but if the court was of opinion that the award was erroneous in law it was to be set aside, and instead thereof it was to be that the Shipping Controller was liable to the owners in respect of the matters in question, the parties not having submitted to the arbitrator any question of amount or any question save that of liability.

Sir John Simon, K.C. and Neilson, K.C. for the shipowners.—The Admiralty are liable to the shipowners for damage caused to the Inkonka by stranding. The vessel was not incurring a "sea risk" within the meaning of clause 18 of the charter-party, but she was engaged in a "warlike operation" within the meaning of clause 19. She was under the orders of the British Admiralty, on a voyage from Salonica to Taranto, having on board troops and hospital stores for the British Government. She was navigating in the war zone under the escort of a British destroyer and bound to obey the orders of the commander. Under Admiralty regulations she sailed without lights. The stranding was a "consequence" of the warlike operations mentioned in clause 19, and the warlike operation was the proximate cause of her running on to the rocks. It is true that the fact of her being engaged in a warlike operation did not prevent her from navigating independently, and if, in order to avoid a sea risk, she had of her own accord tried to enter the port of Taranto, her own act would have been the proximate cause of damage. But the attempt to enter the port was made under the express order of the naval commander, which she was bound to obey, and formed part of the warlike operation which she was carrying out. The warlike operation was the proximate cause of the stranding, and the stranding was the consequence of the warlike operation:

> British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (The St. Oswald) 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270: 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K.B. 879.

There was no intervening cause which prevented the warlike operation from being the proximate cause of the disaster. Nor had those in charge of the vessel any time for exercising their discretion. The present case must be distinguished from the cases of Britain Steamship Company v. The King (The Petersham) (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 404; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 100) and from Green (The Matiana) v. British India Steam Navigation Company (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 513; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 104).

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and Raeburn, K.C. for the Shipping Controller.—The Admiralty are not liable for the damage caused to the Inkonka by stranding. The vessel at the time when the stranding occurred was not engaged in a "warlike operation" within the meaning of clause 19 of the charter-party. She was incurring a "sea risk" within the meaning of clause 18. It lies upon the shipowners to prove that the vessel was engaged in a warlike operation, and in this they have failed. She was engaged in transporting stores, a commercial operation, and the presence of a few troops on board does not turn the operation into one of a warlike character. Further, the stranding was not a "consequence" of a warlike operation even if the vessel were so engaged. The proximate cause of the stranding was the negligence of those navigating the vessel. They could have told the naval commander that they were not willing to enter the port of Taranto at night, and in that case the order would not have been enforced; but they did not adopt this course and were accordingly negligent. It was owing to carelessness that the vessel did not follow the course set by the pilot boat. In the case of Green (The Matiana) v. British India Steam Navigation Company (sup.), the House of Lords held that the cause of the loss was not a "warlike operation" under the terms of charter-party T. 99, and the same view ought to be taken by this court. The principle laid down in The Matiana case is the same as that involved in the present case. The presence of a few troops and stores on board the Inkonka is not sufficient to make a distinction between the two cases, and does not form a test as to the nature of the operation in which the vessel was engaged. It cannot be said that the carrying of troops, or the orders of the commander of the destroyer, was the proximate cause of the stranding. It was caused by the increase of a marine risk, and the vessel took this increased risk for the purpose of avoiding a war peril. The following cases may be referred to with advantage:

> Leyland Shipping Company v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society, 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 4, 258: 118 L. T. Rep. 120 (1918) A. C. 350;

The following judgment was read by

MCCARDIE, J. (after stating the facts the learned judge continued). — The question is whether, on the facts as I have stated them (apart from clauses 7 and 8), the stranding of the Inkonka was a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations. Inasmuch as the circumstances are stated by the arbitrator in full detail, I conceive that his summarised findings in clauses 7 and 8 of the award are open to review. The question becomes one of law immediately the full facts appear, and the master of the Inkonka has been exonerated from any negligence or breach of duty. My task as a judge of first instance is embarrassing. The burden rests upon me of interpreting as best I can the body of decisions which bear upon the point, and of eliciting the true effect of the opinions in the House of Lords in the recent cases of Britain Steamship Company v. The King (The Petersham) (sup.) and Green (The Matiana) v. British India Steam Navigation Company (sup.). Those weighty opinions represent not only a conflict of view between majority and minority, but also an apparent difference of opinion on several points between the distinguished Law Lords who formed the majority itself. It seems clear from the opinion of all in the House of Lords in those cases that the words "warlike operations" are a broader phrase than the word "hostilities." The question, therefore, comes to this: "Was the stranding of the Inkonka a consequence of warlike operations?" No definition has yet been given of that phrase. If given, it might have solved many of the difficulties which arise. Illustrations have been offered with frequency, and it is, of course, less difficult to illustrate than to define. The embarrassment of definition springs, I conceive, from the breadth of the phrase "warlike operations." It is a complex phrase. It denotes and connotes an infinity of varying circumstances. Just as it is difficult to define the words "fraud" or "accident," so with the phrase "warlike operations." Even the most exhaustive definition could scarcely comprise the differing circumstances which may arise. The problem is further and strikingly complicated by the fact that the words have to be considered in connection with the full phrase "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations." This word "consequences" introduces the ever-difficult question of causation as illustrated, for example, by Becker, Gray and Company v. London Assurance Corporation (14 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 156; (1918) A. C. 101). Causation involves the notion of sequence, and this notion has not as yet been fully grappled with or exhaustively treated. It is a topic of profound juristic complexity. The courts cannot act as metaphysical analysts. They can only administer or state the law in practical language upon particular aggregates of circumstance. But in such a case as the present it is always well to remember the cogent words of Lord Sumner in Becker, Gray and Co. v. London Assurance Corporation (sup.). "Cause and effect are the same for underwriters as for other people. Proximate cause is not a device to avoid the trouble of discovering the real cause or the 'common-sense cause' and though it has been and always should be rigorously applied in insurance cases, it helps the one side no oftener than it helps the other. I believe it to be nothing more nor less than the real meaning of the parties to a contract of insurance." It is always of vital importance to remember that clause 19 in this charter follows and is subject to clause 18. Clause 18 saves the Admiralty from liability for ordinary marine risks and perils of the sea. Clause 19 deals with a wholly different set of risks—namely, those which spring from hostilities or warlike operations. In time of war marine risks exist as fully, and perhaps more fully, than in time of peace; and they are none the less marine risks because their details may be coloured or added to, or the danger enlarged, by the existence of war-time conditions. It seems proper to distinguish between war-time conditions of merchantman traffic and the actual occurrence of warlike operations. The imposition of regulations upon merchantmen, whether such regulations be slight or stringent, and whether they be general or specific, does not of itself seem to constitute a warlike operation. If it were otherwise, then it would follow that upon the outbreak of war all British merchant ships became subject to, and participants in, warlike operations, inasmuch as they all fell within the compulsive area of Admiralty regulations.

The Defence of the Realm Act 1914 (5 Geo. 5, c. 8) provided by sect. 1, sub-sect. 1 (2), that for securing the public safety and the defence of the realm regulations might be made "to secure the navigation of vessels in accordance with directions given by or under the authority of the Admiralty." Under this statutory power cogent regulations were made, including (inter alia) regs. 36 to 39. Reg. 37 is as follows: "Every vessel shall comply with such regulations as to the navigation of vessels as may be issued by the Admiralty or Army Council, and shall obey any orders given, whether by way of signal or otherwise, by any officer in command of any of His Majesty's ships, or by any naval or military officer engaged in the defence of the coast. . . ." It is a criminal offence to disobey any such regulation or order. By sect. 46 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25) it was made a crime for the master of a merchantman under convoy of a British ship of war to disobey any lawful signal, instruction, or command of the commander of the convoy. Sect. 31 of the Naval Discipline Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. c. 109) provides as follows: "Every master or other officer in command of any merchant or other vessel under the convoy of any ship of Her Majesty shall obey the commanding officer thereof in all matters relating to the navigation or security of the convoy, and shall take such precautions for avoiding the enemy as may be directed by such commanding officer; and if he shall fail to obey such directions, such commanding officer may compel obedience by force of arms, without being liable for any loss of life or of property that may result from his using such force." I have quoted the above statutes and regulations, inasmuch as the argument of Sir John Simon for the owners of the Inkonka largely turned upon their compulsory and penal effect.

The contract now before us is a charter-party; but it is well to recall the words of Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Leyland Shipping Company v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society (sup.): "This doctrine of proximate cause will be considered in the same light whether in contracts of marine insurance or in contracts of sea carriage, and good sense suggests that it should be so." With this passage may be read the observations of Scrutton, L.J. and Mr. MacKinnon in their work on Charter-parties, 9th edit., art. 79, and notes. In The Leyland case (sup.) Lord Shaw of Dunfermline observed that "Causation is not a chain, but a net." I may venture to add that it is a net in which a judge of first instance may easily become entangled. Sect. 55, sub-sect. 1 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41) provides: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, and unless the policy otherwise provides, the insurer is liable for any loss proximately caused by a peril insured against, but subject as aforesaid he is not liable for any loss which is not proximately caused by a peril insured against." It will be observed that the words in the present charter-party are "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations"; but I conceive that since the decision in Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (sup.) in 1863, it is established law that the words "all consequences" must be treated as meaning the "totality of causes" not "their sequence, or their proximity or remoteness": (see per Willes, J. in that case and per Lord Sumner in The Matiana case (sup.).

Bearing the above-stated matters in mind, let me briefly deal with the facts of this case. In the first place, I think that the Inkonka was not herself engaged in a "warlike operation." She was a merchantman. So far as I know, she was not armed. She carried hospital stores for the British Government. She had no war material in the ordinary sense aboard. Her aim was to get as peacefully and expeditiously as she could from Salonica to Taranto. It is true that if assailed by a submarine she might have attacked the latter in defence by ramming; but the same might be said of all other merchant vessels, and such a contingency cannot of itself be said to find her within the area of "warlike operations." She was never, in fact, attacked, nor is there any evidence that hostile craft were in her proximity. It is true that she had on board a few British troops and officers; but it does not appear whether they were invalids or not. Probably they were invalids or convalescents. She was not a transport in the ordinary sense. If she had been such a vessel it might be held that she was engaged in warlike operations. In The Petersham case (sup.) Lord Atkinson said: "The transfer of the combative forces of a power from one area of war to another or from one part of an area of war to another part, for combative purposes, would, I think, be a warlike operation." Assuming that this passage is agreeable to the other opinions in the House of Lords, yet I think that Lord Atkinson only meant to refer to vessels which were either vessels of war or transports in the ordinary sense. The dominant features of the ship and the dominant object of her voyage must, I humbly venture to think, be looked at. It cannot be that the presence of a few soldiers aboard, whether wounded or unwounded, turns a merchantman into a transport or changes an otherwise peaceful voyage into a warlike undertaking. Many merchantmen during the war carried several Royal Navy men for the purpose of serving the protective guns, or for other reasons. Such fact would not, I conceive, turn a merchantman into the equivalent of a man-of-war. If it did, then the liability of war-risk insurers would be vastly increased. There is here no finding of fact on this point by the arbitrator which could lead to the conclusion that the Inkonka was herself engaged in a warlike operation. This view is, I believe, consonant with the opinion expressed by Roche, J. in Owners of Steamship Larchgrove v. The King (sup.). The facts in the British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (sup.) were quite different. Apart from the admission made by the Crown in that case, it is to be noted that the vessel there in question, the St. Oswald, was actually engaged as a transport in the Eastern Mediterranean, and assisting in the evacuation of troops from Gallipoli. Now the Inkonka here was, of course, sailing without lights in a war region; but it is now clear from The Petersham and The Matiana cases (sup.) that an ordinary merchantman is none the less engaged on an operation of peace rather than an operation of war because she is without lights pursuant to imperative Admiralty directions. The Inkonka was also sailing under convoy of H.M.S. Pincher, and was under enforceable obedience to her. A convoy has been described by Maude and Pollock on Merchant Shipping as "a naval force, consisting of a ship or ships appointed by the Government, or by the commander of a station, to escort and protect merchant ships proceeding to certain parts." I presume that a convoy may consist of one war vessel only escorting a single merchantman. It is now clear from the majority opinions in The Matiana case that a merchantman under naval convoy, and bound to obey that convoy, is not thereby engaged in a warlike operation. The convoy may be so engaged, but the merchantman convoyed sails on a different footing. I may invoke the striking and cogent illustration given by Atkin, L.J. in the Court of Appeal in The Matiana case (sup.). He said: "The warships are engaged in the warlike operation of protecting non-combatant vessels from the enemy. The merchant vessels are engaged in the peacelike operation of conveying merchandise by sea. The sheep are not the shepherd, and are not engaged in the operation of shepherding." I infer from the general body of opinion in the House of Lords in The Petersham and Matiana cases (sup.) that the naval convoy in this present case should be deemed to be engaged in a warlike operation. I doubt if Lord Sumner expressed any definite view on the matter, but I think that such is the broad result of the general opinion in those cases. If so, then the question still remains whether the Inkonka was stranded as a "consequence of warlike operations." Lord Cave, in The Petersham case (sup.) put the point as follows: "It is necessary to show first that there were hostilities or warlike operations which could have caused the collision; and, secondly, that the collision was a direct and proximate consequence of those hostilities or warlike operations. It was mainly upon this second point that the opinions in the House of Lord differed in The Matiana case (sup.). It is essential to ascertain the view of the majority of the law Lords in that case.

The broad facts in The Matiana case (sup.) were these. She was sailing under convoy and without lights. She was bound to obey the orders of the convoy, and was under their compelling directions. She was in a region infested with submarines. The senior naval officer ordered a change of route. The Matiana accordingly changed her course. She was bound to do so. Then an order to zigzag was given. The Matiana obeyed it. About two hours afterwards she struck a small unlighted reef. The night was calm. No breakers were seen before she struck. Her master was blameless. He was, by order of the escort, travelling upon an unusual route. If the order had not been given, or if the reef had been lighted, the accident would not have occurred. Upon these facts the majority of the law Lords held that there was no loss in consequence of a warlike operation. This ruling is of far-reaching effect. It establishes that if a merchantman is lost by striking a rock or stranding or the like peril of the sea, whilst being compelled by an accompanying escort to take an unusual route, and/or to navigate either zigzag or in some other unusual manner, the loss is a peril of the sea, and not, without more, a consequence of warlike operations. I feel that this ruling is substantially inconsistent with the dictum of that great lawyer Swinfen Eady, M.R. in British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (sup.), where, in reference to that case (where the St. Oswald, sailing without lights, pursuant to Admiralty orders, collided with a French battleship) he said: "What occasioned the collision? And the answer is that it was solely occasioned by obedience to orders to sail without lights and to go at full speed. Such a proceeding was in defiance of the rules of good seamanship, but necessitated by the exigencies of the warlike operations then in progress."

In my humble opinion, the facts in the present case cannot be distinguished from the facts in The Matiana case (sup.). The details vary, but the salient features are alike. Just as collision is, primâ facie, a marine risk, so stranding is, primâ facie, a marine risk. Just as the Matiana was ordered to take an unusual course, so the Inkonka was ordered to enter Taranto when her master, as a matter of good seamanship, would have desired otherwise. Just as the Matiana was under the compulsion of her escort, so the Inkonka was under the compulsion of H.M.S. Pincher. Just as the Matiana struck a reef, so the Inkonka went ashore. Just as the Matiana was held to have suffered from a sea risk, so I hold that the Inkonka suffered also from a sea risk. I see no material distinction between the two cases.

The arbitrator here found as a fact that the stranding of the Inkonka was caused by the inefficient lights of the pilot escort, and that if those lights had been adequate there was no reason why the Inkonka should not have safely reached Taranto. If the element of compulsion by H.M.S. Pincher be eliminated, this present case seems to bear much resemblance to Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (sup.). There the Linwood got ashore because a light had been removed from Cape Hatteras in the course of the Civil War by the Confederate troops. Had the light been burning, the Linwood, a Federal ship, would not have been wrecked. It was held that the proximate cause of the loss was a peril of the sea, and not the hostile act of the Confederate troops in extinguishing the light.

In the present case I support the award of the arbitrator. I hold that although the Inkonka was stranded whilst being navigated under war conditions, yet her damage did not arise in consequence of warlike operations. Many decisions were cited to me by Sir John Simon and Mr. Neilson for the owners, and by Mr. Raeburn for the Shipping Controller. If the case had been free from authority, I should have ventured, with the greatest diffidence, to state the rules which, I think, might well prevail upon the points at issue in this and other cases under clause 19, but there is now much authority on the matter. Unhappily, however, it is in a state of great doubt and complexity. I find it most difficult to extract any guiding principle from the judgments. Dictum conflicts with dictum, and decision opposes decision. A judge of first instance is indeed embarrassed in analysing and weighing the various and variant opinions of great authorities. I have, therefore, abstained from expressing any view save that which directly bears upon the present case, and I omit any expression of opinion upon such a point, for example, as to whether or not Ard Coasters v. The King (sup.), and Richard de Larrinaga v. Admiralty Commissioners (sup.) are consistent with the opinion given by the House of Lords in The Petersham and The Matiana cases (sup.). I venture to respectfully express the hope that an authoritative formulation may before long be given which will remove the existing doubts, settle the relevant principles, and guide the daily application of the law. I uphold the award of the arbitrator in this case. The owners of the Inkonka must pay the costs of the proceedings before me.

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Carriage of contraband—Allowances of freight—Discretion and jurisdiction.

The Prize Court has jurisdiction to award freight in respect of the carriage of contraband goods which have been condemned, but the exercise of the discretion to allow it is very rare, and depends upon the particular circumstances of each case.

Held, in the present case that ignorance of neutral shipowners as to the enemy destination of contraband goods, their conduct in informing the British authorities of the proposed shipment, and their services in carrying the goods from a neutral port did not provide a sufficient foundation upon which a discretion to allow freight could properly be exercised.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Prize Court dated the 31st March 1920.

The appeal was by the Procurator-General from an order of the President (Sir Henry Duke) awarding freight to the respondents, neutral shipowners, in respect of the carriage of 1780 bags of cocoa, shipped in the steamship Prins der Nederlanden, and condemned as contraband having an enemy destination.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), Branson, and Harold Murphy for the appellant, the Procurator-General.

Dunlop, K.C. and Darby for the respondents.

Lord SUMNER.—In this case the Procurator-General, having obtained a decree for the condemnation of cargo as contraband, appeals against the President's allowance of freight on it to the Koninklijke West Indische Maildienst, the owners of the carrying vessel the Prins der Nederlanden.

The allowance of freight for the carriage of contraband is undoubtedly very rare. Two reported cases only have been found in which it has been ordered, The Brita Cœcilia (Hay & Marriott, 234) and The Neptunus (3 C. Rob. 108). Other cases in Hay and Marriott, in which freight was in fact given, appear to have been cases where the cargo was the produce of the shipowners' own country or cases of pre-emption of ship's stores for the use of the Crown. In the first case nothing is recorded but the bare fact, in the other the allowance was made, though in argument the captors had contested its competence. It is, therefore, a decision in favour of the jurisdiction and the circumstance that the contraband articles were but "in a small quantity amongst a variety of other articles" may have influenced the learned judge, but more probably as the ground on which he exercised his discretionary jurisdiction in favour of the ship, than as the test for deciding in which cases such a jurisdiction is exercisable at all. Certainly the Neptunus is not, as the appellant argued, a mere instance of de minimis non curat lex. During the present war Sir Samuel Evans recognised the existence of such a discretionary jurisdiction in The Jeanne (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 115 L. T. Rep. 838; (1917) P. 8), but he did not exercise it. The cases of condemnation of contraband goods, where the reports expressly state that the ship lost her freight, are very numerous, and as long ago as The Sarah Christina (1 C. Rob. 237) in 1799, "I shall content myself," Sir William Scott says, "with the restitution of the ship, withholding as usual on the carriage of contraband the allowance of freight and expenses," a mode of expression which seems to suggest the exercise of a discretion to withhold what he had jurisdiction to allow (see, too, The Ringende Jacob, 1 C. Rob. 89; and The Neutralitet, 3 C. Rob. 294), and Mr. Wheaton's note to The Commercen (1 Wheat. 382) observes that on the carriage of contraband "freight is almost always refused" in British courts. This is stated, too, as the standing rule in works of authority such as Pratt's Story (pp. 92 and 93), Hall's International Law, Part 4, chap. 26, sect. 4), and Holland's Prize Law (sect. 83). The first even states that the shipowner "is never allowed freight . . . upon the carriage of contraband goods, nor where there has been a spoliation of papers," which is probably a mere statement of the practice, not a proposition as to jurisdiction. Of course, if goods have only been made contraband during the voyage, the shipowner may be in a different position.

In the present case the Procurator-General's argument denies such a jurisdiction altogether and contends that in the case of contraband any allowance of freight is incompetent; if so, The Neptunus was wrongly decided and in The Sarah Christina Sir William Scott understated the law. No authority in support of the point is forthcoming.

The theory on which, in any case, a Court of Prize allows to carriers a freight on cargo condemned is not very consistent or logical. It is plain that when it does so at the expense of captors, it is not on the footing of any prior obligation legally binding upon them. They have entered into no contract; they have made no request for services to be rendered; there is, so far as they are concerned, no promise to pay, express or implied. When they bring in the ship and claim condemnation of the goods carried they act wholly ex adverso towards the carrier, and solely in the exercise of superior belligerent rights. By placing the goods in the marshal's hands they determine the carrier's lien, and the issue of a decree of condemnation, at any rate, involves the frustration of the voyage. On the other hand, the carrier's personal contract with the shippers or other parties, who are liable to pay freight, either subsists and may be enforced or is determined by the inability of the carrier to bring the goods to the agreed port of discharge and there deliver them, an inability in respect of which he has no legal rights or grievance against the successful captor. Whether his inability to sue for freight arises because his contract, or the law applicable to it, provides for payment of freight only on the completion of the voyage and right delivery of the cargo, and does not provide for freight pro rata itineris, or whether his inability to obtain it is caused by his having lost his lien and so having no possessory right to enforce or to release against good consideration, it arises at any rate from acts, which, so far as the captors are concerned, give him no right to damages, when they are followed by a decree of condemnation.

It is said that the carrier has enhanced the value of the goods captured by bringing them to the place of capture, and that the captor should not be allowed to appropriate this enhanced value without payment. This, however, leads to no clear principle. It would be equally true and so it ought to be equally applicable, whatever the grounds for condemning the goods, whether the freight is prepaid or not, and whether or not the carrier has an available legal remedy against strangers. In fairness he might be deemed to receive it to the use of the party who has prepaid, or in satisfaction of the liability of the party who is still liable to pay, but these considerations merely go to the person to whom the compensation ought ultimately to be paid, and not to the propriety of saddling the captor with freight on the prize condemned in his favour. In all cases if the prize was condemned freight free, the captor would be getting something for nothing, and if so, on this view, he ought to pay in all cases even in cases of contraband or of prepaid freight, and the measure of his payment would be the increased value of the goods, if any, and not, or not merely, a fair return to the ship owner for the carriage performed. If the allowance of freight on goods condemned rests on the view that the captor is getting something of value from the carrier, what distinction is there between cases of contraband cargo where freight is refused and cases of capture of enemy property, not contraband, where it is allowed? (The Emanuel, 1 C. Rob. 296; The Commercen, 1 Wheat. 387). In each case the value added to the goods by the carriage is added by conduct on the carrier's part, which is not wrongful in itself, though the belligerent has the right to interrupt and prevent it.

On the other hand, ignorance (a term perhaps more appropriate than innocence, both to the occupation of shipowning and the carrier's actual relation to the carriage of contraband) would become a highly material consideration if disallowance of freight on contraband rests truly on the theory of its being a penalty. Nevertheless the contrary has been held (The Oster Risoer, 4 C. Rob., 195). If the penalty is inflicted for the commission of an offence, proof of bonâ fide ignorance of the facts constituting the offence surely merits an acquittal. It is suggested that in this connection the present respondents were put on inquiry because a German steamer had brought the cocoa to Las Palmas and a German agent looked after the transhipment there, and because the original voyage on which the cocoa was shipped before the outbreak of war was to Germany, though owing to the war it had been discontinued. It seems to their Lordships that these circumstances would, if anything, rather lull than excite suspicion in the respondents of a substituted transit to Germany to be effected by getting the cocoa taken in the Prins der Nederlanden to a Dutch port, and there consigned to the Netherlands Overseas Trust.

The term penalty, however, though often mentioned (e.g., in the Commercen at p. 394), is not in this connection really one which implies that the carriage of contraband is attended with the usual incidents of the commission of an offence. Neutrals who carry contraband do not break the law of nations; they run a risk for adequate gain, and, if they are caught, they take the consequences. If they know what they are doing, those consequencies may be very serious; if they do not, they may get off merely with some inconvenience or delay. This must suffice them. Having done their best to aid one belligerent by carrying contraband for him, they cannot ask that the other shall pay the penalty for his own success in defeating the attempt by rewarding the neutral carrier as if his venture had succeeded. That would be to encourage the carrying of contraband, whereas it is a thing to be deterred. Nor should ignorance of what he is doing be a safeguard to the carrier. If he is to be deterred, it must be made worth his while to know, in order that he may prefer to abstain.

It seems therefore, to follow that, when freight is allowed, it is from the court's view of fair dealing towards parties whose conduct is not open to blame, and it is refused in order to protect the effectual exercise of belligerent rights. Reasons of this kind seem founded rather in policy and discretion than in legal rule and legal right. There are many passages to be found in the reported decisions which point in this direction. Thus if a neutral vessel is captured with enemy cargo she is discharged with full freight; "no blame attaches to her; she is ready and able to proceed to the completion of the voyage, and is only stopped by the incapacity of the cargo" (The Fortuna, 1809, Edw. 56, 57). "This rule was introduced for the benefit of the shipowners and to prevent the rights of war from pressing with too much severity upon neutral navigation" (The Prosper, 1809, Edw. 72, 76). On the other hand, Sir William Scott speaks of the whole law of contraband as a matter of the practice of the court (Jonge Tobias, 1 C. Rob., 329), and implies that although the court can relax, and has relaxed its practice in other directions in this respect, it will introduce no alteration (Sarah Christina, 1 C. Rob. 237), or only in very special circumstances (The America, 3 C. Rob. 36). Some difficulty, it is true, may be felt on the other side. The allowance of freight may be very fair to the neutral shipowner, and yet quite the reverse for the captors, at whose expense the freight will be found, whether charged on the proceeds of the prize or directly decreed against them. If captors have the right to prevent the cargo from reaching its destination, why must they pay for the exercise of that right; why is not capture and condemnation to the neutral carrier what perils of the sea are, a risk of the adventure? For practical purposes it is enough to say that such is the law of nations, as administered in Courts of Prize; but the theory of it must be that the court, endeavouring to hold an even balance between belligerent rights and the rights of neutral trade, requires that the captors' windfall shall suffer some abatement under circumstances of legitimate carriage and will only adjudge the res in its hands to those who, in placing it there, have submitted to its jurisdiction, after fair consideration for those who lose by mere misfortune and without fault. Now a jurisdiction to do what is fair in the circumstances of a given case is essentially a jurisdiction which is discretionary in its exercise. Long practice now forbids that discretion to be exercised so as to deprive shipowners of freight which has long been regularly allowed to them; but it is still open to the court to make a discretionary allowance when circumstances are wholly exceptional.

On this reasoning their Lordships find it impossible to accede to the contention that there is never any jurisdiction to allow freight on contraband goods condemned. Not only would this overrule The Neptunus and falsify sundry passages which describe the disallowance of freight as usual, not as inevitable, but it would be inconsistent with the theory that the claim for freight rests rather on an appeal on the court's duty of protecting neutrals than on a liability in the captors. Their Lordships are not minded to disclaim a jurisdiction, which may enable a Court of Prize to secure to neutrals in suitable cases a return for work done in the way of their trade and without circumstances of disregard of neutral obligations in the course of it.

At the trial the Procurator-General did not prove that the shipowners had any knowledge of the destination of the cargo, though there is some difference of opinion whether he admitted that they had none. The President was evidently satisfied that they were ignorant of it, and upon this and upon the advantage derived by the captors from the carriage of the goods he decided to exercise his discretion in favour of allowing freight. Before their Lordships the claim put forward by the shipowners was a far-reaching one, for they claimed a right to freight unless it could be shown against them that they knew they were carrying contraband. If so, the owner of a general ship would rarely lose his freight, for captors could seldom hope to bring such knowledge home to him, considering how numerous and often how small are the separate parcels shipped, and in what haste they are often taken on board. In cases of continuous voyage a similar difficulty would arise even for entire cargoes, and such a rule would in the case of cargoes wholly or mainly contraband have no middle term between forfeiture of the ship and release of it with an allowance of freight. It is not too much to require that shipowners should know both the contents of belligerents' proclamations as to contraband and the descriptions of the goods entered in their own manifests. How it might be, if contraband articles were fraudulently concealed in seemingly innocent packages or disguised by the shippers under a plausible misdescription, need not now be decided. The shipowner always has the remedy in his own hands if he requires his freight to be prepaid, and the general practice in the late war to do so shows how available such a remedy is. Their Lordships, therefore, think that the exercise of a discretion to allow freight on contraband ought not to turn merely on the question whether the shipowner knew or did not know the character of his cargo, still less that proof of his ignorance should be treated as a title to a decree for freight.

In the present case the shipowners rely, in addition to their ignorance, upon the candour with which they facilitated the task of the detaining officers by giving early and regular notice of the parcels they were bringing forward from their different ports of call. Certainly their Lordships would not wish to belittle the assistance which such practices, if widely adopted, would give to the capturing power; but it would be idle not to observe that these timely intimations principally served to minimise delay to the line of steamers concerned, and to promote good relations between their owners and the British Government. Their Lordships are unable to find, either in this course or in the respondents' ignorance, or in their meritorious service in carrying the cargo to the place where it was captured, or in the combination of these circumstances, a sufficient foundation upon which, in accordance with the current of decisions, a discretion in favour of allowing freight could be properly exercised, and they, therefore, think that the learned President's decision was wrong. Having come to this conclusion, their Lordships think it undesirable to endeavour to indicate what circumstances would have justified an allowance of freight. As the question is essentially one of discretion, this ought to be decided in each case in the first instance by the judge of the Prize Court on the circumstances as they arise before him. It also makes it unnecessary to examine at length the two subsidiary points as to the freight on the return voyage by the Lapwing or the argument derived from the alleged continuing liability of Onnes and Son. As to the first, they think that the Lapwing brought back the goods to England as part of an arrangement to avoid delay to the Prins der Nederlanden, and therefore for the benefit of the respondents. The overcarriage and return of the cargo could not benefit the captors. In no case, therefore, would they allow the Lapwing's freight. As to the second, even if Onnes and Son are still under a liability for freight, the circumstance seems to be irrelevant. If the captors ought to pay, it does not release them from liability that discharge of their obligation may prove an advantage to these very undeserving persons. On the other hand, viewing the refusal of freight as a matter of penalty, no one can regret it if the shipowners prove to be able to mitigate the effect of it by enforcing a liability on Onnes.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed with costs, and that the decree made by the learned President should be set aside.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, April 20, 1921.

DENHOLM LIMITED v. SHIPPING CONTROLLER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter - party — Requisitioned ship — T. 99 (clause 25)—Cargo of coal — Fire in cargo — "Accident" — Whether "accident" limited to ship or includes cargo.

The concluding lines of clause 25 (b) of the charter-party T. 99, which provide that "if through any accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and reloading the same is to be deducted from the hire," are not limited to an accident to the ship, but include an accident to the cargo.

So held by Bankes and Atkin, L.JJ. (Scrutton, L.J. doubting).

Judgment of McCardie, J. (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 141; 124 L. T. Rep. 378) reversed.

APPEAL by the Shipping Controller from a judgment of McCardie, J. on an award in the form of a special case.

The claimants were Messrs. Denholm Limited, the owners of the steamship Carron Park. The respondent was the Shipping Controller. The Carron Park was requisitioned by the respondent under the terms of a charter-party known as T. 99, clause 25 of which provided:

(a) If from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or any other cause, the working of the steamer is at any time suspended for a period exceeding twelve running hours, pay shall cease for the whole of such and any subsequent period, of whatever duration, during which the vessel is inefficient.

(b) Partial inefficiency. Any work that may be done during a period of partial inefficiency of the steamer, except proceeding to a port for repairs, or to replenish bunker coals owing to an accident, shall be paid for on the basis of the time it would have occupied had the steamer remained efficient. If upon the voyage her speed be reduced by a defect in or breakdown of any part of her machinery, damage to propeller, rudder, or by any other mishap of hull or engines or cargo, the time so lost and the cost of any extra coal consumed in consequence thereof shall be deducted from the hire; but should the steamer be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather or for coals, such detention or loss of time shall be at the Admiralty's expense. In the event, however, of breakdown at sea or other accident necessitating the steamer proceeding to a port of refuge for repairs, or to replace or land crew, hire to cease until the steamer arrives back in a similar position to that in which she was at the time of the breakdown or accident, &c., and any coals used to be replaced or paid for by owners, whichever the Admiralty may elect.

Sub-clause (c), with the marginal note, "Period of inefficiency not to count," was as follows:

If through accident any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged, the time occupied in discharging and reloading same to be deducted from the hire. Any time so lost shall count as part of the term of the charter named in clauses 2 and 7, but the Admiralty have the option of keeping the steamer for an additional period equivalent to the whole or part of the time lost.

The ship loaded a cargo of coal and left the docks of her port of loading. While lying at anchor, fog-bound, outside the docks, a fire broke out in the cargo of coal in one of the holds and the ship had to return to dock to discharge some of the cargo to get at the fire and extinguish it. No damage was done to the ship. The Shipping Controller claimed, under the above clause, to deduct from the hire the time occupied in the operations rendered necessary by the outbreak of fire.

McCardie, J. held that the outbreak of fire in the cargo was not an "accident" within the above clause; that in any case the words "accident" in the concluding lines of clause 25 (b) was limited to an accident to the ship and did not include an accident to the cargo; and that the Shipping Controller was not entitled to the cesser of hire which he claimed.

The Shipping Controller appealed.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of McCardie, J. in favour of the shipowners. The dispute between the parties is in reference to the proper construction of clause 25 of the charter known as T. 99, under which this vessel the Carron Park was being worked at the time of the matters which give rise to this dispute. She was loaded with a cargo of coal at Barry. She put to sea; she was detained in Barry Roads by fog, and whilst she was there, the cargo caught fire; and, as a result, she had to put back to Barry, and it was thought prudent to discharge some portion of her cargo. It was discharged, and ultimately fresh cargo was put into her. The question is whether, under the terms of the charter-party, the charterers are entitled to deduct all or part of the time occupied in unloading and reloading the cargo from the hire. The matter went before an arbitrator who stated a special case, and I think that he has found that there was an accident in fact on board this vessel, and that the accident was the cargo catching fire. I think the case before the arbitrator was fought upon the assumption that there was an accident in fact, and that the dispute between the parties was whether the word "accident" used in the material part of clause 25 (b) referred to an accident to the vessel, or included also an accident to the cargo; and I think that the special case was stated upon the footing that an accident had in fact happened, and that the arbitrator desired the opinion of the court as to whether or not the contention of the one party or the other in reference to that accident was correct.

A great part of McCardie, J.'s judgment is occupied in considering whether there was an accident at all. With respect to the learned judge, I do not think that point was open to him, or to the parties, and therefore I proceed upon the footing that what happened on this vessel was an accident, and the only question is whether it is the kind of accident which is contemplated by the material part of this clause which excludes the charterer from the payment of hire during the period occupied in loading and discharging the cargo. The clause is not well drafted, and read as the charterer wishes it to be read, it certainly does introduce an unusual provision, I think, in another part. Our attention has been called to the clause where the owner is responsible for ventilation. That may be usual, but the owner is made responsible also for the stevedores. It may be that the charter was drawn to include matters which are not quite usual because the draughtsman intended to insert an unusual provision in this clause 25. I do not think that one is entitled to speculate as to why this particular sentence was introduced into this clause, and unless it was so obviously improbable that one can say it is impossible that anybody ever could have intended either to insert such a clause or to agree to it, I think one must construe it according to the language used.

The constructions sought to be put upon the clause are: the construction of the charterer is that the last sentence but one, which provides that if, through any accident, any part of the cargo or bunkers have to be discharged the time occupied in discharging and reloading the same is to be deducted from the hire, is to be read as a provision independent of what has preceded it, and that the words are to be used in their natural meaning. If that is the true view, it seems to me to be obvious that the charterer is right, because there is no qualification on the word "accident" at all, and the words are just as much appropriate to an accident to the cargo as to an accident to the ship. The contention on the other side, as I understand, is that the earlier part of that clause is dealing with accidents to the ship, and, inasmuch as the earlier part of the clause is dealing with accidents to the ship, so you should read the whole clause, wherever it refers to "accident," as accident to the ship, or, possibly as an alternative, the suggestion, as I understand it, is that the earlier part of the clause is dealing with causes which may result in loss of time, and which may result in a stoppage of hire, and this last sentence but one is dealing with the same clause to an additional extent—that is to say that, if for one of the causes enumerated above the steamer is delayed, then the hire proceeded, but it may be that, in addition to being merely delayed, the cargo may have to be discharged and reloaded; and if therefore from the same accident referred to above this consequence follows, then the hire is to cease. The choice is between those two constructions. For some time I hesitated as to the view taken by the learned judge that this clause was not sufficiently clearly expressed to deprive the owner of the hire to which he was entitled under the earlier part of the charter, and I have hesitated whether or not that is not the view which should be taken of this dispute. But having given the matter the most careful attention I can, I think that there is no sufficient ground for saying that these words in the last clause but one are not plain, and that what really leads one to doubt about the matter is not because of any infirmity of the language, but a feeling in one's own mind that one does not quite understand why this clause should have been inserted. That does not seem to be enough, if the words are plain, and I decide in this case, because, in my opinion, the words are so plain that it is not reasonably possible to take the view that the clause has not sufficiently clearly expressed the intention that hire shall cease.

In those circumstances I think that this appeal succeeds.

Scrutton, L.J.—I wish I was in a position to express my view about the first point. My brothers have felt able to come to a clear view as to what this clause means. I at present am in the position that I do not know what it means. I doubt whether my brothers are right, but I am not clear enough as to the alternative view to give a dissenting judgment. I do not suppose that state of mind will be satisfactory to either of the parties, and it certainly is not satisfactory to myself. I think there is a great deal to be said for the view my brothers are taking that there is here an accident: that part of the cargo or bunkers had to be discharged through an accident, and that the time occupied in discharging or reloading the same has to be deducted from the hire. I quite feel the force of the statement that they are words which in their ordinary meaning do cover a view in favour of the charterer. On the other hand, I have very great difficulty in understanding why the accident to the cargo, with which the ship has nothing to do, should deprive the ship of its hire; and I think there is a good deal to be said for the view that this clause is dealing with accidents which render the ship inefficient, and is guarding against the view that the ship, being efficient to discharge and efficient to reload, though not efficient to proceed, hire must be paid for the time in discharging and reloading, which is a view which has been taken by Bailhache, J. in a case cited as to reloading. The whole clause is very different from the ordinary clauses in a time charter in ordinary commercial matters, which provide exactly the opposite to this one as to accidents which may occur. Having clear words on one side, and those doubts as to the reason on the other, I regret to say that I am, at the present moment, quite in doubt as to what the clause means, and I therefore do not feel justified in either agreeing or dissenting, although, as I say, I do not pretend for a moment that it is a satisfactory state of mind to be in. But it is my state of mind.

Atkin, L.J.—It appears to me, on the whole, that the charterer's contention is correct in this case. I know of no artificial rule of construction in construing charter-parties by which the words are to be used in favour of the shipowner, unless some very special degree of clarity is employed in using words in favour of the charterer. It appears to me you have got to give to the words used their plain and ordinary meaning, of course, considering the whole context.

Now, taking the whole context in this case, we have got an off hire clause, and there is a reference to this clause three or four times to "accidents" and one to "mishap." "Accident" is not defined at all, and I am of opinion that throughout the clause "accident" means what it says, namely, any accident. But in a prior part of the clause it is an accident having certain consequences—namely, making the ship inefficient. I can conceive an accident to the cargo which would make the ship inefficient, and, if so, I think it would be such an accident as is referred to in the former part of the clause. It is an accident; but it is quite plain, I think, that the first two paragraphs of the clause relate to accidents which have the result of making the ship inefficient. In this particular clause the same word is used. Now the words in this particular sentence seem to me to be simple words, and not to admit of any ambiguity. "Accident," to my mind, means any kind of accident, and one does not limit it, in my view, to an accident to the ship or an accident to the cargo. It might be an accident to the crew, it might be any accident which causes a part of the cargo or bunkers to be discharged, and, if so, the time occupied in discharging and reloading the same is to be deducted from the hire. It has been a little difficult, to my mind, to find out exactly what is the restriction sought to be imposed by the shipowners. Sometimes it is said to be an accident to the ship; at other times it is said to be an accident causing the ship to be inefficient. I use no reason for introducing any of those limitations into this sentence. The word used is entirely a general word, and it appears to me unnecessary to consider the motives for putting this clause in, or to consider whether it is reasonable or unreasonable, except this, of course: If the clause as so construed led to a manifest absurdity, you perhaps would have to construe the word in a sense which did not lead to the absurdity, but it seems to me—I appreciate the difficulties that have been put by my brothers, which I feel the force of—that sometimes there are conditions which, I think, might make this a reasonable contract. The ship is responsible for stowage, or makes itself responsible for the stevedores, and the ship is responsible for the ventilation; it might be that, by reason of something done or omitted to be done in respect of these two matters, an accident to the cargo might arise. I see no reason myself why, under these circumstances, the ship should not have undertaken that any detention which is caused by such act or omission on the part of the persons for whom the ship was responsible should not be for ship's account. Again, the accident might be such an accident to cargo as would involve the common safety both of the cargo and of the ship, and indeed this seems to be a typical kind of accident, because if the cargo gets on fire, damage to the ship is just as likely to follow as damage to the cargo and, under the circumstances, if the ship puts back, for what is, after all, in substance the necessity of the common adventure, I see no reason why the parties might not reasonably have stipulated that the detention should be for the shipowners' account; in other words, the charterer has not to bear the loss himself.

I am not at all sure that the words do not, in addition—I think they probably do—cover the case of accident to the ship alone where, in order to repair the ship, the cargo has to be taken out and then has to be put back again. The case of Thomas Smailes and Sons v. Evans and Reid Limited (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59; 116 L. T. Rep. 595; (1917) 2 K. B. 54) dealt with that. It seems to me, as I say, that there is no reason to import any particular limitation in these words. They are reasonably plain; if so, I think it is our duty to give effect to them. I agree that the question of whether here there was an accident or not is not open, and was not intended to be open on the case, because the arbitrator has found this was an accidental fire.

I think there was every ground for saying that the fire breaking out in the coal cargo in this manner was, in fact, itself an accident; however, the point does not seem to me to be open.

BANKES, L.J.—We think that the time that should be excluded should include all the time from the moment when the discharge of the cargo commenced until the time that the fresh cargo was completely put on board; assuming, of course, that the whole of that time was occupied according to the custom of the port in either unloading or loading. You would not, for instance, exclude mealtimes, nor night, if it is in accordance with the practice of the port not to load; but, of course, if there was time lost by reason of this cargo being diverted to another vessel and fetching fresh coal, that would have to be excluded. If those figures can be agreed we can enter a judgment that will cover the matter; if not, then we will send it back to the arbitrator.

Appeal allowed.

SANDAY AND Co. v. STRATH STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Short delivery—Claim against shipowner—Mistake—Onus of proof—How discharged.

The plaintiffs claimed from the defendants, who were shipowners, damages for short delivery of a cargo of linseed from Argentina. The plaintiffs said that they delivered on board the defendants' ship at Buenos Ayres, 17,104 bags of Plate linseed for carriage to London. The defendants by their bill of lading and mate's receipts admitted that they received that number of bags on board. The defendants only delivered 16,948 bags in London. The bags delivered on board at Buenos Ayres were tallied by tallymen on behalf of both the plaintiffs and the defendants; and as to 2085 bags, by three tallymen. The tallymen all agreed as to the number of bags delivered to the ship, but an error appeared in one tally book and an alteration in another. The total amount arrived at by the tallymen was accepted by the mate for the purpose of the mate's receipt and was accepted as correct for the purpose of insertion in the bills of lading signed by the master. It was clear on the evidence that there was no possibility of loss by theft or otherwise during the voyage. The learned judge, therefore, found that it was proved beyond a reasonable doubt that all the bags and their contents that were received by the ship from the plaintiffs at Buenos Ayres were delivered by the ship to the plaintiffs in London, and he held that all cases of short delivery turned on inferences of fact. A plaintiff claiming damages for short delivery must prove his case, and it was prima facie enough to entitle him to succeed if he proved the delivery of a less number or weight or measure of goods than that admitted in the bill of lading. That proof placed the onus on the shipowner to establish that the number, weight, or measure admitted by the bill of lading was wrong. The shipowner might discharge that onus by direct evidence that a mistake was made by the tallymen from whose tallies the bill of lading was made out, or by indirect evidence proving beyond reasonable doubt that none of the goods were lost or stolen after receipt, and that he delivered all that he received. In this case the defendants, the shipowners, had proved beyond all reasonable doubt that they had delivered all that they received, and that there must have been a mistake in the tally at Buenos Ayres and in the bill of lading figures which were the result of that tally.

Held, on appeal, that the learned judge had fully appreciated the question of law which governed the matter, and that there was no ground for setting aside his findings of fact.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Greer, J. in an action tried in the Commercial List.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for short delivery of Plate linseed shipped on board the steamship Helmsloch at Buenos Ayres on or about the 24th Dec. 1919, under two bills of lading, dated the 24th Dec. 1919.

The plaintiffs were grain merchants in London; and they alleged in their points of claim that the defendants were the owners of the steamship Helmsloch. Under contracts contained in bills of lading, dated the 24th Dec. 1919, and signed by the master of the ship, the defendants received at Buenos Ayres 17,104 bags of linseed, shipped in good order and condition by Messrs. Sanday and Co. of Buenos Ayres and accepted the same for carriage to London, there to be delivered in the like order and condition to the order of the said shippers or their assigns.

The plaintiffs claimed as the holders of the bills of lading, which were endorsed to them, and they thereby claimed as owners of the goods.

They alleged that the defendants, in breach of their duty or undertaking to carry the goods safely and deliver them in good order and condition, failed and neglected to deliver the whole of the 17,104 bags which they received, but only delivered 16,948 bags.

The defendants admitted the bills of lading, but denied that they were endorsed to the plaintiffs, or that the plaintiffs were the owners of the goods. They further alleged that the plaintiffs were the charterers of the ship and that the goods were shipped under the contract contained in a charter-party between the parties dated the 19th Sept. 1919, and not under the bills of lading.

Alternatively, they alleged that the bills of lading contained the following provisions: (a) "freight for the said goods in accordance with the charter-party, dated London, the 19th Sept. 1919, all the conditions and exceptions of which charter-party, including the negligence claim are incorporated herewith," and (b) "weight measure quality and value unknown."

The defendants further pleaded that they had delivered to the plaintiffs all the bags of linseed put on board the steamship at Buenos Ayres.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20, 1920.—Greer, J.—In this case the plaintiffs claim damages for non-delivery of 156 bags of linseed shipped by them on board the defendants' steamship Helmsloch in Dec. 1919 at Buenos Ayres, for carriage to and delivery at the Port of London. The plaintiffs say that they delivered on board the Helmsloch 17,104 bags of linseed at Buenos Ayres; that by their mate's receipt and bill of lading the defendants admitted that they received that number on board, and that as the defendants only delivered 16,498 bags in London, the linseed weighing 1.68 per cent. less than the bill of lading weight, they, the plaintiffs, are entitled to recover damages for the loss of 156 bags and their contents.

The bags delivered to the ship at Buenos Ayres were tallied by tallymen employed by the plaintiffs as ship's agents to tally on behalf of the defendants. 15,019 bags were tallied as delivered to the ship ex the Elevator Company's warehouse alongside the ship's berth, and 2085 as delivered by cart. As to the last-mentioned number, there was evidence that there were three tallies, one by men employed by the carting contractor who delivered the bags to the ship, one by the tallymen employed to act for the shippers, and one by those employed by Messrs. Stanley to tally for the ship. As regards the bags from the warehouse, I am not satisfied that there were more than two tallies, one by the people in the warehouse on behalf of themselves and Messrs. Sanday, and one by those who were tallying for the ship. The tallymen all agreed as to the number of the bags delivered, and the total amount by such agreement was accepted by the mate for the purpose of the mate's receipt, and the figures from the mate's receipt were, as a matter of course, accepted as correct for the purposes of stating the number of bags in the four bills of lading signed by the master.

It was stated by Mr. Charles Broome, the manager of the Grain Elevator warehouse, in a statutory declaration which was by consent used as evidence, that the balance of the plaintiff's stock in the warehouse remaining after shipment of the 15,019 bags was found to be correct. This evidence makes out a strong primâ facie case that 17,104 bags of linseed were delivered to the ship. I am satisfied that the tally of the number of bags delivered in London was carefully done by those who tallied for the ship and for the receivers. The full bags were counted, the empty bags were counted, and the broken pieces carefully collected, and the number of bags represented thereby was accurately ascertained. Unless the count at Buenos Ayres can be successfully attacked, the defendants are responsible for 156 bags short delivered. Though evidence of the number delivered to the ship makes a strong primâ facie case, it is open to some criticism. There is no first-hand evidence of the count made by the tallymen in the warehouse. The whole of the plaintiffs' evidence consists of the statutory declaration of the manager, who, from the nature of the case, can have no first-hand knowledge of the actual count, though, of course, he is naturally familiar with the method usually adopted.

No tally books kept either by the Elevator Company's men or by Messrs Sanday's men are produced. The latter, I was informed by plaintiffs' counsel, had been lost. The ship's tally books were put in evidence for the plaintiffs. It is apparent on the face of tally book W. M. 4 that a mistake was made by counting twenty-seven bags twice over, and in W. M. 1 and W. M. 2 a figure of thirty, at some time before the column in which it appears was added up, has been altered to fifty. If I am right in concluding, as I do, that there was a mistake in adding twenty-seven bags twice over, Mr. Broome's evidence as to the plaintiffs' balance in warehouse being correct becomes difficult to accept. It was proved that the bags went straight through the chutes into the hatches, that the hatch-covers and tarpaulins were put on each evening when the work ceased, that each bag weighed at least a hundredweight, and that, to prevent pilfering, there were two armed watchmen on board day and night. It seems highly improbable that during these nine days in which the loading took place 156 bags of linseed, each weighing about a hundredweight, could have been abstracted from the hold, taken ashore, and removed without anything being noticed to give rise to suspicion.

Indeed, bags of linseed do not seem the kind of commodity that would afford any great temptation to the prowling night thief. I am satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that no bags of linseed were stolen from the ship after they had been put in the hold. It is also clear on the evidence that there was no possibility of loss by theft, or otherwise, during the voyage.

I therefore find that it is proved beyond a reasonable doubt that all the bags and their contents that were received by the ship from the plaintiffs at Buenos Ayres were delivered by the ship to the plaintiffs in London.

Mr. Neilson, for the plaintiffs, contended that the decisions of the courts were such that I was not entitled on the evidence to find for the defendants. He relied especially on three cases: Harrowing v. Katz (10 Times L. Rep. 115, 400); Bennett and Young v. Bacon (13 Times L. Rep. 204); Smith v. Bedouin Steamship Company (1896) A. C. 70).

In Harrowing v. Katz (sup.), there was a claim by the defendant for short delivery of 377 cases of petroleum. The bill of lading, founded on two tallies, one made on behalf of the ship and the other on behalf of the shippers, acknowledged the receipt of 377 cases more than were delivered at the port of discharge. Kennedy, J. held on the facts that the shipowner had not discharged the onus that lay upon him of disproving the accuracy of the bill of lading number, supported, as it was, by a careful double tally. But if the report of the case before Kennedy, J. is carefully examined, it will be found that the method of loading was quite different from the method adopted in the present case, and the ship failed to prove that there were no opportunities of loss after the cases were delivered to the ship.

Bennett and Young v. Bacon (sup.) is a similar case relating to the short delivery of 100 cases of tomatoes which were delivered from lighters by derricks into the ship's hold. The report does not state what facts, if any, were relied on by the ship to show that the goods could not have been stolen or lost after delivery to the ship, and it therefore does not help me to decide the present case.

In Smith and Co. v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Company (sup.) a shortage of twelve bales of jute was claimed for. The loading occupied twelve days, so that the theft, or loss, of one bale per day after the bales had been delivered on board would account for the discrepancy. The majority of the bales (the bill of lading number was 1000) were delivered from boats to the hatches and there tallied by the ship's tallymen, but some of the bales were not delivered to the hatches, but were placed on deck. In his speech Lord Shand says (1896) A. C. at p. 80): "The evidence does not make it quite clear that bales to the number of twelve may not have been removed from the ship's deck after being placed there, and taken away by the lighters, particularly during the work carried on in the evenings after dark." Later on, he says: "No one can say that there is proof that such abstraction did take place. But it is for the shipowners to displace the shippers' evidence furnished by the acts of their own servants. It appears to me that they do not do so by proof which does not exclude the possibility that the bales in question might have been abstracted from the ship's deck, or which does not make this so highly improbable that such a suggestion must be entirely thrown aside."

Lord Halsbury's observation (1896) A. C. at p. 76) which was relied on, to the effect that no evidence had been given leading to any such conclusion as would upset the effect of the admission in the bill of lading, must be read in the light of the facts mentioned by Lord Shand; and it should not be forgotten that the appeal did not involve the question as to whether there was evidence on which a judgment for the ship could have been supported. The judge of first instance had found for the appellants, the holders of the bill of lading. The House of Lords held that that finding ought not to have been reversed by the Second Division of the Court of Session sitting as a Court of Appeal.

The truth of the matter is that all these cases of short delivery turn on inferences of fact and not on rules of law. The rules of law are quite clear. They are as follows: (1) A plaintiff claiming damages for short delivery must, like any other claimant, prove his case. It is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to succeed if he proves the delivery of a less number or weight or measure of goods than that which is admitted in the bill of lading. This proof puts the onus on the shipowner to establish that the number, weight or measure admitted by the bill of lading is wrong. He may do so by direct evidence showing that a mistake was made by the tallymen from whose tallies the bill of lading was made out. (4) He may do so by indirect evidence sufficient to satisfy the tribunal of fact beyond reasonable doubt that none of the goods were lost or stolen after receipt, and that he delivered all he received.

Now that so many cases are tried without juries, there is a real danger of mistaking inferences of fact set out in the reported cases for rules of law. There is a great, and, I think, unfortunate tendency to cite reported inferences of fact as if they were rules of law. The facts of two cases are never quite identical, and even in cases where they appear to be so the weight attachable to testimony varies so greatly that it is never possible to say that a judge who decided one way in the case of A. v. B. would, even on similar evidence given by different witnesses, in the case of C. v. D. draw the same inferences of fact.

There is nothing in the cases that have been cited, nor in the well-established rule about the onus of proof, to prevent me from giving effect to the opinion that I have formed as to the reasonable effect of the evidence taken as a whole. In my judgment, the defendants have discharged the onus which lay upon them of proving beyond reasonable doubt that they have delivered all that they received, and that there must have been a mistake in the tally at Buenos Ayres and in the bill of lading figures which were the result of that tally. There must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an attempt to set aside the finding of the learned judge upon a pure question of fact, and this court would only do that on being satisfied that the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived was obviously wrong. In my opinion, it is quite impossible to come to that conclusion in this case. The learned judge seems to have tried the case with great care and to have given a very full and elaborate judgment, which indicates that he fully appreciated the question of law which governed the matter and that he applied his mind, as far as I can see, to the material facts of the case.

The action was brought to recover damages for short delivery of 156 bags of linseed which were said to have been shipped by the defendants on their vessel at the Plate, and which they failed to deliver on arrival of the vessel in London. The plaintiff's case, of course, was founded upon the bill of lading, which contained the statement that the quantity of bags which the plaintiffs were claiming to have the right to have delivered to them had been shipped. The learned judge's attention was called to some of the cases which have been reported on the question of short delivery, and, amongst others, to the Smith v. Bedouin Steamship Company case (1896) A. C. 70). I have already read, and will read again, what Lord Halsbury said in reference to the position of a claimant who relies upon the statement in the bill of lading that a certain quantity of goods had been shipped. What he says is this: "To my mind, the cardinal fact is that the person properly appointed for the purpose of checking the receipt of the goods has given a receipt in which he has acknowledged on behalf of the person by whom he was employed that those goods were received. If that fact is once established, it becomes the duty of those who attempt to get rid of the effect of that fact to give some evidence from which your Lordships should infer that the goods never were on board at all." Now it was to that question that Greer, J. applied his mind as to whether there was sufficient evidence to satisfy him that these goods never had been put on board at all.

He first of all directed his mind to the question whether, upon the evidence, there was any possibility of these goods either having been stolen on their way to the vessel either from the cart or from the warehouse, and to the question whether there was any possibility of their having been tampered with, or interfered with in any way, or removed after they had been once placed on the vessel and before the vessel arrived; and the conclusion he comes to is: "I am satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt that no bags of linseed were stolen from the ship after they had been put into the hold. It is also clear on the evidence that there was no possibility of loss by theft or otherwise during the voyage." So he excludes the possibility of there having been any loss after the goods had been put on board, and I do not understand that Mr. Neilson challenges his finding of fact upon that point.

Now it may well be that, upon the authorities, a judge who has to deal with this question of fact should not be satisfied merely with arriving at the conclusion that the presumption arising from the statement of the bill of lading had been displaced; but there was one further inquiry which the learned judge made, and which I think ought to be made in this class of case, and that is what is the evidence with regard to the tally and to the way in which these goods were put on board and the care that was taken to count and tally them as they were put on board? With regard to that, in this case, the learned judge only had what I may call general evidence of the course of business and one set of the tally books and a man who did not profess to be able to speak to the correctness of the tally, but whose only concern with the tally was that he had added up the totals entered in the book by someone else. Nobody was called who took part in any way with the actual tally, and therefore all the learned judge had before him was the one set of tally books; he had none of what I may call the original papers—the tally slips or chits—but a book in which the conclusion of the tally had been entered. He looks at these books, and upon looking at them he says to himself that they were clear evidence of mistakes having been made in the tally and of alterations having been made in the conclusions arrived at by the person who made the entries in those tally-books that were produced. In my opinion, that is quite sufficient to justify a learned judge, who has already come to a conclusion in reference to the possibility of theft or removal of the goods, in coming to the conclusion that there had been mistakes made in the tallying of the goods into the vessel. That is the view that the learned judge took in this case. He appears to me to have delivered a very careful judgment and a judgment with which it is quite impossible for this court to interfere. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

SCRUTTON, L.J.—I agree, and I have nothing to add to the reasons given by Greer, J.

(Before ROWLATT, J.)

BOMBAY AND PERSIA STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. MACLAY. (a)

Practice—Diversion of ship by direction of Shipping Controller—Claim for compensation—Loss of use and expenses of diversion—Shipping Controller sued as individual—Practice — Government not bound by judgment against official as individual —Action misconceived.

The steamship H. was in Sept. 1919 on a voyage from Newport to Alexandria with a cargo of coal. On the 30*th Sept.* 1919 she received a wireless message from the Shipping Controller, directing her to proceed with her cargo to Port Said. She arrived at Port Said on the 3*rd Oct., and on the* 7*th Oct. the master was informed by the senior naval officer at Port Said that the Shipping Controller's direction to proceed to Port Said had been cancelled and that the vessel might proceed on her voyage to Alexandria. The vessel arrived at Alexandria on the* 8*th Oct., six days later than she would have done but for the Shipping Controller's direction to proceed to Port Said. The plaintiffs, the owners of the vessel, brought this action against the defendant, the Shipping Controller, claiming a declaration that they were entitled to compensation for the loss of the use of the vessel for the six days, and the expenses incurred by them in consequence of the direction given by the defendant under the Defence of the Realm Regulations, and that the amount of compensation should be referred for assessment. It was not disputed that the defendant was authorised by law to give the direction in question. By his defence the defendant pleaded that he was not rightly made a party to the action, and that no cause of action was disclosed in the statement of claim either against him personally or as Shipping Controller.*

Held, that the action was misconceived. The defendant could not be sued, either as an individual or as Shipping Controller. The Crown could not be bound by any judgment obtained in the action. The defect could not be regarded as trivial, and an application to cure the defect by substituting the Attorney-General as defendant could not be entertained.

ACTION in the Commercial List.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of the vessel, the Hornayun, brought this action against Sir Joseph Maclay, the Shipping Controller, and they claimed a declaration that they were entitled to compensation in respect of the loss of time and consumption of stores by their vessel which, while on a voyage with a cargo of coals to Alexandria, was ordered by the defendant to go to Port Said. They further claimed that the amount of compensation should be referred for assessment either to the Admiralty Transport Arbitration Board or to such other referee or tribunal as the court might direct.

In Sept. 1919 the plaintiff's steamer, the Honayun, was on a voyage from Newport to Alexandria with a cargo of coals. On the 30th Sept. 1919, the ship was directed by wireless from the Control Board to proceed to Port Said, and did so. She arrived there on the 3rd Oct., and remained there until the 7th Oct. On that day the master was informed by the senior naval officer of that port that the direction of the Board of Control above-referred to was cancelled, and that the ship was free to proceed on her voyage to Alexandria. The Hornayun arrived at Alexandria on the 8th Oct., being about six days late; and the action was brought in respect of that loss of time which had resulted from the ship's compliance with the deviation order.

The defendant pleaded that the facts alleged by the plaintiff did not disclose any contract by any person on behalf of the Crown or the Shipping Controller, and that there was no ground for the declaration asked for, and there was no cause of action against Sir Joseph Maclay either in his personal capacity or as Shipping Controller.

Hosier Brothers v. Derby (Earl) Secretary of State for War, 119 L. T. Rep. 351; (1918) 2 K. B. 671.

Rowlatt, J.—The plaintiffs bring this action against Sir Joseph Maclay, the Shipping Controller, and they claim a declaration that they are entitled to compensation in respect of the loss of time and the consumption of stores by their vessel which, while on a voyage with a cargo of coals to Alexandria, was ordered by the defendant to go to Port Said, although when she got there she was released and allowed to proceed to Alexandria. It is not disputed that the defendant was authorised by law to give this direction.

Further, it is not suggested that any statute or regulation puts upon Sir Joseph Maclay any financial responsibility in respect of the matters in question. If there is any liability to pay compensation under par. 3 of reg. 39 B.B.B. of the Defence of the Realm Regulations, such a liability rests on the Government, that is the Treasury of this country.

In these circumstances, the point is taken that this matter cannot be decided in an action for a declaration brought against Sir Joseph Maclay. No action can be brought against the Shipping Controller as such.

There is no power to sue the Shipping Controller in his official name. The action must be brought against Sir Joseph Maclay, if at all, as an individual. It has been long established that if an official of the State does something, which, if done by anyone else would be a tort, and there is no law which gives him authority, in virtue of his office, to do that particular act or thing, he must, notwithstanding his official position, answer for it in his own name.

An action for an injunction or for a declaration that he must not do the thing again will not lie against him. Similarly, if a person, by virtue of the position which he holds, claims to be entitled to do a particular act or thing himself, an action can be brought at the instance of someone who may be affected, for a declaration that the defendant is not entitled to do that act or thing.

But in dealing with matters of contract or a question of monetary liability under a statute the position is very different. In the case of a contract made by the representative of a public department, the representative is an agent only, and there can be no question of suing him for money under the contract. It is not sought in this case to sue Sir Joseph Maclay for money payable by statute, but the question is whether, when a person has a demand of this kind, he can get a declaration of his rights against the Treasury by suing an official in his own name because he cannot sue him in any other way.

This subject first came into prominence in Dyson v. Attorney-General (103 L. T. Rep. 707; 105 L. T. Rep. 753; (1911) 1 K. B. 410; (1912) 1 Ch. 73. In that case certain forms had been issued by the Inland Revenue authorities. The Attorney-General was in a position to enforce obedience to them by bringing informations for penalties. It was there decided that an action could be brought against the Attorney-General in the name of his office to have it declared that the forms were bad, and that the Attorney-General was not entitled to enforce obedience to them. That is how it was put by Pickford, L.J. in Guaranty Trust Company of New York v. Hannay (113 L. T. Rep. 98; (1915) 2 K. B. 536), and that adequately describes the position.

The decision in Dyson v. Attorney-General (sup.) was based on the old practice in Chancery. It had long been recognised that the Crown cannot be sued, nor could the Attorney-General be sued as representing the Crown, there being nothing in his patent making him liable to be sued for the Crown. But for a long time, as is explained in Mitford Pleadings in Chancery (5th edit.), at p. 32, it had been quite common to make the Attorney-General a defendant to actions in Chancery.

In the administration of property the Court of Chancery decided the rights of competing claimants, and it often happened that it dealt with a subject-matter in which the Crown, as well as the immediate defendant, had an interest; and when that happened the Attorney-General was made a defendant to the bill, so that he could appear and establish or relinquish the rights of the Crown.

In the same way a foreign Sovereign, who could never be sued, was sometimes added as a defendant to a bill in Chancery when the subject-matter was one in which there might be a claim on his behalf. If the foreign Sovereign was made a defendant, he could come in if he chose. In the cases where the Attorney-General was made a party, it will be found that there could be no personal process against him. He was not a corporation. The bill was simply brought to his attention by being left at his chambers, and he could come in and argue it if he liked. He was the officer of the Crown to assert the Crown's rights, and I can quite understand that in Dyson v. Attorney-General (sup.), a case in which I was one of the counsel, the feeling of the judge was that the Attorney-General, the officer to whom is entrusted the enforcement of the Crown's rights in court, should be made a defendant, so that it might be ascertained what rights he had on behalf of the Crown to enforce. Thus the practice grew up.

But what is the position of Sir Joseph Maclay? He cannot be sued as Shipping Controller, in virtue of his office. It cannot be said that the Crown is to be bound and estopped by suing a private individual who fights the case, possibly at his own expense, though he does not do so in this instance. Such an officer might go out of office or he might die.

When an action is brought against the Attorney-General in Court, a notice is given to the barrister who holds the Crown's patent. Notice is given to the Attorney-General to come in and argue the point. But that cannot be extended to an individual who holds a different kind of office, who has done nothing which makes any call upon himself. I think, therefore, that this action is misconceived.

Then it is said that, after all, it is a small matter, which can be remedied by amending the pleadings and substituting the name of the Attorney-General as defendant. But objection has been taken by the Solicitor-General, and I cannot treat it as a small matter which can be dealt with in that way. It has never been established that, by suing the Attorney-General you could prejudice a petition of right in which money is claimed from the Treasury. That is a claim against the Sovereign, and it is to be dealt with by the Sovereign on the advice of a Secretary of State. If the Attorney-General is proceeded against he has no choice but to deal with the question.

I cannot treat things that are constitutionally different as the same, and, therefore, I do not think it is a trivial matter when I am asked to substitute the name of another public officer on the writ as defendant instead of the one already there. Therefore I think this action is misconceived.

I shall say nothing on the merits, and my opinion is entirely gratuitous, but I think there is something important in this proceeding. It is said that there is a tendency, nowadays, to disregard the limits of power in those who hold official positions, and they seem inclined to do justice as they like. I think that in these circumstances courts of justice ought to be careful and observant of the limits of their own powers, and ought to guard the limits of their own jurisdiction, and be careful of the ambit of that of others. This action will be dismissed.

Hill, J.—In the damage action between the Yvonne Odette and the Cedric both ships were pronounced to blame. The Yvonne Odette was lost with several of her crew. The owner of the Yvonne Odette has proved his damages before the registrar and merchants, and by summons asks that the report be confirmed. The report includes claims for lost effects and share of fishing. Representatives of deceased members of the crew have begun actions in respect of loss of life against the owners of the Cedric, who admit liability. The amount of damages in those actions has not yet been determined.

The owners of the Cedric ask by motion that they may be at liberty to pay the amount of the damages found by the registrar to be due to the owner of the Yvonne Odette into court pending the ascertainment of the damages in the life claims, and ask for a declaration that the owners of the

Cedric are entitled to recover contribution from the owners of the Yvonne Odette for half the amount of the damages and costs in the life claims, and that, upon ascertainment of the damages and costs in the life claims and payments thereof by the owners of the Cedric, they may be at liberty to deduct from or set off against the amount of damages found due from them to the owners of the Yvonne Odette half the amount of the damages and costs paid in respect of the life claims.

The question for decision is whether the owners of the Cedric are entitled to such contribution. Assuming that they are not in a position to prove personal negligence, causing the loss, on the part of any particular deceased man as an answer to the claim of his representatives, the owners of the Cedric are liable in full in respect of the life claims. Whether they are entitled to contribution from the owners of the Yvonne Odette depends on whether the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 gives them that right. Apart from the Act they can have no such right.

It is contended that they are given the right, firstly, by sect. 1 of the Act, and, secondly, by sect. 3. The argument on sect. 1 of the Act is based on the decision in The Cairnbahn (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 455; 110 L. T. Rep. 230; (1914) P. 25), and is that sect. 1 includes loss to the owners of the Cedric by reason of having to pay damages for loss of life on board the Yvonne Odette. The argument on sect. 3 of the Act is based on the specific words of the section, which provides: "Where loss of life or personal injuries are suffered by any person on board a vessel owing to the fault of that vessel and any other vessel or vessels, and a proportion of the damages is recovered against the owners of one of the vessels which exceeds the proportion in which she was in fault, they may recover by way of contribution the amount of the excess from the owners of the other vessel or vessels to the extent to which those vessels were respectively in fault."

I am not at all sure that sect. 1 has any reference to liability for life claims, which are specifically dealt with by sects. 2 and 3. But, assuming that sect. 1 and the reasoning in the decision in The Cairnbahn (sup.) do apply to life claims, both sects. 1 and 3 are subject to a proviso. By the proviso to sect. 1 the section is not to be construed as imposing any liability upon any person who is exempted by any provision of law. I leave out the words of the proviso not relevant to the question in this case. By the proviso to sect. 3 the owners of the Cedric can only recover from the owner of the Yvonne Odette contribution to the damages for loss of life if the damages could in the first instance have been recovered from the owner of the Yvonne Odette had he been sued. This is carried out by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 3, which entitles the paying owner to stand in the shoes of the life claimants.

In either case the court has to find out whether the damages for loss of life on board the Yvonne Odette could have been recovered from the owner of the Yvonne Odette, or whether he is exempted from liability by any provision of law. It was assumed in argument that the liability of the owner of the Yvonne Odette was governed by French law. If it were governed by English law the owner of the Yvonne Odette would certainly be exempt from actions under Lord Campbell's Act; the defence of common employment would be open to him. His only liability would be under the Workmen's Compensation Acts. What would be the effect under the Maritime Conventions Act of a Workmen's Compensation Act liability if the Yvonne Odette had been British, I need not consider. I desire to express no opinion upon it. The Yvonne Odette was French, and her owner was not liable under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

I have to ascertain whether, under French law, the owner of the Yvonne Odette is exempted from liability for the loss of life of the master and seamen on board his own ship. What is the French law is a question of fact. I have before me the evidence of two French lawyers, who express opposite views. M. Bodereaux, for the plaintiff, says that the question is determined by arts. 1 and 2 of the law of the 29th Dec. 1905, which in terms declares the owner free of liability, except in case of his own personal negligence. The French lawyer for the defendants does not dispute that that was the effect of the law of the 29th Dec. 1905, but says that the law of the 15th July 1915, which, like the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, was passed to give effect to certain conventions, overrides the law of the 25th Dec. 1905, and imposes upon the owner of a French ship liability for loss of life of anyone on board his ship. He says that this is the result of the provision that "the ships at fault are jointly and severally (solidairement) liable to third parties for losses caused by death or wounds, subject only to the remedy (sauf recours) of the ship which may have paid a larger proportion than she is eventually found liable to pay under the foregoing paragraph" (i.e., the clause as to the proportions of loss).

In this controversy of fact, I am driven to look at the law of the 15th July 1915 for myself. It deals with the proportions of blame; it provides that damage to ships, cargoes, and effects and property of crews, passengers, and persons on board are borne by the ships in fault in the aforesaid proportion without joint and several liability to third parties (san solidarité à l'égard du tiers); it provides for life and personal injury claims as above stated. There are no provisos analogous to the provisos to sects. 1, 2, and 3 of the Maritime Conventions Act; there are no savings of limitation rights, or of defences based on contractual exemptions, or on personal negligence of claimants. Yet these rights existed in French law before the law of the 15th July 1915. I cannot think that law made a clean sweep of them. For instance, I cannot think the right to limit liability given by art. 216 of the Code de Commerce was abolished by the law of the 15th July 1915, or that the law of the 15th July 1915 gives a seaman, whose personal negligence causes a collision and loss to himself, a right of action for damages against his owner. The French law seems to me to deal only with the incidence of liabilities as between the owners of the two ships in fault, and not to give to the persons injured causes of action which they otherwise would not have. I am, therefore, of opinion that the evidence of M. Bodereaux ought to be accepted.

I hold that the owner of the Yvonne Odette is exempt from liability to the representatives of the deceased members of the crew of the Yvonne Odette. The case, therefore, falls within the proviso to sect. 3 of the Maritime Conventions Act, and the owners of the Cedric, when they pay the life claims, will have no right to contribution.

I therefore confirm the registrar's report with costs, and I dismiss the defendants' motion with costs.

Hewett v. Barr, (1891) 1 Q. B. 98.

HILL, J.—The plaintiff is the widow of the master of the steamship Artisan, who lost his life by reason of a collision between the defendants' steamship Espanoleto and the Artisan on the 20th Feb. 1917. On the 13th Dec. 1918 the plaintiff issued a writ in rem against the Espanoleto. It was not served, and no warrant of arrest was applied for. It was not served because by that time the Espanoleto had left the jurisdiction. The writ was not renewed within twelve months, the proper time, and on the 19th March 1920 the plaintiff applied ex parte for leave to renew the writ. She obtained that leave and caused a warrant of arrest to issue, the Espanoleto having by that time come within the jurisdiction. On the following day conditional appearance was entered, and an undertaking to put in bail given. At the time when I granted, ex parte, leave to renew the writ, I was aware that there might be a question arising under sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 which it would be proper for the court to consider, and, that order being made ex parte, it was, of course, open to the defendants to say that the order for renewal had been wrongly made, and that it ought to be set aside. That is one of the objections they have taken on this motion, and which I have to consider.

It is a motion by the defendants to set aside the writ and the renewal and the warrant of arrest, and to discharge the undertaking to put in bail. The first ground of objection is that the arrest is invalid, because there was no valid writ in existence at the time of the arrest. If the writ is bad there is, of course, nothing to support the warrant of arrest. A preliminary objection was taken at the hearing that the original writ was bad, because it was said a writ in rem cannot be issued unless at the time of issue the res is within the jurisdiction. No authority is given for that proposition, and I think the point is a bad one. Of course, a writ in rem cannot be served till the res comes within the jurisdiction, but I can see no reason why the writ cannot be issued and then served when the res comes within the jurisdiction.

The other objections turn on the Maritime Conventions Act. The point was taken to keep it alive, in case the matter should go further, that sect. 8 of that Act does not, in respect of life claims, repeal the one year's limitation prescribed by Lord Campbell's Act. If that were right and the one year's limitation under Lord Campbell's Act still applied to a writ against the ship, then, inasmuch as the collision happened on the 20th Feb. 1917 and the original writ was not issued until the 13th Dec. 1918, the objection would have been a good one. But the point was decided in The Caliph (ubi sup.) against the defendants' contention, and I follow that decision. Having regard to sects. 3, 5, and 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act, I do not desire to express any opinion different from The Caliph (ubi sup.), but in any case I should follow that decision.

The next contention was that the proceedings were not commenced within two years under sect. 8, because that section contemplates that proceedings should be commenced not by issuing a writ, but by arrest. I do not agree. Sect. 8 relates to proceedings in personam as well as to proceedings in rem. It is an English statute, and in English law it is well understood that proceedings are commenced by the issue of a writ. Order I., r. 1, and Order II., r. 1, of the Rules of the Supreme Court show that an action in the Admiralty Division, like an action in any other division, is commenced by the issue of a writ, and I can see no reason at all for giving a different meaning to the commencement of proceedings under sect. 8 from that which obtains in every other action.

That brings me to the real point in the case Was the plaintiff entitled to a renewal of the writ, the twelve months having expired and expired some time? The original writ was issued within two years, but it was not renewed within the proper time. The court has power to extend the time and to give leave to renew. That is quite clear from the decision in Re Jones (ubi sup.) and the cases I am about to mention. Whether the leave should be granted after the time has expired must depend, like every other question of granting an extension of time, upon the circumstances of the particular case. In general, leave will not be granted if, but for the enlargement of time, the plaintiff's claim would be barred by a statute of limitations. That is to say, it will not be granted to revive a barred cause of action (see Doyle v. Kaufman, ubi sup., and, with reference to that case, Smallpage v. Tonge, ubi sup., and especially Hewett v. Barr, ubi sup.). In general the court must not by renewal deprive a defendant of an existing right to the benefit of a statute of limitations. But sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act is a limitation section of a very peculiar kind, for it contains a proviso unknown to any other statute of limitations; in one event—namely, if there has not been any reasonable opportunity of arresting the defendant vessel within the period—it directs the extension of the limited period of two years, and, further, gives the court power to extend it on any other sufficient grounds.

In my judgment, when an application to extend the time for the renewal of a writ in an action which comes within sect. 8 is made, the matter is not to be disposed of merely by saying that the two years have elapsed and the claim is statute-barred and no renewal can be granted. The application to renew must be considered on its merits, and the court must inquire whether the circumstances are such that the court would give leave to issue a writ notwithstanding that the time had expired.

In the present case affidavits were filed from which the following facts appear: The collision was in Feb. 1917, and the Espanoleto for the first time came within the jurisdiction on the 24th Oct. 1918. On the 25th Oct. 1918 the owners of the Artisan issued a writ against the owners of the Espanoleto and caused her to be arrested. On the 20th Nov. 1918 in that action an undertaking to appear was given and consent made to the vessel's release. On the 3rd Dec. 1918 instructions to the solicitors for the present plaintiff in her action were given. It is said that there is a letter written a week or two earlier instructing them that there would be a claim, but an affidavit shows that the solicitors received the instructions on the 3rd Dec. to present the claim, and they then requested that the name and address of the plaintiff should be cabled to them to enable them to issue the writ. That information was obtained on the 13th Dec. 1918, and upon that day the plaintiff's writ was issued. But in the meantime, on the 11th Dec. 1918, the Espanoleto had sailed, and left the jurisdiction. The Espanoleto was not again within the jurisdiction until March 1920, when the renewal was applied for and obtained, and the warrant of arrest granted.

The question, to my mind, is whether, in these circumstances, first, the case comes within the obligatory part of the proviso; and, secondly, if it does not, ought I to exercise my discretion in favour of the plaintiff? I think it is not absolutely certain that the case does not come within the obligatory part of the proviso, because I am not at all sure, on the facts as stated, that the plaintiff had had a reasonable opportunity of arresting the ship. But, whether that is so or not, I think I ought to exercise my discretion in favour of the plaintiff. If she had applied for leave to issue a writ in March 1920, I should have granted it. I think, therefore, à fortiori, I should grant renewal of the writ which she had originally issued in Dec. 1918.

I therefore make an order in favour of the plaintiff extending the time, and the effect of that is that the defendants' motion is dismissed with costs.

Where loss has been suffered by the detention of a ship during repairs owing to collision, the damages must be assessed with reference to the actual period of detention. HILL, J.—On this motion in objection to the registrar's report, the only question for decision is as to the rate of exchange at which a loss by detention suffered by the owners of the Volturno is to be converted from Italian into English currency.

The collision happened on the 17th Dec. 1917 between the Celia and the Volturno. Both ships were damaged. Temporary repairs to the Volturno were made at Gibraltar. Permanent repairs were made at Newport News. The temporary repairs caused a detention of the ship from the 25th Dec. to the 30th Dec. 1917. The permanent repairs caused a detention of the ship from the 24th Jan. to the 18th Feb. 1918. The Volturno was an Italian ship, and was under requisition to the Italian Government under a charter-party by the terms of which she was off hire during each period of repair. By the terms of this charter-party hire was payable by fortnightly payments. The hire was payable in Italian lire. The loss to the owners of the Volturno by reason of her so coming off hire was in respect of the period the 25th to the 30th Dec. 1917, 47,372.32 lire, and in respect of the period the 24th Jan. to the 18th Feb. 1918, 257,046.40 lire. The damage action was begun by the owners of the Celia by writ dated the 24th Jan. 1918. In that action the owners of the Volturno counter-claimed. By judgment given on the 22nd July 1919 both ships were pronounced to blame. The owners of the Volturno filed their claim in the reference on the 19th Nov. 1919. In it they claimed as damages for loss of use of the Volturno the two amounts of lire above mentioned, converting into pounds sterling the 47,372.32 lire at 39.90, and the 257,046.40 lire at 41.30. These were respectively the rates of exchange ruling on the last day of the respective periods of detention.

By an agreed statement of facts, it was stated that the rate of exchange was as follows at subsequent dates, namely, the 22nd July 1919 (date of judgment), 37.55; the 19th Nov. 1919 (date of filing of claim of the Volturno), 50.52; and the 8th June 1920, 66.25. On the last-mentioned date the claim, except as regards the rate of exchange on the two items in question, was agreed between the parties, and the only question submitted to the registrar was as regards the rate of exchange on the two items. I observe that in the claim which had been filed the owners of the Volturno sought to convert the cost in dollars of the permanent repairs at Newport News at 4.77, which, presumably, was the rate at the completion of the repairs on the 18th Feb. 1918, or of payment of the repairs account on the 20th Feb. 1918. It certainly was not the rate at the 8th June 1920. I am not, however, informed upon what terms the items other than the detention items were agreed. I only mention the fact because the same question as to the time at which the rate of exchange is to be taken may arise as well in regard to cost of repairs as in regard to loss by detention.

The registrar has reported that in his opinion the date of payment is the time at which the rate of exchange should be taken. He says: "In the case of the Bellagio I decided, on the authority of Roche, J. in Kirsch and Co. v. Allen, Harding, and Co., that the rate of exchange should be taken at the date of payment." The expression "date of payment" is not very clear. In an ordinary reference tried out before the registrar, the registrar must finally express in English currency the amount of damages which he finds to have been suffered. He cannot award an amount expressed in a foreign currency, for a judgment cannot be entered in foreign currency; it can only be entered in English currency. But I will assume that what is meant is that, damages having been assessed in a foreign currency, they must be expressed in English currency at the rate of exchange ruling at the time when they are assessed; that is, at the date of the report. This is in accordance with the decision in Kirsch and Co. v. Allen, Harding, and Co., where, in assessing damages for breach of contract, damages expressed in American dollars were converted into English currency at the rate ruling at the date of the judgment.

The controversy before me has been whether the rate should be taken at the date at which the tribunal assesses the damages, or whether it should be taken at some other date. Mr. Bateson, for the owners of the Volturno, contended that the rate should be taken as at the date of the writ, or as at the respective dates when the loss by detention was suffered. Mr. Langton, for the owners of the Celia, contended that the registrar was right. His strong argument was that the owners of the Volturno suffered their loss in lire, and that they would be fully compensated by receiving such an amount in English currency as would at the date they received it purchase the same amount of lire, and that the judgment should therefore be for as many pounds sterling as at the date of judgment would provide that amount of lire.

In addition to Kirsch and Co. v. Allen, Harding, and Co., I was referred to the later decision of Roche, J. in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, and to the decisions of Bailhache, J. in Barry v. Van den Hurk and of McCardie, J. in Lebeaupin v. Crispin. Since the hearing of this motion, Di Ferdinando v. Simon has been confirmed in the Court of Appeal.

These decisions make it clear that Mr. Langton's strong argument and the opinion of the registrar are unsound. In Di Ferdinando v. Simon the action was for damages for breach of contract to carry goods from London to Italy and for conversion. Roche, J. found the breach and the conversion, and held that the proper measure of damages was the value of the goods at the date when they should have arrived in Italy, which he fixed as the 10th Feb. 1919, and he found the value in Italian lire. He converted the sum of lire so found into English currency at the rate of exchange ruling at the same date, and gave judgment accordingly. On the appeal the contention of the defendants was Mr. Langton's contention in the present case. It did not prevail. Bankes, L.J. said that the plaintiff was entitled to have his damages assessed as at the date of the breach, and that, in order to expresss the damages in English money, the rate of exchange must be taken as it was at the date of the breach. It is to be observed that in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, whether regarded as a case of breach of contract or of conversion, the damages were ascertainable by ascertaining the market value of the goods at the date at which they should have arrived.

The other cases mentioned were cases of contracts of sale at a price expressed in dollars, and of claims either by seller or buyer for failure to take or give delivery, in which the damages were ascertainable by ascertaining the difference between the contract price and the market price in dollars. In Lebeaupin v. Crispin the damages appear to have been ascertained by taking the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date of breach. McCardie, J. is careful to point out that he is dealing only with ordinary damages for breach of contract. In Barry v. Van den Hurk the date of breach is stated to be March and the sellers sold against the buyer in June 1918; the damages in dollars were ascertained by ascertaining the difference between the contract price and the price so realised in June, and were converted into English currency at the rate ruling at that date. I conclude that either the rate was the same in June as in March, or that it was admitted or held that the sellers acted reasonably in not selling till June.

No question of consequential damage suffered at a date subsequent to the breach was involved in any of these cases. But the principles involved seem to me to apply to consequential damages in contract and to damages in an action for negligence. These principles are: an English judgment for damages must be for a sum of English money; where the damages are assessed in a foreign currency, they must be converted into English money at the rate of exchange ruling at the date with reference to which the damages in the foreign currency have in law to be assessed, and not at the rate of exchange ruling at the date when the tribunal is called upon to convert into English money the damages so ascertained. Find the date with reference to which the damages have to be assessed, and that is also the date at which the exchange must be taken for the purpose of conversion.

I apply this to an action of negligence causing collision and damage to a ship, and consequential loss of use of a ship during repairs. The damages must be assessed with reference to the actual period of detention. It is at that time that the owner suffers damage by loss of use. If those damages are proved in a foreign currency, the tribunal must convert them into English money at the rate of exchange ruling at that time. Strictly, it may be that, inasmuch as the loss by detention is suffered day by day, the damages for such loss should be converted at the average rate over the period of detention, or it may be that in the present case, the hire being payable fortnightly, the loss was suffered when the fortnightly payment succeeding the detention became due and was subject to the deduction in respect of the time when the ship was off hire. I need not determine these niceties in the present case. If the rates are to be taken as at the time of the detention, it has not been suggested that the rates should be taken as other than 39.90 in respect of the period of temporary repairs, and 41.30 in respect of the period of permanent repairs. I should add that a rate of exchange is mentioned applicable to a date, Nov. 1918, at which the Italian Government notified that the ship had been off hire during the periods of repair. The ship came off hire by virtue of the charter-party, and it is immaterial when, in settling accounts between the owners and the charterers, the amount was actually debited in account.

What I have said above of course applies only when at the time the reference is held the repairs have been done and the detention already incurred. If the claim is for prospective damages, no question of exchange arises, or, if it arises at all, it is a matter of estimate and probabilities, like everything else in such a claim.

The result is that I allow the appeal. The matter need not go back to the registrar. The two items will be converted into English currency, the first at the rate of 39.90, and the second at the rate of 41.30. I give the appellants the costs of the appeal.

She collided with the ferry boat* Tranmere. Both vessels were held equally to blame, the tug for being on her wrong side, the ferry boat for proceeding at excessive speed in fog.

Hill, J. found that both the tug and the ferry boat were sounding inappropriate fog signals, and that neither were justified in so doing under the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Hill, J. also considered The Lancashire (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 202; 29 L. T. Rep. 927; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 198) and refused to lay down any rule of law as to the duty of ferry boats in the Mersey to cease running in dense fog.

ACTION for damage by collision.

The steamship Dagmar, while proceeding up the river, bound for Runcorn, with seven flats in tow, and the luggage ferry boat Tranmere, while crossing to the Liverpool from the Woodside luggage berth, came into collision.

The plaintiffs alleged that the Tranmere failed duly to sound her whistle for fog and failed to proceed at a moderate speed, and was negligent in crossing the river at all having regard to the weather.

The defendants alleged that the Dagmar failed duly to sound her whistle for fog and failed to proceed at a moderate speed, and failed to keep to that side of the fairway which lay on her starboard side.

Laing, K.C. and R. E. Gething for the defendants.

HILL, J. (after stating the respective contentions):—I am unable to accept in full the evidence on either side. In some respects I think neither side was giving the court true evidence, but there is sufficient for me to arrive at the conclusion that both vessels are to blame. I find that the place of collision was well to the east of mid-river, and therefore the Dagmar was on her wrong side. I deal next with the signals that were being given for fog. Was either ship sounding at all? Each says she did not hear the other, and she asks the court to infer that the other ship was not sounding. Each, on the other hand, says she was sounding a signal the nature of which I will deal with later. What is the truth of this matter? Is it that neither ship was sounding a fog signal, and that that is the explanation of the other ship not hearing it; or is the truth that each was sounding a fog signal and the other ship did hear it, but comes to the court to say that she did not hear it in order to excuse her for not having acted upon it? I am in doubt as to a good deal of the evidence on both sides, but I find that both vessels were sounding fog signals, and I am very doubtful whether either side is speaking the truth when it says it did not hear the fog signal of the other.

I will now deal with the nature of the fog signal. The Dagmar had a long trail of flats in tow. The total length of the flotilla was about 500ft. The Dagmar was going up the river, sounding a single long blast instead of the signal prescribed by art. 15 (a) of the Sea Regulations—one long blast followed by two short blasts. The master of the tug confessed that when towing craft in fog he always sounded the single long blast and not the prescribed signal. If that be so, he persistently broke the regulations. It is of very great importance that a vessel towing another or others should sound the proper signal. The indication that the Dagmar gave to other ships was that she was a single steamship all by herself coming up the river, whereas she was a tug with a long line of flats 500ft. in length. It is said that it made no difference, as it was not a matter which caused or contributed to the collision. If I am right in disbelieving the Tranmere's evidence that she heard nothing at all, perhaps it is immaterial; she heard the single long blast, and the collision was not brought about by the length of the tow. On the other hand, if I am wrong in disbelieving her and the fact be that she did not really hear anything, then it may well be that a towing fog signal, one long and two short, might have arrested the attention of people who were careless to a single long blast. It shows the importance of obeying the regulation. As to the Dagmar, therefore, I find that she was sounding a signal which might have conduced to the collision.

As to the Tranmere, she also was sounding a signal which was not in accordance with the regulations. She was sounding two blasts of moderate length, something between a long blast and a short blast, instead of one long blast. It has long been the practice of the ferry boats on the Mersey to sound special signals according to the particular ferry course they happen to be on, and this practice is well known on the Mersey. The evidence of all the witnesses, except the master of the Dagmar, who professed to be ignorant of it, was that the practice is well known. I have no doubt that it was as well known to the master of the Dagmar as it was to everyone else. But this departure from art. 15 (a) is not justified under the Sea Regulations nor under any special rule which has been made for the Mersey. It is a breach of the regulation, but in this particular case it is impossible to say that it contributed to the collision; for if, as I find, two fairly prolonged blasts were being sounded instead of one long blast, they certainly gave as good a warning as the one would give. If the two were not heard at all, then one would not be heard. If two were heard they gave quite as much, or rather more, information to the Dagmar than if only one had been blown.

There remain two questions the answers to which I think depend upon very similar considerations. It is argued that the Tranmere contributed to the collision by excessive speed, and it is also argued that she ought not to have been under way at all. I will deal first with her speed immediately before and at the time of the collision. I find against the Tranmere upon the question of speed; I find it was not less than four knots, and I think it was probably rather more. [His Lordship here examined the evidence, and, having found that the Dagmar had only very slight way, continued:] In the circumstances the Tranmere's speed was excessive, because the circumstances were such that the two ships only became visible to each other at a distance of 30ft.—i.e., at so short a distance that it was impossible for the Tranmere to do anything to avoid the collision. It is contended that that speed was not wrong for the ferry boat, which had already reached the east side of the river, because she had no reason to anticipate that the Dagmar would be improperly coming up the river in her wrong water, and that there was nothing to inform the Tranmere that the Dagmar was so coming up. That brings one back again to the question of the whistle signals, and as I have found that the Dagmar in fact was sounding a long blast—although not the right sort of blast—it was a signal which informed the Tranmere that there was a ship coming up on the wrong side of the river. Therefore a speed which would not have been justifiable further out in the river or in crossing the river was not justifiable when the Tranmere was approaching her berth. This leads me to the conclusion that the Tranmere is to blame for excessive speed contributing to the collision; and in my view, having discussed the matter with the Elder Brethren, it brings me to the same point as the question whether she ought to have been under way at all. Mr. Miller invited me to find in law that in a dense fog the ferry boat was not entitled to be under way, and that it was negligence to be under way at all, and he referred me to The Lancashire (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 202; 29 L. T. Rep. 927; L. Rep. 4 A. & E. 198). Now The Lancashire was decided in 1874, and the importance of the ferry traffic to Liverpool, Birkenhead, and the whole industry of the Mersey, of course has altered very much since that time. Speaking for myself, I should not be prepared to lay down any rule of law as to the duty of these ferry boats to cease running under any circumstances; and I do not think, if The Lancashire is looked at fairly, it is a decision in law that the ferry boats are negligent merely because they are running in dense fog or that they run in dense fog at their own risk. It was not necessary in The Lancashire to lay down any such law. The Lancashire, the ferry boat, was under way, and was in collision with a ship which was at anchor and found to be ringing her bell. The Lancashire therefore was to blame without anything more being said about it. Moreover, I think the judgment of Sir Robert Phillimore, in dealing with the duty of a ferry boat not to be under way in the circumstances, was a decision given with reference to the circumstances of the case which he sets out. From that view I express no dissent; there may be circumstances, owing to fog and other things, which make it impossible for a ferry boat to be under way and at the same time navigate with such care as is required in fog; and in this particular case I think it is probable that at the time in question it was impossible for the ferry boat to make her passage from Woodside to Liverpool except at a speed which in the dense fog was excessive. There was a three-knot tide which she had to overcome and at the same time get down the river on her way to Liverpool. She could not do it unless she was making at least four knots, which in so dense a fog was an excessive speed. Therefore in this case it may well be that it was improper for the ferry boat to be under way at this particular time; but the fault which she committed as against the Dagmar was excessive speed, and it is for that I condemn her.

The result is that I pronounce both ships to blame, and I see no reason to draw any distinction in the degrees of fault.

THE RANNVEIG. (a)

Prize Court—Agreement by allies with neutral country conceding right to trade in conditional contraband—Cargo of conditional contraband destined for German base of supplies—Seizure during Armistice.

On the 30*th April* 1918 an agreement was made between the U.S.A. and Norway, and was assented to by the United Kingdom, under which Norway agreed not to export to Germany foodstuffs except fish in quantities not to exceed 48,000 tons per annum. This quantity was duly exported by Norway under Norwegian governmental licence, the monthly total exported being reported by Norway to the United Kingdom. The R. during the Armistice under such licence and within such condition was on a voyage to Stettin, admittedly a German base of supplies, and both ship and cargo were taken as prize by H.M.S. V.

Held, (1) that the cargo was contraband, the Norwegian trade with Germany in fish provided for by the agreement being that trade only which was consistent with neutrality; (2) that as the Armistice did not reopen German trade it gave no immunity; (3) that both ship and cargo were liable to condemnation.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—His Majesty's Procurator-General claims the condemnation as prize of the Norwegian steamship Rannveig and her cargo of 8898 barrels of salted herrings which were captured by H.M.S. Vidette on the 6th March 1919, in the course of transit by sea from the Norwegian port of Trondhjem to the German port of Stettin. At the time of the capture foodstuffs were conditional contraband under His Majesty's proclamations of Dec. 1914 and subsequent dates, and Stettin had been found in this court to be a German base of supplies; and the Armistice concluded between the Allied Powers and Germany on the 11th Nov. 1918 was in operation. Claim for the release of the vessel with damages and costs is made by the Norwegian owners on two grounds—that the cargo of fish was being carried to Stettin with the knowledge, permission, and consent of His Majesty's Government, and was being carried to Germany under licence issued by the Norwegian Food Department in pursuance of an agreement made between the Norwegian Government and the Government of the United States with the assent of His Majesty's Government, dated the 30th April 1918, according to the provisions of which Norway is entitled to export to the Central Powers and their allies fish and fish products up to 48,000 tons per annum. The claimants to the cargo, who also claim damages and costs, are the Reichs-fischversorgung Gesellschaft of Berlin, who allege themselves to be the true owners of the cargo, and assert that "the goods were being imported into Germany under permit." The appearance of these claimants was received on the 4th July 1919, during the war, under reservation by the Procurator-General of his right to contend that the claimants had no right to enter an appearance. At the time of appearance this was, no doubt, a well-founded reservation. No objection was, however, raised at the hearing to the appearance of counsel for the claimants, and Mr. Leck argued the case on their behalf.

Sir Erle Richards, on behalf of the shipowners, did not dispute that Stettin must be regarded by me as a German base of supplies or that foodstuffs in transit thither by sea in March 1919 were primâ facie subject to capture and condemnation. He proved, however, an agreement made between the United States of America and Norway on the 30th April 1918 with regard to trade between Norway and various belligerents, assented to by Great Britain and other Allied Powers; and upon the terms of this convention he founded the claim for exemption from capture upon which his clients rely. The agreement in question is expressed as being made for the duration of the war, subject to provisions for determination which did not affect this case. The main subjects of the agreement are the supply to Norway of commodities from the United States and the disposal by Norway of the exportable surplus of certain classes of Norwegian produce. With regard to fish and fish products it was agreed as follows: Art. 3. "Norway will not export to the Central Powers or their allies foodstuffs of any kind except fish and fish products. Fish and fish products may be exported in quantities not to exceed 48,000 tons per annum. . . . The quantity of fish and fish products which may be exported to Germany and her allies shall not exceed 15,000 tons in any three months. The export of each class of fish and fish products is to be made in the form in ordinary commercial use in the past." . . . Art. 4. "The quantities which it is expected will be available for export to the United States and the countries associated with the United States in the war are substantially as follows: . . . (5) "Fish and fish products, 48,000 tons." The claimants show by their evidence that the surveillance of the export of fish to Germany under the agreement was left by the United States and the Allied Powers to the Government of Norway, that the Norwegian Government set up with the knowledge of the Powers a system of control of the export and reported to them monthly the totals of the shipments actually made, and that the fish laden on board the Rannveig was in point of quantity within the limits of 48,000 tons per annum and 15,000 tons per quarter exportable to Germany under the agreement. The Rannveig was a steamship which had been during the war constantly employed in trade between Norwegian and German ports, including the fish trade, and she had been expressly excepted from the operation of an agreement of the Norwegian Shipowners Association whereby the Allies secured the services of their trade of other Norwegian tonnage.

Mr. Samuelson, managing director of the Aktieselskabet Osterjolingen, stated, and the fact no doubt is, that all shipments of fish to Germany under the agreement of the 30th April 1918 were made under licences which were controlled by the Norwegian Customs, and that the cargo in question was loaded under such a licence. In par. 8 of his affidavit he sets forth the conclusions and acts on his part which led to the dispatch of the Rannveig on the voyage upon which she was captured. He says: "I was of opinion (a) that by reason of the British Government having accepted the benefits of the tonnage agreement, subject to the exception of the named ships, including the Rannveig, so long as they continued in the same trade, and (b) that by reason of conditions of the American agreement, I was entitled to carry cargoes to Germany in the Rannveig within the ration. But after the Armistice was announced, and it became known that British war vessels were in the Baltic, presumably for the purpose of controlling trade with Germany, and a system of control was established, it occurred to me that it was possible that the commanders of the vessels had not been informed of the arrangements made, especially those in relation to the Rannveig. I therefore asked the Norwegian Shipowners Association to address a request to the British authorities that they should call attention to the arrangement so that the said ships should not suffer detention, and I am informed that on the 18th Nov. 1918 a communication to this effect was addressed by the Norwegian Shipowners Association to the British Legation at Christiania; I was afterwards informed by the Shipowners Association by telegrams of the 27th Nov. and the 2nd Dec. that the British Legation contended that the ships were liable to capture while carrying cargo to Germany. As this, in my opinion, must be wrong, as the Legation could not say that England having the benefit of the tonnage agreement and of the American agreement nevertheless should deny the ships to proceed and thus disregard one of the conditions of the said agreements, I consequently had nothing else to do than to let my ships go without any special permit." On the 18th Nov. 1918 the director of the Norwegian Shipowners Association wrote to the British Legation at Christiania this letter: "We beg to inform you that we have been approached by owners of vessels running to German Baltic ports during the war (for instructions) whether they could continue in the trade after the change in the situation in the Baltic as a result of the general armistice of the 11th inst. We have replied that in accordance with arrangements in connection with the tonnage agreement, certain named vessels were allowed to continue in the said trade and that such vessels which have not been removed from the German trade may continue to trade on German ports. We expect that the following steamers will remain in the Norwegian German service: Steamship Rannveig and steamship Gunvor III. We would thank you in case you should find it necessary to call the British authorities' attention to this arrangement, so that these steamers are not going to be detained by the British warships or authorities, which may now control the traffic in the Baltic." He received a reply, the purport of which appears from the following telegram which he forwarded to the managing owner of the Rannveig; "B. Samuelson and Son, Bergen.—Rannveig, Gunvor III.—British Legation inform us that the ships are liable to capture if cargo is carried to Germany. England interprets our tonnage agreement on this point that they would not demand these ships' transfer to Allied trade." It was at the end of Feb. 1919 that the Rannveig was loaded in a Norwegian port and dispatched from Trondjhem, and on the 6th March that she was captured in the Baltic and sent to Leith in charge of a prize crew.

Sir Erle Richards contended that the agreement of the United States of America with Norway made with the assent of Great Britain had the effect of a treaty binding upon His Majesty's Government for a period of its duration, whereby the Norwegian herring trade with Germany to the extent limited by the agreement was exempt from interruption by British naval force. He argued also that there was acquiescence by the Allied Powers in the mode of conducting the fish trade of Norway with Germany during 1918 which ought under the agreement to be held to render the capture unwarrantable. Seizure of a vessel engaged regularly in the trade in question was, he said, an act which must render the agreement in favour of the trade practically inoperative. On the subject of condemnation it was further submitted that at any rate the shipowners had honestly supposed the trade in which they engaged their vessel to be a licensed trade, and they ought therefore to be free from the extreme penalty of confiscation. For the cargo claimants, reliance was placed on the facts already mentioned, and also upon the fact that the seizure took place during the Armistice. There being a suspension of hostilities, it was insisted that the dispatch of foodstuffs to a German base of supply raised no presumption that the same were destined for military use, and that the claim of the Crown ought to fail for want of express proof to that effect. The first question involved in the decision of the case is that of the efficacy under international law of the agreement of the 30th April 1918 and the extent of its operation as an insurance of the allowance of the Norwegian trade with Germany in fish and fish products to which it refers. There is no novelty in the concession or recognition by treaty of special trade privileges or immunities for a contracting party who remains neutral as against another contracting party who becomes or is a belligerent. Numerous treaties to which England was a party in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries contain stipulations of this kind, and they have been sometimes discussed in our courts. (See The Goede Hoop (ubi sup.); The Vryheid (ubi sup.); The Acteon (ubi sup.); and The Twende Brodre (ubi sup.) The sovereign will of the powers engaged affords the only measure of the possible extent of such concessions. A judge exercising jurisdiction in prize has only to determine their meaning and effect when they bear upon claims for condemnation or release—i.e., for some decree or relief which is within the scope of his authority. Treating the export of fish by the Rannveig for the moment as an act of trade by a Norwegian trader, the question which arises upon the facts is not whether the agreement is in its terms effective to sanction export of fish to Germany, but whether while Germany was a belligerent against the Allies it was effective to sanction the carriage of contraband to a German base of supply. To license such a transaction on the part of an alien friend would be to license an unneutral act whereby he must of necessity lose his character of friend. There is nothing in the terms of the agreement which shows an intention to authorise Norwegian traders to do any act inconsistent with neutrality. The Norwegian trade with Germany in fish which is provided for is, in my opinion, that trade only which is consistent with neutrality and not trade which is contraband.

Applying every day rules of construction, I come to a like conclusion with that which Sir James Marriott expressed in 1778 in his judgment in the Vryheid (ubi sup.)—namely, that a treaty right to trade with the enemy in goods which conditionally are contraband must in the absence of express stipulation be limited to "goods going in the ordinary course of merchandise and for merchantile purposes." I therefore hold that the conveyance of fish from Norway to Stettin so long as foodstuffs were conditionally contraband was not by the agreement of the 30th April 1918 permitted to Norwegian traders. Whether the Armistice, which was concluded on the 11th Nov. 1918, suspended the operation of the then subsisting Proclamations as to contraband can be determined by reference to the actual terms of the Armistice without entering upon any detailed discussion of the implications which may or must arise from the conclusion of an armistice. Art. 26 of the terms of the Armistice is in these words: "The existing blockade conditions set up by the Allied and Associated Powers are to remain unchanged, and all German merchant ships found at sea are liable to capture. The Allies and United States contemplate the provisioning of Germany during the Armistice as shall be found necessary." I take it to be a sound proposition that an armistice does not necessarily imply the right to re-provision a beleaguered area or to remove the blockade of a coast: (see Hall, 7th edit., p. 585; Halleck, 4th edit., vol. 2, p. 351), but I think the question need not be examined in this case, since the terms here agreed upon preclude the contention that the Allied Powers had conceded to Germany any privilege of free importation of foodstuffs to her bases of supply. So far as regarded traffic by sea to Stettin, the Armistice did not grant anything to the enemy. Only by opening German trade could it have enlarged the rights reserved to Norwegian citizens under the agreement, and since it did not reopen German trade it is ineffectual as an independent ground of immunity for the present neutral claimants. Whether a Norwegian owner of fish might have raised effectual objection against rights by capture arising under a blockade set up after the agreement was concluded I need not consider. These claimants are not Norwegian subjects. They were not within any class of traders for whose benefit this agreement was made by the Norwegian Government. They are simply a German corporation who had purchased foodstuffs in Norway for the German state and were engaged in conveying the same by sea to a German base of supply. It is hard, if not impossible, to find any ground of principle on which a claim on their part can be founded. As to the cargo, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that the claim of the Procurator-General must prevail and there must be a decree of condemnation of the herrings as foodstuffs captured in course of transit to an enemy base. The cargo of the Rannveig being contraband, what is the position of the owners? They dispatched their ship not only with full knowledge of the character of the burden and of its destination, but after the plainest warning of the risks they ran in doing so. There is no ground for the submission that they were misled. Under such circumstances none of the considerations arise which relieve from the penalty of confiscation shipowners who innocently carry contraband. Having regard to the rule laid down in The Hakan (ubi sup.) it is my duty to pronounce condemnation of the Rannveig as good and lawful prize.

Practice — Investment of proceeds of sale pending action for condemnation—Terms of bail bond upon release to claimant of goods unsold pending action for condemnation — Prize Court Rules 1914, Order I., r. 2; Order XI., r. 2; Order XXVI., r. 1 —Supreme Court Fund Rules 1915, rr. 73, 74, 74 (a).

Claimants to goods seized as prize had obtained orders from the registrar (1) that the proceeds of sale of certain of the goods should be placed on deposit in the joint names of the claimants and of the Procurator-General, or, alternatively, be invested in Government funds; and (2) that unsold parcels should be released on bail. The Procurator-General contended as to (2) that the costs and charges of seizure and detention already incurred should be paid unconditionally as a condition of release.

Held, that the proceeds of goods sold pending the hearing of an action for condemnation should not be placed on deposit or invested.

Held, further, that where goods are released on bail the claimant should not be required as a condition of the release to pay unconditionally the costs and expenses already incurred; and a claimant who pays costs and charges of seizure and detention upon receiving delivery of such goods ought to have credit for the payment as against the security which represents the full value of the goods in the event of his failure in the litigation, and that the bail bond should be expressed in terms which will evidence this right.

APPEAL SUMMONS.

The facts and contentions herein are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

C. W. Lilley (Sir Gordon Hewart, A.-G., with him) for the Procurator-General.

Sir Robert Aske for the claimants.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—In this group of cases certain goods brought in for condemnation as prize and claimed by various claimants have been sold, and the proceeds, amounting to about 85,000*l.*, are in court. Certain other goods similarly brought in and claimed remain unsold in the custody of the marshal. In these circumstances application has been made in chambers for directions that the proceeds of sale of the goods first mentioned be placed on deposit in joint names to be agreed, or alternatively invested in the public funds, and that the goods unsold be released to the claimants upon giving security for the ascertained value of the same less the amount of the costs and charges payable on delivery in respect of the seizure and custody thereof. Upon the application for placing the fund in court on deposit an order has been made in the registry against which the Procurator-General appeals. A question of principle is involved. Sir Robert Aske, on behalf of the claimants, admitted at the hearing of the appeal that the order could not be claimed as of right. He contended, however, that such an order is within the discretionary power of the court, and ought, on equitable grounds, to be made.

The Prize Court Rules 1914 direct that sale of prize shall be followed by payment into court of the gross proceeds of sale (Order XI., r. 3; Order I., r. 2), and that funds and moneys paid into court in prize matters, and securities placed to the credit of such matters, shall be dealt with in the exercise of the ordinary jurisdiction of that court: (Order XXVI., r. 1). Reference was made before me to the Supreme Court Funds Rules 1915, rr. 73 and 74, but, in view of the terms of rule 74 (a), the provisions there made cannot, I think, be taken to strengthen the case of the claimants upon this application. The question is to be determined upon considerations of the established procedure of this court and the circumstances of the particular case. The application is novel in character. It was suggested on behalf of the claimants that an investment which ought to be sanctioned, having regard to the nature and liabilities of the fund, was an investment in Government stocks. Counsel did not, however, take account of the fact that an order for such investment would have the effect of making the public funds of the United Kingdom chargeable with interest in favour of successful claimants of goods seized as prize, even though the case should prove to be one in which the court does not think fit to award damages. Interest by way of damages can be awarded against captors under the general jurisdiction of the court in cases of unjustifiable capture or of misconduct after capture, but there is, I believe, no other ground on which such an award has been customarily made.

The common form of order in past times where between capture and release sale took place was, I think, an order for payment out of the proceeds of sale, subject to any proper deductions in respect of costs or expenses. During wars when prize was by statute or by Order in Council granted to captors, an order for investment certainly could not have been made at the discretion of the judge without consent of the parties. Investment in a fund of fluctuating capital value might have left captor or claimant exposed to serious risk of receiving a diminished fund, or making good a diminution in value. Having regard to past practice, and to the effects which would follow the introduction of orders for investment of prize funds, at the instance of either captors or claimants, I am not ready to introduce or adopt a novel procedure in this case. It is true that in The Kronprins Gustaf Adolf (1917, 2 Br. & Col. P. C. 418) the late President, Sir Samuel Evans, ordered payment of interest by the Crown, but this was done under exceptional circumstances, as Lord Sterndale pointed out in The Hallingdal (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 121 L. T. Rep. 477; (1919) P. 204, 227). Except for a long delay in bringing the cause to hearing, for which I cannot hold the Crown to be in fault, there are no exceptional circumstances in this case, and this order appealed against must be set aside.

The difficulty which exists in respect of the order sought by the claimants for release against a bail bond of the goods unsold is due to the form of draft bail bond which they have tendered. The claimants seek a decision upon a question of principle which has lately come under consideration in various instances. They ask that the practice of the court shall be defined as to cases in which goods under detention in prize are ordered to be released to claimants on bail, and that the terms of the security to be given to the court shall be so expressed as, in the event of present payment of costs and expenses of detention, to exonerate them and their sureties from further liability. There are certain events of prize proceedings in which the liability for costs and charges and the nature of the security for that liability are already well ascertained. Apart from any exceptional circumstances, goods and proceeds of goods which are the subject of proceedings in prize are, according to the ordinary practice of the court, subject to a charge for costs and charges of seizure and detention. If the captor obtains a decree for condemnation, his interest in the goods or fund, the subject of the decree, is charged with these costs and expenses. If the claimant succeeds in the cause, the decree in his favour leaves him to bear the like burden. In an unreported case of The Adonis Lord Sterndale recently stated the position to this effect: "If goods are condemned, the Crown bears the expense of keeping them out of the fund got by condemnation; where the goods are released the expenses are taken out of the fund which is released; where bail has been given and goods are condemned there is simply an order of condemnation, and no order is made as to the repayment of the expenses, but that has been the custom in the registry, and no case in which the question arose whether it was right has come before either the judge or the registrar."

The substantial question now at issue is that which was left undecided in the case of The Adonis—namely, whether a claimant who obtains release on bail of a captured ship or goods should be required as a condition of the release to pay unconditionally the costs and expenses already incurred.

On behalf of the Crown it was argued that he should do this in consideration of such advantage as he may derive from having the use of the goods before trial. In theory the amount payable under this bail bond in the event of condemnation is the market value of the ship or goods, and this value—which is subject to the charge already mentioned—is the whole thing in litigation between captor and claimant. I say nothing of costs of the cause. To add to the loss of the confiscable subject the loss of an amount which is properly only a charge upon that subject seems to me inconsistent with the general practice of the court in relation to the release of captured property. It would also, in my opinion, be inconsistent with the form of prize bond which is found in Appendix A to the Prize Rules 1914. The effect of that bond is to provide security for payment by the claimant of "what shall be adjudged against him in the cause with costs." If under such a bond the sureties for a claimant become liable for payment of the full value of the captured property in question, then, save as to costs of the litigation, they, and consequently he, become liable for no more.

On the whole, I come to the conclusion that a claimant who pays costs and charges of seizure and detention upon receiving delivery of goods ought to have credit for the payment as against the security which represents the full value of the goods in the event of his failure in the litigation, and that the bail bond may be expressed in terms which will evidence this right.

Ships on time charter not amounting to demise carrying contraband — Degrees of knowledge of owners, charterers, and masters—Liability to condemnation.

A German subject carrying on business since 1900 in New York and president of an American steamship line chartered in 1912 and 1913 on behalf of that line on time charters for terms of nine or ten years three Norwegian vessels. The Norwegian owners retained (inter alia) the right to appoint and dismiss the master. At the outbreak of war the ships were directed to New York, and the president organised a regular service of vessels from the U.S.A. carrying foodstuffs consigned to agents of the packers in Copenhagen, in which service the three vessels were engaged when captured. It was found by inference by the court that the service was organised as a means of furnishing to the German Government through Copenhagen necessary supplies. At the time of capture one of the vessels had on board a small quantity of rubber falsely described as gum. Two of the owners were proved to have, and the third did not disclaim, knowledge of the voyage.

Held, on the broad facts as to the whole undertaking, the knowledge of the master, and the knowledge of the charterers, the ships were liable to condemnation.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—In these cases consolidated for trial the Crown claims condemnation of three Norwegian steamships which in Nov. 1914 were captured in course of the voyage from New York to Copenhagen with cargoes mainly consisting of foodstuffs, and brought into the custody of the marshal. Causes for condemnation of the ships and their cargoes were instituted, which, after release of the vessels on bail, came to a hearing in July and Aug. 1915, with the result that a large part of each of the cargoes was condemned as conditional contraband destined for delivery at an enemy base of supply. A parcel of rubber from the cargo of the Kim, which was described in the ship's papers as gum, was also condemned as absolute contraband shipped for an enemy destination under a false description. The President, Sir Samuel Evans, adjourned the hearing of the claims for condemnation of these ships, and of another neutral steamship, the Fridland, which had been captured under like circumstances, and which subsequently was released for reasons not now material.

At the hearing before me discussion as to the character of the several cargoes and the circumstances of the various shipments was limited to such aspects of the matter as relate to the liability of the ships to confiscation, applying to the case the principles stated by the Privy Council in The Hakan (ubi sup.) and by this court in two recent judgments.

Some evidence was adduced with regard to the several cargoes and the circumstances of the shipments which was not before the court at the hearing of the cause with regard to the cargoes. This included evidence as to flour and grain on board the ships, which came before Lord Sterndale in The Dirigo (ubi sup.), and other evidence as to consignments of which release was shown in The Alfred Nobel (ubi sup.) to have been obtained at the hearing before Sir Samuel Evans by means of a concocted case. Counsel for the Crown proved also a variety of acts on the part of the Gans Steamship Line, who were the charterers of the three ships, John H. Gans, president of that concern, the owners and masters of the ships, and the shippers of various consignments of cargo, which necessitates a reference in general terms to the case which was established.

The Crown was able to show, from statements of Mr. John H. Gans and his associates, and from the nature of the transactions, that shortly after the outbreak of war Mr. Gans organised as a new undertaking a line of steamships from New York to Copenhagen for the purposes of carrying on upon a large scale a new trade organised by him chiefly in hog products, wheat, and flour, and that in this trade the Gans Steamship Company engaged not only the ships in question, of each of which they were charterers for a term of years, but other neutral shipping of the same class. Mr. Gans, who died in the summer of 1915, was a German subject who had been engaged in the shipping business in New York since 1900. The evidence showed him to have been from the outbreak of the war an enemy agent of formidable activity, and one of a group of such agents who were resident in New York.

The vessels here in question were all in Norwegian ownership. The Kim was of 5857 tons gross, registered at Tonsberg, in Norway, and owned by P. Johanssen of that port; the Björnstjerne Björnson, of 5268 tons gross, the property of a company at Bergen; the Alfred Nobel, of 4769 tons gross, belonging to a company at Flekkefjord. The Kim was chartered in May 1912 and delivered in March 1913; the Björnstjerne Björnson was chartered while building in June 1912, and delivered in Oct. 1912. The charters were for terms of nine or ten years. At the outbreak of war all the ships were engaged in various parts of the world in general trade, and they were directed to New York by the charterers. By each charter-party the ship named therein was agreed to be let for a term of years from the date at which she should be put at the disposal of the charterers, ready to receive cargo, and with full complement of officers and crew, and was to be so maintained during the continuation of the charter-party. She was to be "employed in carrying lawful merchandise" between all ports, with certain specified exceptions here immaterial, as the charterers or their agents should direct. The owners were to appoint the master and to provide and pay officers and crew, to pay for insurance, and to maintain the ships in an effective condition. The hire was agreed at a fixed monthly rate. The master was to be under the orders of the charterers "as regards employment, agency, and other arrangements," and it was provided that if the charterers shall have reason "to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owner shall, on receiving particulars of complaint, investigate the same, and, if necessary, make a change in the appointment." The charterers were given the option of sub-letting. The charter-party of the Björnstjerne Björnson had as a term that the steamer should "only be employed in strictly neutral trades, contraband, blockaded ports, and ports where hostilities in progress excluded."

The sailings of the new line into which the three ships were directed by Mr. Gans began on the 20th Oct. 1914. The first four vessels appropriated to the service, including these three and the Fridland, left New York respectively on the 20th Oct., the 27th Oct., the 28th Oct., and the 11th Nov. Some knowledge of the scale of the undertaking and the character of the arrangements is to be derived from the facts as to the consignments of meat products. These three ships carried between them meat products, for four firms of meat packers, consigned to agents of the packers in Copenhagen, to the extent of upwards of 19,000,000lb. The Hamburg firm of Neumann, who had sent one of their members to New York, shipped large consignments of grain and flour. Mr. Gans organised the service and conducted personally the engagements of freight for the new line, and took an active part in the detail of the arrangements. For example, he arranged that consignments of rubber, which were invoiced as rubber, should be shipped as gum, not only in the case of the Kim, but in various other cases.

Evidence in considerable detail as to the activities of Mr. John H. Gans was furnished in an affidavit of Mr. Woods, Secretary of the Prize Department of the Procurator-General. From the outbreak of war Mr. Gans was engaged at New York in the organisation and use of neutral shipping for the belligerent purposes of Germany. As an instance it is sufficient to mention a clearance of neutral vessels from New York upon perjured affidavits for the purpose of delivering supplies to German warships at sea, a transaction which resulted, shortly after the death of Mr. Gans, in the prosecution by the United States Government and the conviction of some of the persons who were engaged with him in the transaction. Mr. Woods' affidavit also gives evidence of occasions in which Mr. Gans was the means of dispatching to Europe early in the war large consignments of foodstuffs purchased by the German Government in the United States.

Taking into account the activity of Mr. Gans in every field in which he was able to give active assistance to the enemy, I have no doubt that the true inference from the facts as to the Gans line to Copenhagen is that he organised it as a means of furnishing to the German Government through Copenhagen the regular service of necessary supplies, which, as is notorious, and as the intercepted messages show, they were unable to obtain through previously existing means of transport.

The part which was played by the charterers, through Mr. John H. Gans, in the organisation and management of the contraband service in which the Kim, the Björnstjerne Björnson, and the Alfred Nobel were engaged by them is aggravated by numerous false statements made, no doubt on instructions of the charterers, contained in the letter of their solicitors dated in Dec. 1914, in which the solicitors discuss the charge of "shipment of conditional contraband by indirect routing through Scandinavian countries"; and the three affidavits made early in 1915, in which Mr. Gans himself dealt with the same matter.

The knowledge of the charterers being of the complete kind which arose from organisation and conduct of the undertaking, the facts as to the personal knowledge of the owners and the knowledge of the several masters require to be considered. Neither of the owners gives in his affidavit any explicit statement as to the information he had before his ship left New York of the voyage in question and the nature of the cargo. Neither of them denies such knowledge, and two of them are shown to have had it. The respective masters had very complete knowledge of what was going on, as their affidavits show. They signed the bills of lading, other than the through bills of lading, and superintended the shipment of the cargo. They knew the novelty of the trade, and must, I think, have been aware of the position and activity of Mr. Gans. At a time when precautions, by insistence on consignment to named neutral consignees in neutral countries and guarantees for neutral consumption, were being called for by cautious owners, they were aware that the Gans line dispensed with any such precautions. The messages exchanged between the masters and owners of the Kim and Björnstjerne Björnson are an index to some of the questions which necessarily arose. The masters of the several ships were inevitably aware, in my opinion, of the meaning and effect of the wholesale shipments to Copenhagen in which they were taking part of goods which were conditional contraband.

As to the Kim, it is to be added that her master took part in the misdescription of the consignment of rubber which she carried.

The facts being as I have stated them, counsel for the Crown claimed condemnation of the three ships on the ground, in the first place, upon which judgment was given in this court by Sir Samuel Evans in The Hakan (ubi sup.)—namely, that there is a rule of international law whereby neutral vessels carrying contraband which by value, weight, volume, or freight value forms more than half the cargo are subject to condemnation. They contended also that there was proof as in The Hakan (ubi sup.) of a time charter which enabled the charterers to use the ship for a contraband trade and made tha acts of the charterers acts for which liability attached to the owners, and that the ships were subject to confiscation by reason of the undoubted participation of the masters in the contraband transaction. They also argued thar there was evidence of actual knowledge of the owners. As to the Kim, a further ground of condemnation was alleged in respect of the carriage of contraband—namely, rubber—under a false description intentionally placed upon the ship's papers by the charterers and the master.

That the cargoes of the three ships in question came within the rule as to half contraband which Sir Samuel Evans stated in The Hakan (ubi sup.) is unquestionable. I prefer, however, to deal in the present case with the question which was the chief subject of argument before me, that, namely, of the degree and nature of the "knowledge" which renders a ship liable to confiscation for carriage of contraband. Sir Samuel Evans found actual knowledge of the owners in The Hakan (ubi sup.), and the case was decided in the Privy Council on that ground. "Knowledge on the part of the owners," it is said, "is sufficient to justify condemnation—at any rate, when the goods in question constitute a substantial part of the cargo." These words were also used which tend to limit the operation of the rule: "There can be no confiscation without knowledge on the part of the owner, or possibly of the charterer or master, of the nature of the cargo." The judgment in The Hakan (ubi sup.) does not of itself supply a conclusive test for application in the present case.

Since the decision in The Hakan (ubi sup.) the cases of The Dirigo (ubi sup.) and The Ran (ubi sup.) have been argued and determined in this court. Each of them has a direct bearing on the problem now under consideration. The Dirigo (ubi sup.) was a case of a whole cargo of contraband, and condemnation was claimed on that ground apart from the facts which showed knowledge on the part of the owners. Lord Sterndale, however, thought it well not to act on that contention, but to examine whether there was such knowledge, taking in this respect the same course as he had taken in The Zamora (ubi sup.). Upon a finding of knowledge on the part of the owner the Dirigo was condemned. The knowledge which was found to have existed was knowledge of one G. W. McNear. The ship was the property of a corporation—G. W. McNear Inc.—whose affairs in the relevant transactions were conducted by G. W. McNear.

In The Ran (ubi sup.) the owner of a Norwegian vessel chartered her to an American firm in Oct. 1914 for a single voyage from New York to Scandinavian ports between Bergen and Malmö, including Copenhagen. She loaded a miscellaneous cargo which included some parcels of copper, thirty-three cases of crude rubber, 2010 bundles of aluminium ingots, and 357 cases described as "gum," but in fact containing rubber. Lord Sterndale was not satisfied that the charterers had knowledge that the rubber in the thirty-three cases was misdescribed, and he said this: "It is to be remembered that knowledge of the misdescription is not of itself enough; there must be a knowledge of the misdescription under such circumstances as to lead to the inference that the person who knew of the misdescription also knew of the contraband nature and contraband destination of the goods. I can find no case in which such knowledge on the part of a charterer, even if it existed, has been held sufficient to justify the condemnation of the ship." Lord Sterndale also examined the grounds of the judgment of Sir Samuel Evans, P. in The Hakan (ubi sup.), when that learned judge, speaking of a charter for the Baltic trade during the war, declared it to be no obstacle to condemnation "if owners in time of war and in waters favourable to contraband trading enter into time charter contracts." Lord Sterndale's commentary upon this view of the law is expressed in the following words: "I think he meant to say that if the result of the charter is to take the disposal of the vessel out of the hands of the owner and leave it to the charterer to do what he likes with her, then the owner cannot escape the consequences of what the charterer does, because he has chosen to give the control of the vessel over to the charterers." Lord Sterndale distinguished the case of The Ran (ubi sup.) from that of The Hakan (ubi sup.), and pointed out that the Hakan was chartered for the purpose of the trade in the Baltic, including German ports, in which she was engaged at the time of seizure, whereas the Ran was chartered for a specific voyage from neutral port to neutral port, was engaged in trade apparently neutral at the time of seizure, and was only brought in question because the charterer "against the owner's wish," included in the lading of the vessel some minute portion of cargo destined for an enemy country.

So far as the present case is concerned Sir Samuel Evans' judgment in The Hakan (ubi sup.) supports the claim of the Crown against the three ships claimed for condemnation, and its force is not weakened by the words of explanation used by Lord Sterndale in The Ran (ubi sup.). The judgment is relied upon by the Crown in support of a proposition that the time charter-parties made by the owners of the Kim, the Björnstjerne Björnson, and the Alfred Nobel with the Gans Shipping Company put it in the power of the charterers to make the use which they in fact made of the three ships, and that when the charterers made a hostile use of the ships which the power granted to them by the owners enabled them to make the owners became involved with the charterers in the consequences which that use of the ship entails.

Seeing that the judgments in The Hakan (ubi sup.) and the other recent cases to which I have referred do not of themselves directly determine the questions involved in the present inquiry, it is permissible to examine the matter in relation to more general considerations. The confiscation of ships by reason of a hostile part taken as between belligerents, or, as it has been called, "mixing in the war," is not limited to confiscation on account of the carriage of contraband to a belligerent; it extends to various breaches of neutrality. Breach of blockade is one; engagement in the belligerent operations of the enemy covers a variety of others, among which are included transport service and the carriage of persons or stores or dispatches for warlike purposes. In many such cases the question has from time to time arisen which arises here—What is the knowledge on the part of an owner which involves him in liability to confiscation of his ship? When the hostile act in question is the breach of a blockade, the shipowner is bound by the act of the master; the cargo owner is also bound if at the time of shipment the blockade was known or could have been known. Upon this subject art. 21 of the Declaration of London seems to add nothing to the conclusions of Lord Stowell in The Alexander (ubi sup.) and The Adonis (ubi sup.) and the judgment of the Privy Council in The Panaghia Rhomba (ubi sup.). Where the hostile act was the use of a ship as a transport, Lord Stowell in The Carolina (ubi sup.) decreed condemnation, although, as he stated in a later case, The Orozembo (ubi sup.), "the master was an involuntary agent acting under compulsion."

In The Friendship (ubi sup.) and The Orozembo (ubi sup.) the carriage of persons was the cause of forfeiture. Lord Stowell in the latter case discussed the question of mens rea. "It has been argued," he said, "as if the ignorance of the master alone would be sufficient to exempt the property of the owner from confiscation. But may there not be other persons besides the master whose knowledge and privity would carry with it the same consequences? Suppose the owner himself had knowledge of the engagement, would not that produce the mens rea, if such a thing is necessary? Or if those who had been employed to act for the owner had thought fit to engage the ship in a service of this nature, keeping the master in profound ignorance, would it not be just as effectual, if the mens rea is necessary, that it should reside in those persons as in the owner? . . . The ignorance of the master can afford no ground of exculpation in favour of the owner, who must seek his remedy in cases of deception, as well as of force, against those who have imposed upon him."

Lord Stowell did not, so far as I am aware, determine in a case of carriage of contraband what knowledge on the part of the owner or his representative would warrant confiscation. In The Neutralitet (ubi sup.), however, he did describe the relaxation of the ancient rule of confiscation upon mere proof of the fact of carriage as resulting from "the supposition that freights of noxious or doubtful articles might be taken without the personal knowledge of the owner."

In each of the present cases the master knew all the material facts at all material times, and was actively concerned in his own ship's part in an enterprise which was calculated and designed to give vital assistance to the enemy. The charterers organised and conducted the enterprise. The owners of the Kim and the Björnstjerne Björnson are proved to have had knowledge of the voyage. The owners of the Alfred Nobel do not disclaim like knowledge. I do not proceed, however, upon distinctions applicable to one or other of the vessels, and I do not apply a separate rule in the case of the Kim because of the shipment of rubber under a false description. The broad facts as to the whole undertaking, the knowledge of the master, and the knowledge of the charterers seem to me to make a clear case for condemnation with regard to each vessel.

I decree condemnation of each of these ships, the Kim, the Björnstjerne Björnson, and the Alfred Nobel, as good and lawful prize.

Naval Prize Tribunal—Joint capture—Co-operation and joint expedition of land and sea forces—Droits of Admiralty—Droits of the Crown—Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30).

During the final campaign in German East Africa, in pursuance of a concerted operation by naval and military forces, the port of Dar-es-Salaam was captured by naval forces, military forces entering the town some four or five hours after its surrender. The German steamship F. was at Dar-es-Salaam at the time.

Held (Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson dissenting), that the facts proved a joint enterprise; but that the capture of the F. was a capture by the naval forces alone, not a joint capture by naval and military forces.

Held, by the whole tribunal, that the law applicable to the division of the proceeds of joint captures was that that part which ought to be appropriated to the navy is a droit of the Crown and therefore will be directed to be paid to the Naval Prize Fund under the Naval Prize Act 1918; and that that part which ought to be appropriated to the army is a droit of the Admiralty, and therefore will be paid to the Exchequer to be dealt with as the Crown may be pleased.

In this case the arguments and facts are fully set out in the judgment.

Lord PHILLIMORE.—In this case a claim has been preferred on behalf of the Treasury that the capture should be treated as one made by joint captors, the ship having been actually taken by the squadron under Admiral Charlton, but it is suggested that the land forces under General Smuts so far contributed to the success of the operations as to entitle them under the rules of prize law to be considered as joint captors.

The Feldmarschall had apparently been in the port of Dar-es-Salaam since the beginning of the war. Dar-es-Salaam was attacked several times in the earlier stages of the war by British naval forces, and in November 1914 an arrangement was made, the town being incapable of defence at the time, under which a detachment from the British navy was allowed to enter the harbour and dismantle the engines of the Feldmarschall, so that she could not proceed to sea, and she remained unable to proceed to sea, but afloat, till the surrender on the 4th Sept. 1916.

In the summer of 1916 General Smuts decided on a definite forward movement from north to south, first of all upon the railway that runs nearly due west inland from Dar-es-Salaam and then onwards towards the southern confines of German East Africa. Arrangements were made that the fleet should co-operate with his forces, and Colonel Price was actually on board the flagship; but the navy was held back to a certain extent, as it was not desirable to drive the German forces out of the seaport itself until a sufficient advance had been made by the main force about one hundred miles inland to cut them off.

General Smuts' force were divided into three columns; the east column under Colonel Price; the central column, which moved southwards, under General Smuts himself; and a column starting from a point much further west and marching south-east under General Van Deventer.

The first success was the capture in July of Tanga by the army. The next was the capture of Bagamoyo by the squadron on the 15th Aug. The next important act was the defeat of the enemy by General Smuts' central column on the Wami river which led to the occupation of the railway at Morogoro on the 26th Aug.

The squadron which held back, as already said, was then allowed to proceed to bombard Dar-es-Salaam, and arrived off that port on the 1st Sept., and made a heavy bombardment on the 3rd. Troops in the meanwhile were advancing from Bagamoyo, which was thirty-five miles to the north, and was left in the evening of the 2nd Sept. On the 4th Sept., about 10.30 a.m., a representative of the civil population came out to the fleet and surrendered the town, stating, as was the case, that all the German forces had left on the 2nd. Therefore the navy landed bluejackets and marines and took possession of the town and of the ship, this being accomplished about noon. The troops from Bagamoyo arrived later in the afternoon at 5 p.m. It is, therefore, in my opinion established that the Feldmarschall was captured by the squadron, and by the squadron alone, and that, in fact, the town and harbour and vessel could have been captured many days before had it not been that at the request of the Commander-in-Chief of the army the operations of the fleet were held back.

But it is said that the German forces had been induced to evacuate the town through the fear of being cut off by the main forces of the army, which had before that date already seized upon the line of railway and were in process of moving further south. It is also said that if Dar-es-Salaam had been occupied before the army had been driven from the line of railway, troops might have been sent down from the enemy headquarters at Morogoro, and have turned out any forces which the squadron might have landed. Both these facts may be so; but, at the same time, it remains that the bluejackets and marines which could be landed from the squadron with the help of the squadron's guns could have taken Dar-es-Salaam in the face of all the German force that was there, and could have held the town, at any rate, till a considerable force had been sent down by rail from Morogoro.

The operation in which both sea and land forces were engaged constituted a joint enterprise; but it does not follow from this that a prize taken in the course of a joint or combined enterprise is to be deemed a joint capture. Upon this branch of the law it may be desirable to quote the judgment of the Lords Commissioners of Appeals in Prize Causes in The Nordstern (ubi sup.). "The sole question upon which this case must be decided, and which has, therefore, in the course of the argument, been principally attended to, is whether it is sufficient to establish a right to share on the part of asserted joint captors that the capture shall take place during the time of a joint enterprise. Upon this we are decidedly of opinion that it is not sufficient that a joint enterprise shall exist at the time, except it expressly refer to the capture in question; or, in other words, that the capture grow out of the purpose and object for which the parties have been united, and be the joint produce of an actual co-operation, and the object of union. We, therefore, confirm the sentence appealed from, and reject the claim on the part of the remainder of the fleet."

The case just quoted, like most cases which are to be found in books upon the subject, is the case of a claim between ships; and with the exception of the passage which has just been quoted, there is not much assistance to be got from the tribunal; but there are many cases in the books of claims by land forces to share with the naval forces of the Crown. And there are many cases of decisions given by higher authorities in the Government, though not actually judicial decisions, as to the claims of different land forces to share in booty captured by one force. There is finally the most important case, that of The Banda and Kirwee Booty (ubi sup.) decided in the year 1866, and from this latter case much assistance can be obtained.

There were two occasions in which ships were captured in Suldanah Bay, actually captured by the fleet, but said to be cases of joint captures by the fleet and the army. On the first occasion, which was in the year 1781, the question was raised as to the ship Hoogskarpel, and on that occasion the Prize Court held that it was a case of joint capture, and some very curious legal results followed thereupon. The second occasion was in the year 1796, and gave rise to the decision in The Dordrecht (ubi sup.). Sir William Scott, in a very elaborate judgment, decided that it was not a case of joint capture. No doubt in that particular case he decided that there was no pre-concert, and this finding underlies a great part of his judgment; but he lays down the following propositions; that when possession has been taken by one force, and a claim of joint capture is set up, the onus probandi lies upon those claiming to be captors; that they must prove actual co-operation, and that there must be a contribution of actual assistance.

In The Stella del Norte (ubi sup.) the question of co-operation between land and sea forces was raised in a strange manner. The claim actually put forward was a claim on the part of the fleet under the command of Lord Keith to share in the capture of certain vessels, taken by ships detached from the fleet to act in concert with the Austrian forces on the coast of Genoa for the purpose of driving the French forces out of that country. The actual ships were said to have been captured in co-operation with the Austrian forces because the Austrians had driven away the garrison from a battery under the protection of which they had been lying. The claim of the rest of the fleet was endeavoured to be supported in the following manner: There had been an agreement between Lord Keith and the commander of the Austrian forces that all booty made on the expedition should be divided equally between the two forces, and it was accordingly contended that in that way the whole of the fleet could come in and have a share. Sir William Scott points out that an agreement made between A. on the one side and B. and C. on the other, that B. and C. should share jointly with A. in any booty taken, does not, per se, give any rights to B. as against C.; but he does proceed to consider, first, whether the case was made out without any reference to the Austrian army and, secondly, whether it was made out with reference to that contention and the effect of their co-operation. He proceeded to hold that if it is treated on the ordinary grounds of capture at sea, the fleet at large had not established a right to share. He then considers whether the Austrian army could have claimed and the fleet through them, and he makes the following observations: "To say that all these services are to be combined in one general co-operation would be to establish a principle of unity in conjunction operations of a very large scale, and far beyond what the court is warranted to do by the authority of any case that has yet been determined. It is said: 'That the Austrian forces were instrumental in driving away the garrison from the forts by which the ships had been protected and that the capture could not have been made by the English ships alone, without the operation of the Austrian army.' That, I think, would not be decisive to support an interest. In the case of the Russian army, which I have already suggested, the movements of the army though without reference to that effect, might tend eventually to the success of an attack on ships on the coast, though the movements were taken only for the accommodation of their own plans; yet, on such a remote and accidental assistance, it would, I think, be very difficult to construct a claim of joint interest, on the principle of co-operation and conjunct expedition." Probably, on the whole, most assistance is to be got from The Banda and Kirwee Booty (ubi sup.). Dr. Lushington, in his very elaborate and valuable judgment in that case reviewed a great number of authorities, naval and military, and from the general trend of those cases and from his own conclusions it is not difficult, in my opinion, to extract sufficient guidance to enable this tribunal to decide upon the present application. The actual captors of the treasure which was found in the two towns of Banda and Kirwee when they were recovered from the rebels in April and June 1858, were the force formed from the Madras Army, and proceeding under the command of General Sir George Whitlock, but the claims were put in on behalf of several other forces which were engaged in a combined expedition for clearing the rebels out of that part of Central India. As General Whitlock's force moved from the limits of the Madras Presidency northwards to operate in Bundelcund, the force under Sir Hugh Rose, advancing from the Bombay Presidency, was striking towards the Jumna, in the end moving almost parallel with the force under General Whitlock, while in the delta of the Doab on the north side of the Jumna River, a force under General Carthew, called the Futteypore Movable Column, was occupied in patrolling the left bank. There were several claims in respect of other detachments, but the case of the force under Sir Hugh Rose is that which most nearly approaches the present claim, and Dr. Lushington disallowed it. After speaking of the admission in certain cases of a claim of joint capture, Dr. Lushington proceeded to observe: "But the Prize Court has again and again asserted its resolution not to extend the operation of that doctrine," and dealing with the cases of booty he said: "I am not aware of any instance in which troops have been admitted to share as joint captors solely on the ground of association irrespective of co-operation, irrespective, that is, of service actually rendered. As to the question of association in that particular case, he found that the two generals, Sir Hugh Rose and Sir George Whitlock, held co-ordinate commands, and that though both received instruction from a common political officer, and though it was a common enterprise, still this did not constitute military association. He then proceeded to deal with the question of co-operation and he concluded that in a certain sense Sir Hugh Rose assisted General Whitlock, but he found that, as far as regards the capture of Banda, the principal services rendered by Sir Hugh Rose were so long before in point of time and so far away in point of place, as to be too remote to be considered; that no doubt as Sir Hugh Rose continued to advance, he gave support to General Whitlock, but that this support was of a kind which one division gives an other, and was insufficient to support a claim to share in booty. He went so far as to say that it was "certain that on more than one occasion Sir Hugh Rose diverted the enemy from General Whitlock," and, even so, he rejected the claim preferred by Sir Hugh Rose and his force to share as joint captors.

In the case before the tribunal there can be no question that, at any rate, any time after the capture of Bagamoyo the squadron could have bombarded Dar-es-Salaam so as to make it untenable, or have landed forces under cover of a bombardment, which would have occupied the town and harbour and taken possession of the Feld- marschall. Their guns could have outranged any that the Germans had at Dar-es-Salaam. All that can be said as to this stage of the proceedings is that possibly if the enemy had not been pressed all along the line by the military forces they might have sent larger forces to try and hold the town.

It is then suggested that though they could take possession they would not have been able to hold it if the forces under General Von Lettow had not been otherwise employed; that he could have sent troops down by rail and turned the marines and bluejackets out. It is a possible supposition, but the object of capture is perhaps not so much the acquiring of booty as the destruction of the enemy's resources, and though the Feldmarschall could not have been worked out of port because her engines were disabled, and though the bluejackets and marines might have been driven out of the town and harbour by superior forces, they would have had ample time and opportunity to insert explosives into the ship and destroy her. I think that the claim put forward on behalf of the army to share as joint captors is not established.

If the tribunal comes to this conclusion upon the particular facts of the case, it becomes unnecessary to decide what would have been the legal consequences if it arrived at a different conclusion and determined in favour of the contention that the and forces made out a claim as joint captors. But as it seems not improbable that prizes taken in some other locality during the Great War may be determined to have been taken in such circumstances that military and naval forces are to be deemed as joint captors, and as the matter has been present to our minds from an early stage of the sittings of the tribunal; was the subject of preliminary discussion in the Duala cases; and has been carefully argued in the present case, I think it expedient to state the conclusions of law to which we have come, and which will regulate the application of any prize money in such a case of joint capture. The authority to which reference is always made is The Hoogskarpel, already mentioned. The grant of prize in the war then raging was made by statute (21 Geo. 3, c. 15). Sect. 1 of that Act, after reciting the Order in Council of the 20th Dec. 1780, ordering general reprisals against the States General of the United Provinces, enacted, that the officers and seamen of every one of His Majesty's ships should have the sole interest and property in every ship which they should take during the continuance of hostilities after the same should have been finally adjudged lawful prize. Commodore George Johnstone and Major-General Meadows were appointed respectively commanders-in-chief of the squadron and of the land forces to be employed at the Cape, and they received instructions that in order to prevent disputes concerning the distribution of such booty as should be gained by their operations the booty was to be divided between the land forces and the sea forces in two shares according to the numbers mustered in each service. When the Hoogskarpel came before the Prize Court, Sir J. Marriott, the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, first condemned the ship and cargo as prize, reserving the question who were captors, and later on the 28th May 1785, pronounced "for the interest of the army agreeably to the spirit of His Majesty's instructions to be distributed according to the directions of His Majesty's instructions." Thereupon an appeal was preferred to the Lords Commissioners of Prize on behalf of Commodore Johnstone and the rest of the fleet, their contention being that the Act of Parliament had given this prize to the navy, and that His Majesty's subsequent instructions could not overrule the Act of Parliament. From the proceedings on the appeal, the papers of which we have seen, it would appear that it occurred to the Lords Commissioners that possibly neither party had a claim of right as to prize. They accordingly directed the law officers to appear before them to represent the interest of the Crown, and ultimately decided that as it was a case of joint capture it did not fall within the then Prize Act, but was a reserved droit of the Crown, and that neither the land nor the sea forces had made out any title; and they varied the decree of the Prize Court by condemning the prize to the Crown. According to the statement in Mr. Rothery's book on Prize Droits, at p. 25, Commodore Johnstone and the fleet took various steps to get this decision set aside, and failed; and the Crown having then asserted its right, proceeded to divide the prize as a matter of bounty in the way indicated in the King's instructions to the commanders-in-chief. Mr. Rothery treats this decision as laying down a general rule that where there is a joint capture by land and sea forces the case is one of the reserved droits of the Crown.

We have to consider whether this is or not too wide an inference. Subsequent prize acts made special provisions for such cases as joint capture, and for the distribution of the prize money. The last statutory provision upon the subject is 27 & 28 Vict. c. 25, s. 34 which provides that ships and goods taken by naval and military forces conjointly become subject to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, and may be condemned as prize, but gives no indication as to how the proceeds should be distributed. It was not easy at first to discover upon what principle the Lords Commissioners arrived at the conclusion to which they came in The Hoogskarpel. If a vessel is captured by any public servant such as a master or a revenue cutter, or a custom house officer, or a police officer it counts as a capture by an non-commissioned captor. We have had occasion in the course of the sittings of this tribunal so to decide in The Belgia (ubi sup.) and The Hertha (ubi sup.). In The Rebekah (ubi sup.) Sir William Scott expressed himself as follows upon the question of a capture by the armed land forces of the Crown. "Thus if a ship of the enemy was compelled to strike by a firing from the castle of Dover, or other garrisoned fortress upon the land, that would be a droit of Admiralty, and the garrison must be content to take a reward from the bounty of the Admiralty and not a prize interest under the King's proclamation. All title to sea prize must be derived from commissions under the Admiralty, which is the great fountain of maritime authority; and a military force upon the land is not invested with any commission so derived, impressing upon them a maritime character, and authorising them to take upon that element for their own benefit." To pursue the matter further. If there be a joint capture by a commissioned and non-commissioned ship, and the same principle would seem to apply, if, instead of a non-commissioned ship we read "a for this purpose non-commissioned force," the authorities show that the prize is divided; a part is a droit of the Crown, and part is a droit of Admiralty; and for the purpose of the division the proportions are taken as if it was an ordinary case of joint captors, and then that portion which would go to the non-commissioned captors is treated as a droit of Admiralty. This was decided by the Lords Commissioners in The Twee Gesuster (ubi sup.), and by a judge of the Prize Court in Le Franc (ubi sup.) both reported in a note to The Cape of Good Hope. In the first case two armed cutters one being commissioned and the other non-commissioned took the vessel and the Lords Commissioners so decided. In the second case six private ships of war, five of which had letters of marque, and the sixth of which was non-commissioned, took a prize and the share which would have fallen to the non-commissioned vessel was declared to be a droit and perquisite of Admiralty. From this it would seem to follow that upon general principles if a prize is the result of joint capture by land and sea forces the proceeds should be divided, and that part which would be appropriate to the land forces should be determined to be a droit of Admiralty and fall as such to the Exchequer to be dealt with thereafter by the Crown as it might be advised, and the rest go to the navy. Bearing this in mind, we have to revert to The Hoogskarpel.

The practice of the Lords Commissioners differed from that of the delegates in ordinary appeals from the Admiralty or Ecclesiastical Courts, in that they gave reasons like other judges for their opinions. We have quoted the judgment delivered by Sir William Grant on their behalf in the case reported in 1 Acton. But there is no account in any law report of the reasons given for the decision in The Hoogskarpel. A search, however, has been made at our request, and it appears that there is a short report in newspapers of the day. The keeper of printed books in the British Museum has furnished the tribunal with a paragraph which he certifies to have appeared in the same form in the London Chronicle, the General Evening Post, the Whitehall Evening Post, and the Morning Chronicle in issues of various dates from the 29th June to the 4th July 1786, and the paragraph is as follows: "A very curious and interesting cause was yesterday determined in the Cockpit by an appeal to the Lords of the Council from the Court of Admiralty. The question related to the prize or capture made by Commodore Johnstone last war. It was whether the capture was prize or booty, and consequently whether the property then taken by the fleet and land forces under his command came within the Prize Act. As the destination of the armament was against the Cape of Good Hope, and a considerable land force under the command of General Meadows was aboard, and shared in the action; their Lordships determined that the case in question did not come within the Prize Act. The consequence is, that the whole property is claimed by the Crown, and the captors relinquish their hopes of prize money and depend on the Royal bounty for whatever compensation His Majesty may think proper or competent." In La Bellone (ubi sup.) Sir William Scott, who was one of the counsel in The Hoogskarpel, introduces an account of that case into his judgment. His statement of the reasons of the Lords Commissioners is as follows: "They laid it down that conjunct expeditions were entirely out of the statute with respect to both services; and that the whole property captured was at the disposition of the Crown, whose equity and liberality in justly estimating the merits of both could not be doubted. The same arguments were urged then as have with great propriety and with great ability been urged now—such as that the co-operation of the army could not divest the title of the navy, that their interest will still be preserved, for that they were takers in a sufficient degree to answer the descriptive terms employed in the statute. But these arguments were urged in vain, the property was condemned to the Crown." This seems to explain the decision. Speaking respectfully, one may say that it was rather a narrow construction, but it may be put in this way: The fleet, asserting a claim under the statute in contravention of the instructions given by the Crown, must be confined to the literal construction of the statute; they may have their pound of flesh, but no more. We, the Lords Commissioners, construe the statute as being that if you are the only takers you may have the prize, but if you and others are the takers you do not come within the statute. If this be the ratio decidendi, then for us, to whom that particular Prize Act does not apply, the matter is to be decided upon general principles of law, and our view is that if a case of joint capture should, at any time, be proved before us, that part which ought to be appropriated to the navy will be a droit to the Crown; but that part which ought to be appropriated to the army will be a droit of the Admiralty, and, therefore, not a droit of the Crown, and, therefore, will not be directed by us to be paid to the Naval Prize Fund. What the Crown may be pleased to do with the part which falls to the Exchequer as a droit of Admiralty it is not for us to say. Before we part with this matter we should perhaps observe that if the apparent inclination of Mr. Rothery's view was right, and that as a general rule of law apart from the construction of the particular statute a joint capture always became a reserved droit of the Crown, it might then be argued that under the Naval Prize Act which gives us our authority the whole would, notwithstanding the fact that it was a joint capture, accrue to the navy. It might be said that if it be a droit of the Crown of any sort it should go to the Naval Prize Fund, because the schedule speaks of any money being droits of the Crown, with no limitation upon those words, and this might be sufficient to cover reserved droits as well as those usually granted to the navy.

Admiral of the Fleet Sir George Callaghan.—I concur in the judgment of Lord Phillimore. It seems clear that the Feldmarschall was not a joint capture, although the capture was the result of joint operations. The navy took possession of the ship four or five hours before the arrival of the land forces. These forces were not in sight at the time of the capture. In old days only those actually in sight at the time could claim a share in the capture, and I take it the same principle would apply in this case.

Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson.—The case of The Feldmarschall was brought before the tribunal as a test case in which to obtain a decision upon the right of the army to share in the proceeds of sale of a prize captured as a result of joint operations by the army and navy. It raised questions of fact and law. The question of fact was whether the vessel was a joint capture made as the result of the joint operations of the two services in circumstances which, if there were no legal impediment, would entitle the army to share. The question of law was whether this vessel was a droit of the Crown, and, if so, whether the effect of the Naval Prize Act 1918 and the proclamation made thereunder on the 15th Aug. 1918 whereby droits of the Crown were granted to the fleet was to cede this vessel to the fleet so as to deprive the Exchequer of the right hereto reserved by prize acts of granting the proceeds of sale of joint captures to the army and navy.

The alternative proposition of law was that in so far as the naval forces contributed to the capture the proceeds of sale were droits of the Crown, but in so far as the land forces contributed to the capture the proceeds of sale were a droit of the Admiralty. I agree in the judgment of Lord Phillimore in so far as the questions of law are concerned, and I do not desire to add anything to his observations upon these matters. I regret, however, that I do not find myself in agreement with the conclusion reached by him and Admiral Callaghan upon the question of fact. Evidence was given before the tribunal by Admiral Charlton on behalf of the navy and by Lieut.-Colonel Grant, D.S.O. on behalf of the army. Admiral Charlton was senior naval officer in command of the Cape station and was present at the surrender of Dar-es-Salaam in his flagship, the Challenger. Lieut.-Colonel Grant was second senior officer on the staff of General Smuts, who was in supreme command of the naval and military forces operating against German East Africa. Both officers were, therefore, fully acquainted with the scope and intentions of the operations. A map was produced based upon the evidence given by Colonel Grant, which illustrated the advance of the columns under General Smuts which were operating against the line of the central railway of which Dar-es-Salaam is the terminus of the sea-end. General Smuts was advancing from the north through Handeni to Morogoro. General van Deventer was advancing in a south-easterly direction through Mpapwa against Kilosa. Morogoro and Kilosa are on the railway. In conjunction with these main movements a subsidiary movement had been initiated, parallel to the main operations, to clear the coastal area and capture the lower part of the central railway and Dar-es-Salaam. The operations to clear the coastal area were in the general charge of General Edwards, Inspector-General of Communications and Admiral Charlton, the naval commander-in-chief, jointly. The command of the land columns was entrusted to Colonel Price, whose headquarters we were told were in Admiral Charlton's flagship. The scheme of operations for which these two officers were jointly responsible must have been pre-conceived in the closest collaboration and provision made for its execution from a common fund of initiative and skill. That reliance was placed on both land and sea forces is established by the progress of the operations.

The column moving against Bagamoyo reached Mandera on the 15th or 16th Aug., the object being to effect the joint naval and military attack on that place. Before the arrival of the column, however, within striking distance of the town, the navy undertook, single handed, the capture of Bagamoyo which was successfully effected on the 15th Aug. At the same time a column was advancing down the coast from Sadani and on the 15th Aug. was south of the Wami river. On the 21st Aug. 1916 van Deventer reached Kilosa and cut the railway. On the 26th Aug. 1916 General Smuts occupied Morogoro. A column had been detached from Colonel Price's forces at Bagamoyo to occupy the Ruvu bridge. The effect of these successful operations against the railway was that the German commander von Lettow was no longer able to reinforce Dar-es-Salaam and the evacuation of the town by the garrison was at once commenced.

Admiral Charlton stated in his evidence that on the 4th Sept., the date on which the town was occupied, he was informed by the residents who remained that the evacuation had begun a fortnight earlier. This approximately coincided with the cutting of the railway at Kilosa by van Deventer and with the imminent occupation of Morogoro by General Smuts. At the beginning of September the occupation of Dar-es-Salaam was decided on. The town was defended by fortifications which were armed with one 6-inch gun and two or three 4.1 guns. The latter guns were naval guns removed from the cruiser Konigsberg and temporarily mounted in the forts. The sailors from the Konigsberg were assisting in the defence of the town. On the 3rd Sept. the navy bombarded the fortifications surrounding the town for the purpose of drawing fire and ascertaining whether the place was still defended. On the 4th Sept the demand for surrender was sent in, signed by Admiral Charlton and Colonel Price and the town was surrendered about 10.30 a.m., the naval forces entering two or three hours later after the obstructions in the harbour had been cleared. A boarding party was put on board the Feldmarschall at about 2.30 p.m. The column at Bagamoyo had started for Dar-es-Salaam two days before. The distance to be covered was about thirty-five miles through a hot and dry country which rendered it necessary to march by night. By the 4th Sept., the day on which Dar-es-Salaam surrendered, the column was resting outside the town and entered two or three hours after the naval forces had entered the port. Admiral Charlton in his evidence submitted that the naval forces could have compelled the surrender of the town on the 23rd Aug. 1916 and stated that he had in fact prepared a form of surrender. I do not think that this is the relevant consideration, for, in the conduct of war-like operations the interest of one service as against that of the other or of an ally must of necessity be subordinated to the general scheme of operations, and it is not proper to take into account possibilities, the success of which at best must be a matter of speculation, especially in so hazardous an attempt as a cutting-out expedition, in a port which could be readily reinforced by the enemy. Moreover, in my opinion there would not be an effective capture if the vessel were in the possession of the captors for a period of time only sufficiently long to permit of her disablement and destruction and were then abandoned and retaken by the enemy. No argument in favour of the fleet can be based on the seizure of a prize which is afterwards abandoned and recaptured by the enemy. On the 4th Sept. 1916, when Dar-es-Salaam surrendered, the position was that the town had been rendered untenable by reason of the advance of General Smuts and General van Deventer's forces across the railway.

It is true that the operations of these forces which were strategically decisive in compelling the evacuation of Dar-es-Salaam were then being carried on at a considerable distance from the sea and it may be a matter of doubt whether there can be said to have been that degree of co-operation between them and the fleet which in The Stella del Norte (ubi sup.), to which Lord Phillimore refers, is laid down as the test of the right of the army to share. Each case must be decided upon its own facts, and it is material to remember that little assistance can be obtained from the precedents of old wars because the modern developments of transport and communication by railways, aircraft, telegraphs and wireless telegraphy render co-operation between distant forces much closer and more real than was possible in former times when these facilities were not at their disposal. In the present case, however, the surrender of Dar-es-Salaam was as much due to the advance of Colonel Price's forces along the coast as to the immediate attack by the navy. Admiral Charlton agreed that it was a joint operation, and stated that he did not think the town would have entirely surrendered without a good deal more fighting unless the military had been there. Moreover, two telegrams sent by Admiral Charlton to the Admiralty, reporting the surrender of Dar-es-Salaam, were put in evidence before us and read as follows: "From C-in-C. Cape Zanzibar. To Admiralty. 4th Sept. 1916. Dar-es-Salaam surrendered 9 a.m. 4th Sept. to combined naval and military forces which are now taking possession." "Naval C-in-C. Cape, to Admiralty. 5th Sept. 1916. Dar-es-Salaam surrendered on the 4th Sept. on demand by Challenger following close attacks by whalers at daylight on the 3rd Sept. and subsequent heavy bombardment by ships of gun positions north of town in advance of troops moving south from Bagamoyo, these being strongly reinforced by landings at Konduchi and Maassani. After surrender Colonel Price, O.C. landed with seamen (——) and British colours were hoisted with full honours in the presence of troops entering the town from northward . . ." I think these telegrams fairly represent the view taken at the time by the naval commander-in-chief who did not in his evidence seriously dispute that the surrender of the town was due to the combined operations of the naval and military forces. Whether the forces under General Smuts and General van Deventer are entitled to claim is, as I have already stated a question upon which I feel considerable doubt, but, having considered The Stella del Norte (ubi sup.) and The Banda and Kirwee Booty (ubi sup.), I am disposed to think that they are not so entitled. The naval and military operations were conducted with a common purpose and under the directions of a common chief, General Smuts, and there was undoubtedly co-operation which materially assisted the forces operating in the coastal area and at sea in their task of occupying the town of Dar-es-Salaam by rendering it strategically untenable by the enemy. According to the cases cited, however, this is not sufficient to entitle these land forces to share and, as I do not think there can be said to have been that "service actually rendered" which is a necessary element of their claim, the numerical strength of these forces should not be taken into account. It is clear that at the time the demand for surrender was made the military was encamped immediately outside the town waiting for the cool of the day to take part in the attack if the demand was not complied with. I have examined The Dordrecht (ubi sup.). I am satisfied that the operations against the town were conducted upon a preconcerted plan devised by General Headquarters and carried into effect by Admiral Charlton and Colonel Price acting in collaboration in the flagship with the naval and military forces under their commands; and the land forces rendered not only very material, but essential service in securing the surrender of the town without very considerable loss of life. There was a contribution of actual assistance by the land forces as well as a preconcerted plan, and in my opinion, therefore, the facts fall fairly within the principles laid down in The Dordrecht (ubi sup.), and are such as to entitle the force operating along the coast to put forward a claim to share in the proceeds of this vessel.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v. GAUNT. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine Insurance—All risks—"Casualty"—Bales of wool damaged by water—Deck cargo—Usage—"In the absence of any usage to the contrary"—Proof—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 55, sub-s. 2 (a); s. 78, sub-s. 4; sched. 1, r. 17.

Under an "all-risk policy" it is sufficient for the plaintiff to prove that the loss was caused by some fortuitous circumstance or casualty without proving the exact nature of the accident or casualty which, in fact, occasioned the loss.

The expression in rule 17 of the rules in the first schedule to the Marine Insurance Act 1906 "in the absence of any usuage to the contrary" deck cargo must be specifically insured and not under the general denomination of goods contemplates a usage in a trade and not a usage in the insurance business, and the rule is not intended to alter, and has not altered, the common law on the subject.

Therefore, where there is a usage to carry goods of a particular kind on deck, the insurer is liable to the insured although deck cargo is not specifically insured.

Lord BIRKENHEAD, L.C.—This is an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing a judgment of Rowlatt, J. in favour of the appellants in an action brought against them by the respondent in respect of a partial loss to wool insured with the appellants.

The wool in question was produced in Patagonia by the Sociedad Explotadora del Tierra del Fuego. The respondent, by direct and sub-purchases, had acquired part of the 1916-1917 clip under four contracts, all of which were on the terms f.o.b. Punta Arenas. The insurance up to delivery on ocean steamer at that port was effected by the Explotadora Company and after such delivery by the purchaser, but no question now arises as to the insurance of the risks of ocean transit.

The policies sued upon were taken ou by the Explotadora Company and by them assigned to the respondent after the wool had reached his mills at Bradford and a few days before the writ was issued. These policies have been modified so as to carry out the terms of a general cover note dated the 15th March 1916, and must therefore be read as containing a clause to this effect : " Including all risk of craft, fire, coasters, hulks, transhipment and inland carriage by land and-or water, and all risks from the sheep's back and-or station, while awaiting shipment and-or forwarding and until safely delivered . . . with liberties as per bill of lading."

The wool reached Bradford in a damaged condition. The evidence did not establish with any certainty when or how the damage was done, but made it clear (and Rowlatt, J. so held) that it occurred at some period between the shearing of the sheep and shipment at Punta Arenas—that is to say, during the period covered by the policies issued by the appellants.

The general manager of the Explotadora Company gave evidence that he could not recall a serious claim in respect of damage to wool occurring during the transit to Punta Arenas, and that the statements in the manifests of the local steamers showed that something abnormal had occurred. The mates' receipts and bills of lading issued by the ocean steamers contain notes that a number of bales were wet ; and the oral evidence was to the effect that the wool was damaged before it was taken on board the ocean steamers. There was no evidence as to any particular bale or bales, or as to the exact circumstances or cause of the damage.

In construing these policies it is important to bear in mind that they cover " all risk." These words cannot, of course, be held to cover all damage, however caused, for such damage as is inevitable from ordinary wear and tear and inevitable depreciation is not within the policies. There is little authority on the point, but the decision of Walton, J. in Schloss Brothers v. Stevens (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 331 ; 96 L. T. Rep. 205 ; (1906) 2 K. B. 665), on a policy in similar terms, states the law accurately enough. He said, at p. 673, that the words " all risks by land and water," as used in the policy then in question, " were intended to cover all losses by any accidental cause of any kind occurring during the transit. There must be a casualty." Damage, in other words, if it is to be covered by policies such as these, must be due to some fortuitous circumstance or casualty.

Rowlatt, J. accepted this view, but was of opinion that the evidence proved a state of facts which was consistent with the damage having occurred " without the intervention of anything fortuitous, of anything accidental, or of anything which could be called a casualty within the meaning of an insurance contract." I agree with the criticism of the Master of the Rolls upon this finding. The damage proved was such as did not occur, and could not be expected to occur, in the course of a normal transit. The inference remains that it was due to some abnormal circumstance, some accident or casualty. We are, of course, to give effect to the rule that the plaintiff must establish his case, that he must show that the loss comes within the terms of his policies ; but where all risks are covered by the policy and not merely risks of a specified class or classes, the plaintiff discharges his special onus when he has proved that the loss was caused by some event covered by the general expression, and he is not bound to go further and prove the exact nature of the accident or casualty which, in fact, occasioned his loss. In this case the respondent established that the loss must have been due to some casualty, and consequently the judgment of the Court of Appeal upon this point is right.

A further point arises, namely, whether the policies insure such part of the wool as was carried on deck, the appellants urging that some at least of the bales were damaged whilst being so carried.

There is, it is true, evidence suggesting that some of the damage occurred in the case of bales carried on deck, and the appellants rely on the seventeenth rule of construction in the first schedule to the Marine Insurance Act 1906, which applies to this policy by virtue of sect. 30 (2) of that Act. The latter part of the rule reads : " In the absence of any usage to the contrary deck cargo and living animals must be insured specifically and not under the general denomination of goods."

It was proved that the Explotadora Company were aware of a practice of carrying bales on deck and, in fact, had complained, but the owners meeting this protest with an assertion of right it was not persisted in. There was certainly a usage in the trade to carry on deck. Nor in my view did the rule under consideration make any change in the law as it existed when the Act was passed. Deck cargo and living animals must be insured as such, the policy containing words which inform all interested parties that the goods insured are to be carried on deck or are living animals, as the case may be, unless there is a " usage to the contrary."

It was contended for the appellants that the " usage " contemplated by the rule was a usage in the insurance business as to the description for the purposes of insurance. This cannot be so. In the first place this construction would involve such a departure from the principles of law existing when the Act was passed that we ought not to so construe the words unless such an alteration was most plainly intended; secondly, inasmuch as an insurer is bound to know the usages of trade, if a usage exists in the trade to carry goods of a particular kind on deck, he knows that such goods are likely to be so carried, and there is little reason for requiring a specific statement that such a method of carriage will or may be employed. The "usage," therefore, must be a trade usage, and it was abundantly established in the case which your Lordships are considering. There was, therefore, no need to insure the wool specifically as deck cargo, and the omission to do so does not afford any defence to the appellants.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord FINLAY.—This appeal relates to the question of the liability of the appellants upon policies covering wool from various stations in Tierra del Fuego and on the mainland of Patagonia to Punta Arenas, the port of embarkation for Europe. The wool arrived in this country in a damaged condition. An action was brought upon policies covering the wool on the ocean voyage from Punta Arenas, and in that action it was held that the underwriters were not liable for the damage upon the ocean policies, and there is no appeal from that decision.

The present appeal relates to policies of insurance from the sheeps' backs at several stations to the ocean steamers at Punto Arenas. Rowlatt, J. held that the plaintiffs in the present action failed to establish any right to recover on these policies. The damage was by wet, and the learned judge was of opinion that there was no evidence of any casualty causing the wetting so as to make the policy attach. The Court of Appeal, on the other hand, held that the circumstances show that the loss was covered by the terms of the policy as resulting from some casualty, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs, the amount to be assessed by a referee. The amount has been assessed at 19,125*l.* 13*s.* 11*d.* The insurance company on this appeal ask that the judgment of Rowlatt, J., in their favour should be restored.

The wool had to be conveyed from a number of sheep stations to Punta Arenas, partly by land and partly by water, in coasting vessels. The insurances are to be read as containing the following clause:—"Including all risk of craft, fire, coasters, hulks, transhipment and inland carriage by land and/or water and all risks from the sheep's back and/or station, while awaiting shipment and/or forwarding and until safely delivered into warehouse in Europe, with liberties as per bills of lading."

I take this clause from the letter of cover of the 15th March 1916, it being admitted that the policies are to be read as containing a clause to this effect.

The bales of wool, on arrival at Bradford, were found to be seriously damaged by water, and the action was brought. A commission was issued to Punto Arenas, and the evidence taken on commission and at the trial left no doubt in the minds of the court of first instance and of the Court of Appeal that the wetting took place after shearing and before the bales were put on board of the ocean steamer at Punta Arenas. There was no specific evidence to show how the wetting had taken place. Rowlatt, J. held that the whole of the evidence was consistent with the goods having been injured "without the intervention of anything fortuitous, of anything accidental or of anything which could be called a casualty within the meaning of an insurance contract." He repeated the ratio decidendi of his judgment in another sentence near the end:—"It seems to me that the policy insures the assured only against risks and any evidence which does not show that the damage was due to something fortuitous does not support the case when the underwriters are sued."

The evidence showed that the wool was made up into bales at the stations and that these bales were carried down to the place of embarkation on the small coasting steamers by which they were carried to Punta Arenas, where they were stored in hulks until embarkation could be made upon the ocean steamers.

No details were available as to the transit of particular bales, but the Master of the Rolls in his judgment in the Court of Appeal thus summarises the evidence:—"It was, however, shown that the logs of the small steamers showed bad weather and rain at times, and that some bales shipped on them about this time were wet, and also that some of these bales received on board the ocean steamers were stated in the mate's receipts and bills of lading to be wet and damaged. It was also proved that sometimes there was not room in the sheds for all the wool accumulated for shipment on the river steamers, and that some had to be piled outside the sheds, where tarpaulins were provided but not always effectively used. Evidence was also given that bales sometimes got wetted with salt water by an unexpectedly high tide while piled on the beach, and also by spray coming over them when carried on the deck of the river steamers. Evidence was given that part of the wool was always carried on deck. Great congestion prevailed at this time because of the difficulty in obtaining transport, with the result that the storage places were overcrowded and some of the wool had to be stored outside. Mr. Burbury, the manager of the Explotadora, stated that in his experience of the carriage of wool, extending over many years, he could not remember any case of a serious claim in respect of damage arising during the transit from the stations to Punto Arenas, and that the statements in the logs and mate's receipts indicated that something abnormal had happened. The chief officer of one of the ocean steamers also gave evidence that the part of these bales which he received was the worst cargo he had ever seen."

The Master of the Rolls proceeded to state the risks insured against, and referred to the decision of Walton, J. in Schloss Brothers v. Stevens (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 331; 96 L. T. Rep. 205; (1906) 2 K. B. 665). That was the case of a policy somewhat similar to that in the present case, and Walton, J. said, at p. 673 in the Law Reports (Asp. p. 334): "I think they" (the words of the clause) "were intended to cover all losses by any accidental cause of any kind occurring during the transit. Does the loss suffered, in fact, come within that category; Was the damage from some accidental cause? There must be a casualty."

The Master of the Rolls said that in the present case there was exceptional damage such as did not arise under the normal conditions of such a transit, and that in his opinion it might be inferred that it proceeded from a casualty or something accidental. With reference to the judgment of Rowlatt, J, he remarked :—" I think he treated the policy too much as one against specific perils in which it is necessary to prove specifically that the loss came within one of them and did not give sufficient attention to the fact that this was a policy of an unusual kind against all risks, and that it was sufficient to show that the loss was occasioned by a casualty or something accidental without proving further in what the exact nature of that casualty consisted."

I agree with the Master of the Rolls in thinking that there was sufficient evidence to justify the inference that this loss was due to something accidental. Of course, no one would contend that a policy of this kind would cover ordinary wear and tear or deterioration incidental to the transit of goods. There must be something in the nature of an accident to bring the policy into play. But I can find no justification for the contention which the appellants put forward at the Bar of your Lordships' House that in order to recover upon such a policy for damage resulting in the goods getting wet by rain it would be necessary to establish that there was an extraordinary or unusually heavy fall of rain. It would be quite enough if, owing to some accidental circumstances, the goods were left uncovered when rain was falling. This might happen by some want of care on the part of the men whose duty is was to keep the goods covered with the tarpaulins which were provided for the purpose. If, from any of the accidental circumstances which are incident to a journey, the goods are damaged by a risk covered by a policy, the element of casualty or accident is supplied. There is nothing in the present case to show that the damage was due to any wilful misconduct on the part of the assured. As Atkin, L.J. put it in his judgment, I think that the facts show that the wetting might probably be caused by some fortuitous accident or casualty.

I agree with this finding. This disposes of the main question on this appeal. There is, however, another point to be dealt with.

The appellants allege that some part of the bales were damaged while being carried as deck cargo on board the coasting steamers, and that the policy does not cover deck cargo.

They rely for this purpose on the Marine Insurance Act of 1906 s. 30, and the seventeenth of the rules of construction in the schedule.

Sect. 30 is as follows : " (1) A policy may be in form in the first schedule to this Act ; (2) subject to the provisions of this Act and unless the context of the policy otherwise requires the terms and expressions mentioned in the first schedule to this Act shall be construed as having the scope and meaning in that schedule assigned to them."

The seventeenth of the rules for construction is as follows : " 17. The term ' goods ' means goods in the nature of merchandise, and does not include personal effects or provisions and stores for use on board. In the absence of any usage to the contrary deck cargo and living animals must be insured specifically and not under the general denomination of goods."

The construction of this rule has given rise to a great deal of controversy, and it is now necessary that we should endeavour to settle this vexed question of construction. Rule 17 is very oddly worded, but it appears to me that on its true reading it leaves the law as to insurance of deck cargo very much as it was before the Marine Insurance Act passed.

The rule prescribes that deck cargo and living animals must be insured specifically in the absence of any usage to the contrary. What is the meaning of the provision that deck cargo and living animals "must be insured specifically"? I think "specifically" in this connection means " as such." In the case of deck cargo there must, in addition to the ordinary description of the goods, be an intimation in the policy that the goods are to be carried on deck, by inserting " for carriage on deck," or other similar words. In the case of " living animals " the description must convey an intimation that the animals are alive and not mere carcasses, that is, if there is any ambiguity in the description there must be added to it the word " live," or some equivalent expression.

There are, of course, special risks attaching to deck cargo and to live animals, and the rule is, I think, intended to secure that the underwriter must have express information of the existence of such risks " in the absence of any usage to the contrary."

What is the meaning of these words as to usage which are prefixed to the second part of rule 17 ? In the case of deck cargo, I think that these words would be satisfied by proof of a usage in a particular trade, or generally, to carry on deck goods of a particular kind. The underwriter is bound to know of the existence of such usages, and the description of particular goods as of the class to which such a usage applies gives him the information that the goods will or may be carried on deck. If there is such a usage there is no reason for requiring a statement that goods which fall within it are, in fact, to be carried on deck, as the mere description of the goods gives the necessary intimation. Such a usage may be fairly described as " a usage to the contrary." I cannot adopt the appellants' contention that the usage must be a usage not in the carrying trade with regard to such goods, but in the insurance world with reference to the manner in which they are to be described for insurance purposes. Such a usage as to insurance may, of course, grow up in any trade in which deck carriage of certain articles prevails, and if such a usage in the business of insurance has grown up it will be a usage to the contrary. But in my opinion no such usage in the business of insurance is necessary to dispense with the specific description of deck cargo as such. Any such construction of rule 17 would bring it into acute conflict with the law as to insurance of deck cargo as it existed up to 1906, and is not, in my opinion, warranted by the wording of the rule.

In the case of " living animals " the words " in the absence of any usage to the contrary " may have been introduced to guard against the conceivable case that in a particular trade in which the goods carried were almost exclusively live cattle or sheep there might be a usage that such live stock should be merely described as " goods." The contingency is not a very probable one, but Parliament, if it considered the wording of this rule, may have thought that to provide against any possible usage to the contrary could do no harm and might conceivably be useful.

The concluding words of the paragraph that deck cargo and livestock are not to be insured simply as goods appear to be quite unnecessary, but do not militate against the construction of the paragraph which I am disposed to adopt.

As both the Master of the Rolls and Atkin, L.J. point out, there was abundant evidence of a usage that in this trade bales of wool should be carried on deck. The "usage to the contrary" was therefore established, and there was no necessity to ensure the bales specifically as for carriage on deck.

Upon the whole, I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord CAVE.—I agree and have nothing to add.

Lord ATKINSON.—I concur.

Lord SUMNER.—With one exception mentioned later on I concur in the conclusions drawn from the evidence by the Court of Appeal. The damage was fresh-water damage; it occurred after the winter rains had begun. There is some evidence that bales are exposed to rain at Puerto Prat, when the sheds are full, and on the decks of the coasters, where it is proved to be the usage to carry such cargo as this, and on the hulks at Punta Arenas. It is proved that tarpaulins are provided by the shippers at their sheds and that their men sometimes neglect to use them. On coasters and hulks tarpaulins ought to be at hand and used, and it is not shown that either were unseaworthy for want of them. Proper tarpaulins properly used would protect the wool from damage by rain. Evidently a substantial amount of the damage was done while the goods were on deck and would have been prevented if proper care had been used.

The perils insured against in the printed form of policy are enlarged by those in the cover notes, "including all risk of craft, fire, coasters, hulks, transhipment, and inland carriage by land and/or water, and all risks from the sheep's back and/or station, while awaiting shipment and/or forwarding. . . ." Both clauses, therefore, the additional clause as well as that in the regular form, describe risks or perils intended to be insured against: (Nigel Gold Mining Company v. Hoade, 6 Com. Cas. 268; Jacob v. Gaviller, 7 Com. Cas. 116). The words closely resemble those in Schloss v. Stevens (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 331; 96 L. T. Rep. 205; (1906) 2 K. B. 665), where Walton, J. refused to read "all risks by land and by water" as limited to the risk peculiarly incidental to carriage in a ship, in boats or in craft, and held that it must be "read literally as meaning all risks whatever." There is nothing abnormal in this; in fact, "against all risks whatsoever, anything printed or written herein to the contrary notwithstanding" was a clause known in practice over thirty years ago, and a great variety of clauses in policies on cattle, employing the words "all risks," "all risks of mortality," and "all risks of mortality . . . from any cause whatsoever" may be found by the curious in Sir Douglas Owen's Marine Insurance Clauses. "There must be a casualty," added Walton, J.; the words were "intended to cover all losses by any accidental cause of any kind occurring during transit." The appellants argue that getting wet, when not under cover, is a thing that will happen to bales whenever it rains, and the injured bales started on their journey after the rainy season had begun; in a word, they say the loss arose from "no unusual cause": (Dudgeon v. Pembroke (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 393; L. Rep. 9 Q. B., at p. 594). It is, however, to be remembered that discussions about wear and tear and leakage and breakage generally arise when the issue is whether the loss is or is not a loss by perils of the sea, e.g., in Rohl v. Parr (1 Esp. 445), Hunter v. Potts (4 Camp. 203), and Merchants Trading Company v. Universal Marine Company (2 Asp. M. C. 431, at p. 432), where Lush, J. observes, "the silent natural action of the water on a floating body is, not a peril of the sea, but it is wear and tear." The more widely the category of perils insured against is extended, the more nearly is it true to say that not only perils of the sea but perils on the sea are insured. "All risks" has the same effect as if all insurable risks were separately enumerated; for example, it includes the risk that when it happens to be raining the men who ought to use the tarpaulins to protect the wool may happen to be neglecting their duty. This concurrence is fortuitous; it is also the cause of the loss by wetting. It appears to be what happened. For wool to get wet in the rain is a casualty, though not a grave one; it is not a thing intended, but is accidental; it is something which injures the wool from without; it does not develop from within. It would not happen at all if the men employed attended to their duty.

There are, of course, limits to "all risks." They are risks and risks insured against. Accordingly the expression does not cover inherent vice or mere wear and tear or British capture. It covers a risk, not a certainty; it is something, which happens to the subject-matter from without, not the natural behaviour of that subject-matter, being what it is, in the circumstances under which it is carried. Nor is it a loss which the assured brings about by his own act, for then he has not merely exposed the goods to the chance of injury, he has injured them himself. Finally the description "all risks" does not alter the general law; only risks are covered which it is lawful to cover, and the onus of proof remains where it would have been on a policy against ordinary sea perils.

I think, however, that the quasi-universality of the description does affect the onus of proof in one way. The claimant insured against and averring a loss by fire must prove loss by fire, which involves proving that is is not by something else. When he avers loss by some risk coming within "all risks," as used in this policy, he need only give evidence reasonably showing that the loss was due to a casualty, not to a certainty or to inherent vice or to wear and tear. That is easily done. I do not think he has to go further and pick out one of the multitude of risks covered, so as to show exactly how his loss was caused. If he did so, he would not bring it any the more within the policy. These considerations answer the appellants' complaint that the plaintiffs were meagre with their proof. So they were, but it was enough for them to prove some casualty insured against. Rowlatt, J., as I venture to think, attached too much importance to the absence of any kind of marine disaster. If the casualty was fortuitous, it needed not to be a calamity.

As a good deal of the damaged cargo was on deck, there arises for decision a point upon the Marine Insurance Act, which was strongly pressed upon your Lordships. The first schedule sets out a Lloyd's form of policy and a series of rules for its construction "where the context does not otherwise require," and, out of seventeen following rules, in all but one the meaning of some particular term is expounded. The schedule in fact contains a typical document with an elaborate interpretation clause. I can conceive no subject on which the Legislature is less likely to have wished to make a change or to declare that what people have hitherto meant in business shall be their meaning no longer. Theretofore all concerned, when they said "goods" simply, meant goods under deck or goods in and over all according as the usage of the trade in which the goods were to be carried did not or did include a usage to carry on deck. Why should a Codification Act abolish that habitual meaning and make the word mean the one or the other according as there is or is not a drafting usage among those who prepare and those who sign policies? No one has suggested any reason for such a change.

Even if the schedule has changed the law, does it affect this case? Sect. 30 (2) is an interpretation section. It says "the terms and expressions mentioned in sched. 1 shall be construed as having the scope and meaning in that schedule assigned to them." Now this policy, as expanded by the covers, does not contain any term or expression mentioned in art. 17 of sched. 1; it says, "wool," "wool clips," or "bales of wool," not deck cargo or cargo or goods. Next, the rule does not apply "except where the context does not otherwise require." Now the form is for a voyage in a named ship, "beginning the adventure upon the said goods, from the loading thereof aboard ship," but the context consists of additional words, which make the adventure begin from the sheep's back and continue by land and/or water in coasters and hulks and while awaiting transhipment. I greatly question, if this context does not require something different from the mere insurance of deck cargo specifically. In any case, if this rule of interpretation is new, the appellants find considerable difficulty in making it apply to this policy on any strict construction, and unless the construction is to be very strict, there is no ground for questioning that the rule is not new, but only embodies the existing law. This cargo is insured specifically, for it is described as wool "clips" and "bales of wool." To say that it is not insured specifically, though it is described specifically, unless it is insured as on deck however described, conflicts with the rest of the sentence. Clearly living animals have to be insured specifically as living animals, and not under the general denomination of goods. From the specific description the underwriter must take notice of the place of stowage, where a usage as to the place of stowage of such goods is, or is deemed to be, known to him.

Then there are the words "in the absence of any usage to the contrary." Rule 17 is a direction as to the apt mode of drawing up a policy, that is primarily as to the use of words. The rule in construing and therefore in drawing contracts is that the words must be understood with reference to the circumstances in the light of which the parties contract. When there is a usage to carry all or any goods on deck, which both parties know or are deemed to know, their words may be selected and will be construed with reference to it. In such circumstances even a general word, "goods," will derive its meaning from the usages of the carrying trade known to the contracting parties, just as much as from any usage known to both, as to the meanings of terms in the general vocabulary of commerce. Now the word "usage" is not expressly limited, and a usage to carry on deck is a usage like another; only the context, therefore, can restrict it to a usage of drafting policies. What is that context? Goods on deck are still "goods," and "goods" are specifically described for insurance, when the policy says what they are specifically. It is not a specific description to say where they are. So much for mere language. What makes "goods" insufficiently specific for an insurance on deck cargo is not any usage of underwriters to use words in a technical sense, but the usage of carriers to stow goods under deck, as being the safest place. A usage to carry on deck is a usage to the contrary to that, and, therefore, where it exists, its presence prevents any misdescription from arising. If in all carrying trades cargo was carried in and over indiscriminately no one would ever have distinguished between one position and the other any more than between one hold and another. No doubt, if ever a usage arises among those who draw and sign and accept policies to mean by "goods" any kind of goods, stowed anywhere, that also might be proved as a "usage to the contrary," but the respondents' point here is not that the "usage to the contrary" can never be such a usage as the appellants say it must be, but that it is not exclusively so, for a usage to carry on deck is also a usage to the contrary. For my part, I think them right.

Perhaps I might venture to say that in this article the Legislature has used language to express its thoughts with less than its accustomed felicity, but I think that there are special reasons to explain this. It may easily happen to anyone who endeavours to crystallise in a sentence the language of a century's decisions to draw the line somewhat uncertainly between the usual mode of carrying particular goods and the usual meaning of or description of those goods in a policy. In Lord Mansfield's time goods on deck were said not to be covered by a policy "on goods," because, in the language of insurance, goods only meant goods which were merchantable and a part of the cargo. Hence a captain's effects and goods lashed on deck were not covered. Apparently (though not quite certainly) the objection that the goods lashed on deck were not covered by the description "goods" rested on the fact that they were on deck and so not part of the cargo, which normally would be under deck, and not on the fact that they were not merchandise, but were the master's own effects: (Ross v. Thwaite, 1 Park, 23). In 1802 the opinion was clearly expressed that goods on deck were not within the description of goods in the policy: (Backhouse v. Ripley, 1 Park 24). Lord Ellenborough held in 1815, that underwriters were bound to take notice of a usage to carry carboys of vitriol on deck "without any communication," and so a policy on carboys of vitriol covered them on deck: (Da Costa v. Edmunds, 4 Camp. 142). In the general usage of the carrying trade, goods were only properly stowed when stowed under deck, but when, by a particular usage of a particular trade, or referring to particular goods, they were properly stowed though stowed on deck, the underwriter must be taken to know it as part of his business equipment, and to contract to insure goods in that trade or of that description with reference to the usage. Subsequent authorities develop this view. Evidence of a usage of underwriters not to pay for boats when slung on the quarter, though the policy was on "ship, boat and other furniture," was held inadmissible as contradicting the express language of the policy: (Blackett v. Royal Exchange Assurance, 2 C. & J. 249), and Ross v. Thwaite was explained by Lord Lyndhurst, C.B. upon the view that by an implied term of the policy the underwriter is liable for goods insured only when so carried as to be exposed to ordinary and not to extraordinary and uncommunicated perils. Hence "an usage that they are not covered by an ordinary policy upon goods, but that they require a distinct explanation to the underwriter of the part of the ship in which they are to be carried or (where that will imply the same information) of the nature of the goods, is not at variance with any part of the policy." In commenting on this case in Myers v. Sarl (30 L. J. Ex., at p. 13), Cockburn, C.J. says that it goes to the verge of permissible exclusion of evidence, and that Ross v. Thwaite and Backhouse v. Ripley, cases which had never been questioned, showed that by usage the general terms in the policy had received a limited signification. In the same case Blackburn, J. considered that Lord Lyndhurst meant that, taking the language of the whole contract, it evinced upon the face of it an intention not to use the phrase in question in the particular sense sought to be put on it. In substance this was the view adopted in Miller v. Titherington (30 L. J. Ex. 217), briefly affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber, 31 L. J., Ex. 363, where on demurrer a plea of a custom of Liverpool underwriters not to pay for general average on timber jettisoned from deck was sustained on a declaration on a Liverpool policy upon ship. It was pleaded as a custom in the North Atlantic timber trade that underwriters were not liable under such circumstances, as both assured and underwriter well knew when they entered into the contract, and Martin, B. assigns as the reason for his decision that Blackett's case is really an illustration of the rule first recorded in Ross v. Thwaite, and that in such cases words are used in particular trades in a particular sense, which the parties may prove by evidence.

As far as I know, questions relating to insurance on deck cargo in actions on a policy for loss of the cargo by perils insured against did not come up for any considerable amount of further discussion in this country till 1903, the propositions laid down in the 2nd edit. of Arnould on Insurance (p. 263) being generally accepted, namely, "goods carried on deck, as they are exposed to a greater hazard than goods carried in the ordinary way, are not covered by a general insurance in the common form of goods and merchandise; if, indeed, they are so carried by virtue of any general and well-known custom of the particular course of trade, on which the insurance is effected, the underwriter is presumed to be acquainted with such usage without having notice, and therefore may fairly be supposed to undertake the risk of their being so carried on deck." In 1903 Walton, J. reviewed the subject in a remarkable judgment (Apollinaris Company v. Nord Deutsche Insurance Company, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 526; 89 L. T. Rep. 670; (1904) 1 K. B. 252) and stated these conclusions: "When from the description of the goods or the voyage, or both, it is apparent that in accordance with a well-known practice or usage of trade the goods will or even probably may be carried on deck, then even in the case of voyages by sea, when goods so carried are necessarily exposed to peculiar dangers, still the underwriters will be deemed to have consented to take this risk and will be liable for any loss of deck cargo by perils insured against" (at p. 528, Asp.; p. 258 of L. Rep.). . . "The rule against carrying goods on deck is usually involved in and depends on a larger and wider rule, which is that goods carried on a vessel should not be stowed so as to be exposed to unnecessary and extraordinary peril during transit."

The result would appear to be as follows:— (1) In the absence of proof of a special meaning attaching to the word used, and of contracting with reference to that meaning, anything coming under the description of the subject-matter of insurance which is expressed in the policy is covered; but (2) there is an implied exception from the liability of the underwriter, that he does not cover losses where they are caused by exposure of the subject-matter by those in charge of the adventure to extraordinary perils, of which the risk of deck carriage is one. (3) If the underwriter knows by the special description employed or otherwise, or if he is deemed to know it without notification because of the existence of a usage in the carrying trade to which the insurance refers that the goods may be carried on deck, his contract is taken to assent to that mode of stowage, and then either he agrees to cover such extraordinary perils or they cease to be extraordinary and so are covered. The important thing to notice is that the usage in question is a usage of the carrying trade to do a certain thing, and is not a usage of the business of insurance to attach a special meaning to a particular term, or to recognise a special liability in certain circumstances though only general terms are used. Such, I think, was the law before it was codified by the Act of 1906, and such, in my opinion, it remains. The particular wording of art. 17 obviously is not that which would have been adopted if totally new legislation was being framed. It takes its colour from the decisions, and reference to those decisions shows how the article came to be framed as it was. I think that it makes no change in the law.

The fact which I am not able to find established in the evidence as the Court of Appeal found it is the existence of a custom of underwriters to insure wool on deck during this transit under general terms not specifying that it may be stowed on deck. There was no evidence of actual knowledge that wool was ever carried on deck so far as the defendants were concerned, and their underwriter denied it. There was none of general knowledge of the practice and there was evidence to the contrary. True the cover was many years old and had been annually renewed, but no claims were proved to have been made and paid on the footing of the wool being carried on deck. A man may know that in some instances his cargo is being put on deck without this being evidence against him of a usage to carry on deck, for he may be relying on his right to claim damages for improper stowage if any harm is done. So these underwriters may have renewed the cover annually, relying on their not being on the risk except for under-deck cargo. If so, the renewal of the insurance does not show that they used general terms to cover the cargo whether on deck or not. To make them liable there must be proved, in fact, a usage to carry on deck, which they are deemed to know, and then a liability arises in such circumstances in respect of deck cargo, though unspecified.

There remains an argument based on the reading of sect. 78 (4) of the Act which is very novel. It is one of the disadvantages of codification that new terms used or even unfamiliar sequences of propositions suggest that the law has been changed where those familiar with the old decisions would not have suspected it. The argument affords a striking instance of this. The section obviously refers to suing and labouring. It cannot possibly be read as meaning that if the agents of the assured are not reasonably careful throughout the transit he cannot recover for anything to which their want of care contributes. The point, therefore, fails.

I think the appeal should be dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, Nov. 29, 1920.

(Before BANKES, ATKIN, and YOUNGER. L.JJ.)

THE KRONPRINZ OLAV. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Limitation of liability—Fund—Claims by cargo owners and others—No claim by owners of the damaged ship — Proceedings pending abroad—Unliquidated claims—Rights of plaintiffs against limitation fund—Time for bringing in claims—Discretion—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503, 504.

Early in 1917, after a collision between two Norwegian vessels, the C. and K., the C. sank. In March 1917, the owners of the C.'s cargo began an action against the owners of the K. in the Admiralty Court. In May 1919 both vessels were pronounced to blame, and it was adjudged that the plaintiffs should recover half of the amount of their damage from the defendants. Thereupon the owners of the K. commenced a limitation action against the owners of the C., the owners of her cargo, and all persons claiming to have received damage by reason of the collision; and in Feb. 1920 a decree was pronounced limiting the liability of the owners of the K. to 8*l. per ton on the registered tonnage of the* K., calculated in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894; and it was ordered that all claims be brought in within three months and that claims not so brought in would be excluded from sharing in the limitation fund.

Claims were filed by the owners of the C.'s cargo. The owners of the C. entered an appearance, but took no further steps in the limitation proceedings. In Feb. 1919 the owners of the C. had commenced an action in Norway against the owners of the K., and in June 1920, when the registrar made his report, the trial of the Norwegian action was still pending. The owners of the K. subsequently took out a summons asking that the report be not confirmed, and that they might have leave to file a claim against the fund in respect of any liability they might incur under the Norwegian proceedings. Hill, J. dismissed the summons.

Before their appeal was heard the Norwegian court had pronounced the K. two-thirds to blame, but had not assessed the damages.

Held by Bankes and Atkin, L.JJ. (Younger, L.J. concurring on different grounds) (1) that the plaintiffs were not entitled under the limitation sections of the Merchant Shipping Act to have the distribution of the fund stayed; (2) that limitation proceedings do not contemplate claims by plaintiffs, and that the owners of the K. could not file a claim against the fund in their own right; (3) (Atkin, L.J. doubting) that if an application had been made in proper form the court would have had a discretion to extend the time before distributing the fund, in order to allow the plaintiffs to ascertain their liability under the pending Norwegian judgment and to apply to the court to adjust the distribution of the fund so that the plaintiffs might obtain credit for the amount to be paid under the Norwegian judgment; (4) but that, having regard to the lapse of time since the collision, the court had rightly exercised its discretion in refusing to postpone the distribution of the fund.

Decision of Hill, J. affirmed.

APPEAL from a decision of Hill, J., who dismissed the plaintiffs' application that the registrar's report in an action of limitation be not confirmed, and that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to file a claim.

The following statement of the facts is in substance taken from the judgment of the learned judge given on the 29th July 1920. On the 2nd Feb. 1917 a collision occurred between the Norwegian steamships Kronprinz Olav and Cuba. The Cuba sank with her cargo. On the 3rd March 1917 the owners of the cargo laden on board the Cuba began an action in rem in this court against the owners of the Kronprinz Olav. On the 13th May 1919 a decree of both to blame was pronounced in that action, and the owners of the Kronprinz Olav were accordingly condemned in a moiety of the cargo owners' damages. The owners of the Kronprinz Olav thereupon brought a suit of limitation of liability in accordance with the provisions of sects. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 against the owners of the Cuba, the owners of her cargo, and all persons claiming to have suffered damage by reason of the collision. On the 2nd Feb. 1920 a limitation decree was pronounced by this court, and that decree contained the usual provisions as to bringing in claims within a certain time (three months) and as to excluding claims not brought in. Claims were filed by the owners of the cargo on board the Cuba and by the master and the crew of the Cuba in respect of their lost effects. A reference was held in pursuance of the limitation decree, and on the 29th June 1920 the registrar made his report. He found the amount due to the claimants who had filed claims to be in the aggregate 23,725*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* The amount of the limited liability of the owners of the Kronprinz Olav was 9385*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.* That amount has been duly paid into court under the limitation decree. The owners of the Cuba did not file any claim in the proceedings under the limitation decree. They entered an appearance, but they did nothing further.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides by

Sect. 503: The owners of a ship, British or foreign, shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity; that is to say . . . (d) where any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other vessel, by reason of the improper navigation of the ship, be liable to damages beyond the following amounts, that is to say . . .(ii) in respect of loss of, or damage to, vessels, goods, merchandise . . . an aggregate amount not exceedings eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

Sect. 504: Where any liability is alleged to have been incurred by the owner of a British or foreign ship in respect of . . . loss of or damage to vessels or goods, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of that liability, then, the owner may apply in England and Ireland to the High Court . . . and that court may determine the amount of the owner's liability and may distribute that amount rateably among the several claimants, and may stay any proceedings pending in any other court in relation to the same matter, and may proceed in such a manner and subject to such regulations as to making persons interested parties to the proceedings, and as to the exclusion of any claimants who do not come in within a certain time, and as to requiring security from the owner, and as to payment of any costs, as the court thinks just.

His Lordship proceeded as follows: "I was told that the owners of the Cuba are suing the owners of the Kronprinz Olav in Norway, and that a decision is expected some time in the autumn." [That action was commenced on the 17th Feb. 1919, and judgment was given on the 30th Sept. 1920, condemning the owners of the Kronprinz Olav in two-thirds of the damages of the owners of the Cuba.] "In these circumstances the owners of the Kronprinz Olav apply by the present summons for an order that the report be not confirmed, and that they, the owners of the Kronprinz Olav, be at liberty to file a claim. They fear that as the result of the proceedings in Norway, they may become liable in damages to the owners of the Cuba, and if they have to pay the owners of the Cuba in Norway they desire to stand in their shoes and prove against the limitation fund in respect of any moneys so paid. The claimants, in whose favour the registrar has reported, object, and assert that they are the only claimants before the court, that the time limited for bringing in cliams has expired, that the owners of the Cuba have brought in no claim, and that the owners of the Kronprinz Olav are not in a position to bring in any claim.

I think the objections of these claimants are sound. No doubt if the owners of the Kronprinz Olav had discharged a liability arising out of the collision to the owners of the Cuba, they would in the limitation proceedings be entitled to stand in the shoes of the owners of the Cuba and prove against the fund as being subrogated to the rights of the owners of the Cuba: (see The Crathie, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256; 76 L. T. Rep. 534; (1897) P. 178). But they have not paid anything and are not yet found liable to pay anything. They have no claim against the fund. They have filed no claim within the time limited, and they are to-day not in a position to file any claim or to say with any certainty that they will ever have a claim which could be filed at any time. In these circumstances it would in my judgment be wrong to postpone the right, which the claimants who have proved have already acquired, to have the fund distributed in satisfaction of their claims. I dismiss the summons with costs."

C. R. Dunlop, K.C. and J. B. Aspinall for the appellants. — Under sects. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the appellants are not liable under English law, beyond 8*l.* a ton, i.e., 9385*l.* for damages arising out of the collision. If they are adjudged to pay and do pay under Norwegian law some 16,000*l.* to the owners of the Cuba, they ought to be allowed to stand in the shoes of the owners of the Cuba and claim against the limitation fund in respect of that payment. The owners of the Cuba have made no claim against the limitation fund, although they entered an appearance in the limitation action. That is immaterial, and the appellants are entitled to credit for any sums to be paid to the owners of the Cuba:

The Crathie, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256; 76 L. T. Rep. 534; (1897) P. 178; Rankine v. Raschen, (1877) 14 Sc. L. Rep. 725; 4 Rep. 725.

The plaintiffs should be allowed to put in a claim against the limitation fund in respect of their liability to the owners of the Cuba, and the distribution of that fund should be postponed. The time for sending in claims may be extended:

The Zoe, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 583; 54 L. T. Rep. 879; 11 Prob. Div. 72.

If the appellants are not entitled as of right to that extension the court should in the circumstances of the present case exercise its discretion in their favour.

G. P. Langton for the respondents, the claimants against the limitation fund.—The plaintiff's claim is merely contingent; its amount is not at present ascertained, and there are no materials before the court for ascertaining it, and the court has never so far allowed such a claim. In the cases cited the amounts claimed by the plaintiffs in the limitation proceedings were in respect of moneys already paid to persons who had not taken part in the limitation proceedings; here no such payment has been made. The plaintiffs are at fault for their delay; they have long been aware of the action pending against them in Norway, and they took no steps to safeguard themselves in the limitation proceedings from the effects of an adverse judgment in Norway. The claimants should not be required to wait any longer for the distribution of the limitation fund.

Dunlop, K.C. in reply.

Bankes, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Hill, J., and, as put by Mr. Dunlop for the plaintiffs, raises an important question. Mr. Dunlop's claim in substance was that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs had a right to an order from the court staying the distribution of the fund paid into court in the limitation proceedings until they had had the opportunity of bringing before the court a claim on their own behalf founded upon the amount which they had been held in a Norwegian court liable to pay to the owners of the Cuba.

Upon those facts the main contention is that the plaintiffs have a right to have the distribution of the fund stayed and a right to bring forward their claim, whenever it is ascertained, to rank as a claim which must be allowed. The foundation of Mr. Dunlop's argument is that under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the plaintiffs have a statutory right to have the amount of the damages which are payable by them under the decision of the Admiralty Court, limited. There are two observations which it seems to me it is necessary to make in reference to that contention. First, the statute can only affect claims of persons who are affected by the statute, it can have no effect upon a claim by a foreigner in a foreign country, and, therefore, it is not true to say that the statute gives the owner of a vessel any absolute right to limit the amount of his liability; the right is qualified by the fact that it has reference only to the claims of persons who are affected by the statute. Secondly, it appears to me on reading sect. 504 that the claimants there referred to are clearly persons other than the person who is seeking to limit his liability, and that when the application was made to the court below and to this court that the plaintiffs, the owners of the Kronprinz Olav, might bring in a claim, their application was wrong in form; the proper form would be an application that they might have the benefit of the statute by being allowed credit, as against the fund, for any amount that they may have to pay in respect of the Norwegian judgment. That is more a matter of form than a matter of substance, but as a matter of form I think that the plaintiffs are wrong in suggesting that they have any claim in their own right which they can bring forward as against the fund.

The decree which was made followed the language of the section, and it not only limited the liability to a certain amount, but it ordered that advertisements should be issued intimating to "all persons having any claim in respect of loss or damage caused as aforesaid that if they do not come in and enter their claims on or before the 3rd day of May 1920. they will be excluded from sharing in the aforesaid amount." The court clearly was competent to make such an order, and if a claimant did not come in and make a claim by that date he was in mercy, and it would be in the discretion of the court as to whether he should be allowed to make his claim in spite of the fact that the time had expired. There is no doubt whatever that the court had jurisdiction to extend the time, and, in my opinion, it ought always, in a proper case, to extend the time if it is shown that for some good reason the claimant was not in a position to make the claim within the time specified. I think the fact that the court has jurisdiction to extend the time is quite plainly established by decided cases: See, for example, The Zoe (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 583; 1886, 54 L. T. Rep. 879; 11 Prob. Div. 72). I am of opinion, therefore, that assuming the plaintiffs had made their application to the learned judge in the proper form and had asked him for an extension of time, it would have been within his jurisdiction to grant the application, not because the plaintiffs had an absolute right to an order as a matter of course, but because the court would, in my opinion, have had jurisdiction to allow the plaintiffs to put forward a claim in proper form, although the owners of the Cuba had not themselves put forward any claim in time or at all, and although possibly some considerable time may have elapsed since the date fixed for bringing in claims.

Some question may arise as to whether there is any difference between the case in which the shipowner who has successfully established his right to limit his liability is called upon to meet a claim by a claimant resident abroad and has either established, or is seeking to establish, his right abroad. I do not think it is necessary to decide that question on this particular appeal, but, speaking for myself, I think that it is difficult to see why any distinction should be drawn between the two cases if the object of the court is to give to the applicant the relief which as between himself and the claimants to the fund, the statute seems to me to contemplate that he should have.

I do not think it is necessary to decide that point definitely on this particular appeal, because Mr. Langton for the defendants has satisfied me that, having regard to the dates, the order of the learned judge was in substance right.

This collision took place as long ago as Feb. 1917. The plaintiffs have known of these proceedings in Norway ever since Feb. 1919. The decree in the limitation action was not made till Feb. 1920, and the plaintiffs were apparently content, as is stated in their affidavit, to take their chance of the proceedings in Norway turning out in their favour. They did not at the time at which the decree of limitation was made, or at any subsequent stage until after the report of the registrar, attempt to bring forward or indicate that there was this contingent liability in respect of claims which the owners of the Cuba might establish in Norway. The plaintiffs allowed time to run on and did nothing until this very late stage in July 1920, when the application was made to the judge to further hang up these proceedings. I am satisfied that although it was the intention and the object of the statute to protect an owner by allowing him to limit his liability in the manner indicated by the statute, it was also the intention that within some definite time, to be fixed by the court at the time of the decree, those persons who would be entitled to any distribution of the fund in court should have the amounts paid out. It seems to me that quite sufficient time has elapsed, and that it does not lie in the mouths of these plaintiffs, who have done nothing for so long and have been content to trust to the Norwegian decision being in their favour, to come at this last stage and to endeavour to hang up these proceedings for a further indefinite time; for, even now, the amount of the damages is not ascertained and there is no indication as to when it is likely to be ascertained.

For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the learned judge's order was in substance right, and that the distribution of this fund ought not any longer to be delayed. It is a matter entirely in the discretion of the court whether the distribution shall be further postponed, and in my opinion the right view is that the time has come when the fund should be distributed. Under these circumstances it does not seem to me necessary to discuss either of the two decisions to which we have been referred, The Craithie (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256; 76 L. T. Rep. 534; (1897) P. 178) and Rankine v. Raschen (1877, 4 Rep. 725; 14 Sc. L. Rep. 476), because the facts in those cases were so different. In both cases a sum of money had in fact been paid to claimants, and they were, I think, bound by the provisions of the statute. I do not think it is possible to extract from either of those decisions any real assistance in reference to the proposition which has been propounded by Mr. Dunlop for the plaintiffs.

In my opinion the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Atkin, L.J.—This application arises out of a collision which took place in 1917 between two Norwegian-owned vessels, the Kronprinz Olav and the Cuba, in which the Kronprinz Olav sank the Cuba. Neither of those parties, being Norwegians, are subject to the operation of English statutes, but by sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, it is provided that "where any liability is alleged to have been incurred by the owner of a British or foreign ship in respect of loss of life, personal injury, or loss of or damage to vessels or goods . . . the owner may apply" for a limitation of proceedings. What the exact restriction is upon the rights of the owner of a foreign ship in that respect, if any, it is unnecessary to say, but certainly those are very large rights given to foreign owners. The owners of the Kronprinz Olav commenced proceedings in the Admiralty Court with a view of having their liability limited. They did not do so until the owners of the cargo on the Cuba had commenced the ordinary Admiralty proceedings against the owners of the Kronprinz Olav, and an award had been made in favour of the plaintiffs in that action. Thereupon the owners of the Kronprinz Olav commenced their proceedings for limitation of liability against the owners of the Cuba, the owners of the cargo, and all other persons who were said to have sustained damage. Those proceedings were commenced in 1919, and on the 2nd Feb. 1920 a decree was made in the ordinary form.

[The Lord Justice read the decree and proceeded:]

The registrar and merchants proceeded to deal with the claims that were brought in, and duly made their report on the 29th June last. Upon that report, if the parties accepted it, in accordance with ordinary practice, I think the amounts would be paid out; there would be no express motion to confirm the report, but an application might be made to confirm it or an application might be made complaining of it, and in this particular case on the 7th July the plaintiffs in the action took out this summons "that the registrar's report be not confirmed and the plaintiffs be at liberty to file a claim." It appears to me that this was an unfounded application. What the plaintiffs had in their minds was, that ever since the beginning of 1919 the owners of the Cuba had been taking proceedings in personam against them in the Norwegian courts for damages in respect of the loss of the Cuba, and the owners of the Cuba had not brought in any claim before the registrar and the merchants. They preferred to rely upon their own courts in respect of that liability which they were entitled to enforce in Norway, as they clearly were not subject in their own courts to the restrictions imposed upon them by the English statutes, and those proceedings were still pending at the time that this summons was taken out. What the plaintiffs desired was that they should have the benefit of any claim made in the Norwegian action which they might have to settle, so that the distribution of the proceeds in the Admiralty Court might be made upon the footing that the owners of the Cuba had made a claim which in fact they had not made, and that the plaintiffs should have credit, in the proceedings here against the total sum paid into court, in respect of the claim made by the owners of the Cuba.

To my mind it is entirely wrong to say that proceedings in limitation actions contemplate any claim by plaintiffs. The contention seems to me to be a contradiction in terms; the claims are claims against the plaintiffs, claims to enforce liability against the plaintiffs; the claims can only be paid out of the fund; and, therefore, for the plaintiffs to apply to be allowed to file a claim, is an application for something to which it seems to me they were not in the least entitled. Nevertheless, it may be that they were entitled to make an application on the ground that the fund in court ought not to be distributed except upon the footing that certain claims not in this country had been made; and the question is whether that application ought to be acceded to, made in that form in this particular case. It is plain I think that the distribution of the fund in court is not dependent upon the claims that are brought in and assessed before the registrar and merchants, because it may be that a claim has already been settled by the plaintiff, and, if so, it is his duty to bring that fact before the court in order that the sum which has already been paid should be taken into account in relief of his liability to which, on the hypothesis that his liability is limited to 8*l.* per ton on the registered tonnage of his vessel, he is entitled. I say the distribution is not on the claims as brought in before the registrar, because when the court is informed that the plaintiff has paid such a claim as that, unless all parties accept it the registrar and merchants have to ascertain what was the true amount of that claim if it had been brought in; otherwise a serious injustice might be done to the other parties by the claim being taken into account on a larger footing than in fact it deserved, and therefore it may involve an investigation by the registrar and merchants.

I know of no case where the registrar and merchants, or the court, in dealing with something which is not the subject matter of a claim brought in before the registrar and merchants have dealt with it except upon the footing that payment has actually been made by the plaintiffs. The suggestion here is that the court has a further power to consider not only a claim in fact made within the jurisdiction and settled, but a contingent claim that is being made or may be made abroad, in respect of a party who is not subject to the restrictions of the particular section of the Merchant Shipping Act. I have been in very considerable doubt whether such a claim can be considered at all, because the benefit that is given under this statute is given, I think, to persons who come within the jurisdiction of the statute; it is a restriction upon the rights of persons, who, on this hypothesis, have got a claim larger than in fact they are going to be paid, and that restriction does not apply at all in the case of foreigners who are in a position to make their claim outside the jurisdiction. I see nothing to compel them, at any rate, to come here and make their claims, and if there is nothing to compel them to make their claims here I find it very difficult to conceive that the court can order the fund to be adjusted upon the footing that such a claim was made. I do not propose to determine that matter, however, as I think it is unnecessary.

One of the features, and a necessary feature, of the procedure under the Act is that there is a period of time to be fixed by the court within which claims must be brought, otherwise they are excluded. I agree that in special circumstances there may be grounds for extending that time, but the object is plain enough. It is to enable the amounts that are to be paid out of the fund in court to be ascertained, because the portion which each claimant will be entitled to receive out of the fund in court depends upon the precise assessment to a shilling of all the other claims which have to be brought into account, and it is obvious that if claims are left outstanding there will be a delay in ascertaining how much each person can receive. It would be a very hard position if, in spite of the decree made in accordance with the Act fixing a period of time after which claims are excluded, the registrar and merchants, for the purpose of assisting the court to determine how much money is to be paid out, are to take into account contingent claims which in fact have not been made at all, but which may yet be made because of a right in the future. In this case a claim was made in Norway within two years of the collision, but supposing the limitation suit had been commenced, as might very well have happened, within a month or two of the collision. The suggestion that the court must wait until a person who has a foreign claim has first of all delayed until the extreme period of limitation, whatever it may be—it may be two years under the Maritime Conventions Act—before he makes his claim at all, and then that the court must wait until that claim has been assessed in the foreign court, has been further revised by the registrar and merchants in order to see that it is fair and that it does justice to the other claimants, makes it fairly obvious what the inconvenience and real injustice to the other claimants of such a procedure would be. To my mind the circumstances in this case would do the same injustice, though not to the exaggerated extent that I have suggested as possible. The claim was in 1917; no proceedings were taken promptly; the cargo-owners did not get their decree until 1919; then the limitation of liability proceedings were commenced. During the whole of that time the present plaintiffs were aware of this claim, for proceedings were commenced in Norway in Feb. 1919. During the whole of that time they refrained from referring to the claim in their statement of claim: they did not get the decree moulded with reference to the claim; and they made no application that it should come before the registrar and merchants. They waited until after the report of the registrar and merchants; and indeed they waited, as appears from their affidavit, because they were of opinion that the claim in the Norwegian Court was not likely to be successful. After the whole of that delay they then proceed to make an application which in my view, as I have said, is quite unfounded, that they should be at liberty to file a claim themselves. I am not quite sure that one is doing the application full justice in saying that before the learned judge they limited their claim in that way. I think it is possible they may have applied to the learned judge to exercise his discretion in their favour, by ordering that a payment out should be made to them on the footing that the claim had been made by the owners of the Cuba. If they did not, then they are in the further dilemma that they have failed to ask any court to exercise a discretion in their favour until they come to this court, a still further delay. To my mind it clearly was the intention of the Legislature that these claims should be brought in reasonably promptly so as to enable a distribution to be made of the sum which the claimants are at any rate entitled to have, and I think it would be a very bad precedent to allow plaintiffs to delay, and delay for a very considerable period as in this case, and then at the last moment to come in and hold up a distribution of the fund for many months. If this application were granted, the decree in the Norwegian Court even now does not fix the true amount of the claim of the owners of the Cuba, and even when that has been ascertained in Norway it does not bind the other claimants, who might still desire to have it referred to the registrar and merchants to determine the true amount of the collision damage done in 1917.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that it would be quite wrong for us to exercise our discretion, if we have it, to allow this application, and I agree that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Younger, L.J.—One cannot, I think, read sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act without seeing that one purpose of the Legislature, which by that section limited a shipowner's liability in respect of certain cases of loss of life, injury or damage, was to make that limitation as absolute, as effective, and as complete as it could be made. The privilege is extended to a foreign owner as well as to a British owner, I presume, because the Legislature saw in the exemption granted to a foreign owner the application of some high maritime policy which it was desirable for this country to give effect to; and when one looks at sect. 504, which gives to the owner who is liable the right to have the limitation of the liability made effective, it appears to me that on the construction of that section, which is expressed in the widest terms as regards the power of the court, it is the duty of the court to do its best to make that limitation of liability as complete as the Legislature intended that it should be. Of course, the British Legislature had no authority, by any statute that it may enact, over claimants out of its jurisdiction, and unless they come within the jurisdiction it matters not for this purpose whether those claimants are foreigners out of the jurisdiction or are British subjects; but, nevertheless, although the statute cannot by its terms restrict the activities of these persons exercised beyond the jurisdiction of the statute, if it is the purpose of the statute to limit the liability as effectively as possible, it will be, as I read these sections, the duty of the court, when it can, to make the statute effective over such persons as I have above described. Very similar principles to those which I think apply here are frequently applied in debenture holders' actions in the Chancery Division, where claims in respect of the property to which the debenture-holders are entitled, but which may be situate outside the jurisdiction, are made by persons over whom the court here has no jurisdiction, and while the court recognises that it has no jurisdiction over such persons and perforce has to accept that position, it nevertheless uses any power it has to limit that disadvantage by taking steps to see that if and when those persons come within the jurisdiction they may be made to do such justice in the matter as the court sees ought to be done. An excellent example both of the court's limitations and of its functions in such matters is to be found in Re Maudslay, Sons and Field (82 L. T. Rep. 378; (1900) 1 Ch. 602).

In this case, the Norwegian owners of the Cuba have not come into, and there is no power to compel them to come into, those proceedings; but their claim against the owners of the Kronprinz Olav is one which, so far as it is a valid claim, would have been a claim to be brought in under the limitation proceedings and dealt with there, if it had been filed in due time. In respect of that claim not brought in, the plaintiffs in the limitation proceedings, as it appears to me, are powerless. They had to submit to any decree against them which the Norwegian court may make and enforce, and they must do the best they can with that decree. To my mind they have not, and never will have, in respect of that outstanding liability, any claim which, as plaintiffs, in the limitation proceedings, they can bring in those proceedings. The only right or claim that they ever could bring in these proceedings, as it seems to me, would be this: Having paid to the Norwegian owners a claim which might have been brought in the limitation proceedings here by these owners, the plaintiffs would be entitled, or might be entitled, standing in the shoes of those owners whom they had paid, to make in the limitation proceedings the claim which the owners themselves might have made. But until they have paid something to the owners of the Cuba, and until they have got something which amounts to an assignment of the rights of the owners of the Cuba as against the fund here, it appears to me that the plaintiffs are not in a position to come forward and by the strength of their own right arm make any claim at all against the fund in the English proceedings. I think the observations of the learned judge in deciding this case are absolutely correct.

[The Lord Justice read the observations of Hill, J. set out above, and proceeded:]

In my judgment, all the observations of the learned judge which I have read, apart from the conclusion which I will refer to in a moment, were well founded, and if there were no more in the case as it is now presented to us by Mr. Dunlop for the plaintiffs I should, speaking for myself, say that the learned judge's decision was beyond criticism and that it must stand. But Mr. Dunlop has put forward a second line of argument, and as I read the learned judge's judgment he has not dealt with that at all, and probably it was not before him. I desire now to deal with that part of the case, and then to explain why I think that none the less this appeal must be dismissed.

The case that is now made is based on these principles: sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act, it is said, gives to the court the fullest possible discretion with regard to the time which is to be fixed for the bringing in of claims, and in exercising that discretion it is the duty of the court, remembering the main purposes of ss. 503 and 504, to hold the balance equally between the parties to the limitation proceedings, to see on the one hand that the plaintiffs are not vexed beyond the stated liability that is prescribed by the statute, and on the other hand that in the exercise of its power to protect the plaintiff beyond the amount which the statute fixes as his liability the court is not delaying unduly the satisfaction of the claims which, to the extent to which the fund in court will suffice to meet them, have to be satisfied out of that fund. Those are the two rights which the court has to respect as best it can, and to my mind it has a duty to adjust both of them. The provision with regard to the date which is fixed by the order of the court, and which under sect. 503 has to be fixed, is a class of provision which occurs in many other statutes besides the Merchant Shipping Act, and on a matter in pari materis it occurs among other places in sect. 169 of the Companies' Consolidation Act 1908, where the section is to this effect: "The court may fix a time or times within which creditors are to prove their debts or claims, or to be excluded from the benefit of any distribution made before those debts are proved." It has always been the rule that a claim may, notwithstanding that section, be brought in after the time has been fixed, the only disability on the person delaying being that his subsequent claim is not to disturb prior dividends; but with regard to any fund available for distribution he is entitled to his share of it, even to the extent of excluding the other creditors until he has received the same satisfaction as they and notwithstanding that his claim is made late. I apprehend that may well be the position under this statute if the court, before a fund is distributed, is made aware that there is a claim which is not yet brought forward and which will affect the final distribution.

The court, in those circumstances, ought and would consider that. Now what is the position with regard to the plaintiffs here in that aspect of the case? The plaintiffs in England have been sued in Norway and a judgment has been given against them in the Norwegian Court for a sum which is not yet ascertained. There has been an inquiry there to ascertain the precise amount of that liability, and a sum is named which will represent its maximum amount. The plaintiffs might, therefore, in the proceedings here put forward their case from this point of view. They might say: We have not paid anything, so we are not entitled to claim as claimants, but we ask to be allowed to rank against this fund to-day, because the persons to whom we are under liability in Norway have not claimed; we have not paid and we cannot claim on their account, but, nevertheless, there is a judgment against us in Norway which, in the course of some period of time which we are not able now to specify, will materialise in a claim against us for a Norwegian sum representing x pounds, and we ask the court, therefore, so to mould or modify the order which has been already made, that, without disturbing the distribution that may be made among the other claimants as regards the balance, there shall be set aside in court the sum for which we apprehend we shall be liable; if it turns out that we are liable for that sum then we ought to get that in respect of the Norwegian claim; if, on the other hand, it turns out that we are not liable for that sum then that amount will be distributed among the other claimants, and any costs put upon them by reason of the delay will be compensated by interest which we will pay. That is the proposal made by Mr. Dunlop, and the question is whether, if the learned judge's attention had been called to the case in that way, he ought in the exercise of his discretion to have acceded to that argument. I am not so satisfied as my learned brothers are, that the plaintiffs, in making that claim now, are too late. It does not appear to me that anything that has happened in Norway, so far as they are concerned, has delayed the application here. It is not suggested that the proceedings in Norway, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned, have not been carried on as expeditiously as possible. But, nevertheless, I am much impressed by the circumstances to which my learned brothers have drawn attention, and that is the great length of time which has taken place since this collision and the fact that these claimants are still without their money, even limited as it is to the amount paid into court; and I think, taking all the circumstances into consideration, there has just been that passage of time which, holding the balance equally between the plaintiffs and the claimants, requires the court now to say that the time has come when the claimants ought to get their money.

Accordingly, although my reasons are different from the reasons stated by the other members of the court, the conclusion I come to is the same, and I concur in thinking that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

(Before Lord STERNDALE, M.R., WARRINGTON and SCRUTTON, L.JJ.)

THE KARAMEA. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Navigation of entrance to Montevideo Harbour — Rounding the whistling buoy — "Keeping course and speed"—Whistle signals —Apportionment of blame—Discretion of Court of Appeal to review apportionment—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 19, 21, 25, 27 and 28—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57) s. 1.

When the judge of the Admiralty Court has apportioned blame under sect. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), and the Court of Appeal agree with him on the facts and in his conclusions as to the actions of the ships, they will not lightly interfere with his apportionment, though they have power to do so. But if the court differs from the judge in these respects the court will review his decision as to the proportions of blame.

The K., when outward bound from Montevideo, sighted the green light of the H., on her port bow when the K. was nearing the whistling buoy at the entrance to the harbour. The vessels were on crossing courses. When the K. had the buoy abeam on her starboard she starboarded to make the turn for the sea, the turn being usually made at the buoy. The H., when first sighting the K. at a distance of two miles, ported slightly but did not blow her helm signal, although she was altering not only for the buoy but also in order to manœuvre for the K., nor did she at once open her red light. After the K. starboarded, the H. hard-a-ported to avoid a collision, but did not reverse her engines, and a collision occurred.

Hill, J. held that the K. was three-fourths and the H. one-fourth to blame. Both vessels appealed.

Held, that under art. 21 of the Regulation for Preventing Collisions at Sea it was the duty of the K. to keep her course and speed; and there were no special circumstances to relieve the K. from obeying the rule; and that under art. 19 it was the duty of the H. to keep out of the way of the K. The H. was to blame not only for failing to reverse her engines, but also for not blowing her whistle when she originally ported, as it might have been heard by those on the K., and have acted as a warning to them not to starboard. Art. 28 requires a vessel to sound helm signals when in sight of another vessel; she is only relieved from this obligation under the article when the other vessel is so far distant that she cannot be affected by the manœuvres which the signal indicates. The H. and the K. held to blame in equal degrees.

Judgment of Hill, J. (infrà) (1920) P. 314) varied.

APPEAL and cross-appeal from a decision of Hill, J. in a collision action.

The plaintiffs (appellants on the cross-appeal) were the owners of the Norwegian steamship Haugland. The defendants (the appellants) were the owners of the British steamship Karamea.

The facts found by Hill, J. in the court below were as follows:

The collision happened shortly after 10 p.m. on the 12th Feb. 1919 to the southward and eastward of the whistling buoy which lies off the entrance channel to Montevideo. It was a fine clear night. The Haugland, a steamship of 3194 tons and 324 feet long, in ballast, was inward, and the Karamea, a steamship of 5627 tons and 420 feet long, laden, outward bound. The ships were in collision, the port side amidships of the Haugland with the stem of the Karamea. When they first sighted one another the speed of the Haugland was about eight and three-quarter knots, that of the Karamea rather less. The latter's engines were at full speed, but she was of deeper draught and passing through mud.

At the time of the collision the Haugland was under hard-a-port helm, with engines at full speed ahead; and the Karamea was under hard-a-starboard helm, with engines at full speed astern. Before this, according to the Haugland, the ships had been brought red to red, and, according to the Karamea, green to green.

The Haugland's case was that she, on a W. ½ N. course, saw the masthead light, and with glasses the red light, of the Karamea to the northward of the whistling buoy three to four points on the starboard bow at a distance of two to two and a half miles. She ported three and a half points to a course of N.W., and brought the buoy nearly ahead and the Karamea a little on the starboard bow. The Karamea, still showing her red light, crossed the bows of the Haugland from starboard to port at a distance of three-quarters of a mile to a mile, and brought the vessels red to red, and so continued until, at about half a mile, the Karamea's red light was two and a half to three points on the Haugland's port bow. The Haugland then starboarded a little to bring the buoy a little on the starboard bow. Then at a distance of a quarter of a mile the Karamea opened her green light about two points on the Haugland's port bow. The Haugland hard-a-ported, keeping full speed ahead, heard two short blasts, and replied with one short blast. The red light of the Karamea was shut in, and the collision followed.

The Karamea's case was that she was on a S. by E. course, shaping to pass the whistling buoy close on the starboard hand at a speed of seven knots; that when about three-quarters of a mile above the buoy she saw the masthead light of the Haugland three points on the port bow at an estimated distance of one and a half to two miles, and, though seeing no green light, recognised that the Haugland was a steamer heading up channel, i.e., on a crossing course ; and that when the buoy was abeam on the starboard hand the Karamea starboarded, and after beginning to swing saw the green light of the Haugland about a point on the port bow. She gave two short blasts, hard-a-starboarded, and brought the green light about ahead. She gave a second two short blasts, and the red light of the Haugland opened one point on the starboard bow at about a quarter of a mile. She went full speed astern, heard one short blast, and the collision followed.

The Karamea further contended that, upon the vessels first sighting each other, the Haugland did not port sufficiently to open her red light at once to the Karamea, and did not blow her helm signal.

The Haugland, in reply to the latter contention, contended that she did not then blow her whistle as the distance was too great to allow of its being heard.

Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897 art. 19 :

When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Art. 21 :

Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.

Hill, J. (after stating the facts as above set out, and adding that as to the helm action of the Karamea there was some variation in the evidence, the master saying that the orders were starboard and then hard-a-starboard, and the man at the wheel saying it was hard-a-starboard from the beginning, continued).—The first question is : Did the crossing rule apply, and, if it applied, was the rule obeyed ? The Haugland, bound for Montevideo from the sea, intended to pass the buoy on the starboard hand and then turn in under port helm. The Karamea, bound from Montevideo for the sea, intended to pass the buoy on the starboard hand and at the buoy to turn out under starboard helm. The Haugland, while still a good distance away from the buoy, which was on the Haugland's starboard bow, saw the red light of the Karamea broader on the starboard bow and that the Karamea was coming down towards the buoy, that is, to the southward. The Karamea, while still to the northward of the buoy and a good distance away from the Haugland, saw the masthead light of the Haugland, and recognised that the Haugland was heading to the westward.

There was considerable evidence and discussion as to whether the Haugland's green light was an efficient light. It is immaterial on the question of liability, for the Karamea without the guidance of the light knew that the Haugland was heading to the westward. The ships were, in fact, crossing ships, and each knew it. If the rules applied, the Haugland was the give-way ship, and the Karamea was the keep-course-and-speed ship. I am advised, and I am myself of opinion, that there was nothing which made the crossing rules inapplicable, or which could justify the Karamea in changing her course at the buoy, or which could justify the Haugland in not taking timely and sufficient measures to keep clear of the Karamea, and pass under her stern. When no other ship is concerned, the buoy may be a convenient point at which to make the turn, but according to the evidence the turn is often made before the buoy is reached, and I am advised that there is no reason why it should not be made after the buoy is passed. The Elder Brethren can see, and I can find, no special circumstances which relieved the ships, on sighting one another, from obeying the crossing rules, or which could entitle the Karamea to say that in starboarding at the buoy she was keeping her course, I therefore apply the crossing rules to the case.

Applying the crossing rules, it is obvious that the Karamea was to blame for starboarding, and that that fault was a cause of the collision. She saw the Haugland approaching on the port bow, and when abreast of the buoy she starboarded. According to the evidence she answered her helm slowly ; she was dragging in the mud. I am advised that it is very likely that she would get across on to the Haugland's port bow before she had swung sufficiently to open her green light. I find that that happened, and that the ships were never green to green. The lights were the green of the Haugland to the red of the Karamea, then red to red, and at the last the red of the Haugland to the green of the Karamea. The Karamea is to blame for starboarding and continuing to starboard. Her starboarding was wrong and brought about a position of danger. She never converted that into a position of safety by bringing the vessels green to green. She continued to starboard while the Haugland rightly ported, and she so brought about the collision.

I now have to consider the conduct of the Haugland. Accepting the plaintiff's case in full, it is impossible to acquit the Haugland of blame. When the green light of the Karamea opened on the Haugland's port bow, the helm of the Haugland was hard-a-ported, but the engines were kept full ahead, instead of being put full speed astern. This was all the more wrong because the officer in charge of the Haugland had observed that the Karamea was starboarding before the Karamea opened her green light. He then knew that the Karamea was intentionally taking action, which, if persisted in, would create a position of great danger, and when the green light opened he knew that a position of great danger had been created. I am advised that he ought to have at once reversed, and I entirely agree.

There still remains the question of whether the Haugland committed any earlier or other fault. [His Lordship dealt with the evidence on these points, on which he found in favour of the Haugland, and proceeded :] The main fault for the collision rests with the Karamea. The Haugland is also to blame ; her blame is not reversing when a position of danger was brought about by the Karamea.

In the circumstances, it seems to me that the proportions of blame of the two vessels are not equal, and I pronounce the Karamea three-fourths to blame, and the Haugland one-fourth to blame.

Both vessels appealed.

Bateson, K.C. and Alfred Bucknill for the owners of the Karamea (the appellants).

Stephens, K.C. and Dumas for the owners of the Haugland (the cross-appellants).

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Hill, J., in which he held both the vessels to blame. I agree that both vessels were to blame, and so far I agree with Hill, J. But another question arises. Hill, J. held the vessels to blame in the proportions—the Karamea three-fourths and the Haugland one-fourth; and it has been argued before us that, even if both vessels are to blame, those proportions of blame are wrong. On that two questions arise. It was argued for the respondents that, even although we might differ from the learned judge, unless we differ from him on a principle of law we cannot, or, at any rate, ought not, to interfere with his judgment as to the proportions of blame. I confess I cannot follow that argument at all. If we agree with him on the facts, and come to the same conclusion as to the actions of the two ships, I think it would take a very strong case indeed to induce us to interfere with his discretion as to the proportion of blame. We have power to do it, but I do not suppose we ever should do it. But if we differ from him on the facts as to the actions of the two ships, and find the one of them was more to blame in respects which actually had something to do with the causing of the collision, it seems to me we should not only be at liberty, but we should be bound, to review his decision as to the proportions of blame, because, if his decision is formed upon a judgment as to the actions of one of the vessels with which we do not agree, it is obvious that the very elements on which he formed his decision are disturbed. [His Lordship stated the facts, and continued:] As the Karamea was coming down from the whistle buoy, and as the Haugland was approaching it, the port light or the port side of the Karamea would be to the starboard side when they saw the starboard light of the Haugland. They were, therefore, crossing ships, and the crossing rule would apply, unless there was something in the circumstances of the case to prevent that rule applying. Now I am quite clear that there was nothing to prevent the crossing rule applying. There is no question of narrow channel. That is admitted; and the only thing that could be said was that it was a habit of ships to turn at the whistling buoy if they were outward bound and going eastward, and they were to turn under a starboard helm. If they were inward bound and going into the port, this turn under the port helm would be made somewhere about the whistle buoy. But even if this were a regular and recognised turning point, I think there is authority for saying that the circumstance does not prevent the crossing rule from applying; and in this case any such ground of rejecting the crossing rule seems to me to be disposed of by the evidence of the master of the Karamea himself, who said it was not necessary to turn at the turning point, though they did generally turn there. There was nothing in the shape of another ship, and nothing in the state of the water or of anything else, to prevent an outward-going ship going further south of the whistling buoy and starboarding there if it were a right and proper thing to do so. Therefore it seems to me there is no question that the crossing rule applies; and therefore it was the duty of the Karamea to keep her course and speed, and of the Haugland to keep out of the way of the Karamea.

The Karamea undoubtedly did not keep her course and speed. She did starboard there, as she intended to do, in order to make her course to the eastward, and I can see no reason to say that she is not to blame for that. But there is a considerable conflict as to the way in which the collision happened. The Karamea says that, although she had starboarded there, and even assuming it might be a wrong thing to do, she had produced a position of safety, of green to green, before any risk of collision really arose. I mean any serious risk of collision, not technical only; and in that position the Haugland ported into her, and therefore was entirely the cause of the collision. On the other hand, the Haugland says that nothing of the kind took place, but that she, having acted to a certain extent under a port helm, partly to get her head more to the buoy and partly because she saw the Karamea coming down, had got the Karamea for some considerable time on her port side, red to red, and on her port side about two or three points; and after they had been some considerable time in that position the Karamea without any cause at all starboarded into her, or starboarded across her bows. The learned judge has not accepted either of those stories. He has accepted the story of the Haugland to a greater extent than that of the Karamea, but he has not accepted it altogether. The conclusion that he has drawn—and I do not see any reason for differing from him—was this: He says the position into which the vessels got shortly before the collision was this, and that they did it in this way. The Karamea was coming down and intending to alter under a starboard helm, somewhere about the whistling buoy; and I will take it that she was to the eastward of it, and had it on her starboard hand. She was admittedly dragging to a certain extent through the mud, as there is always mud about that place; and therefore she was not making the speed she otherwise would have done, nor was she answering her helm in the way that she otherwise would have done. But she was going her full speed, and the learned judge came to the conclusion that what happened was this: The Haugland had altered a little under the port helm—partly for the Karamea, and partly to get her position better for the buoy. The Karamea did not answer, in consequence of her dragging through the mud, her starboard helm as was intended and as was expected; and therefore she went further ahead to the southward than she would have done if she had answered her helm, with the result that she drew to a certain extent across the bows of the Haugland. They did come for a time red to red, but all the time the Karamea was still acting to a certain extent, and intending to act, under a starboard helm. She continued to do that, with the result that, although she had got for a short time red to red with the Haugland, acting more, and perhaps rather more quickly, under her starboard helm, she came across her bows and had her green light to her; and so the collision was caused by the Karamea striking the Haugland somewhere nearly amidships, and at somewhere about a right angle. That is what the learned judge has found to be what happened, and I do not see any reason to differ from him at all as to that. There is no question that, if you take as absolutely accurate the estimates of distances and bearings which are given by the two vessels, and especially by the Haugland, there may be a difficulty in producing the effect which the learned judge has found was produced; but that is subject to what has been so often said with regard to those cases that you may get very much misled if you proceed upon the assumption that all the estimates of the bearings and distances are absolutely accurate. They are estimates, and they are not always right, and I do not see any ground for differing from the learned judge. He has held on that state of things, of course, that the Karamea was to blame. But he has also held that the Haugland was to blame, and for this reason—that, when she saw what the Karamea was doing, instead of reversing she still continued full speed ahead under a hard-a-port helm. I think he was right there also. That was a wrong manœuvre of the Haugland, which took place at the last moment, and at the time when the Karamea had put her in a position of very considerable difficulty; and holding that to be the only respect in which the Haugland was to blame, he considered that one-fourth of the blame only was attributable to her.

But another case was made against the Haugland which the learned judge rejected, and that was this: When she sighted the Karamea she did port—I think she says half a point, or, at any rate, it was a very slight porting; she did not port sufficiently to open her red light at once to the Karamea. She brought the Karamea very much finer upon her starboard bow, but she did not actually get her on the port bow at that moment, and she trusted to the Karamea keeping her headway and crossing her head in order to get the position of red to red which was afterwards produced. She was then at a distance of somewhere about two miles. She did not blow her helm signal, and I can see no excuse for that. If she had been altering simply for her own navigation, apart from anything to do with the Karamea, there would be something to be said for it. But avowedly she was altering, not only for the buoy, but also in order to manœuvre for the Karamea; and therefore under the strictest definition which you can have of a vessel in sight the Karamea was in sight of the Haugland for the purpose of manœuvre, and she did act for her. Now, in those circumstances, the rule is express—that the vessel which is acting ought to blow the proper helm signal; and the only reason given for not doing so in this case was that the Haugland was so far off—that is, she was about two miles off—that the Karamea could not possibly have heard the signal, and therefore it was no use blowing. I ought to say that the wind also was blowing—not strongly, but was blowing from the Haugland towards the Karamea. Of couse, it is very difficult to say how far a whistle can be heard, unless you know what the whistle is. But we are advised, and I think our experience also teaches us, that two miles is not by any means an impossible distance for a good whistle to be heard, and that does not seem to me to be any reason for not whistling. Now what is said against the Haugland is this: You, by your action, contributed to this collision, because you misled, or, at any rate, might have misled, the Karamea into thinking that you were not going to alter for her, and that, therefore, she might safely alter and go on her course under the starboard helm. The Elder Brethren advised the learned judge in the court below that, in respect of the absence of the whistle, and the slight porting, and not seeing the red light, the Haugland could not be held to blame at all. We have asked our assessors, and I regret to say on the second point the assessors do not entirely agree—namely, whether the Haugland ought at once to have opened her red light, and not trusted to the Karamea crossing her bow in order to get them red to red. If I had to choose, I think I should myself say that, in the circumstances, it is better that a ship like the Haugland should emphasise her position at once, as she is the ship which has to alter for the other; but I do not think it is necessary to come to that conclusion, because both of those who assist us are of opinion that this vessel, undoubtedly altering as she did, ought to have given her helm signal, and they see no reason in the circumstances (so far as they can judge without knowing exactly what the whistle was) why that whistle should not have been heard by the Karamea. Taking those two things together, I cannot myself see how the Haugland can be held not to blame for her manœuvres at that time. Had she at once opened her red light there certainly was a better chance of the Karamea being warned that she must not starboard. It ought not to have been necessary to have warned her, because she had no right to starboard by the rule. Had she heard the helm signal at all she would have had a greater chance of being warned, although the distance was considerable. But as the Haugland omitted both to open her red light at once and also to give any sound signal that she was acting for the Karamea, I cannot help differing from the learned judge when he says she was not to blame for that earlier port manœuvre. If she were, it seems to me that that is a fault which might very well, and very likely did, contribute to the collision, because it deprived the Karamea of the warning that she otherwise would have had, which might have induced her to correct her wrong manœuvre. She did not get that warning, and she did not correct her wrong manœuvre. She came on wrongly, and the Haugland also acted wrongly at the last, and they were both continuing their wrong action up to the time of the collision; and therefore it seems to me that, in those circumstances, the Haugland is more to blame than the learned judge thought she was, and therefore we have to see whether, in the altered circumstances thus produced the proportions that the learned judge has stated should be maintained. I do not think they should. I think, in the circumstances as we find them, that there is no reason for dividing the blame, except according to the rule that each is to blame half and half; and that, I think, is the judgment that ought to be given.

Warrington, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The judge below has found both vessels to blame. He has apportioned the blame in the proportion of three-fourths to the Karamea and one-fourth to the Haugland. He has arrived at that proportion by finding the Haugland to blame in reference to one act of hers, and one act only. It is contended on behalf of the Karamea the Haugland was also to blame for default in the early part of her manœuvres, and we are accordingly asked, if we come to that conclusion, to vary the apportionment arrived at by the learned judge. Now with regard to that I only desire to say this: It is conceded by counsel for the Haugland that, if the method of apportionment adopted by a judge is determined by his conclusions on a point of law, then if this court differs from him in the conclusion at which he arrives there is no question that it has the right to alter the apportionment at which he has arrived. I can see no distinction between that case and the case in which the conclusion of the learned judge has been determined by his finding of fact, and this court differs from him in that finding. It seems to me that in either of those two cases this court necessarily arrives at a conclusion, not merely that the apportionment is wrong, but that the method by which the apportionment is arrived at is wrong, and in that case I see no reason why this court should not vary the apportionment. It may well be, and probably is the case, that, if the court arrives at the same conclusion both in fact and in law, it would not interfere merely because the learned judge in his discretion has given proportions which this court thinks it would not have given. That is another matter altogether. But there may well be an apportionment that depends on either a conclusion of law or a conclusion of fact in which this court differs, and then it seems to me there is no objection to its altering the apportionment. [His Lordship stated the circumstances which resulted in the collision, and continued:] Now what has been said on behalf of the Karamea is that the Haugland ought, when she originally ported her helm, as I have said, partly with a view to the ship as well as to the buoy, to have gone more decidedly under a port helm so as to indicate to the Karamea that she understood that it was her duty to give way, and so to have told the Karamea that she was expected to maintain her course and speed, and that, if she had done so, then the collision might very well not have occurred. Further, it is said that the Haugland ought, when she did port her helm as she did, to have given the port helm signal, which she failed to do. That she did port her helm there is no question on the story of the Haugland herself, nor is there any question that she failed to give the port helm signal. The only reason for not giving it is that she thought that the Karamea was too far off. Now the learned judge, under those circumstances, asked the Elder Brethren who were assisting him whether they thought that the Haugland, under the circumstances, had done all that was necessary for keeping clear by taking the action that she did, and the Elder Brethren advised him that they thought that she had. We have consulted our assessors on that point, and they do not altogether agree. One of them thinks that the Haugland did what was necessary, and that it was not incumbent upon her to make a more decisive turn to port than she actually did. The other does not take that view. But they both agree that there was no excuse for her having failed to give the port helm signal. It is really unnecessary to say with which of the two views as to the helm action of the Haugland I agree; but I must say this that looking generally at what happened, I think both ships were bent too much upon maintaining the course which had been laid down for each before the circumstances of danger arose, and did not take sufficient account of the position of the other ship and the possible risks of collision, and if I had to decide it—though I say so with great hesitation—I think I should say that the Haugland was to blame for not having taken a more decisive course under the port helm. But, as I say, it may be unnecessary to decide that, as I think there is no doubt that she was to blame for not having given the signal. It comes to this, therefore, that the learned judge having found that the Haugland was to blame for one fault only—namely, that of not having reversed her engines and continuing to go ahead at full speed under her hard-a-port helm—we come to the conclusion that the Haugland was further to blame at an earlier stage in the proceedings; and having arrived at that conclusion, then I agree that the best course to pursue is to treat both vessels as to blame, and not to make any apportionment except that the damages be divided in two.

Scrutton, L.J.—I agree, and I do not propose to repeat in detail the manœuvres stated by my brethren. I only desire to say a word or two to make clear my own views of the effect of the rules on this case. The Karamea was coming south out of Montevideo, but at a certain point would turn east in order to go to sea, going at right angles. The exact point at which she would turn was not settled by any physical object. She might have turned before the whistling buoy. She might have turned somewhere south of the whistling buoy. The Haugland was coming from the sea on a westerly course, and would at a certain point turn again at right angles to go into Montevideo; and, again, the exact point at which she would turn was not fixed by the physical conditions, and each ship would turn somewhere in the neighbourhood of the whistling buoy, but had no particular point settled for the turn, either by a rule or by any physical conditions.

Under those circumstances, what is the bearing of art. 19? That article says: "When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision." I think the authorities have settled that you consider whether the steamships are crossing some time before they cross, or, as has been put by a learned judge, now dead, who used to practise in the Admiralty Court: "So as to involve risk of collision." Looking some way back, you consider the courses prolonged as if they were kept straight on and see if they cross, and if they cross you see when they cross whether the two ships will be somewhere near one another; and if you find that to be the state of things, then primâ facie the one on the starboard side must be the give-way ship. You get an exception to that when another rule comes in, and the courses of the ships are prescribed by physical conditions such as that of narrow channel, so that, though the lines, if prolonged, would cross, the position and the rules settle that the courses will not cross, because each ship will keep on the starboard side of the narrow channel; and when you get that position art. 19 does not then apply and art. 25 will. [Art. 25 provides: "In narrow channels every steam vessel shall where it is safe and practicable keep tn that side of the fairway or mid-channel, which lies on he starboard side of such vessel.] This seems to be a sort of halfway case, where you know each ship is going to alter its course. You know they alter their course in about the same place, but there is nothing that definitely settles at what point they shall alter their course. They may go a little further before altering their course in each case. That constantly happens at sea when the ordinary course is to make for a lightship or a buoy, or sometimes for a headland, and then to alter your course. Now, in my view, in a case like that, which is the present case, the crossing rule applies, and you ought to keep the courses as prolonged, and put the burden of keeping out of the way on the vessel which has the other on the starboard side. If that is acted upon it avoids the difficulties that would otherwise arise, and which did arise in this case, particularly at night, when in doubt as to which ship is going to make an alteration in her course, which you know is going to be made at some time but as to which you are not sure exactly when it will be made. But it appears to me that you are in a somewhat ambiguous position because you know the prolonged course is not the course the other ship is going to make, and that this imposes on the give-way ship the obligation of good seamanship, of making clear what she is going to do. There may be an ambiguous position under those circumstances because the stand-on ship may think, "the other vessel does not understand the stand-on rule, and so I shall be safe to make an alteration which I am going to make anyhow, and which she knows I am going to make." That puts upon the give-way ship the obligation of clearly giving way, and giving the stand-on ship the clearest indication she can that she is treating herself as the give-way ship, and meaning to get out of the way. I am disposed to agree with what I think would have been the view of the learned judge if he had not been advised by his assessors, and with what is the view of one of our own assessors—namely, that the Haugland ought to have ported more decisively and shown the red light sooner, and made clear to the Karamea that she was treating herself as the give-way ship and getting out of the way.

Though I agree that that is a point of some difficulty, and I can quite understand a difference of opinion about it, I have no difficulty whatever about the second point, as to neglecting to give the signal that she was altering her helm. The rule is when vessels are in sight of one another that a steam vessel under way shall indicate that course by certain signals. Now, of course, very properly, an interpretation has been put upon the words "when vessels are in sight." It does not mean that if on the extreme horizon, with a glass, you descry a vessel in sight you must blow a sound signal which she may possibly not hear. It means, and has been interpreted to mean, when the vessel may be treated as being in sight so as to be affected by the manœuvre you are making. If you put the limitation (which appears to me to be a very proper limitation) on art. 28, then it is quite clear that one of the purposes for which the Haugland was making this alteration of course was to avoid the other ship, and anyhow the other ship might think she was manœuvring for that purpose. [Art. 28 provides: ". . . When vessels are in sight of one another a steam vessel under way in taking any course authorised or required by these rules, shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or siren. . . ."] Under those circumstances it seems to me to have been quite clear that here it was the duty of the Haugland to say by her whistle "I am porting," in order that the Karamea might have notice of the fact, and shape her course accordingly. The excuse put forward for her seems to me to be futile. It does not matter that the signal you are giving may not be heard; you must give it, and if it can be heard so much the better for the other ship.

The only other point that I desire to mention is that I entirely agree with my brethren in this, that if you agree with the findings of fact and law of the learned judge below, and the only difference is that the Court of Appeal attaches more importance to a particular fact than he did, it would require an extremely strong case to alter the proportions of blame which the learned judge below has attributed to the ships. But when you take a different view of fact or law from that taken by the learned judge, and find certain matters blameworthy which he has not found blameworthy at all, it appears to me there is not only no objection to the Court of Appeal altering the proportions, but that it is bound to alter the proportions, because of the extreme probability that if the learned judge had taken the same view of the facts as the Court of Appeal, he would himself have taken the Court of Appeal's view as to the proportions of blame.

For these reasons I agree with the judgments already pronounced.

LIMERICK STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED v. W. H. STOTT AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter (Clause 16)—Icebound port—Port kept open by Icebreakers—Damage by forcing ice—"Nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice"—Manchester Ship Canal—Ship unable to leave Manchester in light draft—"Good and safe port."

A safe port is a port to which a ship can safely get and from which she can safely return.

By a charter-party, dated the 25th Nov. 1919, and made on the Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter 1912 form, the plaintiffs' steamer was chartered, and it was provided that the steamer should be delivered to the charterers and should be employed between good and safe ports or places within the limits of one Baltic round where she could always safely lie afloat, as the charterers or their agents should direct.

Clause 16 of the charter-party provided that "the steamer shall not be ordered to . . . any icebound port" or any port "where there is risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer will not be able on account of ice to enter the port or get out after loading or discharging, nor shall the steamer be obliged to force ice"; should the steamer be detained by any of the above causes such detention should be for charterers' account, but nevertheless, "if on account of ice the captain should consider it dangerous to remain at port of loading for fear of steamer being frozen in and/or damaged, he shall have liberty (but not be obliged) to sail to a convenient open port and await charterers' fresh instructions."

The charterers ordered the steamer to proceed to the port of Abo, which port was kept open in the winter by means of ice-breakers. While proceeding to Abo the steamer encountered ice. Sometimes she was able to force her way through without the aid of an ice-breaker, sometimes she tried and failed; but eventually with the aid of an ice-breaker she got through and arrived at Abo. In the course of her voyage to and from Abo she was very seriously damaged by the ice. After loading a cargo at Abo the charterers ordered the steamer to proceed to Manchester. To reach the port of Manchester the steamer had to proceed up the Manchester Ship Canal. She was able to pass through the canal loaded on her way to Manchester, but after she had discharged her cargo at Manchester, her draft was such that she could not proceed down the canal and clear the bridges without cutting her masts. In a claim by the plaintiffs against the charterers for breach of charter-party, Bailhache, J. held (1) that the charterers had committed no breach of the charter-party in ordering the steamer to proceed to Abo, because that port, being kept open by means of ice-breakers, was not an icebound port within the meaning of the charter-party; (2) that on the true construction of clause 16 of the charter-party the steamer was not bound to force her way through ice; whether she attempted to do so rested in the master's discretion; therefore the charterers were not liable for the damage suffered by the steamer through encountering ice on the way to Abo; (3) that Manchester was not a good and safe port within the meaning of the charter-party, because a safe port meant a port to which a ship could safely get and from which she could safely return. The charterers therefore committed a breach of the charter-party in ordering the steamer to Manchester and were accordingly liable for the expense of cutting the masts to enable her to return under the bridges of the Manchester Ship Canal.

Held on appeal, (1) that Abo was not an ice-bound port within the meaning of the charter-party; and (2) (Atkin, L.J. doubting) that the charterers had not ordered the ship to a port on her way to which she was obliged to force ice; and that there had not been a breach of the charter-party in either respect.

Judgment of Bailhache, J. (infrà); (1921) 1 K. B. 568 affirmed.

Appeal by the shipowners from the judgment of Bailhache, J. in the action.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover from the defendants damages for breach of a charter-party. The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Innisboffin, and they chartered her to the defendants, by a charter-party dated the 25th Nov. 1919, for one Baltic round voyage. The charter-party was on the Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter 1912 form, and provided that the steamer should be delivered to the charterers at Huelva, and should be employed between good and safe ports or places within the limits of one Baltic round, where she could always safely lie afloat, as the charterers or their agents should direct. The steamer was to be delivered under the charter about the 30th Nov. 1919.

By clause 2 the owners were to provide and pay for the insurance of the steamer. By clause 3 the charterers were to provide and pay for all other charges and expenses, except certain items already mentioned which are not material to this report.

It was provided by clause 7 that the steamer (unless lost) should be redelivered on the expiration of the charter-party in the same good order as when delivered to the charterers (fair wear and tear excepted), at an ice-free port in charterers' option in the United Kingdom. Clause 9 provided that the captain should prosecute his voyages with the utmost dispatch.

By clause 14 throughout the charter losses or damages arising or occasioned by negligence, default, or error of judgment of the pilot, master, or crew, or other servants of the owners, in the management or navigation of the steamer were absolutely excepted, and by clause 16 the steamer was not to be ordered "to any ice-bound port" or any port where there was risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer would not be able on account of ice to enter the port or to get out after completing loading or discharging, "nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice. Should the steamer be detained by any of the above causes such detention shall be for charterers' account. Nevertheless, if on account of ice the captain should consider it dangerous to remain at port of loading for fear of steamer being frozen in and/or damaged, he shall have liberty (but not be obliged) to sail to a convenient open place and await charterers' fresh instructions."

The steamer was duly delivered to the defendants under the charter-party and came on hire shortly after the date thereof. In Jan. 1920 the defendants ordered her to proceed to the port of Abo in Finland. At that period of the year a great portion of the Baltic Sea is icebound. There are a few ports on the southern shore of the Baltic Sea which are normally free from ice, but the majority of the ports become icebound unless kept open by ice-breakers. The port of Abo was kept open in the winter by ice-breakers.

The Innisboffin encountered ice on her voyage to Abo. Sometimes the ice was sufficiently thin for her to force her way through without the aid of an ice-breaker. On one or two occasions she attempted to force her way through without the aid of an ice-breaker and failed. Eventually, with the aid of an ice-breaker she got through the ice and arrived at Abo. In the course of her voyage to Abo and her return voyage from Abo, she was very severely damaged by the ice, the damage so caused amounting to 2600*l.*

After loading a cargo at Abo the charterers ordered the Innisboffin to proceed to Manchester. To reach the port of Manchester the steamer had to proceed up the Manchester Ship Canal. She was able to pass through the canal loaded on her way to Manchester, but after she had discharged her cargo at Manchester her draft was such that she could not proceed down the canal and clear the bridges without cutting her masts.

Accordingly the plaintiffs' claim was based on two allegations (1) that the port of Abo was an icebound port, or, alternatively, that it was a port where there was a risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer would not be able to enter or to leave on account of ice, and further that Abo was a port to enter which the steamer might be obliged to force ice and that consequently the charterers committed a breach of the charter-party in ordering the steamer to proceed to that port and that they were therefore liable for the damage sustained by the steamer by ice in entering and leaving the port and the incidental expenses to which the plaintiffs were thereby put, and (2) they alleged that Manchester was not a good and/or safe port in that the steamer could not leave that port at light draft unless her masts were cut, and that the charterers committed a breach of the charter-party in ordering the steamer to proceed to that port, and were therefore liable for the cost of cutting and repairing the masts.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Claughton Scott for the plaintiffs.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt for the defendants.

Bailhache, J.—The question whether or not the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the damages sustained by the steamship Innisboffin depends entirely on the construction of the charter-party. The charter-party is on the Baltic Uniform Time Charter Form, and contains a clause, No. 16, which deals with ice. The rest of the clauses are the usual clauses in a time charter, including a clause that the steamer is to prosecute her voyages with the utmost dispatch. I mention that clause because Mr. MacKinnon has laid some stress on that fact.

The clause on which Mr. MacKinnon principally relies is clause 16, which provides that "the steamer shall not be ordered to . . . any ice-bound port or any port . . . where there is risk that in the ordinary course of things the steamer will not be able on account of ice to enter the port or to get out after completing loading or discharging, nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice. Should the steamer be detained by any of the above causes such detention shall be for charterers' account. Nevertheless, if on account of ice the captain should consider it dangerous to remain at port of loading for fear of steamer being frozen in and/or damaged he shall have liberty (but not be obliged) to sail to a convenient open place and await charterers' fresh instructions."

The only thing that is there dealt with is detention, and the clause provides that detention from any of the causes there mentioned is to be for charterers' account—that is to say, that they are to pay the agreed rate of hire for the time during which the steamer is detained by any of those causes. The clause says nothing at all about damage to the steamer. It must be borne in mind that in the Baltic a few ports on the southern shore are normally and naturally open all the year round—that is to say, ice does not form in them, but that in the majority of the ports in the Baltic ice does form in the winter, although certain ports, as, for instance, Stockholm, are kept open during the winter by means of icebreakers.

That is the case with the port of Abo, which is kept open by the Finnish Government by means of icebreakers. As I understand this charter-party, what it provides is this: The charterers are to be at liberty to send this vessel to the Baltic in the winter—indeed, that is what they chartered her for, but they must not send her to a port that is icebound—that is to say, they must not send her to a port that is frozen up so that the vessel cannot enter, the reason being that, inasmuch as the port will be frozen up for several months, the steamer will be delayed for an indefinite time, and the owners do not want their vessel unreasonably detained; for that reason the charterers are not entitled to send the vessel to a port that is, in fact, icebound.

Further, although the vessel is able to enter a port which is normally icebound, still she is liable to be icebound in that port before she can get away and thereby be unreasonably detained. Therefore the owners exclude those two things. The charterers are not to send the vessel to a port that is blocked with ice, and they are also not to send her to a port where, although she may get in, there is a risk that she may be caught in the ice and be unable to get away after completing loading or discharging. The charterers are only at liberty to send her to a port that is not ice-bound. In the Baltic, however, it very often happens that although the port is not itself ice-bound, as it is kept open by icebreakers, yet the passage to the port does become icebound or is partly or entirely closed with ice.

Now, although the charterers are entitled to nominate a port which is not icebound, yet if in the course of her voyage to that port the vessel encounters ice which prevents her prosecuting her voyage, she is not, under the charter-party, bound to force the ice, and therefore it is not a breach of contract on the part of the shipowners if she does not go to that port.

Clause 16 provides for all these eventualities; it also contains a provision for another eventuality, and that is this: If the charterers have ordered the vessel to a port which was not at the time icebound, but she is there so long that there is a danger if she remains longer she will be caught in the ice and not be able to get out, the captain may, if he likes, although he is not bound to do so, leave the port and go to the nearest port when there is free and open water, and then await charterers' instructions. If, however, he does not leave the port, but remains there, and is caught in the ice, then the detention of the vessel from that cause is for charterers' account.

The real context in this case is whether Abo was or was not an icebound port. If Abo was not an ice-bound port, then it was no breach of contract on the part of the charterers to order her there. Abo is a port which, if left to itself, would undoubtedly become in the course of the winter, particularly in January and February, frozen to such an extent that no vessel could possibly get either in or out, but the port is kept open, as I have said, by means of icebreakers. Now is that, within the meaning of the charter-party, an icebound port? In my judgment it clearly is not. It is true that Abo would be an icebound port if artificial means were not taken to prevent it becoming icebound, but artificial means are taken by the Finnish Government to prevent it becoming an icebound port, and it is a port which, so far as the port itself is concerned, a vessel can enter and leave at any time of the year owing to the ice being constantly kept broken. There was, therefore, no breach of contract on the part of the charterers in sending the Innisboffin to Abo.

On the way to Abo she encountered ice and was damaged in proceeding through the ice. It is contended on behalf of the shipowners that even if it was no breach of contract on the part of the charterers to send the vessel to Abo, still they are liable for the damage which she sustained in getting there. I find it difficult to understand that proposition. I agree that if it were a breach of contract on the part of the charterers to send the vessel to Abo the damage that she naturally and properly sustained on the voyage to or from Abo, apart from the negligence of the master, would be for the charterers' account. But the charter expressly provides that, although Abo may be a port to which the vessel may be properly ordered, she is not bound to force the ice to reach that port unless the master chooses. It is left to his discretion; he may force the ice or he may refuse to proceed further by reason of the ice.

In my judgment this action is founded on a misapprehension of what clause 16 provides. That clause, as I read it, does not throw the liability for any damage which the vessel may sustain upon the charterers if they commit no breach of contract with regard to the port to which they order the ship; the clause throws the liability for the detention of the vessel in the events there set out upon the charterers, and gives the owners the option in certain cases not to proceed to ports nominated by the charterers if the ports fall within the terms of clause 16 through being icebound or if the route to those ports is impeded with ice. This disposes of the whole case with the exception of one small item.

The Innisboffin left Abo with a cargo for Manchester. In order to get there she had to proceed up the Manchester Ship Canal. Under the terms of the charter-party she could only be ordered to a safe port. When she went through the canal loaded on her way to Manchester her masts were just low enough to clear the bridges, but after discharging her cargo at Manchester she came up in the water, and when she proceeded down the canal from Manchester her masts would not clear the bridges, and accordingly they had to be cut. In my judgment, the expense of cutting the masts must fall on the charterers, because they were only entitled to order the Innisboffin to a safe port, which means a port to which a ship can safely get and from which she can safely return. It was therefore a breach of contract for the charterers to order her to proceed to Manchester, and having committed a breach of contract they must pay the damages which flow from that breach of contract.

To my mind, that is the distinction between the damages sustained at Manchester and the damages sustained by the vessel through being ordered to Abo. The charterers committed no breach of contract in ordering her to Abo, and therefore they are not liable for any consequential damage, whereas they committed a breach of contract in ordering her to proceed to Manchester, and therefore are liable for the consequential damages.

The result is that there will be judgment for the plaintiffs for the comparatively small amount involved in cutting the masts in order to enable the Innisboffin to get to and from Manchester.

Mackinnon, K.C. and H. Claughton Scott for the appellants.—Abo was an "ice-bound port" within the meaning of clause 16 of the charter-party. The object of the clause is not only that the ship shall not be ordered to an ice-bound port, but that she shall not be ordered to a port on the way to which she will encounter ice. Secondly, the words "nor shall the steamer be obliged to force ice" mean that she shall not be ordered to any port to reach which she will be obliged to force ice. In ordering the ship to such a port the charterers acted in breach of the charter-party, and are liable for the damage done to the ship by ice.

Wright, K.C. and Jowitt for the respondents, were not called upon to argue on the question whether Abo was an ice-bound port.—The words "nor shall the steamer be obliged to force ice" are a separate term of the charter-party, having no connection with the preceding words, and their effect is that, if the master is called upon to force ice, he may refuse to do so without prejudice to the owners' hire. There was no breach of the charter-party, as the ship was not obliged to force ice.

Mackinnon, K.C. in reply.

April 22.—The following judgments were read:—

Bankes, L.J.—In this action the plaintiffs, as owners of the steamship Innisboffin, claim damages from the defendants as charterers for injury sustained by the vessel as a result of her encountering ice on a voyage upon which she had been ordered by the defendants. As the case is presented to this court by the appellants there is no dispute as to the facts. The question turns upon the construction of the charter-party. The material facts are as follows. The vessel came on hire shortly after the date of the charter-party. In Jan. 1920, she was ordered by the defendants to proceed to Abo, a port on the coast of Finland. In proceeding on that voyage the master kept close to the east coast of Sweden, and when somewhere north of Stockholm he encountered ice. He endeavoured to force his way through, but failed, and was obliged to wait until an ice-breaker from Stockholm came to his assistance. Having been released by the ice-breaker the master continued his voyage, and eventually arrived at Abo through the channel which is kept open to that port by ice-breakers employed for that purpose by the Government of Finland. The vessel sustained injury from contact with the ice. In respect of that injury the action was brought. Bailhache, J, has held that Abo was not an icebound port within the meaning of this clause, having regard to the fact that the Government of Finland kept a channel to the port open in spite of the ice. I agree with the learned judge's conclusion upon the facts of this case, though I think it undesirable to attempt to give a definition of what constitutes an ice-bound port which could be applicable under all circumstances.

The other point upon the construction of this clause is to my mind one of considerable difficulty. The appellants contend that the clause from its commencement down to the words "to force ice" should be read as one continuous sentence, the whole of which refers to limitations placed upon the powers of the charterers. Thus read, the words "nor shall the steamer be obliged to force ice" are a short form of expressing "nor shall the steamer be ordered to any port to arrive at which she will be obliged to force ice," or some equivalent words. On the other hand, the respondents say that the words "nor shall the steamer be obliged to force ice" should be read as a separate sentence from what precedes them, and relate to the legal or contractual obligation on the part of the steamer, and not to any limitation upon the powers of the charterers. Bailhache, J. has adopted the latter construction. I agree with his view. From any point of view the clause is not skilfully drafted. The use of the word "nor" appears to indicate the the draftsman intended the concluding words to form part of one continuous sentence. On the other hand, if this view is adopted it necessitates the introduction of words which are not in the sentence as drafted; because the "shall" which follows the "nor" must refer to orders under which the steamer may or will be obliged to force ice, and some words given by the charterers rather than to the obligation imposed on the steamer must be read with the concluding part of the sentence to give it the meaning contended for by the appellants. In my opinion less violence is done to the language actually used by adopting the construction contended for by the respondents than that contended for by the appellants, and it also seems to me that the respondents' construction fits in better with what I conceive to be the general intention of the parties as expressed in the charter-party as a whole than that of the appellants. Reference was made during the argument to clause 7, but I did not understand that the appellants desired to found any claim upon its provisions. I therefore express no opinion upon what is admitted to be a clause always introduced into this form of charter-party but never insisted upon. A point was made by Mr. Jowitt for the defendants that even assuming the appellants' construction of clause 16 was accepted the respondents were entitled to succeed upon the facts, because the evidence proved that the master never was obliged to force ice. I express no opinion on this point, as the evidence was not gone into, and in my view of the meaning of clause 16 it is not necessary to consider it. If clause 16 is to be read as I think it should be read the appellants have failed to establish any breach of the contract contained in the charter-party for which a claim to damages could be made. I desire to reserve any opinion upon the question what damages are recoverable in the event of a breach of the provisions of clause 16 being proved. For the reasons I have given I think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Scrutton, L.J.—The plaintiffs, the appellants, were owners of a ship which was chartered by the defendants, the respondents, in November, to go a Baltic round voyage. She was ordered in January to Abo in Finland, and in the course of the round voyage was damaged by ice. The shipowners then sued the charterers alleging: (1) that they had ordered her to an ice-bound port contrary to clause 16 of the charter, and that in consequence she was damaged; (2) that they had ordered her to a port to enter which might oblige her to force ice, and that in consequence she was damaged. The first claim fails in fact. The judge below has found, and I agree with him, that Abo was not an ice-bound port. It would be if no artificial measures were taken, but in fact by the use of ice-breakers a channel for entrance is kept open from the Aland Islands to Abo. The captain admitted it was kept open the whole year and the defendants' witnesses proved that steamers were running six voyages a week between Stockholm and Abo the whole winter. Such a port kept artificially open the whole winter cannot be said to be ice-bound.

On the second head the facts seem to be that the Innisboffin, a steamer thirty-one years old, met on her voyage through the Baltic on a proper route some thick ice some 200 miles from Abo; she tried to get through it by ramming it—that is, to "force" it—but she failed and became fast in the ice. She then, by wireless telegraphy, summoned an ice-breaker from Stockholm, which extricated her, and for the rest of the voyage she ran in channels made by ice-breakers, or open sea. Shortly after this incident her forepeak was found leaking, and her plates were bent in, as appears in the photographs, between the frames. Clause 16 enables the captain to refuse to go to an ice-bound port, and to refuse to force ice which he meets on his voyage, without being guilty of any breach of charter, and without prejudicing his owners' right to hire while he is waiting for proper orders, or for a sea free of ice. He is also allowed, but is not obliged, to leave a port which is likely to become ice-bound; that is, in my view, it cannot be said that the owner loses his right to hire, because the captain elects to stay when he might have escaped. Now whether or not the ship will meet thick ice on this Baltic round seems to be a matter of uncertainty. What the master will do when he meets thick ice seems to be a matter of his navigation. The charterer does not give him any orders as to this situation or "oblige" him to do anything, and he will not prejudice his owners' hire by waiting till he can get through. He is not "obliged to force ice." In this particular case by sending for the ice-breaker he could have got through without damaging himself. I am unable to see what breach of charter the charterers have committed in this case; the damage seems to have resulted from the captain's decision to take a course of action which by the charter he was relieved from the obligation to take. Some damage is supposed to have resulted from storms blowing the steamer on the thick ice at the edge of the ice-breaker's channel. This does not seem to be the charterers' affair.

The question was argued before us whether the charterers who requested the ship to go to an unsafe or an icebound port, to which she was not bound to go, were liable if she went for damage sustained on her voyage. I desire to reserve my opinion on this point. The state of knowledge of shipowner and charterer may be material when the point has to be decided. The action was not based on clause 7 of the charter. It is not clear what this means, as the clause is difficult to reconcile with the shipowners' obligation to maintain the ship efficient under clause 2 and to insure her under the same clause; and with the last part of clause 12. When it is necessary to construe the clause it will be desirable to consider what is covered by "fair wear and tear," and whether the clause applies to damage not caused in any way by the charterer.

In my view the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Atkin, L.J.—I have found considerable difficulty in construing clause 16 of this charter-party. Unaided I think I should have come to the conclusion that the words "nor shall steamer be obliged to force ice" were intended to impose a restriction upon the charterers' rights to direct the ship to a particular port, a restriction additional to those imposed in the first words of the clause "that the steamer shall not be ordered to any port," &c. The words might reasonably mean "nor shall the steamer be ordered to a port to reach or leave which she finds herself compelled to force ice." It occurred to me that if she were ordered on a voyage in which she found herself shut in by ice, so that for safety she had to force herself through, the damage caused by this action of the ship would be for charterers' account; and I was inclined to think that the express provision for detention immediately following the words in question treated the obligation to force ice as one of the causes which expressly put detention on charterers' account. I should not have read the words as merely giving a liberty to the ship to abstain from forcing ice. Had I come to the conclusion above suggested I should have thought that there was evidence fit to be considered by the trial judge that in this case there had been a breach of contract by the charterers. I recognise, however, that this meaning of the word "obliged" is not the meaning of the same word three lines lower down in the same clause; and when I find my brother Bailhache and the two other members of the court taking a different view I have not sufficient confidence in my opinion to say that the judgment appealed from is wrong. I agree that Abo was not in the circumstances an icebound port.

THE GULF OF SUEZ. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Steamship coming out of dock—Crossing rule — Porting to counteract ebb tide — Misleading signals—Other vessel not misled—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, arts. 19, 21, and 28.

The G., leaving the Albert Dock on the Birkenhead side of the Mersey, intended to cross straight to the east side of mid-river and then turn down stream. The G. S. was proceeding up river to the west of mid-river, having the G. on her starboard bow. The vessels sighted one another at a distance of about half a mile, at the time when the G. was leaving the dock entrance; and they came into collision some 700 ft. from the Liverpool side. The G., on leaving the dock, ported a little to counteract the effect of the ebb tide on her head, and gave a short blast, and subsequently a second short blast. After the first slight porting to counteract the tide, the helm was steadied, and the second short blast was given, and she continued on straight across the river. The question was whether in the circumstances the crossing rule (art. 19) applied.

Held, that the question depended on the distance at which the vessels sighted one another, and that they were just sufficiently far apart for the crossing rule to apply. The G. S. was held to blame for not reversing when the G. was seen to be continuing to head across the river.

In the Admiralty Court the G. also was held to blame on the ground that she sounded port helm signals when she was not, in fact, "directing her course to starboard" (art. 28).

Held, by the Court of Appeal that, as she did not, in fact, mislead those on board the G. S., who saw that she was not altering her course to starboard, she ought not to be held to blame.

Judgment of Hill, J. varied, the G. S. being held alone to blame.

APPEAL by the plaintiff, the Shipping Controller, the owner of the Gustav, from the judgment of Hill, J., who held both vessels to blame.

The plaintiff, the owner of the steamship Gustav, claimed against the defendants, the owners of the steamship Gulf of Suez, damages in respect of a collision that occurred on the 26th May 1920, off the Prince's Dock, in the River Mersey.

The plaintiff by his statement of claim said:

(2) Shortly before 9.33 p.m. (B.S.T.), on the 26th May 1920, the Gustav, a steel-screw steamship of 2259 tons gross and 1364 tons net register, 300ft. long, manned by a crew of twenty-eight hands all told, while on a voyage from the Alfred Dock, Birkenhead, to Newport, Mon., in water ballast, was leaving the lock of the Alfred Dock. The weather was fine but slightly hazy, and it was not quite dark. The wind was calm, and the tide ebb of the force of about two and a half knots. The Gustav was being assisted by a tug made fast ahead and was heading about E. by N. in order to get to her proper side before turning down the river, and making about four to five knots an hour through the water. Her whistle had been sounded a warning blast when she was about to leave the lock, and this signal was repeated when she was just clear of the lock. Her helm was then ported a little to counteract the effect of the tide. Her regulation underway lights, including a second masthead light, were being duly exhibited, and were burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. (3) In these circumstances those on the Gustav observed a steamer, which proved to be the Gulf of Suez, showing a masthead and green light about half a mile distant and about four to five points on the port bow. The whistle of the Gustav was at once sounded a short blast, and about the same time her tug was cast off. The Gulf of Suez answered the port helm signal of the Gustav by sounding one short blast. The helm of the Gustav, which was still slightly aport, was kept so, and her whistle was again sounded a short blast in reply to the signal of the Gulf of Suez, but the Gulf of Suez, instead of keeping to her proper side of the channel and passing under the stern of the Gustav, as she could and ought to have done, was seen to be altering under starboard helm and causing danger of collision, and though the engines of the Gustav were put full speed astern and her starboard anchor was dropped and the Gustav by these means greatly reduced her speed, the Gulf of Suez, although acting at the last under port helm, came on and with her starboard side abaft amidships, struck the stem of the Gustav, doing her damage. (4) A good look-out was not kept on the Gulf of Suez. (5) Those on the Gulf of Suez neglected to keep out of the way of the Gustav. (6) Improperly starboarded and attempted to cross ahead of the Gustav. (7) Negligently failed to port in due and proper time. (8) Neglected to ease, stop, or reverse their engines. (9) Neglected to keep that vessel to her own starboard hand side of the channel. (10) Neglected to indicate their course by whistle signal. (11) Those on the Gulf of Suez neglected to comply with arts. 19, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, and 29 of the Collision Regulations, and art. 11 of the Rules for the Navigation of the River Mersey.

By their defence the defendants said:

(1) The defendants deny that the collision and damage . . . were caused or contributed to by the negligent navigation of the steamship Gulf of Suez by the defendants or their servants, but say that the same were solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Gustav by those in charge of her . . . (2) Shortly before 8.30 p.m. (G.M.T.), on the 26th May 1920, the Gulf of Suez, a single-screw steamship of 1607 tons gross register, and 260ft. long, manned by a crew of thirty-three hands all told, and in charge of a duly licensed pilot for the port of Liverpool, whilst on a voyage from the Mediterranean to Manchester with a general cargo, was steaming up the River Mersey on the west side of mid-channel, and was approaching the Seacombe Ferry Stage. The weather was fine but slightly hazy, with a very light S.W. wind and the tide was ebb, of the force of about two knots. The Gulf of Suez was duly exhibiting the regulation masthead and sidelights for a steamship under way, and a fixed stern light and a good look-out was being kept on board of her. The Gulf of Suez, which was steering up river at a speed of nine to ten knots, was heading about S. ½ E. magnetic under slightly starboard helm, to give room to a ferry boat which was bound out from Seacombe Ferry Stage. (3) In these circumstances those in charge of the Gulf of Suez saw a steamship with a tug ahead of her, proceeding out from the direction of the Alfred Dock at a distance of four to five cables, and bearing about two points on the starboard bow of the Gulf of Suez. The hull of the steamship, which proved to be the Gustav, was seen, and also her masthead and red lights. At the same time that the Gustav came into sight one short blast was heard from her. Those in charge of the Gulf of Suez immediately replied with two short blasts, and the helm, which was a-starboard, was kept a-starboard. The Gustav, which slipped her tug about the same time as her first blast was sounded, again sounded a short blast, and those in charge of the Gulf of Suez again sounded two short blasts and put their helm hard-a-starboard and stopped their engines. The Gustav came on at increasing speed, causing great risk of collision, and those in charge of the Gulf of Suez put the engines slow ahead and almost immediately afterwards full ahead, and put their helm hard-a-port to try and swing the vessel clear of the stem of the Gustav, which vessel continued to come on towards the Gulf of Suez, but shortly afterwards the stem of the Gustav struck the starboard side of the Gulf of Suez in the way of the engine-room, causing her such damage that the Gulf of Suez had to be beached. Very shortly before the collision the Gustav dropped her anchor, and three short blasts were sounded on her whistle, but her speed was not reduced before the collision. (4) Those in charge of the Gustav were negligent in the following respects: (a) They did not keep a good look-out; (b) they attempted to pass ahead of the Gulf of Suez and cross the river at a time when it was unsafe for them to do so; (c) they navigated the Gustav across the river at an excessive speed and failed to ease, stop, or reverse their engines in due time or at all; (d) they failed to comply with arts. 27, 28, and 29 of the Collision Regulations; (e) they improperly ported their helm; (f) they failed to starboard their helm.

The facts appear from the judgment of Hill, J.

HILL, J.—The collision took place at 8.30. p.m., Greenwich time on the 26th May 1920 in the River Mersey off Prince's Dock entrance, or perhaps a trifle farther down the river. It was dusk at the time and the two ships were exhibiting lights, but their hulls were visible to one another. The tide was ebb, with a strength of two to two-and-a-half knots. The Gustav, the plaintiffs' ship, is a vessel of 2,259 tons gross and 300 feet long and was in ballast. She had left the Alfred Dock on the Birkenhead side and intended to cross to the east side of mid-river and then turn down for sea. The Gulf of Suez was proceeding up the river for Eastham to the west of mid-river. They sighted one another, both lights and hulls, at about the distance of half a mile while the Gustav was issuing from the dock entrance, and the Gulf of Suez was somewhere off Seacombe. They were in collision some 600 feet or 800 feet off the dock wall on the Liverpool side. At the time of the collision the Gustav was heading about east and nearly athwart the river, and the Gulf of Suez about south, nearly straight up. At the time of the collision the Gustav had not much way as her engines had been reversed and her starboard anchor dropped. The Gulf of Suez engines were working at full ahead, and the engine movements as given in evidence were as follows: The Gustav as she left the dock put her engines at slow and immediately full speed, and was gradually increasing speed as she went. Very shortly before the collision, the master says, when his ship was nearer the Liverpool side—more than half way over towards the Liverpool side than mid-river—the engines were put full speed astern and the starboard anchor was let go. The Gulf of Suez was coming up at a speed which he puts at 9 to 10 knots, so that it would look, by the time from the log, as if it was perhaps rather nearer. She kept her speed for an appreciable time, and then the following was done with the engines: "Stop," then "slow ahead," and then "full ahead." That is the record in the engine log. Some of the evidence put the slow ahead before the stop; but I accept the evidence of the engine-room log. The helm action and helm signals were as follows: The Gustav on leaving the entrance ported a little, to counteract the effect of the ebb tide on her head as she emerged into the tideway, and then gave a short blast. What she did subsequently is not at all clear on the evidence, except that she gave a second short blast; and, according to her documents, she at a later stage ported a point. The log and the deposition of the master practically are in agreement. The log is as follows: "9.25 proceeded into river, sounding one long blast on whistle and shortly afterwards cast off tug (Cairngarth ahead). Before casting off tug, after leaving docks sighted steamship Gulf of Suez coming up river, her starboard side open to our port side, could see her green and masthead light, she being distant about half a mile and five points on our port bow. We were proceeding towards the Liverpool side of river. The Gulf of Suez continued on her course and was coming ahead as if attempting to cross our bow; seeing she was doing this, we sounded one short blast on whistle and altered our course one point to starboard," and so on. According to the evidence of the master, and, I think, the final evidence of the pilot, after the initial porting the helm was steadied and not again altered and was steady at the time when the second short blast was given. A further doubt was cast on the plaintiffs' evidence in the evidence given by the man at the wheel, who, when he was asked how he ported his helm, indicated a movement to starboard, and he also said that he was told after the first porting to steady and that he did steady on the Waterloo Tower. It is left in very grave doubt on the plaintiffs' evidence and documents; but the evidence for the Gulf of Suez is that as far as they could see the starboarding did not have the effect of altering her head, and, therefore, I am inclined to accept the evidence of the master and the pilot of the Gustav, namely, that after the first porting (a slight porting to counteract the tide as the ship's head came into the tideway) the helm was steadied and was not afterwards moved, and that the second short blast was given at a time when the helm was steady. As for the Gulf of Suez, she was already under some starboard helm for the ferry boat when the Gustav was first seen. On hearing a short blast from the Gustav the helm was starboarded, and, on hearing a second blast, hard-a-starboarded, and when the engines were put full ahead after the stop and slow the helm was hard-a-ported. There is a dispute as to the whistle signals given from the Gulf of Suez. The Gulf of Suez says that she gave two short basts in reply to each of the Gustav's one short. The Gustav says she heard only one short, which was given in reply to the Gustav's first one short. On the evidence as a whole, and especially having regard to some of the independent evidence called by the plaintiff, I find that the Gulf of Suez did give two short blasts and gave them twice. She certainly starboarded, and it is probable that she should give two short blasts, and there is positive evidence, apart from the ship herself, that she did, and I find that she did. I should add that as the Gustav was leaving the dock she gave a long warning blast. It is said that she gave one while she was in the dock as well; she certainly gave one which is spoken to in the evidence as she was leaving the dock, and that, apparently, was not heard on board the Gulf of Suez, and it certainly was not reported to the pilot. It is obvious that there was very serious fault somewhere, when two ships sighted one another half a mile distant while they were both on the Cheshire side of the river and so manœuvring as to come into collision within a very short distance of the dock wall on the Liverpool side. It is not seriously disputed that the Gulf of Suez is to blame for failure to take timely action with her helm (assuming that on hearing the short blast of the Gustav she was justified in concluding that the Gustav was going to turn up river under port helm), and was justified in starboarding to give the Gustav more soom for that manœuvre, yet a time came when the Gustav was seen to be continuing to head across river, and when engine action was called for, and when to go astern would have given time to see what the Gustav was really intending. Instead of reversing, what she did was to stop and slow, and then at last full ahead and hard-a-port, to try and throw herself clear. I am advised that the Gulf of Suez was certainly to blame for not reversing, and that fault would equally attach to her whether the two ships were under the crossing rules or whether their conduct was to be judged by good seamanship independently of the rule.

Whether the crossing rule applied or not has been much argued, and the argument for the Gustav is mainly based on treating it as applicable, for it is said that the Gustav did keep her course by keeping a slight port helm to counteract the tide, did get speed by gradually gathering way under engines which were already full ahead, and was bound not to reverse until the point was reached at which a collision was inevitable by the Gulf of Suez alone. Whether the crossing rules apply to ships in the relative positions of the Gustav and the Gulf of Suez depends, in my view, upon the particular facts of the case. I have been referred to The Sunlight (90 L. T. Rep. 32; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 509; (1904) P. 100) and The Llanelly (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 485; 110 L. T. Rep. 269; (1914) P. 40). In my view, it all depends on the distance at which the vessels are from one another at the time when one of them leaves the dock entrance. I am inclined myself to think that these two ships sighting one another at half a mile distance came within the crossing rule. But I think it is very near the line, because it seems to me to depend upon this—do they sight one anothe at such a distance that they can each of them reasonably act under the crossing rule and so avoid the collision? These two ships at half a mile distance seem to me to be very near the line, and I will assume—without finally deciding it—that the crossing rule applied, and I will inquire whether, that being so, the Gustav can escape blame. I have already pointed out that whether one applies the crossing rule or not the Gulf of Suez cannot escape blame. Can the Gustav in this case take the benefit of the crossing rule? As she was leaving the dock entrance, coming out into the tideway—that is, before her definite direction could be apparent to the Gulf of Suez—the Gustav sounded a short blast. At that time she was porting only to counteract the effect of the tide on her head as she left the entrance; she was not taking any course for the Gulf of Suez, nor was she, in my view, directing her course to starboard within the meaning of the rule. I think it was a misleading signal. I was not given any case in which this had been definitely decided; but I think if the reasoning of The Aristocrat (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 1908, P., at p. 19), be looked at it will confirm the view that I have expressed—that when a ship is merely using helm action to counteract the effect of the tide on her heading she is not directing her course either to starboard or to port, as the case may be, and that she is not justified in giving an approaching ship a signal as if she was directing her course one way or another. The Elder Brethren think that it was a very misleading signal and that a prudent navigator on the Gulf of Suez hearing such a signal would rightly conclude that the Gustav was going to direct her course to starboard and turn up river and that she wanted the Gulf of Suez so to understand it—I do not say necessarily turn right up river, but turn on an up-river heading. On the evidence that short blast was repeated without any helm action at all, and therefore, it was doubly misleading. Those signals did mislead the Gulf of Suez, and went far, on the whole, to justify the starboarding of the Gulf of Suez. The Elder Brethren think that a prudent navigator would, in such circumstances, rightly starboard to give more room to the Gustav to carry out the manœuvre of turning up river which the Gustav was indicating by her short blast. The Gustav having given these signals, which are equivalent, in the circumstances, to an intimation that the Gustav was not going to keep her course, I ask myself, Does it lie in the mouth of the Gustav to say that she was bound by the crossing rule and was bound to keep her speed up to the point indicated by the rules? I think not. She has by her fault led the Gulf of Suez into the starboard helm action, and brought about the position in which the obligation to take timely engine action to avoid collision rests upon her as much as upon the Gulf of Suez. And if she had reversed sooner, the collision would have been avoided. I therefore am of opinion that even if it be rightly argued that, notwithstanding the short blast of the Gustav, the Gulf of Suez could have avoided the collision, yet there was continuing fault of the Gustav which herself contributed to the collision.

I therefore hold that both ships by their negligence have brought about this collision, and that they were both to blame.

The plaintiff appealed.

Bateson, K.C. and L. F. C. Darby, for the appellant, contended that the Gustav was justified, while porting to counteract the ebb tide, in giving port helm signals; and that, even if she was wrong in so doing, she did not mislead the pilot of the Gulf of Suez, and was not to blame for the collision. Lord Sterndale, M.R.—This is an appeal from Hill, J. who held both ships to blame for a collision on the Mersey. I am not going into the facts in detail, because he has set them out in his judgment. The plaintiff ship, the Gustav, was coming out of the Alfred Dock on the Birkenhead side. The Gulf of Suez was bound up river, and she was coming along on her proper side, the starboard side, at or just below the Seacombe stage, just off the north-eastern corner of the stage, and about 700ft. out. She was under a slight starboard helm in order to clear a ferry boat that was coming away from the stage. When she first saw the Gustav the Gustav had just cleared the stage in the sense that a vessel which was near the stage was able to see her. She could not see her, she said, when she was actually coming out of the dock, because the stage obscured the view; and, if she could see her clear of the stage from where she was, the Gustav must, I think, have been at that time clear of the dock.

The first question upon those facts is: Did the crossing rule apply to these ships? I agree with Hill, J. that that must always depend upon the distance at which ships see one another. If the Gulf of Suez had only sighted the Gustav just when she was coming out of the dock, and the Gulf of Suez was close up to her, it would be very difficult to say they were crossing courses. I agree also with Hill, J. that it is rather a near thing in this case, but I also agree with him in thinking that the side of the line on which the case falls is that at the time the vessels sighted one another the crossing rule did apply, because at the time when the Gulf of Suez sighted the Gustav, she was clear of the dock and was beginning to cross the river. She would have to cross the river to get on to her right side, if she was going down, as I think she was.

The learned judge has held the Gustav to blame substantially—indeed I think wholly—for giving a misleading signal, and so inducing the Gulf of Suez to do what she did, namely, instead of letting the Gustav cross her, by stopping or coming inside her, she starboarded and went on the Liverpool side of the river, where the collision happened. I think there is no question that the Gulf of Suez was to blame, and, I think, substantially for the reasons that the learned judge has given, but the question is whether the Gustav also was to blame. The learned judge has held her to blame, because she gave a misleading signal, and so produced all or, at any rate, a considerable part of the mischief. What she did was this: When she was just coming out of the dock, of course her starboard bow would be caught by the ebb tide: and she ported a little to counteract the tide, and blew one blast. After that, the learned judge has found she steadied and continued to cross in the same direction. She may have steadied on a little port helm; she may have been carrying a little port helm all the way; but she did not port any more, and she did not alter her direction. She continued to cross the river. It is true that the plaintiffs' documents say that after that first porting to counteract the tide she altered a point under a port helm. The learned judge has accepted the evidence in preference to the documents, and I think in a considerable measure because not only did the witnesses from the Gustav say that they did not alter their course at all, but because the witnesses from the Gulf of Suez say the same; and they say that, whatever helm signals she blew, it was dusk and it was light enough to see the hulls, and they did see she was going across the river, and was not altering her course to starboard. But the pilot and the master both say that on hearing those blasts they thought that she was going up the river, going south, and that she was porting for that purpose. I should have thought the pilot in charge of the Gulf of Suez would have known that it was necessary to port a little on an ebb tide in order to get across the river and to counteract the tide.

It has been strongly maintained by the appellants that the Gustav was quite right in blowing those signals: first, because she was counteracting the tide; and, second, it was right to give a port helm signal, because she was still counteracting the tide, although proceeding in the same direction as that on which she had steadied, and as her helm was then aport. It is not in the view I take of the case necessary to decide the point; but, as at present advised, I do not agree with those contentions; and I only say that I am fortified in that by the opinion of a nautical assessor. I doubt very much whether at the first time she could have been said to be altering her course, because she was not on a course at all: she was merely just correcting her heading. On the second occasion, two justifications are given for giving the second blast: one is that they were, as the learned counsel said, talking to one another, using, as he says, very likely the port helm signal to mean this: not "I am directing my course to starboard" but "I am going to pass you on my port side." Well, I cannot accept that as a justification at all. The regulations have fixed what the meaning of the signal is, and I cannot think that it is right or admissible for masters or pilots to use those signals with a different meaning. If they are in the habit of doing so, and each understands what the other means by the signal, no harm may result, but it does not, in my opinion, make it a proper use of the signal; and I think, in saying that, I am only following what has been said in other cases. It seems to me that the statement in Mr. Stuart Moore's Rules of the Road at Sea on art. 28 is accurate; he says (at p. 60) this with regard to what are called the port and starboard helm signals: "It must be remembered, however, that the first two signals are only for the purpose of indicating that a vessel is, at the moment the signal is given, directing her course to port or starboard. They do not mean that the vessel is going to pass on a particular side; nor that her helm is placed in a particular way; nor that the vessel will continue on the course she is taking." The object of them is to let the vessel which has to manœuvre for the one giving the signals know whether that vessel is altering her course or whether she is not; they are not for the purpose of letting the other vessel know what helm action she may be taking to continue on the same course; that does not matter to the other vessel; she has got to manœuvre for a course, and not for any means which may be taken to preserve the course. As the result in this case of the port helm the Gustav did continue on the same course, according to all the evidence, and in my opinion the second port helm signal was wrong. I am advised that probably the right thing for her to do on both occasions—and I agree with this—if she wanted to call the other vessel's attention at all, was to blow a warning blast to call her attention, and not to blow a signal which indicated that she was doing something that she was not doing. I think that that was a misleading signal in this sense, that it was a signal which had a tendency to mislead, and, if it had in fact misled, of course the learned judge would have been quite correct.

If the old principle of statutory presumption of fault existed, there might be a considerable amount to be said about that signal, but it does not; and, therefore, in order to hold the Gustav to blame for giving that signal, it must be shown not only that it was a misleading signal in the sense that I have mentioned, namely, a signal having a tendency to mislead, but it must be shown that the signal did in fact mislead, and that that misleading was the cause of or a contributing cause to the collision. Now, that is where I think the defendants' case against the Gustav is not established in this case, so far as signal goes. Firstly, the evidence is quite clear from the Gulf of Suez that, although they heard the signals from the Gustav, they saw that she was not altering her course, but was proceeding right across the river; and, secondly, the pilot who was in charge of the Gulf of Suez says quite clearly and distinctly that his manœuvres were not affected by those signals. He said, and so did the master, that they thought the vessel was going to the southward when they heard the whistles; but they discovered long before the collision that she was doing nothing of the sort, for they saw her, as I say, going across the river. He was asked in re-examination these questions: (Q.) One other question: I asked you about the port helm signal that this vessel blew, and what you gathered from it? (A.) Well, I was under the impression that she would still keep on her port helm and go well to the southward." I do not quite know, as I have said, why a Liverpool pilot who knows the necessity of porting a little coming out of the Alfred Dock on an ebb tide to counteract the tide, could have formed that opinion at all; but he says he did. Then the next question is: "Did that impression in your mind have any effect upon your manœuvres?" (A.) "No"—then he goes on—"only that if she wanted to come to starboard she had sufficient room over to port or starboard, whether she was bound south or north." Now, when you introduce after the word "No" something with the words "only that," you expect that there will be some qualification upon the "No"; but those words, to my mind, whatever they mean, that follow the "No," although introduced by the words "only that," do not at all qualify the answer "No"; and the learned counsel appearing for the Gulf of Suez agrees with me that they do not qualify the word "No." So that, in addition to the fact that you have the witnesses from the Gulf of Suez saying that whatever the signals were, they saw she was not altering and was going straight across the river, you have the distinct and positive statement by the man in charge of the navigation of the Gulf of Suez that they did not affect his manœuvres at all. In those circumstances it seems to me quite impossible to say that these signals, although in my opinion they were wrong, were a contributing cause of the collision. The man who is said to have been misled by them says he was not misled by them, in this sense, that he was not led by them into doing anything that he would otherwise have not done; or into not doing anything that he would otherwise have done; his manœuvres were not affected by those signals at all. But there is also another fact, I think, namely, that those signals had been given, before the collision, and their effect was gone quite sufficiently before the collision for the pilot and those on board the Gulf of Suez to have corrected any wrong impression that might have been induced by them. Therefore, on that ground, on which the learned judge held the Gulf of Suez to blame, I regret to say that I cannot agree with him, because it seems to me established by the evidence that they had in fact no misleading effect, whatever their misleading tendency might have been.

But then there is this other point made against the Gustav, with which I do not think the learned judge has dealt. The respondents' counsel, after contending that the crossing rule did not apply, and contending that the signal was misleading, said: Well, put those contentions on one side; assume that the crossing rule did apply; assume that the signal did not mislead; still the Gustav was to blame for not having done something to avoid the collision—namely, stopping and reversing before she did. And the point was this: the Gustav had blown a long warning blast as she came out of the dock, which was heard a very considerable distance. Those on board the Gulf of Suez say they did not hear it, and that is one part of the blame which they sought to attach to the Gustav. They did not specifically allege any fault in her upon the misleading signal in their pleadings, and, although I think the pleadings most likely covered it, it is of importance that there was no such allegation, because it shows the matter was not considered important. After blowing those warning blasts, she came out and blew the two blasts that I have mentioned. The Gulf of Suez blew on two or three occasions the starboard helm signal, and continued to starboard, and was seen by the Gustav to be continuing her starboard helm. The Gustav said that they did not hear any starboard helm signal; they heard a port helm signal from her. Now the learned judge has found, and I think quite rightly, that she never blew a port helm signal, and she did continue to blow starboard helm signals, and the two vessels went on until if not very near to one another they were approaching one another closer when the Gulf of Suez stopped. The Gustav still went on, and the Gulf of Suez then put her engines ahead again, and came round under a hard aport helm, and so the collision happened. What is said against the Gustav is this: They ought to have heard the starboard helm signals—and I should think they ought; I do not know why they did not—and if they heard a vessel blowing a starboard helm signal and going off under a starboard helm in such a way that if their courses were continued they would meet, the Gustav ought to have stopped earlier than she did. Now if I am right in saying that the crossing rule applies, it was the duty of the Gustav to keep her course and speed, and I think it is very important that no rule should be laid down by the court which would throw any burden or give any encouragement to the stand-on ship to alter her course or to act in any way before she is absolutely obliged to do so. The statement of the rule in Mr. Marsden's book seems to be quite correct. This rule is perhaps the most difficult of all the regulations for seamen to adhere to. It must always be a matter of difficulty for the officer in charge of the vessel which has to keep her course and speed to determine when the time has arrived to take action, for if he acts too soon, he may disconcert any action which the other vessel may be about to take to avoid his vessel, and be blamed for so doing, and yet the time may come when he must take action. The precise point when he should cease to keep his course and speed is difficult to determine, and some latitude is allowed him in determining this"—those last words are taken from the judgment of Lord Gorell in The Albano (96 L. T. Rep. 335; 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; (1907) A. C. 193)—"and when it is shown that he was carefully watching the other vessel and endeavouring to do his best to act at the right moment, he will not be held to blame, though it afterwards appears that he waited too long or acted too soon." Those words are taken from the judgments in the Huntsman (104 L. T. Rep. 464; 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 606) and the Ranza (79 L. J. P. 21n). I think it is important that those principles should be attended to.

Now what was the position here? There is distinct evidence from the Gustav to this effect, the pilot of the Gustav is saying that he saw the other vessel starboarding, and then he is asked: "Then did he keep on his starboard helm or did he change it?—(A) He kept on his starboard helm." So that whether the Gustav heard the two blasts or not, she did know the other vessel was under starboard helm. "(Q.) And then what was the next thing? You went on till when?—(A.) Well, until I thought it was time for me to do something to try and avoid a collision; I came full speed astern. (Q.) Up to the time you came full speed astern, could he quite easily have ported and got away under your stern?—(A.) Most decidedly." And I do not know that there is any evidence to displace that.

Then there is another matter of much greater importance than any speculations or calculations or guesses as to time and distance; and that is this. It is found by the learned judge that at the time of the collision the Gustav had hardly any way on her at all; she was going I think about five knots before that. I do not think it is found one way or the other, but there is evidence that not only did she go astern, but she let go her anchor and her anchor held, she had not to pay out any more chain. Both those things show that she must have reversed at quite an appreciable time and distance before the collision, and that she must have done a good deal towards taking her way off, because she had, as the learned judge finds, very little way on; and, secondly, if she had had much way, her anchor would not have held, as it did. I think that is sufficient to show that, giving her the reasonable latitude which it is said she ought to have, she did not delay acting herself too long. It has been laid down over and over again that a stand-on ship is not to act herself so long as the other ship can by her own action avoid the collision. As I have said, there is evidence clear and distinct, and I do not think there is any to the contrary, that up to the time she reversed her engines the other vessel could have avoided the collision by her own action, and I think there is very good ground for saying that when she had once stopped, if she had not put her engines on ahead again there would have been no collision at all.

For these reasons I think that the Gustav was not to blame on that head either, and that the learned judge's judgment should be varied by finding not both vessels to blame, but the Gulf of Suez alone to blame, and I suppose that will carry the costs both here and below.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree, and I think the first question to be determined in this case is whether or not these two vessels were crossing vessels within the meaning of art. 19. The learned judge has found that they were, after some doubt, and I think that he was right in so finding. It appears to me from a survey of the circumstances—the place at which each vessel saw the other, the position in fact which was obvious at that particular moment—that the vessels were crossing within the meaning of the rule so as to involve risk of collision, which indicates a period before the risk has, so to speak, actually matured; a period at which there is a probability that there will be a risk of collision if the precautions are not taken. Therefore to my mind the Gustav intending and proceeding to go across the river from the Birkenhead side, and the other vessel coming up the river, were obviously crossing vessels so as to involve risk of collision. Now it follows from that that there was an obligation under art. 21 upon the Gustav to keep her course and speed, it appears to me that that obligation rested upon her until a period arrived at which it was clear that the collision could not be avoided by the action of the Gulf of Suez alone. I agree entirely with what has fallen from the Master of the Rolls as to the importance of maintaining that rule, and the danger that there would be in giving any latitude to the stand-on vessel, unless the emergency had arisen which allowed her to depart from the rule; and it appears to me, leaving out of account for the moment the further question that arises as to a misleading signal, that if one had merely to consider the question of these vessels crossing, the learned judge has not found that the Gustav under those circumstances took action too late, and it appears to me there is no evidence upon which we ought to come to that finding. On the contrary, in view of the evidence as to what happened when she did take action, and the fact that by the time the collision came about she had almost entirely taken off her way, or at any rate had reduced it very considerably, I think it is impossible to say that the Gustav in that respect was to blame. The only other question is the suggestion that here as between these two vessels the crossing rule must be taken not to have applied, because the Gustav has misled the Gulf of Suez into believing that the Gustav was not crossing but was in fact proceeding in a different direction—namely, up the river, and that raises the question of these signals. For my part on this part of the case I do not think that very much importance ought in any case to be attached to the signals, because both vessels were able to observe one another; it was dusk, not dark, and they both agree they could see each the hull of the other vessel, and what in fact was being done. The Gustav coming out of the dock, in order to obviate the effect of the ebb tide, kept a slight port helm upon the vessel, and, inasmuch as she had put her helm to port, she blew one short blast, meaning, "I am directing my course to starboard," and it is said that that was a wrong use of the signal, because in fact she was not directing her course to starboard, but was keeping straight on. And it is said that in any case it would be a wrong use of the signal, at a time when no alteration was given to the helm at all, in respect of the second blast. It does not appear to me in this case to be necessary to decide that point. I am not saying at all that I differ from the view expressed by the Master of the Rolls and also the result upon it; but I prefer to not decide whether or not it would be a wrong use of the signal if in fact a navigator, whose ship would otherwise be directed, we will say, to port, signalled that he was using his port helm so as to keep the vessel in a direction in which she would not be going if it were not for the use of that port helm. That I do not wish to decide. Nor do I wish to decide a further point that arises, which is this: Whether a use of the signal which is not that and does not mean that which is indicated by the rule is in fact in itself an infringement of the rule. That question may arise, because what the rule says is this: that a vessel shall indicate the course by the following signal, one short blast to mean: "I am directing my course to starboard." Assume that a vessel in the course of navigation does blow one short blast not meaning "I am directing my course to starboard," it may well be said that that is not an infringement of the rule, because the rule only indicates what he shall do if he is directing his course to starboard. I am far from saying that a use of these signals in a manner which is not that which is contemplated by the rules themselves, may not be an error in navigation, and such an error in navigation as to amount to negligence; very likely it may be, all I am suggesting is that it may be a different question, and that, instead of establishing under those circumstances, as one might in the one view, a breach of a statutory obligation, the litigant would have to establish that there was in fact negligence, that is to say, faulty navigation amounting to negligence, on the part of those responsible for the ship. But I leave the matter there, I do not think it is necessary to decide it in this particular case, because the case that is made is that this signal did in fact mislead those responsible for the navigation of the Gulf of Suez, and that must mean in this case the pilot, so as to lead him to believe that the Gustav was not in fact a crossing vessel, and so as, in that way, to prevent the Gustav from relying upon the crossing rule.

I think the answer is, with great respect to the learned judge below, that this signal in this case did not have that effect. I have already pointed out that both vessels were able to see one another, during the whole course of the proceedings, and see what was happening, and it appears to me very difficult to suppose that the helm signal in itself would be sufficient to mislead the navigator of the Gulf of Suez into taking a wrong course. But, quite apart from that, the signal that was given, if it meant anything at all, meant: "I am directing my course to starboard." Well, it might mean anything; it might mean, as the judge himself pointed out, perfectly consistent with this: "I am going to cross this river, but I am going to one of the docks across the river which are south of the landing stage, in which case a port helm would be necessary." It might mean: "I am navigating under port helm to avoid some obstruction" or for some purpose which it is not necessary to state, which he may not see. It may mean, that "I am going," as the judge said, "under big port helm, I am going right up the river." I should have thought it would be a probable measure at that time and in that state of tide, or at any rate a possible measure. But in any case, if in fact there was a doubt, and there were two equally possible—I think one may say equally probable courses—that might be taken under that helm signal, it seems to me that it would have been wrong for the navigator of the Gulf of Suez to make up his mind that it only meant the one thing, namely, that the vessel was going up the river, But, quite apart from that, it appears to me upon the evidence in this particular case the attack on the part of the defendants entirely fails, because I read the evidence of the pilot as a statement that in fact he was not misled. He was asked whether it had any effect upon his manœuvres, and he said, No; and he said, No, it appears to me without any material qualification; and, if that is the true effect of his evidence, it appears to me that there is no evidence upon which the learned judge could find that the action taken by the Gustav had any effect so as to prevent the Gulf of Suez from being responsible for her undoubted and admitted negligence.

I think for these reasons that the appeal should be allowed, and the order should be made as announced by the Master of the Rolls.

YOUNGER, L.J—I am of the same opinion on all the points dealt with and disposed of by my Lord and the Lord Justice.

THE BORRE. (a)

Action in rem — Bail—Solicitors undertaking to provide bail—Purported withdrawal from undertaking—Arrest of ship—Amount of bail—Nature of bail in Admiralty.

A solicitor who indorses upon the writ in an action in rem an undertaking to give bail, thereby securing the immunity of the ship from arrest, undertakes to provide bail in a sum equal to the value of the ship at the time when he enters into the undertaking. This obligation is not affected by subsequent fluctuation in the value of the ship.

A solicitor who has given such an undertaking cannot afterwards withdraw from it, and invite the plaintiff to arrest the ship, and although the plaintiff does so, the solicitor will not necessarily be released from his obligation to provide bail.

Nature of bail in Admiralty considered and contrasted with that of bail given in criminal proceedings.

APPEALS from an order of the assistant registrar directing Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., solicitors, for the owner of the Borre to furnish bail in an amount of 1400*l.*, in pursuance of an undertaking entered into by them in proceedings in rem arising out of a collision between the Borre and the barge Ventnor.

The facts and the arguments of counsel fully appear from the judgment of the President.

April 28.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P. in a written judgment, said:—The parties in this case, which came on for hearing a few days since, are at variance as to an undertaking to put in bail given at the commencement of the proceedings by the solicitors for the defendants, who have been held liable for damages.

Inasmuch as undertakings of the kind in question form part of the usual machinery of the court, and are indeed commonly acted upon as though they were in fact bail bonds and recognised by the court in the rules and in practice as securities proper to be offered to plaintiffs with rights in rem, the controversy is of some importance. Moreover, a considerable amount is at stake.

The plaintiffs, on the 22nd June 1920, issued their writ in an action in rem against the defendants as owners of the steamship Borre to recover damages unliquidated in amount for the sinking in the Thames by the defendants' steamship of the plaintiffs' barge Ventnor with a cargo of meat. The defendants' solicitors on the same day endorsed the writ with an undertaking in common form to enter an appearance and put in bail. The Borre was within this jurisdiction. The plaintiffs' solicitors, in reliance upon the undertaking, refrained, as it was intended they should, from arresting the Borre, and she continued in the owner's service. She suffered damage by collision at sea, and was repaired, but by reason of the collision was reduced in value. She was also affected by the general depreciation in shipping values which has taken place between June 1920 and the present time.

At this date the plaintiffs, with the plaintiffs' advisers, supposed the defendants to be entitled, under the Merchant Shipping Acts, to limit their liability in respect of the collision with the Ventnor. The defendants' advisers probably shared this belief. It was founded on a mistake, so far as at present appears.

The only owner of the Borre at the time of the collision whose identity has been established was shown at the trial of the action to have been in charge of the vessel and directing her navigation at the time of the collision for which the Borre was held solely to blame.

In the belief that the defendants were entitled to limit their liability the parties discussed an amount of bail. The defendants' solicitors suggested 2000*l.* as the amount for which they were bound to find bail, and the plaintiffs' solicitors were ready to accept bail for this sum. Bail, however, was not given, and in March 1921 a correspondence took place which is in existence before me. On the 17th Feb. 1921 the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors: "Our clients inform us that they are unable to make arrangements for the bail in this case, and as the vessel is within the jurisdiction of the court, viz., at Dover, we hereby withdraw our undertaking for bail and you will no doubt arrest the steamer."

The plaintiffs' solicitors replied on the 18th Feb.: "We are in receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, which was received by us late yesterday afternoon, and having regard to the terms thereof, we, as suggested by you, at once arrested this vessel. We had, of course, no option but to arrest the vessel under the circumstances, but at the same time we reserve all our clients' rights under the undertaking for bail given by you."

On the 21st Feb. the defendants' solicitors wrote: "As you were in a position to arrest the vessel, and, in fact, did so, we regard our undertaking as entirely superseded."

The plaintiffs' solicitors on the 23rd Feb. wrote insisting upon their clients' rights under the undertaking. The next day the defendants' solicitors acknowledged receipt of the letter, adding: "As you know quite well, we have acted in accordance with our rights and in the manner which has been approved by the judges of the Admiralty Court on similar occasions."

On the 28th Feb. the plaintiffs' solicitors gave the defendants' solicitors notice that they had learned the true facts as to the value of the ship and the position of the owners relative to limitation of liability, and they added: "With regard to the question of bail, we propose applying by motion to the judge to compel you to fulfil your undertaking. It is needless to say that such a course would be most distasteful to us."

The answer on the 1st March was: "We have no doubt the judge will follow the course which is recognised as the practice of the court in such circumstances."

The Borre was arrested on the 17th Feb., and on the 16th March 1921 was appraised as of a then value of 600*l.*, and the owners, through their solicitors, provided bail in that amount, and the vessel was released. The plaintiffs' solicitors applied on the 12th April by summons for an order "that the defendants' solicitors do forthwith provide good and sufficient bail" pursuant to their undertaking.

Upon the hearing in the registry the correspondence, which evidenced a provisional consent of the plaintiffs to accept bail in 2000*l.*, was read. The assistant registrar also had before him information not on oath as to the opinion of the valuers by whom the appraisement had been made concerning the value of the Borre at the date of the writ. This value was probably not less than 4000*l.*, and was certainly much in excess of 600*l.* or 2000*l.*

Treating the correspondence as evidence of an agreement as to amount of bail, the assistant registrar ordered the defendants' solicitors to complete bail in an amount of 1400*l.* additional to the bail for 600*l.* already given.

Both parties have appealed against the order made in chambers. The defendants' solicitors contend that no order ought to have been made, and the plaintiffs that bail should have been ordered to the full amount of the value of the Borre at the date of the undertaking to put in bail.

Both parties disclaim the suggested agreement for bail in 2000*l.* upon which the order already made depends, and the dispute between them must now be decided without regard to that consideration. For the solicitors, Mr. Langton argued before me that they were entitled to determine their liability under their undertaking as soon as the Borre was identified by them to the plaintiffs as being within the jurisdiction and subject to arrest. He also argued that the arrest which in fact took place operated as a waiver of the plaintiffs' rights under the undertaking. Alternatively, he insisted that the bail given after the arrest and appraisement was available and sufficient to satisfy the undertaking. The case made by Mr. Balloch for the plaintiffs was that the undertaking bound the solicitors to provide bail to the full value of the Borre at the date when it was given, and that it remained in force notwithstanding the subsequent arrest and liberation on bail of the vessel.

Mr. Langton supported his claim to require the arrest of the ship and consequent release of the undertaking by reference to the case of bail given in criminal courts by sureties for the appearance of an accused person to take his trial. I do not think there is a real analogy. The bail in criminal cases is given to secure the due attendance upon justice of the person bailed.

The bail in actions in the Admiralty jurisdiction is given to secure satisfaction of a claim—in full or to a limited amount. The practice as to the surrender or arrest of an accused person and consequent discharge of his sureties is incidental to a different branch of law from that administered here, and throws no light on the matter now in debate.

The first question between the parties is that of the meaning of the undertaking.

Is it an undertaking to produce the ship, and therefore, satisfied if, pending the cause, the ship is offered for arrest under conditions in which arrest can be made? If not, does it require the finding of bail for the value of the vessel at the date when the undertaking is given, or for the value at some subsequent time when the plaintiff or the defendants proceed to an appraisement or inquiry?

To the claim made in February by the defendants' solicitors for release from their undertaking upon their pointing out the Borre in a position in which she could be arrested, there are various substantial objections. They undertook to provide bail, and thereby to secure to the plaintiffs a sum of money. In place of a contingent right over the proceeds of a ship in the custody of the Marshal, they gave the plaintiffs a contingent right over a fund in pounds sterling. To call on the plaintiffs, even at once to resume their former situation, would simply be to undo the transaction of which the undertaking was the pledge. To my mind the proposition that the plaintiffs were bound to submit to such a divestment of their right is unarguable. What is actually sought now is, however, something more, namely, that the plaintiffs should be required to accept the ship as security when her value has become insignificant.

Mr. Langton produced no authority for such a demand, and upon inquiry in the Registry I have not been able to find any case in which the court has given effect to such a demand.

I reject, therefore, the contention that the plaintiffs were bound to re-arrest the Borre and give up the solicitors' undertaking. The undertaking subsisting, the plaintiffs claim that it shall be fulfilled by the filing of a bail bond, so conditioned that if the defendants do not pay what may be adjudged against them in this action, with costs, execution may issue against their sureties for a sum not exceeding the value of the ship. The defendants claim that the value of the ship having been appraised at 600*l.* the bail already given in that amount satisfies the undertaking. There are some objections to this contention which were not argued, and which I shall not discuss. The question debated before me was that of the date at which the value to be limited in the bond is to be ascertained. The obvious answer seems to me to be that the undertaking speaks as of the date when it was given.

A promise on the 22nd June 1920, to give bail to the amount of the value of the Borre, did not mean the value as it was in 1919, or as it should or might be in 1921, but as it then was. To act upon any other view would be to convert into a mere speculation a business transaction which was intended to produce certainty. Cases in which the court has altered the amount of the bail given upon release of a ship relate to error in computation, and do not give any countenance to the suggestion that the liability to give bail for a ship released in an action in rem fluctuates from time to time pending the cause. I hold, therefore, that the undertaking requires by its terms the completion of bail to the amount of the value of the Borre on the 22nd June 1920.

There remains the question whether the plaintiffs have waived their rights under the undertaking. In support of the affirm view reliance was put upon a case in the Court of Common Pleas of Miller v. James (8 Moore C. P. 208). There a solicitor, whose client was sued for debt, undertook to procure the client's signature to a cognovit.

The effect of this acknowledgment of the plaintiff's claim would have been to entitle the plaintiff to sign and proceed to execution in the action if default in payment were made by the defendant. The plaintiff, upon being told by the solicitor that he could not, or would not, procure the cognovit, replied that he would not be severe, and would proceed with his action.

The Court of Common Pleas said the enforcement of the undertaking was a matter of discretion, and that the plaintiff's election to go on with the action was virtually a waiver of his rights against the solicitor.

The question of waiver in the present instance cannot be determined by the authority of the case cited. If there were clear proof that the plaintiffs here had elected to arrest the Borre, and to release the solicitors from their undertaking, Miller v. James (sup.) would be an authority against them. In fact, what the plaintiff did was to arrest the ship with notice to the solicitors that they held them bound by their undertaking. What is to be determined is whether the arrest was so wholly inconsistent with any claim upon the undertaking that once arrest was made the undertaking must be treated as discharged. I think it was not. The ship was the property of the defendants. The undertaking created a personal obligation on the part of the solicitors. The security of the ship, and the security of the undertaking, are not in their nature incompatible.

There was no doubt an implied term of the undertaking that if bail were given no arrest should be made, but the solicitors refused to give bail and invited an arrest. They could not properly do this, and to allow them now to profit by the state of things so brought about would be, in my opinion, substantially unjust.

Additional bail must be given forthwith to make up in all the value of the Borre as on the 22nd June 1920.

If the parties do not agree the amount will be determined in the registry.

THE VIGILANT. (a)

Tug and tow—Towage contract—Rope cast off by tug during performance of contract—Damage to tow—Breach of towage contract—"Improper navigation or management" of the tug—Limitation of tug owners' liability—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503—Merchant Shipping (Limitation of Shipowners and Others Liability) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32).

If a vessel which is being towed under a contract of towage is damaged by reason of the transfer of the towing rope from the engaged tug to another tug, the damage is caused by the improper navigation of the engaged tug, and not by a breach of the contract of towage. The owners of the engaged tug are therefore entitled to limit their liability in accordance with sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60).

ACTION by the owners of the steam tug Vigilant, claiming to limit their liability in accordance with sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners of a fleet of steam tugs, entered into a contract of towage with the owners of the steamship Frey, which involved towing the Frey from the Howden Dock in the Tyne to the Albert Edward Dock. The plaintiffs supplied their tug Vigilant to perform the towage. In the course of the performance of the contract of towage, when the Frey was in proximity to the island pier of the Albert Edward Dock, and under way in the sense that she was a moving vessel, subject to the action of the flow of the river, the Vigilant transferred her tow rope to another tug, the Titan, in order to proceed to the performance of some other contract of towage upon which the plaintiffs were engaged. The Frey came into collision with the island pier, sustaining damage. In a subsequent action by her owners to recover this damage, the present plaintiffs, the owners of the Vigilant, were held liable.

G. P. Langton, for the plaintiffs the owners of the Vigilant.—The damage was caused by the "improper navigation" of the Vigilant, and without the fault or privity of her owners, as required by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In any event the action of the Vigilant is covered by the much wider words "improper navigation or management" of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900, s. 1.

Dumas, for the defendants the owners of the Frey.—The damage did not arise from any act of navigation or management by those in charge of the Vigilant, but was solely caused by a failure to tow, in breach of the contract to do so. The plaintiffs are not entitled to limit their liability in respect of damage caused by a breach of contract:

Wahlberg v. Young, 4 Asp Mar. Law Cas. 27n.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P. (after stating the facts), said:—What is contended on the one hand, is that either under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 or under the combined effect of sect. 503 of that Act and sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900 the plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability on the ground that the damage in question was caused by reason of the "improper navigation" or by reason of the "improper navigation or management" of their ship Vigilant, they not being themselves in actual fault or privity to the negligent or improper navigation.

It is not disputed that for improper navigation of the tug in the act of towage, the tug owners, subject to the statutory restriction of their right to limit their liability, might limit their liability; for example if instead of letting go of the tow rope which held the Frey, the master of the Vigilant had slackened the tow rope, or if he had improperly gone astern on his engines, or had made any other negligent manœuvre in the act of towage. But it is said on behalf of the owners of the Frey, the negligence in this case was not negligence in the act of towing, but rather a breach of contract in failing to tow. The default which is relied upon is the transfer of the tow rope from the Vigilant to the Titan, and, that being so, it is said that there was no longer negligence in towing, but from the moment of the transfer there was a failure to tow, and so a mere breach of contract. Reliance is placed upon the principle enunciated in the case of Wahlberg v. Young (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27n) by Lord Esher (then Brett, J.) who declared (at p. 28): "A mere breach of the towage contract would not bring the case within sect. 54 of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63)." Here it is said that there was a mere breach of the towage contract, and therefore the case does not fall within the sections of the Merchant Shipping Acts now relevant to the limitation of liability. Now it is to be observed that in the Court of Common Pleas in each of the judgments in the case of Wahlberg v. Young (sup.) Lord Coleridge, C.J. and Brett and Archibald, JJ. expressed themselves quite explicitly to the effect that the right to limitation of liability "applies equally whether the damage done be from a breach of contract or from a simple tort." Lord Coleridge stated that proposition in plain words; Lord Esher appears not to have dissented from the proposition; and I understand Archibald, J. to have concurred in the view of the Chief Justice.

It seems to me that what I have to determine here is whether there was something more than a mere breach of contract to tow. Failure to tow at all would have been a clear instance of such a breach. Failure to complete the towage at a time when no act of towage was in process would have been, it seems to me, another mere breach of contract. When I say "No act of towage was in process," I mean when the Frey and the Vigilant were relatively in such positions that each of them could take charge of her own safety, irrespective of the navigation of the other involved in the contract of towage.

It seems to me that this case does not fall within either category which I have just mentioned. The findings upon which the judgment in the main action proceeded were that the tow rope of the Frey was transferred from the Vigilant to the Titan when the towage was proceeding, and the Frey was in motion; when the process of towage, which had brought her to the point at which she had arrived, still had its effect upon her, and when she herself had not control of her own safety which she would have had if the towage had either not been begun or had been interrupted when not in progress.

That being the case, it seems to me that the transfer of the tow rope from the Vigilant to the Titan at a time when the towage was in progress was negligent towage, or an act of negligence in the process of towage, and is so not within the class of acts as to which Lord Esher in his judgment declared that these acts were not within the provision of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, which related to improper navigation.

The view of the matter I take, to put it shortly, is this, that, relatively to the Frey, the Vigilant was engaged in an act of navigation when she transferred the tow rope of the Frey to the Titan: that the performance of that act of navigation was improper, and that by reason of that the conduct of the plaintiffs which is here in question was improper navigation within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts. My own impression of the extended provision of the Act of 1900, which extends the right to limit liability for "improper navigation or management of the ship" is that these words probably do not include the class of case here in question unless the larger and original words "improper navigation" do include it.

In my opinion, the larger words "improper navigation" do include what was done in this case. Therefore I hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability. There will be a decree of limitation, as prayed, with the usual consequences as to costs—namely, that the plaintiffs pay the defendants their costs.

THE TROMP. (a)

Bill of lading — "Shipped in good order and condition"—"Weight quality condition unknown"—Cargo damaged on shipment—Clean bill of lading — Estoppel — Shipper acting as agent of the consignee—Undertaking to indemnify the master.

The description "shipped in good order and condition" when it appears in a bill of lading refers to the outward condition and appearance of the goods. The subsequent description "weight quality condition unknown" refers to the internal condition of the goods not visible to the person who signs the bill. A bill of lading which contains both these expressions is not thereby contradictory in terms.

The plaintiffs agreed to purchase through A. and the B. agency in Sweden potatoes f.o.b. Gothenburg, payment to be made on signing clean bills of lading. A. chartered the Dutch sailing vessel Tromp to carry some of the potatoes to Hull. The plaintiffs subsequently ratified the chartering of the Tromp, and the potatoes were loaded under the supervision of A., whom the plaintiffs authorised to act for them in certain matters connected with the stowage of the cargo. The bags of potatoes were brought to the ship in a wet condition, and the full number described in the bills of lading was not loaded. The master of the Tromp accordingly refused to sign clean bills of lading. On the undertaking of the B. agency, given with the knowledge and approval of A., to indemnify him against the liabilities which he might incur thereby, and acting upon the advice and with the approval of his owners' agents, he ultimately signed clean bills of lading which described the cargo as "shipped in good order and condition . . . weight quality condition unknown." Thereupon payment was made by the plaintiffs in Gothenburg in accordance with the terms of sale. On the arrival of the Tromp at Hull the whole of the cargo was found to be damaged. The plaintiffs accordingly arrested the Tromp in an action for damage to cargo and short delivery, contending that they were indorsees of the bills of lading without notice of the condition of the cargo, and that the defendants were estopped by the admissions contained in the bills from denying that the cargo was shipped in good order and condition. The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were indorsees without notice, saying that A. was the agent of the plaintiffs and that the property in the goods passed to the plaintiffs before shipment.

Held, that A. was not the agent of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were therefore indorsees of the bills of lading without notice, and the property in the potatoes therefore passed to them on the signing of the bills. The defendants were therefore estopped from denying as against them that the potatoes were shipped in good order and condition. The description "shipped in good order and condition" applied to the external condition of the bags which was visible to the master, and was not in contradiction with the subsequent words "weight quality condition unknown." The defendants were liable for the injury to and loss of the potatoes.

ACTION in rem for damage to and short delivery of a cargo of potatoes laden on board the Dutch sailing vessel Tromp.

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs were Messrs. Jefferson and Gosling, who were merchants at Hull. The defendants were the owners of the Tromp.

By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that in May 1920 the Baltic and North Sea Traffic of Gothenburg shipped on board the Tromp, then at Gothenburg, 2923 bags of potatoes and that the master of the Tromp received the same to be carried from Gothenburg to Hull on the terms of bill of lading by which he acknowledged that the potatoes were shipped in good order and condition and agreed to deliver them in the like order at Hull. The Tromp arrived at Hull on the 3rd June 1920, when the potatoes were found to be wet, soft, pulpy, and greatly damaged. The plaintiffs arrested the Tromp and obtained bail.

The defendants by their defence alleged that by charter-party dated the 15th May 1920 the Tromp was chartered by one Appelgren, at Gothenburg, on behalf of the plaintiffs, on whose behalf the freight under the charter-party was paid. The Baltic and North Sea Traffic were the agents of the plaintiffs, and as such agents agreed to hold the master of the Tromp free from all responsibility which might arise from the master having signed the bill of lading, although the number of bags appeared from the mate's receipt to be less by seventy-four than the number stated in the bill of lading, and although the cargo was partly wet and was stowed in the ship by the shippers. The master signed at the request of the Baltic and North Sea Traffic and Appelgren. The charter-party provided that he was to do so. The potatoes were not shipped in good condition. The property in them did not pass to the plaintiffs through the bill of lading, but in accordance with a contract of purchase made about the 20th April 1920 by Appelgren acting on behalf of the plaintiffs. The defendants denied that there had been any breach of their duty as carriers. They further counterclaimed for damages for loss of charter-party by reason of the wrongful arrest of the Tromp by the plaintiffs at Hull on the 11th June 1920, but the counter-claim was abandoned at the trial.

The plaintiffs by their reply denied that Appelgren or the Baltic and North Sea Traffic ever acted as their agents and that the potatoes were their property when shipped.

Stephens, K.C. and Clement Davies for the plaintiffs.—The defendants, by presentation of a clean bill of lading, represented to the plaintiffs that the potatoes were shipped in good order and condition. This representation is not modified by the subsequent words "weight quality condition unknown," which refer to the internal condition of the goods. They are, therefore, estopped from denying the good condition of the potatoes on shipment. The following cases were cited:

Compania Naviera Vasconzaga v. Churchill and Sim, 94 L. T. Rep. 59; (1906) 1 K. B. 237; 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 177;

Martineaus v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 106 L. T. Rep. 638; 17 Com. Cas. 176; 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 190;

Crossfield v. Kyle Shipping Company, 115 L. T. Rep. 285; (1916) 2 K. B. 885; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 190.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Bisschop for the defendants.—The defendants are protected by the words "weight quality condition unknown." The appearance of the words "condition" in both expressions relieves the defendants from any warranty of condition. In the Compania, &c. v. Churchill (sup.) "condition" was opposed to "quality." The words "weight unknown" relieves them of responsibility for short delivery. The facts show that the plaintiffs shipped the potatoes through their agent Appelgren. There can thus be no estoppel. Appelgren was acquainted with the condition of the potatoes. Reliance was placed upon:

The Ida, 32 L. T. Rep. 541; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 551;

Craig v. Delargy, 6 R. 1269;

New Chinese Antimony Company v. Ocean Steamship Company, 117 L. T. Rep. 297; (1917) 2 K. B. 664; 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 131.

Stephens, K.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—The plaintiffs are merchants at Hull and have brought this action against the defendants, the owners of the Dutch sailing vessel Tromp, to enforce a claim in respect of loss and damage alleged to have occurred in course of transit by sea from Gothenburg to Hull on board the Tromp of a cargo of potatoes. The plaintiffs sue as owners of the cargo and as indorsees of a bill of lading. The Tromp was arrested in the suit and in due course released on bail.

The resort of the plaintiffs to the jurisdiction of the court in rem is material to various questions which arose at the hearing. The plaintiffs found their action upon the acknowledgment in the bill of lading of shipment on board the Tromp of 2923 bags of potatoes in good order and condition, and the proved fact that a large part of the potatoes was delivered at Hull, as the statement of claim alleges, "wet, soft, pulpy, rotten and greatly damaged," and a part was not delivered. The defendants put in issue the alleged terms of the bill of lading. They allege also that the plaintiffs were the charterers of the Tromp when the bill of lading was issued, and had by their agents required its issue by the master with knowledge that 2923 bags were not shipped, and that the potatoes shipped were not in good condition, and under an indemnity against liability on the part of the defendants. They further allege that the plaintiffs were the owners before shipment and the shippers of the potatoes, and undertook the stowage of the same, and by their agent so stowed the potatoes that damage ensued upon the voyage. By way of counterclaim the defendants claim substantial damages for the arrest and detention of the vessel and consequent loss of charter. The counter-claim was not seriously maintained. Although the cause of action of the plaintiffs in rem depended upon estoppel as to the state of the potatoes when shipped, and the quality shipped, evidence was given by both parties as to the actual state of the cargo at shipment.

A large proportion of the bags and some part of their contents had become wet in course of inland transit in Sweden, and this wetness was the cause of the damaged condition in which cargo arrived. The state of the cargo was known at the time of shipment to the shippers, to the persons engaged in the delivery and stowage, to the master of the Tromp, and to the defendants' agents in Gothenburg, and all of these persons knew that the potatoes, by reason of the state of the bags, would inevitably arrive at Hull in a damaged condition. They also all knew there was a shortage in quantity.

Assuming the relations of the parties to be governed by English law, and the plaintiffs to have been unaware of what was done in Gothenburg, various courses of action were no doubt open to them. The plaintiffs, however, in order to avail themselves of the power of arrest of the ship under the jurisdiction of the Court in Admiralty elected to proceed against the defendants in rem for alleged default of the defendants as shipowners in course of the carriage of goods by sea. Their success in the action must depend, therefore, upon their right to rely upon an estoppel and to hold the defendants accountable upon a suppositious state of facts. It would obviously be improper as against defendants, brought into the jurisdiction by the arrest of their property, to have regard to possible claims of the plaintiffs other than those in respect of which the action was brought.

The plaintiffs were and are importers and exporters of and dealers in fruit and vegetables. Oscar Theodor Appelgren was a commercial agent at Gothenburg who, before the events here in question, had sold fruit on commission in Sweden and done no other business on account of the plaintiffs.

The Baltic and North Sea Traffic was the name of a Swedish firm carrying on business at Gothenburg, inter alia, as forwarding and shipping agents. I shall call them the Baltic Agency. The potatoes in question were, before shipment, the property of a grower at Saternas, in South Sweden, and were offered for sale and sold on his behalf by one Per Carlander in Stockholm. Carlander supposed that he was selling to the plaintiffs.

In a letter to the Baltic Agency he described the whole parcel as "300,000 kilos potatoes which have been sold to Messrs. Jefferson and Gosling, Hull, by Saternas Eiendam, through Mr. Appelgren, for which parcel according to arrangement you are to pay and forward same to purchasers." Appelgren's authority in the transaction, and the capacity in which he, in fact, conducted it, were much in dispute in the case. The bargain he made with the grower's agent was for delivery f.o.b. at Saternas at a price of 6.50 kroner per 100 kilos payable in cash against bill of lading at Gothenburg after bill of lading had been signed by outward steamer.

Plaintiffs' purchase was at 100 kroner per 100 kilos f.o.b. at Gothenburg.

The matters of fact in dispute included these: When did the plaintiffs become owners of the potatoes? In what capacity and on whose behalf did Appelgren deal with the potatoes? What actual or implied authority had he as agent for the plaintiffs in and about the shipment and dispatch of the goods? Did he charter the defendants' vessel on behalf of the plaintiffs? Did he procure the bill of lading for the goods as plaintiffs' agent? Were the Baltic Agency plaintiffs' agents? And did they, as such agents, procure the bill of lading and agree to indemnify the defendants against claims arising from the condition of the cargo at shipment?

On the 10th April 1920 Appelgren, as the agent of an undisclosed principal, offered to the plaintiffs 300 tons of potatoes f.o.b. Gothenburg, in bags of 50 kilos, at a price inclusive of commission for payment at Gothenburg against inspection certificate and bill of lading.

After inspection of the potatoes by an agent of theirs, who was in Sweden, plaintiffs on the 20th April accepted Appelgren's offer of potatoes at 6.50 kroners per 50 kilos f.o.b., sacks and commission included. The commission to which the contract referred was, as the plaintiffs supposed, a commission payable to Appelgren. Appelgren directed them on the 22nd April that a credit for the price of the potatoes was to be opened in favour of the Baltic Agency at a bank in Gothenburg, and the plaintiffs accordingly, through their bankers, opened a credit with the Scandinaviska Kreditaktiebolegt "for an amount up to 39,000 kroner, to be paid against handing in a full set of bills of lading made out to order and invoice of 300 tons of potatoes, in sacks of 50 kilos each, at the price of 130 kroner per 1000 kilos, or pro rata." It was an implied term of the credit that payment should be made against clean bills of lading, and the plaintiffs supposed that the Baltic Agency were to receive payment as or on behalf of the vendor of the goods. While the plaintiffs' bargain for the potatoes was under negotiation, they telegraphed to Appelgren inquiring whether he could secure a small steamer to convey the potatoes to Hull. He secured space for 70 tons on board a Wilson liner, the Novo, at a rate of freight of 50 kroner per 1000 kilos payable on ship's arrival at Hull, and shipped 67 tons on that vessel. They pressed for dispatch of the remainder, and he telegraphed various statements as to possible mode of shipment. Then on the 15th May he chartered from the agents of the defendants the sailing vessel Tromp, and on the 17th May telegraphed to the plaintiffs: "Only shipping Novo 67 tons: remainder will be shipped Wednesday-Thursday by sailer Tromp." He further telegraphed: "Instruct bank to prepay freight for about 138 tons sailer Tromp, 60 crowns per ton." The defendants telegraphed expressing dissatisfaction, but upon being informed that the Tromp had been secured, and that the potatoes were alongside, they acquiesced in the situation.

At Appelgren's instance they opened a credit at Gothenburg for payment of freight at the specified rate against manifest and receipts. The credit was opened, as Appelgren suggested, in favour of the Baltic Agency.

Upon completing his arrangement for purchase of the potatoes, Appelgren agreed with the Baltic Agency for transport of the same by lighters from Saternas to Gothenburg, and delivery there on board ship. From evidence given by him and by Eric Douglas Franck, an official of the Baltic Agency, it was clear that they and he alike had full knowledge of his position in the business and of his actual relationship to the plaintiffs.

The potatoes were forwarded to Gothenburg in three parcels. The first parcel was shipped on board the Novo in sound condition and discharged sound at Hull. No question arises with regard to them. The cargo of the Tromp consisted of the other two parcels. Before and during the loading of the Tromp the plaintiffs sent to Appelgren telegraphic requests to do a variety of things on their behalf in relation to the shipment. They authorised him to secure tonnage for the potatoes and ratified his action in chartering the Tromp, directed him to insure, to inspect the potatoes as to condition, to see to the stowage and secure efficient ventilation, to direct the master as to the voyage, to promise him a gratuity for good dispatch and to arrange for towage out of Gothenburg and into Hull. They directed him also to instruct the Baltic Agency to consign the Tromp to a firm at Hull, whom they named.

These various directions the plaintiffs apparently gave to Appelgren without any arrangement between them for his acting generally as their agent and in the expectation that he would be ready to carry out their instructions in order to earn his commission. Appelgren chartered the Tromp on the 18th May 1920 to proceed from Helsingborg to Gothenburg, and there load under deck a minimum cargo of 130 tons of potatoes in bags, with liberty to ship a full cargo; freight to be payable in advance on signing bills of lading; stevedores employed by captain to be approved by shippers; the master to sign bills of lading, at any rate, of freight, without prejudice to the charter-party, subject to adjustment in final payment of the freight. Berlind Bersen and Co., of Gothenburg, made the charter on behalf of the owners.

The loading of the Tromp extended over five days, the 21st May to 26th May. On the first day, after loading had gone on some time, the master called the attention of Appelgren and Franck to the wet condition of the bags and refused to be responsible for receiving the potatoes on board. Thereupon Appelgren stated that he was the buyer's agent and would take the responsibility. From that time the loading continued under his supervision, exercised personally, or by Franck. He also, through the Baltic Agency, employed workmen to expedite the work. The ship's log correctly records the master's view of the transaction in these words: "Cargo consisted of potatoes stored in bags which, however, were so wet that the captain protested against having them on board, whereupon the shippers continued the loading at their own responsibility."

The quantity of potatoes delivered at the ship's rail was 2923 bags. From time to time bags which were thought altogether too wet for stowing were put aside to dry. Ultimately 2849 bags were placed in the hold, and seventy-four were returned into lighters.

The facts as to the signature of the bills of lading were much discussed in the case. When the lighters arrived alongside the Tromp on the 29th May, 1920, the manager of the Baltic Agency and Appelgren sought to induce her master to sign bills of lading for the potatoes, although none was on board his vessel. For this purpose Appelgren signed a form of indemnity in the words following: "I hereby agree not to hold you responsible for any damage or loss incurred through your handing over to me clean signed bills of lading for the sailing vessel Tromp for 2923 sacks of potatoes from Gothenburg to Hull, although the said cargo has not yet been shipped." The master of the Tromp refused to sign bills of lading for cargo which was not on board. When the loading of the Tromp was complete the difficulty as to bills of lading became acute.

On the 26th May the master met the Baltic Agency's manager at their office. The Baltic Agency knew that payment of price and freight would only be made at the bank against bills of lading which did not disclose the condition of the cargo. The master knew also that payment of freight would only be made against such bills. His account of what took place at the interview was that when the Baltic Agency produced a clean bill of lading, he started to write his remarks upon it. They told him a clean bill of lading was necessary. Some conversation then took place as to his writing his remarks in the mate's receipt. Then, as he said, they "spoke of an indemnity." The master consulted Berlind Berson and Co., the local agents of his owners. They knew the Baltic Agency, and, as the master stated, "said it was all well," and filled in a form of indemnity to the following effect for signature by the representative of the Baltic Agency: "We hereby undertake to hold Captain Berner and (or) any other concerned free from all responsibility and (or) liability for compensation which may eventually arise owing to his having signed our bills of lading for 2923 bags of potatoes, 140,304 kilos per sailer Tromp, the 26th May 1920, although the mate's receipt states seventy-four bags less in dispute, cargo partly wet and stowed into the ship by the shippers. It is a special agreement that we immediately shall compensate Captain Berner for any deduction in the freight, and (or) compensation for liability which may be made in consequence of the above-mentioned remarks."

This undertaking was duly signed by the representative of the Baltic Agency, and thereupon the making out of the bills of lading proceeded.

The bill of lading in its printed form acknowledged shipment of "in good order and condition by the Baltic and North Sea Traffic of Gothenburg . . . 2923 bags of potatoes, 140,304 kilos . . . to be delivered in the like good order and condition at Hull . . . unto order or assigns, he and they paying freight for the same as per charter-party dated the 15th May 1920, all the terms and exceptions contained in which charter are herewith incorporated."

At the foot of the bill of lading and forming part of its printed contents were the words "quality, condition, and measure unknown." Before authorising the master to sign, the ship's agents added to these qualifying words the word "weight," thereby making the qualifying clause to read, "weight, quality, condition, and measure unknown." As soon as the master of the Tromp had signed the bills of lading, he and the representative of the Baltic Agency went together to the bank, where the purchase money of 2923 bags of potatoes, kr. 18239.32, and the amount of freight of the same kr. 3418.24, was paid them on behalf of the plaintiffs in exchange for the bills of lading and the receipted invoices for goods and freights.

The master of the Tromp admitted upon cross-examination that he knew the bill of lading was untrue as to the quantity and condition of the cargo, and that "it was not all right."

Appelgren was not present on the 26th May, but he knew and approved what was done by the Baltic Agency. They did what he and they had intended. On the following day he learned the exact details of their action.

He discussed with them the fact that the bill of lading acknowledged receipt of 74 bags which had not been shipped, and in respect of potatoes not shipped and wet bags shipped, and he arranged that they should deduct from the vendor's price the value of 350 bags. On the arrival of the Tromp at Hull, in answer to indignant messages from the plaintiffs as to the rotten condition of her cargo, he sent a variety of disingenuous statements, none of which revealed the actual state of affairs. The Baltic Agency was in extreme pecuniary difficulties, but he got from them the amount of his expected profit on the business—5000 or 6000 kroner. They retained for their own use the amount of their account against Appelgren, and the balance of the sum received from the bank remained in their hands as a debt due to the grower of the potatoes, when shortly afterwards they became bankrupt.

The financial position of the Baltic Agency and of Appelgren, and the situation in point of domicile of the various parties concerned are sufficient to explain the election of the plaintiffs to proceed here under the jurisdiction in rem instead of pursuing elsewhere remedies against individuals.

The first matter for decision upon the facts is that of the extent of the estoppel which the bill of lading in question would create in favour of a holder for value, not affected with notice of the circumstances under which it was issued. Counsel for the plaintiffs relied to some extent upon the combined effect of the positive statement "shipped in good order and condition," and the negative statement, "weight, quality, and condition unknown," and suggested a liability on the part of the defendants by reason of the knowledge their agents, in fact, had of the weight of the cargo shipped, and the state of the potatoes at shipment.

To estop the defendants from denying that they knew the facts will not avail, however, to entitle the plaintiffs to judgment in an action where the quantity of the goods shipped and their order and condition at shipment are the first things to be proved. The defendants are not sued for a false pretence of their agents that they did not know anything to the contrary of the statements in the bill of lading. What the plaintiffs need is to estop the defendants from denying that the quantity of potatoes shipped was 2923 bags, and that the 2923 bags were shipped in good order. The bill of lading is to be examined to ascertain whether it makes in plain terms these statements of fact. In my opinion it does. The words "weight and measure unknown" do not qualify the acknowledgment that there were shipped 2923 bags. The words "quality, condition unknown" do not cover the whole area of the representation made by the words. "shipped in good order and condition." The representation made by the bill of lading, including the qualifying words, is that 2923 bags of potatoes were shipped in good order and that the weight, quality, condition and measure of the goods were unknown.

In Compania Naveira Vascongada v. Churchill and Sim (sup.) Channell, J. distinguished the meanings of "condition" and "quality" as those terms are applied to goods, and defined "condition" as referring usually to external appearance. The goods there under consideration consisted of sawn timber. "In good order" and "in good condition" may perhaps have the same meaning when they relate to deals or planks, because the external state of the goods is there apparent. All that appears to the eye upon a shipment of potatoes in bags is the state of the packages. The good order of the shipment and the condition and quality of the goods are, or at any rate may be, separate matters. The defendants, while they guarded themselves by the qualifying words in the bill of lading from making any representation as to the condition and quality of the potatoes shipped on the Tromp made a representation as to the state of the bags. Bags of potatoes in good order are not externally wet. The defendants are estopped from denying that the bags here in question were dry when shipped. The wetness of the bags, which was the main, if not the only, cause of the rotting of the potatoes in the ship's hold, must therefore be attributed to the treatment of the cargo by the defendants' servants after the shipment. As between the defendants and an indorsee of the bill of lading without notice this would give the cause of action relied on by the plaintiffs.

The answer made by the defendants to the plaintiffs' claim—assuming an average decision as to the meaning of the bill of lading—is that the plaintiffs are not in truth indorsees, or indorsees without notice; that they were themselves the charterers of the vessel and the shippers of the cargo; and that they, by their agents, not only knew the state of the potatoes, but knowingly stowed them in wet bags, and agreed to be responsible for any damage which might be thereby caused.

The plaintiffs no doubt ratified the action of Appelgren in chartering the Tromp. They used Appelgren as their agent for a variety of purposes in their efforts to secure careful shipment and careful handling of the goods. I do not find, however, that he bought or shipped the potatoes as their agent. They supposed him to be the seller's agent, paid by a commission for his services in selling goods which they bought f.o.b. at Gothenburg. Shipment was not undertaken by Appelgren on their behalf.

With regard to storage, the terms of the charter-party and the statements of Appelgren were relied upon by the defendants. Clause 4 of the charter-party is in these words: "Vessel to load under inspection as to stowage by the authorised inspector appointed by shippers free of charge to vessel for such inspection. Stevedore employed by captain to be approved by shippers." The plaintiffs did not in fact appoint or request Appelgren to exercise any authority for them under the charter-party. They did not represent him, or, as the phrase is, hold him out as a person who might act for them in this respect. I accept the evidence which shows him to have said to the master and crew of the Tromp that he was the plaintiffs' agent, but I am satisfied that the defendants' master and their agents at Gothenburg did not believe that Appelgren was authorised on behalf of the plaintiffs to ship or sanction the shipment on board the Tromp of potatoes in wet bags. The plaintiffs, in my judgment, are not deprived of any rights they may otherwise have under the bill of lading by any acts done by Appelgren as an agent or pretended agent of theirs.

There remains the question whether the plaintiffs were themselves the shippers of the cargo. The plaintiffs agreed to buy a cargo f.o.b., and to pay against bills of lading and receipted invoices. The defendants by their agents knew the truth of the matter, and that the plaintiffs were not the shippers. This was one of the reasons of their decision to give the bills of lading, which were given only upon receiving a guarantee from the Baltic Agency to protect them from liability for consequences of this improper act. With very full knowledge in relation to the nature of Appelgren's dealings with the plaintiffs' interests, the defendants by their agents corroborated by their bill of lading Appelgren's representation to the plaintiffs that the Baltic Agency was the shipper of the cargo. The plaintiffs did not know, and the defendants ought not, as against them, to be heard to say that the fact was otherwise.

On the whole, I come to the conclusion that within the narrow ground of claim to which the plaintiffs are necessarily limited in this action, they are entitled to judgment, and there must be a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess damages. The plaintiffs will have the costs of their claim, and also of the defendants' counter-claim, which was not persisted in.

PRIZE COURT.

Tuesday, July 13, 1920.

(Before Sir HENRY DUKE, P.)

THE DIRIGO. (a)

Security for costs of appeal—Charging order upon —Priorities—Payment out—Solicitors Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.

Claimants having paid 500*l. into court as security for costs of their appeal to the Privy Council, and having then abandoned the appeal, applied for payment out thereof.*

The Procurator-General then applied for a charging order upon the said 500*l. on the ground that the security ordered in the proceedings before the Prize Court was inadequate and that the costs of those proceedings and of the abandoned appeal would fully absorb both securities. The claimants' solicitors contended that they had in any event a prior claim for their own costs under sect.* 28 of the Solicitors Act 1860.

Held, (1) that the charging order should be granted as prayed; (2) that the solicitors had no prior claim upon the fund, as it had not been "recovered or preserved" by them.

CROSS SUMMONSES adjourned into court.

The facts and contentions fully appear from his Lordship's judgment.

C. R. Dunlop, K.C. for the claimants.

Clement Davies for the Procurator-General.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—In this case there were cross summonses with regard to a sum of 500*l.* which had been paid into court by the claimants under an order of this court as security for the costs of the claimant's proposed appeal to the Privy Council against the judgment of this court.

The appeal has been abandoned, and thereupon the claimants solicitors issued a summons asking for payment out of court of the sum in court subject to the provisions of the costs of the Procurator-General in the abandoned appeal. Following upon that summons, the Procurator-General issued a summons asking for a charging order upon the sum of 500*l.*, subject to his own costs of the appeal, proceeding under the equitable jurisdiction of the court —jurisdiction about which there is, of course, now no question. That is illustrated in Brereton v. Edwards (60 L. T. Rep. 5; (1888) 21 Q. B. Div. 488) to which Mr. Clement Davies called my attention. The principle there laid down is that if the debtor is entitled to property which cannot be reached by fi. fa., or other process of execution at law, the judgment creditor is entitled ex debito justitiæ to an order charging such property with the amount of his judgment debt, and that charge is effective to secure the ultimate payment to him out of the property so charged. It has been said that the power to make that order is a discretionary power, but although the conclusion not to exercise it may arise in cases where the order will not be fruitful, and although the order will not be made contrary to general principles of justice, I take the law to be that a judgment creditor, who is aware of property of his debtor which is immune from legal process of excution, and which can be made the subject of a charging order, is entitled to have such a charging order. I take that to be the general position, subject to such qualifications as those I have referred to.

When the Procurator-General's application for a charging order had been supported before me, Mr. Dunlop, who appeared for the claimants, asked that his clients—the solicitors who were instructing him for the claimants—should be heard to maintain a claim to make the whole of the 500*l.* in the first instance available to secure their costs of the appeal to the Privy Council. The position with regard to the respective claims is this: that, assuming priority is due to the Procurator-General, his taxed costs of the proceedings in this court which remain unpaid will absorb the whole sum remaining after taxation of his Privy Council costs, and there will still be a balance in which the claimant will be indebted to him upon his costs in this court. So that the question is one of priority. The costs of the solicitors in connection with the proceedings in the Privy Council are not very great—they amount to some 50*l.* or 60*l.*—and the fund is obviously available in satisfaction of those costs in priority to the claim of the Procurator-General if the solicitors are properly entitled to have an order made in their favour.

It was because of the form in which the matter was raised at a late stage of the discussion of the question here that I thought it necessary to take time to consider what I ought to do. Owing to the manner in which the question arose there was not an opportunity of referring me to authorities, and I had not the authorities sufficiently clearly in my mind to have a definite view as to what I ought to do. Mr. Dunlop put it first on the ground of lien, and then he put it on the ground of the equitable jurisdiction of the court. Moreover, there is the general principle with regard to costs of solicitors which is often put into operation in decisions of the court. These are to this effect; that where a solicitor has been instrumental in bringing a fund into existence, or in preserving a fund, for a very long period of time it has been the practice of our courts—and not only the practice in equity, but I think it will be found in some decisions in the old common law courts—that the court will protect the interests of its officer who has been so instrumental. What Mr. Dunlop said to me was that although it might be true, as was urged against him, that there could be no lien here by reason that the fund was not in the possession of the solicitor, nevertheless there was an equitable claim upon the fund created or preserved by the exertions of the solicitor. The head of claim has been dealt with for a long time now under sect. 28 of the Solicitors Act of 1860, and the section has fortunately been expounded in numerous decisions. It provides that "In respect of property recovered or preserved in a suit, matter, or proceedings, the court may declare the attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon and to a right of payment out of the property recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such attorney or solicitor for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such suit, matter or proceeding." It is not necessary to refer to numerous decisions; but there are two cases in the Court of Appeal in one of which the solicitor's claim to charge was enforced, and in the other of which it failed—namely, Bulley v. Bulley (38 L. T. Rep. 401; 8 Ch. Div. 479), and Greer v. Young (49 L. T. Rep. 224; 24 Ch. Div. 545). In both of those cases the principle which is applicable was considered, and it was laid down broadly and generally that the right which is either recognised or created under the statute is in the nature of a salvage right, and that what entitles the solicitor to a charge is that the property or fund shall have been recovered or preserved by the instrumentality of the solicitor and have been so recovered or preserved "in the proceedings." It appears from the judgments of the Lords Justices in both these cases, and from other authorities, that, the right being in the nature of a salvage right, the solicitor may recover against the fund beyond the interest of his own client. Bowen, L.J. says in the second of the two cases—Greer v. Young—in interpreting the section: "The section is a very general one. It applies to every case in which a solicitor is employed. It authorises a charge not on the mere interest of the plaintiff, but on all property recovered in the action whatever, for the plaintiff only, or for him in connection with others. It appears clear to me that it is a salvage section. The solicitor is treated as a salvor who has recovered or preserved something in a time of danger by his work and labour." That brings the case to this position, that if I am satisfied on the facts that this fund is brought into being or is preserved by the activity of the solicitor he is entitled to have a charge upon it although there is a claim of his client's opponent which would have absorbed it.

I have to consider here whether this is in truth a fund such as is referred to—"a fund recovered or preserved" by the activity of the solicitor in the proceedings. I have come to the conclusion that it it is not. The fund was ordered to be brought into court as a condition precedent to the prosecution of an appeal at the instance of the Procurator-General. The Procurator-General was the first actor in the matter. The fund was brought into court because the court ordered it to be brought into court. It was not recovered by any activity of the solicitor. His duty was, under the circumstances which then existed, if he could, to defeat the application of the Procurator-General, and to induce the judge who made the order either to make no order, or to make a less order. Now, that is the state of things as to the origin of the fund. What has taken place since has been that the fund has been paid into court—no doubt paid into court by the solicitor, but not paid into court as the result of his exertions on behalf of the parties generally, or of his exertions on behalf of his own client, but paid into court in pursuance of a duty to pay it into court, in course of his professional duty as money entrusted to him by his client for that purpose.

If the fund had been in truth a fund which was recovered or preserved by the activity of the solicitor, and supervening upon that the Procurator-General brought this claim, I should have been glad to have recognised and enforced the claim on the part of the solicitor. But I come to the conclusion, regarding the facts from what I hope is a common-sense point of view, that the solicitor neither recovered nor preserved this fund, and that the equitable jurisdiction of the court does not apply in his favour.

I therefore dismiss the application of the solicitor for charge upon this fund for his costs, and I allow the claim of the Procurator-General for a charging order upon the fund for the balance of the costs of the Procurator-General in the suit in this court. The Procurator-General must have the costs of his application, but I make no order as to any other costs.

THE UNITED STATES (No. 2). (a)

Reprisals Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915—Terms of release of goods—Incidence of (a) insurance and (b) detention expenses.

Goods seized on a neutral ship bound from Copenhagen to New York were decreed to be of enemy origin and to be enemy property, and ordered to be detained till peace or further order. The Attorney-General, on a claim by American claimants, now waived the rights of the Crown in respect of such decree, but claimed that orders for release should be subject to payment of insurance and detention expenses incurred by the marshal.

Held, that the seizure and detention being rightfully made in the course of a voyage begun after the publication of the Reprisals Order, and consequent upon shipment presumably made with knowledge thereof, the proper order was for restitution to claimants subject to payment of expenses of discharge, detention, or sale properly incurred, including costs of insurance.

CLAIMS by American citizens for release.

The facts and contentions are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.), and James Wylie for the Procurator-General.

Raeburn, K.C. and Wilfred Price for the claimants.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—These are three claims by traders domiciled in the United States of America for the release of goods or their proceeds in the custody of the marshal after seizure at sea on board a Danish vessel by His Majesty's naval forces, under the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. A large number of similar claims are outstanding, and these cases have been selected for early disposal in order that the principles generally applicable to such claims may be determined.

Each of the seizures now in question was followed in due course by the issue of a writ in Prize framed under the Reprisals Order claiming—"an order for detention and/or sale of the goods seized being goods of enemy origin or being enemy property on board the steamship United States which sailed from a port other than a German port after the 1st March 1915, and for payment into court of the proceeds of sale of the said goods to be dealt with as the court may in the circumstances deem to be just (if such goods shall not before such order be requisitioned for the use of His Majesty)." In each case at various dates in 1917 the order sought by the writ was made and it was declared in each case that the goods were of enemy origin and were enemy property. The order was for detention until the conclusion of peace, with liberty to the Crown to apply for an order for sale and detention of the proceeds. The form of order was that settled by the President (Sir Samuel Evans) in the United States (American Bead Company and other claimants, ubi sup.). The claimants in all the various cases (these and others) submitted to an order in this form either without appearing or without objection at the hearing.

On the 3rd June last the court was moved on behalf of the present claimants and numerous others that the decrees or orders made in their several cases should be "varied so far as the goods are declared to be enemy property," and for liberty to enter appearance where no appearance had been entered, and to file evidence in support of their claims to ownership of such goods and to have their claims heard and determined by the court. After argument I allowed appearances to be entered and gave directions for delivery of pleadings and exchange of documents, in three selected cases, and for an early hearing, and reserved to the Crown whatever rights were created by the declarations of enemy ownership already made.

At the hearing of the cases now in question, evidence was produced that under the law applicable to mercantile transactions in time of peace—though not under the rules of international law which apply to the passing of property in goods forwarded by sea in time of war—the goods in question were at the time of seizure the property of the respective claimants. The Attorney-General, thereupon, waived the rights of the Crown in respect of the declarations of enemy ownership heretofore made by the court, and consented to orders for release, if the court were satisfied that the claimants were, according to municipal or mercantile law, owners at the time of seizure, but he claimed that any orders for release should be conditional upon payment by the claimants respectively of the necessary expenses of detention. He urged further that the expenses to be paid by the claimants ought to include premiums paid for the insurance of the goods.

The argument for the claimants as to the costs of bringing in, unloading, warehousing, and delivery was that these seizures were self-regarding acts of a belligerent power, not provoked by any previous action of the claimants, or warranted by any infraction of the ordinary rights of belligerents. The expense of such proceedings, it was said, ought not to fall upon neutrals, but ought rather to be borne by the belligerents.

As to insurance premiums, counsel for the claimants relied upon the usual practice in Prize under which in ordinary circumstances expenses which have been incurred for insurance of goods afterwards ordered to be released are not charged upon the goods.

Questions of some difficulty would have arisen if the Procurator-General had insisted upon the declarations of enemy ownership heretofore made in their full possible effect. It would have been necessary to consider, for example, the clauses of the Treaty of Versailles in relation to enemy property situate in the United Kingdom when peace was concluded. Under the circumstances, these matters need not be further examined. It is sufficient to say that the goods were rightly detained and are now to be released.

The question of expenses is to be determined upon consideration of the terms of the Order in Council and with due regard to the settled practice of the court. The claimants in their several statements of claim assert that the detention of their respective parcels of goods was wrongful. It is impossible that I should so hold. The validity of the Order in Council in point of international law has been definitely established in the highest tribunals, and its requirements must be observed in dealing with the present controversy.

The material provisions of the Order are that goods detained thereunder shall be restored at the appointed time upon such terms as this court may deem to be just, and that the practice of the court in its jurisdiction in Prize shall so far as applicable be allowed.

The power of the court as to the incidence of expenses incurred about the seizure, sale, detention, and restitution of goods which come into the custody of the Marshal after capture is complete, and under the Order in Council the power of the court is to be exercised as justice may in each case require. I think this has always been so in the ordinary jurisdiction in Prize. Any general principles which have been stated appear always to have been so applied in the exercise of the discretion of the court as to meet the justice of the particular cases as they arose. The Resolution (ubi sup.) supplies an instance in which captors' and claimants' expenses alike were borne by the Crown upon a requisition of goods seized as prize and afterwards ordered to be released. Reference to The Narcissus (ubi sup.), The Catherine and Anna (ubi sup.), The Industrie (ubi sup.), The Peggy (ubi sup.), and The Asia Grande (ubi sup.) furnish other illustrations of the complete authority of the court to determine the ultimate incidence of expenses incurred in relation to Prize.

Although the goods here in question were not claimed for condemnation, they are in some particulars similarly circumstanced to goods so claimed. They were rightfully seized unladen and detained, and if sold were rightfully sold. Their seizure and detention, where it took place in course of any voyage which began after the publication of the Reprisals Order, was seizure and detention consequent upon shipment presumably made with knowledge of the order and of the measures directed by the Crown to be taken thereunder. Discharge in a British port of goods, within the prohibitions in the order, custody of the marshal, and sale by order of the court if necessity arose, were things which notoriously involve expense — expenses of unlading and warehousing in all cases and expenses of sale in some. On behalf of the Crown it was contended also that in the circumstances of the war, insurance was an expense which no prudent custodian of the merchandise of others would feel at liberty to omit. The question between the Crown and the claimants is whether these expenses ought to be borne by the goods and proceeds now to be released. Whether the matter is considered generally under the Order in Council, or in the light of the practice of the court in prize, the terms upon which it is just that the goods should be released are, in my view, terms of payment by the claimants of the expenses properly and necessarily incurred in the handling of their respective parcels.

As to insurance, it is the fact that under ordinary circumstances goods in the custody of the marshal under a claim of condemnation do not on release bear the expense of insurance, where these have not been incurred by order of the court or at the request of the claimant. This practice results from the relative positions of the captors and the claimant with regard to the property in the goods, and from the obligations properly belonging to the marshal. Goods held by the marshal for an owner who by his own act has subjected his property to detention seem to me, however, to be subject to other considerations. No captor has an interest in them. The marshal is charged with their safe keeping for the sole purpose of eventual restitution. He has incurred expenses of insurance, upon a system recognised in the registry and with the result, as I was reminded by the Attorney-General, that from time to time various claimants have received policy moneys for goods which, without any negligence, had been destroyed, and as to which they would otherwise have suffered a total loss. Insurance was a wise and almost indispensable precaution in these cases in the interest of the owners of the goods. It was in that interest only that insurance was effected. The facts differ widely from those under which the court has refused to charge upon goods seized as prize and afterwards ordered to be released, the cost of insurances effected by or on behalf of captors. In my opinion, it is just that the costs of the insurance here in question should be borne by the owners of the goods, and I direct that it shall be so borne.

Outside of the main question of expenses I was asked on behalf of the Procurator-General for some expression of opinion as to the conditions under which detained goods should ordinarily be released, and, in particular, as to proofs of ownership to be required and precautions proper to be taken to avoid claims by persons not now upon the scene. As to these matters, I do not think it is necessary to say more than that the Procurator-General is under no obligation to consent upon his own responsibility to the release of goods where the title of a claimant is not established to his reasonable satisfaction.

The order proper to be made in each of the three cases before the court is an order for restitution to the several claimants, upon payment in each case of the expenses properly incurred, including costs of insurance, the amount of such expenses in case of dispute to be determined in the registry.

MOTION for a declaration.

The facts of the application are set out in the headnote, and in an affidavit sworn by Viscount Jellicoe, the Commander-in-Chief of the Grand Fleet on the 31st May 1916, which, after setting out the names of the 151 ships and of the commanding officers, proceeded:

On the said date the British Battle Fleet was cruising in the North Sea accompanied by the 3rd Battle Cruiser Squadron, 1st and 2nd Cruiser Squadrons, 4th Light Cruiser Squadron, 4th, 11th, and 12th Flotillas. The 1st and 2nd Battle Cruiser Squadrons, the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd Light Cruiser Squadrons and destroyers from the 1st, 9th, 10th, and 13th Flotillas, supported by the 5th Battle Squadron, were in accordance with my directions scouting to the southward of the Battle Fleet. The Battle Cruiser Fleet was under the command of Earl Beatty (then Vice-Admiral Sir David Beatty), G.C.B., O.M., G.C.V.O., D.S.O., in the Lion.

At 2.20 p.m. reports were received by the Battle Cruiser Fleet which indicated the presence of the enemy and at 2.35 p.m. smoke was sighted to the eastwards. I was immediately informed of this and I proceeded (in the Iron Duke) with the Battle Fleet with its accompanying cruiser and destroyer force at full speed in a S.E. by S. direction to engage the enemy. The Battle Cruiser Fleet on sighting the said smoke altered course to the E. and subsequently to N.E. and the 1st and 3rd Cruiser Squadrons spread to the E., forming a screen for the Battle Cruiser Squadrons and the 5th Battle Squadron.

At 3.30 p.m. line of battle was formed, the 2nd Battle Cruiser Squadron forming astern of the 1st Battle Cruiser Squadron with destroyers of the 13th and 9th Flotilla taking station ahead. A course was then set E.S.E. and the 2nd Light Cruiser Squadron coming up at high speed took station ahead of the battle cruisers. At 3.31 p.m. five enemy battle cruisers were sighted and the E.S.E. course steered caused the Battle Cruiser Fleet to converge slightly upon the enemy. At 3.48 p.m. the action commenced at a range of 18,500 yards. The 5th Battle Squadron, which had conformed to the movements of the Battle Cruiser Fleet, came into action at 4.8 p.m. at a range of 20,000 yards. The Battle Cruiser Fleet was then steering a course S.S.E. parallel to the enemy. At 4.1 p.m. Nestor, Nomad, Nicator, Narborough, Pelican, Petard, Obdurate, and Nerissa of the 13th Flotilla, Moorsom and Morris of the 10th Flotilla, and Turbulent and Termagant of the 8th Flotilla, moved out to attack the enemy with torpedoes and intercepted an enemy force of one light cruiser and fifteen destroyers. After a fierce engagement the British destroyers returned, having compelled the enemy force to retire on their battle cruisers with a loss of two destroyers sunk. Nestor, Nomad, Nicator, Moorsom, Petard, Nerissa, Turbulent, and Termagant pressed home the attack against the enemy battle cruisers.

From 4.1 p.m. to 4.43 p.m. the action raged fiercely, and at 4.18 p.m. one of the enemy vessels was seen to be in flames. At 4.38 p.m. the enemy battle fleet was reported ahead and was sighted in a S.E. direction at 4.42 p.m. The course of the British Battle Cruiser Fleet and 5th Battle Squadron was then altered 16 points to starboard and the said Fleet proceeded on a northerly course. The enemy cruisers shortly afterwards altering course the battle continued. Between 5 and 6 p.m. the battle continued on a northerly course at a range of about 14,000 yards, the enemy receiving severe punishment. At 5.35 p.m. the course steered was N.N.E., the enemy gradually hauling to the eastward. At this time the British Battle Fleet lay N. 16 W. from the Battle Cruiser Fleet and at 5.56 p.m. the leading battle ships of the British Battle Fleet were sighted by the Battle Cruiser Fleet. The battle cruisers then formed ahead of the Battle Fleet.

The Battle Fleet came into action at 6.17 p.m., and the enemy was engaged intermittently by the ships of the Grand Fleet till 8.20 p.m., at ranges between 9000 and 12,000 yards. During this time the British Battle Fleet made alterations of course from S.E. to S. and to S.W. and W., the enemy constantly turning away, being evidently anxious to avoid further action in view of the loss that he had sustained. At 7.20 p.m. the 4th Light Cruiser Squadron made an attack upon enemy destroyers, and at 8.18 p.m. they supported the 11th Flotilla in a similar attack. At 9 p.m. the enemy was entirely out of sight, but during the night attacks were made by the 4th, 11th, and 12th Flotillas upon the enemy, and at 10.30 p.m. the 2nd Light Cruiser Squadron in rear of the Battle Fleet was engaged in close action with an enemy's force of light cruisers.

At daylight on the 1st June 1916 the Grand Fleet, being then to the S. and W. of Horn Reef, turned to the N. to search for enemy vessels and remained in the vicinity of the battlefield near the line of approach to German ports until 10 a.m., and at 1.15 p.m. no sign of the enemy fleet being seen, the British Fleet returned to port.

During the said engagement the following enemy vessels were destroyed: Lutzow, Pommern, Wiesbaden, Rostock, Elbing, Frauenlob, V. 4, V. 27, V. 29, V. 48, S. 35. There were on board the said enemy vessels, at the beginning of the engagement 4537 persons in all distributed as follows:—

Ship.	Number on Board.
Lutzow	1450
Pommern	839
Wiesbaden	500
Rostock	480
Elbing	460
Frauenlob	350
Destroyers V. 4	85

The destruction of the aforesaid German vessels was solely effected by the combined action of the ships of the Grand Fleet under my command . . . no other ship or vessel being present or assisting thereat.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—The circumstances of the naval action which is the subject of this motion, have been referred to by counsel, and the duty of the court is merely ministerial. It is to ascertain what amount of prize bounty is due in respect of the action, and what ships were engaged in it.

The admiration and gratitude of the nation have been properly expressed by those whose duty it is to express them. The gallant Admiral, whose affidavit has been read, and all who served under him, have received the thanks of His Majesty and of the Legislature. It is only necessary for me to say that I find and decree that the Battle of Jutland was the common engagement and enterprise of the 151 ships of the Grand Fleet, and that is a decree in which those who represent the whole of the Fleet concur. The prize bounty which is due under the regulations is 22,685*l.*

All I desire to add of my own motion is that the record of these proceedings will be one of the most cherished documents in the archives of this court.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—In this case the Crown claims the condemnation of the motor schooner Twee Ambt, and her cargo of coffee, on the ground that when she was captured in the port of Freetown in Sierra Leone she was on her way to the port of Stettin in Germany.

The ship is registered under the Dutch flag, and is owned by a company all of whose members are Dutch. The cargo is the produce of the Dutch colony of Java, grown upon a great number of estates in Java, and shipped on board the Twee Ambt under circumstances which can be very shortly stated.

In the years 1916 and 1917 there had been established by acts of His Majesty's Government, and with the concurrence to a considerable degree of neutral States and of neutral merchants, a system of control of the import of coffee into Holland, and the control had become continuously more stringent. Holland had been the entrepot through which supplies of coffee had passed in very large quantities into Germany when the German ports were closed, or practically closed, to direct overseas traffic by the action of His Majesty's Navy. For some time the legitimate activity of merchants in Holland in colonial produce from the colonies of their own country, and in colonial products of other countries, had been employed for the purpose of supplying to the German market, and to the German Government, the supplies of coffee which could not be directly obtained. Statistical evidence has been put before me which shows that during a considerable period of the war there was a great volume of trade in coffee proceeding from the Dutch ports and over the Dutch frontier. That had become progressively more restricted. There had been a limitation of the import of coffee into Holland, and there had been a limitation of the export of coffee from Holland. The Dutch Government had enacted, at the time which is material in this case, an absolute prohibition of export of coffee from Holland into Germany. Not only so, but the overseas trade with Holland by arrangements made between the Netherlands Overseas Trust and His Majesty's Government had been brought—as well as trade could be brought—into a neutral condition.

I have seen no case during the short period that I have sat in this court in which the Netherlands Overseas Trust has failed to discharge to the best of its ability the obligation it had undertaken towards His Majesty's Government for the maintenance of the neutral character of Holland's trade. It is material in this case that the Netherlands Overseas Trust had had no inconsiderable part in the authorisation, and in the organised control of, the adventure which is here in question, so far as it was a legitimate adventure. At the time in question, the import of coffee into Holland overseas had been reduced, so far as Java was concerned, to something like 30 per cent. of its normal volume, and the export from Holland of all coffee, as I have said, had been stopped by the Dutch Government. In these circumstances there was a condition almost of desperation among the planters of Java with regard to the coffee trade. Their produce could not come forward to the ports; there was a restriction upon forwarding; and there was another very serious factor in the business aspect of the matter—namely, that in the Javanese ports at the time in question it was almost impossible to obtain transport. The available transport of the mercantile marine world had been greatly reduced and produce lay—as appears from the correspondence in this case—awaiting transport for periods which tended to reduce and, in some cases, to destroy its value. That was broadly the state of things in Holland and in Java, and in the relations between the Dutch Government and the Dutch mercantile community, through the Netherlands Overseas Trust, and His Majesty's Government, at the time when the adventure here in question was undertaken in the summer of 1917.

The coffee trade of Java was carried on in a manner which it is desirable perhaps very shortly to state. The planters were, and apparently are, financed to a considerable extent by great mercantile firms in the home country—namely, Holland. Advances are made for the production of the crops. Those advances continue up to the time of the shipment of the crops, and in the normal course the Javanese planter is engaged in a joint enterprise, when his crops come to hand and are ready for shipment, with the great mercantile houses in Holland who finance, and in a considerable degree control, the trade of Java in coffee. Three of those houses are concerned in these present proceedings. I need not enumerate the very great body of planters who are concerned. They have put in their separate claims, but the litigation has been directed quite obviously by three large Amsterdam houses, and chiefly by the Koloniale Bank at Amsterdam, by reason of the fact that the mercantile transactions of the planters were in the hands of those houses in Amsterdam.

That being the state of the case, in 1917 coffee was lying ready for shipment, and, to a limited amount, coffee could come forward for shipment. Shipping could not be found, but with great difficulty the Amsterdam houses made an arrangement—an arrangement initiated in the first instance by the Koloniale Bank—whereby the Twee Ambt, which had found her way to Java and was in some difficulties there, was made available for the transport of that limited quantity of coffee for which transport could be arranged. The Koloniale Bank, not having supplies of coffee in sight which would completely load the Twee Ambt, communicated with some of the other houses—two of the other houses in particular who are here concerned—and ultimately between them they found cargoes sufficient to load this vessel. Communications then took place between Java and Amsterdam, and the responsible people in Amsterdam, in the first instance, met the proposal to load the Twee Ambt by a statement that it would be either impossible or illegal to do so. There were further communications between the mercantile houses and the Netherlands Overseas Trust, and, after a delay, the enterprise of forwarding the cargo of Javanese coffee on board the Twee Ambt was accepted by the managers of the Netherlands Overseas Trust as a transaction for which they would become responsible. It is not immaterial to observe that one of the most prominent of the business men who were engaged in the concern—a gentleman who was called here before me, a banker of Amsterdam—was a very active member of the governing council of the Netherlands Overseas Trust. Arrangements were made for the transport of the cargo to Amsterdam, within the restrictions which had been established by His Majesty's Government, by the Dutch Government and by the Netherlands Overseas Trust. Having arrived at that stage, the persons in charge of the business got into communication with the naval authorities of this country; they notified the naval authorities of the intended voyage and the whole facts of the case, and they secured the sanction of the naval authorities for the voyage in question and had a route mapped out upon which they had to dispatch their ship, and upon which they did dispatch her. They were to make their voyage to Freetown, calling there for examination by the British authorities; to proceed from Freetown to the North Atlantic, round by the north coast of Scotland, coming down to the North Sea, and by that route making their way to Rotterdam. So far as the business people in this case are concerned—apart from two whom I will mention presently—that programme was not only mapped out, but it was entered on, and it was at all times intended honestly to be carried out. In that state of the case the vessel sailed on an authorised voyage with an authorised cargo of coffee for import into Holland. During that part of the voyage which brought the vessel to Freetown there were some very extraordinary happenings. The master was a young man of thirty, whose history perhaps illustrates the difficulty there was during the later periods of the war in obtaining trustworthy commanders for merchant ships in remote, and especially in tropical, countries. It seems to me that the master was probably as untrustworthy a master as the owners could well have obtained.

I dare say that he was the best man that those on the spot could get. But it is evident that he was a man entirely reckless, that he had not much self-respect, not much regard for his duty, and apparently not much regard for the interests of his owners; and he had very little conception of the manner in which a sensible shipmaster maintains his proper relations with his crew. I dare say it may be true that crews shipped, as the crew of this vessel was, are found not to be the best specimens of seamen. One of the witnesses said that crews shipped in the way in which this crew was shipped are always found drunk. Be that as it may, the master and the crew were frequently at variance long before the vessel got to Freetown. There were various causes for it—it is unnecessary to examine them—but there were violent personal differences between the master and the crew. While the undoubted conduct of the master must be given its true effect, absolute confidence cannot be reposed, it seems to me, in the statements of people who confess themselves his enemies and who had very serious grievances against him.

When the vessel had arrived at Freetown and was under the supervision of the naval authorities there, the master found his way ashore. He had not provided the crew with means of satisfying their favourite inclination—that for strong drink. Apparently they had had no advances, and that was one cause of difference between him and them. But he himself found his way ashore, and in drinking saloons in Freetown he was guilty of some extraordinary conduct. It was there that the master made known, in the course of conversation, and in the presence of various people, that he had been minded, and probably was then minded, to take the Twee Ambt to a German port. It was because of statements of the master—not of the crew, I think—that this matter originally came to be taken in hand by the naval authorities and the port authorities at Freetown. When the master had made his unguarded statements with relation to the war, and his views with regard to his ship and what he might do with her, the crew came to be examined, and the crew—which was, I think, in a semi-mutinous condition, and, at all events, was wholly at variance with the master and not under the ordinary control of the master—related to the British authorities at Freetown the happenings there had been in the course of the voyage so far as it had gone. It appeared—and I am satisfied that it was the case—that when the master was a few days out from the Javanese port he had seriously approached members of the crew to sound them as to whether they would engage with him in a barratrous enterprise of taking the vessel to Germany with her cargo. That, to my mind, is the serious element in this case. The crew—every man of them—refused to be parties to any such undertaking, and that, in my opinion, is a material fact. If this had been a case where the crew had entered into the design of the master, very different considerations would, according to my view of the facts, have arisen. The crew repelled the suggestions of the master, and they were at increasing variance with him until they arrived at Freetown, and at Freetown they disclosed all he had said to them.

It is alleged against the crew that they disclosed more than the master had said to them, but their evidence raised a case against him which, to my mind, is not satisfactorily displaced so far as he is concerned, to the effect that he had conceived—and that he entertained—the design of taking this vessel, if he found his way to do so, to a German port. He was called at Freetown—he was examined here afterwards—and he made a variety of frivolous statements as to these allegations against him, which are as grave almost as could be made against a shipmaster. They were allegations that he had engaged in a scheme of barratrous conduct, which would not merely result in the dishonest expropriation of his owners' property, but conduct which, if it were carried to its intended issue, must have resulted in the forfeiture of their ship and of the forfeiture of the goods she was carrying. These allegations are not displaced by the owners' evidence. That was the situation, and that is my view of the facts at the time of the inquiry at Freetown, and I have to consider what results from that conclusion.

It is said for the Procurator-General that what is established is that the destination of this vessel while she was in the port of Freetown was the enemy port of Stettin, and I have to consider whether that is the fact. I am inclined at present—it is not necessary to examine the subject with minute care in view of my general conclusions—but I am inclined to take the view that if in fact the destination of this ship while she was at Freetown was Stettin, I ought to condemn this ship and cargo. I will not discuss this matter at length; but it is true that in a variety of decisions in Prize innocent owners of ships and cargoes have been involved, by reason of their confidence in the ship's master and the nature of his employment, in a liability to condemnation arising out of his acts. There are a variety of cases which may be referred to in this connection. I examined them quite recently in the group of cases known as The Kim, The Alfred Nobel, and The Björnstjerne Björnson (ubi sup.).

It is said by Mr. Bevan that once it is found that the master of a vessel has the intention to take his ship to an enemy destination in such a way as to subject it to condemnation, the vessel is subject to condemnation. Mr. Bevan read from The Louisiana (ubi sup.) this passage: "It is the intention of the person who is in a position to control the destination which is really material." I am bound by the decision of the Privy Council in The Louisiana to its full extent, and I should not for a moment shrink from applying it, but I have to consider what it means. It is one of many decisions relating to a variety of cases in which owners of ships and of cargoes may become liable, beyond their own intention, for conduct of their agent, the master. There are a great variety of cases—it is unnecessary to recapitulate them—but the most extreme case which is within my recollection is that in which the owners were held liable in the condemnation of their vessel by reason that the master against his will had been compelled to engage in the unneutral undertaking of carrying enemy forces and enemy papers. Cases of that kind, and cases such as those to which Mr. Bevan referred, e.g., The Panaghia Rhomba (ubi sup.) in particular, where the ship and the cargo had been held liable to condemnation, notwithstanding absence of proof of knowledge on the part of the owners of ship or cargo, where it was found that the ship had been engaged in an actual breach of blockade, are those which I am asked to apply, together with what is said to be the principle stated in the passage to which I have referred from the judgment in The Louisiana (ubi sup.) to the facts of the present case. How does the matter really stand? I will examine what ground there is, apart from dicta in prize law, for condemning the owners of this ship and the cargo. The owners are a body of mercantile men—neutrals—who engaged, with the sanction of His Majesty's Government, in a neutral undertaking, the conditions of which, imposed by His Majesty's Government, they carried out with scrupulous regularity. That is the position of the owners, and I accept—it has hardly been challenged on the part of the Crown—the evidence presented by the shipowners and the cargo owners with regard to their conduct in this case, and their intentions. That is the position of the shipowners and the cargo owners. If I condemn the ship or the cargo, I must condemn them because of acts which the owners did not in fact authorise, and which were so far outside the authority of their agent, the master, that they would be, so far as they are established, criminal acts on his part.

It is quite true that in some Prize cases passages will be found in which it is said that although the act done was an act of barratry, nevertheless the ship and the cargo must pay the penalty. But in every case, so far as I am aware, the penalty was incurred only by the act done. I have to consider whether upon the broadest views of the authorities there was an act done here which subjects this vessel and her cargo to condemnation. What was done by the master was to conceive, and to take steps at sea—between Batavia, the Javanese port, and Freetown—to ascertain the views of members of his crew as to engaging in, a barratrous enterprise. That was what was done, accepting the evidence of the Crown at its full value. Now does that constitute such an act as renders it necessary in this court to condemn the ship and cargo? Of course they both stand on the same footing. In my judgment, it does not. The design of the master, however criminal it might have been, was never carried into practical effect. There is no overt act on the part of the ship which warrants my saying that this ship had been brought into the prosecution of an unneutral undertaking. She was on her authorised voyage, and she was subjected, in due course, to the control which the British authorities had provided for her. In my opinion there is no evidence which would warrant me in saying that at Freetown the master entertained the design at all costs of going to Stettin; I think it was in contemplation and was not a design definitely adopted; and I am satisfied, as a matter of fact, upon the proofs before me, that the master never could have carried the crew with him in any undertaking of that kind; and so, in point of fact, I say that whatever the criminal design or the criminal wishes of the master, and however unneutral the mind of the master, he never was in a position to carry his designs into execution, he never in fact began to carry them into execution, and he never could have carried them into execution.

Those, broadly, are the grounds on which, in my opinion, it would be wrong to say that this ship was in fact, when she was in the port of Freetown, destined for Stettin. I hold, therefore, that she was destined for Rotterdam, that Rotterdam was her destination in intention and also in fact on the part of the only persons who had the power to carry out their intentions, and I am satisfied that she would have duly arrived at Rotterdam.

propose, therefore, to decree the release of the ship and the cargo.

THE NEW SWEDEN. (a)

Prize—Mails of a neutral State—Seizure—Transmission of mails by rail for examination—Damage by fire during transmission—Liability of captor—Duty to insure—Order in Council of the 11th March 1915.

Certain parcels of goods of enemy origin and enemy property were consigned per the Swedish parcels mails to the claimants who were domiciled in New York. The postal bags containing these packages were seized at the port of K. under the provisions of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. Eventually the bags came into the hands of the post office authorities at K., who sent them by rail to the censor of parcel post in London, there being no facilities for the examination of the postal bags at K. On the railway journey some of the goods were destroyed or injured by fire. Those packages which were delivered in London were seized and in due course sold, the net proceeds being subsequently paid to the claimants. The claimants sought to recover from the Procurator-General the loss of that part of the consignment which had been affected by the fire, contending that the captors had failed to exercise due care in the control of the goods; in sending them to London they had caused a deviation in the voyage which avoided the existing insurances upon them, and they had failed to hand them over to the Marshal, as provided by the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, by whom they would have been insured.

Held, that the decision in The United States (No. 2) (ante, p. 344; (125 L. T. Rep. 446; (1920) P. 430) does not imply in the duty of the captors to take reasonable care, an obligation to insure. The captors did not fail in their duty to take care of the goods in their custody when they forwarded the mail bags to London, as there were no facilities for examining mails at K. The Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 does not require that seized goods should be placed in the custody of the Marshal as soon as they are brought into port, nor at any particular time. In the present case, it could not have been done until after examination, whether the goods were subject to seizure or not. In so far as this Order in Council is concerned, it is doubtful whether any breach of duty on the part of public officers as between themselves and the Crown, concerning a matter of administrative instruction, will give a cause of action to foreign owners of goods.

CLAIM to recover from the Procurator-General damages for loss and injury of goods whilst in the custody of captors. The facts and arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgment.

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument:

The Sudmark (No. 2), 118 L. T. Rep. 383; 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 201; (1918) A. C. 475.

Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—This is the claim of a firm called Topken Company, having a commercial domicile in New York, to recover damages from the Procurator-General on behalf of the claimants in respect of destruction and damage by fire, which they suffered in relation to 113 packages, containing gloves of European, apparently German, manufacture, which had been seized in the parcels mail on board the Swedish vessel New Sweden on the way from Scandinavian ports to the United States. This raises some questions of principle quite novel in a good many circumstances. I heard the matter very ably argued, and, in order that I might avoid any hasty expressions of opinion, I desired to have an opportunity of carefully reading the Order in Council as to its administration with regard to the facts of this case.

The state of the case was this: On the 13th May 1916 the New Sweden called at Kirkwall in the course of her voyage by reason of the existence at that time of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 and the embargo or prohibition which His Majesty, as a belligerant of war, had found it necessary to put on commerce between Germany and neutral states, for reasons which did not appear in the hearing of this case, and which are immaterial here. It appeared to those who made the necessary examination, under the Order in Council, of the cargo from Sweden there was reason to believe that among the postal bags which were on board, it might be there were some which contained goods liable to detention under the Order in Council, and which had been forwarded in the Swedish post for the purpose of avoiding detention. The belief, in fact, proved well founded, for goods comprised in thirty or forty consignments, which were among the postal packages, have formed the subject of proceedings in this court by writ under the Order in Council. As to, I think, the whole of these consignments, and certainly with regard to the 113 packages of gloves which are here in question, there is a decree of the court made in an action relating to these consignments, which has not been the subject of any appeal, whereby it is declared that the packages in question, together with other consignments comprised in the writ, were of enemy origin and enemy property, and so they became subject to detention under the Order in Council until the end of the war. The decree went on to direct that the packages should remain in the custody of the court. The 157 postal bags, taken possession of by the authority of the Crown at Kirkwall on the 16th May, were corded and sealed. The seals of international mails were not broken by any authority, and the Surveyor of Customs, upon receiving these 157 postal bags from the naval authorities, handed them over, as he received them, to the authorities of His Majesty's post office, for delivery to the censor of parcels post in London. They were duly despatched, and it was in course of the despatch under the care of H.M. Postmaster-General that these Swedish mail bags met with an extraordinary accident, which has never been explained. While the train was on its way southward on the Highland Railway, a fire broke out in the van in which these postal bags were, and destruction and damage to a considerable extent was done among the 113 parcels of goods which are the subject of the present application. The fire was extinguished, and on the 19th May the appointed surveyor of customs, Mr. Rogers, who had been nominated to supervise the examination of parcel goods of neutral mails sent to London for examination, taking account of facts revealed on examination of the packages here in question and numerous other packages, seized them as prize to the use of His Majesty. The schedule to Mr. Roger's affidavit represented the thirty-three consignments which were so seized in those of the mailbags which escaped destruction. Of the 157 forwarded, only sixty-two were discharged into the custody of the Customs in London, and the parcels in question were part of the contents of the sixty-two. The surveyor of customs in London who had been appointed to superintend the examination of the parcels, and, following the examination, to deal with matters of fact, on the 9th June, when the examination was complete, having seized these parcels, placed them in the custody of the Marshal of the court. The fire occurred when the packages were in the custody of the "captor," using the generic distinction "captor" as relating to all the persons acting under the authority of the Crown in the seizure, and detention of the goods, when he placed them in the custody of the Marshal. The claim, which is a claim for damages suffered by these goods, is made both under general prize law and under the terms of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915.

It is necessary to consider what the position of the Procurator-General is in this case, he being sought to be made liable for damages. In the decision which governs the matter he must be held liable if there has been misconduct or some neglect on the part of persons who handled these goods on behalf of the Crown, either in the act of seizure or during the period of detention—he must answer in respect of all persons acting in the capacity of captor. So that a claim founded on prize law must be founded, as I think, on some allegation of misconduct or neglect of the captor. It was long ago decided that a captor, by virtue of his belligerent right of capture, is not an insurer. It was not contended otherwise by Mr. Raeburn for the claimant, but Mr. Raeburn could not resist the temptation to examine the possible effect upon prize law of a case which came to be decided in this court last year with regard to the liabilities which are imposed upon goods which are brought into prize by virtue of the operation of the Order in Council of March 1915. In the case of the United States (No. 2) (sup.), to which Mr. Raeburn referred, it was determined that the Marshal of the Court, who had received into his custody goods seized and detained under the Order in Council, must be reimbursed in respect of costs which he had incurred for insurance. He drew attention to the decision in that case as one which might affect the obligations of a captor, and which I think might affect the obligations of the Marshal. I have only to say that the decision in the case of the United States does not relate to general prize law at all, and does not purport in any way to modify the Order in Council of March 1915 and the well-established doctrine that the captor of the goods is not an insurer and is under no obligation to insure. It deals with expenditure which, in cases under the Order in Council, had been made by the Marshal, and decides that the expenditure was reasonably made. It may be at some future time the question may arise whether the Marshal is under an obligation to make expenditure which has been held to be reasonable in some cases. That question does not arise here. It is enough to exclude it in this case, to say that the facts in the question here occurred years before the decision in the case of the United States, No. 2 (sup.), but, if they had subsequently occurred, my own view is there is no enlargement of the obligation of the captor and there was no duty upon the Marshal to insure in this case. The obligation on the captor was to take care and reasonable care, of the goods. If he failed in that obligation, then, in general prize law he must answer the claim for damages.

What is said here is, that he sent these goods by rail transit to London after the goods were destined for sea transit. It is said by Mr. Raeburn that by this act they provided a deviation on the voyage which would avoid the existing insurance by the placing of the goods where they were never intended to be. I have to consider whether the "captor," using the expression collectively, was exercising a reasonable care of failing in his duty in that respect in the action taken with regard to these goods. They were lawfully captured, and they have been declared to be goods of enemy origin and enemy ownership within the meaning of the Order in Council. The captor must deal with them. The goods in question, 113 packages, were enclosed in the mails of a neutral state, and the mails for a neutral state have to be opened and examined to separate the goods subject to capture from the goods which I may describe comprehensively as innocent goods forming the contents of the mails. It was not suggested on the part of the claimant that otherwise was the case. It was not suggested that these goods could be examined as mails should be examined at Kirkwall. There were no facilities for examination on the ship or in the Kirkwall post office. There were goods of innocent consignors in the mails, which must be forwarded and which would be forwarded. It was almost conceded by the claimant that London was the proper place for such examination. In my judgment the familiar facts with regard to the examination of these parcel mails in London during the course of the war period, in which the Order in Council was in operation, and the facility with which packages were detained and packages not subject to detention were forwarded, upon the whole, are the best evidence that the course taken in this case of forwarding seized mails for delivery and examination under proper supervision at the General Post Office in London, was the proper course, if, indeed, it was not the only practicable course for all interests concerned. That being so, it seems to me that the allegation that there was any failure of duty, misconduct or neglect or breach of apparently reasonable care on the part of the captor in forwarding these mails in the ordinary course to be examined in London, wholly fails, and so far as prize law is concerned, apart from the Order in Council, this claim fails.

Under the Order in Council it was contended there had been a direct breach of duty in the failure on the part of the captor to deliver these packages forthwith upon their seizure into the custody of the Marshal, and that automatically they would then have become insured. It is a fact that, if these goods were delivered into the custody of the Marshal at Kirkwall, they would have been insured.

I think what has to be ascertained is whether, the Order in Council providing in favour of the claimants that these goods should be at the first port reached after seizure delivered into the custody of the Marshal, there has been failure in this case. If the provision made in favour of a foreign consignor or owner has been disregarded, then such owner must have suffered damage by that disregard. In the quoted case of the Sudmark, No. 2 (sup.), it was pointed out on behalf of the Procurator-General that the decision of the Privy Council was to the effect that directions given as matters of administration by the Crown to its servants are not directions for the benefit of owners of captured goods as against the captors. In so far as this decision and the regulations contained in the Order in Council as to the modes of dealing with captured goods are concerned, it does not seem to me that any breach of duty on the part of public officers as between themselves and the Crown, concerning a matter of administrative instruction, will give a cause of action to foreign owners of goods. I think a distinction must be made in that respect, but the first and main question is to ascertain what does the Order in Council in fact provide as to the time of delivery into the custody of the Marshal. Art. 1 of the Order in Council deals with vessels sailing for foreign ports. The language is somewhat different from that which refers to vessels or goods which are the subject of the subsequent clause. The clause says that the goods on board any vessel which has "sailed from her port of departure after the 1st March 1915" shall not be allowed "to proceed to any German port," but "must be discharged in a British port and placed in the custody of the Marshal of the Prize Court." That is not the same direction precisely as is given as to the goods now in question, which ismet with in art. 4: "Every merchant vessel which sailed from a port other than a German port after the 1st March 1915 having on board goods which are of enemy origin or are enemy property, may be required to discharge such goods in a British or allied port. . . . Such goods shall be placed in the custody of the Marshal of the Prize Court." I see nothing to hold that this was not complied with sufficiently, there being no provision for forthwith or peremptory handing over. The goods, subject to the embargo provided in art. 4, are goods of enemy origin or enemy property. The goods seized in this case were the Swedish parcels mail. It could not be said of the mails collectively or of the contents of any particular packet which constituted the mail, that they were seized as being of enemy origin or property. The fact was, that until examination was made, no ground for seizure to be operative under the Order in Council could have effect. The goods to be seized were goods of enemy origin or property. Among these were the goods of the present claimant. They had been so disposed under the protection of the neutral mails that they could not be individually seized by themselves at Kirkwall. They must be subject to examination, and I think that upon a reasonable construction of art. 4 there was no obligation to put the goods in question into the custody of the Marshal until they had been ascertained to be subject to seizure. I have already come to the conclusion that that could not be ascertained until they had been examined by the British postal authorites, and the censor of the mails, who was responsible for their delivery to the Marshal in due time.

In my judgment, both on the express directions of art. 4 and upon the reasonableness under art. 1, the captor, speaking collectively, acted within his right in prize law and under the Order in Council in postponing delivery of the goods until they could be delivered after ascertainment as to specific conclusions that they answered the description set forth. Looking at the facts both as to prize law and the Order in Council, I come to the conclusion that this demand for damages fails and must be dismissed with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ARD COASTERS LIMITED; LIVERPOOL AND LONDON WAR RISKS INSURANCE ASSOCIATION LIMITED v. MARINE UNDERWRITERS OF STEAMSHIP RICHARD DE LARRINAGA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance—War risk—Collision between merchant ship and warship—No navigation lights—"Consequences of hostilities or warlike operations."

Two merchant vessels, while navigating at night without lights, in accordance with Admiralty orders, were sunk in collisions, the one by a patrolling destroyer and the other by an armoured cruiser on her way to take up the duty of escorting a convoy. The question in each case was whether the loss was due to a "war" risk, which in the case of the A. was a risk undertaken by the Admiralty, who had requisitioned the ship; and in the case of the L. was a risk accepted by the appellant insurance company.

Both merchant ships were insured against ordinary marine risks, and also by their policies against "consequences of hostilities and warlike operations."

Bailhache, J. decided that both the destroyer and the cruiser were engaged in "warlike operations," and therefore that the ships were not lost by ordinary marine risks but as the consequence of warlike operations, and that the war risk underwriters were liable. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision.

Held, that the orders appealed from were right, and both appeals must be dismissed on the grounds stated by Bailhache, J. and endorsed by the Court of Appeal.

Decision of the Court of Appeal, in the first case reported 36 T. L. Rep. 555, and in the second case reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; 123 L. T. Rep. 485; (1920) 3 K. B. 65, affirmed.

APPEAL from two decisions of the Court of Appeal affirming decisions of Bailhache, J.

The Ard Coasters' case is reported in 36 T. L. Rep. 555, and that of the Richard Larrinaga in 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 572; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; 123 L. T. Rep. 485; (1920) 3 K. B. 65.

In the Ard Coasters' case, their steamship, the Ardgantock, was requisitioned by the Government under the terms of the charter-party known as T. 99. By clause 19 the Admiralty took the war risks which would be excluded by the f.c. and s. clause of an ordinary marine policy, including "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations," but (clause 18) the Admiralty were not liable for sea risks. The Ardgantock was lost owing to a collision off the east coast in the dark with a British destroyer which was patrolling for submarines. Both vessels were sailing without lights in accordance with Admiralty instructions. The vessels were proceeding in opposite courses, and if their original position had been maintained, they would have passed well clear of each other, but the destroyer having come to the end of her beat, turned on a starboard helm and, being unable to see the respondents' vessel until the last moment, struck her on the port side. No negligence was proved on the part of either ship. By a petition of right the respondents claimed to be entitled to 70,000*l.*, the agreed value of their ship.

Bailhache, J. found that the patrolling of the North Sea by the destroyer was a warlike operation, which was rendered dangerous by the absence of navigating lights, and that the collision was due to this warlike operation and gave judgment for the amount claimed. His judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

In the Richard Larrinaga case the ship, a merchant vessel, was sailing in convoy from the United States to England. At the same time one of His Majesty's warships was on a voyage to pick up a convoy. Both ships were sailing without lights. The night was very dark. The two ships sighted one another at close quarters and a collision occurred in which both ships were damaged. No negligence was proved on the part of either ship. The Richard Larrinaga was insured under a marine risks' policy which contained the usual f.c. and s. clause and a war risks' policy which covered "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations by or against the King's enemies."

Bailhache, J. held that the warship was at the time of the collision engaged in a warlike operation and that loss consequently fell on the war risks' underwriters. The Court of Appeal affirmed that decision.

In the first appeal:

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.), Raeburn, K.C., and R. H. Balloch for the appellants.

Leslie Scott, K.C., A. T. Miller, K.C. and Le Quesne for the respondents were not called on.

In the second appeal:

Raeburn, K.C. and S. L. Porter for the appellants.

R. A. Wright, K.C., A. T. Miller, K.C. and Le Quesne for the respondents were not called on.

The House dismissed both appeals.

Lord FINLAY.—These two appeals have been heard together by your Lordships, but I shall deal with the two cases separately, and I take first the Ard Coasters' case, which we heard argued on a previous occasion.

In that case there was a petition of right against the Crown based on obligations undertaken by the Admiralty in the form of charter-party, which is very familiar, now known as T. 99. The facts out of which the question arises are very simple indeed.

His Majesty's warship Tartar was engaged patrolling between the Tees and Whitby for the purpose of looking out for submarines or anything in the shape of an enemy. The Tartar ranged about and proceeded a certain distance and then turned and proceeded in the opposite direction, roaming over the beat of sea she was directed to patrol. She had been proceeding at the time just before the turning which lead to the collision in a southerly direction. The Ardgantock was a merchantman which was proceeding in the same part of the sea in a northerly direction on a course such that, if both courses had been prolonged, they would have been parallel, and had no alteration taken place the two vessels would have passed each other safely port to port. They were navigating both vessels with lights out. It was a dark night, and the Tartar, when she got to the point whereabouts in the ordinary course she would turn round and go in the opposite direction, proceeded to starboard, and after she did that she was within such a short distance of the Ardgantock that there was no time to prevent the collision which ensued. She had not been able to see the Ardgantock, the night being dark and visibility not being good, and the lights being out. The result was that the Tartar struck the Ardgantock on the port side at about right angles.

In these circumstances the question arose as to the effect of clauses 18 and 19 in the charter-party T. 99 under which the Admiralty had requisitioned the ship. Clause 18, which deals with sea risks is as follows:

"The Admiralty shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost, wrecked, driven on shore, injured, or rendered incapable of service by or in consequence of dangers of sea or tempest or any other cause arising as a sea risk."

Clause 19, which deals with war risks, provides: "The risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following or similar, but not more extensive clause: 'Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention and the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after the declaration of war.'"

The rest of clause 19 I need not read. There can be no doubt whatever, in my opinion, that, when patrolling in this way the Tartar was engaged in warlike operations. In the course of that warlike operation—in the ordinary course—when she got to the end of her tether in the one direction proceeded to turn round, and she happened to turn under her starboard helm in the direction of the Ardgantock, which she could not see owing to the darkness and the absence of lights, and the collision took place. It appears to me that the loss was the direct consequence of the patrolling, and the turning which took place was part of that operation. Bailhache, J. is reported as saying this: "The negligence point therefore fails, and it remains to consider whether this collision was a consequence of hostilities or of warlike operations. Now I have said what the Tartar was doing. She was a destroyer and she was patrolling the seas in search of submarines. In doing that she was patrolling the seas without lights. The Ardgantock, in pursuance of Admiralty instructions, was also sailing without lights. I have already held in an earlier case that under those circumstances where there is a collision between two merchant vessels, neither of which is engaged in warlike operations, the mere fact of their both sailing without lights in pursuance of Admiralty directions to that effect and colliding does not make the collision a war risk, but it retains its character of a marine risk. But in this case there was a warlike operation. The Tartar was patrolling the seas. That, of itself, was a warlike operation. She was patrolling the seas without lights, which made the warlike operations dangerous. The collision was due to the fact that the Tartar was patrolling the seas, that is to say, it was due to a warlike operation which was being conducted on the part of the Admiralty. It seems to me, therefore, to follow that the collision which was due to that is a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations."

In the Court of Appeal, Atkin, L.J. puts the matter very clearly indeed. I may be permitted to quote one passage from his judgment. "To my mind the Tartar was clearly engaged upon a warlike operation. She was patrolling the seas in search of submarines, and indeed, for the purposes of this argument counsel for the Crown accepted the findings of the learned judge, and accepted and argued the case on the assumption that the Tartar was engaged in a warlike operation. Now it appears to me that as part of her warlike operation it was her duty to alter her course from time to time, under circumstances where she could not effectively see where she was going; in other words, she had to turn in the dark. Turning in the dark she ran into the suppliants' vessel, the Ardgantock, and that vessel was, without negligence on her part, navigating without lights in such a position that the Tartar executing her warlike operations, without negligence must run into her. The injury to the Ardgantock was proximately caused by the impact of the war vessel moving in the course of warlike operations. The injury was directly due to the warlike operation of the Tartar, just as it would have been, in my view, if the Tartar had been herself injured by running into an unlighted wreck or other peril of the same kind. The Tartar would have avoided the peril if she had received timely warning by lights, or otherwise, of the presence of the Ardgantock, but that she had in the course of her warlike operations to proceed without such warning and to expose herself and others to risk of injury is one of the risks of the warlike operation. In my view the injury of the Ardgantock was proximately caused by the warlike operation of the Tartar."

I entirely agree with that view of the case, and I desire to say one word about the case of the British Steamship Company v. The King (The St. Oswald) (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 121, 270; 118 T. L. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879) and the admission which was supposed to have been made on behalf of the Crown in that case, that the absence of lights made the adventure a warlike operation. I think there must have been some misunderstanding there, and that any admission which was made must be read with reference to the particular circumstances of the case. It cannot be that the mere fact that two merchantmen at sea proceeding on their peaceful errand as merchantmen become engaged in a military operation because for the purpose of escaping submarines or the enemy they are sailing with their lights out. They are sailing with their lights out on a peaceful errand, and in the hope of evading the attention of enemy warships. For these reasons, my Lords, it seems to me that in this case the decision of the courts below was right and the appeal should be dismissed.

THE SECOND CASE.

In the case of the Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association, Limited v. Marine Underwriters of the Steamship Richard de Larrinaga, the question arises in a contest between two sets of insurers, the marine underwriters on the one hand who insure against sea risks and the War Risks Association who insure against war risks. We have been supplied with a copy of the policies issued by both these bodies. Taking the War Risks Associations' policy the second clause is this: "This insurance is only to cover the risks of capture, seizure, and detainment by the King's enemies and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat, and all the consequences of hostilities or warlike operations by or against the King's enemies, whether before or after the declaration of war." Now, the War Risks Association say that this case does not fall within the terms of that clause. The facts giving rise to the question are extremely simple. The Richard de Larrinaga was going in an easterly direction in convoy not very far from the coast of the United States on the Atlantic side. His Majesty's ship Devonshire was proceeding from Halifax in Nova Scotia to Hampton Roads in Virginia for the purpose of picking up a convoy there, and the Richard de Larrinaga was run into by the Devonshire. There was a collision between the two vessels, and the damage took place which is the subject of the arbitration which has finally, on a case stated by the arbitrator, come before your Lordships. The award was stated in the form of a special case. The first paragraph states that the claim in the arbitration arose out of a collision between the steamship Richard de Larrinaga and his Majesty's ship Devonshire in the Atlantic on the 23rd July 1917. The second paragraph states: "At the time in question the Richard de Larrinaga was sailing in convoy at a speed of about six or seven knots an hour. In obedience to Admiralty orders she was exhibiting no lights. The night was very dark. The Devonshire was on a voyage to pick up a convoy of merchant vessels; she was making a speed of about twelve knots an hour and was exhibiting no lights. The two ships sighted one another at close quarters, and very shortly afterwards the collision occurred. A good look-out was being kept on each." Then the next paragraph in the case states that the question has been referred to Mr. Butler Aspinall, and the fourth paragraph states that by an interim award he had found that it was not established that either ship was to blame for the collision. The fifth paragraph states that the Marine Underwriters and the War Risks Association came before him afterwards for the determination of the question whether the collision arose from a marine or a war peril, and the sixth paragraph quotes the clause which I have already read from the policy itself.

Bailhache, J. in dealing with this matter, says this: "I do not think myself that very much is to be got out of the St. Oswald case (sup.). The St. Oswald case (sup.) proceeded, as the Court of Appeal pointed out in the British India Company v. Green; The Matiana (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.

513; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58; 121 L. T. Rep. 559; (1919) 2 K. B. 670), upon admissions made by the Crown, which really, when once those admissions are made, seem to make the result in that case inevitable." As I have said in the Ard Coasters case, I think there is some misconception about that.—"Leaving that case out of account, so far as the authorities go I really think these propositions are established, that where one of His Majesty's ships is sailing at night without lights and is engaged in hostile duties such as looking for submarines, and she collides with another ship, there the collision is due to a consequence of hostilities. The same is the case if one of His Majesty's ships is engaged in convoying other ships and they are sailing without lights at night and a collision occurs, that is a consequence of hostilities or warlike operations. The question which remains, and which is not absolutely covered by authority, is as to what was the position in such a case as this; where one of His Majesty's ships is sailing at night without lights, not at the moment actively engaged in actual warlike operations, such as patrolling and on the look-out for submarines or the actual convoying of ships, but she is proceeding to her station for the purpose of taking up her duties there as a convoying ship. Atkin, L.J. in the Petersham case, British Steamship Company v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 404, 507; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 58; 121 L. T. Rep. 553; (1919) 2 K. B. 670), said this: 'I incline to think that during war almost any action or movement of the combatant forces in the course of their combatant duties while exercised in the area of war could be included.'" Bailhache, J. goes on: "I think myself that when one of His Majesty's ships is proceeding to her station to take up her duties as a convoying ship she is engaged on a warlike operation."

In the Court of Appeal Bankes, L.J. expressed an opinion to the same effect: "I cannot myself draw any distinction, as I say, in principle between the facts of the Ard Coasters case and the present case. Mr. Raeburn has said, 'Oh, but the Devonshire was proceeding on a peaceful voyage with a view to later taking up a warlike operation.' I do not agree with that argument. I think a vessel proceeding to her station in order to take up a warlike operation is in fact at the time she is so proceeding engaged on a warlike operation." I entirely agree with the opinion expressed by both these learned judges. Part of a warlike operation consists in getting to the proper point for striking at the enemy if actual hostilities of that kind are the object of the expedition, or in proceeding to the point where the duty of undertaking the charge of a convoy is to take effect. Protecting convoys is a form of warlike operation; it is an operation in the course of war necessary to be performed by war vessels for the purpose of protecting the merchantmen. I cannot separate the proceeding under orders to the spot where the duty is to be discharged from the actual discharge of the duty itself; both form part of the warlike operation. It is just as much a part of a warlike operation to get your ships or your troops to the spot where a thing is to be done as it is to do it when you get to the spot. It is said, "Oh, there may be great difficulties in saying where the progress to the place of operation begins." Well, nice questions might arise in some cases, but it seems to me perfectly plain that when a war vessel is actually at sea, and is there because she is under orders to go to a particular spot to undertake a warlike operation, whatever its nature may be, she is engaged in that warlike operation because she is doing that which is necessary to get to the spot where the actual thing is to be done. For these reasons, it appears to me that the decisions of the courts below were right and ought to be affirmed.

Lord DUNEDIN.—I concur. In the Ard Coasters case I think the judgment may be put in a form which much resembles a syllogism. Patrolling for submarines is a warlike operation. The Tartar was engaged in patrolling. In the course of that operation, and while engaged in it, she ran into the Ardgantock. The collision is therefore the consequence of a warlike operation.

In the other case I think it is necessary first to see exactly what has been already decided in the Matiana case (British India Company v. Green (sup.). I think the Matiana case was a clear decision to the effect that the escorting ship of a convoy is engaged in a warlike operation—the escorted ship is not. Here if the Devonshire had been the escorting ship, then the result in view of the Matiana case and the last case would be clear; the collision would be a consequence of a warlike operation. The Devonshire was not actually the escorting ship, and she was not actually convoying, but she was on a voyage to pick up a convoy; her commission to convoys covered her proceeding to the place where she was to pick up the convoy, and accordingly I think it comes within the decision in the Matiana case that she was engaged in warlike operations.

Lord SUMNER.—I agree. I think both the Ardgantock and the Richard de Larrinaga were lost in what were warlike operations and as the direct consequence of them. The Tartar was on patrol and so all her manœuvres in the course of that duty were warlike operations. One of these manœuvres was to starboard her helm just before this collision and she was irrevocably committed to it before she could see the Ardgantock. In continuing it she found the Ardgantock across her bows before anything could be done, and as part of the continuance of that warlike operation the Ardgantock was cut down. The absence of lights was only one of the conditions, not the direct cause of what happened. This case is distinguishable from those of the Petersham (sup.) and Matiana (sup.). The case of the Richard de Larrinaga is another illustration of the same position. His Majesty's ship Devonshire was proceeding on her duty of going to pick up a convoy through waters where convoying and navigation without lights were both necessary. There was a possible risk of the sudden appearance of enemy craft, and in the area of war the Devonshire would be found, if occasion arose, to take appropriate warlike action. We do not know the details, but I think we must take it that she ran into the Richard de Larrinaga because she was steaming on the particular course which she actually took as part of that warlike operation. It cannot at any rate be said that this cruise of the Devonshire was not a warlike operation. There may be action taken and effects produced by men-of-war in time of war which are not warlike operations, and no doubt operations in war and operations of war are not necessarily the same thing; but no exact definition of these terms is needed for this case, and I think this task had better be left to those of your Lordships who may be sitting in the next war.

Lord PARMOOR.—I agree, and I desire to add nothing in the Ard Coasters case.

In the case of the Richard de Larrinaga, although concurring, as I do fully, in the opinions already delivered, I desire to add a few words. The cases referred to show that a warship may be engaged in a warlike operation though no attack upon or by the enemy is taking place or immediately impending. In this case a commissioned ship of war was at the time of the collision under orders to pick up a convoy of merchant ships and was on her way at sea to carry out these orders in accordance with her duty. Under these conditions she appears to me to be a ship engaged in a warlike operation. I should be prepared to endorse the view of Bailhache, J., founded on an opinion expressed by Atkin, L.J., in these words, "Indeed I think myself, agreeing, with respect, with what Atkin, L.J. says there, that almost any movement in war time at sea of one of his Majesty's ships is a warlike operation." It is not necessary to say that some exceptional conditions might not arise, but no such conditions are present in this case. The rest of the case appears to me to be covered by your Lordships' decision in the Ard Coasters case.

Lord WRENBURY.—There are two cases before the House. The principles applicable to each have, I think, been largely determined, or at any rate indicated, in the opinions expressed by your Lordships in the Petersham case, Britain Steamship Company v. The King (sup.). I take it that this is certainly decided—that an ordinary marine risk does not become a war risk because some regulation operative during and by reason of war renders the risk more serious. The question is whether the loss was occasioned by a new risk arising by reason of warlike operations. The first case with which your Lordships have to deal is this. The Tartar was engaged in a warlike operation. She was performing the duty of patrolling a certain area of the sea, going from north to south, then turning and going from south to north, and so on, from time to time. She was doing this in discharge of her duty as a vessel of war in order to deal with the possibility that there were submarines in the district with which it would have been her duty to engage if she had found them. While employed on that duty, having finished her beat in one direction, she was turning for the purpose of proceeding in the reverse direction.

The operation of turning was a necessary part of the warlike operation of patrolling that part of the sea. There were no lights, the night was dark, and in turning she fouled the course of the Ardgantock, which was proceeding along the coast, and a collision occurred. It is plain, I think, that the course of the Tartar, whether she was proceeding directly down the coast or whether she was turning for the purpose of going in the reverse direction, was equally a course taken in discharge of her duty as a ship conducting a warlike operation. If the two ships had met end on, and without anything to attach blame to either vessel and a collision occurred there can be no question, I think, about it. If a warship engaged in performing a particular duty of war, in the course of performing that duty without blame attaching to either vessel, comes into collision with another vessel in ignorance of her proximity because for precautionary reasons neither vessel is carrying lights, the collision results in consequence of her operation of patrolling and the loss is a loss in consequence of warlike operations. There can be no difference by reason of the fact that the ships did not meet end on, but that the Tartar, in discharge of her duty, was turning at the moment when the collision occurred. The Solicitor-General's argument, I think, if I seek to summarise it, really comes to this, that no doubt the Tartar was engaged in a warlike operation, but that the moment when she should turn, the direction in which she should turn and the place where she should turn were matters in her discretion; that she was not compelled by her duty as a ship of war to turn when she did or where she did or as she did. That is an argument which does not commend itself to me. It was her duty to turn somewhere, and, if in the ordinary course of her turning the result was a loss it appears to me that it was in consequence of her warlike operation. I do not think it is enough to say that the ship was a warship and was proceeding under orders given by naval authority. If, for instance, her orders were to go into dock to have her bottom cleaned or her boilers overhauled, and she was simply proceeding there, that might be one case. If, on the other hand, her orders were to go as fast as she could to a particular place to take part in an action which was proceeding or immediately expected, that is another case, and I should say that certainly she was on a war errand and engaged in a warlike operation. I do not think that the matter is to be tried by the fact that she is firing her guns or using her ram at the moment or anything of that kind. The question is: What is the duty she is performing at the moment? The particular facts in the second case that we have here to deal with are these. The vessel in question was under orders to go to a particular place to pick up a convoy of merchantmen. When she was conveying them certainly she would have been engaged in a warlike operation. I think that operation began when she took up the duty of going to the place where she was going to act. She was, I think, engaged in a warlike operation at the time the collision occurred. For these reasons I think the second appeal fails.

FRENCH MARINE v. COMPAGNIE NAPOLITAINE D'ECLAIRAGE ET DE CHAUFFAGE PAR LE GAZ. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Time charter-party — Construction — Payment monthly in advance—Extension of charter beyond stipulated period — Frustration of adventure — Effect on payment of hire.

The appellants chartered from the respondents a steamer for four calendar months under a charter-party, which provided that the charterers should pay as hire a fixed sum per month, and pro rata, for any fractional part of a month until re-delivery of the steamer to owners as therein stipulated, payment of hire to be made monthly in advance. Provision was also made for re-delivery of the steamer at a United Kingdom coal port. Should the steamer be on a voyage at the expiration of the period fixed by the charter, the charterers were to have the use of the steamer at the rate and on the conditions therein stipulated to enable them to complete the voyage, provided always that the voyage was reasonably calculated to be completed about the time fixed for the termination of the charter. In the event of a breakdown of machinery or other accident preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four hours, the charter-party provided for the cesser of hire until she was again in an effective state to resume her services; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather, and in certain other events the time so lost and expenses incurred were to be for the charterer's account, and in the event of the vessel being lost, the hire paid in advance or not earned was to be returned to the charterers, who were to have a lien on the steamer for all moneys paid in advance and not earned.

The period fixed by the charter-party expired on the 10*th Aug.* 1919. In the previous July the charterers had loaded the steamer at Antwerp with a cargo of coal for Toulon, intending that she should return to Great Britain with a cargo of mineral, but on the 14*th July the Shipping Controller notified that after completion of her discharge at Toulon the steamer was required to go to Australia. The steamer proceeded to Toulon, but the discharge of her cargo was not completed until the* 16*th Aug., on which day the owners took delivery of their steamer at Toulon without prejudice to their rights, and under the requisition she was sent to Australia.*

The charterers claimed that they were only entitled to pay a fractional portion of a month's hire, namely, from the 10*th to the* 16*th Aug., when the steamer was delivered, and the question was referred to arbitration.*

Held, (1) that the provision for payment in advance applied to the case of an extension of the charter-party beyond the stipulated period, and that, on the 10*th Aug. a full month's hire was payable by the charterers; and* (2) (Lord Finlay and Lord Wrenbury dissenting on this point) that there having been no re-delivery as prescribed by the charter, the charterers were not entitled to a pro rata adjustment by reason of the frustration of the adventure.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal, affirming a judgment of Bailhache, J. upon a case stated by an arbitrator.

The question in the case was as to the amount due from the French Marine to the respondent company in respect of the hire of the steamship Ardoyne under a charter-party dated the 13th March 1919. Bailhache, J. and the Court of Appeal (Bankes, Warrington and Scrutton, L.JJ.) held, on the authority of Tonnelier v. Smith (77 L. T. Rep. 277), that no part of the hire was returnable.

The charterers appealed.

Leck, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the appellants.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Jowitt for the respondents.

After consideration, their Lordships, by a majority (Lord Finlay and Lord Wrenbury dissenting), dismissed the appeal.

Lord FINLAY.—The question in this case is as to the amount due from the French Marine to the respondent company in respect of the hire of the steamship Ardoyne under a charter-party dated the 13th March 1919.

The dispute was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrator made his award in the form of a special case, raising three questions, of which the third alone is now material:

3. Whether the French Marine were bound on the 10th Aug. 1919 to pay a full month's hire of the said steamer, or whether they were bound to pay only a fractional part of a month's hire for the period from the 10th Aug. 1919 until the steamer was re-delivered to the chartered owners.

The arbitrator awarded as follows:

That the French Marine are not and were not on the 10th Aug. 1919 liable to pay a whole month's hire on that date, but are and were only liable to pay to the chartered owners a fractional part of a month's hire from the 10th Aug. 1919 up to the date when the steamer was re-delivered to the chartered owners. . . . But this award is subject to the opinion of the court on the following special case, which is stated at the request of the parties.

The special case incorporated the charter-party. The charter-party was between the respondent company as owners of the steamship Ardoyne and the appellants, the French Marine, charterers. Clause 1 states that the owners agreed to let, and the charters to hire, the steamer for the term of four calendar months from the time when the steamer was placed at the disposal of the charterers. The following are the other clauses material to the present question:

5. That the said charterers shall pay as hire for the said steamer 25*s.* per ton deadweight, say 9250*l* per calendar month, commencing from the time the steamer is placed at the disposal of charterers, and pro rata for any fractional part of a month (the days to be taken as fractions of a month of thirty days) until her re-delivery to owners as herein stipulated.

That the payment of the hire shall be made as follows: In London, in cash, without discount, monthly in advance to Ernest Bigland and Co. Limited.

In default of such payment or payments, as herein specified, the owners shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said steamer from the service of the charterers, without prejudice to any claim they (the owners) may otherwise have on the charterers under this charter.

7. That the steamer (unless lost) shall be re-delivered on the expiration of this charter-party, in same good order as when delivered to the charterers (fair wear and tear excepted) at an ice-free port in charterers' option in a United Kingdom coal port. Charterers giving disponents of steamer seven days' notice of expected date of re-delivery between the hours of 6 a.m. and 6 p.m., but the day of re-delivery shall not be a Sunday or legal holiday, always unless owners agree to take re-delivery earlier.

The charterers to give the owners not less than ten days' written notice at which port and on about which day the steamer will be re-delivered.

Should the steamer be on a voyage at the expiration of the period fixed by this charter, the charterers are to have the use of the steamer at the rate and on the conditions herein stipulated to enable them to complete the voyage, provided always that the said voyage was reasonably calculated to be completed about the time fixed for the termination of the charter.

Money in dispute to be deposited in the joint names of the parties to this charter-party with approved bankers at the place of payment of the hire until the dispute has been settled by the arbitrators.

12. That in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or owners' stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage to hull or other accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting more than twenty-four consecutive hours, the hire shall cease from the commencement of such loss of time until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service; but should the steamer be driven into port, or to anchorage by stress of weather, or from any accident to the cargo, or in the event of the steamer trading to shallow harbours, rivers, or ports where there are bars causing detention to the steamer through grounding or otherwise, time so lost and expenses incurred (other than repairs) shall be for charterers' account.

18. That should the steamer be lost or missing, the hire shall cease from the date when she was lost or last spoken, or, if not spoken, then from the date when last seen, and hire paid in advance and not earned shall be returned to the charterers.

21. That the owners have a lien upon all cargoes and all sub-freights for hire and general average contribution, and for all expenses and damages due under or for breach of this charter and charterers to have a lien on the steamer for all moneys paid in advance and not earned.

31. Should steamer be in a position to give re-delivery under this charter within ten days before the expiration of the stipulated charter period of four months, disponents agree to accept re-delivery then. If the steamer should be in a position to give re-delivery at an earlier date than ten days before the expiration of the stipulated charter period, charterers have the right to arrange for the steamer to perform a voyage reasonably calculated to be completed within ten days after the expiration of the charter period.

The special case then proceeds to make a statement of the facts, which may be summarised as follows:

The steamer was placed at the disposal of the charterers on the 10th April 1919. In consequence of a letter from the British Shipping Controller of 16th June 1919 the charterers caused the Ardoyne to be loaded at Antwerp with a cargo of coal for Toulon with the intention that she should return to Great Britain with a cargo of mineral. After the vessel was so loaded there was correspondence between the British Ministry of Shipping and the charterers by letters of the 9th, 10th, and 14th July 1919, all of which are set out in the case. What ensued is stated in pars. 5 and 6 of the case:

5. On the 14th July 1919 the Shipping Controller issued his licence in respect of the Ardoyne for a voyage from Antwerp to Toulon with a cargo of coal, and endorsed the licence with the following words: "Thence Australia to load for Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies."

6. The Ardoyne accordingly proceeded from Antwerp to Toulon and delivered her cargo of coal at the latter place, and the French Marine gave notice to the chartered owners that on completion of the discharge of her cargo at Toulon the Ardoyne would be re-delivered to the chartered owners as they were prevented by the action of the Shipping Controller from bringing the ship back to the United Kingdom with a cargo of ore as had been intended. The chartered owners disputed this view, but in order to save waste of tonange and without prejudice and reserving their rights, took delivery of their steamer at Toulon from the French Marine on the 16th Aug. 1919. The steamer then proceeded on her Australian voyage pursuant to the directions of the Shipping Controller.

In the 10th par. of the case the arbitrator says:

I am of opinion and, so far as questions of fact are involved, find as follows:—

(a) That the commercial adventure contemplated in the charter-party of the 13th March 1919 was frustrated as from the 16th Aug. 1919 by the direction of the Shipping Controller that the said steamer should proceed to Australia to carry from there a cargo of wheat for account of the Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies.

(d) That the French Marine were therfore justified in re-delivering the steamer to the chartered owners at Toulon on completion of the discharge of the coal cargo.

(e) That the French Marine are not and were not on the 10th Aug. 1919, liable to pay a full month's hire of the steamer on that date, but are and were only liable to pay a fractional proportion of a month's hire from the 10th Aug. to the 16th Aug., when the steamer was re-delivered as aforesaid.

The question for the opinion of the Court is stated as being whether his opinion expressed in par. 10 so far as it involves questions of law is right.

It is obvious that the arbitrator's finding means that the owners of the vessel are entitled, in respect of the period from the 10th Aug. onwards only, to hire from the days from the 10th to the 16th Aug., and I shall deal with the case on this footing. The question cannot be read as relating only to a provisional payment on the 10th Aug. subject to liability to account. The real question is as to the rights of the parties with regard to the final payment.

The answer to the question raised by the case must depend upon the construction to be put upon the charty-party.

The term of the charter-party is four calendar months (clause 1). The hire (clause 5) is 9,250*l.* per month and pro rata for any fractional part of a month until her redelivery to owners as stipulated. The payment is to be in London in cash, payable monthly in advance, and in default of such payment the owners may withdraw the steamer.

The first question that arises is whether the provisions of clause 5 for payment of the monthly hire in advance apply in cases of an extension of the charter-party beyond the four months certain. That this was a very debatable point is shown by the fact that while Lord Esher and Rigby, L.J. answered this question in the affirmative, two judges of wide commercial experience (A. L. Smith, L.J. and Mathew, L.J.) answered it in the negative (Tonnelier v. Smith, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 77 L. T. Rep. 277). Whatever view I might have been disposed to take upon this point, if it were a new one, I think we ought to follow the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal given in that case nearly a quarter of a century ago. It has no doubt been acted upon since then, and, apart from the fact that it was given by a court of very high authority, I do not think it would be right to depart from the practice as settled by that case, as innumerable charter-parties must have been entered into on the view that that decision was good law.

For these reasons I think we ought to hold, as the Court of Appeal held in 1897, that the whole of the monthly hire was payable in advance on the 10th Aug., but it appears to me clear, upon the charter-party and on authority, that any such payment is provisional merely, and if, at the end of the period, it is found that less hire has been earned, the owner must account for the excess to the charterer. This was so held in express terms by the Court of Appeal in the case which I have just referred to (Tonnelier v. Smith), and it was on this basis that the Court of Appeal arrived at the conclusion that the monthly hire was payable in advance under such an extension.

Apart from authority, how does this question stand upon the terms of the charter-party?

The hire was for a calendar month 925*l.* and for any fractional part of a month pro rata. If the use under the charter-party is only for a portion of a month, the hire is according to the number of days computed pro rata on the basis of 925*l.* for the whole month. Whenever there is a broken month the hire is less in proportion. It would be extraordinary if when during any month the hire earned under the charter-party is, say, 2000*l.*, being pro rata, the owner should be entitled to retain the whole month's hire, 925*l.*, which has been paid in advance. There might be a bargain to this effect, but very clear words would be necessary to compel such a construction. If it appears when the month in question ends that the user has been for a week only, surely the reasonable view is that the owners must pay back three-fourths of the whole month's hire which they received in advance.

Payment in advance is highly expedient, for in many cases if the money be not paid in advance it may be very difficult to enforce payment by the charterer, who may belong to a foreign country and not be amenable to English law. The payment in advance is really intended to secure the owner. The right of the charterer to repayment of the amount paid in advance in excess of what is earned does not rest merely upon special provisions in the charter-party as to particular cases. It rests upon the provision of clause 5 that if there has been less than a month's use the payment is to be in proportion only. Certain special cases are particulraly dealt with in the charter-party, but the enumeration is not exhaustive; wherever there has been a provisional payment in advance for a month if it be found that less has been earned during the month the recipient must account for the excess.

One of the commonest cases in which the vessel is used for a fraction of a fresh month after the expiration of the period of the charter-party would be when from some accidental cause she does not reach the home port for redelivery to the owner till some time, say, a week after the time fixed in the charter-party has expired. A whole month's hire is paid in advance when the month begins, but the owner can keep only what represents a week's hire. The right to the return on this case is not expressly given in the charter-party, but it follows from the terms of clause 5.

A second case receives special treatment. If a vessel is on a voyage at the expiration of the period fixed by the charter-party the charterers are to have the use of the steamer to complete the voyage on the chartered terms, which include payment pro rata, provided the voyage was reasonably calculated to be completed by the time of the termination of the charter (clause 7, 3rd sentence). It is obvious that this is intended to provide for voyages other than the mere voyage home for redelivery, which requires no special provision.

A third case is that dealt with by clause 12. If there is loss of time from deficiency of men or owner's stores, breakdown of machinery or accident preventing the working of the steamer and lasting for more than twenty-four hours, the hire ceases till she is in an efficient state to resume her services. A corresponding amount would have to be accounted for when the amount of hire up to the end of the month is settled. The right is obvious, though there is no express provision for it. On the other hand, the concluding part of clause 12 provides that in case of loss of time owing to the vessel's being driven into port or having to anchor by reason of bad weather or detention by bars in shallow water, &c., the time lost is to be for the charterers' account.

A fourth case is dealt with in the charter-party, that of the steamer's being lost or missing, and it is provided that the hire is to cease from the time she was last seen or spoken to. This is the case dealt with by clause 18, and it is only here that the words are added, "and hire paid in advance and not earned shall be returned to the charterers." We were informed during the argument that this form of charter-party has grown gradually and has been altered from time to time. We do not know how these words came to be inserted here and here only, but it cannot be seriously contended that this is the only case in which the owner is to account for hire which he received in advance but has not earned. I think that this sufficiently appears from the scope of the clauses to which I have already referred.

Further, the terms of clause 21 show that the charterers have, under the charter-party, this right to a return of moneys paid in advance and not earned. I have endeavoured to show that clause 5 and other clauses preceding this clause 21 conferred this right in all cases. Clause 21 recognises the existence of this right and gives a special remedy for its enforcement by providing that the Charterers "are to have a lien on the steamer for all moneys paid in advance and not earned."

A good deal of confusion had been introduced into this case by the argument put forward for the respondents that it is a case of "frustration," and that it is to be governed by rules laid down in some cases where there has been "frustration of the adventure" owing to some unexpected event. The truth is that this is simply a case in which the action of the British Government in requisitioning the vessel prevented the owner from being able to give to the charterers after the 16th Aug. the use of the vessel. The case need not be encumbered by the discussion of rules which have been laid down for cases in which some supervening event so profoundly modifies the circumstances affecting a contract as to justify its being treated as at an end. All that has happened here is that as the British Government took the vessel out of the hands of the owner he could not go on giving the charterers the use of it. As he could not give the use of the vessel after the 16th Aug. the freight ceased to be payable. After the 16th Aug. no freight could be earned by him with the Ardoyne from the French Marine for the reason that the vessel was employed by orders of the British Government in earning freight for the owner, by carrying wheat from Australia at remuneration given by the British Government. That remuneration may be adequate or inadequate. With that we are not concerned. What is certain is that this employment of the vessel prevented the owner from giving the use of the vessel under the charter-party to the French Marine for more than a fractional period of the month. The freight ceased with the cesser of the use of the ship.

I have endeavoured to show that upon the construction of the charter-party the payment of the month's hire, 925*l.*, on the 10th Aug. was purely provisional and subject to account at the end of the user during the month ending the 10th Sept. This very point was decided in the case of Tonnelier v. Smith (sup.). In that case the charter-party provided that the charterer should pay for the hire of the vessel at the rate of 700*l.* per calendar month from the time she came on hire and at the same rate for any part of a month, hire to continue until her redelivery to the owners unless lost, payment of the said hire to be made in cash in London monthly in advance. The term of the charter-party was for the time required for performing a round voyage out and home with an option to continue the charter for a further period of one second round trip. This option was exercised, and the vessel arrived at Middlesbrough, her final port of destination on the second round voyage, on the 13th Jan. A fresh month of hire was begun on the 19th Jan., and the shipowner demanded payment on that date of 700*l.*, a whole month's hire. The charterers tendered a sum representing hire up to the 28th Jan., by which time he reckoned the vessel would be discharged and ready for delivery. Mathew, J. held that the charterers' contention was right. "The charterer," he said, "must calculate what the sum is likely to be, and pay it to the owners; if too little the charterer is liable for the balance." The case went to the Court of Appeal. A. L. Smith, L.J. agreed with Mathew, J., but the majority of the court, Lord Esher, M.R. and Rigby, L.J., were of the contrary opinion, and held that the shipowners were entitled to have full payment of a month's freight made on the 19th Jan. They give as a reason that the payment was provisional only and subject to adjustment according to the time actually taken. Rigby, L.J. in delivering the judgment of Lord Esher and himself, after referring to the terms of the charter-party (which are very similar to those of the charter-party in the present case), went on to say as follows: "The last provision that the charterer was to have a lien on the ship for all moneys paid in advance and not earned, makes it plain, if it were otherwise doubtful, that the payments in advance were to be provisional only and not final, and would entitle the charterer to postpone delivery of the ship until the unearned payments were repaid—a right which would effectually secure prompt repayment of those amounts. The special provision for repayment in case of loss is intended to fix readily the actual amount to be repaid, and cannot be construed, regard being had to the lien on ship given to the charterer in respect of all unearned payments, as limiting repayments to the sole case of loss. The provisions in favour of the owners, first, for advance payment of freight, and, secondly, for lien on cargo and subfreights, were plainly intended to relieve the owners as far as possible from the necessity of having to bring a personal action against the charterer, and may have the more importance when, as here, the charterer is a foreigner and might have to be sued, if at all, in his own country. At no time during the term of the charter-party could it be ascertained with certainty on one of the days fixed for monthly payments how much freight would actually be earned during the month. The ship might be disabled or even lost just after the date fixed for the monthly payment, and then only a day's freight might be earned. Even when it appears probable that only a day's freight will be earned some circumstance—as, for instance, a strike—may intervene to delay the date of discharge and delivery up, and in the result a whole month's freight may, after all, be earned. The greater or less degree of probability of the happening of the events which will determine how much freight is to be earned is nowhere referred to in the contract, and can scarcely afford a rule for construing it."

The whole of this last passage from the judgment of the Court of Appeal is exactly in point upon the construction of the charter-party in the present case. The judgment of the Court of Appeal proceeds on the ground that the payments in advance are provisional only and not final, and that the charterer would be entitled to postpone delivery of the ship until the unearned payments were repaid, and that the special provision for repayment in case of loss cannot be considered, regard being had to the lien on the ship given to the charterer in respect of all unearned payments, as limiting repayments to the sole case of loss.

I have given my reasons for thinking that this conclusion is correct, and that it is so appears to me to follow not merely from the provisions specially referred to by Rigby, L.J., but from the whole frame of the charter-party under which, when the hire is for a fractional part of a month, the payment is to be proportionately reduced. It would require a very strong case to justify us in departing from the practice sanctioned by the decision of the Court of Appeal in 1897.

I desire to add a few words as to one suggestion which was thrown out in argument—namely, that there had been no delivery of the ship as stipulated in the charter-party, so that the right to hire would run on after the requisition. It is true that payment of hire was by the terms of clause 1 to go on until re-delivery of the ship to the owners, as stipulated in the charter-party. The requisitioning of the Ardoyne by the British Government, however, would obviously, on possession being taken under the requisition on behalf of the British Government, amount to a determination of the possession of the charterers and a transfer of possession to the British Government on the terms of their requisition and under any liability to the owners which the requisition entailed. The owners themselves took delivery of the steamer at Toulon, but without prejudice, and reserving their rights, and the vessel proceeded from Toulon on her voyage to Australia under the orders of the Shipping Controller on behalf of the British Government. It seems to follow that with this delivery the hire under the charter-party must have stopped running.

I have already referred to the use that has been made of the phrase "frustration" with reference to the cesser of the user of the Ardoyne as an argument for leaving the owner in possession of the whole 9250*l*. It was said that when an adventure is "frustrated" things must remain as they are, that the money remains with the man who has it, that the contract is gone, and therefore that there is no right to have any part of the month's hire returned. The distinction between the present case and such "frustration" as was deemed to have occurred in the group of cases called the "Coronation Cases" is obvious. In those cases the payments had been made not provisionally but absolutely, and the person who had received the money was held entitled to keep it after the "frustration." In the present case the payment was provisional and subject to adjustment according to the time during which the hire might last. "Frustration" cannot convert a provisional payment into an absolute one. If it did it would not leave the parties in statu quo but would make a most material alteration in the position of the person who had paid the money. The very act of requisition relied on as a "frustration" put an end to the hiring, as the ship was taken from the charterer and handed over to the British Government. The requisition made it impossible that the hiring under the charter-party should continue beyond the 16th Aug., and it follows that the charterers are liable only for six days in August.

In my opinion the French Marine were bound to pay a full month's hire of the steamer on the 10th Aug. 1919, but this payment would have been provisional only, and in the events which happened they are only liable to pay a fractional proportion of a month's hire—namely, from the 10th Aug. to 16th Aug., when the steamer was re-delivered under the circumstances I have stated.

In my opinion the appellants substantially succeed, and should have their costs on this appeal and in the courts below.

Lord DUNEDIN.—Strictly speaking, the question put by the umpire is limited to the determination of whether the appellants were liable on the 10th Aug. to pay a month's hire in advance. Tonnelier v. Smith (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 77 L. T. Rep. 277) decided in a case for all practical purposes the same as the present as regards the phraseology of the charter that the payment must be made. I agree with your Lordships that, though not technically binding, the case of Tonnelier has ruled practice so long that it ought not to be disturbed unless we thought it was clearly wrong. I cannot say that. Further, I think it is unavailing to distinguish Tonnelier's case from the present on the ground of the provision in clause 7 that money in dispute should be deposited in a bank. On the 10th Aug. there was no reason to hold that any money was in dispute, and further, the clause has ample justification in regard to disputes as to coals and other matters of the same sort.

The case, however, has not been confined within these strict limits. Assuming that the full month's hire ought to have been paid in advance on the 10th Aug., yet upon the doctrine which is conveniently expressed by the brocard of the civil law, frustra petis quod mox es restiturus, if it can be shown that the appellants would have been entitled to get repayment of that portion of the month's hire which corresponded to the period after the 16th Aug. when the ship was taken away from them by the action of the Government, then it would be useless to give judgment to the respondents for more than the sum corresponding to the period from the 10th to the 16th. And it is on these lines that the courts below have proceeded, though they have held that inasmuch as no such right would have accrued to the appellants, judgment ought to be given for the full amount.

I do not shrink from saying that I have found this question one of extreme difficulty, as to which my opinion has repeatedly wavered. It has been rendered all the more difficult by the very slight assistance which is to be derived from the opinions of the learned judges below. I do not say this by way of criticism; it is rather a piece of evil fortune.

As to the first point, they were bound by the judgment of Tonnelier, and so far there is no more to be said.

As to the second point, it is not mentioned in two of the judgments, but I assume that the learned judges proceeded on the ground explicitly stated by Scrutton, L.J., namely, that they were bound by Lloyd's Royal Belge v. Stathatos (33 Times L. Rep. 390; 34 Times L. Rep. 70). They were so bound, and that prevented them doing what they would otherwise have done—arguing the case on its merits. Then, when I consider Stathatos, I am scarcely better satisfied. There is, indeed, a carefully argued judgment by Atkin, J., but when I turn to the Court of Appeal the judgment is put on a ground which is either ill reported, as has been said by Lord Finlay, or is, I think, clearly erroneous. That ground is that you could only recover under the contract, and that as the contract is no longer existent owing to what is termed frustration, there is no basis on which you can reach re-payment. It is useless to cite the numerous cases which have recently arisen and have been decided, several of them in this House, as to what happens when the performance of a contract according to its terms is rendered impossible by a vis major. It is nowhere laid down that the contract is non-existent. There is no liability in respect of non-performance in the future; but accrued rights remain untouched and enforceable. There is no better reductio ad absurdum of the other proposition than is to be found in the present case. If the contract is non-existent for all purposes of recovering money under it, then, inasmuch as the appellants here did not de facto pay anything on the 10th Aug., the respondents can get nothing from them now and no question of repayment arises.

The question must therefore, in my opinion, be thus approached: On the 10th Aug. the respondents were bound to pay a month's hire; on the 16th Aug. the further performance of the contract became impossible. Was there or was there not an accrued right on the appellants' part to get repayment of such portion of the hire paid on the 10th Aug. as did not, as we conveniently term it in Scotland by a word which is wanting in English, "effeir" to the period from the 10th to the 16th Aug. The sheet anchor of the appellants' argument is the expression used by Rigby, L.J. and the Master of the Rolls in Tonnelier's case, that the payment in advance is "provisional"; coupled with the admission which had to be given by the respondents' counsel that had there been a delivery at a coal port in the United Kingdom in the ordinary course on the 16th that sum would have been recoverable. I confess I was much moved by that argument, but on further consideration it appeared to me that the word "provisional" might be too hard pressed. I do not think that by terming the payment "provisional" the learned judges meant to say that the payment in advance was not really a payment, but only a deposit, leaving the question of payment over. The payment in advance is truly payment, but it can only be a payment of what the contract says is earned. Now, the payment earned by the contract is freight for use till re-delivery of the ship in terms of the contract; on delivery, freight ceases, consequently the money paid in advance in so far as it does not represent freight earned, became mere money had and received, and, as such, recoverable. This was the result in Tonnelier's case.

Now, in the present case there was no re-delivery in terms of the contract, and consequently freight in terms of the contract never ceased. In each and every case that was thought of there is a substantive provision for the ceasing of freight. There is the case of re-delivery (clause 5), there is temporary inefficiency (clause 12), there is loss of the steamer (clause 18). The addendum to clause 18, that hire not earned shall be returned, neither helps nor hinders the argument, for the right to get return is conceded when there is re-delivery, and I take it would have to be conceded when there was a partial operation of clause 12. The case that has happened was not thought of, and consequently there is no provision for the cessation of hire in that event. No doubt, the inability to re-deliver is due to no fault of the appellants; that, however, has no effect one way or the other on accrued rights. The "Coronation" cases here come to be in point.

The situation, therefore, stands thus: The payment in advance has accrued and has been made good. A right to stop the hire after re-delivery or during such temporary inefficiency, or after loss, has not accrued, for none of these events has happened; and no right has accrued in respect of an event which was not mentioned.

I proceed entirely on the words of the contract. The general consideration that hire is prima facie the consideration for use does not move me; the same might be said of bill of lading freight when payment stipulated for and made in advance cannot be recovered though the goods are never delivered owing to loss at sea.

For these reasons, I think that the appeal falls to be dismissed, and I move accordingly.

Lord SUMNER.—In strictness, the umpire's question, which has now to be answered, is concluded by Tonnelier v. Smith (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 77 L. T. Rep. 277). He states his opinion to be "that the French Marine are not, and were not on the 10th Aug. 1919, liable to pay a full month's hire of the steamer on that date, but are and were only liable to pay a fractional proportion of month's hire from the 10th Aug. to the 16th Aug.," and leaves it to the decision of the court to say whether this was right in law or not. Further, in reciting the issues raised between the parties and the submission made by the charterers, he confines himself to the words "were not on the 10th Aug.," omitting any reference to present liability. Now Tonnelier v. Smith decided that, if payment was not made, the remedy by lien was exercisable by the shipowner on the day on which payment of a month's hire was due in advance; that is to say, that the full month's hire was then due and payable. So far that decision would conclude the matter. The first question, therefore, is whether Tonnelier v. Smith is either distinguishable or wrong; but the courts below have allowed the case stated to be treated loosely, so as to raise the further question, whether by reason of events happening after the 10th Aug. and involving what the umpire calls "frustration" of the commercial adventure, only the sum to be paid can be reduced to an amount representing the time from the 10th Aug. to the 16th Aug., and this accordingly forms the second question.

Tonnelier v. Smith (sup.) has so long been acted upon in the time-chartering business and has been followed in such a multitude of settlements of ships' accounts, that, unless it is manifestly wrong, it ought not to be overruled. Personally, I think the issue in that case was rightly decided, but some sentences in the majority judgment—incautious perhaps and wanting in clearness—have been, as it seems to me, much misunderstood. In that case the ship had reached the port of redelivery, and there it was that a dispute arose in view of the high probablility that the discharge would not occupy a month. The case of "frustration" of the further performance of the adventure was not before the minds of the Court of Appeal at all. To read the words "the payments in advance were to be provisional only and not final" as deciding, that in all events whatever, in the event of frustration as well as in that which was the origin of the actual dispute, a repayment could be claimed, if the use of the ship was not enjoyed for a full month, is, in my view, to disregard both the reasoning of the judgment and the occasion on which it was delivered. The charter contained express words applicable to the particular case and the Court of Appeal construed them. They were "at and after the same rate for any part of a month, hire to continue till her redelivery." They were held to be an express provision for a payment in advance, which was not final. True it was that in terms repayment was only stipulated for in that charter once, in another clause and in another event—namely, loss of the ship, but to give the charterer the security of a lien on a ship, which was lost, would be meaningless. Other cases of repayments to the charterer were evidently contemplated, and the case before the court, covered by the words above quoted, was one of them. The difficulty of reading this lien as meaning that the charterer can refuse redelivery of the ship and yet not be under a continuing liability for further hire is obvious, and lien on the ship in the strict sense he had none. In the present case also the ship never was out of the possession of the owners, whether chartered or actual. There may have been no demise to the chartered owners; there certainly was none to the charterers. The ship sailed for Australia in the same unchanged possession as that in which she arrived at Toulon. I reserve any opinion as to the meaning and effect of this so-called lien, but the use made of it by the Court of Appeal in Tonnelier's case is simple enough. The judgment goes on to dismiss the charterer's contention, that in the event which had happened all he had to pay was hire estimated pro rata, on the ground that the charter contained no provision for any estimate, clearly showing that the court held the rights of the parties to depend on the actual provisions of the contract. If the court had meant that in a time-charter all advance payments of hire are provisional or conditional, they need not have dwelt on the lien clause or have explained the object of the loss clause. To say that, apart from the circumstances of that dispute, the court then held that any such payment is provisional merely, and that, if at the end of the period a less amount of hire proves to have been earned, the owner must account for the excess to the charterer, to my mind imputes to Esher, M.R. and Rigby, L.J. a proposition equally irrelevant and wrong, for it means that they did not consider the rule Expressum facit cessare tacitum applicable to a time-charter. Payment means payment. Without some provision, expressed or necessarily to be implied from the expressions used, there is no right to repayment except such as the law gives. Here there was no total failure of consideration but a partial failure only, for which in law no pro rata repayment could be claimed. The right to repayment, in the events which happened, has to be found in the charter, and the fact that, in one form of words or another, the charter provides for repayment in certain named events is good ground for saying that in other events repayment is not provided for. This, in my view, is all that Rigby, L.J. said or was warranted in saying, and it fails to carry the appellants home.

It was ingeniously agrued that Tonnelier v. Smith (sup.) might be distinguished from the present case, because this charter contains a provision that money in dispute is to be deposited in joint names, but I think there is no substance in the point. If a dispute arises, it must go to arbitration, and the party from whom a payment is claimed must, so to speak, pay it into court. This is the most that can be made of the clause; perhaps it means no more than this, that, if there is a sum received from strangers by one party, to which both lay claim, it is to be deposited in medio to abide an award. In no case can it mean that if one party disputes his liability to pay money to the other, he can deposit the money in joint names and so discharge himself from an actual obligation to pay according to the contract. The clause refers to security and procedure only, not to liability.

It will not be disputed that the charter and the charter alone must be the source from which any right to a repayment or reduction of hire is to be derived. The umpire has found as a fact, that on the 16th Aug. further performance on either side was frustrated. The term may not be the best, and it has been doubted—though not in the most recent cases—whether "frustration" applies to a time-charter, when the chartered period has not expired and the ship has not been lost. The result, however, is plain. From the 16th Aug. both parties were released from further performance, but both remained bound to perform such things as they had become bound to before that date. What provision, then, does the charter contain?

There can be no doubt that on the 10th Aug. the full sum of 9250*l.* was due and payable in advance, and it was not paid. The words applicable are these: "The payment of the hire shall be made . . . monthly in advance" and "the" hire (not merely hire) is 9250*l.* per calendar month and pro rata for any fractional part of a month, payable "as hire . . . until her redelivery to owners as herein stipulated," that is, at a United Kingdom coal port. No one could then tell for certain the date of re-delivery. A strike of dock labourers at Toulon might cause such delay as to make another month's hire fall due on the 10th Sept. On the other hand, the ship might be re-delivered at almost any time after fourteen days, or might break down or be lost within the month. The charter provides for these three cases, but for the case of frustration, which happened, it makes no provision at all. The words "pro rata for any fractional part of a month" refer only to a period of time terminating with re-delivery as stipulated and not to any other period. The period from the 10th to the 16th did not terminate with re-delivery as stipulated. A portion of a month terminating with the loss of the ship and a period the currency of which is suspended by a breakdown and renewed on further readiness for service, are expressly provided for elsewhere and otherwise. It is true that on the 10th Aug. such rights as these provisions involve were rights which the charterers were entitled to enjoy, but they were entitled to enjoy them only in the events upon which the charter makes them contingent. If the ship occupied only a fractional part of thirty days in reaching her port of re-delivery and in being tendered to the chartered owners there, if she lost time from any breakdown within clause 12, if she was lost or missing, then, but not till then, the terms of clauses 5, 12, or 18, as the case might be, would become applicable. In fact, on the 16th Aug. further performance of this charter on either side became impracticable, because the ship was requisitioned, and the charter was silent about the consequences. The legal rights thereupon arising are those stated by Collins, M.R. in Elliot v. Crutchley (90 L. T. Rep. 497; (1904) 1 K. B. 565, at p. 568) "in the absence of any special provision made by the parties with reference to the contingency of further performance of the contract becoming impossible, moneys paid in accordance with the terms of the contract must remain where they are when that contingency occurs; the party who has paid them, and by the contract was bound to pay them, cannot recover them back, but, as regards future liabilities, the contract is at an end." I cannot see why these words should be less applicable to a case where the contingency has occurred during and not before the commencement or performance of the contract, or what distinction can be drawn between the obligatory directions of the Shipping Controller, for which unexpected event this pre-war form of charter made no provision, and the unexpected cancellation of the Coronation Procession.

It is no doubt true that the object of payment in advance is to secure the chartered owner in dealing with a foreigner, but that is no measure of the meaning of the stipulation which requires it. I daresay that in some events to require payment in advance is stringent, but the debtor takes his chance and in most cases covers himself by insurance. This obligation cannot be measured by such considerations, nor is any special perspicuity necessary to the expression of it. In the case of prepaid bill of lading freight and of chartered freight for a voyage paid in advance, the risk is run every day and the law is clear; the loss of ship and cargo next day leaves the money prepaid in the receiver's hands. The reason is because payment is to be "in advance"; it is not also stipulated to be "on account." The money is not deposited, it is paid. Here the charterers got six days' service, at any rate, for their money, and when, on the 16th Aug., the further service was frustrated, the chartered owners reserved all their rights and the ship's service ended at Toulon. This was the charterer's misfortune; it was not the chartered owners' fault. The parties had made no provision for the event, and, if a court were to make compensation to the charterers at the chartered owners' expense by taking a mere proportion of a month's hire, several important stipulations would be overlooked and injustice would be done. Under this charter the charterer has to pay hire from the date when the steamer is placed at his disposal till he re-delivers her at the stipulated port of re-delivery in same good order as when delivered to him, and not on a Sunday or legal holiday. The length of this period cannot be fixed exactly in advance, and, therefore, all time charters have to be made with a certain elasticity in the charterer's interest. In this case the period was four months plus any further time needed to complete a voyage current on the expiry of the four months. It is a fallacy to suppose that this results in a hiring consisting of separate and disparate periods, to which different considerations apply. The period of hiring is one and continuous, though it is longer or shorter according as the ship is or is not on a voyage at the expiration of the four months, and, in fact, this last part of the hiring is expressed like the other to be "on the conditions herein stipulated." In this way the owners not merely get hire for the ship's use but, under clause 3, they are freed from a large part of the costs of bringing her back to a convenient port of re-delivery, such as coals, port charges, pilotages, tug-assistance, &c. The relevance of this is that, if there were a simple refund of hire paid in advance, proportionate to the number of days during which the ship was not at the charterer's disposal because she had been requisitioned and the charter "frustrated," the owner would be returning too much, for he would be getting no compensation for the loss of the advantage of having her brought home in large part at the charterer's expense, although he himself was in no default under the charter.

I would venture to ask this question: If clause 5 provides generally for a readjustment of a provisional advance by repayment of hire not earned, or if the hire, which is to be paid in advance under clause 5, means only hire for an efficient vessel placed at the charterers' disposal and does not extend to hire for a vessel not placed at their disposal, why are the clauses as to breakdown and loss of the ship required at all? The former is otiose; the latter should have been confined to the words prescribing the date for presumption of the loss. I agree that, if at the date of prepayment the charterers had a general right to have their advance payment readjusted in all events, for any fractional part of the month during which the ship might not prove to be at their disposal from any cause, the subsequent frustration would not defeat that right, but I fail to see how such a meaning can be extracted from the words of the charter. The charterers were relieved from having to bring the ship back to England to a coal port of their selection; they had no more hire to pay, no more bunkers to provide, but that is all. The word "hire" does not mean a payment commensurate with user; indeed, it is expressly provided that hire is not recoverable, when the opportunity for using the ship fails because, though efficient per se, she is weather bound and so of no use to anybody. Where a fractional payment constitutes hire, the charter says so; when advance payments are to be repaid, it says so; when it makes no provision in terms, none can be supplied by your Lordships. Where is there any provision for repayments in the event of frustration? The shipowner was thereby excused from earning his hire; why is he, nevertheless, required to repay it? The judgments of four learned judges of great experience in these matters have been given in favour of the respondents. After a careful re-examination of the matter I believe them to be in accordance with the current of authority in these matters for many years, and to be right.

Lord Parmoor.—This is an appeal from the order of the Court of Appeal of the 17th June 1920, affirming an order of Bailhache, J. to the effect that a full month's hire was payable to the respondents under the terms of a time charter-party, dated the 13th March 1919, between the respondents as owners of the steamship Ardoyne, and the appellant as charterers. The order of Bailhache, J. was made on an award, in the form of a special case, in an arbitration under the terms of the charter-party. The owners and the charterers submitted certain points of law to the umpire, but the only question now left in dispute is, whether the umpire was right in awarding that the French Marine were not on the 10th Aug. liable to pay a whole month's hire, but were only liable to pay a fractional part thereof. It is not disputed that the commercial adventure, contemplated in the charter-party, was frustrated as from the 16th Aug. 1919, by the direction of the Shipping Controller, that the steamer should proceed to Australia, to carry from there a cargo of wheat for account of the Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies.

The charter-party in question is a time charter party. The charterers, under clause 5, undertake to pay hire monthly in advance, in cash, in London, without discount until re-delivery of the ship to the owners. Re-delivery under the terms of the charter was made impossible after the frustration of the commercial adventure by the direction of the Shipping Controller. The provision "pro rata for any fractional part of a month" is a provision applicable when the ship has been re-delivered at such time, or under such conditions, that an adjustment of the amount of hire is necessitated under the terms of the charter-party. In this sense the amount paid in advance is a provisional payment, and if this is the meaning of the decision in Tonnelier v. Smith (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 77 L. T. Rep. 277) I am in agreement with the Court of Appeal in that case. It is necessary, therefore, further to consider whether at the date of the frustration of the contract any right of pro rata adjustment had accrued. It had not, I think, accrued either under the re-delivery clause, the breakdown clause, or the loss of steamer clause. The ship was on voyage at the expiration of the period fixed by the charter, but under clause 7 the charterers are to have her use at the rate, and on the conditions therein stipulated to enable them to complete the voyage; that is to say, on the payment of the monthly hire in advance, subject to any provisions in the charter for pro rata adjustment. The provision in clause 7, as to the deposit of money in dispute, has no application to the matters in dispute in the arbitration, and I cannot find that either party placed any reliance on this provision. There is no suggestion of a breakdown under clause 12, or of the loss of the steamer under clause 18. Under the terms of the charter there has been no re-delivery of the ship within the terms of the charter-party, such re-delivery being rendered impossible by the direction of the Shipping Controller, which frustrated the commercial adventure.

When the terms of a contract can no longer be carried out by either party, and there is no provision in the contract to meet this contingency, the contract cannot be treated as rescinded ab initio, but the parties are released from further performance. Thus any payment previously made and any legal right previously accrued according to the terms of the agreement will not be disturbed, but the courts will decline to construct a hypothetical contract by suggesting terms which were not within the intention of the parties when the contract was entered into. It has been pointed out that this principle may not in all cases provide an equitable settlement, but that there is no preferable alternative: (Civil Service Co-operative Society v. General Steam Navigation Company, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 477; 89 L. T. Rep. 429; (1903) 2 K. B. 756) and Chandler v. Webster (90 L. T. Rep. 217; (1904) 1 K. B. 493), Lloyd Royal Belge Société Anonyme v. Stathatos (34 Times L. Rep. 70). It follows that the money paid in advance for the full month cannot be recovered back in respect to the part of the month after the frustration unless the right to a pro rata adjustment had previously accrued. In my opinion no such right had accrued under the terms of the charter-party. The simple fact is that the parties at the time of the making the contract did not contemplate the contingency of a commercial frustration consequent on the order of a Food Controller, due to the outbreak of an European war, and made no provision to meet any such contingency.

The appeal should be dismissed.

Lord WRENBURY.—When the Ministry of Shipping intervened, there resulted two consequences—first, both parties were discharged from further performance of the contract, for further performance had been rendered impossible; and secondly, the charterer's obligation to pay hire until re-delivery of the vessel at a United Kingdom coal port was at an end because such re-delivery had been rendered impossible. Having stated these two consequences, I have stated all the consequences resulting from the frustration of the contract. Existing rights remained undisturbed. The contract was not torn up. It was not dead—it was partially paralysed. Some of the contractual terms retained, others had lost, their living force.

In Lloyd Royal Belge v. Stathatos (34 Times L. Rep. 70) hire had been paid in advance and the contract was frustrated by the detention of the ship by the British Government. Pickford, L.J. is there reported to have said that as a result of the intervention of the Government "the contract was at an end." And upon the question of the charterer's right to recover the hire paid in advance he is reported to have said that "the implication arising from" clause 21 in the charter "could only arise while the contract remained in existence. When the charter was put an end to, that implication did not arise. They could only recover the money by virtue of some provision in the contract, and as the contract had come to an end there was no provision under which the money could be recovered." I doubt whether Pickford, L.J. can be correctly reported. The report being only in the Times Law Reports will not have been revised by the judge, and I doubt whether he can have said that which is attributed to him and have laid down so general a proposition as is contained in the words I have quoted. If he is correctly reported I must say with all respect that I do not agree with that general proposition. As regards rights existing at the time of frustration the contract is, in my judgment, not impaired.

To ascertain those existing rights I have to read and construe the contract. That which remains is, in my judgment, merely a question of construction.

The questions to be determined are, first, whether on the 10th or the 16th Aug. the shipowner was entitled to sue the charterer for a full month's hire (what was at that time the existing right of the shipowner in this respect?); and, secondly, if he was so entitled whether the charterer could, in an appropriate state of facts, recover a proportion of the amount.

Hire is, primâ facie, a payment made for user This primâ facie meaning may be displaced by provisions in the contract. The charterer may have agreed to pay for the expectation of user; or he may have agreed to pay, whether he has user or not. I find that in this contract there are provisions that the charterer is not to pay if, in certain circumstances, he has not the user: (see art. 12). This, at first sight, seems to imply that, except in the defined circumstances, he is to pay, whether he has the user or not. The events, however, in which he is not to pay are confined to cases in which the ship is not in a condition efficient for user. If she is efficient, but time is lost by other causes, he is to pay. From these provisions arises an implication that hire in this contract means payment to be made for an efficient steamer whether the charterer has the actual user or not, but not an implication that it includes payment to be made for a steamer whose user has by frustration been made impossible. It does not follow, therefore, that in this contract the primâ facie meaning of hire, namely, payment for user, is displaced.

Upon this question, art. 18 is again instructive. If the steamer is lost, hire is not payable, after the date of the loss, and "hire paid in advance and not earned" is to be returned. Here is a plain indication that hire is not earned unless there be user or the opportunity of user.

Further, as regards the hire itself, I look to see whether the hire is necessarily so much a month (neither more or less), whether the use be for a month or less than a month, or whether the contract contemplates fractional sums for periods less than a month. The answer is that it does contemplate fractional amounts in some events at any rate. Under art. 5, the hire during the four months ending on the 10th Aug. is so much a month in advance, for any further period the hire is a fractional part to be calculated to the date of re-delivery. For my purpose it is not material for the moment to inquire whether the particular case in which a fractional payment is to be due is this case or not. The point is that a fractional and not an entire payment is under some circumstances "hire" under this contract. A similar observation arises upon art. 7. In the circumstances there contemplated the hire is to be "at the rate" stipulated by the contract—i.e., at the rate of so much a month, and, as the period of time for which the calculation at that rate is to be made may be uncertain, provision is made for deposit in joint names until that question has been settled.

Lastly, by art. 21, the charterer is to have a lien on the steamer for all moneys "paid in advance and not earned." Upon this the following passage in Tonnelier v. Smith (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 327; 77 L. T. Rep. 277) is relevant: "The last provision that the charterer was to have a lien on the ship for all moneys paid in advance and not earned makes it plain if it were otherwise doubtful, that the payments in advance were to be provisional only and not final, and would entitle the charterer to postpone delivery of the ship until the incurred payments were repaid."

With this I agree. And again, upon the question of construction it is not material that re-delivery of the ship is not now possible.

These being the provisions of the contract, the conclusion at which I arrive upon the question of construction is that hire here means payment due for an efficient vessel which the owner places at the disposal of the charterer whether from outside causes the charterer is able to make use of the efficient vessel or not, but does not extend to payment to be made for a vessel which the owner does not (because he cannot) place at the disposal of the charterer; that during the time when the owner does not place an efficient vessel at the disposal of the charterer the hire is "not earned"; that the provision of art. 21 that the charterer shall have a lien on the ship for moneys "paid in advance and not earned" (however difficult this may be to apply practically having regard to the provision as to hire continuing to accrue until re-delivery) shows that if the sum paid in advance turns out to be too large the charterer will have a right to recover.

Payment was not made on the 10th Aug. in advance—the question is whether the charterers are now liable to pay a full month's hire or a fractional part. It is not, I think, material to inquire whether the obligation was, and is, to pay a full month with a right of recovery of a proportionate part or to pay a fractional part. In either case the charterers, I think, are right in saying that the owners cannot demand and retain a full month's payment when the vessel was taken from the charterer during the currency of a month.

For these reasons I think that this appeal should be allowed.

AUSTRALASIAN UNITED STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED v. HUNT. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF FIJI.

Bill of lading—Clause requiring claims to be made within seven days—Refrigerating apparatus—Obligation to maintain imposed by statute on shipowner — Whether "weakened, lessened, or avoided" by the bill of lading—Fiji Ordinance No. XIV. of 1906, s. 4.

The Fiji Ordinance, No. XIV. of 1906, relating to the sea carriage of goods (which is in substance identical with the Sea Carriage of Goods Act 1904 of Australia) enacts by sect. 4 that where any bill of lading or document contains any clause whereby the obligation of a ship-owner (inter alia) to make and keep the ship's refrigerating chambers fit for the carriage and preservation of the goods should in any way be weakened, lessened, or avoided, that clause shall be illegal and void. By sect. 5 the parties to a bill of lading are to be deemed to have intended to contract according to the laws in force at the place of shipment, and by sect. 7 (1) a warranty shall be implied that the ship shall be at the beginning of the voyage seaworthy in all respects.

The respondent shipped at Fiji bananas on board a vessel belonging to the appellants. The bill of lading provided that no claim for loss or damage should be enforceable unless made within seven days from the date at which the cargo was or should have been landed. The refrigerating chambers were defective and the fruit was damaged on the voyage. The shipper sued to recover the loss so caused him, contending that the shipowners were liable in that the ship was unseaworthy, but he failed to claim within seven days.

Held, that as the clause in the bill of lading weakened or lessened the ship-owners' obligation, it was void under sect. 4 of the Ordinance, and consequently the shipper was not barred by his delay in claiming from recovering damages.

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Fiji affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Fiji dated the 21st Oct. 1919.

The action was brought by the respondent against appellants claiming damages for negligence and breach of duty in the carriage of bananas shipped in the appellants' steamship, Levuka, from Fiji for delivery in New South Wales. The only question to be decided by their Lordships was whether by the terms of the two bills of lading under which the fruit was carried the appellants were freed from liability. The facts and the material terms of the bills of lading, each of which contained the same conditions and of Fiji Ordinance XIV. of 1906 (the Sea-Carriage of Goods Ordinance) are set out in the judgment of their Lordships. The negligence alleged consisted in the defective condition of the refrigerating chambers of the vessel as found by Sir C. S. Dawson, C.J., who tried the action. That finding of fact could not be challenged, but he held that the conditions in the bills of lading did not apply, since the action was in respect of an implied and not an express warranty, and he accordingly entered judgment against the appellants for 547*l.* 14*s.*

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord HALDANE.—This is an appeal of the defendants in an action from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Fiji. The claim in that action was for damage suffered by a consignment of bananas shipped by the respondent on a vessel belonging to the appellants. It was adjudged that the respondent should recover 547*l.* 14*s.* and costs.

The respondent is a planter residing and carrying on business in Fiji. The appellants are shipowners. No question now arises as to the fact of damage or the amount, or of such damage having been due to the unseaworthiness of the appellants' vessel, the Levuka, on which the bananas were shipped in Fiji for delivery in New South Wales. The unseaworthiness consisted in the defective condition of the refrigerating chambers of the vessel, as established. But a question which remains is whether, by the terms of the two bills of lading, under which the fruit was carried, the appellants are freed from liability.

Before considering the terms of the bills of lading, their Lordships think it important to refer to the provisions of the Fiji Ordinance of 1906 relating to the sea carriage of goods. This Ordinance follows in substance the analogy of the well-known Harter Act of the United States, as well as that of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act 1904, of the Australian Commonwealth. The Ordinance enacts (sect. 4) that:

> Where any bill of lading or document contains any clause, covenant or agreement whereby (a) the owner, charterer, master or agent of any ship, or the ship itself, is relieved from liability from loss or damage to goods arising from the harmful or improper condition of the ship's hold, or any other part of the ship in which goods are carried, or arising from negligence, fault or failure in the proper loading, stowage, custody, care or delivery of goods received by them, or any of them, to be carried in or by the ship; or (b) any obligations of the owner or charterer of any ship to exercise due diligence and to properly man, equip and supply the ship, to keep the ship seaworthy, and to make and keep the ship's hold, refrigerating and cool chambers, and all other parts of the ship in which the goods are carried, fit and safe for their reception, carriage and preservation, are in any wise weakened, lessened or avoided; or (c) the obligation of the masters, officers, agents or servants of any ship to carefully handle and stow goods and to care for, preserve and properly deliver them, are in any way lessened, weakened or avoided, that clause, covenant or agreement, shall be illegal null and void and of no effect.

By sect. 5 the parties to any bill of lading are to be deemed to have intended to contract according to the laws in force at the place of shipment. By sect. 7 (1):

> In every bill of lading with respect to goods a warranty shall be implied that the ship shall be at the beginning of the voyage seaworthy in all respects, and properly manned, equipped and supplied.

The bills of lading provided that the goods were received for shipment subject to the terms, conditions and exceptions indorsed on the back which were to form part of the contract. Along with these was a provision that the appellants received the goods to be forwarded subject to any statutory exemptions and limitations, and on the terms contained in the document, but that such terms were to be construed as qualified by the provisions of the Sea Carriage of Goods Act 1904, already mentioned, which, as their Lordships have observed, is substantially the same in its provisions as the Fiji Ordinance of 1906. Among the terms indorsed were the exemption of the appellants from liability for loss or damage due to accidents arising from defects in the fittings or appurtenances of the ship. There was also a clause (No. 17) under which any claim for loss or damage to goods was to be restricted to the wholesale cash value at the port of discharge and must be made in writing within seven days from the date at which the cargo was or should have been landed. Otherwise such claim was not to be enforceable.

Reading the terms of the Ordinance, which are controlling, into those of the bills of lading, it is obvious that if the latter conflict with the former the former must prevail. This being so, the first question which arises is whether there was imported into the bills of lading an obligation on the owners that the ship should be seaworthy, and in particular that the refrigerating chambers should be in adequate condition for the transport of the bananas. It is clear that this question must be answered in the affirmative, and that if the bills of lading contained any stipulation inconsistent with such a provision, the stipulation was inoperative.

The second question is whether the bills of lading actually contained any such inconsistent stipulation. What happened was that when the ship arrived at Sydney and Melbourne, her ports of destination in Australia, the fruit turned out to have been damaged on the voyage by the imperfect condition of the insulating chambers. But the respondent did not give notice of his claim within seven days of the arrival of the Levuka at the ports of discharge, and if the condition as to the necessity for that in clause 17 of the bills of lading was operative, that fact would have exonerated the appellants from liability. The point is, therefore, whether the terms of the ordinance have rendered the condition as to notice inoperative. Their Lordships think that this question must be answered in the affirmative. Reliance was placed for the appellants on decisions in the courts of the United States, such as those in the cases of The Persiana in 1911 (185 Fed. Rep. 396), The Westminster (127 Fed. Rep. 680), and The St. Hubert (107 Fed. Rep. 727), to which their Lordships would have attached much importance had the question been in reality analogous to that which arises in the appeal before them. But there the provision in the bills of lading was merely that the owner was not to be held liable for any damage to goods, notice of which was not given before the removal of the goods. This was held not to be inconsistent with the provisions of the Harter Act. In the case of such provision it may be that it can be treated as not affecting the substantial right which that Act gives, but as restricted to the character of the evidence by which it is to be established, and therefore as confined to procedure and as not extending to interference with substantive title. In the present case the conditions contained in clause 17 are that the claim is not only to be restricted, but that it must be made in writing and within seven days from the date of landing of the cargo. Their Lordships are of opinion that such conditions affect the substance of the right conferred by the Fiji Ordinance, which is to treat as void any condition by which the absolute right to recover for damage due to failure to keep the refrigerating chambers in good condition was "in any wise weakened, lessened, or avoided." On this question the judgment of Horridge, J. in Hordern v. Commonwealth and Dominion Line Limited (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 51; 116 L. T. Rep. 501; (1917) 2 K. B. 420) is instructive.

As they have already said, their Lordships also think that the same provision in the ordinance rendered it impossible for the appellants to say that no warranty as to seaworthiness was implied. But it has been contended that it was open to them to stipulate validly that they should not be liable for damage arising from defects in the fittings of the ship, if the stipulation was restricted to a warranty that was merely implied. Their Lordships might have called upon the respondent for an argument upon this point, but in the view which they take on the earlier question, which goes to the root of this appeal, they are of opinion that it is unnecessary to pronounce upon it.

They will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN C. T. COGSTAD AND CO. AND H. NEWSUM, SONS, AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Arbitration—Practice—Appeal—Case stated by arbitrator—Arbitrator desiring case may go back in certain events—Consultative jurisdiction of court—Arbitration Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 7 and 19.

An award stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the High Court is not a final award stated in accordance with sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889, if on the face of the award it is apparent that in the exercise of the duties originally undertaken by him the arbitrator desires that in a certain event further opportunity should be afforded for the final exercise of his authority. Such an award is an award stated for the consultative opinion of the court under sect. 19 of the Act.

An umpire in stating a special case after stating certain findings of fact and conclusions of law proceeded, "The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party and the facts as stated by me the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in point of law. If they be correct, my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particular, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court."

Held, (Lord Parmoor and Lord Carson dissenting) that the award was not final and no appeal lay from the decision of the judge at the hearing of the award.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134; 124 L. T. Rep. 204; (1921) 1 K. B. 87) affirmed.

APPEAL from an order of the majority of the Court of Appeal (Bankes, and Warrington, L.JJ. (Scrutton, L.J. dissentiente) (reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134: 124 L. T. Rep. 204; (1921) 1 K. B. 87) refusing to hear an appeal against a judgment of Bailhache, J. (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 19) given on the hearing of an award stated in the form of a special case.

By the order it was adjudged as a preliminary point that no appeal lay from the judgment for the reason that such award was not stated in the form of a special case under sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889, but was a special case stated under sect. 19 of that Act.

By a submission contained in a charter-party disputes were referred to two arbitrators and, if they could not agree, to an umpire. The umpire by his award, which was stated in the form of a special case, set out the facts and decided that the appellants, the ship-owners, were responsible to the respondents, the charterers, for breach of a charter-party and assessed damages for the breach, and he concluded as follows: "The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party and the facts stated by me the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in law. If they be correct, my award is to stand, but if they be incorrect in any particulars, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the Court."

Bailhache, J. upheld the award.

Upon appeal to the Court of Appeal, a preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the charterers that no appeal lay from the judgment of Bailhache, J. because the special case stated by the umpire was not a final award stated for the opinion of the court under sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889, but was a case stated for the opinion of the court under sect. 19. The Court of Appeal (Scrutton, L.J. dissentiente) decided that the objection prevailed as the case, from the language used, must be taken to have been stated under sect. 19, and the jurisdiction of the court under that section being consultative only, they had no power to entertain the appeal.

The Arbitration Act 1889 provides that:

Sect. 7. The arbitrator or umpire acting under a submission shall, unless the submission expresses a contrary intention, have power (a) to administer oaths to or take the affirmations of the parties and witnesses appearing; and (b) to state an award as to the whole or part thereof in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court; and (c) to correct in an award any clerical error arising from any accidental slip or omission.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sect. 19. Any referee, arbitrator or umpire may, at any stage in the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the court or a judge, state, in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, any question of law arising in the course of the reference.

Lord BUCKMASTER.—By charter-party dated the 8th April 1916, and made between the appellants, as the owners of the steamship Lord on the one part, and the respondents as charterers of the vessel on the other, the said steamship was chartered for a term of six months from the date of delivery. The charter-party contained provisions that the captain should prosecute his voyage with due dispatch and exempted the owner from liability for damage from various causes therein specified, including negligence default or error of judgment of the masters. There was also the usual provision that, in case of dispute, the matter should be referred to the arbitration in London of two arbitrators and their umpires.

On the 26th Sept. 1916, the vessel, after loading, left Liverpool on a voyage to Archangel in accordance with the instructions given by the respondents. The voyage was never completed owing to the fact that the master, in anticipation of danger due to German submarines, delayed the ship, and, on the 2nd Nov. the monthly freight due on the 19th Oct. being unpaid, the appellants withdrew the vessel from the service of the respondents.

Disputes consequently arose between the parties, the appellants claiming for hire, war insurance and other expenses, and the respondents for loss incurred by withdrawal and delay. These disputes were referred to arbitration in accordance with the provisions of the charter-party. The arbitration was duly held, and, on the 21st Nov. 1919, an award was issued in the form of a special case. The whole question on this appeal is whether this award was a complete and final exercise of the power of the arbitrator, or whether it was partial and interlocutory, reserving powers which had not been exercised and which, in certain events, the arbitrator would be compelled to exercise in order to put a final conclusion to the dispute. The important difference of these two views is due to the provisions of the Arbitration Act. This provides, by sect. 7, that the arbitrator should have the power to state a final award in the form of a special case ; but, by sect. 19, power is also given to state a special case on any question at law at any stage of the proceedings. If the special case be stated under sect. 7 it can be appealed from the judge who determines it to the Court of Appeal ; but, in the latter case, the decision of the judge before whom the matter is first heard cannot be challenged. It is under this latter head that the respondents say that the present case falls. Consequently they contend the decision of Bailhache, J. (reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 19), before whom the matter was first heard, is complete, and the Court of Appeal had no jurisdiction to entertain this matter.

The Court of Appeal has taken this view, Scrutton, L.J. dissenting, and it is from this decision that this appeal has been brought.

The whole difficulty is due to the ambiguous form of the award issued. It is stated upon its face to be an award and, after a general recital, contains the statement that the arbitrator had been requested to make an award in the form of a special case, and it concludes with a final assessment of costs. All this is properly referable to the idea that the award is a final statement under sect. 7 ; but clause 21 modifies the effect of this language and gives rise to the difficulty. That clause finds its place in the award after the full examination of the facts.

He states that the voyage was abandoned on the 31st Oct. and that the owners were justified in withdrawing the steamer for non-payment of the hire, but that they committed a breach of clause 9, which provides that the captain should prosecute his voyage with the utmost dispatch. On these views he assessed the damage due to the owners and to the charterers respectively, leaving a balance in favour of the owners of a sum of 1849*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* He then concludes in these words : " (21) The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party and the facts as stated by me the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in point of law. If they be correct, my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particulars, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court."

The appellants contend that the qualified form of this clause is merely nothing but an expression of the arbitrator's wish that, if the court thinks he has been wrong in a point of law, it should exercise the power under sect. 10 to remit the award for the purpose of re-determining the amount of damage ; they suggest that, in fact, this would only require a small and simple sum in arithmetic ; and they finally point out that the final clause which awards the cost of arbitration shows that the matter was complete.

I find myself unable to accept this view. The only way in which it is possible to ascertain what was the real effect of this award is to construe its language. Unless it can be found that, according to its terms, the powers of the arbitrator were so exercised that, in any event, his duties under the arbitration were ended, and that he reserved to himself no further power in any event, then the award cannot be regarded as final.

The prefatory language of question 21 is strongly relied upon by the appellants ; but there was no need for any such statement at all if the award was intended to be complete. If the matter reserved was nothing but a mere calculation of figures already ascertained and which could not upon any interpretation of the law be altered, it would then have been a simple matter for the arbitrator to have stated that in the event of his conclusion as to the construction of the charter-party being held to be erroneous, he had assessed the final figures in the manner suggested, or he might have left the matter entirely alone, leaving the court, if it were necessary, to send it back for re-adjudication; or the parties themselves could, on that hypothesis, have settled the figures without further reference.

The fact that he had expressly desired that the matter should be referred back to him for re-assessment of the damages is to my mind inconsistent with the view that his power to decide the amount of the damage, which was not in terms assessed, had been fully and effectually discharged.

In the case of the Holland Steamship Company and others (95 L. T. Rep. 769), the circumstances were the same as in the present, excepting that the award stated that if the opinions given by the arbitrator were wrong, "the matter is to be remitted" to give effect to the true construction of the contract. I agree with Bankes, L.J. and Warrington, L.J. in thinking that the difference in language between that award and the present is immaterial, and I agree also with both those learned judges that the principle upon which that case proceeded was correct.

The case of Shubrook v. Tufnell (46 L. T. Rep. 749; 9 Q. B. Div. 621) is a case which arose on a discussion as to whether or not an appeal from a decision upon a special case the matter should take its place on the final or interlocutory list; but the Master of the Rolls, in deciding that it ought to appear in the final list, made a statement, upon which Scrutton, L.J. places considerable reliance in arriving at his conclusion. In that case Sir George Jessel said, referring to the case of Collins v. Paddington Vestry (5 Q. B. Div. 368) that "that case only held that where the decision of the court on the point submitted to it could not in any event necessitate the entering of final judgment for either party, the decision was interlocutory. Here, if we differ from the court below, final judgment has to be entered for the defendant, and there is an end of the action."

He appears to assume that if an award is made in such a form that in one event a decision will make it final that constitutes a final award.

I am unable to agree with this view. It does not appear to me that an arbitrator has exhausted the duties he has undertaken if he makes an award that is final in one event alone and leaves open and undetermined what may happen in any other event, and desires that on the happening of that event the matter shall be sent back to him for completion. It makes no difference how much or how little of his original power as arbitrator is retained, if in fact from the award itself it can be seen that, in the exercise of the duties originally undertaken by him the arbitrator desires, in certain circumstances, that further opportunity should be afforded for the final exercise of that authority the award cannot be regarded as final.

I think the judgment of the Court of Appeal is correct and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Sumner.—It is from the award itself and from the language in which the umpire has expressed it, that we have to gather what he meant or more exactly what he did. The question is this: When he executed this award did he end his umpirage by making a final award, imperfect in form it may be but exhaustive of his functions, or did he merely submit to the court a question of law on the footing of such findings as he had already arrived at, the answer to which would decide whether he must continue to exercise his arbitral functions, in accordance with a right to do so which by the award he reserved to himself?

Substantially all turns on par. 21. The prefatory words "having been requested to make my award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, do hereby make my award accordingly," agree somewhat better with a final than with a consultative award, for they are quite suitable to the former while the latter, though not wrongly so expressed, would more naturally not be called "my award." I do not, however, think the words are sufficiently significant to modify the effect of par. 21, which in terms states what the relation of the umpire to the court is and what question he submits to it.

The material words of par. 21 are "if they"—that is "the decisions at which I have arrived"—"are correct, my award is to stand, but, if incorrect in any particulars, I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court." The best way for the appellants of reading these words is that adopted by Scrutton, L.J., namely, that the umpire therein requests the court to exercise its powers of sending the case back to him, if, in its discretion, it thinks fit to do so, but this is open to the comment that, if that was what was meant it should have been more clearly stated, or better still, have been left to the court and not stated at all. I think the natural meaning of the words is this: "On the question whether the shipowners are excused from liability for their captain's default, I hold in law that they are not, and have included in my award certain damages against them accordingly. I may be wrong in so holding, but have not hitherto thought it necessary to make up an alternative computation of the damages. I wish to be told if I am right or wrong. If I am wrong, I wish to have the opportunity of completing my award by finding what in that event I should have to decide, though, if I have been right, it does not arise for decision." This accords with the words "for re-assessment of the damages," for the effect of reversing the umpire's decision upon this question of law would be more than a mere rectification of the arithmetic disclosed on the face of the award. The amounts dealt with by the umpire are not so stated in the award as to dispense with "readjustments" by some one, who knows more of the matter than the award itself tells the court.

This construction seems plain but, if the words were ambiguous, I think that the result would be the same for, it should be presumed that the umpire meant to do, and so worded his award as to do, his duty, which was to decide all questions submitted directly or indirectly for his decision. This he would only do, if he consulted the court on the point of law, reserving the final award on the fact in the alternative till he had received a direction.

I think the appeal fails.

Lord Parmoor.—I agree with the opinion expressed by Scrutton, L.J. in the Court of Appeal, and think that the appeal should be allowed. There is a right of appeal, unless the case stated by the umpire comes under sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act of 1889. The determination of the appeal depends upon the construction of the document of the 21st Nov. 1919, signed by the umpire.

The document is designated an award, and the umpire recites that he has been requested to make his award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, and that he thereby so makes his award accordingly. It was argued that this recital was consistent with the statement of a special case, either under sect. 7 or under sect. 19 of the Arbitration Act 1889. I cannot agree with this contention. The power given to an umpire under sect. 7 is to make an award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court. This is in accord with the language of the recital. Under sect. 19 there is no award. The umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference state, or be ordered to state, in the form of a special case, for the opinion of the court, any question of law arising in the course of the reference. This distinction is fundamental. The purpose of a case stated under sect. 19 is to enable the umpire to obtain guidance during the pendency of the reference in order to assist him in arriving at his decision. Although a case may be stated under this section at any stage of the proceedings, it cannot be stated after an award has been made. The language used by Bowen, L.J. in Re Knight and the Tabernacle Permanent Building Society (67 L. T. Rep. 403; (1892) 2 Q. B. 613), has been accepted in all subsequent cases: "The section contemplates a proceeding by the arbitrator for the purpose of guiding himself as to the course he should pursue in the reference. He does not divest himself of his complete authority over the subject-matter of the arbitration. He still remains the final judge of law and fact." I think that the umpire in the present case did divest himself of his complete authority over the subject-matter of the arbitration and that his intention to do so is clear on the construction of the document.

It is not necessary to go through the document in detail, but, inter alia, the umpire found that the owners of the ship had committed a breach of clause 9 of the charter-party and assessed the damages for the breach at 4586*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* He further found that, subject to the opinion of the court of law, there was nothing due by the owners to the charterers, but that there was due by the charterers to the owners the sum of 1849*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* in full settlement of all accounts. In respect of a claim made by the charterers for cash advanced by the captain, he disallowed the amount as the charterers had not produced satisfactory proof of such advance. These are decisions made by the umpire under the terms of the reference, and in respect of them he has discharged his duty as the judge of law and fact. Clause 21 is as follows: "The question for the opinion of the court is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party, and the facts as stated by me, the decisions at which I have arrived are correct in point of law. If they be correct my award is to stand, but if incorrect in any particulars I desire that the award may be referred back to me for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court." There can be no doubt as to the effect of this clause. In one alternative the award stands as the final judgment of the umpire, in the other alternative a desire is expressed that the award be referred back to the umpire for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court. It was argued that it was not the intention of an umpire to state a case under sect. 7 because he had not dealt with one or more alternative assessments, which only become material if a decision at which he has arrived is not correct in point of law. I think that this contention cannot be maintained. I do not doubt the importance of the form in which a question or questions are submitted for the opinion of the court, but it is only one of the contentions relevant to the construction of the document as a whole, and is not in itself a conclusive test. The umpire asks whether the decisions at which he has arrived are correct in point of law. If the court agree in this view the umpire has once and for all divested himself of his authority over the subject-matter of the arbitration. I do not desire to place my decision on any meticulous analysis of the language used, and think the result would be the same, whether the umpire had expressed his desire that the award should be referred to him in a certain contingency, or had used the language which was used in Holland Steamship Company v. Bristol Navigation Company (sup.). If an umpire intending to state a case under sect. 7 states it in such a form as not to enable the court to give a final decision on all the matters in issue, there is ample power under sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889 to remit the matters referred, or any of them, to the reconsideration of the umpire. It would not be necessary to make such a remission if the court agree that the decisions at which the umpire has arrived are correct in point of law. As a matter of convenience and economy, it may often happen that a long inquiry into alternatives will be avoided, if, on one point, the decision of an umpire is upheld. I can see no reason why this form of procedure should not be adopted. One of the difficulties in arbitration practice, before the Act of 1889 consisted in the want of an alternative procedure to the revocation of a submission. This alternative is supplied by sect. 10.

The last paragraph in the document is an award of the costs of the arbitration. This, again, is an important matter on which the arbitrator has divested himself of his authority. To award the costs of the arbitration is a necessary factor for finality, in an award stated as a special case under sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889, but is not consistent with the statement of a special case under sect. 19, which is only a step in procedure during the pendency of the reference. In such a case the costs are in the discretion of the arbitrator or umpire and would naturally not be dealt with by him until he made his award. Subject, therefore to the authorities, to which I propose to call attention, the document of the 21st Nov., signed by the umpire, denotes, in my opinion, the intention of the umpire to state his award in the form of a special case, and negatives the suggestion that the umpire intended merely to ask the opinion of the court in a case stated under sect. 19.

The case of Shubrook v. Tufnell (46 L. T. Rep. 749; 9 Q. B. Div. 621) raised the question whether a case stated for the opinion of the court, which, in the alternative, was to be referred back to the arbitrator, and in which an order had been made for reference back to the arbitrator, was appealable. No doubt this case was before the Arbitration Act 1889 and therefore the effect of sect. 19 of that Act could not be considered, but it is an authority to show that under conditions similar to those in the present case, an appeal would lie, unless it is held that the arbitrator intended to proceed under sect. 19. The decision was that of Sir George Jessel, M.R. and Lindley, L.J. concurred. The judgment says:

"If we differ from the court below, final judgment has to be entered for the defendant, and there is an end of the action." It makes no difference that under later procedure an award can be enforced by an order without the necessity of bringing an action. That case was further considered in Bozson v. Altrincham Urban District Council (1903, 1 K. B. 547), when the question arose whether an appeal from an order made in an action was an appeal from a final order. The case of Salaman v. Warner (1891, 1 Q. B. 734) was quoted to maintain the proposition that an order is not a final order unless it is one made on such an application or proceeding that, for whichever side the decision is given, it will, if it stands, finally determine the matter in litigation. Reference was also made to Re Herbert Reeves and Co. (85 L. T. Rep. 495; (1902) 1 Ch. 29). The earlier decision of the Court of Appeal in Shubrook v. Tufnell (sup.), which was not cited in Salaman v. Warner (sup.), and which appeared to be in conflict with it, was also called to the attention of the court. In his judgment, Lord Halsbury said that he preferred the earlier decision of Shubrook v. Tufnell (sup.), and thought that the order appealed from was a final order. In the same case Lord Alverstone, C.J. takes as the real test whether the judgment or order, as made, finally disposes of the rights of parties. Applying this test to the present case, Bailhache, J. found that the award was correct, and the appeal is against a decision which, as made, does finally dispose of the rights of the parties. The conclusion from these cases is that where one alternative may finally dispose of the rights of the parties, the fact that there are other alternatives, which may require further consideration, is not in itself a sufficient ground on which to found the conclusion that the arbitrator did not intend to make an award in the form of a special case, but only to ask the opinion of the court for his guidance on the point of law. The case relied on by the respondents is the Holland Steamship Company's case, in which the Master of the Rolls (Lord Collins) and Farwell, L.J. held that, as the umpire had said the case was to go back if either or both points had been wrongly decided, the case was under sect. 19. Scrutton, L.J. who was umpire in this case, retained the opinion that his decision was a final decision, "as it was stated to be, and certainly intended to be, and not an interlocutory one," and that he did not intend to retain any seisin or conduct of the case. In the present case I agree with Scrutton, L.J. that the umpire does not retain any control or conduct of the arbitration after the issue of the document of the 21st Nov. 1919. Any further reference to him would not arise from the terms of the submission, but only in the event of the court's exercising its powers under sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act 1889. Bankes, L.J. thinks that arbitrators would be well advised, when stating a special case, to state, on the face of the case, under which section it intended to be stated. I do not question the advantage of adopting this course of procedure. The umpire, in stating the special case under appeal, has, in my opinion, clearly expressed on the face of the case, that it is intended to be stated under sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act 1889. It is on this ground that I think the appeal should be allowed.

Lord WRENBURY:—The alternatives are two. The one is that this is a final award—that the authority of the umpire is at an end, that he has bid farewell to the arbitration and is no longer umpire—although by an order under sect. 10 he could be recalled to the office which otherwise he has vacated. The other is that this is a consultative award—that he has retained his hold over the matters submitted to his arbitration—that his authority is not over—and that he awaits the opinion of this court before he resumes and concludes his duties. To determine which is the true view recourse must be had to the language of the award itself. The question turns, I think, upon the language of art. 21, not forgetting any other article in the document which may throw light upon the true meaning of art. 21.

As I read art. 21 the umpire is here saying—I ask the opinion of the court upon a definite question of law. If the answer is A. then my award is to stand (implying that in some other state of circumstances it is not to stand). But if it is B. my award is not to stand for I have by my award assessed the damages, and if the answer is B. that assessment is not to stand. I shall have to assess the damages anew. If he reserves the power to assess the damages anew he can only assess them anew under the authority which is in him as umpire, and his office as umpire must be a continuing office.

It is argued that the words "I desire that the award may be "referred back to me" import not that he is retaining his hold upon his office, but that he is requesting the court to make an order under sect. 10 reviving his office. I do not so read them. I think the language of the article means "In event A. I have, in event B. I have not assessed the damages" (which was the fact) "and in event B. I must go on and assess them."

Art. 22 has given me some concern. The umpire there assesses the costs of the arbitration and directs their payment as to two-thirds by the owners and one-third by the charterers. It may be that his apportionment was based upon the damages as he had assessed them in case A., and it would not be unlikely that if the relevant case should turn out to be B. he would desire to reconsider that. But it is not obvious or necessary that he should desire to retain the power to alter the apportionment which he had thought proper to make. I cannot, from the fact that he was committing himself finally as to costs, infer that he was concluding his office as regards the assessment of the damages in case B.

I think that this was not a final award under sect. 7, but an award under sect. 19, and that there is no appeal.

It results that, in my judgment, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord CARSON.—I agree with the judgment of Scrutton, L.J. in the Court of Appeal, and with the reasons upon which he has based it. The question is whether the award has been stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court under sect. 7 of the Arbitration Act, or whether the arbitrator has found it necessary under sect. 19 in the course of the proceeding under the reference to consult the court for his guidance before making a final award. Upon reading the award I am of opinion that the arbitrator intended to make and did make a final award—that he has decided all the questions which have been submitted to him or have arisen in the course of the reference, and finally that he has dealt with the costs of the arbitration which he could only do in the event of a final adjudication upon the case submitted to him.

It is true that in clause 20 the award is expressed to be made subject to the opinion of the court upon any point of law, and that in clause 21 the arbitrator states that the question for the opinion of the courts is whether upon the true construction of the charter-party and the facts as stated by him the decisions at which he has arrived are correct in point of law.

As the court before whom the case stated came agreed with the arbitrator in his construction of the charter-party and the decisions at which the arbitrator had arrived, it became unnecessary to remit the award for any further consideration.

It was argued before this House that as the arbitrator had not decided the liability of the parties in the event of a different view being taken by the court and had stated in clause 21 that if his decision was not correct in any particular he "desired" that the award might be referred back to him for re-assessment of the damages due in accordance with the decision of the court, the award could not be considered a final one. I agree with Scrutton, L.J. that where the arbitrator expresses his final opinion in the form of a special case, he need not and in many cases he could not be expected to work out all the possible results which might follow from the various views that the court might take, and indeed I think it was with a view to meeting such a difficulty that sect. 10 of the Arbitration Act was enacted. The expression of his desire that under circumstances the award might be referred back to him does not in my opinion prevent the award from being a final one as it is merely referring to the power given by sect. 10 of the statute to the court before whom the special case would come for decision. I am therefore of opinion that this appeal should be allowed.

OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP CELIA v. OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP VOLTURNO; THE VOLTURNO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Collision—Damage—Loss agreed in foreign currency—Rate of Exchange—Date of conversion.

Held (Lord Carson dissenting), that in an action of negligence causing collision and damage to a ship and consequent loss of the use of the ship during detention for repairs, the damages must be assessed with reference to the actual period of detention. And if those damages are agreed in a foreign currency the tribunal must convert them into English currency at the rate of exchange ruling at the time the detention occurred.

Order of Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of Hill, J. (reported ante, p. 288; 125 L. T. Rep. 191; (1920) P. 447), affirmed.

Decision in Di Ferdinando v. Simon and Co. (124 L. T. Rep. 117; (1920) 3 K. B. 409), applied.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Celia from an order dismissing their appeal with costs from a decree of Hill, J. on a motion in objection to the registrar's report in an action of damage by collision (reported ante, p. 288; 125 L. T. Rep. 191; (1920) P. 447).

The collision took place in the Mediterranean Sea between the steamship Celia and the steamship Volturno, an Italian ship, on the 17th Dec. 1917. Both vessels were equally to blame for the collision and both were damaged. The cross claims for damages were referred to the registrar for assessment, but were subsequently agreed and no reference was held. Subsequently a difference arose as to the date at which the rate of exchange allowed to the owners of the Volturno for loss by detention during repairs, should be taken, and that point was submitted to the registrar. The registrar reported that in his opinion the time at which the rate of exchange should be calculated was the "date of payment." At that time (since 1920) the rate of exchange was over 66 lire to the £ sterling. At the dates when the two periods of detention for temporary and permanent repairs were incurred the rate of exchange was only 39.9 and 41.3 lire respectively.

The owners of the Volturno gave notice of objection to the report of the registrar and submitted that they had at the dates when the losses by detention were respectively suffered an accrued right to recover from the owners of the Celia a sum of British sterling determined by the rates of exchange prevailing at the time, together with interest until payment and that the subsequent fluctuations of exchange could not increase or diminish the amount so recoverable.

Hill, J. following the decision of the Court of Appeal in Di Ferdinando v. Simon Smits and Co. Ltd. (124 L. T. Rep. 117; (1920) 3 K. B. 409), held that the respondents claim for detention must be assessed with reference to the rate of exchange prevailing at the actual period of detention. He therefore, allowed the appeal with costs.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Sterndale, M.R., and Atkin and Younger, L.JJ.) refrained from giving any opinion on the merits dealing with the matter merely by adopting the view of Hill, J. that the case was covered by the decision of the other branch of the Court of Appeal, (Bankes, Warrington and Scrutton, L.JJ.) in Di Ferdinando's case.

After consideration their Lordships dismissed the appeal, Lord Carson dissenting.

Lord BUCKMASTER.—On the 17th Dec. 1917, a collision occurred in the Mediterranean between the steamship Celia, which belongs to the appellants, and the Italian steamship Volturno, which is the property of the respondents.

The dispute as to liability for the collision was determined in this country in an action before Hill, J. who decided, on the 22nd July 1919, that both vessels were to blame and referred the question of damages to the registrar. The cross claims for damages were agreed between the parties. The claim of the owners of the Volturno included one for loss due to the fact that the vessel was under hire to the Italian Ministry of Marine at all material dates, and that in consequence of her detention for the necessary repairs from the 25th to 30th Dec. 1917 at Gibraltar, and the 24th Jan. to the 18th Feb. 1918 at Newport, deductions for her hire were made amounting in all to 304,418 lire. That the Volturno is entitled to damages under this head is admitted. But the question is, at what date ought the rate of exchange to be fixed, in order that those damages which were originally assessed in lire should be converted into sterling. The registrar held that the date at which the damage was assessed was the correct date, but Hill, J. decided that the time when the actual loss for each detention was incurred was the correct period, and this view has been confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

It is suggested that special considerations may apply in regard to the particular circumstances in which this matter arises for determination, but I cannot see that any of these circumstances take this case out of the general rule and it is the nature of that general rule which your Lordships are asked to consider and determine. There are only two possible dates put forward as the dates upon which the conversion can be made. The one is the date when the actual loss was incurred and the other the date when the judgment assessing it was delivered. The suggestion that it might be the date of the writ was incapable of being supported and has not been argued. For the purpose of determining which of these two periods is correct it is essential to examine what it is that the judgment effects.

It is argued on behalf of the appellants that it should be considered as divided into two parts, the one declaratory of liability determined in lire and fixed at the date when the damage was incurred and the other as a matter of mere machinery converting the lire into sterling at the date of the judgment.

That, to my mind, is not the true function and purpose of the judgment. A judgment, whether for breach of contract or for tort, where, as in this case, the damage is not continuing, does not proceed by determining what is the sum which, without regarding other circumstances, would at the time of the hearing afford compensation for the loss, but what was the loss actually proved to have been incurred either at the time of the breach or in consequence of the wrong.

With regard to an ordinary claim for breach of contract this is plain. Assuming that the breach complained of was the non-delivery of goods according to contract, the measure of damage is the loss sustained at the time of the breach measured by the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods at that date.

As was stated by Wright, J. in the case of Joyner v. Weeks (65 L. T. Rep. 16; (1891) 2 Q. B. 31, at p. 33): "Many cases may be put in which it is plainly immaterial that at the commencement of an action for a breach of contract the plaintiff is, in fact, no worse off than he would have been if the contract had been performed."

And as an instance of this proposition, he gives the alteration of market values. By the same process of reasoning a person who has committed a breach cannot have his liability increased by such a cause.

Similar considerations apply to an action for tort. In cases where, as in the present, the damage is fixed and definite, and due to conditions determined at a particular date, the amount of damage is assessed by reference to the then existing circumstances, and subsequent changes would not affect the result. If these damages be assessed in a foreign currency the judgment here, which must be expressed in sterling, must be based on the amount required to convert this currency into sterling at the date when the measure was properly made, and the subsequent fluctuation of exchange, one way or the other, ought not to be taken into account.

There is little authority upon the actual question until recent times, a circumstance due, no doubt, to the fact that fluctuations of currency did not formerly occur with the violent oscillations by which they have been marked in recent years.

One of the earliest authorities is the case of Scott v. Bevan (2 B. & Ad. 78).

In that case judgment had been recovered in Jamaica for the sum of 1554*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, current money of the Island of Jamaica, and proceedings were taken here upon the judgment, the only question being whether the judgment should be converted into English currency, 100*l.* sterling being the equivalent of 140*l.* currency of Jamaica, or whether it should be taken at par, and it was decided that it ought to be estimated at the rate of exchange at the time of the judgment in Jamaica. The real question raised here does not appear to have been considered by the court, a significant fact when it is remembered that Lord Tenterden was the presiding judge.

In the case of Bertram v. Duhamel (2 Moo. P. C. 212), the point was not elaborately argued, and the quotation in the judgment at p. 217 is from the opinion of Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion (11 Ves., 314), but this is not sufficiently explicit to afford real assistance.

The next case is of greater importance. It is Manners v. Pearson (78 L. T. Rep. 432 (1898) 1 Ch. 581). In that case an action was brought claiming an account of moneys due under a contract which provided for payment in Mexican dollars. Judgment in the action, declaring the plaintiff to be entitled to an account, was delivered on the 4th Nov. 1897, and the defendant in fact delivered an account on the 13th Nov. of the same year, showing that a balance was due to the plaintiff in Mexican dollars on the 31st Oct. 1896. The question that arose was the date at which conversion from Mexican dollars into English sterling should take place. The plaintiff at first suggested that each sum of money should be converted into sterling at the date when it was shown to be due in the account, but he appears to have been willing to accept the 31st Oct. 1896, the date when the balance of the amount was shown to be due, while the defendants contended that the proper date was the 13th Nov. 1897, when the account was delivered.

It is at least remarkable that the actual date of the judgment was not suggested as the critical moment. The court held (Vaughan Williams, L.J. dissenting) that the right date was the 13th Nov. 1897. The foundation of the judgment depends entirely upon the fact that the claim was a claim for account, and it appears to proceed upon the principle that the account was the real cause of action. Lindley, L.J. says: "To substitute English for Mexican dollars every time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for every breach of it which the plaintiffs can prove that the defendants committed, which is a totally different matter." Rigby, L.J. says, that "plaintiff's argument proceeds upon an entire misapprehension of the nature of an action for account in equity, which is an action for the balance found due on the taking of the account and not for the several items to be included in it"; and he then says that the account "was not delivered until the 13th Nov. 1897, and even if accepted on that date, could not have formed a basis of an order at an earlier period." This judgment clearly does not proceed upon the view that the date of the judgment is the correct date for conversion, but rather upon the ground that the judgment is a judgment for something which is found due on taking the account, and that it is at the date when the account has been taken or delivered that the true liability is disclosed. In other words the balance of the account is treated as the foundation of the claim for judgment, and it is at that date that the conversion is to be made.

I am not prepared in the absence of argument to accept this view as correct, but it is not essential to determine it in the present case. It is sufficient to say that the judgment certainly did not proceed upon the ground for which the appellants now contend. Vaughan Williams, L.J. on the other hand, states in clear language the principle which the respondents say is correct. He says, "It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling and thus converting the one currency into the other is based upon damage for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place; and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment," and he adds, "I see no reason why different rules should be applied in the case where the form of action is, as in this case, an action for an account." He thought, therefore, that conversion should take place in respect of each item as it was shown to be due, but as the plaintiff was willing to accept the 31st Oct. 1896 he also accepted that date as correct.

With the principle as he enunciates it I am in entire agreement, and I do not think that there is any expression in the judgment of the other learned Lords Justices to show that they disagreed. Their judgment depended, as I have shown, on their view as to the proper application of this principle to the circumstances of the action. The final authorities upon this matter are fortunately far from ambiguous. Roche, J. in Kirsch and Co. v. Allan, Harding, and Co. (122 L. T. Rep. 159) decided that the rate of exchange should be taken as at date of payment. It is a little difficult to ascertain what is exactly meant by that phrase; but it is not necessary to examine it further; for, in a later decision of Di Ferdinando v. Simon and Co. (124 L. T. Rep. 117: (1920) 2 K. B. 704), which was an action for breach of contract to carry goods from London to Italy and for conversion, the learned judge held that the proper measure of damage was the value of the goods at the date when they should have arrived in Italy. He found the value in Italian lire and converted the sum into English currency at the rate of exchange on that date. This judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal (sup.). Bailhache, J. in Barry v. Van den Hurk (123 L. T. Rep. 719; (1920) 2 K. B. 709), also fixed the date for conversion as the date when the damages were properly measured, and MacCardie, J. in Lebeaupin v. Crispin, decided the same thing (124 L. T. Rep. 124); (1920) 2 K. B. 714).

There is consequently a very formidable body of opinion in recent decisions against the appellants' contention, and the only authority to which they can refer in their support is an American decision in the case of Marburg v. Marburg, decided in 1866. It is reported in 26 Maryland 8. There does not appear to have been any consideration of the question in the Supreme Court of the United States, and their Lordships are deprived of the assistance which would have been afforded had the matter been the subject of argument before that tribunal. The principle underlying the decision in the Maryland case appears largely to be due to the consideration of text books on international law. In one sense the case undoubtedly affects international matters, but it does not necessarily follow that it involves consideration of international law. The real question must depend upon the true effect of a judgment in one country relating to damages that are measured in terms of a foreign currency, and in this international relationships do not necessarily enter. Disputes similar to that in the present case could easily arise between two British subjects out of a purely British contract. Where the measure of damage was originally expressed in terms of a foreign currency in such a case, the English court could and ought to measure the damages at the proper date, and then at that date convert the foreign exchange into English currency.

There can be no difference in the principle when one of the litigants is not a British subject.

For these reasons I think this appeal should fail, and should be dismissed with costs.

Lord SUMNER.—A good deal of the effect of the appellants' plausible and ingenious argument is due to two fallacious suggestions, which have crept into and colour the whole of it. The first is that this is in substance a claim by the owners of the Volturno for a sum contractually due from the owners of the Celia in lire, and the other that, as they have elected to recover it here and not in Italy, the judgment recovered here is merely an attempt to put them in the same position as if a contract had been enforced in Italy.

The collision occurred on the high seas, and, subject to proof that the Celia was to blame, she became forthwith liable for the consequences. I may pass over the fact that the Volturno was also to blame as not for this purpose affecting the matter. The right to compensation was complete then and there, though it might take time to discover all the consequences and to establish the extent of the mischief. That compensation was not recoverable in any particular currency, and, although for convenience of proof it would be severable into divers heads and items, it would be one gross sum, recoverable once for all. If there had been prospective or continuing damage the matter would have been more complicated, but I do not think that the principle would have been affected. The currency, in which judgment would be given, would depend upon the place in which the plaintiffs might find the defendants' ship so as to arrest her in proceedings in rem, or might succeed in serving process on the defendants themselves as the commencement of proceedings in personam. The essential thing to remember which the appellants somewhat ignored, is that the sum in question here is only an item in a general claim for damages for a wrong done at sea, which was the subject of compensation just as naturally in British as in Italian currency.

The deduction of hire for the Volturno, which the Italian Ministry of Marine made from the sums payable by them to her owners under the charter, is, therefore, for the purposes of this case, mere evidence of damage inflicted on them by the collision. Though proved in a different way from the physical damage to the ship, it is on the same footing, for it measures their loss suffered by having the ship laid up, just as their repair bills measure their loss suffered by having her side stove in. If the question of damage had not been simplified by an agreement between the parties, and if all the damages had gone to the registrar and merchants for assessment together, no one would have thought of raising any questions of the rate of exchange as at the date of the judgment. The cost of the temporary repairs incurred at Gibraltar would, I suppose, have been proved in sterling; if they had been done at Marseilles or Cadiz, they would have been proved in francs or in pesetas, just as the repairs at Newport News would have been proved in dollars, and in each case these currencies would have been converted into sterling as at the date when liability for the several outlays accrued, because when the damage is proved by the actual cost of repairing it, conversion of that cost forthwith into the currency with which the High Court deals, is simply the process of completing that proof. When the owners of the Volturno came to their next item, namely, the money value of the use of the ship, of which the damage suffered in collision deprived them, why should any different rule as to exchange be applied? The charter furnished very precise evidence of the then value of the ship in use day by day, but it was evidence only and was not conclusive: (The Argentino, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 433; 13 P. Div., per Bowen, L.J. at pp. 202, 203). The owners of the Celia would have been at liberty to challenge it, if they could, and, if there had been no charter, the Italian owners might have shown what employment in Greece or in Norway could have been got, and so have measured their loss in drachmas or in kroner instead of in lire. If the damages were such as need not be repaired at all, the whole loss might have been measured by the immediate depreciation of the ship in consequence of the collision, for the Volturno's owners would not be bound to repair her merely for the benefit of the owners of the Celia. In that case there would either be no question of exchange, if the evidence of sound and damaged values could be given in sterling, or, if there was any conversion into sterling, it would have been calculated at the rate current at the time of the collision.

I am quite unable to understand why the owners of the Volturno should be subjected to any different rule merely because they have had the good sense to eliminate all questions that could be agreed, and to present in the most naked form the one question as to which the parties were in difference. All that was agreed was the number of lire actually deducted by the Italian Ministry of Marine during the period when the Volturno was off hire, with the dates and the commencement and ending of those periods. Whether any adjustment was made for the expenses of running the ship while earning hire which would be saved while she was off hire does not appear. I do not gather that anything in the agreement was meant to vary any of the rights of the parties.

The appellants, however, completed their argument by saying that the court, having ascertained how many lire the collision cost the owners of the Volturno in respect of detention terminated its judicial functions at that point, and thereafter in bringing into the judgment a certain amount of sterling to correspond with that finding, was merely making its decision available to the judgment creditors as the best way in which they could be assisted by an English court to get the lire to which they were really entitled. I think this, again, is a fallacy. For the purposes of a collision action it is the judgment that is the final judicial act, and it is the judgment that is the decision of the court. The agreed numbers of lire are only part of the foreign language in which the court is informed of the damage sustained, and, like the rest of the foreign evidence, must be translated into English. Being a part of the description and definition of the damage, this evidence as to lire must be understood with reference to the time when the damage accrues which it is used to describe.

The matter may be tested in this way. Suppose that, as an incident of the collision, some seamen belonging to the Celia had taken possession on behalf of her owners of a parcel of Italian currency notes, the property of the owners of the Volturno, and that the former had received and kept it. The owners of the Volturno could have claimed damages for conversion of the notes or their return with damages for their detention, as they chose. In the first case, the value of the notes would be taken and exchanged into sterling as at the date of the conversion, and as the foundation of the damages in the second case the same date would have been taken. Why should damage to the ship and her owners by collision be measured otherwise?

No authority was forthcoming which really supported the appellants' propositions. There have been, during the past one hundred years, several English cases, in which these propositions might, and indeed ought to have been applied, if they are sound, yet very learned judges proved to be unconscious of their existence; the best example is Scott v. Bevan (2 B. and Ad. 78). The case in the Court of Appeal in 1898 (Manners v. Pearson, 78 L. T. Rep. 432; (1898) 1 Ch. 581) really negatives them.

On the other hand considerable support for the view which I have ventured to express above is to be found in the judgment of the Privy Council in Pilkington v. Commissioners for Claims on France (2 Knapp, 7), which was pronounced by Sir William Grant, M.R. Referring to acts of the French Revolutionary Government, whereby between 1793 and 1796 debts due by French subjects to British subjects and payable in France had been sequestrated, and to subsequent arrangements by treaty between England and France, under which compensation was to be made by France in respect of these acts as for unjustifiable confiscation and funds were deposited with Commissioners for that purpose, he is reported as having said (p. 19), "we think this has no analogy to the case of creditor and debtor. There is a wrong act done by the French Government; then they are to undo that wrong act, and to put the party into the same situation as if they never had done it. . . The Republic themselves, in effect, confess that no such decree ought to have been made. . . Therefore it is not merely the case of a debtor paying a debt at the day it falls due, but it is the case of a wrongdoer who must undo, and completely undo, the wrongful act he has done, and, if he received the assignats at the value of 50*d.*, he does not make compensation by returning an assignat, which is only worth 20*d.*; he must make up the difference between the value of the assignat at the different periods." It is true that these observations are stated to be not strictly necessary to the decision (p. 21) and that Dr. Knapp prints his report from notes by another hand, but I think these circumstances detract but little from the authority of the passage quoted.

As to Marburg v. Marburg (26 Maryland, 8), it is a case of a breach of contract to pay abroad a sum of money, which was the price of goods sold and delivered. It purports to follow Scott v. Beavan, and has no reference to damages for a wrong not arising out of a contract. Even so, there has been at different times much discussion in the United States as to the true rules governing such actions (Story, "Conflict of Laws," 8th edit., s.s 303-315; Sidgwick on Damages, 9th edit., s. 274); but I think the question need not be pursued, as all such cases turn upon contractual obligations for payment of fixed or calculable sums in a foreign place and in the local currency, which have been put in suit in the courts of the United States. For the same reason, while not intending to intimate any criticism upon it, I have not troubled your Lordships with any examina- of the judgment in Di Ferdinando v. Simon (sup.) in the Court of Appeal. The case of Delegal v. Taylor (7 Bing. 460) might seem at first sight to be in point for the appellants, for it began with a claim in trover for a parcel of local currency notes seized in Lima, but subsequently an agreement was made with the wrongdoers to give up the notes or pay their value as found by the officer of the court, and, the notes having been lost at sea, the question came before the court in the form of an application for directions as to the course he was to take under this agreement. I think that in substance the direction given was to find what it would cost to get notes of an equal face value in Lima, where they must be presumed to be worth what they appeared to be worth, and in any case it appears not to advance the present appellants' argument.

Finally it was urged that exchanging lire with sterling at the date of the judgment was the best way of eliminating speculative elements, and had the advantage of ensuring that in no case would a judgment creditor get more than the exact sum to which he was entitled. Fluctuations in foreign exchanges inevitably introduce a speculative element into all transactions and affairs, and unless the parties themselves have provided for this by some contract, the law must apply the same principles as if they had remained stable. Waiting to convert the currency till the date of judgment only adds the uncertainty of exchange to the uncertainty of the law's delays. The result may favour one side or the other, and there is no answer to this except that already discussed—namely, that the claimant's right is exclusively a right to lire, and would result in a judgment for lire, if only an English court was, so to speak, competent to express itself in Italian. This is a mere assumption. After all the court is an English court and in theory decides the right as at the time when it arises, and does so in plain English. I therefore think that this argument also fails, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord PARMOOR.—The relevant facts may be shortly stated. On the 17th Dec. 1917 there was a collision in the Mediterranean between the steamship Celia and the steamship Volturno. Both vessels have been held equally to blame for the collision. The Volturno was temporarily repaired at Gibraltar, causing a detention of the ship from the 25th to the 30th Dec. 1915, and permanently repaired at Newport, causing a detention of the ship from the 24th Jan. to the 18th Feb. 1918. The Volturno was on charter to the Italian Government, and the vessel was off hire during each period of repair. The loss to the respondents from loss of hire during temporary repairs was agreed at lire 47,372.32, and during permanent repairs at lire 257,046.40, but a difference arose as to the date at which the rate of exchange for Italian lire should be taken, in order to ascertain the amount to be paid in English currency. The question for decision is, whether in calculating the amount which the respondents are entitled to recover from the appellants in respect of damages for the loss of hire of their vessel, the rate of exchange should be taken as that ruling when the loss was incurred, or as that ruling when the assessment of damage was ascertained?

The answer to this question depends, not on any technical rule of English procedure but on the principle of insuring to the injured party, as far as possible the full measure of compensation to which he is entitled. The argument on behalf of the appellants is, that, in an action of tort, damages are not ascertained until they have been assessed, and that if, in the interval between the tortious act which has occasioned the damage and the ascertainment of its amount there has been an alteration in the rate of exchange, the party injured will, instead of receiving the amount due to him as compensation, receive a greater or less amount, dependent on whether the rate of exchange has fluctuated favourably or adversely to his interest. I think that there would be no answer to this argument if the probable fluctuations in the rate of exchange between the date at which the loss is suffered and that at which the amount of damage is acsertained are a relevant factor in determining what the amount of damages s ould be. For reasons hereinafter stated, there appears to me to be a fallacy in this contention. The argument for the respondents is, that the amount of loss consequent on a tortious act, such as a collision at sea, falls to be determined at the date when it is suffered, and that the probability of subsequent alterations in the rate of exchange is immaterial, and that the risk of alteration in the rate of exchange is one which affects generally the financial transactions between the two countries and is in no way connected either with the tortious act or with the ascertainment of the amount payable to the injured party.

In my opinion, this contention is correct. The probability of the alteration in the rate of exchange is not an admissible factor in the ascertainment of the amount of damage, both on the ground of remoteness and on the ground that it is a matter which affects generally all financial transactions and is in no way connected with the tortious act for which the respondents are liable. To prevent misunderstanding, I desire to add that if the probability of alterations in the rate of exchange could be regarded as a relevant factor in ascertaining the amount of damage, it would be within the discretion of a registrar to fix that rate, as at the date of the assessment, or at such other time as in his opinion might be reasonably adopted to obtain a fair figure.

The necessity for transferring into English money damages ascertained in a foreign currency, arises in the fact that the courts of this country have no jurisdiction to order payment of money except in English currency. Considerations which are irrelevant in the ascertainment of the amount of damage are irrelevant in fixing a rate of transfer, and I agree in the judgment of Hill, J. as confirmed by the Court of Appeal. In truth the risk of a subsequent fluctuation in the rate of exchange is a risk which the parties themselves respectively incur. In its incidence it may, in any particular case, either mitigate or enhance the amount which, under a stable condition of exchange, would be payable to the injured party, but in itself it cannot affect the ascertainment of damages.

Of the many cases to which your Lordships were referred, the judgment of the Privy Council in Pilkington v. Commissioners for Claims on France (2 Knapp 7) is most analogous to the present case. The judgment of Sir William Grant is based on the finding that a wrong act had been done by the French Government, and that restoration in a debased currency is not restoration for the wrong done, and that, if the wrongdoer received the assignats at the value of 50*l*. he does not make compensation by returning an assignat which is only worth 20*l*., but that he must make up the difference of the assignat at the different periods. If the assignat at the later date had been worth more than the value of 50*l*. I think it would logically follow, on the judgment of Sir William Grant, that the wrongdoer would have made full compensation by returning such a number of assignats as would have replaced the numbers received, assessed at the value of 50*l*.

The other cases cited refer to damages on breach of contract, and not on tort. In the case of contract no doubt the parties may agree to make an alteration of exchange subsequent to the breach of contract an element in the assessment of damages, but in the absence of any such agreement, the same considerations would be applicable whether the action is based on tort or on contract. In the case of Di Ferd nando v. Simon (124 L. T. Rep. 117; (1920) 3 K. B. 409) in the Court of Appeal, it was pointed out that fluctuations in value subsequent to the date of the breach were irrelevant considerations, on the ground of remoteness, and that, where there is a market, the damages is the market value of goods at the time and place where they should have been delivered. I agree with the judgment of Scrutton, L.J. and for the reasons given by him. The same view is expressed by Vaughan Williams, L.J. in Manners v. Pearson and Son (78 L. T. Rep. 432; (1898) 1 Ch. 581): "It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling, and thus converting the one currency into the other, is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place, and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment." In the same case Lindley, M.R. says that no claim by the plaintiff to damages can be supported, and that the judgment and trial of the action limited the right of the plaintiff to an account of what is due to him from the defendants. He held that the plaintiff was not entitled to have the dollars turned into English money until the amount due on taking the whole account was ascertained. It is not necessary in this appeal to consider the principles applicable to the taking of an account where no damages are claimed, but I do not think that this case supports an argument in favour of the contention of the appellants. In his judgment, Lindley, M.R. adopts the principle expressed by Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion (11 Ves. 314): "I cannot bring myself to doubt that, where a man agrees to pay 100*l*. in London upon the 1st Jan. he ought to have that sum there upon that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him, the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed." I will not detain your Lordships by reference to cases which have already been fully dealt with.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord WRENBURY.—In my opinion this appeal fails.

The action is for damages for tort. It is not a continuing tort. On the 30th Dec. 1917 and the 18th Feb. 1918 the defendants, the owners of the Volturno, were by the plaintiffs' wrong damaged to the amount of 47,372.32 lire in the one case and 257,046.40 in the other case, making together 304,418.72 lire. On the 8th June 1920 the defendants' claim was agreed, subject to the question of the rate of exchange to be taken in assessing the loss. On the 30th Dec. 1917 the rate of exchange was 39.90. On the 18th Feb. 1918 it was 41.30. On the 20th June 1920 it was 66.25. The order under appeal has taken 39.90 and 41.30 as the proper rates of exchange to be taken in measuring in English currency the agreed loss of 304,418.72 lire. The appellant says that this is wrong.

Your Lordships who have preceded me have already reviewed the authorities; it is unnecessary for me to do so again; more usefully can I state in my own words what I think is the true principle. Assume that a judge is sitting in July to try an action for damages for a tort committed on the preceding 1st Jan. Let me express the judgment in the form of a declaration, followed by an adjudication upon it. The judgment should, I think, be as follows: Declare that on the 1st Jan. the plaintiff suffered by reason of the defendant's tort a loss of 300,000 lire. Declare that on the 1st Jan. the equivalent sum in British currency was, say, 7500*l*. Adjudge that the plaintiff recover against the defendant 7500*l*. There is no difference of principle arising from the fact that the loss is of lire as distinguished from, say, cows. If the plaintiff had been damaged by the defendant tortiously depriving him of three cows the judgment would be: Declare that on the 1at Jan. the plaintiff suffered by the defendant's tort a loss of three cows. Declare that on the 1st Jan. the plaintiff would have been entitled to go into the market and buy three similar cows and charge the defendant with the price. Declare that the cost would have been 150*l*. Adjudge that the plaintiff recover from the defendant 150*l*. It would be nihil ad rem to say that in July similar cows would have cost in the market 300*l*. The defendant is not bound to supply the plaintiff with cows. He is liable to pay him damages for having on the 1st Jan. deprived him of cows. The plaintiff may be going out of farming and may not want cows, or, when judgment is given, he may have enough already. The plaintiff is not bound to take cows and the defendant is not bound to supply them. The defendant is liable to pay the plaintiff damages, that is to say, money to some amount for the loss of the cows; the only question is, how much? The answer is, such sum as represents the market value at the date of the tort of the goods of which the plaintiff was tortiously deprived.

The argument to the contrary is that the defendant is bound by a pecuniary payment to put the plaintiff in a position as good as that in which he stood before the tort was committed. That is true, but it is necessary to add that, of which we have recently heard so much, in the form of a fourth dimension, namely, the consideration of time. The defendant is bound to make such pecuniary payment as would put the plaintiff at the date of the tort in as good a position as he would have been had there been no tort. If the date taken be that not of the tort but of the judgment, it is giving the plaintiff not damages for the tort, but damages also for the postponement of the payment of those damages until the date of the judgment. If such later damages can be recovered, as under circumstances they may be if the defendant improperly postpones payment, they would be recovered in the form of interest. They would be damages not for the original tort, but for another and a subsequent wrongful act.

All the authorities are in favour of this view except the decision of Roche, J. in Kirsch v. Allen (122 L. T. Rep. 159) and the American decision in Marburg v. Marburg (26 Maryland, 8). In Di Ferdinando v. Simon, Roche, J. himself decided in favour of this view, preferring it (unless the cases could be distinguished) to his decision in Kirsch v. Allen. His decision in Di Ferdinando v. Simon was affirmed on appeal (123 L. T. Rep. 105; (1920) 3 K. B. 409). The present case is in substance an appeal from Di Ferdinando v. Simon. In my opinion that case was well decided. No difference arises by reason of the fact that this is an action of tort while that was an action for breach of contract. There is here no continuing tort.

I think this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord CARSON.—A collision occurred on the 17th Dec. 1917 between the Celia and the Volturno. At the trial of the action on the 22nd July 1919, Hill, J. held both vessels equally to blame for the collision, and referred the question of damages to the Admiralty Registrar. The damages, however, were agreed on the 8th June 1920, and the reference was, therefore, not held. The damages were agreed in lire and the question this House has to decide is as to the proper date upon which to calculate the rate of exchange in order to fix in English currency for the purpose of entering an English judgment the damages payable by the wrongdoer to a foreign claimant.

The registrar decided that the date of payment, by which I understand him to mean the date at which the judgment is entered, is the time at which the rate of exchange should be taken. He did so on the authority of a decision of Roche, J. in Kirsch v. Allen and Co. (122 L. T. Rep. 159; 123 L. T. Rep. 105), and he did so treating a decision of Bailhache, J. as distinguishable on the ground that such decision arose in a case of breach of contract.

Hill, J. reversed the decision of the registrar, holding, on the authority of Di Ferdinando v. Simon and other cases, that where the damages are assessed in a foreign currency they must, in entering an English judgment, be converted into English money at the rate of exchange ruling at the date with reference to which the damages in the foreign currency have in law to be assessed. The Court of Appeal simply affirmed this judgment, feeling itself bound by the decision in the case of Di Ferdinando v. Simon.

The Volturno was an Italian ship, and was under requisition to the Italian Government under a charter-party. By the terms of this charter-party hire was payable in Italian lire. By reason of the collision temporary repairs to the Volturno were made at Gibraltar, causing a detention of the ship from the 25th to the 30th Dec. 1917. Permanent repairs were made at Newport News, causing a detention of the ship from the 24th Jan. to the 18th Feb. 1918. The loss of the owners of the Volturno by reason of such detention was in respect of the first period, 47,372.32 lire; and in respect of the second period, 257,046 lire; and these two sums amounting to 304,418.72 lire, were claimed as damages, and were apparently included in the damages agreed.

It was contended by the owners of the Volturno that the rate of exchange should be taken either at the date of the writ or at the respective dates when the loss by detention was suffered, and Hill, J. adopted this latter view.

It is to be observed, as I will try and show later, that there is very little authority until we come to recent decisions which can be held to lay down any rule on this subject, and the fact that the respondents put forward alternative dates shows how uncertain the law is upon this subject. I would also add that all the cases so far as I know relied upon in the judgment of Hill, J. were cases of breaches of contract, and no different rule for damages in contract or tort was suggested in the argument before this House. If I am right in the view I have taken of the matter, the reasons which impel me to that view will apply a fortiori to breaches of contract. The argument for the appellants in support of their contention that the date of the entry of the judgment is the proper date to fix the rate of exchange is shortly as follows: The foreign litigant has suffered, as is agreed, damages to the extent of 300,000 lire. On the principle of restitutio ad integrum, he is paid 300,000 lire; he gets all the damage he has suffered and it is all he would get if the claim was in Italy instead of in England, and although those damages have referred to and are answered on the basis of a loss at an antecedent date, that affords no reason for awarding him either more or less owing to the fluctuations of the exchange one way or the other between Italy and England, which only means that the lira will buy more or less English money. The learned counsel for the appellants say further that the object, and the sole object, of translating the lire agreed upon into English currency is to comply with the requirements of English law—that an English judgment for damages must be for a sum of English money in order to make the damages accessible by execution to the foreign litigant. This principle, they say, would satisfy the dictum of Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion (11 Ves. 314), where he lays down: "If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him, the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had, if the contract had been performed."

I will deal shortly with the authorities later. On what principle are we asked to enter judgment for the owners of the Volturno for a sum of Emglish money which will to-day produce a much larger sum of lire than that which they themselves have agreed upon, or if the exchange had gone the other way and the value of the lira had appreciated, a sum of English money which would produce less than the agreed amount? It is said that the damages must be assessed with reference to the actual periods of detention. It is at that time that the owner suffers damages by loss of use. With that I entirely agree. But when it is added that it follows that that is also the date at which the exchange must be taken for the purpose of conversion with a view to entering judgment I do not follow the reasoning. I assume that in assessing the damages all the necessary adjustments would be made and elements of damage considered. It may be that, for instance, in the present case the temporary repairs at Gibraltar had to be paid in sterling, and it would, of course, follow that the amount of lire which the sterling represented at the rate of exchange at that date should form an item in the damages. Similarly, if goods had to be bought in the market in England to replace English goods not delivered under a contract with a foreigner, the date of such purchase would necessarily fix the rate of exchange in assessing the damages. But I do not think there is any connexion between the fixing of the damages and the rate of exchange to be taken in relation to certain items thereof at certain dates, and the rate of exchange to be fixed for the purpose of entering judgment.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the contention of the appellants is well founded and that the true rule ought to be that the foreigner should, when the damages as assessed or agreed upon are in foreign currency, receive under the judgment neither more nor less than that sum, and that the proper date to ascertain this is when the entry of judgment is being made for the purpose of making the judgment available.

It may be said that where the rate of exchange has gone against the lira, the delay has prejudiced the applicant. I do not think that can be considered, as the rule which has been applied must plainly apply whether the exchange is adverse or otherwise. But in any event to assign this as a reason for the rule would be in reality to give damages for non-payment, which, except under special circumstances, are never awarded in our courts: (for instance, see the judgment of Bailhache, J. in Barry v. Van den Hurk, 123 L. T. Rep. 719; (1920) 2 K. B. 709).

In Manners v. Pearson (78 L. T. Rep. 432; (1898) 1 Ch., at p. 587) Lindley, M.R. says: "To substitute English money for Mexican dollars any time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for any breach of it which the plaintiff can prove that the defendant committed, which is a totally different matter."

I have examined the judgments delivered by the Court of Appeal in Ferdinando v. Simon (sup.) and also the judgments Lebaupin v. Crispin and in Barry v. Van den Hurk, all decided in 1920, but although they all seem to me to lay down and assert the same rule as that upon which Hill, J., following some of these judgments, acted and which I have already considered, I do not think the learned judges who decided them rest their judgments on any authorites, and rather assume that such a rule existed, or ought, as a matter of principle, to exist. The only case, apart from the recent authorities to which I have referred, which seems to me to give us any assistance is the case of Manners v. Pearson, from which I have already quoted.

Vaughan Williams, L.J. no doubt in that case laid down the principle which is contended for by the respondents in the present case, but he was a dissenting judge, and his judgment cannot be reconciled with the judgments delivered by the majority of the court, Lindley and Rigby, L.JJ.

Although that action may have to some extent turned on the form of the action, it is to be noted that judgment was given for an account on the 4th Nov. 1897; the account was delivered on the 13th Nov. 1897, showing an amount due to Aug. 1896, yet upon an application by the plaintiff claiming that the rate of exchange should be fixed at the date when the account showed the amount due, namely, Aug. 1896, the court decided that the rate of exchange should be taken not as of that date, but as of the date of the account under the judgment, viz., the 13th Nov. 1897.

We have not been referred to any rule laid down in any English text writers, but under American law the rule, as I have stated it, seems to prevail. Sedgwick, 8th edit., vol. 1, s. 274, states the rule that, generally speaking, the exchange is to be estimated at time of payment, and in support quotes a number of American authorities, including the case of Marburg v. Marburg (26 Maryland, 8), to which we were referred, and which Sir John Simon admitted was, for what it was worth, an authority in favour of the appellants. Of course, such authorities are not binding in any way upon us, but they seem to me to be sound in principle, and I think the discussion of the question in Story's Conflict of Laws, 8th edit., ss. 308-315, leans to the same conclusion.

I would refer also to Westlake's Private International Law, 5th edit., s. 226, p. 315, where the learned author supports the view I gave already indicated.

I am therefore of opinion that the arguments of the counsel for the appellants should prevail, and that the appeal should be allowed.

THE RANNVEIG. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT, ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Agreement by allies with neutral country conceding right to trade in conditional contraband—Cargo of conditional contraband destined for German base of supplies—Seizure during Armistice.

On the 30th April 1918 an agreement was made between the U.S.A. and Norway, and was assented to by the United Kingdom, under which Norway agreed not to export to Germany food stuffs except fish in quantities not to exceed 48,000 tons per annum. This quantity was duly exported by Norway under Norwegian Governmental licence. the monthly total exported being reported by Norway to the United Kingdom. During the Armistice the R. was on a voyage to Stettin under such licence and within such condition. Stettin was admittedly a German base of supplies. The R. and her cargo were taken as prize by H.M.S. V.

Held, that reading the agreement as a whole, each contracting party undertook certain specified obligations, namely, on the part of the United States, to furnish to Norway certain supplies, and on the part of Norway, to place restriction on her exports to the Central Powers. Norway neither obtained nor acquired a right for her subjects to ship and carry contraband; neither did the belligerent powers release their right to capture contraband.

Held, further, that since the conditions of the Armistice were quite consistent with the maintenance of the German organisations in view of a possible renewal of hostilities, and since the shipowners carried a complete cargo of conditional contraband bound to an enemy base of supplies, both ship and cargo were subject to condemnation.

APPEAL from a judgment of the President of the Prize Court (Sir Henry Duke, reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 292; 124 L. T. Rep. 635; (1920) P. 177).

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.), Sir Ernest Pollock, (S.-G.) and Pearce Higgins for the Procurator-General.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—This is an appeal by Norwegian shipowners, the Aktieselskabet Osterjolingen, and by German cargo-owners, the Reichsfisch-versorgung, against a decree whereby a cargo of salted herrings in transit from Christiansand to Stettin and the steamship Rannveig, on which it was laden were condemned, the first as being conditional contraband bound to a German base of supply, and the second as having carried it with full knowledge of its character and destination. Both appellants relied chiefly on an international agreement, called the Norwegian-American Agreement, dated the 30th April 1918. The German cargo-owners appeared and claimed the benefit of this agreement and were heard without objection to argue that it was binding on the Crown, which is not contested, and that it assured to the traffic in question, immunity from capture and condemnation. This is the main question in the appeal. The shipowners claimed that under this agreement, read in combination with another called the Tonnage Agreement, made between His Majesty's Government and the Norwegian Shipowners' Association in the previous November, they were entitled to carry this cargo to Stettin without interference, or at least were reasonably warranted in so reading the agreements and therefore should not suffer condemnation of the ship.

There is a passage in the President's judgment which their Lordships will mention before passing on. He observes, and apparently as a step in his train of reasoning: "To license such a transaction on the part of an alien friend would be to license an unneutral act, whereby he must of necessity lose his character of friend. There is nothing in the terms of the agreement which shows an intention to authorise Norwegian traders to do any act inconsistent with neutrality. The Norwegian trade with Germany in fish which is provided for is, in my opinion, that trade only which is consistent with neutrality, and not trade which is contraband."

This passage, doubtless by inadvertence, appears to assume that the carriage of the cargo in question would, apart from the Norwegian-American agreement, have been an unneutral act in the carrier, and that to have permitted it to be shipped would have been a breach of neutrality on the part of the Norwegian Government. It is not, however, the crucial point of his decision. The carriage of contraband, though hazardous, is not an unlawful or an unneutral trade. The fact that it is subject to the right of the belligerent to prevent it by capture on the high seas makes it necessary to consider whether the appellants in this case are relieved from the consequences of such capture by the operation of the agreements in question.

The Norwegian-American agreement had on its face many objects, and in construing it they may be borne in mind. Furthermore, it is material to remember that it was entered into by the Norwegian Government on the one hand through its special representative, and on the other by the chairman of the War Trade Board of the United States, an organisation empowered to make such a contract on behalf of the United States. The agreement subsequently received the adherence of various Allied Governments, and more particularly of that of His Majesty.

When this agreement was entered into Norway had undoubtedly a strong interest in obtaining from the Allied and Associated Powers, especially from the United States, an agreement for a full supply of the commodities which were necessary to her economic life and prosperity, but in Europe, too, there were supplies which she desired to obtain from the Central Powers, and this involved the maintenance of Norwegian exports in exchange and of sea-borne traffic, probably in Norwegians bottoms as much as in German, for the purpose of transporting it. Equally important to her, perhaps more important still, was the observance of her obligations of neutrality and the avoidance of any voluntary discrimination between one combatant power and another. On the other hand, though there is nothing in the record to furnish direct evidence on this point, their Lordships cannot without affectation ignore what must be common knowledge—that in the spring of 1918 the problem of intercepting contraband traffic between Norway and Stettin was one which presented to the Allies difficulties not attaching to the control of traffic in the North Sea. Their Lordships have been invited to hold that the object, or at least one object, of the stipulations of this agreement with regard to the export of herrings to Stettin was to induce the Norwegian Government in effect to do for the Allied Powers what they could not then do for themselves, and to secure by agreement restriction of the traffic in food within moderate limits. It may be so, but their Lordships cannot undertake to determine the meaning of a written agreement by considering the results which may follow from its terms. It is equally possible that its object was to enable Norway, by stipulations made by the Norwegian Government in the interests of the country, to find a profitable and secure outlet for a portion of her herring catch, to obtain by way of quid pro quo a corresponding supply of German manufacturers, and above all, to silence any possible complaint from the Central Powers that an agreement had been made which involved discrimination against themselves. The agreement as a whole has compromise writ large upon the face of it. One stipulation answers another; but who can now estimate the relative weight of each? Their Lordships have no information before them which would be an adequate justification for giving to particular phrases a meaning based on the precise objects or the relative importance of the various clauses, and must perforce refer to the words used for their meaning.

Again, in point of form, conventional terms relating to exports of Norwegian commodities from Norwegian waters would naturally be expressed as undertakings by the Norwegian Government, not as licences accepted by it from the hands of foreign powers. A sovereign State, scrupulously mindful of the obligations of neutrality, and justly resolute to maintain its own dignity and independence, would be prompt to reject language which might imply the permission of another power to take this or that action as to the goods to be shipped on board its own ships in its own ports; while, on the other hand, the United States could have no interest in imposing on Norway language suggesting the acceptance of permission from abroad, since for practical purposes the mere undertaking of the Norwegian Government was sufficient to ensure any results that were decided. It cannot, however, be denied that if, upon a sufficient inducement or by inadvertence, the Norwegian Government did, in truth, assent to language clearly expressing the grant of permission by the United States to export herrings in a certain measure from Norway, the matter was entirely within its competence and the language must be read as it stands.

Their Lordships accordingly turn to the wording of the instrument. Art. 3, par. 1, is particularly material. It begins by a statement that, for considerations recited "the Norwegian Government agrees to the following restrictions of her exports to the Central Powers or their allies, viz.: "Norway will not export to the Central Powers or their allies food-stuffs of any kind except fish and fish products. Fish and fish products may be exported in quantities not to exceed 48,000 tons per annum export weight." and then, after defining "fish" and "fish products," it proceeds: "There shall be no export to Germany or her allies of any oil or derivations thereof, of fish or of any marine animals. The quantity of fish and fish products which may be exported to Germany and her allies shall not exceed 15,000 tons in any three months, and the amount which such export is more or less than 12,000 tons in any quarter must be deducted from or added to 12,000 tons the following quarter."

Manifestly in form the whole of the article above quoted is an undertaking by the Norwegian Government, unless the two sentences containing the words "fish products may be exported" and "the quantity . . . which may be exported" can be read as permissive words, uttered by the United States and conferring on Norway an American leave and licence to do certain things.

There is an observation to be made here which, though general, is of actual assistance. It is this: The language of this agreement, when it is the language of the United States, may be treated as being the language of His Majesty's Government, and, whatever its form, if it amounts in substance to a licence from the Crown covering the traffic now in question the appeals succeed. It would be pedantic and unworthy of the dignity of the Crown if their Lordships were to draw a distinction between the promise of a licence to the Norwegian Government and the possession of a licence from the Crown by the particular persons engaged in this adventure. Lord Ellenborough, C.J. in Usparicha v. Noble (13 East, 332) laid down a similar proposition.

If His Majesty's Government have given assent to a contract which, reasonably construed, involves permission to those engaging in this trade to carry it on free from the exercise of belligerent rights, those rights are waived and a court of prize cannot enforce them. The ultimate question before the President was: "Does the agreement, rightly construed, amount to a waiver of the belligerent rights of the Crown in regard to contraband trade of the kind in question?" Before their Lordships it is: "Have the appellants succeeded in establishing that the conclusion of the President in the negative was wrong?"

With the assistance of counsel their Lordships have examined every relevant word in this document, but it would be unprofitable to repeat at length the arguments on either side, as applied clause by clause and sentence by sentence. It often happens in questions of construction that the meaning of a passage will finally turn on the impression which it produces on individual minds, rather than on logical deductions or grammatical analysis. The word "may," twice used in the passage quoted, is at least indeterminate. Even if it were supposed to be a part of the agreement where the United States speaks, there is the question whether it means "You may export without interference from the Allies' cruisers" or "You may export without its being a breach of contract on your own part, that is without complaint on ours." To read it as meaning "Norway contracts not to export foodstuffs other than fish and fish products; these she may or may not export up to 48,000 tons, ut she undertakes not to export more," is reasonable and more in accordance with the scheme of the article than to read it as meaning "Norway undertakes not to export foodstuffs other than fish, and the United States permit Norway to export from her own ports 48,000 tons of her own fish."

Thus Norway's agreement relates only to the excess of 48,000 tons, while as to that quantity it remains outside the contract and her original freedom of action is unaffected. The Allies, on the other hand, accept the obligations which Norway imposes upon herself as sufficient, and there is no stipulation on their part which restricts their right to interfere with this traffic. This likewise is left outside the agreement and unaffected. The President's conclusion is in favour of the former reading. It is true that there is a later passage, which runs: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorise or permit the exportation to Germany or her allies of pyrites in any form except pyrites cinders." but this is a denial of a licence, not the grant of one, and all that can be said is that if these words contemplate a licence by the United States to Norway, which need not be decided, the parties showed that their vocabulary contained much more apt words—namely "authorise" and "permit"—than a mere "may," which is adapted to either purpose.

Although objection may be well taken in some respects to his reasoning, their Lordships are unable to say that the construction adopted by the learned President was wrong, or that he ought to have been satisfied that the belligerent rights of the Crown had been waived. Reading the agreement as a whole, the construction which is most consistent with its language, in their Lordships' opinion, is one by which each contracting party undertakes certain specified obligations—namely, on the part of the United States, to furnish to Norway certain supplies, and on the part of Norway, to place restrictions on her exports to the Central Powers. In other respects the rights of each party remain unaffected. Norway neither obtains nor requires a right for her subjects to ship and carry contraband; the belligerent powers make no release of their rights to capture contraband.

There remain but two minor points. It is said that after the Armistice it cannot be presumed that Stettin was still a military or naval base of supplies, as during actual hostilities it had so often been found to be. The answer is that the record contains no evidence of any change and that the Armistice was an Armistice only and quite consistent with the maintenance of the German organisations in view of a possible renewal of hostilities. The other contention is that the shipowners acted in good faith (which is not denied) and reasonably read the agreement as permissive, and therefore should not suffer condemnation of their ship. Their Lordships think that those who know all the material facts, as these shipowners did, and rely on a reading of a written instrument, which proves to be wrong, do so at their peril. They can no more rely on such an error than upon ignorance of the law. If they read it aright they were in the right; not having done so, they are in the wrong. They carried a complete cargo of conditional contraband bound to an enemy base of supplies with their eyes open, and the usual consequences follow.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

EGYPTIAN BONDED WAREHOUSE COMPANY LIMITED v. YEYASU GOSHI KAISHA AND ANOTHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT FOR EGYPT, VICE ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION IN PRIZE.

Prize Court—Jurisdiction—Third party procedure—Indemnity.

In Oct. 1915, a Japanese firm, as owners, obtained from the Prize Court, Egypt, an order for the release of certain goods seized in the German steamship L. The goods were in the appellants' warehouse, who held them as agents for the marshal. A large portion of the goods were in error forwarded to England instead of to Japan as the owners of the goods had directed. They issued a writ in the Prize Court, Egypt, against the marshal claiming damages for negligence. The marshal served on the appellants a third party notice claiming to be indemnified. The appellants disputed the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, but on a preliminary hearing the judge dismissed the objection, the appellants not appearing. The case was subsequently tried and judgment was given for the owners against the marshal, and for the marshal against the appellants. This appeal was brought against the latter part of the judgment, which it was contended was made without jurisdiction.

Held, that there was no jurisdiction in the Prize Court to decide, as between parties some of whom were not parties to the Prize proceedings, disputes not involving the consideration of the jus belli and arising out of facts which occurred after an effective release of the goods to a claimant. Further, there was nothing in the Prize Court Rules nor in Order XLV., which provided for the calling in of third parties against whom the right of indemnity is claimed.

APPEAL by the third parties from a judgment of the the Prize Court, Egypt.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Hon. S. O. Henn Collins, for the appellants.

D. Stephens, K.C. and Balloch, for the respondents, the owners of the goods.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and Bowstead, for the respondent, the marshal.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Sir ARTHUR CHANNELL.—This is an appeal from His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court in Egypt, exercising jurisdiction in prize. The appellants, the Egyptian Bonded Warehouse Company Limited, are an Egyptian company who were employed by the marshal of the Prize Court to warehouse goods which came into his charge as marshal. The first respondents are a Japanese firm, who claimed, as owners, 171 cases of aniline dyes which had been part of the cargo of the German steamer Lutzow, seized as prize within the district over which the Prize Court of Egypt had jurisdiction, and placed in charge of the marshal of the court, and by him warehoused with the appellants.

On the 4th Oct. 1915, the Japanese firm (the first respondents) obtained from the Prize Court an order for the release to them of the 171 cases which they claimed. It will be necessary to state hereafter in greater detail what was done upon this order, but the result was that through the mistake of someone, 150 out of the respondents' 171 cases got shipped to England instead of Japan, as they had desired and directed. On the 27th Dec. 1916, the first respondents, by a writ issued out of the Supreme Court, and entitled "Vice Admiralty Jurisdiction in Prize," commenced proceedings to recover damages from the marshal for alleged negligence in respect of the 150 cases. There was some delay in proceeding with the action owing, perhaps, to the fact that the then marshal, Mr. Wallis, died, and on the 8th Feb. 1918, the writ was amended by striking out his name, leaving it as a writ against the marshal of the court, without naming the successor in the office. By this time the defence of the marshal had been taken up by His Majesty's Procurator-General in Egypt, presumably for the reason that negligence being alleged against a public officer in the execution of his duty, it was right that the action should be defended at the public expense, and especially as the individual then holding the office could not be personally responsible for any default of his predecessor.

On the 8th March 1918, the procurator-general acting on behalf of the marshal defendant, issued from the court, and procured to be served on the appellants, a third-party notice, stating that the defendant claimed to be indemnified by the appellants on the ground that the negligence complained of was committed by the appellants as his agents, and giving notice to the appellants to enter an appearance if they wished to dispute the plaintiffs' claim in the action, and that in default of appearance they would be deemed to admit the validity of any judgment, and their liability to indemnify. The appellants did not enter an appearance, taking the view that the Prize Court had no jurisdiction to issue the notice. Their main ground appears to have been that as Egyptian subjects they could only be sued by a foreigner in the mixed court, and they must have given some notice of these contentions, for the next proceedings was an argument, before Mr. Peter Grain, one of the judges of the court, on the point of jurisdiction. The appellants were not represented, but the plaintiffs in the action appeared by counsel, and the Procurator appeared for the marshal. Both seem to have argued in support of the jurisdiction.

On the 28th June 1918, the judge delivered judgment to the effect that the Prize Court had jurisdiction. On this the appellants (by leave, necessary owing to the time having expired) entered an appearance under protest, and the case was tried, with the result that judgment was given for the plaintiffs in the action for damages, the amount to be ascertained by an inquiry, which was directed; and for the marshal, as against the third parties, that he was entitled to be indemnified by them. From this judgment the appellants appeal to this board, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain and decide on the third-party notice, and also that even if it had, the decision was wrong on the merits. The marshal also entered an appeal, but on petition by him to this board he was, on the 7th Feb. 1921, struck out as appellant and made a respondent on the terms that his argument was to be restricted to his claim to be indemnified by the appellants.

The only appeal now before the board, therefore, is that of the Bonded Warehouses Company against the judgment, holding them liable to indemnify the marshal against the claim of the Japanese firm, and the main question for consideration is whether the Prize Court has jurisdiction to decide any such matter. The interlocutory judgment delivered by Grain, J. goes through and quotes the authorities which show that a Prize Court has jurisdiction over the incidents as well as the principal matter of prize, but he does not refer to the facts of the present case, nor say why he considered they brought the case within the rule which he laid down. It is possible that the facts had not then been brought fully to his knowledge. It must, however, have been clear that the complaint was about matters which had arisen after the release of the goods. The communications which passed immediately after the release were proved at the subsequent trial and are summarised in the final judgment. They were in writing, except that there were a few telephonic communications, the effect of which appears by the letters which are set out in the record. The order of releasc, dated the 5th Oct. 1915, was formally drawn up, and was on the 6th Oct. sent in a letter from the advocates acting for the claimants in prize to the appellants, the Warehouse Company. That company carried on business not only as warehousemen, but also as forwarding and shipping agents and the letter of the 6th Oct. gave directions to the company to take delivery of the goods released, and to arrange for their shipment to Japan.

Further letters passed as to further information which the appellants required in order to be able to ship the goods. The order of release was returned in order that the advocates might get an addition to it which would prevent difficulties with the Customs authorities, and facilitate the shipping. The correspondence from the first shows that the appellants accepted the directions given to them, and agreed to hold for their owners the goods to which the release related, and which were described in a schedule to the order by the marks on them. The Bonded Company, however, kept no books distinguishing for whom they held goods, or even showing what they had in stock, and this the trial judge very naturally held to be negligent. It seems to have been the practice for the marshal to give to the Bonded Company documents called delivery orders, directing the company to hold to their own order goods in their warehouse then standing in his name. This seems to have been done when it was proposed to send goods away to show that the marshal had no further claim, and as an authority to deal with the goods as forwarding agents. Such a document was given on the 18th Oct. in reference to the 171 cases which had been released, but it does not mention the release, or the name of the plaintiffs, or of their advocate to whom the order of release had been given. It was in precisely the same terms as a document which had been given on the 14th Oct., intended to relate to goods which had been condemned, and which it was proposed to ship to England, and in respect of which the Bonded Company was to act as shipping agents for the marshal himself. These documents appear to have been given at the request of the Bonded Company when it was desired to deal with the goods, but it is clear that they were treated as mere matters of form, and that the company did not wait for such orders to be given before they accepted directions for shipment. The document of the 14th Oct. was the cause of the trouble, because the list attached to it included, as well as the marks of condemned goods, the marks of 150 out of the 171 cases which had been released to the plaintiffs. The case of the marshal is that he employed the company to make out this list, and merely put his signature to it when presented to him for signature. This is the basis of his claim for indemnity. The goods named on it were not shipped until the 27th Oct., but then they were, and no comparison of the lists having been made, the 150 cases were included in the shipment. On the 16th Oct., before the shipment, and when the goods were still in their warehouses, the company had written to the advocate of the plaintiffs a letter distinctly accepting his orders as to the disposal of the 171 cases, but there was further delay in shipping the plaintiffs' goods, as there was a prohibition against exporting aniline dyes from Egypt, and it was necessary to get dispensation for these goods, and it was not until the 4th Dec., when all these difficulties were removed, and the goods were about to be shipped that the mistake was discovered.

On these facts their Lordships are clearly of opinion that before the cause of complaint of the plaintiffs arose, not only had the 171 cases been released to them by order of the court, but the release had been acted on by attornment, if that last step was necessary to prevent their ceasing to be prize goods. They had, in fact, in their Lordships' view, ceased to be prize goods.

Passing now to the authorities on the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, the most important are referred to in the judgment of Peter Grain, J. What they show is that the Prize Court has exclusive jurisdiction over the question of prize or no prize, and also over all questions which depend for their proper determination on the question of prize or no prize, the reason being that prizes are acquisitions jure belli, and that jus belli is to be determined by the law of nations, and not by the municipal law of any country. Thus in Le Caux v. Eden (2 Douglas, 594), it was held that an action for false imprisonment for detention of a passenger on a ship alleged to have been wrongfully captured in war could not be entertained by a common law court, because it could not decide the question of rightful or wrongful capture. In that case the whole question was discussed very fully, and with great learning. So the claim for freight on a voyage interrupted by capture, and continued to a different port by direction of the captors, can only be dealt with in the Prize Court, for the right to the freight contracted for for the intended voyage is lost by the non-completion of that voyage, and the only freight which could be recoverable would be that which the Prize Court might award, applying its rules to the particular circumstances of the capture, on which it alone could adjudicate. This was held in the Corsican Prince (1915, 112 L. T. Rep. 475; (1916) P. 195; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29), and the decision on that point was approved by this board in the St. Helena (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 488; 115 L. T. Rep. 465), although there the appeal was allowed on other grounds. This doctrine as to prize jurisdiction over what are called incidental matters, meaning matters which depend for their decision on prize or no prize, is well established, but it obviously has no application to the present case, where the claim for indemnity in no way required the consideration of any question of prize law or international law for its determination. The prize court also has the incidental jurisdiction which is necessary to enable it to keep control over the captured ship or goods, pending the decision as to whether or not they are lawful prize, in order that the court may be able to deliver them to whomsoever they may decide to be entitled. The learned judge in this case quotes a passage from Storey (Pratts' Storey, edit. 1854, pp. 30 and 31), (also quoted by Sir Samuel Evans in the Corsican Prince (sup.), stating that the Prize Court will follow prize proceeds into the hands of agents or other persons holding them for the captors, or by any other title. "It may proceed to enforce all rights and issue process, therefore, so long as anything remains to be done concerning the subject matter." In a note to Storey at the end of the passage quoted there is a reference to Home v. Camden (2 H. Bl. 533), where the House of Lords reversed a decision of the Common Pleas, granting a prohibition, in respect of an order made after sentence of condemnation by the Prize Court, but before an appeal from the sentence to the Commissioners of Appeal in Prize had been disposed of. In that case many points were argued, but on this point the judgment proceeded on the view that owing to the appeal the property had not finally vested, and therefore there was jurisdiction. If there had been no appeal (and there has been no appeal from the release in the case now before the board) it would seem that there could have been no jurisdiction after sentence.

Grain, J. concludes his judgment by saying that the Prize Court can follow prize goods through all incidents or torts concerning them, and "its jurisdiction continues so long as anything remains to be done touching the subject matter." He must, therefore, have thought that the tort complained of in this case had been committed whilst something remained to be done in the matter, whereas the further investigation of the facts at the trial seems to their Lordships to show that that was not so. There are matters of form in the procedure of the Prize Court here which must not be lost sight of. If the decision of the court against the marshal is based on the disciplinary jurisdiction of the court over its officer, the usual way of commencing proceedings would be for the party aggrieved to call on the court by motion to exercise its jurisdiction, and not by issuing a writ for damages against the marshal. It was probably the issuing of the writ which led to the idea that a third-party notice might be issued, but there is no trace of any such practice in the Prize Court. There is nothing in the Prize Court rules here, which it is stated were adopted in the Court in Egypt, providing for the calling in of third parties against whom the right of indemnity is claimed, and as it is a new practice introduced by the Judicature Acts, it cannot be incorporated by Order XLV., providing for the old practice of the High Court of Admiralty in Prize being followed in cases not provided for by the new rules. Their Lordships, however, would not desire to base their decision in this case on any matter of form. They base it on the broad view that there is no jurisdiction in the Prize Court to decide as between parties, some of whom have not been parties to the prize proceedings, disputes not involving the consideration of the jus belli, and arising on facts which have occurred after an effective release of the goods to a claimant. Their Lordships decide nothing as to the judgment against the marshal, as there is no appeal against it, and of course nothing as to the right to indemnity, or as to the question of contribution between tort feasors which the appellants desired to raise on the appeal. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed, and the judgment of the Prize Court against the third parites including, of course, the order for costs, should be set aside, and that the appellants should have their costs of the appeal paid by the second respondent, and that the first respondents should bear their own costs of the appeal.

Their Lordships propose to make no order to give the appellants their costs in the court below, as the costs there would mainly have been occasioned by the dispute as to the indemnity decided against the appellants on the facts, and it would involve a difficult taxation to apportion the costs in the court below properly payable by each party.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, June 2, 1921.

(Before Bankes, Warrington, and Scrutton, L.JJ.)

Troy v. Eastern Company of Warehouses Insurance and Transport of Goods and Advances Limited (of Petrograd). (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Shipping and forwarding agents—Through b ll of lading—Prepayment of lump sum freight — Consignee voluntarily taking delivery of goods at place short of original destination—Freight for unperformed portion of transit unexpended — Principal or agent — Obligation to account.

The plaintiff delivered to the defendants in Liverpool a large quantity of cigars and cigarettes for carriage to Petrograd viâ Vladivostock, at the rates (previously quoted by the defendants) of 4l. 7s. 6d. per ton for the sea portion of the carriage to Vladivostock, and 99l. 10s. per ton for the land portion from Vladivostock to Petrograd, and on the terms of a document in the form of a bill of lading, which stated that "Goods are forwarded on the basis of the present existing tariff and in accordance with the exceptions and (or) conditions of the railway companies, steamship lines, or other transport media concerned in the carriage, and we only act in our capacity as shipping and forwarding agents without responsibility on our part for other transport media concerned in the transport," and "Freight on above goods payable in Liverpool." The plaintiff duly prepaid at Liverpool the amount of the freight, which was 125l. for the sea portion of the carriage, and 928l. for the land portion, and it was assumed by the plaintiff that the rates which the defendants had quoted to the plaintiff were intended to cover the defendants' remuneration. The consignee of the goods, owing to the internal troubles in Russia, voluntarily elected to take delivery of the goods at Vladivostock. The defendants had not paid the railway company any sum of money in respect of carriage from Vladivostock to Petrograd. The plaintiff claimed to recover back the sum of 928l. as money received by the defendants as the plaintiff's agents and not expended by them.

Rowlatt, J. held, that as the sum paid to the defendants by the plaintiff in Liverpool was a lump sum for procuring the carriage, and included the defendants' remuneration, they were under no obligation to account to the plaintiff for any portion of the money which was not expended by reason of the consignee electing to take delivery at a place short of the original destination of the goods.

Held, that on the facts the defendants were in this transaction acting, not as forwarding agents, but as principals, and that the judgment of Rowlatt, J. was right.

(a) Reported by T. W. Morgan and W. C. Sandford Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Rowlatt, J. in an action tried in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiff claimed from the defendants 928*l.* 5*s.* as money had and received by the defendants as the plaintiff's agents and not expended by them. In Oct. 1916 the plaintiff employed the defendants, who were shipping and forwarding agents, to arrange for the carriage of a quantity of cigars and cigarettes for the plaintiff from Liverpool to Petrograd viâ Vladivostock. The goods were to be delivered at Petrograd to one Aristotles Kalogeropulo. The defendants had, at the plaintiff's request, quoted for the sea portion of the carriage to Vladivostock and for the land portion from Vladivostock to Petrograd by "Grande Vitesse." The plaintiff delivered the goods to the defendants at Liverpool for carriage to Petrograd at the rates so quoted—namely, 4*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton for the sea portion to Vladivostock and 99*l.* 10*s.* per ton for the land portion from Vladivostock to Petrograd, and on the terms of a document which provided (inter alia) that the defendants were acting only in their capacity as shipping and forwarding agents, without responsibility for other transport media concerned in the transport, and that the freight on the goods was to be payable in Liverpool. The defendants delivered to the plaintiff an account which included an item of 928*l.* 5*s.* for the carriage and charges in respect of the goods from Vladivostock to Petrograd; and the plaintiff duly paid the same to the defendants. Nothing was expressly arranged with regard to the remuneration of the defendants, but it was assumed by the plaintiff that the rates quoted by the defendants to him (the plaintiff) at his request, included their own profit.

When the goods arrived at Vladivostock the consignee considered it advisable, in view of the condition of affairs in Russia at the time, that the goods should not be forwarded along the Siberian Railway to Petrograd. He accordingly intercepted the goods at Vladivostock and accepted delivery of them there, and the remainder of the transit was abandoned. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action, claiming to recover back from the defendants the sum of 928*l.* 5*s.* which related to the part of the transit which was abandoned, alleging that as that sum was paid by him to the defendants in respect of carriage from Vladivostock to Petrograd, the defendants were liable to repay the sum in question as money received by them as the plaintiff's agents because they failed to make arrangements to enable the goods to be forwarded from Vladivostock to Petrograd. The defendants denied that they were the agents of the plaintiff, and by their defence they alleged that the consignee intercepted the goods at Vladivostock, and thereby released and discharged them from all responsibility, liability, and obligation with respect to the goods or to any further carriage or forwarding thereof.

Sir M. M. Macnaghten, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount claimed as money received by the defendants as the plaintiff's agent and not expended by them.

H. Simmons for the defendants.—The plaintiff is not entitled to recover, because the payment was an absolute payment to the defendants of a lump sum for services rendered, and not as agents for the plaintiff, and they are not accountable for any sums not expended. Moreover, the consignee intercepted the goods and thereby released the defendants from any further responsibility in the matter. But the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants was one undivided contract. The defendants were ready to fulfil their part of the contract. He referred to:

London and North Western Railway v. Bartlett, 5 L. T. Rep. 399; 7 H. & N. 400;
Hough and Co. v. Manzanos and Co., 4 Ex. Div. 104; 27 W. R. 536;
Byrne v. Schiller, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 111; 25 L. T. Rep. 211; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 319;
Jones v. European and General Express Company, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; 124 L. T. Rep. 276; 90 L. J. 159 K. B.

Rowlatt, J.—This case raises an important and apparently a novel point. The defendants are shipping and forwarding agents. The plaintiff desired to consign some cigars from Liverpool to Petrograd viâ Vladivostock, and he approached the defendants with a view to getting this transaction carried through. The defendants quoted rail transit prices from Vladivostok to Petrograd, (1) for carriage by "grande vitesse" and (2) for carriage by "petite vitesse." The plaintiff elected to have the goods sent by "grande vitesse" and delivered the goods to the defendants, who issued a document in the nature of a bill of lading, the exact meaning of the terms of which I need not, I think, determine. The defendants sent in an account to the plaintiff quoting a price from Vladivostock to Petrograd. No doubt they made a profit for themselves on the transaction, but the amount of their remuneration does not appear in the account. The question is whether the plaintiff can recover back from the defendants the amount which they would have paid for railway carriage from Vladivostock to Petrograd, having regard to the fact that the consignee elected to accept delivery of the goods on their arrival at Vladivostock. It cannot be contended that the plaintiff would be entitled to get back all the money paid by him to the defendants in respect of the procurement of carriage from Vladivostock to Petrograd, because if he revoked the agency he could not expect to recover profits to which the defendants are reasonably entitled. My attention was called to a decision of my own in which I said that forwarding agents were not carriers and were not responsible beyond making the arrangements with the carriers. In other words, they are agents to effect carriage and not carriers. Jones v. European and General Express Company (sup.).

To say, however, that the defendants' duties were not higher than that of agents does not help much. This case cannot be decided merely by labelling the defendants "agents" or "non-agents." It turns on this fact. The defendants were paid a lump sum to procure carriage out of which they were to pay the actual carriers and get their own remuneration. They are not accountable for the way in which they spent that sum. Whether they paid more or less does not concern the person who employed them. No one can, therefore, revoke any part of the contract for the carriage and call on the defendants to account for the sum saved by the defendants by reason of the agency having been revoked and full advantage not having been taken by the consignee of the original contract.

For these reasons, I am of opinion that the plaintiff's claim fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

Judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appealed.

H. Simmons for the defendants was not called.

Bankes, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Rowlatt, J., and the material facts appear to be these. The plaintiff, a merchant in London, was anxious to make the necessary arrangements for the conveyance of a large quantity of cigars and cigarettes, running into tons by weight, to Petrograd, to a customer there, under conditions that would enable him to secure payment for his goods from his customer, and he apparently employed a firm of Messrs. Morgan to inquire as to the arrangements that it was possible to make, and Messrs. Morgan got into touch with the defendants, whose full name is "The Eastern Company of Warehouses, Insurance and Transport of Goods with Advances Limited (of Petrograd)," and one can gather the nature of their business partly from their title, and partly from the places where their branch offices are situate, apparently all over Russia and in Persia and all over the Continent of Europe as far as Samarkand, Taschkent, and other places.

The goods were in London and therefore it would be necessary to arrange for the transmission of the goods from London to any port to which they were shipped, and also to arrange the route by which they should be conveyed. Apparently different routes were discussed, but finally the route settled on was Liverpool to Vladivostock, and Vladivostock to Petrograd; that meant, of course, a conveyance partly by sea, and partly by land. Messrs. Morgan apparently discussed with the defendants the land portion of the conveyance, and a question arose as to whether the goods when they arrived at Vladivostock should be sent on by "grande vitesse" or "petite vitesse." In order to enable Messrs. Morgan, or Mr. Troy, to decide which method of dispatch should be adopted, the defendants quoted prices for the "grande vitesse" and the "petite vitesse," which prices appear in a letter of the 20th Sept. 1916; they quoted 32s. per pood of 36 lb. by "grande vitesse" and 15s. per pood by "petite vitesse," which runs into big figures, being 99*l.* odd a ton by "grande vitesse." There is nothing to indicate, and it is not suggested, that that was a quotation obtained from the Trans-Siberian Railway and was the Trans-Siberian Railway's charge, it was the defendants' figure which they were prepared to include in a through rate from Liverpool to Petrograd, and a through rate which was to form part of a payment which had to be made in advance. Messrs. Morgan decided for Mr. Troy that the goods should go by "grande vitesse," and after enquiries it was ascertained that there was an available steamer, the Tydeus, belonging to Messrs. Holt, which was sailing, I think in October, and which could take the goods, if they were in Liverpool in time to be put on board. It was decided to send the goods by that vessel, and Messrs. Morgan issued a consignment note to the defendants notifying that the goods had been sent from London to the defendants' order at Birkenhead (on quay) for the Tydeus, for the purpose of being forwarded to this Russian customer at Petrograd. The freight and other charges were to be paid by Messrs. Morgan. The goods arrived at Liverpool and were put on board the vessel, and the shipowner issued a bill of lading in respect of the goods, the freight for which was payable in advance, and that was a freight arranged between the defendants and the shipowner. The vessel arrived at Vladivostock and the goods were discharged there. All we know about the state of things at Vladivostock is that there was certainly a very considerable difficulty in getting goods from Vladivostock to Petrograd by the Trans-Siberian Railway, and if the Russian customer had insisted upon their being taken to Petrograd, very considerable delay would have occurred before there would have been any "grande vitesse" to take them there.

I think the only conclusion one can arrive at on this part of the case is that for reasons, the full details of which we do not know, it suited the Russian customer's purse better to take delivery of the goods at Vladivostock than at Petrograd, and he did so. There is no evidence that it was impossible to convey the goods from Vladivostock to Petrograd, or that the circumstances were such that that part of the adventure must be said to have been frustrated. The learned judge offered the plaintiff an opportunity of considering whether his position would not have been better by obtaining the necessary evidence and perhaps putting forward a different form of case, but the plaintiff did not accep that offer and was willing to stand upon the position which he made before the learned judge, and which he has repeated here to-day, which is that the defendants were in the position of agents merely, and therefore were in the position of persons who had, as agents, received instructions to make the necessary arrangements for the conveyance of these goods from Vladivostock to Petrograd by "grande vitesse," that the instructions and authority to make those arrangements were revoked before the arrangements had been made or the defendants had entered into responsibility, and that, under those circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to recover so much of the amount which he paid the defendants in advance for the entire journey as represents the portion of the journey from Vladivostock to Petrograd.

That case depends entirely upon the plaintiff being in a position to show that the defendants were in the position of agents merely. In my opinion, the plaintiff, upon the documents, fails in establishing that position. He can only found the case by laying undue emphasis upon the part of the defendant's title in which they describe themselves as "forwarding agents," and the accident that the defendants let him know how they made their charge for doing what they did in regard to these goods for the journey of the goods from Liverpool to Petrograd. When the documents are looked into, it appears to me in this case that although the defendants describe themselves as forwarding agents, and although they disclaim any personal responsibility for any mishaps on the voyage due to acts of any person employed by them, they, in fact, did accept the position of issuing themselves the through bill of lading for the goods with all the liabilitites attaching to that position, subject, of course, to the protection which they afford themselves by the exceptions.

Under those circumstances it appears to me that this is not a case of principal and agent at all, but of two independent contracting parties, one of whom describes himself as a "forwarding agent," but although under the circumstances and on occasions the defendants may act as mere agents in this case they have not acted or purported to act as mere agents carrying out their principal's instructions; they were required to undertake the position of principals, it was an essential condition of their obtaining this business that they should themselves issue a through bill of lading, and by issuing the through bill of lading, they made manifest the fact that in this particular transaction they were independent contracting parties.

It was one of the terms of their contract that they should be paid the full freight in advance. The freight, it is true, was made up of three items; one was the "sea freight to Vladivostock at 87*s.* 6*d.* per 40 cubic ft.; carriage and charges from Vladivostock to Petrograd per "grande vitesse," and bills of lading—two sets 5*s.*" It was a mere accident that the defendants rendered their account in that form. They were under no obligation to do so; they might have charged a lump sum, in which case it would have been very difficult as it seems to me for the plaintiff to have even formulated a case founded on his present contention, but it was, and is described in the through bill of lading as "freight on the above goods payable in Liverpool." The amount was paid in Liverpool; it was freight paid in advance, and in my opinion Rowlatt, J. was quite right in saying that upon the facts of this case there was no reason for departing from the rule applicable under ordinary circumstances to freight payable in advance, and it gave the plaintiff no right of action to say: "You describe yourselves as 'forwarding agents,' and, in fact, quoted me the figures and showed me the figures which made up the total claim which I paid and under those circumstances I am entitled to treat you as my agent to whom I gave instructions to make a contract with the Trans-Siberian Railway; you have not done it, and therefore you must pay me back so much of the total amount as has reference to that part of the journey. In my opinion, the view taken by Rowlatt, J. on the facts was right. This case is quite distinguishable from the case cited to the learned judge (Jones v. European and General Express Company Limited, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; (1920) 124 L. T. Rep. 276; 90 L. J. K. B. 159; 25 Com. Cas. 296), and I think his decision in that case was quite right upon the facts as far as they are disclosed in the reports. I think, for the reasons I have given, the two cases are clearly distinguishable.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. On the 14th Oct. 1916 the defendants, who are described as "The Eastern Company of Warehouses, Insurance and Transport of Goods with Advances Limited (of Petrograd)," gave to the plaintiff through their agents, Messrs. Morgan, in Liverpool, a document which is, in fact, a through bill of lading. It states that they have "received for shipment in apparent good order and condition" and so on "per steamer Tydeus or other steamer from Liverpool to Vladivostock, thence by conveyance to Petrograd, there to be delivered unto Mr. Aristoteles Kalogeropulo, Petrograd," the goods which are described in the document and they are "to be delivered at the aforesaid port (or so near thereto as she can safely get) subject to the conditions and exceptions hereof." The document also contains the stipulation "Freight on above payable in Liverpool." The goods were duly delivered to the defendants and were shipped by them on the steamship Tydeus, and on the 18th Oct. the defendants sent to the plaintiff through their agents, Messrs. Morgan, an account expressed to be an account for freight and charges. The freight was divided into two parts: 125*l.* as freight and charges to Vladivostok, and carriage and charges from Vladivostock to Petrograd 928*l.*, and on the 20th Oct. the plaintiff, in accordance with the contract, paid the whole of that freight, 1053*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* In fact the goods instead of being carried from Liverpool to Petrograd, were carried from Liverpool to Vladivostock, and there, to follow the allegation in the points of claim, Mr. Kalogeropulo took delivery of the goods and the goods were not carried from Vladivostock to Petrograd.

The plaintiff brings this action for the recovery of 928*l.*, that part of the freight which represents the carriage from Vladivostock to Petrograd, and he contends, and he puts his case upon the footing that the defendants were mere agents entrusted with the sum in question to be expended by them in procuring the carriage of the goods from Vladivostock to Petrograd, and that as that sum was not expended, or as to so much of it as was not expended, the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendants as his agents. It is admitted on the part of the plaintiff, that if the defendants were not the mere agents, as he alleges they were, but if they had been the actual carriers of the goods, then the plaintiff, having paid the whole freight in advance, could not have recovered any part of it by reason of part of the transport not having been effected by the defendants. The question to my mind is whether the defendants are to be treated as if they were mere agents, such as they are alleged to be by the plaintiff, or whether they are independent contractors who have contracted with the plaintiff for the transport of the goods from Liverpool to Petrograd. In my opinion, the question turns entirely upon the construction of the document to which I have already referred. That document is to all intents and purposes a through bill of lading; it contains an obligation on the part of the defendants, having accepted the goods, to deliver them to the ultimate consignee at Petrograd. I think the true view of that contract is this: that they, the defendants, are not the actual carriers; the contract is nevertheless one for carriage of the goods, it being understood between the parties that the actual carriage has to be performed not by the defendants themselves, but by persons employed by them. It is admitted that the plaintiff would have no right to inquire into the mode in which the sum in question had been expended by the defendants had they actually procured the carriage of the goods from Vladivostok to Petrograd, and it seems to me once you have that admission, it is impossible to say that the defendants were mere agents such as they are suggested to be by the plaintiff. I think, as I have already said, the true effect of the contract is that it is really a contract of carriage, and that the case must be decided in the same way as it would have had to be decided had the defendants been ordinary carriers to whom freight had been paid in advance and, therefore, the plaintiff's claim, which is for the return of part of that freight, has, rightly, been held by Rowlatt, J. to fail. The judgment of Rowlatt, J., in my opinion, must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

THE BRISTOL CITY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Limitation of liability—Vessel not equipped with proper ground tackle—Collision—Unseaworthiness—"Actual fault or privity" of owners—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.

Sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 casts the onus upon plaintiffs in limitation actions of showing that what happened occurred without their fault or privity.

The B. C. was an unfurnished vessel not fully equipped with ground tackle, and not supplied with engine power. The builders (representing her owners) gave instructions that she should be towed from Cardiff to Bristol by two tugs. One tug was late in arriving, and the marine superintendent in charge started the towage with one tug only. The weather, which was not good, became unexpectedly worse, and the tow rope, which was rotten, broke. The B. C. had only one anchor on board, and about forty-eight fathoms of wire rope, no cables, no windlass, and no hawse pipes. This equipment failed to hold her, and she drifted across the bows of the J. E., a sailing vessel at anchor, doing her much damage. The owners of the B. C. claimed, under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, to limit their liability.

Held, upon the advice of the nautical assessors, that the B. C. ought to have been furnished with at least two anchors and proper ground tackle, and that she was not seaworthy, that the collision was due to the lack of equipment, and that the builders (who were also owners of vessels) being aware of the facts as regards the equipment of the vessel, could not establish that the collision took place without their "actual fault of privity," within the meaning of the section, and were not, therefore, entitled to a limitation decree.

Judgment of Duke, P. affirmed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Duke. P. refusing to grant to the plaintiffs a decree of limitation of liability.

The plaintiffs were the builders of the Bristol City, but by an amendment were substituted as plaintiffs in the place of the owners.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, by sect. 503, sub-sect. 1, provides:

The owners of a ship, British or foreign, shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity; (that is to say,) . . . (d) Where any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel . . . by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; be liable to damages beyond the following amounts . . . (ii.) In respect of loss of, or damage to, vessels . . . an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

Bateson, K.C. and Noad for the appellants.—The plaintiffs were depending on the towage being made with two tugs, and if it had been so made, there was an ample margin of safety. It is true she had no hawse pipes, but she would have been safe without them with two tugs. The plaintiffs are not mariners, nor did they know that the weather was bad, and that there was only one tug towing, and they were not doing anything unreasonable in giving the instructions which they gave:

Lennard's Carrying Company v. Asiatic Petroleum Company, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 81; 113 L. T. Rep. 195; (1915) A. C. 705.

The accident was due to two causes—Captain Barclay started with one tug only, and a rotten tow rope broke. The plaintiffs were not responsible for these causes. If the plaintiffs' instructions had been followed, the vessel would have been in a fit condition for the towage.

Laing, K.C. and A. E. Nelson for the respondents.—The vessel had no hawse pipes nor ground tackle, and Mr. Hill knew of this. He is a shipowner, as well as a ship builder, and should know that in this condition the ship was not seaworthy. He knows that accidents may happen, and that if such an accident should happen as in fact did happen, ground tackle would be necessary. There was, therefore, actual fault or privity on his part, in letting the ship put to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and he is not entitled to a limitation decree.

Bateson, K.C. replied.

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—The Bristol City was an unfurnished vessel, built at Bristol by the plaintiffs, and sent from there to Cardiff to take on board her engines. From there she was to be towed back to Bristol to be fitted. The voyage was a short one. She was taken across by two tugs, and the intention of the owners was that she should be brought back by two tugs. She was not in fact so brought back. When she had her engines on board the second tug had not arrived, and Captain Barclay the marine superintendent in charge of her, decided to start with only one tug. She had then only one anchor on board and about forty-eight fathoms of wire rope, no cables, no windlass, and no hawse pipes. As she was coming across the tow rope, which was rotten, broke, and Captain Barclay, after trying unsuccessfully to pick up the tug, let go the one anchor, which did not hold. The Bristol City drifted for, it is said, about ten minutes, and finally brought up simply by coming across the bows of the John Ena. Much damage was done to the latter vessel, and the plaintiffs now seek to limit their liability.

To limit liability is always hard upon the person injured; yet one cannot help feeling a certain sympathy with the plaintiffs, because two unfortunate things happened which they could not have contemplated. They did [not contemplate that Captain Barclay would start with one tug only. It appears that he made inquiries about the weather and as to the state of the barometer before starting. The weather at that time was not good; it unexpectedly got worse before the Bristol City tried to anchor, and that, no doubt, was the cause of her drifting. The President seems to have thought that Captain Barclay was justified in starting when he did, but it appears to me that, on the evidence, I should have been inclined to hold the contrary. The other thing that the plaintiffs did not know was that the tug's rope was rotten, and they could not be expected to know that. The President, however, has found, on the advice of the Elder Brethren, that without proper ground tackle the ship was not seaworthy—that is to say, that although she might, and in all probability would, have come across safely if all had gone right, still, if anything had happened to make it necessary for her to help the tugs, then she was not properly equipped with ground tackle so as to be in a position to help. It seems to me that that is to a great extent a matter of nautical skill, and we have therefore taken the opinion of our assessors. I put the question to them in this way: "Considering the ordinary chances of navigation on such a voyage as this, was the Bristol City, in the condition in which she was, reasonably fit for the voyage, taking into account the fact that it was intended that she should be attended and towed by two tugs?" The answer was: "No, the anchor and length of wire were insufficient; she should have had two anchors and a proper amount of cable." That agrees with the advice given to the President; and even if I wished I should have difficulty in differing from it, but I need hardly say that I do not wish to differ from it.

That leaves the questions, (1) Was the absence of proper equipment the cause of the accident? and (2) did the accident happen without the fault or privity of the plaintiffs? On the first question, it seems to me that the lack of proper equipment was the cause of the accident. It is very likely that if Captain Barclay had not started with only one tug the accident would not have happened, nor would it have happened if the tow rope had not broken but all these things having happened, the last factor is that the vessel, not being provided with proper ground tackle, did not bring up, but drifted down on to the John Ena. I have not asked the assessors to put the chances into figures, but the Elder Brethren in the court below thought that it was about ninety-nine chances to one that, with proper ground tackle, the collision would have been averted. I think, therefore, that the want of that equipment was a real cause of the accident.

The next question is whether the accident happened without the actual fault or privity of the owners within the meaning of sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. [His Lordship read the section.] I think by the section the onus is upon the plaintiffs to show that what happened occurred without their fault or privity. In the court below Mr. Hill, senior, was called as representing the plaintiffs. He evidently knew very little about the matter. The plaintiffs did not really know what fault or privity was going to be alleged against them, and they only called the elder Mr. Hill because he happened to be in London. Upon this appeal being entered, an affidavit was put in by his partner, Mr. Hill, junior, who did know something about it, for he said that the business connected with the vessel going to and from between Bristol and Cardiff was under his management and supervision, and he knew that the ship was not fitted with hawse pipes, that she had no windlass, and was provided with one anchor. He goes on to say that the equipment was identical with that of other vessels under the same conditions. Then he says: "I am not a mariner, and have no knowledge of the handling of vessels." But he knew the facts, and the statement that he was not a mariner is not sufficient to show that he did not know that this equipment was inadequate. Mr. Hill, senior, did know something about these matters, for he gave an answer that, in the ordinary course of events, a vessel would not be sent to Cardiff and back without hawse pipes if it could be helped. I do not think it unfair to Mr. Hill, junior, to say that probably he would have given a similar answer to his father. But I do not base my judgment on that. Mr. Hill is a ship-owner, as well as a builder, and it seems to me that the two things must be taken together. The one capacity cannot be separated from the other. He has been sending vessels up the Channel for some time, and, in my view, persons in his position must be taken to know something about their business, and the equipment necessary to make a vessel seaworthy. It is true he says that he has on other occasions sent vessels equipped like this; but he does not say that he does not know the consequences of sending a vessel on a voyage, however short, without some proper ground tackle; and that obligation is not displaced by his saying: "I am not a mariner." I daresay he has no knowledge of the handling of vessels, and could not navigate a vessel across the ocean. But that is insufficient. I have considerable sympathy with the plaintiffs; but I feel obliged to say that I cannot interfere with the judgment of the President, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree. [His Lordship stated the facts.] I am not sure what decision I should have come to if left to myself, but we have the assistance of nautical assessors, and they advise us in the same sense as the President was advised, and, in view of their findings, I find myself unable to come to a different conclusion of fact. Therefore, it must be taken that the vessel was not properly equipped. As regards the question whether the loss was caused by that defect, I have no doubt but that it was so caused. Perhaps it would not have happened if there had been two tugs, or if the rope had not parted, but these events having happened, I think there is no doubt that, in the end, the accident did happen through the want of proper ground tackle.

Then there is the further question, whether the accident happened without the fault or privity of the owners.

It seems that the Hills, junior and senior, between them knew the facts, and the question is whether they can negative the knowledge that the ship was in effect unseaworthy. Lord Sumner, then Hamilton, L.J., in Asiatic Petroleum Company v. Lennard's Carrying Company, says this (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381; 109 L. T. Rep. 433; (1914) 1 K. B. 436): "Where the Legislature has selected one adjective for employment, I think little is to be gained, and often much to be lost, by paraphrasing it with another. Actual fault negatives that liability which arises solely under the rule of 'respondeat superior.' In that sense it conveys the idea of personal fault, but it does not necessarily mean that the owner must have laid the train or set the torch himself. Nor again does it mean that the owner must have been the sole or next or chief cause of the fire. It is fire 'without his actual fault' not fire 'except where caused by his natural action.' The question is, could it be said of the fire that the owners had nothing to do with it but only their servants, or that for this fire not they but only their servant, if any person, were to blame? It is not enough that the happening of the fire is the servant's fault. It must also not be the owner's fault." Here then was knowledge of the two managers as to the facts, and they were responsible for the vessel's equipment. It might be said that they yet did not know what ground tackle was necessary, but it is quite plain from the evidence of Mr. Hill, senior, that they were owners as well as builders, and under these circumstances I think that they should have had a knowledge of what is seaworthy and what is not. In my view, the onus is upon the plaintiffs to establish that they did not know that this vessel was not properly equipped, and I think it is impossible to say that they have discharged that onus. I think therefore that the appeal fails.

Younger, L.J.—So soon as it is found that the damages are attributable to the absence of proper ground tackle on the Bristol City, it is, I think, clear that the plaintiffs have not established that that state of things happened without their fault or privity; and I am constrained, although with reluctance, to accept that position and concur in a finding against them. I have found it difficult, however, in the circumstances of this case, to disabuse my mind of the impression that the relevant cause of the accident was not so much the absence of ground tackle as that, without the fault or privity of the plaintiffs, the vessel started from Cardiff with one tug only. I have had difficulty in getting rid of the impression that the accident was due to the fact that Captain Barclay undertook this voyage disregarding the provisions of the owners in the matter of tug power. I have found it difficult to disabuse my mind of the conviction that had the Bristol City, on her return voyage from Cardiff, been in charge, as it was intended, of two tugs, the absence of proper ground tackle would have been innocuous, but I have abandoned that impression in view of the strong opinions held by my Lord and the Lord Justice.

CHELLEW v. ROYAL COMMISSION ON SUGAR SUPPLY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

General average expenditure—Port of refuge—Subsequent total loss of ship and cargo—Liability of cargo owner for general average—Termination of adventure—York-Antwerp Rules 1890, r. 17.

By rule 17 of the York-Antwerp Rules 1890, the contribution to a general average shall be made upon the actual values of the property at the termination of the adventure.

A steamship left Cuba with a cargo of sugar, which under the bills of lading was to be carried to Queenstown for orders and to be delivered at the port of destination to certain consignees. The bills of lading provided that general average should be payable according to York-Antwerp Rules. During the voyage the ship incurred general average expenses at a port of refuge, and soon after resuming her voyage, she and her cargo were totally lost at sea by fire. The shipowner claimed general average contribution from the consignees of the cargo.

Held, that, under the York-Antwerp Rules which were incorporated in the contract, the claim failed, because at the termination of the adventure, namely, on the total loss of the ship and cargo, the cargo had no value.

Quaere, whether the claim would have succeeded at common law, apart from the York-Antwerp Rules.

Decision of Sankey, J. (infra ; (1921) 2 K. B. 627) affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of Sankey, J. on the award of an arbitrator stated in the form of a special case.

The material parts of the award of the learned arbitrator were as follows :

In Jan. 1919 the Penlee loaded a cargo of sugar at two ports in Cuba. Various bills of lading for the cargo were issued, under which the cargo was to be carried to Queenstown for orders and to be delivered at the port of destination to the Royal Commission on the Sugar Supply. Each bill of lading contained the provision "general average payable according to York-Antwerp Rules." The respondents were at all material times the owners of the cargo and holders of the bills of lading.

The Penlee sailed from Cuba with the cargo on the 20th Jan 1919. She encountered a hurricane on the 10th Feb. and sustained damage to her hull and engines. In consequence of the damage her master prudently determined to put into Horta in the Azores as a port of refuge, where she arrived on the 22nd Feb. At Horta certain repairs were done and she sailed from Horta upon their completion on the 15th March.

At Horta certain expenses of the nature of port of refuge expenses were incurred by the claimant amounting in all to 717*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* As the damage to his ship which occasioned resort to Horta was of the nature of particular average, and did not arise from any general average sacrifice, the claimant would not have been entitled to assert that he had a right at common law to a contribution in general average towards any of the above expenses in view of the decision in Svendsen v. Wallace (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 453 ; 52 L. T. Rep. 901 ; 10 App. Cas. 404. But under Nos. 10 and 11 of the York-Antwerp Rules 1890 the claimant was primâ facie entitled to say that all the above expenses amounting to 717*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.* ought to be treated as a general average expenditure. The said expenses were incurred for wages and maintenance of the officers and crew at Horta, and port charges, and did not include any outlay for discharging or reloading cargo, or otherwise directly incurred in relation to the cargo or its preservation.

The Penlee having sailed from Horta on the 15th March for Queenstown, signs of fire on board were discovered on 18th March. This fire apparently broke out in the cargo in No. 2 hold, but there was no evidence as to its cause. The fire increased so rapidly and seriously that on the 20th March her master and crew were compelled to abandon the vessel and take refuge on another ship. The Penlee and her whole cargo thus abandoned were totally lost at sea.

The claimant subsequently procured an average adjustment to be prepared in which the above sum of 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* was treated as a general average expenditure. This was apportioned over the steamer valued at 89,250*l.* the cargo valued at 140,000*l.*, and the shipowners freight at risk valued at 1184*l.* The value of 89,250*l.* for the steamer was the estimated value she would have had on arrival in the United Kingdom, and the value of 140,000*l.* for the cargo was the estimated value that the cargo would have had if it had arrived at the port of delivery in good condition.

Upon the above apportionment the cargo's proportion of the 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*s.* was 436*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* The claimant requires the respondents to pay this sum of 436*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, and on their refusal the dispute was referred to me.

It is apparent that upon these facts there arises this question of law ; if subsequently to the incurring by a shipowner of general average expenditure the ship and all her cargo are totally lost while completing the agreed voyage, can the shipowner claim any contribution in general average from the owners of the cargo so lost ?

The learned arbitrator then enumerated the various text books dealing with the question of law, and which are cited in the judgment below and continued :

I conceive firstly that the rule might be either (1) general average expenditure at a port of refuge gives the shipowner an immediate right of contribution to that expenditure from the other interests then existing and at their then values, irrespective of their subsequent fate or subsequent values ; or (2) such expenditure gives the shipowner a right of contribution from the other interests at their value at the agreed port of destination, and if for any reason an interest, otherwise liable to contribute, has no value at the port of destination it cannot be made to contribute. And secondly I conceive that reason must be shown to establish any logical distinction between the rule as to the right of contribution towards a general average sacrifice (e.g., if a master jettisons cargo worth 100*l.* or sacrifices a mast worth 100*l.*) and the rule as to the right of contribution towards general average expenditure (e.g., if the master expends 100*l.* on port of refuge expenses).

After discussing the views of the various authors above referred to on the distinction between the rule as to sacrifice and as to expenditure the learned arbitrator continued :

The supposed hardship that the shipowner having made the expenditure, and having lost his ship, is in a poor way unless he can get contribution from the owners of the lost cargo) does not, I think, exist under the conditions of commerce. The shipowner in the present case, after expending 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* at Horta could have insured that sum by a policy on average disbursements on the voyage from Horta to the United Kingdom, against the risk of the total loss of the ship and cargo, or against the risk of the loss of cargo involving the loss of any contribution from cargo. Brigg's v. Merchant Traders Company (13 Q. B. 167). And I think he could have added the premium for this insurance to the 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* as part of his general average expenditure reasonably incurred. . . .

The most relevant authorities on the suggested distinction between sacrifice and expenditure seem to me to be the following: Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East. 220), Fletcher v. Alexander (18 L. T. Rep. 432; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 375), Ocean Steamship Company v. Anderson (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; 50 L. T. Rep. 171; L. Rep. 13 Q. B. Div. 657). My own conclusion is that the rules of the common law are as follows:

(1) The right of a shipowner to contribution in general average is the same whether his claim is for contribution to a general average sacrifice or for contribution to a general average expenditure.

(2) The extent of the right of a shipowner to contribution in general average is the same as the extent of the right to such contribution of any other party to the contract of affreightment.

(3) A claim to contribution in general average by any party to the contract of affreightment must be assessed upon the properties of all parties to that contract upon the values of such properties at the port of adjustment, and the port of adjustment, if voyage has not been abandoned at an earlier port, is the port of the agreed destination under that contract.

(4) If the property of any party to the contract of affreightment, who is called upon to contribute in general average to another party or parties, has no value at the port of adjustment, either by its arrival in a worthless condition, or by its not arriving at all, that party cannot be made to contribute.

I should arrive at the same result in the present case upon another and narrower ground. The shipowner's right to treat this sum of 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* as general average expenditure arises solely as matter of contract, by the incorporation in the bills of lading of the York-Antwerp Rules 1890. In construing the contract so made I think Nos. 10 and 11 of the rules must be read in conjunction with No. 17, and that so construed the result is as suggested above.

I award that the claimant is not entitled to recover the sum of 436*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* or any sum from the respondents. I direct that the claimant shall pay the costs of this my award, and if the respondents shall in the first place pay such costs the claimant shall repay them. And I direct that the claimant shall pay to the respondents their costs of the reference to the taxed if not agreed.

If the court shall be of opinion that the claimant is entitled to claim contribution in general average from the respondents to the said sum of 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, and is entitled to have such contribution assessed upon the values of ship, freight and cargo as they would have been at the port of destination if the voyage from Horta had been safely accomplished, then I award that the claimant shall recover from the respondents the sum of 436*l.* 2*s* 2*d.* I direct in that case, that the respondents shall pay the costs of this my award, and if the claimant shall have paid such costs they shall repay them to him. And I direct that the respondents shall pay to the claimant his costs of the reference to be taxed if not agreed. If the court shall be of opinion that the claimant is entitled to claim contribution in general average from the respondents to the said 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* and is entitled to have such contribution assessed upon the values of ship, freight, and cargo, as they existed at Horta, then I award that the claimant is entitled to recover from the respondents such proportion of 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* as the value of the respondents' cargo at Horta bore to the combined values at Horta of the ship, the freight at risk and the said cargo.

The York-Antwerp Rules 1890 provide:

Rule 10. Expenses at Port of Refuge, &c.—(a) When a ship shall have entered a port or place of refuge, or shall have returned to her port or place of loading, in consequence of accident, sacrifice, or other extraordinary circumstances, which render that necessary for the common safety, the expenses of entering such port or place shall be admitted as general average; and when she shall have sailed thence with her original cargo, or a part of it, the corresponding expenses of leaving such port or place, consequent upon such entry or return, shall likewise be admitted as general average. (b) The cost of discharging cargo from a ship, whether at a port or place of loading, call, or refuge, shall be admitted as general average, when the discharge was necessary for the common safety or to enable damage to the ship, caused by sacrifice or accident during the voyage, to be repaired, if the repairs were necessary for the safe prosecution of the voyage. (c) Whenever the cost of discharging cargo from a ship is admissible as general average, the cost of reloading and storing such cargo on board the said ship, together with all storage charges on such cargo, shall likewise be so admitted. But when the ship is condemned or does not proceed on her original voyage, no storage expenses incurred after the date of the ship's condemnation or of the abandonment of the voyage shall be admitted as general average. (d) If the ship under average be at a port or place at which it is practicable to repair her, so as to enable her to carry on the whole cargo, and if, in order to save expenses, either she is towed thence to some other port or place of repair or to her destination, or the cargo or a portion of it is transhipped by (sic) another ship, or otherwise forwarded then the extra cost of such towage, transhipment, and forwarding, or any of them (up to the amount of the extra expense saved) shall be payable by the several parties to the adventure in proportion to the extraordinary expense saved.

Rule 11. Wages and maintenance of crew in port of refuge.—When a ship shall have entered or been detained in any port or place under the circumstances, or for the purposes of the repairs, mentioned in rule 10, the wages payable to the master, officers, and crew, together with the cost of maintenance of the same, during the extra period of detention in such port or place until the ship shall or should have been made ready to proceed upon her voyage, shall be admitted as general average. . . .

Rule 16. Amount to be made good for cargo lost or damaged by sacrifice.—The amount to be made good as general average for damage or loss of goods sacrificed shall be the loss which the owner of the goods has sustained thereby, based on the market values at the date of the arrival of the vessel or at the termination of the adventure.

Rule 17. Contributory values.—The contribution to a general average shall be made upon the actual values of the property at the termination of the adventure, to which shall be added the amount made good as general average for property sacrificed; deduction being made from the shipowner's freight and passage money at risk, of such port charges and crew's wages as would not have been incurred had the ship and cargo been totally lost at the date of the general average act, or sacrifice, and have not been allowed as general average; deduction being also made from the value of the property of all charges incurred in respect thereof subsequently to the general average act, except such charges as are allowed in general average. . . .

Jowitt for the claimant.—The point involved in the case is a new one. The question is whether the shipowner should be saddled with all the expenses incurred at a port of refuge in the event of the ship and cargo becoming ultimately a total loss. This involves the question as to where the value of the cargo should be taken for the purpose of general average contribution, before arrival at the port of destination. The charter-party in the present case is subject to the York-Antwerp Rules and reference may be made particularly to rules 10, 11, 16, 17, and 18. There is a distinction between a general average sacrifice and a general average expenditure. (See Carver, Carriage by Sea, 4th edit. (1895) pars. 428-30). If the passage referred to is sound in law, it is impossible to fix an accrued liability at the port of destination. The termination of the adventure does not mean the port of discharge. Reference may be made to Lowndes' General Average, 5th edit., sect. 61. In a passage later on he gives a definition of the phrase "termination of adventure." Primâ facie the rate of contribution is to be taken at the port of refuge. If anything in the nature of a loss occurs between the port of refuge and the port of destination an equitable adjustment should follow. One portion of the cargo might be affected and others not. The following authorities may also be usefully referred to:

Phillips' Law of Insurance, 5th edit., pars. 1317-1319, 1373-4;
MacArthur on Marine Insurance, 2nd edit., pp. 204-6;
Arnould on Marine Insurance, 9th edit., p. 1212.

The arbitrator in the present case has said that because the cargo is a total loss there is no contribution; the claimant contends that the ship, freight and cargo each contribute one third of the loss. It is difficult to see why the shipowner who has expended money on behalf of other parties should not be entitled to recover a proportion of his expenditure. I refer the court to the cases of:

Fletcher v. Alexander, sup.;
Anderson v. Ocean Steamship Company, sup.

The shipowner is entitled to contribution and the decision of the arbitrator cannot be upheld.

Le Quesne for the owners of cargo.—The narrow ground on which the shipowner can formulate his claim is on the construction of the York-Antwerp Rules. But the termination of the adventure is not equal to abandonment. The two things are quite distinct. In the present case there was no property and no value at the termination of the adventure. The cargo never did arrive at its destination. On the broader ground, however much text writers have differed, one principle has always been recognised—namely, that where there has been no benefit no need for contribution exists. And no benefit accrues until all the risks of the adventure are at an end. It is the general practice of adjusters to fix contributions by the value at the port of arrival. The cases referred to by counsel for the claimant show that the same principle is to be applied whether a claim arises from sacrifice or expenditure. Phillips and Arnould take the view that there may be contribution without benefit in the case of expenditure, but not in the case of sacrifice; but there is no real ground for saying that there can be contribution without benefit.

Jowitt in reply.—Sacrifice and expenditure must be kept distinct. In expenditure the shipowner has incurred a debt, but the cargo owner has not. The distinction is well shown in Benecke on Marine Insurance, at p. 298.

March 23, 1921.—The following judgment was read by

Sankey, J.—This is a special case stated by a legal arbitrator to raise the following question of law. If subsequently to the incurring by a ship owner of general average expenditure the ship and all her cargo are totally lost while completing the agreed voyage, can the shipowner claim any contribution in general average from the owners of the cargo so lost? The facts are as follows: In Jan. 1919 the Penlee loaded a cargo of sugar at two ports in Cuba. Various bills of lading for this cargo were issued. By such bills of lading the cargo was to be carried to Queenstown for orders and to be delivered at the port of destination to the Royal Commission on Sugar Supply. Each bill of lading contained the provision "general average payable according to York-Antwerp Rules." The respondents were at all material times the owners of the cargo and holders of the bills of lading. The Penlee left Cuba with a cargo on the 29th Jan. 1919. She encountered a hurricane on the 10th Feb., and received damage to her hull and engines. In consequence of the damage her master prudently determined to put into Horta, in the Azores, as a port of refuge, where she arrived on the 22nd Feb. At Horta certain repairs were done and she left Horta upon their completion on the 15th March. At Horta certain expenses, of the nature of port of refuge expenses, were incurred by the claimant amounting in all to 717*l.* 16*s.* 3d. As the damage to the ship which caused resort to Horta was of the nature of particular average, and did not arise from any general average sacrifice, the claimant would not have been entitled to assert that he had a right at common law to a contribution in general average towards any of the above expenses in view of the decision in Svendsen v. Wallace (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 453; 52 L. T. Rep. 901; 10 App. Cas. 404). But under Nos. 10 and 11 of the York-Antwerp Rules 1890 the claimant was primâ facie entitled to say that all the above expenses, amounting to 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.*, ought to be treated as a general average expenditure. The said expenses were incurred for wages and maintenance of the officers and crew at Horta, and post charges, and did not include any outlay for discharging or reloading cargo, or otherwise directly incurred in relation to the cargo or its preservation.

The Penlee left Horta on the 15th March for Queenstown, and signs of fire on board were discovered on the 18th March. This fire apparently broke out in the cargo in No. 2 hold, but there was no evidence before the arbitrator as to its cause. The fire increased so rapidly and seriously that on the 20th March her master and crew were compelled to abandon the vessel and take refuge on another ship. The Penlee and her whole cargo thus abandoned were totally lost at sea.

The claimant subsequently procured an average adjustment to be prepared by Messrs. Manley, Hopkins, Sons, and Cookes, in which the above sum of 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* was treated as general average expenditure. This was apportioned over the steamer valued at 89,250*l.*, the cargo valued at 140,000*l.*, and the shipowner's freight at risk valued at 1,184*l.* The value of 89,250*l.* for the steamer was the estimated value, which she would have had on arrival in the United Kingdom, and the value of 140,000*l.* for the cargo was the estimated value that the cargo would have had if it had arrived at the port of delivery in good condition. On the above apportionment the cargo's proportion of the 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* was 436*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* The claimant required the respondents to pay this sum of 436*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, but the respondents refused, and this was the dispute referred to the arbitrator.

The question which falls for determination is not easy to decide. There is apparently no judicial authority on the matter, but it is one which has been considerably discussed by distinguished jurists who have written on the subject, namely, Arnould on Marine Insurance, Carver on Carriage by Sea, Lowndes on General Average, McArthur on Marine Insurance, and Phillips on Insurance. These authors differ from one another without always assigning the most satisfactory reasons for their conclusions. With regard to a general average sacrifice, the law would appear to be settled. Bovill, C.J., in Fletcher v. Alexander (sup.) says, at p. 382: "If, however, after the jettison or the matter which is the subject of average has arisen, the remainder of the goods are entirely lost, and so no benefit accrues to the owners of the other goods from the jettison, no contribution can be claimed. The whole law on the subject is founded on the principle that the loss to the individual whose goods are sacrificed for the benefit of the rest is to be compensated according to the loss sustained on the one hand, and the benefit derived on the other." Lowndes, at p. 302 of the 5th edit., says: "On this point all the authorities and the practice are agreed. The question as to which there is room for a difference of opinion is whether the rule thus laid down for jettison is to be applied to the case of expenditures."

Both Phillips, 5th edit., ss. 1317 and 1319, and Amould, 9th edit., s. 976, distinguish between sacrifice and expenditure, the latter saying: "As regards sacrifices, then the law is clear, but in the case of expenditures attention must be paid to some different considerations." He sets them out and concludes the section by saying: "Hence the long-established rule used to be that disbursements for the general benefit must be fully reimbursed in general average whether the ship and cargo be eventually saved or not." But at sect. 977 he states: "Notwithstanding these considerations, however, the general practice of adjusters is, as we have already observed, not to give practical effect to this distinction, but to allow contribution, and to assess the contributory values, in all cases with respect to the state of facts as existing at the port where the adventure is terminated. Whether the claim for contribution arises out of sacrifices or expenditures. In neither case, therefore, does any property contribute which does not ultimately arrive, and such property, moreover, only contributes on its arrived value." On the other side there is the authority of Carver, 4th edit., who states in sect. 428: "Hence, it has been repeatedly laid down by writers of authority both in England and the United States that the rule as to contribution to an expenditure is different from that as to a sacrifice. It is said that all the parties interested in the adventure become, there and then, as soon as the advance is made, liable to pay their shares, and that those shares should be in proportion to the values of the property at the time of the expenditure without regard to subsequent losses or deterioration. There has not however, been any decision on the point, and adjusters in practice do not recognise the supposed distinction. They take the state of things at the termination of the adventure as the bases for contribution both with regard to sacrifices and expenditures." Then he says: "It is therefore established in the case of a sacrifice that the contribution shall be in proportion to the benefits ultimately derived. The reasons for this equally apply (with the one reservation) in the case of an expenditure. The rule of law should therefore if possible be the same in both cases." McArthur, 2nd edit., p. 205, footnote (a) says: "There appears no sufficient reason for altering the rule that with the exceptions above mentioned contribution to expenses should be made upon the same basis as to sacrifice, namely, upon the net value of the property at the temination of the venture, that is to say, assuming that the amount of the general average is within the net value of the property."

To sum up the matter, Phillips and Arnould appear to distinguish between sacrifice and expenditure. Carver and McArthur appear to treat them on the same footing subject to certain exceptions, one of which is stated by Carver in the above-mentioned section to be that: "If after general average disbursements have been made a total loss of ship and cargo occurs, it seems clear that the disbursements should not be borne by the shipowner entirely; or if the value of what is ultimately saved of the adventure is less than the expenditure it is equally clear that the excess of expenditure should not fall wholly either on the shipowner or on the owners of what has been saved."

Lowndes, 5th edit., at p. 302, sets out the argument on both sides with a leaning to the view held by Arnould. Those who are in favour of distinguishing between sacrifice and expenditure contend that an expenditure of a nature, as in the present case, incurred in the middle of a voyage constitutes a debt which at the moment it is incurred is due rateably from each contributor. Their opponents argue (1) that the state of facts at the termination of the adventure is to be regarded, (2) that the claim to contribution in general average must be assessed upon the value of the property of all parties to the contract of affreightment at the port of adjustment, (3) that if the voyage has not been abandoned at an earlier port, the port of adjustment is the port of the agreed destination under the contract.

In my opinion, the arguments in favour of taking the state of facts at the termination of the venture are more weighty, especially because: (1) The value of the property when it reaches the hands of its owners can be ascertained with precision, (2) there ought to be only one adjustment of the nature of general average. Endless confusion would result from a multiplicity of adjustments made on a multiplicity of different considerations, (3) the whole law depends, as was said in Fletcher v. Alexander (sup.), on the loss to the one and the benefit—that is, in my view, the ultimate benefit—to the other (see Lowndes, p. 303). It is true that Carver, as above pointed out, suggests one reservation to the principle that contribution in the case of expenditure should be the same as in the case of a sacrifice, namely, in proportion to the benefits ultimately derived, but he appears to me to give no good or logical reason for this reservation.

It was urged that in the Mary Thomas case (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108) the Court of Appeal affirming, Gorell Barnes, J., as he then was, suggested a distinction between a sacrifice and an expenditure but that case was not a direct decision on the law of general average, but upon the rights of a shipowner under an insurance policy when different considerations may apply. Neither do I think that the case of expenditure by a ship's master in reward or salvage operations is a true analogy or a safe guide, because if a shipowner pays a cargo's proportion of salvage he must reclaim it from the cargo owners, not as a contribution to a liability he has incurred, but as indemnity for a payment he has made on behalf of and as agent for the person directly liable.

I agree with the conclusions stated by the learned arbitrator in par. 18, which are as follow: (1) On the question of principle the law demands the loss of the one and the ultimate benefit of the other, and (2) on the question of practice, certainly and convenience, instead of confusion are to be obtained by one adjustment at the port of destination. Apply that question of principle and that question of practice to the present circumstances; I am of opinion that as no cargo arrived at the port of destination the shipowners are not entitled to claim contributions from the cargo owners. The result is that the award of the learned arbitrator will be upheld.

Award upheld.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 15, 1921.—The following judgments were read:

Bankes, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Sankey, J. upon a special case stated by an arbitrator. The case was stated to raise a point of law which is formulated by the arbitrator in par. 7 of the special case in these terms: "If subsequently to the incurring by a shipowner of general average expenditure the ship and all her cargo are totally lost while completing the agreed voyage, can the shipowner claim any contribution in general average from the owners of the cargo so lost?"

The cargo in this case was being carried under bills of lading which contained the clause "General average payable according to York-Antwerp rules." The learned arbitrator in the special case discusses at length all the authorities on the point, upon which no judicial decision has ever been given, in order to discover what the proper answer to the question of law would be were the matter governed by the common law. He then goes on to say in par. 19 of the special case as follows: "The shipowner's right to treat this sum of 717*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* as general average expenditure arises solely as matter of contract by the incorporation in the bills of lading of the York-Antwerp rules 1890. In construing the contract so made I think Nos. 10 and 11 of the rules must be read in conjunction with No. 17 and that so construed the result is the same as I have suggested in par. 18."

For the reasons given by Scrutton, L.J. I agree with the view taken by the arbitrator that the present case falls within rule 17. I express no opinion upon what the common law rule should be. The appeal must be dismissed with costs here and below, the court expressing its opinion that the award of the arbitrator as stated in par. 20 of the special case is correct.

I may say that Atkin, L.J. agrees with the judgment I have just read.

Scrutton, L.J.—This appeal was stated to raise a very controversial question in the law of general average, namely, whether there is any difference between the principles of adjustment in cases of general average sacrifice and general average expenditure where after the sacrifice or expenditure the ship and goods are lost by other perils before arrival at the port of destination. And, if the facts raised this point, they would raise a question of considerable difficulty. There is an absence of case law on the subject, an embarrassing abundance of contradictory opinions of text writers, and a varying practice of average adjusters. But in my view the facts do not raise this question. The parties to the contract of affreightment agreed that their contract should be governed by York-Antwerp rules. These rules, the result of two conferences of leading representatives of underwriters, shipowners, and average adjusters, were intended to avoid by agreement difficult questions on which lawyers and experts disagreed. For instance, the English law on port of refuge expenses, as appears from the cases of Atwood v. Sellar (42 L. T. Rep. 644; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 283; 5 Q. B. Div. 286), and Svendsen v. Wallace (52 L. T. Rep. 901; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 453; 10 App. Cas. 404), was far from clear. The York-Antwerp rules solved the difficulty by making rules not in accordance with the existing decisions under which all the port of refuge expenses in the present case are treated as general average.

The first question therefore is to see whether the York-Antwerp rules provide an agreed answer to the present problem. Rule 17 provides that "The contribution to a general average shall be made upon the actual values of the property at the termination of the adventure." When the adventure arrives at its intended port of destination it is agreed therefore that the contributing values are to be those at that port and not at the port where the expenditure was incurred, thus avoiding the question most in dispute as to expenditure, whether the values should not be taken as at the port where the expenditure was incurred. What happens when ship and cargo are lost and never reach the intended end of the adventure? Though the adventure terminates prematurely it seems clear to me that it terminates, and the actual values are then nothing and no contribution can be levied on them. If part of the interests get to the intended end of the adventure as if cargo be trans-shipped and freight earned, there are contributing values available. But having regard to the conflicting language of text writers and conflicting practice of average adjusters, it appears to me that rule 17 was intended to avoid the decision of the difficulties by agreeing a rule. And in my view that rule decides that in this case there was no contribution to the shipowner's general average expenditure, because at the termination of the adventure there were no contributing values. If this is the true view of the case there is no need to discuss what would be the law if the parties had not agreed on York-Antwerp rules, and I notice that the learned arbitrator is of opinion that the York-Antwerp rules decide the question adversely to the claim, though he was unable to resist the temptation of deciding what would be the law if the rules did not exclude the claim.

I reserve to myself full liberty to consider the question of common law in the absence of agree ment when it arises, as in my view there is a great deal to be said in principle for the view of Mr. Phillips and Sir Joseph Arnould supported by the analogies of liabilities for salvage both maritime and by agreement, and by the view of Gorell Barnes, J. in The Mary Thomas (71 L. T. Rep. 104; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 495; (1894) P. 108), as to the rights of the person making general average expenditure against his underwriters. It may be that practical difficulties giving rise to a practice of average adjusters may overcome the advantages in principle of this view, but I prefer to postpone the decision of this difficult question till it arises. In the present case in my opinion it does not, as the parties have avoided the difficulties by an agreed rule of adjustment and contribution. The person incurring the expenditure under the agreed rule runs a risk of loss which he can cover by insurance of his interest in the arrival of the interests on which he has a lien for contribution to his expenditure.

For these reasons in the result the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

POLEMIS v. FURNESS, WITHY, AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Exceptions — "Fire . . . always mutually excepted" — Fire caused by negligence of charterers' servants—Damages which could not reasonably have been anticipated—Liability of charterers—Negligence — Remoteness — "Natural and probable cause."

In a time charter-party "fire" was "always mutually excepted." Fire broke out in the ship, which was totally destroyed. Arbitrators found that the fire arose from a spark igniting petrol vapour in the hold; that the spark was caused by a board, knocked into the hold by the charterers' servants, coming into contact with some substance in the hold; and that the causing of the spark could not reasonably have been anticipated, though some damage to the ship might reasonably have been anticipated. The charterers contended: (1) That the exception of "fire," in the charter-party protected them from liability; and (2) that the damages were too remote, as it could not reasonably have been anticipated that the falling of the board would have caused a spark:

Held (1), that the exception of "fire" did not relieve the charterers from loss by fire caused by the negligence of their servants as there was no express term to that effect in the exceptions clause; and (2) that, the fall of the board being due to the negligence of the charterers' servants, the charterers were liable for all the direct consequences of the negligence, notwithstanding that the consequences could not reasonably have been anticipated.

The question whether the damage that ensues can reasonably be anticipated is material only on the question whether an act is negligent or not.

Dictum, of Pollock, C.B, in Greenland v. Chaplin (1850, 5 Ex. 248) disapproved.

(a) Reported by W. C. SANDFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEAL by the charterers from the judgment of Sankey, J. on an award in the form of a special case.

The owners of the Greek steamship Thrasyvoulos claimed to recover damages from the charterers for the total loss of the ship by fire.

By a charter-party of Feb. 1917, Messrs. Polemis and Boyazides, the owners, chartered the ship to Furness, Withy and Co. Limited, for the period of the duration of the war and at charterers' option up to six months afterwards from the day she was placed at the charterers' disposal ready to load in the port of Cardiff. By clause 3, the owners were to provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew, to pay for insurance of the vessel, war risks excepted, and also for all the engine room stores, and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery for ordinary cargo service. By clause 4 the charterers were to provide and pay for all the coals, fuel, port charges, pilotages, agencies, commissions, and all other charges whatsoever, except those before stated. By clause 5, the charterers were to pay for the use and hire of the vessel at the rate of 9572*l.* 16*s.* per calendar month commencing on the day of delivery as above with a clean and clear hold, "hire to continue from the time specified for commencing the charter until the hour of her redelivery to owners (unless lost) at a port in the United Kingdom or continent in same good order and condition as when delivered to them fair wear and tear excepted." By clause 21: "The act of God, the King's enemies, loss or damage from fire on board in hulk or craft, or on shore, arrest and (or) restraint of princes, rulers, and people, collision, any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of pilot, master, or crew in the management or navigation of the ship, and all and every of the dangers and accidents of the seas, canals, and rivers, and of navigation of whatever nature or kind always mutually excepted."

The facts appear from the headnote and judgments.

The owners contended that the charterers were liable for the loss of the ship; that fire caused by negligence was not an excepted peril; and that the ship was in fact lost by the negligence of the stevedores, who were the charterers' servants, in letting a sling strike the board, knocking it into the hold, and thereby causing a spark which set fire to the petrol vapour and destroyed the ship.

The charterers contended that fire, however caused, was an excepted peril; that there was no negligence for which the charterers were responsible, inasmuch as to let a board fall into the hold of the ship could do no harm to the ship and therefore was not negligence towards the owners; and that the danger and (or) damage were too remote—i.e., no reasonable man would have foreseen danger and (or) damage of this kind resulting from the fall of the board.

The arbitrators made the following findings of fact:—

(a) That the ship was lost by fire. (b) That the fire arose from a spark igniting petrol vapour in the hold. (c) That the spark was caused by the falling board coming into contact with some substance in the hold. (d) That the fall of the board was caused by the negligence of the Arabs (other than the winchman) engaged in the work of discharging. (e) That the said Arabs were employed by the charterers or their agents the Cie Transatlantique on behalf of the charterers, and that the said Arabs were the servants of the charterers. (f) That the causing of the spark could not reasonably have been anticipated from the falling of the board, though some damage to the ship might reasonably have been anticipated. (g) There was no evidence before us that the Arabs chosen were known or likely to be negligent. (h) That the damages sustained by the owners through the said accident amount to the sum of 196,165*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* as shown in the second column of the schedule hereto.

Sankey, J. affirmed the award. The charterers appealed.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and S. L. Porter, for the charterers.—The damage caused could not reasonably have been anticipated, and, being therefore too remote, cannot be recovered. In Greenland v. Chaplin (5 Ex. 248) Pollock, C.B. said, following a recent dictum of his own in Rigby v. Hewitt (1850, 5 Ex. 240): "I entertain considerable doubt whether a person who is guilty of negligence is responsible for all the consequences which may under any circumstances arise, and in respect of mischief which could by no possibility have been foreseen, and which no reasonable person would have anticipated. Whenever the case shall arise, I shall certainly desire to hear it argued, and to consider whether the rule of law be not this: that a person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences, but that he is not, by the law of England, expected to anticipate and guard against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur." Salmond on Torts, (2nd edit., p. 106), says: "Damage is too remote if it is neither the intended nor the natural and probable result of the wrongful act. Every man is responsible for damage which he intended to result and which did result from his wrongful act, however improbable it may have been. Every man is also liable for the natural and probable results of his wrongful act, even though not intended by him. But no man is liable for consequences neither intended nor probable." In Pollock on Torts (11th edit., pp. 39, 40), the dictum of Pollock, C.B. is cited, and it is said (referring to Beven, Negligence in Law, i., 106): "It is suggested that this rule applies only 'in determining what is negligence,' and 'not in limiting the consequences flowing from it when once established'; and this position is worked out in an ingenious and elaborate argument." In Cory v. France, Fenwick, and Co. (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 499; 103 L. T. Rep. 649; (1911) 1 K. B. 121) Vaughan Williams, L.J. said: "In my judgment he (the plaintiff) has always to prove that the negligence of which the defendant is proved to have been guilty was a proximate cause of the injury which is complained of in the action. In considering what is a proximate cause, you may often have to ask the question which was asked in the cases of Rigby v. Hewitt (sup.) and Greenland v. Chaplin (sup.), namely, was the negligence which was proved against the defendant of such a character that the consequences which followed might reasonably be expected to result under ordinary circumstances from such misconduct?" In Dunham v. Clare (86 L. T. Rep. 751; (1902) 2 K. B. 296), Collins, M.R. said that "the liability is measured by what are the reasonable and probable consequences of his breach of duty." See also Re London, Tilbury and Southend Railway Company (62 L. T. Rep. 306; 24 Q. B. Div. 329), per Lord Esher, M.R.; and Sharp v. Powell (26 L. T. Rep. 436; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 253). The dicta of Channell, B. and Blackburn, J. in Smith v. London and South-Western, Railway Company (23 L. T. Rep. 680; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 14) are applicable only to the particular facts of that case. [They referred also to Clark v. Chambers (38 L. T. Rep. 454; 3 Q. B. Div. 327) and Scott v. Shepherd (1773, 3 Wils. 403; 2 W.B. 892; 1 Sm. L. C., 12th edit., 513); and Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (123 L. T. Rep. 599; (1920) A. C. 983.)] Secondly, the charterers are exempted from liability by the exception of "fire" in clause 21, even if the fire was caused by negligence. The general rule that applies to shipowners, that they are liable for negligence unless protected by clear words, does not apply to charterers. They referred to:

Steinman v. Angier Line, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; 64 L. T. Rep. 613; (1891) 1 Q. B. 691;

Baxter's Leather Company v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 93; 99 L. T. Rep. 286; (1908) 2 K. B. 626; Chartered Bank v. British India Steam Navigation Company, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 245; 100 L. T. Rep. 661; (1909) A. C. 369.

MacKinnon, K.C., and Dumas for the shipowners.—All the damage that flows directly from an act of negligence is recoverable, even though the consequences could not have been reasonably anticipated (Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company, sup., per Channell, B. and Blackburn, J.; Weld-Blundell v. Stephens, 123 L. T. Rep. 599; (1920) A. C. 983, per Lord Sumner). As regards the dictum of Pollock, C.B. in Greenland v. Chaplin (sup.) it is doubtful whether he is correctly reported in the Exchequer Reports. In the Law Journal (19 L. J. 292 Ex.), the important words "who is guilty of negligence" are omitted. Secondly, as regards liability for negligence, the same rule applies to charterers as to shipowners and they are not relieved from the consequences of negligence unless the exception clause contains express words to that effect.

S. L. Porter, in reply.

July 15.—The following judgments were read:

Bankes, L.J.—By a time charter-party, dated the 21st Feb. 1917, the respondents chartered their vessel to the appellants. Clause 21 of the charter-party was in these terms. [The Lord Justice read it.] The vessel was employed by the charterers to carry a cargo to Casablanca in Morocco. The cargo included a quantity of benzine or petrol in cases. While discharging at Casablanca a heavy plank fell into the hold in which the petrol was stowed, and caused an explosion, which set fire to the vessel and completely destroyed her. The owners claimed the value of the vessel from the charterers, alleging that the loss of the vessel was due to the negligence of the charterers' servants. The charterers contended that they were protected by the exception of fire contained in clause 21 of the charter-party, and they also contended that the damages claimed were too remote. The claim was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators stated a special case for the opinion of the court. Their findings of fact are as follows. [The Lord Justice read clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), set out above.] Then they state the damages, 196,165*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*

These findings are no doubt intended to raise the question whether the view taken, or said to have been taken, by Pollock, C.B. in Rigby v. Hewitt (5 Ex. 243) and Greenland v. Chaplin (5 Ex. 248), or the view taken by Channell, B. and Blackburn, J. in Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company (23 L. T. Rep. 680; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 21), is the correct one. The doubt which I have indicated in reference to what Pollock, C.B. really said is due to the fact that, as reported in the Law Journal (19 L. J. 295, Ex.), the Chief Baron does not use the words on which reliance is placed and which were quoted with approval by Vaughan Williams, L.J. in Cory v. France, Fenwick, and Co. (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 499; 103 L. T. Rep. 649; (1911) 1 K. B. 122). Assuming the Chief Baron to have been correctly reported in the Exchequer Reports, the difference between the two views is this: According to the one view, the consequences which may reasonably be expected to result from a particular act are material only in reference to the question whether the act is or is not a negligent act; according to the other view, those consequences are the test whether the damages resulting from the act, assuming it to be negligent, are or are not too remote to be recoverable. Sir F. Pollock in his Law of Torts (11th edit., pp. 39, 40), refers to this difference of view, and calls attention to the fact that the late Mr. Beven, in his book on Negligence, supports the view founded on Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company (sup.). In two recent judgments dealing with the question, the view taken by the court in Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company (sup.) has been adopted—namely, by the late President (Sir Samuel Evans) in H.M.S. London (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 109 L. T. Rep. 960; (1914) P. 76), and by Lord Sumner in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (123 L. T. Rep. 599; (1920) A. C. 983). In the former case the President said: "The court is not concerned in the present case with any inquiry as to the chain of causes resulting in the creation of a legal liability from which such damages as the law allows would flow. The tortious act—i.e., the negligence of the defendants, which imposes upon them a liability in law for damages—is admitted. This gets rid at once of an element which requires consideration in a chain of causation in testing the question of legal liability—namely, the foresight or anticipation of the reasonable man. In Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company (sup.) Channell, B. said: 'Where there is no direct evidence of negligence, the question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in considering the question whether there is evidence for the jury of negligence or not . . . but when it has been once determined that there is evidence of negligence, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not.' And Blackburn, J. in the same case said: 'What the defendants might reasonably anticipate is only material with reference to the question, whether the defendants were negligent or not, and cannot alter their liability if they were guilty of negligence,'" and after referring to the various phrases used in connection with remoteness of damages he said: "But it must be remembered, to use the words of a well-known American author (Sedgwick), that 'the legal distinction between what is proximate and what is remote is not a logical one, nor does it depend upon relations of time and space; it is purely practical, the reason for distinguishing between the proximate and remote causes and consequences being a purely practical one'; and again, to use the words of an eminent English jurist (Sir F. Pollock, 11th edit., pp. 35, 36), 'In whatever form we state the rule of "natural and probable consequences," we must remember that it is not a logical definition, but only a guide to the exercise of common sense. The lawyer cannot afford to adventure himself with philosophers in the logical and metaphysical controversies that beset the idea of cause.'" In the latter case Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (sup.)—Lord Sumner said: "What are 'natural, probable and necessary' consequences? Everything that happens happens in the order of nature and is therefore 'natural.' Nothing that happens by the free choice of a thinking man is 'necessary,' except in the sense of predestination. To speak of 'probable' consequence is to throw everything upon the jury. It is tautologous to speak of 'effective' cause, or to say that damages too remote from the cause are irrecoverable, for an effective cause is simply that which causes, and in law what is ineffective or too remote is not a cause at all. I still venture to think that direct cause is the best expression. Proximate cause has acquired a special connotation through its use in reference to contracts of insurance. Direct cause excludes what is indirect, conveys the essential distinction, which causa causans and causa sine qua non rather cumbrously indicate, and is consistent with the possibility of the concurrence of more direct causes than one, operating at the same time and leading to a common result as in Burrows v. March Gas and Coke Company (26 L. T. Rep. 318; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 96) and Hill v. New River Company (18 L. T. Rep. 355; 9 B. & S. 303). As, however, these different epithets and formulæ are used almost indiscriminately, something more must be done than to choose an epithet which has been used in a decided case. It is necessary to consider whether the facts of the case cited raise a question of causation belonging to the same category as that under discussion. The crux of the present question is the intervention of Mr. Hurst between the respondent and Messrs. Comins and Lowe. Further, no want of care has to be proved here against the respondent, for he accepts the decision that he broke his contract by his partner's omission to be careful, though not by any deliberate, intentional, or wanton breach. This at once makes it possible to lay aside large classes of authorities. What a defendant ought to have anticipated as a reasonable man is material when the question is whether or not he was guilty of negligence, that is, of want of due care according to the circumstances. This, however, goes to culpability, not to compensation: Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks (1856, 11 Ex. 781); Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company (sup.), per Blackburn, J. Again, what ordinarily happens, or may reasonably be expected to happen, is material where a mere series of physical phenomena has to be investigated and the remoteness of the damage or the reverse is to be decided accordingly. Such a case is Sharp v. Powell (26 L. T. Rep. 436; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 253), unless indeed it be regarded as a decision on negligence or no negligence. At any rate it is not this case.

In the present case the arbitrators have found as a fact that the falling of the plank was due to the negligence of the defendants' servants. The fire appears to me to have been directly caused by the falling of the plank. Under these circumstances I consider that it is immaterial that the causing of the spark by the falling of the plank could not have been reasonably anticipated. The appellants' junior counsel sought to draw a distinction between the anticipation of the extent of damage resulting from a negligent act, and the anticipation of the type of damage resulting from such an act. He admitted that it could not lie in the mouth of a person whose negligent act had caused damage to say that he could not reasonably have foreseen the extent of the damage, but he contended that the negligent person was entitled to rely upon the fact that he could not reasonably have anticipated the type of damage which resulted from his negligent act. I do not think that the distinction can be admitted. Given the breach of duty which constitutes the negligence, and given the damage as a direct result of that negligence, the anticipations of the person whose negligent act has produced the damage appear to me to be irrelevant. I consider that the damages claimed are not too remote.

The other point relied upon by the appellants was that the damage having been caused by fire they were protected by clause 21 of the charter-party. To this it was replied that the clause had no application in the case of a fire caused by the negligence of the charterers' servants. I see no reason why a different rule of construction of this exception contained in the charter-party should be adopted in the case of the charterer than would undoubtedly be adopted in the case of the shipowner. In the case of the latter clear words would be required excluding negligence. No such words are found in this clause. Neither shipowner nor charterer can, in my opinion, under this clause claim to be protected against the consequences of his own negligence.

For these reasons I think that the appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—A ship owned by the respondents was destroyed by fire while under a time charter to the appellants. The respondents claimed as damages the value of the ship and some incidental expenses. The appellants disputed the claim and the matter was referred to arbitrators, who made their award in the form of a special case in favour of the respondents, the owners, subject, of course, to the opinion of the court.

The only question for the court is whether on the findings of the arbitrators as to facts they were justified in law in making an award in favour of the respondents. Sankey, J. has held that they were so justified. The charterers appealed.

The accident happened in the port of Casablanca, in Morocco, to which the ship had been directed by the charterers with a cargo which included cases of benzine and/or petrol stored in No. 1 hold. These cases had leaked on the voyage and there was a considerable quantity of petrol vapour in the hold. Arab stevedores employed by the charterers were engaged in shifting certain cargo in the hold, and for the purpose of their work had placed some heavy planks across the forward end of the hatchway. In the course of the work one of the planks came in contact with the sling or the rope by which the sling was worked, was thereby dislodged, and fell into the hold. The fall was instantly followed by a rush of flames, and the result was the total destruction of the ship. The findings of fact have already been read by Bankes, L.J. and I need not read them again.

The charterers contend, first, that they are relieved from liability by the exception clause in the charter-party; and, secondly, that damages for the loss of the ship cannot be recovered, inasmuch as the causing of the spark was something that could not reasonably have been anticipated, and therefore the destruction of the ship was not the natural or probable consequence of the negligent act, and the damage was too remote.

As to the first point, the exception clause is in the following terms. [The Lord Justice read it.] There is, therefore, no express exception of loss by fire caused by negligence. The present claim is based on negligence. It appears to be well settled that in such a contract as the present the exceptions would not be construed so as to excuse the shipowner for loss of the nature described if caused by the negligence of himself or his servants, unless expressly so framed; Carver on Carriage by Sea (sects. 14, 22); and as to bills of lading per Bowen, L.J. in Steinman v. Angier Line (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 46; 64 L. T. Rep. 612; (1891) 1 Q. B. 691), and in my opinion the same construction must be given to the clause when it is the liability of the charterers which is in question. This defence therefore fails.

As to the second point, it is contended that "a person guilty of negligence is not responsible in respect of mischief which could by no possibility have been foreseen and which no reasonable person would have anticipated" (5 Ex. 248). We are asked, in effect, to say that the doubt on this point expressed by Pollock, C.B. in Greenland v. Chaplin (5 Ex. at p. 248) is well founded and that his tentative view set forth in that case and in Rigby v. Hewitt (5 Ex. at p. 243) ought to prevail. There is some doubt whether the words of the Chief Baron in Greenland v. Chaplin (sup.) are correctly reported in the Exchequer Reports, for in the report in the Law Journal (19 L. J. 295 Ex.) the words "guilty of negligence" are omitted, so that in the Law Journal report the passage reads: "I entertain considerable doubt whether a man is responsible in respect of mischief," and so on, leaving out the words "guilty of negligence." However this may be, the law on this point is, in my opinion, correctly stated in Beven on Negligence, 3rd edit., vol. i., p. 85. I need not read the passage.

The result may be summarised as follows: The presence or absence of reasonable anticipation of damage determines the legal quality of the act as negligent or innocent. If it be thus determined to be negligent, then the question whether particular damages are recoverable depends only on the answer to the question whether they are the direct consequence of the act. Sufficient authority for the proposition is afforded by Smith v. London and South Western Railway Company (23 L. T. Rep. 680; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 14), in the Exchequer Chamber, and particularly by the judgments of Channell, B. and Blackburn, J. Channell, B. says: "I quite agree that where there is no direct evidence of negligence, the question what a reasonable man might foresee is of importance in considering the question whether there is evidence for the jury of negligence or not, and this is what was meant by Bramwell, B. in his judgment in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Company (11 Ex. 781) referred to by Mr. Kingdon; but when it has been once determined that there is evidence of negligence, the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not." Blackburn, J. says:

"I also agree that what the defendants might reasonably anticipate is, as my brother Channell has said, only material with reference to the question whether the defendants were negligent or not, and cannot alter their liability if they were guilty of negligence." In the present case it is clear that the act causing the plank to fall was in law a negligent act, because some damage to the ship might reasonably be anticipated. If this is so then the appellants are liable for the actual loss, that being on the findings of the arbitrators the direct result of the falling board: (see per Lord Sumner in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens, 123 L. T. Rep. 599; (1920) A. C. 983).

On the whole, in my opinion, the appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Scrutton, L.J.—The steamship Thrasyvoulos was lost by fire while being discharged by workmen employed by the charterers. Experienced arbitrators, by whose findings of fact we are bound, have decided that the fire was caused by a spark igniting petrol vapour in the hold, the vapour coming from leaks from cargo shipped by the charterers, and that the spark was caused by the Arab workmen employed by the charterers negligently knocking a plank out of a temperorary staging erected in the hold, so that the plank fell into the hold, and in its fall by striking something made the spark which ignited the petrol vapour.

On these findings the charterers contend that they are not liable for two reasons: first, that they are protected by an exception of "fire" which in the charter is "mutually excepted;" secondly, that as the arbitrators have found that it could not be reasonably anticipated that the falling of the board would make a spark, the actual damage is too remote to be the subject of a claim. In my opinion, both these grounds of defence fail.

An excepted perils clause, if fully expanded, runs that one of the parties undertakes to do something unless prevented by an excepted peril, in which case he is excused. But where he has an obligation to do some act carefully, if he fails in his obligation, and by his negligence an excepted peril comes into operation and does damage, the excepted peril does not prevent him from acting carefully, and he is liable for damages directly flowing from his breach of his obligation to act carefully, though the breach acts through the medium of an excepted peril. It is a commonplace of mercantile law that if a peril of the sea is brought into operation by the carelessness of the shipowner or his servants, he is liable, though perils of the sea are excepted perils, unless he has also a clause excepting the negligence of his servants. In the same way, though the charterer has an exception of fire in his favour, he will be liable if the fire was directly caused by his servants' negligence, for it was not fire that prevented them from being careful. This disposes of the first defence.

The second defence is that the damage is too remote from the negligence, as it could not be reasonably foreseen as a consequence. On this head we were referred to a number of well known cases in which vague language, which I cannot think to be really helpful, has been used in an attempt to define the point at which damage becomes too remote from, or not sufficiently directly caused by, the breach of duty, which is the original cause of action, to be recoverable. For instance, I cannot think it useful to say the damage must be the natural and probable result. This suggests that there are results which are natural but not probable, and other results which are probable but not natural. I am not sure what either adjective means in this connection; if they mean the same thing, two need not be used; if they mean different things, the difference between them should be defined. And as to many cases of fact in which the distinction has been drawn, it is difficult to see why one case should be decided one way and one another. Perhaps the House of Lords will some day explain why, if a cheque is negligently filled up, it is a direct effect of the negligence that some one finding the cheque should commit forgery: London Joint Stock Bank v. Macmillan (119 L. T. Rep. 387; (1918) A. C. 777); while if some one negligently leaves a libellous letter about, it is not a direct effect of the negligence that the finder should show the letter to the person libelled: Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (123 L. T. Rep. 599; (1920) A. C. 956). In this case, however, the problem is simpler. To determine whether an act is negligent, it is relevant to determine whether any reasonable person would foresee that the act would cause damage; if he would not, the act is not negligent. But if the act would or might probably cause damage, the fact that the damage it in fact causes is not the exact kind of damage one would expect is immaterial, so long as the damage is in fact caused sufficiently directly by the negligent act, and not by the operation of independent causes having no connection with the negligent act, except that they could not avoid its results. Once the act is negligent, the fact that its exact operation was not foreseen is immaterial. This is the distinction laid down by the majority of the Exchequer Chamber in Smith v. London and South-Western Railway Company (23 L. T. Rep. 680; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 21), and by the majority of the court in banc in Rigby v. Hewitt (5 Ex. 240) and Greenland v. Chaplin (5 Ex. 243), and approved recently by Lord Sumner in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (123 L. T. Rep. 599; (1920) A. C. 983), and Sir Samuel Evans in H.M.S. London (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 109 L. T. Rep. 960; (1914) P. 76). In the present case it was negligent in discharging cargo to knock down the planks of the temporary staging, for they might easily cause some damage either to workmen, or cargo, or the ship. The fact that they did directly produce an unexpected result, a spark in an atmosphere of petrol vapour which caused a fire, does not relieve the person who was negligent from the damage which his negligent act directly caused.

For these reasons the experienced arbitrators and the judge appealed from came, in my opinion, to a correct decision, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

The Cap Palos. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Contract for towage—Loss of tow—Negligence—Exceptions clause—"Default of the steam tug-owner"—Tug-owner not sending assistance to tow while in danger—Liability of tug-owner.

The defendant contracted to tow the plaintiffs' motor-schooner Cap Palos on a round voyage. The contract contained an exceptions clause, which relieved the defendant from liability for "the acts, neglect, or default of the masters, pilots, or crews of the steam tugs, or of consulting engineers, ships husbands, or other persons in his employment . . . . or for any damage or loss that may arise to any vessel or craft being towed, or about to be towed, or having been towed, . . . through collision or otherwise, whether such damage arise from or be occasioned by any accident or by any omission, breach of duty, mismanagement, negligence, or default of the steam tug-owner, or any of his servants or employees, or by any defect or imperfections in the steam tugs. . . ." The towage contract was carried out with interruptions until on the 24th Oct. 1919 the tugs left the tow at anchor in a position of some danger. The defendant knew of the danger, and ordered a tug to go to the assistance of the Cap Palos, but countermanded the order upon the ground that assistance was being sent by the Salvage Association. No assistance reached the Cap Palos, and on the 26th Oct. she was driven on the rocks and became a constructive total loss.

Held, that the exceptions did not protect the defendant from liability, as they were limited to a time when the defendant was doing, or omitting to do, something in the actual performance of the contract, and did not apply to a time when he had ceased, even though temporarily, to do anything at all, and had unjustifiably left the performance of his contractual duties to others.

Decision of Hill, J. reversed.

Appeal from a decision of Hill, J., in an action for damages for breach of contract.

The plaintiffs, the appellants, were the owners of the five-masted motor-schooner, Cap Palos. The defendant was George Alder, tug owner of Middlesbrough.

The plaintiffs claimed that the loss of the Cap Palos was due to the insufficiency of power of the defendant's tugs and to his failure to supply a tug of sufficient power to continue the performance of the contract.

The defendant pleaded that the loss of the vessel was due to the negligence of those in charge of her in attempting to get under way and failing to wait until towage assistance arrived or the weather moderated. In the alternative the defendant relied on the exceptions in the towage clause.

"The contract was to tow the Cap Palos on a round voyage, of which the first stage was from Immingham to Hartlepool in ballast. No tug was named for the service, but it was admitted by the defendant that under the contract there was an obligation to provide sufficient tug power. The first tug provided was not of sufficient power, but the defendant provided a second, and the towage proceeded with interruptions until the tugs and tow found themselves in Robin Hood's Bay. The tugs lost their hawser, which had parted, and left the tow in that bay. After vainly trying to get out of the bay, she anchored there on the night of the 24th Oct. On the 25th she again tried to get out of the bay, but failed; and on the 26th she was driven on to the rocks, and became a constructive total loss. It is for this loss that the plaintiffs make their claim upon the defendant. The Cap Palos was fitted with an auxiliary motor, but it was out of gear, and she had to depend upon her sails. It was not contemplated by either party that the motor should be used. The details of the towage up to the time of getting to Robin Hood's Bay are, in my opinion, not relevant to the question before us and are quite sufficiently dealt with by Hill, J. Owing partly to the defective power of the first tug, and partly to other causes, the towage took much longer, and there were many more interruptions than were expected or than there should have been; but the towage did go on, and, in my opinion, did go on under the contract. The only point made at the trial on this part of the case was that the tugs and tow got out of their course and into the bay, because the two tugs, attached as they were to the tow and to one another, were of of insufficient power to avoid their being set out of their course towards the shore. Hill, J., was advised by the Elder Brethren that the tug power was sufficient if properly handled, and the same advice was given to us by our assessors. The learned judge came to the conclusion that they got into Robin Hood's Bay by bad navigation in not making allowance for a change of wind, not hauling out when a mist came on from a course which would take them very near the bay, and by not using the lead; but he held that the defendant was protected from the consequences of this negligence of the tug-masters by the exceptions in his contract. I agree with the learned judge on this part of the case.

"The question as to the rest of the case is quite different. I agree with Hill, J., that if assistance had been sent to the Cap Palos at any time up to midday on the 26th Oct. 1919, which was Sunday, she could have been saved from becoming, as she did, a total constructive loss, although she might have been damaged to a certain extent. It was the defendant's duty under his contract to send such assistance, and he did not send it; and the questions are whether, upon the facts, he is excused from performing that duty, and, if not, whether he is protected by the exceptions. The reason why nothing was done on Friday, the 24th, is not quite clear; but I think the result is that the defendant attributes it to a combination of bad weather and unpreparedness of the tugs, which had arrived in Hartlepool without their hawsers, which, they said, they had lost in Robin Hood's Bay, and had not yet been supplied with new ones, which the defendant took steps to supply. According to the defendant the tugs were ordered to go to the Cap Palos on the morning of Saturday, the 25th, and were fitted to do so; but the masters refused to go, because of the weather. I doubt whether the weather was bad enough to prevent their going, and also whether they ought to have left the Cap Palos in Robin

Hood's Bay and gone to Hartlepool; but it is not necessary to decide either of those points, because, in my opinion, these omissions of duty, if they existed, were those of the masters of the tugs, against which the defendant is protected by the exceptions in his contract. Some explanation of the circumstances may be afforded by the fact that the master of one of the tugs, the Symbol, was not in the service of the defendant, but of a firm from whom the defendant had just bought her, and was only in command of her for the purpose of taking her round from Southampton and delivering her to the defendant. On her way round she was sent to perform this towage. As appears from the correspondence, the master seems to have been anxious to get back with his crew to Southampton, and very likely did not want to renew a towage on the East Coast in weather that was not good, while the master of the other tug may have been influenced by his example. The question, however, is not very material, because the defendant is not excused from the performance of his duty, if he had means of performing it without using these tugs. It is clear that he had these means, for he had another tug, the J. P. Rennoldson, which he in fact ordered on the 25th Oct. to go to the Cap Palos, after he had been to Robin Hood's Bay and heard of the refusal of the other tug-masters. Unfortunately he cancelled these orders later in the day, and from this the whole trouble has arisen, for there is no reason to think that the J. P. Rennoldson could not have reached the Cap Palos in time to be of use. The reason given for the cancellation of the orders to the J. P. Rennoldson is as follows: The defendant gave evidence that a Mr. Milburn, the brother of Lloyd's agent at Whitby, and then acting for him in his absence, showed the defendant a telegram to the effect that Grimsby underwriters were sending two powerful tugs, expected to arrive that night. Mr. Milburn denied having shown him any telegram of that kind. I think it is probable that the defendant did get some intimation of the kind, because the facts were that the captain of the Cap Palos had communicated with Lloyd's agent, whose son, acting for him, did communicate with the Salvage Association, who, of course, act for underwriters in these cases; that the Salvage Association at Grimsby did send a powerful tug; that the ship's agent at Grimsby so informed the ship's agent at Liverpool after the vessel had been driven ashore; and that Mr. Milburn, the acting Lloyd's agent, had a faint recollection that he had heard that tugs were coming from Grimsby. The Cap Palos, although not insured in England, was re-insured here, and the matter seems to have followed the ordinary course where the Salvage Association are concerned with a ship in distress. Unfortunately, the tug sent by them was obliged by weather to put into Bridlington Bay, and could not reach the Cap Palos. On getting this information as to the tug, the defendant assumed that he might safely leave the matter in the hands of the Salvage Association, so far as getting the vessel into a place of safety was concerned, and cancelled the orders to the J. P. Rennoldson."

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant, contending that the loss of the Cap Palos was due to the negligence of the defendant, and to the breach of the contract to tow.

Hill, J., held that the defendant was protected from liability by the exceptions clause in the contract of towage, and dismissed the action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and Balloch for the appellants.—The defendant repudiated the contract and cannot therefore rely on the exceptions:

Jureidini v. National British and Irish Millers' Insurance Company, 112 L. T. Rep. 531; (1915) A. C. 499; Braithwaite v. Foreign Hardwood Company, 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 52; 92 L. T. Rep. 637; (1905) 2 K. B. 543.

But assuming there was no absolute repudiation of the contract, the defendant was not entitled to suspend the performance of the contract at any rate at a time when the tow was in peril. The learned judge found that the defendant did not perform his contract with reasonable industry. This is not a case of negligence while performing the contract, but of a failure to carry out the contract. The exception, "breach of duty," only applies to a tort and not to a breach of contract. The defendant is not, therefore, protected by the exceptions.

MacKinnon, K.C., D. Stephens, K.C., and Dumas for the respondent.—The point was not taken in the court below that the defendant repudiated the contract, and it ought not to be taken now. The defendant did not repudiate the contract, but was temporarily prevented by adverse conditions from carrying it out. The tugs which had gone to Hartlepool to get new hawsers were prevented by the weather from returning to Robin Hood's Bay, and the defendant having heard that the Salvage Association were sending two powerful tugs to the assistance of the Cap Palos, cancelled the order to his own tugs for the time being. The defendant had not abandoned his contract of towage:

Bradley v. Newson, Sons, and Co., 119 L. T. Rep. 239; 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 340; (1919) A. C. 16.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following judgments were read:

Lord STERNDALE, M.R. stated the facts as set out above, and continued: I agree with Hill, J. that it is not necessary to determine the question, hotly contested at the trial, as to whether this information (as to the sending of tugs by the Salvage Association) was given to the defendant by Lloyd's agent, because I also agree with him that, however the defendant got it, he was not thereby relieved from his obligation to send the J. P. Rennoldson or some other efficient tug to the help of the Cap Palos, and so continue to carry out his contract. It may be that, when the Salvage Association send a tug to tow a vessel out of danger, and the tug arrives, they do in practice take charge of the operations until the vessel is in a place of safety, without the help or interference of anyone who has a towage contract with her owners, because their tugs are better fitted and equipped and their crews better skilled in such work. But that, if correct, does not discharge such a person from the obligations of his contract. The Salvage Association's tug may, as in this case, not arrive, or other things may happen which require him to discharge that obligation; and I agree with Hill, J. that, in cancelling the orders to the J. P. Rennoldson and leaving to the Salvage Association the towage of the Cap Palos from a place of danger to a place of safety, the defendant failed to fulfil the obligations of his contract, and was guilty of a breach of it.

Then there arises the question whether the learned judge was right in holding that the defendant was protected by the exceptions in the contract. The main argument against his decision before us was based on an attempt to show that the defendant, after the Cap Palos went ashore, wholly repudiated all obligations under the contract, and could not therefore avail himself of the exceptions. This is a question of fact, upon which there should have been a finding by the learned judge. I am quite satisfied from the pleadings, the arguments of counsel as appearing in the judge's note, supplemented to a certain extent by shorthand notes and by the judgment, that this point was never raised at the trial. The evidence to which we were referred on the point confirms me in this opinion, for, considering the counsel and the judge, I do not believe it would have been left as it is without further investigation if the point had been before the court. It was admitted that the learned judge was not asked for a finding on the point. I doubt, therefore, very much if it was competent for the appellant to raise the point in this court, but it is not necessary to decide this, because of the view that I take of the case on other points, and also because I think that no such repudiation is proved by the evidence. I think what is proved is that the defendant gave up any attempt to tow the vessel from danger to a place of safety, but that he never repudiated his contract to continue his towage after she was brought to a place of safety. There was evidence given by him that he ordered the two tugs originally engaged to go to Robin Hood's Bay in case they were wanted. If this were true, it is some evidence of an intention to go on with his contract; if it were not true, the judge should have been asked for a finding on the point. I do not think that the finding of the learned judge that the defendant gave up any attempt was intended by him to be a finding of more than I have stated—that is, that he gave up any attempt to do what he thought the Salvage Association tug was going to do. No other question was present to the judge's mind, and I do not know how he would have found on any other point which might have been, but was not, brought to his attention.

It was argued that, on these facts, as I have stated them, the exception ceased to apply, because the contract was changed in character on the analogy of deviation, as in the case of Lilley v. Doubleday (44 L. T. Rep. 814; 7 Q. B. Div. 510). This may be so, and I say nothing to the contrary, but I prefer to base my judgment on another ground. The exceptions clause in the towage contract is as follows: [The Master of the Rolls read the exceptions clause, the material part of which is set out in the headnote, and continued:] Really, the words held to protect the defendant are "damage . . . through collision or otherwise" to a vessel being towed, or having been towed, by reason of the default of the steam tug-owner. These words, isolated from their context, are very wide, and may cover the case, but there are numerous cases which decide that a limitation may be put upon such wide words, if the construction of the whole clause requires it. I think that is the case here. I do not think it is necessary to say that in no case can the words "default of the owner" refer to a breach of contract, but I think that the whole clause points to the exceptions being confined to a time when the tug-owner is doing something, or omitting to do something, in the actual performance of the contract, and do not apply during a period where, as in this case, he has ceased, even for a time, to do anything at all, and has left the performance of his duties to someone else. In other words, I think the exception extends to cover a default during the actual performance of the duties of the contract, and not to an unjustified handing over of those obligations to someone else for performance.

I think, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiffs, with costs here and below.

Atkin, L.J.—This is an action for damages for breach of a contract of towage, whereby the plaintiffs' ship was lost. The learned judge has held the defendant excused by reason of the exceptions contained in the contract. It is not disputed that the defendant's ordinary conditions of towage were incorporated in the contract made between the parties, and the only question to be determined is whether, under the circumstances, they apply so as to protect the defendant. It is contended by the plaintiffs that they do not apply, because at the time of loss the defendant was not performing, and had temporarily, at any rate, abandoned performance of the particular contract to which the exceptions related. [His Lordship stated the facts.] The history of the towage in hours, as appears from the record, is: Four and a half hours' towage, thirty-seven no towage; one towage, three no towage; nine and a half towage, sixty-one no towage, of which only six hours' towage was efficient—a remarkable divergence from a contract for about fifteen hours' continuous towage. This closely resembles Alice's "jam every other day"—tug yesterday and tug to-morrow, but never tug to-day. The figures appear to me to indicate such delay as to make the purported performance something quite different from that contracted for, a form of deviation quite familiar in maritime adventures. But the consideration of the defendant's performance of this contract cannot end with a bare enumeration of hours of towage. Evidence was given of his actions during the period from 10.30 on the Thursday, when the towage ceased, and 3 p.m. on Sunday afternoon, when the schooner went aground. On the Saturday the defendant himself visited Robin Hood's Bay, and apparently made arrangements that a fresh tug, the J. P. Rennoldson, then at Middlesbrough, should go to the rescue. But on receiving a message, not identified, that two powerful tugs were being sent to the scene on behalf of underwriters on Saturday evening, the defendant cancelled these arrangements, and, as found by the learned judge, gave up any attempt to help the schooner. Much argument was addressed to us to show that this finding was contrary to the evidence. In my opinion, although there was evidence each way, there was ample evidence to justify the judge, who saw the witnesses, in arriving at this finding. The judge has also found that, if the defendant had continued to attempt to carry out his contract with reasonable industry, the schooner could have been saved up to midday on Sunday.

The question that arises is whether, under the above circumstances, the defendant can rely upon the exceptions. In my opinion, they have no application in the facts of this case. It is immaterial to discuss whether the true view is that the wide words of the exceptions, "default," "omission," and "breach of duty," properly construed, do not extend to cases where the contracting party ceases altogether to perform the contract, or that the exceptions, construed in their widest sense, do not apply where the contract is not being performed at all. The principle appears to me to be common to all classes of contract, and is to be found applied in cases of marine insurance—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 45 to 48; carriage by sea and river—Morrison and Co. v. Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400, 504; 115 L. T. Rep. 508; (1916) 2 K. B. 783) and Davis v. Garrett (1830, 6 Bing. 716); by land—Malleti v. Great Eastern Railway (80 L. T. Rep. 53; (1899) 1 Q. B. 309) and Lilley v. Doubleday (44 L. T. Rep. 814; 7 Q. B. Div. 510); and contracts of bailment. "The principle is well known, and perhaps Lilley v. Doubleday (sup.) is the best illustration, that if you undertake to do a thing in a certain way, or to keep a thing in a certain place, with certain conditions protecting it, and have broken the contract by not doing the thing contracted for in the way contracted for, or not keeping the article in the place in which you have contracted to keep it, you cannot rely on the conditions which were only intended to protect you if you carried out the contract in the way in which you had contracted to do it"—per Scrutton, L.J., in Gibaud v. Great Eastern Railway (125 L. T. Rep. 76; (1921) 2 K. B. 435). If the tugs, on the orders of the defendant, had cast off the tow in a storm on a lee shore for the purpose of engaging in a more profitable salvage operation, and the tow were in consequence damaged, could it be suggested that the intention of the contract was that the defendant should be protected? It is not as was contended, a question of a repudiation of contract which has to be accepted by the other party in order to give rise to a claim for breach. The tow might go to the bottom protesting to the last moment and claiming fulfilment of the contract, and yet the defendant would, in my judgment, in such a case fail to be protected by his exceptions. I am far from saying that a contractor may not make a valid contract that he is not to be liable for any failure to perform his contract, including even wilful default, but he must use very clear words to express that purpose, which I do not find here.

For the above reasons I come to the conclusion that the exceptions in this case afford no defence to the claim, and that effect must be given to the learned judge's findings of fact, and judgment be entered for the plaintiff for damages to be assessed by the registrar and merchants.

Younger, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. One of the respondent's conditions of towage, to which reference has been made in the judgments just delivered, is as follows: "If a steam tug is engaged to tow a ship to any port or station, but through stress of weather or other unavoidable circumstances, she is separated from the ship, the steam tug-owner shall be paid (pro rata) for the distance towed, unless otherwise mutually agreed." This condition seems to supply some indication of the circumstances in which separation of the tug from the tow was, in the contemplation of this contract, regarded as permissible. The circumstances did not exist here. The tugs, the learned judge finds, negligently left the Cap Palos in Robin Hood's Bay on the morning of the 24th Oct. That negligent act, however, was the act of the masters, and from that the conditions protect the respondent. But the constructive total loss of the vessel was not due to that negligent act. It was due to the neglect and default of the respondent himself, fully cognisant as he was of the facts, and of the situation of the Cap Palos, in not sending before noon on the 26th Oct. a tug or tugs to assist her in the position of danger in which she had been left, and incidentally to proceed with the completion of the first part of his contract of towage, the prosecution of which he had for the time abandoned. I agree in the view that from that personal neglect and default of his own, at such a time and in such circumstances, the conditions of towage afford no protection to the respondent, even if the explanation he offers of his failure to send the tug J. P. Rennoldson to the assistance of the tow can on the evidence be accepted, a subject upon which I refrain from further observation.

I think the appeal should be allowed.

APPEAL FROM THE TRIBUNAL CONSTITUTED BY SECT. 2 OF THE INDEMNITY ACT 1920.

Emergency legislation—Charter-party—Requisition of ship by Admiralty—Compensation—Claim by charterers—Direct loss—Interference with business—Injury to ship—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), s. 2, sub-ss. 1 (b), 2 (iii.) (b); schedule, part II.

By sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (b) of the Indemnity Act 1920, any person not being the owner of a ship, who has "incurred or sustained any direct loss or damage by reason of interference with his . . . business . . . through the exercise . . . during the war of any prerogative right of His Majesty or of any . . . power under any enactment relating to the defence of the realm . . . shall be entitled to payment of compensation in respect of such loss or damage."

By sub-sect. 2 (iii.) (b), if the claimant would apart from the Act have no legal right to compensation, the compensation is to be assessed according to the principles set forth in part II. of the schedule to the Act.

A towage and salvage company hired the use of a tug for the purposes of their business by a charter-party which entitled them to the services of the tug for as long as they pleased with the right to terminate the hiring by a fourteen days' notice. During the currency of the charter-party the tug was requisitioned by the Admiralty.

(a) Reported by W. C. Sandford, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Held, by the whole court, that, apart from the Indemnity Act 1920, the charterers would not have had any legal right to compensation.

Held, by Bankes and Warrington, L.JJ. (Scrutton, L.J. dissenting) that the loss of the average net earnings of the tug while requisitioned was "a direct loss or damage" by reason of the interference with the charterers' business within sect. 2 (1) (b) of the Act, and that they were entitled to compensation, which must be assessed as directed in part II. of the schedule to the Act.

APPEAL from the decision of the tribunal constituted by sect. 2 of the Indemnity Act 1920.

The Elliott Steam Tug Company claimed compensation under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (b) and sub-sect. 2 (iii.) (b), of that Act and part II. of the schedule to the Act [which are set out in the judgment of Warrington, L.J.] for direct loss or damage by reason of interference with their property or business through the exercise during the war of powers conferred by the Defence of the Realm Act.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28.—The following judgments were read.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the tribunal set up by the Indemnity Act 1920. By sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, an appeal is given upon any point of law to a party aggrieved by any direction or determination of the tribunal. By the recent Order LVB. of the Rules of the Supreme Court rules are provided regulating appeals from the tribunal. Rule 40 provides that the notice of motion to this Court shall state the point or points of law by the direction or determination on which the appellant feels aggrieved. The point of law raised by the appellants in this appeal is stated in the notice of appeal as follows: "And further take notice that the points of law by the determination of which the claimants feel aggrieved are that the court was wrong in holding that to award the claimants further compensation than the amount above mentioned would be to contravene the principles laid down in part II. of the schedule to the Indemnity Act 1920, and furthermore the claimants will contend that upon the evidence called and the facts so found, they are entitled to the compensation claimed as aforesaid."

The facts which gave rise to the appellants' claim for compensation as found by the tribunal are shortly as follows. The appellants carry on business as tug owners. In Nov. 1914, they chartered the tug Frank from her owners upon terms which entitled the appellants to retain her as long as they pleased, with a right to determine the hiring on fourteen days' notice in writing. The hire was at the rate of 155*l.* per calendar month. On the 19th May 1917, the tug was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and she was retained under the requisition until the month of Nov. 1919. The appellants did not determine the charter-party, because having regard to the favourable terms on which they had acquired the tug, they were anxious to keep her at their disposal when she was released from requisition. The claim put forward by the appellants for compensation represented what they claimed to be the direct loss to them arising from the requisitioning of the tug. It was made up under two heads, (1) the amount of hire which they continued liable to pay to the owners during the whole time that the tug was under requisition: (2) the loss of the profit which they would have made during that period by the use of the tug. They were willing to give credit for all sums which the Admiralty had paid to the owners, and which the owners had passed on to them. The view taken by the tribunal with regard the first head of claim was that with the view of minimising the damages resulting from the requisitioning of the tug it was the appellant's duty to have given the fourteen days' notice terminating the charter, and had this been done the obligation to pay any further hire would have ceased. The tribunal however considered that the appellants should be allowed a reasonable time within which to decide what course to take, and as a result they allowed one month to cover both the consideration period, and the notice period, and gave the appellants their full claim under both heads of damage for that month. This decision was challenged by the appellants, as a matter of law, upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the finding of the tribunal that it was a reasonable course to take, and consequently their duty, to put an end to the charter-party in order to minimise the damage. This court held that the point was not raised by the notice of appeal, and would not allow it to be proceeded with. This disposes of any question of damage in reference to the hire paid by the appellants under the charter during the period of requisition.

There remains the claim for loss of profit, or expressed more accurately the loss of what would be the average and ordinary net earnings of the tug during the period of requisition. This claim cannot be disposed of upon the grounds on which the claim for the hire was disposed of. If the appellants' duty was to put an end to the charter for the purpose of minimising damages, and they had in fact done so, it would not have been a voluntary act, and would have been done merely for the purpose of minimising the damages which resulted from the requisitioning of the tug and would have left the other branch of the claim for damages untouched. Whether the appellants had any right to those damages depends upon the construction of the Indemnity Act, because apart form that Act it is I think clear that they could not have had any legal right to damages. The Act by sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, provides that any of the persons indicated in the section who has "incurred or sustained any direct loss or damage by reason of interference with his property or business in the United Kingdom through the exercise or purported exercise, during the war, of any prerogative right of His Majesty or of any power under any enactment relating to the defence of the realm or any regulation or order made or purporting to be made thereunder, shall be entitled to payment or compensation in respect of such loss or damage; and such payment or compensation shall be assessed on the principles and by the tribunal hereinafter mentioned." By awarding the appellants damages limited to the period of one month the tribunal have found (as I think upon the evidence they were entitled to find) that the business of the appellants had been interfered with by the requisitioning of the tug, and that the appellants had sustained direct loss thereby. By their cross notice of appeal the respondents complain of the inference drawn by the tribunal, that the interference with the appellants' business caused them any direct loss. In my opinion the decision of the tribunal upon this point was correct, and in accordance with the authorities; see The Argentino (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 733; 59 L. T. Rep. 914; 13 Prob. Div. 191; 61 L. T. Rep. 706; 14 App. Cas. 519). The loss of what the tug might reasonably and fairly be expected to earn for the appellants had she not been requisitioned is in my opinion direct loss within the meaning of the sub-section which I have just quoted. It was urged upon the court by the respondents' counsel that it had never been the practice of the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission to award any compensation for loss of profits, and that, as the tribunal was directed by sect. 2, sub-sect. 2, iii. (b), of the Act to assess compensation in accordance with the principles on which that commission acted, the tribunal could not award profits. Whether this was the practice of the commission I do not know, but of this I am sure, that since the passing of the Indemnity Act 1920, compensation must be assessed by the tribunal set up by that Act in accordance with the directions of that Act, and not otherwise; and I am confident that the tribunal must be dealing with claims upon that footing. It does not follow that because a person proves a direct loss by reason of interference with his property he is entitled to payment or compensation, because the principles upon which payment or compensation are to be assessed are laid down by the Act. Those principles are set out in the schedule to the Act, and they appear to have been framed with the intention of awarding compensation to individuals who suffered losses over and above what the community in general suffered owing to the war, and to exclude compensation for any special loss or any loss of special profits due to the war, or for any losses arising solely out of the existence of a state of war. It was no doubt difficult to select a form of words which would exactly and clearly convey the intention of the Legislature, and I do not propose to attempt any definition of what the various expressions in the schedule include. In the present case the tribunal have excluded the bulk of the appellants' claim for loss of profit. If they did so on the ground that the appellants failed to prove a direct loss, their decision was not in my opinion correct in law. I am not satisfied that they did so decide, or that they so intended to decide. Indeed their decision awarding any damages indicates the contrary. The written judgment of the tribunal concludes in this way: "It was contended that the impracticability of hiring a substitute tug, owing to the existence of a state of war, combined with the requisition, forced the claimants' decision and so caused the further loss; but it appears to us that to compensate the claimants for such further loss on that ground would be to contravene the principles laid down for our guidance in part II. of the schedule to the Indemnity Act." If by this the tribunal intended to convey that though the loss proved by the appellants was a direct loss it nevertheless was a loss excluded by the express language of part II. of the schedule, and therefore could not be taken into account by the tribunal, we have not at present the materials upon which we can decide the point of law raised by the appellants. This court cannot decide questions of fact. The case therefore must be remitted to the tribunal for them to take such action (if any) as they may consider desirable and to report to the court, if they so desire, any further findings of fact upon which this court can proceed in dealing with the question of law submitted to it. The appeal must be adjourned. The cross-appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—This is an appeal by claimants under the Indemnity Act 1920 from the determination by the tribunal set up under that Act of the amount due to them for compensation.

By sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (i.), of the Act the right to appeal is strictly limited to any direction or determination of the tribunal on any point of law, and by rule 40 of Order LV.B in the Rules of the Supreme Court 1921 it is provided that the notice of motion, i.e., the notice of appeal, shall state the point or points of law by the decision or determination on which the appellant feels aggrieved. The jurisdiction of this court is therefore strictly limited and we must be careful not to pass the limits there laid down.

The claimants were under a charter-party dated the 2nd Nov. 1914, the charterers of a steam tug Frank for a period which was practically so long as they pleased unless previously determined by the charterers by a fourteen-days' notice. The tug was used by the claimants for their towage and salvage work from which they derived profits. She was on the 19th May 1917, requisitioned by the Admiralty. The claimants claimed compensation under two heads: (1) loss of profit from the use of the tug in their business of which use they had been deprived during the period of requisition; and (2) the charter rate of hire paid by them to the owners so far as it had not been repaid out of the hire paid by the Government. The tribunal have awarded compensation under both heads for the amounts claimed, but for thirty days only. The claimants seek to have the limit of thirty days removed so far as concerns the loss of profits. The respondents on the other hand contend that nothing should have been awarded for loss of profits. I have stated the nature of the case in general terms only, but in terms which seem to me to be sufficient to explain what follows. The jurisdiction of the tribunal and the right of the claimants to compensation depend in my opinion on the Indemnity Act 1920. By sect. 1 of that Act the right to institute legal proceedings in respect of acts done in good faith by officers of the Crown, during the war is speaking generally taken away, but by sect. 2 a right to compensation is given. That section by sub-sect. 1 provides that a person (a) being the owner of a ship which has been requisitioned shall be entitled to payment or compensation as therein mentioned; "(b) who has otherwise incurred or sustained any direct loss or damage by reason of interference with his property or business in the United Kingdom through the exercise or purported exercise, during the war, of any prerogative right of His Majesty or of any power under any enactment relating to the defence of the realm, or any regulation or order made or purporting to be made thereunder, shall be entitled to payment or compensation in respect of such loss or damage; and such payment or compensation shall be assessed on the principles and by the tribunal hereinafter mentioned, and the decision of that tribunal shall be final." This is followed by two provisions, one giving the limited right of appeal above referred to, the other being immaterial. Sub-sect. 2 provides "that the payment or compensation shall be assessed in accordance with the following principles": Of these (i.) and (ii.) are not applicable to the present case. (iii.) is as follows: "(a) If the claimant would, apart from this Act, have had a legal right to compensation, the tribunal shall give effect to that right, but in assessing the compensation shall have regard to the amount of the compensation to which, apart from this Act, the claimant would have been legally entitled, and to the existence of a state of war and to all other circumstances relevant to a just assessment of compensation: Provided that this sub-section shall not give any right to payment or compensation for indirect loss. (b) If the claimant would not have had any such legal right, the compensation shall be assessed in accordance with the principles upon which the commission appointed by His Majesty under commissions dated the 31st March 1915, and the 18th Dec. 1918 (commonly known as the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission), has hitherto acted in cases where no special provision is made as to the assessment of compensation, which principles are set forth in part II. of the schedule to this Act."

In my opinion the claimants in the present case come under sub-clause (b). As charterers they had no property in the ship nor had they the possession thereof and they could not at common law have maintained an action against the officers of the Crown who took possession of the ship. Accordingly that part of the schedule which regulates in their case the assessment of compensation is part II., which is in the following terms: "Principles on which the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission has hitherto acted. The compensation to be awarded shall be assessed by taking into account only the direct loss and damage suffered by the claimant by reason of direct and particular interference with his property or business, and nothing shall be included in respect of any loss or damage due to or arising through the enforcement of any order or regulation of general or local application, or in respect of any loss or damage due simply and solely to the existence of a state of war, or to the general conditions prevailing in the locality, or to action taken upon grounds arising out of the conduct of the claimant himself rendering it necessary for public security that his legal rights should be infringed, or in respect of loss of mere pleasure or amenity." The tribunal arrived at the following conclusions: (1) that the business of the claimants as charterers was interfered with by the requisition; (2) that the requisition interfered with the claimants' business so as to cause directly some loss of profit and some loss of charter hire; (3) that to minimise the loss they ought to have given the fourteen days' notice to determine the charter but were entitled to a reasonable time, fixed by the tribunal at thirty days, to consider their position, and accordingly they allowed the claim under both heads for thirty days. The judgment concludes with the following passage: "The further payments of charter hire and the further loss of profits was not caused directly or even indirectly by the requisition. As Mr. Page candidly stated, the claimants themselves in their own business interests after consultation and advice decided to keep the charter on foot for so long a period as the requisition lasted. This decision and not the requisition caused the further loss. It was contended that the impracticability of hiring a substitute tug, owing to the existence of a state of war, combined with the requisition, forced the claimants' decision and so caused the further loss; but it appears to us that to compensate the claimants for such further loss on that ground would be to contravene the principles laid down for our guidance in part II. of the schedule to the Indemnity Act." I now turn to the appellants' notice of appeal. After stating that he intends to appeal he defines his point in these terms; "And further take notice that the points of law by the determination of which the claimants feel aggrieved are that the court was wrong in holding that to award the claimants further compensation than the amount above mentioned" —that is loss during the thirty days—"would be to contravene the principles laid down in part II. of the schedule to the Indemnity Act 1920, and furthermore the claimants will contend that upon evidence called and the facts so found, they are entitled to the compensation claimed as aforesaid." The last contention seems to me to raise really no point of law at all. This is not drawn with the precision which in proceedings such as the present ought I think to be observed, but I think it means that there was nothing in the schedule to justify the limitation to the thirty days.

The respondent's cross notice is as follows: "And further take notice that the point of law by the direction of determination on which the respondent feels aggrieved is the inference drawn by the court that the interference with the claimants' business by reason of the requisition was such as to cause directly some loss of profit and some loss of charter hire and the decision of the court that it was competent to the court to draw such an inference from the facts proved."

I will deal first with the cross-appeal. This, in my opinion, fails. The question turns on the construction of the statute. I will assume that at common law the charterers could have obtained no compensation for interference with mere contractual rights, but the statute has, in my opinion, without reference to the question whether the claimants had rights at law, given compensation to any person who has incurred or sustained any direct loss or damage by reason of interference with his business. The claimants' business was that of employing the Frank and other tugs in towage and salvage work. They proved that profits were derived by them by the employment of the Frank and they lost these profits by being deprived of the Frank, they not being able, as they proved, to obtain on reasonable terms another tug in her place. I think the tribunal were justified in concluding that some loss of profit was direct loss sustained by reason of interference with business. Were the tribunal justified in confining the loss to the thirty days? As regards the minimising the loss by determining the charter, with deference to the tribunal, the determination of the charter, though it would have rendered them no longer liable to pay hire and so have reduced their loss in that respect, would have left the loss of profit resulting from their loss of the tug unaffected, and I think the tribunal were wrong in law in limiting on this ground the period for which loss of profit was allowed. But it is open to argument that the loss after the thirty days resulting from inability to obtain another tug was not suffered by reason of "direct and particular interference" with the claimants' business by the requisition of the Frank, but by reason of general measures taken by the Government in consequence of the existence of a state of war, and was thus due "simply and solely" to the existence of that state of war or to "general conditions prevailing in the locality." I express no opinion on the validity of this argument for we do not know from the judgment with any certainty the view taken by the tribunal. The concluding passage of the judgment seems to indicate that they took some such view as I have suggested, but I think they ought to be requested if they think fit to make further findings of fact or to express their views in terms on the construction of part II. of the schedule. The matter should be referred back to them for this purpose.

The cross-appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

Scrutton, L.J.—This is an appeal under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (i), of the Indemnity Act 1920, from the decision of the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission upon a claim by the Elliott Steam Tug Company, charterers of the tug Frank owned by Charles Duncan and Co., for compensation for damage done to their business by the requisition of the tug by the Admiralty on the 19th May 1917. Before the requisition of the tug the charterers were making a profit of 5*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* per day (not including days when the tug was not working) after paying the owners 5*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* a day. In other words they were making a gross profit of 10*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* a day, a net profit of 5*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* day. The Admiralty, who only deal with owners, at first paid the owners 5*l.* 10*s.* a day, which the owners ultimately handed over to the charterers. The charterers had continued to pay 5*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* a day to the owners for their charter was renewable at charterers' option, and the charterers desired to preserve their rights over the tug, after the requisition ceased. These rights indeed were so valuable that the owners ultimately paid the charterers 2000*l.* to cancel the charter. In the second stage of the requisition the Admiralty took over the maintenance of the tug, and only paid the owners 1*l.* 4*s.* a day, which they paid to the charterers. At this stage the charterers who were paying the owners 5*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* a day, and only receiving 1*l.* 4*s.* from the Government, were obviously making a heavy loss. The question now is as to the rights of the charterers against the Government.

At common law there is no doubt about the position. In case of a wrong done to a chattel the common law does not recognise a person whose only rights are a contractual right to have the use or services of the chattel for purposes of making profits or gains without possession of or property in the chattel. Such a person cannot claim for injury done to his contractual right: see on this point the judgment of Blackburn, J. in Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Company (33 L. T. Rep. 475; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 453), where a contractor making a tunnel on K.'s land claimed against a wrongdoer to K.'s land, whose wrong made his contract less profitable, and was held not entitled to recover. It is for this reason that underwriters cannot sue directly a wrongdoer against property they have insured, but must proceed in the name of the assured, as explained by Lord Penzance in Simpson v. Thomson (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 38 L. T. Rep. 1; 3 App. Cas. 289). It is for this reason also that charterers under a charter not amounting to a demise do not and cannot sue in the Admiralty Court a wrongdoer who has sunk by collision their chartered ship. The same principle was applied by Hamilton, J. in Remorquage a Helice (Société Anonyme) v. Bennetts (1911) 1 K. B. 243), to prevent the owner of a tug suing the wrongdoer who had sunk his tow, whereby he had lost the benefit of his contract of towage. When the Court of Appeal in The Okehampton (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428; 110 L. T. Rep. 130; (1913) P. 173) allowed sub-charterers to sue for the loss of their bill of lading freight through a collision by the defendants' wrongdoing, they did so, I think, because it was proved that the sub-charterers, not the owners, had contracted to carry the goods and had received them and had, therefore, a lien for the freight and sufficient possession as bailees to sue for damages to the goods: see The Winkfield (85 L. T. Rep. 668; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 249; (1902) P. 42). This is a sufficient reason for the decision, as explained by Hamilton, L.J. at the beginning of his judgment. I do not think the headnote is accurate in speaking of possessory interest in the ship.

But, secondly, at common law, the shipowner suing a wrongdoer for temporary loss of the ship's services would be entitled at common law to recover the loss of profits during that period as a direct consequence of the wrong. This is explained as regards ships by the judgments of Bowen, L.J. and the House of Lords in The Argentino (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 733; 61 L. T. Rep. 706; 14 App. Cas. 519). It is indeed every-day practice in injury cases, where the plaintiff is given loss of earnings or profits during the time his injury lasts as the direct consequences of the injury. I used the word "direct," because it is the word preferred after consideration of the alternatives by Lord Sumner in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (132 L. T. Rep. 593; (1920) A. C. 983). The charterer in collision cases does not recover profits, not because the loss of profits during repairs is not the direct consequence of the wrong, but because the common law rightly or wrongly does not recognise him as able to sue for such an injury to his contractual right in the ship.

But, thirdly, at common law the owner of a ship while under a duty to act reasonably to reduce damages is under no obligation to destroy his own property to reduce the damages payable by the wrongdoer. The leasehold tenant of a house would not be bound to stop paying rent to his superior landlord during the period during which a wrongdoer prevented him using the house, because by so doing he would reduce the damages the wrongdoer had to pay if by so doing he lost the tenancy of the house after the wrong of the tort feasor was repaired or finished in its effects. It is common practice at common law to recover (1) net profits lost; (2) standing charges which have reasonably to be incurred and which are not made up by profits by reason of the wrongdoer's action. In other words, in a case of temporary loss of a chattel, gross profits lost are recovered so long as expenses of earning them reasonably continue; and the reasonableness is from the point of view of the owner of the chattel. If the expenses cease their amount is set off against the gross profit otherwise lost. I mention these second and third points because on neither of them do I agree with the view taken by the commission during the argument, which was apparently that loss of profits during requisition could not be the direct consequence of the requisition; and that the charterer was obliged to abandon his charter or rather was not entitled to claim the cost of keeping it alive for his benefit after the requisition.

The charterer then has no common law right against a person who deprives him of the opportunity of earning profits by his contractual rights, by taking away the ship in respect of which he had a contract. As a consequence the Board of Arbitration which dealt with registered ships excluded the charterer from claiming for the same reason. They only allowed the owners to claim, and sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a), of the Indemnity Act does not apply to the case of a charterer. He does not come under sect. 2, sub-sect. 2 (iii.) (a), for apart from the Act he would have no legal right to compensation. He can only get compensation under the Act if he has sustained any direct loss or damage by reason of interference with his property or business through the exercise of prerogative rights, or powers under any statute for the defence of the realm and then only on the principles set out in Part II. of the Schedule to the Act. The commission appear to have rejected all claim for loss of profits because the charterers were unable to replace the requisitioned tug at any reasonable rates on the ground that it was "loss or damage due simply and solely to the existence of a state of war." In one view all requisitions were due to a state of war, but to adopt this interpretation would be to make the schedule illusory and meaningless, even as applied to owners. It is difficult to interpret these very vague words, but they may perhaps exclude that part of the profits or value due to war as compared with the pre-war profits or value.

But in my opinion there is a deeper objection to the appellants' claim based on the common law principles already stated, namely, that the charterer cannot get any damages for the loss of his purely contractual rights, whether in property or business. The owner of a ship requisitioned who had been running it for his own account receives an agreed sum from the Admiralty for hire, say, 5*l.* a day, and the Admiralty only deals with the owner. Suppose he has chartered his ship, does the amount payable by the Admiralty suddenly rise from 5*l.* a day for the ship run by the owner for himself to 10*l.* a day for the same ship run by the owner for the charterer? It clearly does not, in my opinion, and the reason is that the 5*l.* a day is the full value of all interests in the ship. It is probably much less than the market value of an unrequisitioned ship, but that is because of the agreed Blue Book rates. But it is the full value for the purpose of compensation and the charterer is not entitled to any additional payment. Whether he is entitled to any share of the 5*l.* depends on his contract with the owners; in this case he has had the whole of the gross rate and cannot claim any more; he must settle with the owner his share, if any, of the net rate and its advantages.

This view, which is not the view put forward by the tribunal, excludes the claim of the appellants; there is a cross-appeal against the amount awarded by the tribunal rested on the ground that the loss of profits was not direct loss. I think it was direct loss if the charterer had a right to claim, and that, therefore, the cross-appeal fails on the point raised.

Appeal adjourned; cross-appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Monday, Feb. 14, 1921.

(Before Rowlatt, J.)

M. Isaacs and Sons Limited v. William McAllum and Co. Limited. (a)

Charter-party—Ship's name—Implied warranty of nationality—Breach—Shipowner selling vessel to foreign subject—Change of nationality of vessel—Change of flag—Implied term—Damages.

By a charter-party a British ship was chartered by her owners to the plaintiffs for twelve months in direct continuation of an earlier time charter. During the currency of the charter-party the owners sold the ship to a Greek subject, thereby causing her to change her flag. The charterers did not attempt to avoid the charter, but kept the services of the ship until it expired. By the contract of sale the owners reserved the right, and it was agreed that they should retain the right of satisfying any requirement of the charterers with regard to the personal performance of any obligations of the charter-party.

Held that although there was no implied warranty in the charter-party that the ship was a British ship because she was called by a British name, the owners had committed a breach of the charter-party in selling the ship to a foreign subject and causing her to change her flag, and the charterers were entitled to such a sum in damages as would represent the increased difficulty of getting suitable and remunerative employment in consequence of the change of flag.

Action in the commercial list tried by Rowlatt, J.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the breach of a charter-party. By their statement of claim they alleged that by a charter-party dated the 15th April 1919, the defendants, as owners, chartered to the plaintiffs the steamship City of Hamburg for a period of four calendar months. By a second charter-party, dated the 30th Aug. 1919, the defendants further chartered to the plaintiffs the said steamship for a period of twelve months in direct continuation of the charter-party dated the 15th April 1919. At the dates of both charter-parties the steamship City of Hamburg was a British ship.

On the 10th Sept. 1919 the defendants sold the vessel to one Denis Anghelatos, a Greek subject, and the sale was carried out with the permission of the British Ministry of Shipping. On the 11th Sept. 1919 the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs giving them notice of the sale, and the next day the plaintiffs replied refusing to consent to the transfer of flag during the period of the charter-party, and stating that they would hold defendants responsible for any damages the plaintiffs might sustain.

On the 13th Oct. 1919 the register of the vessel as a British ship was closed; and on the 8th Nov. 1919 she was transferred to the Greek flag at Leghorn, being renamed the Panaghis Dracatos; and on the 12th Nov. she left that port under the Greek flag.

The plaintiffs then brought this action for breach of the second charter-party. By par. 2 of their points of claim they alleged that it was an implied term of the charter-party that the steamship should remain during the period of twelve months under the same flag; and that the plaintiffs entered into the contract on the basis of that implied term, as the defendants well knew; (par. 3) that further, or alternatively, it was an implied term of the second charter-party that the defendants would not lessen the beneficial user of the vessel to which the plaintiffs were entitled; (par. 4) that a steamship trading under the British flag was more valuable than a similar steamship trading under the Greek flag, by reason of the fact that shippers of general cargo were unwilling to ship such cargo on board Greek ships, and for that reason a Greek steamer could not be profitably employed in regular general cargo lines trading to and from the United Kingdom; and, further, that the insurance premiums charged on a Greek ship exceeded by about 50 per cent. the insurance premiums charged on a British ship; (par. 5) that in breach of the said implied terms the defendants during the second charter-party sold the steamship to a Greek subject, and procured the closing of the British register, and the steamship was transferred to the Greek flag and renamed; (par. 6) that by reason of the premises the steamship was delayed at Leghorn from 7 p.m. on the 8th Nov. until 8 p.m. on the 12th Nov. 1919; (par. 7) that by reason of the change of flag and name the plaintiffs were obliged to pay additional sums for insurance on cargo; (par. 8) that by reason of the change of flag and name the plaintiffs, during the remaining period of the second charter-party—namely, the 8th Dec. 1919 to the 21st Oct. 1920, had suffered damage by reason of increased insurance charges and increased difficulty of getting suitable and remunerative employment for the steamship. By par. 10 the plaintiffs alleged that it was necessary for the defendants before selling the steamship to obtain the consent of the British Shipping Controller, whose consent was given subject to a stipulation that the steamship should trade for twelve months within the United Kingdom only; and, by par. 11, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants, by selling the steamship, and rendering it subject to that stipulation, cut down the limits within which the steamship was authorised to trade under the charter-party, and thereby committed a breach of the charter-party, whereby the plaintiffs suffered damages, of which particulars were furnished. The plaintiffs claimed on all those alleged grounds 28,678*l.*

The defendants admitted the two charter-parties referred to and admitted that the steamship City of Hamburg was a British ship at the dates thereof. By par. 2 of their defence and counter-claim, the defendants denied the implied term alleged by the plaintiffs in par. 2 of the statement of claim, and denied that the second charter-party was entered into on such implied terms. By par. 3 the defendants denied the implied term alleged in par. 3 of the plaintiffs' points of claim. They denied that a vessel trading under the British flag was more valuable than a similar vessel under the Greek flag. They said that they were always ready and willing to perform, and could and would, have performed, any voyage within the limits of the charter-party of the 30th Aug. 1919.

Rowlatt, J.—In this case the plaintiffs chartered from the defendants a ship which was then called the City of Hamburg. It was not expressed in the charter-party that she was a British ship, but she was, in fact, a British ship; and the charter was a time charter taking effect, I think, from about Oct. 1919 until last Oct. It followed on a time charter of about four months, which the same charterers, the plaintiffs, had taken from the defendants, so that the plaintiffs knew the ship, although that is not stated.

Shortly after the second charter had been entered into the defendants sold the ship to a Greek gentleman, and her name was changed, and she sailed under the Greek flag. It is in those circumstances that this action is brought. I do not need to mention the steps that were taken to get an injunction, and so on; but what happened was that the plaintiffs have kept to the charter. I do not know whether they could have avoided it or not, and I am not inquiring as to that, and they have kept the services of the vessel, and the time has now expired, and I do not think that anything arises out of the fact of the sale viewed alone. The defendants reserved the right to perform the contract personally. I do not know exactly what is the effect of that when they are selling the ship to the subject of a foreign nationality, with the resulting change of flag, but, at any rate, the charter-party has been performed in the sense that the various voyages have been taken in accordance with the requirements within the charter-party of the charterer, and that is over. What remains is a complaint founded on the fact that these services have been performed with a vessel not of the British flag, but of the Greek flag, and it is said that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for that breach.

There was no implied warranty in this charter-party that she was a British ship because she was called the City of Hamburg. That is clear from the case of Clapham v. Cologan (3 Camp. 382) cited by Mr. Raeburn, but that does not arise. She was a British ship; if she had not been, the case of Clapham v. Cologan (sup.) shows that no claim could be made on the ground that she was called the City of Hamburg.

But she was a British ship, and the way in which it is put by Mr. Leck is that the act of the owner in changing her name and flag and in changing her from a British ship into a Greek ship—as an incident of the sale of the property in the vessel—gave the plaintiffs the services of a different ship from that for which they had contracted, and one which was less valuable.

There has been some little discussion at the Bar about the doctrine of implied terms in a charter-party, but it seems to me that when parties contract for services to be rendered by one of them by means of a specific chattel, that at any rate throws an implied undertaking on the part of the other contractor that the chattel shall not be altered so as to prejudice the services which are to be rendered by it. I think that is only a particular phase of the well-known principle laid down in Appleby v. Meyers (or Myers) (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2, C. P. 651), a decision at the root of the doctrine as to implied terms in contracts. If a specific thing is contracted for, the contract is not properly carried out if the thing is so altered as to render less valuable services or different services. I think that is the same thing put in different language.

So I think the question here is whether the change of flag was a material matter. Lots of changes can be made in a ship, I have no doubt, such as painting, altering the colour, altering the mast, or all sorts of things might be made, which should not, in my opinion, affect the contract at all but would affect only the question of damages.

The question I have to decide, then, is whether the change of flag was a material change in the nature of the subject matter; and it seems to me that I must answer that question affirmatively. I do not think it possible to hold that it made no difference under what flag the ship sailed.

The law of the flag has not only direct importance as regards the ship itself, but has also important collateral effects on, for example, the discipline of the ship and the moral of the crew, and many other such matters. This being so, the consideration therefore arises as to damages in any particular case. In my opinion, in the present case there was a breach of the charter-party by the change of the flag during the existence of that contract; and the question that remains is how much (if any) damages should be awarded.

I do not think that the damages are likely to be at all great; but I must give an opinion about them for the guidance of the arbitrator or referee. But I will say what I think about the damages because, even if I am right in deciding in favour of the plaintiffs, it may be that they would like to question my limitation of their damages, so I will say what I think about it and direct the arbitrator or referee accordingly. The first is in respect of delay at Leghorn. That has disappeared. The plaintiffs themselves are responsible for three of the four days claimed, and the other day was merely one day, as it appears from the log that the captain was engaged in starting his fires, I daresay, to start next day. But it is not claimed. Therefore, I do not think that I ought to allow anything under par. 6. Then in par. 7, the sum of 145*l.* is claimed because the plaintiffs are obliged, or ought, to insure themselves against any liability that they might come under to shippers on board the ship in respect of cargo, I suppose, already put on or contracted to be put on, because she changed her flag. I agree with Mr. Raeburn. I think they wasted their money. I do not see how they could be under any such liability, and I do not think they are entitled to anything for that. Then, under par. 8, I think they are entitled to get something. They say that there was increasing difficulty in getting suitable and remunerative employment for the steamship, mainly because shippers did not care for Greek ships, or their underwriters did not care for Greek ships. They have adduced evidence to that effect, although it is contradicted in a way that leaves room for its possibly being true to a certain extent, because the gentleman who gave evidence for the defendants agreed that, in the last few months, at any rate, people were beginning to be shy of Greek ships. But that is the evidence, and I think the plaintiffs are entitled to get a sum to represent the increased difficulty of getting suitable and remunerative employment. But if, and so far as, they have suffered damage by reason of delay or laziness on the part of the captain and crew, and so on, I do not think they can recover that in this action. That is not the damage that flows from the vessel's register being changed. Those damages flow from the breach of duty of the master and crew at the time, and should have been made the subject of that sort of charge. The only damage they are entitled to on this claim is a sum to represent the increased difficulty of getting suitable and remunerative employment for the vessel.

I give judgment for the plaintiffs, and I direct an inquiry before a referee with regard to the damages so resulting to them, and I give judgment for the defendants for an amount admittedly due to them under their counter-claim.

Judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim and for the defendants on the counterclaim.

LESLIE SHIPPING COMPANY v. WELSTEAD. (a)

Charter-party — Time charter — Monthly hire— Right of owners to withdraw steamer from services of charterers in default of payment—Measure of damages.

Under a time charter-party hire was to be paid monthly in advance, and in default of such payment the owners were to have the faculty of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers. The charterers did not pay the hire, and the owners withdrew the steamer from their service.

Held, that the owners were entitled to recover damages for the chartered period remaining after the withdrawal of the steamer from the charterers' service. The measure of such damages is the difference between the rate of hire provided in the charter-party and the market rate at the date of withdrawal.

ACTION in the Commercial Court, tried by Greer, J.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the breach of a charter-party. The charter-party was dated the 29th March 1920, and was in the form of the Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter 1912. It was made between the plaintiffs, the Leslie Steamship Company, the owners of the steamship Raithwaite, a vessel of about 5176 tons deadweight, summer freeboard inclusive of bunkers, and the defendant, Frederick Welstead, as charterer. By it the plaintiffs agreed to let, and the defendant to hire, the steamship Raithwaite for thirty-six calendar months from the time the vessel was delivered to the charterer as therein provided. It was also provided, inter alia, by clause 5, that the charterer should pay as hire 25s. per ton on the vessel's summer deadweight for the first twelve months, 22s. 6d. for the second twelve months, and 20s. for the third twelve months, from the time the steamship was placed at the disposal of the charterer, and so pro rata for any part of a month until delivery to the owners as therein stipulated; that the payment of the hire should be made in London in cash without discount monthly in advance; and that "In default of such payment or payments, as herein specified, the owners shall have the faculty of withdrawing the said steamer from the service of the charterers, without prejudice to any claim they (the owners) may otherwise have on the charterers under this charter." Clause 23 provided that the charterer should have the option of subletting the steamship, but the original charterer always to remain responsible to owners for due performance of the charter. The charter-party also provided that the owners should provide and pay for all provisions and wages for insurance of the ship, and all deck and engine room stores, and maintain the ship in an efficient state, and that the charterer should provide coal, fuel, water for boilers, &c.

On the 28th May 1920 the steamship was delivered to the defendant at Greenock, and the defendant duly paid the first and second month's hire, as provided by the charter. The defendant, however, did not pay the third month's hire due on the 28th July 1920, but in respect of that month's hire the parties agreed that two bills of exchange of that date should be accepted by the defendant payable thirty days after date, one for 6000*l.* and another for 500*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.* These bills were dishonoured on presentation, the defendant alleging that they were accepted subject to a condition which the plaintiffs had not fulfilled. The defendant did not pay the fourth month's hire, and on the 22nd Sept. 1920 the plaintiffs, claiming to do so under clause 5 of the charter-party, withdrew the steamship from the service of the defendant without prejudice to any claims they might have on the defendant under the charter-party.

On the 18th Feb. 1921 the plaintiffs, the shipowners, commenced an action against the defendant, the charterer, claiming damages for breach of the charter-party, and alternatively, for hire thereunder. The plaintiffs alleged that by reason of the defendant's breaches of the charter-party, they, the plaintiffs, had suffered damage, and had lost the amount of hire for which the defendant was liable under the charter-party during the remainder of the chartered period, or alternatively the difference between the amount for which the steamer could on the date of withdrawal have been let in the market upon similar terms. The plaintiffs claimed 184,610*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, being the total amount of the hire under the charter-party for the remaining two years and eight months of the chartered period, or, alternatively, 76,501*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, being the difference between the total amount of hire, and hire for the remainder of the chartered period at the rate ruling at the date of withdrawal at which the steamer could have been let in the market, less credit for certain bunker coal, 3,920*l.*

The defendant pleaded (inter alia) that the alleged damage was too remote and not recoverable. The defendant alleged that he had suffered damage, and counterclaimed sums amounting to over 70,000*l.* At the trial the parties agreed that the plaintiffs' damages should be estimated at 47,743*l.*, subject to the determination of the question of law.

GREER, J.—This is an action by Messrs. Leslie, trading as the Leslie Shipping Company, for hire due under a charter-party, less certain credits, and for damages arising from the withdrawal of the vessel in consequence of the defendant's non-payment of hire according to the terms of the charter-party. The charter-party was dated the 29th March 1920, and was for thirty-six months, and it began to run on the 28th May 1920. At the date of the withdrawal two months' hire was due. For one of these two months a bill of exchange had been given, but the bill was dishonoured. The other month's hire had not been paid at all, though it was like the other, due in advance. The question which I have to decide is whether or not, on account of the withdrawal of the vessel in those circumstances, the plaintiffs are entitled to say that, by reason of the defendant's breach of contract, they have lost the benefit of the hire for the rest of the charter-party period, and are therefore entitled to damages based upon the difference between the charter rate and the best possible rate that they could have got during that period outside the charter-party.

The question turns on clause 5 of the charter-party. It is said for the plaintiffs that the damages which they claim—namely, the loss of the chartered hire less the earnings that could be got by the vessel free from the charter, are the natural and probable consequence of the non-payment in advance of the hire fixed by the charter-party. It is said, on the part of the defendant, that these damages are due to the withdrawal of the vessel from the charter-party by the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs' only remedy in these circumstances is to claim for hire at the agreed rate up to the date when they withdrew the vessel from the service of the defendant, and to get their vessel back by withdrawal, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to put themselves in the same position as if the defendant had adhered to the terms of the charter-party during the whole term thereof.

It seems to me that the point is not free from difficulty, and if I had not already expressed my opinion upon it in a previous case tried by me (Merlin Steamship Company v. Welstead (The Kenmare) (unreported) April 5, 28, 29, 1921), I might have taken time to consider the point.

On the whole, my view is that the damages arise as the natural and probable consequence of the defendants' breach of contract in failing to pay the two instalments of hire which were due at the date of the withdrawal of the vessel by the plaintiffs from the defendant's service. What were the circumstances between the parties? The vessel was in the hands of the defendant under this charter-party when the market was going against him. He gave bills for one month's hire which were not met by him; and, in addition, when another bill for another month's hire matured he did not pay that next monthly hire. Would not any shipowner be entitled to conclude in such a case that the charterer did not intend to pay the hire during the subsequent months of the charter? The defendant's own bill for one month's hire he had allowed to be dishonoured; a person in business rarely does that if he can possibly avoid it; and when the next month's hire became due he did not pay it. I think that, apart altogether from clause 5 of the charter-party, such conduct on the part of the defendant would, I think, amount in law to a repudiation of a fundamental part of this contract, and would entitle the plaintiffs to treat it as at an end. Clause 5 was inserted in the charter-party for the benefit of the shipowners, and not to their detriment, and it seems to me to follow that they possess under it the express right of withdrawing the vessel. It becomes impossible, therefore, that there should be any discussion about it. It seems to me that this clause cannot be treated as cutting down the rights which the plaintiffs would have had in the absence of such a clause.

For these reasons I am against the somewhat belated argument that has been put forward on behalf of the defendant, and my judgment is that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover not only the hire due on the 22nd Sept. 1920, when the plaintiffs withdrew the vessel, and to withdraw the vessel, but also to damages the amount of which has been agreed, calculated on the basis of the evidence that has been given. The amount agreed is 47,743*l.*, and there will be judgment for that amount, without prejudice to any further action by the defendant on his counter-claim. If the defendant thinks that there is any substance in his counter-claim for damages, he can bring an action.

ARMOUR AND CO. LIMITED v. LEOPOLD WALFORD (LONDON) LIMITED. (a)

Bill of lading—Special form—Reasonableness—"On deck" clause—Duty of shipowner to give notice to shipper of intention to carry on deck—Booking slip.

The plaintiffs shipped a quantity of candles on board the defendants' steamer for carriage from London to Antwerp, on the terms of a booking slip which the defendants had given to the plaintiffs, and which was approved of by the plaintiffs. The booking slip was as follows (inter alia): "We beg to confirm freight engagement. . . . All engagements are made subject to the conditions, terms, and (or) exceptions of our bills of lading and also to the conditions and (or) regulations of any steamboat, railway, or canal company by whom the goods may be conveyed and all goods are at the risk of senders or owners thereof until actually shipped on board the steamer. No insurances of any description are booked without special instructions. No cargo shipped unless Walford Line's Bills of Lading are used; no other bills of lading accepted." The goods were shipped on the 18th March 1919, and a bill of lading, dated the 19th March, was given to the plaintiffs. By clause 11 of the bill of lading it was provided that: "The company has the right to carry the goods below deck and (or) on deck, and in branch steamers, coasting or river steamers or vessels and (or) lighters, launches, or boats, and to land or store goods for the purpose of transhipment, reshipment, or further carriage, and shall have the right to sub-contract in respect of any such carriage or part thereof, and shall not be liable for any loss, damage, or injury within the exceptions in this bill of lading whether due to negligence or not, but such exceptions shall apply to carriage by such sub-contractors as if such sub-contractors were specifically mentioned in the said exceptions."

The goods were stowed on the deck of the defendants' vessel, and there was no suggestion of any carelessness in the way they were arranged and protected. No notice was given to the plaintiffs by the defendants that the goods were, or would be, carried on deck. While on the voyage from London to Antwerp the goods were damaged by sea-water through the ordinary perils of the sea. The plaintiffs claimed damages for alleged breach of contract by the defendants in relation to the carriage of the goods.

Held (1) that the plaintiffs were bound by clause 11 of the bill of lading, notwithstanding its unusual character, because they had accepted the booking slip, which provided that the goods were to be shipped under the defendants' special form of bill of lading, and clause 11 applied to the goods actually named in the bill of lading; (2) the defendants were entitled to stow the candles on deck; (3) there was no implied condition that the defendants should give the plaintiffs notice that the goods in question would be carried on deck, and (4) the defendants were therefore not liable for damages.

ACTION in the Commercial List, tried by McCardie, J.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for alleged breach of contract in relation to the carriage of a certain quantity of candles from London to Antwerp. The plaintiffs were the owners of the goods in question, and the defendants were shipowners who ran a line of steamships to continental ports. In March 1919 the plaintiffs wished to ship 25 tons of candles from London to Antwerp. They communicated with the defendants and, as a result, the defendants sent them a booking slip, confirming the freight engagement and providing (inter alia) that "all engagements are made subject to the conditions, terms . . . of our bills of lading . . . No cargo shipped unless Walford Line's Bills of Lading are used; no other bills of lading accepted." The plaintiffs approved of this booking slip, and a portion of the 25 tons of candles was shipped on the defendants' steamship on the 18th March, and on the 19th March a bill of lading was given to the plaintiffs, which contained a clause providing that the company had the right to carry the goods below deck and (or) on deck.

The plaintiffs' goods were placed on the deck of the defendants' ship. There was no carelessness on the part of the defendants in the way they were arranged or protected. But they were damaged by sea water, through the ordinary "perils of the sea," on the voyage from London to Antwerp. The amount of the damages was agreed at 1235*l.* The defendants had not given the plaintiffs any special notice that these goods would be carried on deck.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and D. Nowill Pritt (H. M. Paul with them) for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28.—McCARDIE, J. read the following judgment.—The plaintiffs, as owners of goods shipped on board a steamer of the defendants, claim damages for breach of contract. The defendants run a line of steamships to continental ports. In March 1919 the plaintiffs wished to send 25 tons of candles from London to Antwerp. They communicated with the defendants. As a result, the defendants sent to the plaintiffs a booking slip dated the 5th March 1919. So far as material it said: "We beg to confirm freight engagement as follows" (then followed a statement of cargo, rate, port of shipment, and port of destination). The slip proceeded as follows: "All engagements are made subject to the conditions, terms, and (or) exceptions of our bills of lading and also to the conditions and (or) regulations of any steamboat, railway or canal company by whom the goods may be conveyed and all goods are at the risk of senders or owners thereof until actually shipped on board the steamer. No insurances of any description are booked without special instructions. No cargo shipped unless Walford Line's Bills of Lading are used; no other bills of lading accepted." The plaintiffs approved the booking slip. The statement of claim expressly alleges that this slip was part of the bargain between the parties.

A portion of the 25 tons was shipped on the defendant's steamship Poldiep on or about the 18th March 1919, and a bill of lading dated the 19th March was given to the plaintiffs. It is as to these goods that the claim arises. The bill contains many clauses. Clause 11 is the only one material to be set out. It is as follows: Clause 11: "The Company has the right to carry the goods below deck and (or) on deck, and in branch steamers, coasting or river steamers or vessels, and (or) lighters, launches or boats, and to land or store goods for the purposes of transhipment, re-shipment, or further carriage and shall have the right to sub-contract in respect of any such carriage or part thereof and shall not be liable for any loss, damage or injury within the exceptions in this bill of lading whether due to negligence or not, but such exceptions shall apply to carriage by such sub-contractors as if such sub-contractors were specifically mentioned in the said exceptions."

I may mention that clause 1 of the bill of lading refers to many classes of goods, ranging from gold dust to statuary, bank notes to laces and furs, and that clause 2 contains a widely-worded negligence and perils of the sea clause in favour of the shipowners. The goods were placed on the deck of the Poldiep. It is not suggested that there was any carelessness in the way they were arranged or protected. Whilst on the voyage to Antwerp they were injured by sea water, through the ordinary "perils of the sea." The damage is agreed at 1235*l*.

Such are the broad facts. I take in order the contentions of the plaintiffs, and I will briefly state as to each contention such further facts as are relevant. In the first place, the plaintiffs assert that they are not bound by clause 11 of the bill of lading; that defendants therefore wrongfully placed the candles on deck, and not below deck; and that defendants are consequently hit by the rule stated in art. 48 of Scrutton and Mackinnon on Charter-parties, 10th edit.—that the effect of unauthorised deck storage is to set aside the exception of the bill of lading, and to render the shipowner liable under his contract of carriage for damage happening to the goods so stored.

The plaintiffs assert that clause 11 was unusual; that it was not specifically drawn to their attention; that they were not aware of it, and therefore are not bound by its provisions. I cannot accept this contention of the plaintiffs. I think they are clearly bound by clause 11. They had accepted the booking slip, which provided that the goods were to be shipped under the defendants' special form of bill of lading and none other. The bill of lading is made out in accordance with the booking slip. The form used has been unvaryingly employed by the defendants for seven or eight years, and clause 11 has for that period appeared as it is now. The defendants have but one form of bill of lading. In 1916 and 1917 the plaintiffs made several shipments with the defendants under similar bills of lading with a like clause.

Moreover, in the present case, the plaintiffs' traffic manager got from his stationers several printed forms of the defendants' bill of lading, and sent those forms to the defendants, who signed them and then forwarded them to the plaintiffs. They are the bills of lading for the goods now in question. I hold that the plaintiffs in fact accepted them, as they were bound to accept them, as bills of lading in proper form. Counsel for the defendants called my attention to Carver on Carriage by Sea (6th edit., s. 122), where the learned author considers whether a bill of lading is to be taken as a conclusive statement of the contract of carriage. Several useful cases are there cited. In my view, a bill of lading is not, as between shipper and shipowner, conclusive of the true contract. It may, for example, be inconsistent with a prior overriding, and express written bargain as to the terms on which goods shall be carried or the form in which bills of lading shall be issued.

The law is stated somewhat favourably to the shipper in the article by the late Kennedy, L.J. in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 26, p. 148, where he says: "In some cases the bill of lading is to be regarded as evidence only of a pre-existing contract" (see per Lord Bramwell in Sewell v. Burdick (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 376; 52 L. T. Rep. 445; 10 App. Cas. 74) and Wagstaff v. Anderson (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 42 L. T. Rep. 720; 5 C. P. Div. 171) "and the person accepting it is not necessarily bound by all its stipulations" (Crooks and Co. v. Allan (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 216; 41 L. T. Rep. 800; 5 Q. B. Div. 38) and Lewis v. M'Kee (19 L. T. Rep. 522; L. Rep. 4 Ex. Ch. 58) "but may be entitled to repudiate them on the ground that he did not know, and could not reasonably be expected to know, of their existence, his assent to them is not to be inferred from his acceptance of the bill of lading without objection" (Crooks and Co. v. Allan (sup.). I respectfully doubt if this passage adequately distinguishes between the mere physical receipt of the bill of lading and the mental acceptance of it, whether it has or has not been fully read by the shipper. It must be remembered that the Statute of Frauds does not ordinarily apply to a contract for carriage by sea. The bargain may be collected from various documents or other sources: (see Carver on Carriage by Sea (6th edit., s. 53) and Scrutton on Charter-parties (art. 8).

Whatever the prior express bargain has been, a shipper is free to accept any bills of lading he chooses. If, therefore, he has chosen to receive without protest a bill of lading in a certain form he should ordinarily be bound by it, for as Mr. Carver well observes in sect. 56 of his book: "Where that has been done it is difficult to suppose that the document can be treated as not being what it seems to be." That learned author proceeds: "The practice of looking to it as a contract may be said to be uniform and, indeed, has been adopted by the Legislature (Bills of Lading Act 1855); and the scarcity of authority is in truth a strong confirmation of the view that it is the contract; for it shows that in practice the point has not been considered open to question."

Here the plaintiffs, I am satisfied, actually accepted the bill of lading in question as the bargain for carriage. From whatever point of view the case is regarded, be it on the principle of Richardson Spence, and Co. v. Rowntree (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 482; 70 L. T. Rep. 817; (1894) A. C. 217) or on the point that the bill accorded with the provisions of the booking-slip or the ground that the plaintiffs actually accepted the bill of lading, they are bound by clause 11.

The print of clause 11 is small, and in this connection Crooks and Co. v. Allan (sup.), Roe v. Naylor, Limited (116 L. T. Rep. 542; (1917) 1 K. B. 712), and Gibaud v. Great Eastern Railway Company (125 L. T. Rep. 76; (1921) 2 K. B. 426) were cited before me. Clause 11, however, is in clear print. It is as plain as the other clauses, and it takes its due place in the sequence of clauses. It is perfectly legible. The cases just cited do not therefore require consideration.

Mr. Raeburn, counsel for the plaintiffs, next contended that, assuming the plaintiffs to be bound by clause 11, yet this clause only applied to the classes of goods which, in the ordinary course of shipping, and according to the ordinary practice of shipowners, were usually placed on deck and not below deck. In my opinion, this contention also fails. Clause 11 would scarcely be needed if its application were limited to goods which, by usual practice, would be placed on deck. Its central object, I think, is to give the shipowners a right to stow on deck those goods which ordinarily would be placed below deck. The clause is very broadly worded. It contains no hint of limitation as to the class of goods to which it applies. Primâ facie it applies to all goods. I see no ground for cutting down its primâ facie effect. It is part of a body of clauses which includes clause 1. Clause 1, as I have already pointed out, refers to goods of many sorts. In actual practice, moreover, the defendants have carried on deck articles of all kinds—from wheat to lace. This is not unusual with shipowners when carrying on short sea routes. The words of the clause are: "The company has the right to carry the goods below deck and (or) on deck." It seems plain to me that those words refer and must refer to the goods actually named in the bill of lading. Here those goods were the candles in question, and in my view the defendants had the contractual right to stow them on deck.

I respectfully agree with the statement in Scrutton and Mackinnon on Charter-parties (10th edit., pp. 283-4, notes to art. 99), that clauses in a bill of lading must be construed in the light of the commercial adventure undertaken by the shipowner. The decisions upon clauses giving leave "to call at any ports" or "to call at any ports in any order" indicate the restriction which may be placed on language of apparent breadth. But in the present case the words are broad and clear, and I see no method of cutting down their operation, save in such a way as to defeat the very object of the clause itself.

The final point for decision arises on the able argument of counsel for the plaintiffs that the defendants here owed a contractual duty to the plaintiffs to inform them that the goods were about to be or had been placed on deck and not below deck, so as thereby to enable the plaintiffs to effect an appropriate and valid insurance if they so wished.

It is admitted that the plaintiffs were not in fact aware until the goods had actually reached Antwerp on the 26th March 1919, that they had been stowed on deck. The importance of the contention of the plaintiffs lies in the fact that they had actually wished and intended that the goods should be stowed below deck and not on deck. They had taken out ordinary insurance policies which did not provide for cargo carried on deck. Hence the plaintiffs are hit by rule 17 of the Rules for Construction of Policy under the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and cannot recover against their underwriters. They submit that I ought to read an implied condition into the contract that the defendants were under the circumstances bound to notify them of the stowage on deck. It was admitted by one of the defendants' managers, in evidence, that the defendants, as a matter of courtesy, often notify cargo-owners of an on-deck shipment so as to enable due insurance to be made. It was also stated by a witness for the plaintiffs (the shipping manager of a continental line of steamers who use the "on deck" clause) that if they found they had to put a consignment on deck they would thereupon inform the consignor of the fact.

The point before me, however, is not a question of courtesy but of legal obligation. The ever-recurring case of The Moorcock (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 373; 60 L. T. Rep. 654; 14 Prob. Div. 64) has offered itself for consideration. There Bowen, L.J. said (14 P. D., at p. 68): "The implication which the law draws from what must obviously have been the intention of the parties, the law draws with the object of giving efficacy to the transaction and preventing such a failure of consideration as cannot have been within the contemplation of either side." But the equally recurring case of Hamlyn and Co. v. Wood and Co. (65 L. T. Rep. 286; (1891) 2 Q. B. 488) has also been cited. There Lord Esher said (1891, 2 Q. B., at p. 491): "I have for a long time understood that rule to be that the Court has no right to imply in a written contract any such stipulation, unless, on considering the terms of the contract in a reasonable and business manner, an implication necessarily arises that the parties must have intended that the suggested stipulation should exist. It is not enough to say that it would be a reasonable thing to make such an implication. It must be a necessary implication in the sense that I have mentioned."

From the above two fertile decisions a vast crop of later cases has been begotten. The principle, however, remains unchanged in spite of the aggregation of case law on the matter. Now, in this litigation before me I cannot create the implied obligation suggested by the plaintiffs. Notice to the plaintiffs by the defendants of "on deck" stowage was not essential to the efficacy of the contract of carriage by sea. The bill of lading was a complete and effective and workable document without any implication of a duty to give notice. Insurance was a collateral thing. It was a matter for the plaintiffs alone. It did not touch the defendants. By the terms of the booking slip the defendants clearly, though impliedly, disclaimed responsibility for insurance. The plaintiffs knew the terms of the contract of carriage. They were aware of clause 11. There was nothing to prevent them from taking out a policy to cover the contingencies which might arise under that clause 11. The extent of such a policy was a matter for them and not for the defendants. The "on deck" clause is well known. It has existed on numerous lines for many years. Why should the defendants assume that the plaintiffs had not got an adequate assurance? The matter lay within the plaintiffs' concern alone. It seems to me also that the plaintiffs had as much opportunity of knowledge as the defendants. In an earlier shipment of part of the total lot of candles, the plaintiffs' superintendent had watched its stowage on board the steamship Abeille. There was nothing to prevent an agent for them from ascertaining whether the candles in question were placed below deck or on deck of the Poldiep. If I were to hold that the obligation to give notice existed on the facts before me, it would follow, as Mr. Wright, counsel for the defendants pointed out, that an equal obligation would be cast on the defendant with respect to transhipment or reshipment and the other matters referred to in clause 11.

Mr. Raeburn, counsel for the plaintiffs, cited the case of Hood v. West End Motor Car Packing Company (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 12; 116 L. T. Rep. 365; (1917) 2 K. B. 426), where the Court of Appeal held that an implied term existed, as between assured and underwriters, that notice should be given to the underwriters within a reasonable time after the assured knew that a motor-car, the subject of an insurance policy, was being carried on deck. That case turned, however, upon the particular requirements of insurance law, as between assured and underwriter, with respect to the Marine Insurance Act 1906 and the Institute Cargo Clause. It is, in my view, plainly distinguishable from the facts now before me. I cannot here imply a condition requiring the defendants to notify the plaintiffs of the stowage on deck.

I am indebted to the leading counsel for the plaintiffs for his able arguments, but, in my opinion, the action fails and must be dismissed with costs.

THE JAMES W. ELWELL. (a)

Bottomry bond — Maritime risk — Voyage undefined in the bond — Validity of the bond — Co-ownership — Writ of fi. fa. — Seizure of the ship by the sheriff — Action in rem — Arrest by the Marshal of the Admiralty — Sale by the Marshal — Necessaries men — Execution creditors — Priorities.

A bottomry bond must define the voyage of which the lender undertakes the maritime risk. An instrument is not a bottomry bond, notwithstanding that the parties to it describe it as such, if its terms provide nothing to prevent the lender demanding repayment at any time, even before the ship has sailed from the port where the bond was given, or if, by leaving undefined the time when repayment shall become due, it enables the lender to maintain a secret maritime lien on the ship at his pleasure.

In determining priorities between necessaries men and execution creditors for whom the sheriff has seized a ship under a writ of fi. fa., the execution creditors will be preferred to the necessaries men, since the former are secured creditors from the time of seizure, whilst the latter have only acquired a security for such sums as they may become entitled to under a subsequent judgment.

An American ship, which was jointly owned by two sets of American owners, was seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. in execution of a judgment recovered in the King's Bench Division against one set of owners. Soon afterwards she was arrested by the Marshal of the Admiralty at the suit of parties suing in rem for necessaries. Other necessaries men subsequently commenced proceedings, and either effected arrest or entered caveats. The ship was then sold by the Marshal acting with the consent of all parties.

An action was then commenced against her by parties claiming to be holders of a bottomry bond. The bond had been given by the master some months previously in order to provide funds to free his vessel from arrests under which she then lay. By the terms of the bond, which described itself as a bottomry bond, the master agreed "to bond and lien the ship" in the amount advanced, the lenders "to have absolute lien upon the vessel until the said loan is repaid," and undertook to draw no other bond on the ship without the consent of the lenders. In an action on this bond the execution creditors under the judgment in the King's Bench Division intervened.

Held, that this bond was void. No time was fixed for repayment. The loan was therefore repayable on demand, and there was nothing in the documents to prevent the plaintiffs demanding repayment before the ship sailed from the port where the bond was given. Nor was there anything to prevent them from allowing the loan to run on indefinitely and maintaining a maritime lien on the ship all the time. The execution creditors and the necessaries men who had established their right in rem were, therefore, entitled to the proceeds of the sale.

As between these claimants, held that the sheriff could effectually seize the shares in a foreign ship, to which no statutory restriction to the contrary applied, in the same way that he could seize an undivided share in any other chattel; but that, on the other hand, seizure by the sheriff did not deprive the Marshal of his power to arrest the ship, since both were alike the servants of the court.

It followed that the execution creditors were secured creditors from the moment of seizure; as such they ought to enjoy priority to the necessaries men who had only obtained a security for sums to which they might become entitled under a subsequent judgment. The rule of the Admiralty Court that necessaries men shared in the proceeds of a sale pari passu without regard to the dates of arrest and judgment should not be extended to include execution creditors.

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The shares held by those owners against whom judgment had been signed in the King's Bench Division were, therefore, ordered to be paid out to the execution creditors. The shares held by the other owners were ordered to be paid out to the necessaries men, ranking pari passu.

MOTION by the holders of a bond alleged to be a bottomry bond asking for a declaration of the validity of the bond and for payment out of court of the proceeds of the sale of the American sailing vessel, James W. Elwell, execution creditors under a judgment of the King's Bench Division intervening.

The James W. Elwell was an American sailing vessel of which, in Aug. 1920, 56-64th parts were owned by the Northland Navigation Company and one Clarke, and the remaining 8-64th parts by one Morrey. On the 4th Aug. 1920 judgment was signed in the King's Bench Division against the Northland Company and Clark by the Svenska Stenkols Aktiebolaget Carl Schylter of Stockholm. On the 5th Aug. 1920 a writ of fi. fa. was issued in respect of this judgment, and on the same day an action in rem was begun by the American Union Line, claiming for necessaries. On the following day the ship was seized at Falmouth by the sheriff, and very shortly afterwards, on the same day, was arrested by the Marshal of the Admiralty in the action by the American Union Line, both writs being duly nailed to the mast of the vessel.

Other actions were subsequently begun in rem against the James W. Elwell, in each of which caveats were duly entered. Motions for judgment in default of appearance came before the court at various dates, and a reference was subsequently held.

The sheriff attempted to sell the ship on two occasions, but failed to find a buyer, and she was eventually sold on the motion of Messrs. MacLeod and Hill Limited, one of the necessaries claimants by the Marshal acting with the consent of all parties.

The claimants against the proceeds of the sale then were:

Messrs. MacLeod and Hill Limited, shipbrokers, for necessaries. At the reference it was established that their claim was not for necessaries, but it was agreed by all parties that an advance of £200 made for the payment of the wages of the crew should be deemed to have been made with the consent of the court, and should carry a lien.

The Master of the James W. Elwell, for wages and disbursements.

Mr. Brunt, the proprietor of the Sailors' Home at Swansea, for necessaries.

Messrs. Samuel and Co., for necessaries.

The American Union Line, recognising that their claims were not for necessaries, did not take part in the reference.

After the sale an action was begun against the ship by the American Express Company, who claimed to be the holders of a bond of bottomry. This document, the terms of which are fully set out in his Lordship's judgment, was executed by the master at Bordeaux in September 1919, at a time when the James W. Elwell was lying at Bordeaux under arrest in claims for necessaries. The bond secured advances by means of which the vessel was released, and proceeded on her voyage to Barry. The American Express Company, in their action, sought a declaration of the validity of the bond, and asked for judgment upon it in default of appearance. The execution creditors, the Svenska Company, intervened.

June 13.—HILL, J.—This ship, the James W. Elwell was an American ship. On the 6th Aug. 1920 at Falmouth she was seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. issued on the 5th Aug. 1920, and received by the sheriff on the 6th Aug. This writ was in execution of a judgment signed on 4th Aug. 1920 and obtained by the Svenska Stenkols Aktiebolaget Carl Schylter, of Stockholm, in the King's Bench Division. A few minutes after the seizure by the sheriff the ship was arrested by the Marshal in a suit in rem for necessaries brought by the American Union Line against the owners of the James W. Elwell by a writ issued on the 5th Aug. 1920. Other actions in rem were brought against the owners, and either the ship was arrested or caveats were entered in respect of the following claims: Messrs. McLeod and Hill Limited, for necessaries, writ issued on the 5th Aug. 1920; Mr. Reid, master, for wages, writ issued on the 7th Aug. 1920; Mr. Brunt, for necessaries, writ issued the 9th Aug. 1920; and Messrs. Samuel and Co., for necessaries, writ issued the 12th Aug. 1920.

Since the sale, to be presently mentioned, a suit in bottomry has been brought by the American Express Company by writ in rem issued on the 20th Dec. 1920. No appearance has been entered to any of these writs. The sheriff made two attempts to sell, on the 26th Aug. and the 14th Sept. 1920. There were no bids. That is not surprising in a sheriff's sale. Unlike the Marshal, he could not give a title clear of maritime liens, and buyers would naturally hesitate to buy from the sheriff a ship under the arrest of the Marshal. In the interval between the two attempts McLeod and Hill Limited moved for appraisement and sale. On the 9th Sept. 1920 an order was made in their action. This order directed an appraisement and sale by the Marshal without prejudice to the priorities of the claimants in rem, and reserving the rights of the judgment creditors, and it condemned the ship and proceeds in the costs of the motion and in the costs of similar actions by the master, Mr. Brunt, and Messrs. Samuel and Co., and of the attendance on counsel for the sheriff and for the judgment creditors, the Svenska Company. The order was made with the consent of all those persons, and, though not so expressed in the order, with the consent of the American Union Line. The Marshal sold. Together with the ship he sold a small quantity of cargo on board, which has turned out to be the property of the Svenska Company. To the proceeds of that coal, less a proper proportion of the Marshal's expenses of sale, no one has any right except the Svenska Company. The fund resulting from the sale of this ship is not enough to pay all the claimants to it. It has, therefore, to be determined which of the claimants are entitled to claim against the fund, and it is also necessary to determine the priorities.

I will first consider who has a claim enforceable by an action in rem. The American Union Line obtained a judgment in default, but recognising that they could not establish that their advances were for necessaries, they did not proceed to a reference. They have no right in rem. McLeod and Hill Limited obtained a judgment in default, but upon a reference it was found that their advances were not for necessaries. They have no right in rem. Their advances included a sum of 200*l*. advanced for payment of wages. They made that advance in the erroneous belief that they would stand in the shoes of the crew. The payment of course cleared away a maritime lien. Very properly all parties have assented to McLeod and Hill being treated as if they had paid the 200*l*. with the sanction of the court. The master has established his claim, which of course carries a maritime lien and a right in rem. Mr. Brunt and Messrs. Samuel and Co. have established their claims for necessaries. They have a right in rem. There remains the claim of the American Express Company to bottomry.

Have the American Express Company a good claim in bottomry against the proceeds of the ship in court? The facts, important for the present purpose, are as follows: The ship, of American nationality, was at Bordeaux, under arrest, in Sept. 1919, in claims for necessaries. The plaintiffs, the American Express Company, had made considerable advances to the owners to clear the arrests. They made a further advance of 20,000 francs on the terms of the document on which they rely as a bottomry bond. The ship was about to make a voyage from Bordeaux to Barry with pit props, and was under charter-party to the Svenska Company for a coal voyage from Swansea to Stockholm. The voyage from Bordeaux to Barry was performed, the vessel arriving at Barry on the 11th Oct. 1919. From Barry the ship went to Swansea, and began to load under the charter-party. Her owners then refused to perform the charter-party. The Svenska Company issued a writ, and obtained an injunction, with the result that the ship lay at Swansea until the sale by the marshal. The Svenska Company have intervened in the bottomry action, and they say that the alleged bottomry bond is not a bottomry bond at all, and that, therefore, the American Express Company have no maritime lien.

As to the bond, firstly the original has been lost, but I accept the copy which has been produced as a true copy. Secondly, the necessity for the loan was not disputed, before the evidence produced by the American Express Company. The ship was tied up by the arrests and could not move until they were cleared and the master had the actual authority of the owners. Thirdly, it is clear that the intention of the parties was that the advance up to 20,000 francs should be on terms of bottomry. The question is whether they have succeeded in creating a valid contract of bottomry. The document is as follows:—

Bordeaux (Gironde), France, September 13, 1919.—Bond of bottomry between A. C. Clark, master of the American schooner James W. Elwell, of Portland, Maine, and the American Express Company, 3, Cours de Gourgue. Bordeaux.—I, A. C. Clark, master of the schooner James W. Elwell, do hereby agree to bond and lien the said schooner together with her furniture, sails, gear and future earnings to the amount of francs 20,000 for value received, said American Express Company to have absolute lien upon vessel until said loan is repaid together with interest accrued and all other charges relating thereto. I further state that the said vessel was built at Bath, Maine, U.S.A., in the year 1892, and is 196$\frac{3}{10}$ feet in length, 39$\frac{2}{10}$ feet in width, 18$\frac{3}{10}$ feet deep, and that she is of 1192 tons gross and 1081 tons net, as appears by Permanent Register No. 11, issued at Portland, Maine, the 3rd March 1919. This vessel at this date first above written is valued at about 150,000 dollars, and there are no previous attachments against her, to the best of my knowledge and belief, and I further agree not to draw any further bond on the said ship without first having consent from the American Express Company.

Is this an effective bottomry bond or not? Whether it is or not must be gathered from the document itself.

In The Emancipation (1 Wm. Rob. 124) Dr. Lushington said, at p. 128: "I shall assume that it was the intention of the contracting parties at the time the bond was executed, to give a good and valid bottomry in the legal and strict sense of the term. Assuming this, I am still of opinion that such mere intention alone is not sufficient for the validity of an instrument of this description, and that this court cannot pronounce in favour of any bond, unless it shall appear in express terms, or by necessary inference from the contents of the bond itself, that the transaction was founded upon a bottomry consideration. The rule of law that the meaning of written instruments must be construed by the tenor of their contents alone, is strictly applicable to cases of this kind. I must, therefore, look to the bond itself in the present instance, without referring to extrinsic evidence at all; and unless I can come to the conclusion from the words of the bond, that any maritime risk is to be directly or indirectly inferred, I must hold that I have no authority to pronounce in favour of its validity."

Compare with this The Indomitable (Swa. 446), where the learned judge says, at p. 452: "There must be a maritime risk in the instrument; it matters not in what form of words." In Simonds v. Hodgson (3 B. & Ad. 50) it was said at p. 57: "No person can be entitled to it (maritime interest) who does not take upon himself the peril of the voyage; but it is not necessary that his doing so shall be declared expressly and in terms, though this is often done, it is sufficient that the fact can be collected from the language of the instrument considered in all its parts."

It is said that such bonds should receive a liberal interpretation. Be it so, but the document, given a liberal interpretation, must be one which shows the essentials of a bottomry contract. One of these essentials is often spoken of as a maritime risk. This means that the repayment of the money advanced shall be conditional upon the safe arrival of the ship. The Emancipation (sup.), at p. 131. That is the meaning of the necessity of sea risk. Compare Stainband v. Shepard (22 L. J. Ex. 341) at p. 346, where it is said (by Parke, B.): "It is essential to the validity of hypothecation that the sea risk should be incurred by the lender, and that the pledge in the ship should take effect only in the event of its safe arrival."

It is said that the use of the word "bottomry" shows that the lender was lending on terms of some maritime risk. It may be so. In The Royal Arch (Swa. 267), at p. 281, Dr. Lushington said: "The very term bottomry implies sea risk." Compare also the language of Dr. Lushington in The Emancipation (sup.), at p. 130, where that learned judge pointed out that: "hypothecate" may mean bottomry or mortgage only. And if you have a voyage described, and the contract is expressed to be one of bottomry, there is little difficulty in inferring that the condition of repayment is the safe arrival on that voyage.

But what can be inferred from the word "bottomry" detached from any voyage or anything to denote when the voyage is to begin and when to end? To have a good contract of bottomry you must have a loan with repayment conditional upon safe arrival, that is to say, you must have a voyage the sea risk of which is to be run by the lender.

If further authority is necessary Lord Stowell in The Atlas (2 Hag. Adm. 48), at p. 53, said: "The definition of bottomry bonds, which I find in all the writers that have adverted to the subject, are contracts in the nature of mortgages of a ship on which the borrower borrows money to enable him to fit out the ship or to purchase a cargo for a voyage proposed, and pledges the keel or bottom of the ship, pars pro tanto as a security for repayment. It is, moreover, stipulated that if the ship is lost in the course of the voyage by any of the perils enumerated in the contract, the lender also shall lose his money; but if a ship shall arrive safe, then he shall be paid back his principal, and also the interest agreed upon, called maritime interest, however this may exceed the legal rate of interest."

No single case has been cited in which there was no voyage specified in the bond, with one exception which proves the rule, namely The Jane (1 Dod. 461), at p. 463, where it was said: "This furnishes an answer also to the other objection that the particular voyage on which the ship was destined was not stated in the bond. It is impossible that the master should describe the voyage with precision, because he is subject to the orders of the Government, which may at any time alter the destination of the vessel at its pleasure; the master can only come cy près; he must describe his voyage as near as he can."

If there is no voyage at all described, there is nothing to prevent the loan being immediately repayable, or to make repayment conditional on the ship surviving any particular risk. Or, on the other hand, there is nothing to prevent the lender from indefinitely postponing a demand for repayment, and leaving the ship for years subject to a secret maritime lien.

It is said for the plaintiffs that this bond became payable on the vessel's arrival at Barry. The bond does not say so, nor can anything of the kind be implied from its terms. The bond is a contract whereby, in consideration of an advance, the plaintiffs are given an absolute lien on the ship and her future earnings. As no time is fixed for payment the loan is repayable on demand. I see nothing in this document to prevent the plaintiffs demanding repayment before the ship left Bordeaux. On the other hand, I see nothing to prevent them letting the loan run on indefinitely, and maintaining a secret maritime lien on the ship all the time. Called a bond of bottomry it is really only an attempt to create a lien to secure a loan. But it is not a mortgage. I hold it to be void. Therefore, it is unnecessary to decide the question whether the plaintiffs were not so slow in asserting their rights that they ought not to be postponed to the other claimants. The plaintiffs ask leave to amend and to claim as necessaries men. At this late stage I am of opinion that I ought not to give them leave to do so. And it would do them no good, for they never advanced upon the personal credit of the owners, and unless they have a personal claim in debt against the owners for necessaries, they can have no right in rem.

The priority of the master being recognised by all, he has already been paid out of the fund. As to the balance, less such costs and charges as are properly chargeable against it, the competition is between the Svenska Company as execution creditors, on the one hand, and Brunt and Samuel and Co. on the other. As between themselves Brunt and Samuel and Co. rank pari passu. This issue raises several questions. When a sheriff has seized under a writ of fi. fa. before the Marshal arrests in an action in rem. to enforce a claim not supported by a maritime lien, i.e., a claim for necessaries, does the execution creditor rank before or after or pari passu with the arresting the plaintiffs? In the present case this question is complicated by the further question whether the judgment debtors were owners of the whole of the ship or only of 56-64th shares, and the resulting question as to the powers of the sheriff to seize shares in a ship and the method in which such seizure can be effected.

The defendants in the action brought by the Svenska Company were Eleazer W. Clark, Northland Navigation Company, and A. W. Clark. A. W. Clark was the master at the date of the Svenska Company's writ, and was joined only for the purposes of an injunction. The judgment for damages which the sheriff was executing was against the owners only. Upon the affidavits now before the court I find that in Aug. 1920 the ship was owned as to 56-64ths by the Northland Navigation Company, an American Corporation, and as to 8-64ths by Walter G. Morey. The execution creditors had no judgment against Morey, and the Sheriff had no power to sell Morey's shares. It is true that Messrs. Cooper and Co., solicitors for the defendants in the Svenska action, consented to the sheriff selling the whole ship, but the consent could not prejudice the rights of those who were suing in rem and who were entitled to enforce their rights against all the owners, including Morey. It follows that Brunt and Samuel and Co. are alone entitled to so much of the fund as represents 8-64ths of the ship. As to the remaining 56-64ths, the question remains as between execution creditors and necessaries men.

There was much argument as to the method by which shares in a ship could be effectually seized under a fi. fa. Much of that argument was based on the assumption that the sheriff could only transfer the shares by bill of sale. In that connection the Irish case of Harley v. Harley (11 Ir. Ch. R. 451) was referred to. In my view, all this argument was irrelevant. The James W. Elwell was a foreign ship to which the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 did not apply. I need express no opinion as to the authority of anything said in the Irish case. If the whole ship had belonged to the judgment debtors the sheriff could have seized it and sold it like any other chattel. No statute would have required a transfer in any particular way: (Union Bank v. Lenanton, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 600; 38 L. T. Rep. 698; 3 C. P. Div. 243). The transfer would be governed by the common law. So with shares in a foreign ship, the sheriff can seize and sell and transfer as he can an undivided share in any other chattel. There is no doubt that at common law an undivided share in a chattel can be taken in execution by seizure of the chattel and sale of the share. The co-owners of the ship are not by reason of the co-ownership partners in the property, though they may be partners in the employment of it. Sect. 23 of the Partnership Act 1890 does not apply. The Merchant Shipping Act has nothing to say to the transfer of shares in a foreign ship. No other statute limits the common law right. The 56-64th shares were validly taken in execution by the sheriff by the seizure of the ship, and the sheriff, if he had found a buyer, could have effectually transferred the shares.

On the other hand, I dissent altogether from the argument that the sheriff, being in possession of a ship, in execution of a judgment obtained against the owner of 1-64th share, could prevent an arrest by the Marshal in an action in rem against the owners of the whole 64-64th shares. Whatever difficulties may have arisen in former days out of the conflicting jurisdictions of the common law and the Admiralty Courts, there are no such difficulties to-day. The sheriff and the Marshal are alike the servants of the High Court of Justice. I see no more objection to the Marshal and the sheriff seizing a ship than I do to the sheriff seizing the same chattel twice under two separate writs of fi. fa. If difficulties arise as to sale, they can be dealt with by the court as was done in the present case, and the court will be careful to provide that the sale by it shall not prejudice any rights acquired by the several seizures or arrests. In my view the only question is one of priorities. The execution creditors validly seized through the sheriff. The necessaries men validly arrested through the Marshal. The ship has been ordered to be sold without prejudice to priorities in rem and reserving the rights of the judgment creditors.

Who have the priority? In my view it is the execution creditors, the Svenska Company. From the moment of seizure by the sheriff the execution creditor is in the position of a secured creditor in regard to the goods seized: (Ex parte Williams, L. Rep. 7, Ch. 138; Slater v. Pender, 26 L. T. Rep. 482; (1872) L. Rep. 7, Ex. 95; Re Clarke, 77 L. T. Rep. 417; (1898) 1 Ch. 336). The execution creditor from the moment of seizure had a legal right as against the execution debtor, that is to say, the owner of the goods, to have the goods sold and to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale. At that moment the necessaries men had nothing but a right to sue the owners of the ship in rem, and by arrest of the ship to make it a security for any judgment they might ultimately recover. As was said by Lord Esher in The Cella (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 293; 59 L. T. Rep. 125; 13 Prob. Div. 82), at p. 87: "The moment that the arrest takes place the ship is held by the court as a security for whatever may be adjudged by it to be due to the claimant." But until the moment of arrest the necessaries man, having no maritime lien, is not in any sense a secured creditor. In my opinion, the arrest cannot deprive the execution creditor of his existing security. It was ingeniously argued by Mr. Digby for one of the necessaries men that the sheriff had not sold, and could not in law have sold, by the time the Marshal arrested, and that the sheriff, when the time for sale came, could only have sold and transferred subject to the right acquired by reason of the arrest effected before the date of sale. I cannot agree. If the argument were sound, then a later seizure under one fi. fa. before sale under an earlier seizure, under another fi. fa., would prevent an effective sale under the first seizure and would have the effect of preferring a later to an earlier seizure, whereas the law gives priority to execution creditors in the order of the seizures, or, to speak more strictly, in the order of delivery of writs of fi. fa. to the sheriff.

As between several necessaries men suing in rem this court has worked out the equitable rule that all share pari passu, whatever the dates of the arrests and judgments: The Africano (7 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 427; 70 L. T. Rep. 250; (1894) P. 141). But I cannot see my way to extend that equitable rule to the prejudice of an execution creditor for whom the sheriff has seized before arrest by the Marshal. In the present case I regret having to come to this decision. There can be no doubt that the fund has been created by the sale by the Marshal, and that it never could have been created by a sale by the sheriff. The necessaries men, or more strictly speaking, McLeod and Hill, have pulled the chestnuts out of the fire for the Svenska Co. But, in my opinion, as to 56-64ths, it was the Svenska Company's chestnut.

The result is as follows: The proceeds of the sale of the cargo of coal, less a proportion of the Marshal's expenses of sale, will be paid out to the Svenska Company, and the proceeds of the sale of the ship, less the Marshal's charges and expenses will be paid out as follows: (1) In respect of costs awarded by the order of the 1st Sept. 1920; (2) 200*l.* to the liquidator of McLeod and Hill Limited; (3) 8-64ths of the residue to Mr. Brunt and Messrs. Samuel and Co., sharing pari passu; and (4) 56-64ths to the Svenska Company, subject to deduction of the sheriff's costs and charges, which will be paid to the sheriff. The Svenska Company will have the costs of their intervention in the action by the American Express Company, and of the arguments on the question of the validity of the alleged bottomry bond. There will be no other order as to costs.

THE TARBERT. (a)

Salvage — Benefit arising from the services — No pecuniary benefit to the owner—Request services—Tug and tow—Life salvage claimed by tug.

A steamer, whilst being towed in the Mersey, was damaged by collision with another vessel, for which the other vessel was subsequently held to be alone to blame. The master of the steamer, which was sinking rapidly, asked the tug, which had been towing at the time of the collision, to tow his vessel in shore. The tug endeavoured to do so, but the steamer grounded on the Pluckington Bank, at some distance from the shore. In this position she became a constructive total loss. Some of her cargo was, however, recovered, and a substantial sum remained in the hands of the cargo owners after the expenses of recovery had been met.

At the trial it appeared that, had the services never been rendered by the tug, cargo of no less net value would have been recovered than was, under the circumstances, restored to the cargo owners.

Held, that since the cargo had still to be saved in the position in which the tug left it, and as it was then worth no more than it would have been if the tug had done nothing, no salvage service had been rendered, and the tug was entitled to no award.

Held, on the facts, that the requested services had not been performed, and that the lives of the steamer's crew were in no danger.

Semble, if the lives of the crew had been in danger, an engaged tug, in taking the crew off the steamer which she is towing, is not acting outside the scope of her towage contract in such a manner as to earn a salvage award.

The action therefore failed.

ACTION of salvage.

The plaintiffs were the owners, master and crew of the steam tug Knight Templar. The defendants were the owners of the steamer Tarbert.

On the 22nd Dec. 1919 the Tarbert was in the Mersey about abreast of the Woodside Stage, a little to the westward of mid-river, heading to the south. She was laden with a cargo of palm oil in casks and palm kernels in bags. The Knight Templar, which had been engaged to assist her, was towing her, the engines of the tug working at slow speed. In these circumstances the Tarbert was run into by the steamship Otterdal, and received very severe damage. The tow rope parted, and was cast off at the moment of the collision. The Tarbert was left with whatever way she had on, with the flood tide upon her, and her helm hard-a-starboard. The crew asked to be taken off. The Knight Templar was accordingly put alongside and the crew taken off. The Knight Templar was then requested by the master of the Tarbert to make fast to him and to attempt to tow the Tarbert in shore. The Knight Templar did make fast, and the attempt was made to get the Tarbert to the Liverpool side, where it was thought that she might be beached within 100 ft. of the dock wall, somewhere abreast of the Albert Dock. In crossing the Pluckington Bank, however, the Tarbert struck the bottom on the outer part of the bank, heeled over on her beam ends, and there lay.

On the Pluckington Bank the Tarbert became a constructive total loss, but cargo of the value of 17,124*l.* was restored to the cargo owners after the cost of recovering it had been paid.

At the trial the evidence of the plaintiffs showed that if the Tarbert had been allowed to sink in mid-river, the net value of the cargo recovered would have been not less than 17,000*l.* Less cargo would have been recovered, but at less cost, the net result would have been about the same.

Thereupon counsel for the defendants, without calling evidence, submitted that no case for salvage had been made out.

Laing, K.C. and J. B. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.—The cargo was brought into a position of comparative safety. The risk to which it was exposed in mid-river is a matter of speculation. In such a case the court will favour the salvers. In any case, the requested services were performed, and the lives of the crew rescued from danger.

Bateson, K.C. and Balloch.—Nothing has been saved. The cargo, to the extent of 17,124*l.* was never in danger.

HILL, J.—After stating the facts said: [in the position in which she was left on the Pluckington Bank] the Tarbert became a constructive total loss. Part of her cargo was got out, with the net result that the part that was got out was worth 17,124*l.* On the bank where the Tarbut lay she was totally submerged during certain parts of the tide, and partially submerged at all states of the tide. According to the evidence afforded by the charts of her position, there would appear to be at least 16 ft. of water—perhaps rather more—at low water at ordinary spring tide. If she had been left to herself, instead of being taken hold of by the tug, she would have sunk probably—almost certainly—in deep water, probably in considerably deeper water than she did sink.

However, that is a matter of speculation. One might speculate as to how long she would have been kept afloat and how much way she had, if any, at the time when the tug made fast, and as to what would be the effect upon her of the helm being hard-a-starboard, but, at any rate, it is not disputed that she would have sunk somewhere out in the river instead of sinking on the Pluckington Bank. The evidence is that even if she had sunk in mid-river the cargo could have been saved. Perhaps more was saved in the result than was otherwise the case, but at greater expense, so that the net money result would have been approximately the same in any case. That is the effect of the evidence that was called for the plaintiffs, and that is the only evidence that was called. The defendants have not contested the evidence, but were content to rest upon it. Therefore, the conclusion upon that evidence is that when the cargo had been put on Pluckington Bank it was indeed in a position from which it could be, or a portion of it could be, brought to shore, so as to give a net result of 17,000*l.* odd, but that if it had not been put upon the Pluckington Bank and the ship had sunk a portion of the cargo could equally have been saved so as probably to have given the same net result. It is for the plaintiffs to make out that they have rendered a service which entitles them to a salvage award. The first question which arises, and the main question, and I am not sure that it is not the only question, is this: Was any actual benefit conferred upon the cargo by what the tug did?

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

I think that may be expressed in this form: Was the cargo when the tug left her worth more than it would have been if the tug had done nothing? Upon that matter it seems to me that the plaintiffs have failed to prove that it was: on the contrary they have themselves given evidence to show that it was worth no more.

The property—the cargo—was never brought into complete safety, and the most that could be said of it is that it was brought into comparative safety, though on the bank it still had to be rescued from very grave peril. If it was in a position from which it had to be rescued, just as it would have been if it had had to be rescued from mid-river, and if such method of rescue would have given the same results, in my view the only conclusion to arrive at is that what the tug did did not make the cargo worth any more, and in fact did not put the cargo in a position of greater comparative safety than it would otherwise have been in. Of course it might from the evidence that was given have been said that on the bank the work of completing the salving of the cargo was a matter of certainty, whereas if the ship had sunk in the river that would have been a matter of speculation. But the evidence which was given by the plaintiffs, and accepted by the defendants (who, I suppose, had similar evidence if it had been necessary to call it), puts that view out of court, because as I have said, the evidence is equally certain that there would be a salving of cargo in whichever position the ship had sunk. If there was no benefit conferred it is said nevertheless that this was a service rendered at request and the res was ultimately saved; therefore it was a service which must be rewarded. But as I understand the rule as to rendering services at request, that rule is this, that if a salvor is employed to do a thing, does it, and the property is ultimately saved, he may claim a salvage reward, though the thing which he does—in the events which happen—produce no effect. But that depends on the question that I have already spoken of as the main question, namely, was the property ultimately saved, and was it brought into a position of greater safety?

Was there by some means or other a benefit conferred upon it? But apart from that one has to look at what the tug was requested to do. What she was requested to do was to tow the ship in shore. That she did not do. She made a very praiseworthy effort to do it, but she did not do it owing to the misfortune of the ship striking on the Pluckington Bank. Therefore I am unable to see that the plaintiffs bring themselves within the doctrine applicable to the payment of services rendered at request.

There remains only the suggestion with reference to the saving of life. I do not think that it has been made out that this tug saved the lives of the master and the crew. It is true that the tug took some of them on board, but there was another tug handy in the Mersey. But apart from that I am not at all prepared to say that an engaged tug which in an emergency takes on board the master and crew of the ship which has engaged her is so far acting outside her duty that she is entitled to claim as a salvor.

For these reasons I think that the plaintiffs' claim fails. I should mention that the plaintiffs have proved loss and damage to their ship to the amount of 206*l.* If they really had succeeded in getting the ship close in shore, the plaintiffs would probably have got a very handsome award. It is one of those cases where they have unfortunately not succeeded in carrying out the service which, if it had been carried out, would have entitled them to a large remuneration. Like other salvors they have got to take the rough with the smooth, and if they have not succeeded in their efforts as salvors they cannot obtain from the court any award.

THE EVA (a).

Actions in rem—Necessaries—Master's wages—Master also part owner—Priorities—Foreign law—Sale of ship abroad—Right of foreign government to tax proceeds—Sale by order of the court—Practice—Judgment by default—Payment out of court.

The claim for wages and disbursements of a master who is also part owner of a ship ranks after the claims of persons who have supplied necessaries to that ship, since the master is personally liable to such persons.

The Jenny Lind (26 L. T. Rep. 591; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 529) considered and followed.

A foreign government which is by foreign law entitled to a percentage on the sale price of ships voluntarily sold out of its national registry is not entitled to claim such percentage when the ship is sold by the marshal in a default action in rem.

When a party has obtained judgment in a default action, he is entitled to move for payment out, but must give notice of that motion to any person who has intervened or entered caveats against payment out. If any other claimants to the fund want to be in a position to resist payment out they must, to entitle them to be heard, intervene or enter caveats.

MOTION to confirm reports of the registrar and for payment out of a fund in court representing the proceeds of the sale of the sailing ship Eva. Judgments by default had been obtained in actions in rem against the Eva by the master and crew for wages, subsistence, and viaticum; Messrs. F. O. Kindberg Limited for repairs; Mr. Assman for necessaries.

The Eva was sold in Messrs. Kindberg's action, but the proceeds of the sale were not sufficient to satisfy the amounts found due to these claimants by the registrar. On the motion of the master and crew for confirmation of the report of the registrar, and for payment out, Messrs. Kindberg and Mr. Assman objected to payment out of the sum found due to the master, on the ground that he was owner of one-thirtieth share in the Eva, but neither of them had intervened in the master's action or entered caveats against payment out to him.

Stone-Hurst for Messrs. Kindberg Limited.

Ellis Cunliffee for Assman.

July 5.—HILL, J., in adjourning the motion, said (inter alia): In order that the practice of the court, which has become a little lax, may be put into proper form, I think it well to state that when any party has obtained judgment in a default action, he is entitled to move for payment out, but he must give notice of that motion to any persons who have intervened or entered caveats against payments out. If that procedure is strictly followed he is not under any obligation to give notice to any other persons. If any other claimants against the fund want to be in a position to resist an order for payment out they must, to entitle them to be heard, intervene or enter caveats. Unless that practice is followed, a party who is going to move the court for payment out has no means of making sure that he has brought before the court all the persons entitled to be heard. In the present case none of the parties now before me have intervened or entered caveats, but I shall adjourn the case for a week to enable them to do so.

When the motion came again before the court, application was made by the Government of Finland, which claimed 2½ per cent. of the purchase price of the Eva, to which under the law of Finland they were entitled on the voluntary sale of a Finnish ship out of the registry of Finland.

Stranger for the Government of Finland.

July 12.—HILL, J. said: In this case I have already given judgment for the master suing for wages and disbursements, for the crew suing for wages, for Messrs. Kindberg in respect of repair, and for Mr. Assman for necessaries. I also ordered payment out of 236*l.* to the crew for their wages, because they clearly come first.

In the ordinary course the master's claim for wages and disbursements would also come first, but the matter stood over for argument and evidence, objection being taken that the master could not claim in priority to the necessaries and repairs men, because he was himself a part owner and had himself given orders for the repairs and necessary supplies, and therefore became personally liable on the contract.

It has been frankly admitted for the master that he gave the orders on the instructions of his owners, and also that he is the owner of one-thirtieth share in the ship. That puts him in a very unfortunate position. The authority on the point is The Jenny Lind (26 L. T. Rep. 591; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 529), where a master and part owner of a foreign ship ordered necessaries for the ship. The necessaries were supplied, and it was held that the persons who supplied them were entitled to be paid for the necessaries out of the proceeds of the ship and freight in priority to a claim by the master for wages and disbursements. It is true that the case in part proceeded on the assumption that it was a question of competing maritime liens, Sir Robert Phillimore treating the necessaries men as if they had a maritime lien, and Mr. Bucknill sought to distinguish it on that ground; but further reasons for the judgment show that it was not decided only on that ground, reasons which seems to apply quite apart from the question of the necessaries men having a maritime lien. The master, as part owner, was held personally liable to the necessaries men. Consequently if, in the present case, he ranked in priority to them, they would be in a position to attach the debt. There is good reason, therefore, why they should be preferred, and I cannot prefer the master's debt to the debts of the repairs and necessaries men.

Certain costs have to come out first. The fund was realised in Messrs. Kindberg's action and the costs of realisation will come first. Then there are the costs of the master and crew's action. The master and crew joined together, and the crew certainly came before everybody else. The costs of that action are not enhanced by the addition of the master, and, therefore, up to the time of the confirmation of the report, those costs must rank next. The balance of the fund will not be nearly enough to pay Messrs. Kindberg and Mr. Assman, and, therefore, they will rank pari passu. That will exhaust the fund.

There remains the application on behalf of the Finnish Government. It is said that the Eva is a Finnish ship, and that by Finnish law that Government takes 2½ per cent. of the sale price of Finnish ships sold out of Finnish nationality. That no doubt is imposed to prevent the sale of Finnish ships abroad. Mr. Stranger argues that he is entitled to have that right recognised here. He makes his application without notice of motion and without entering a caveat, but I will treat him as being properly here. He has no affidavit to prove that the Eva was a Finnish ship. I have no affidavit to the contrary, but I have an affidavit by the master from which it looks as if the Eva were an Esthonian and not a Finnish ship. I will assume, however, that she was Finnish. To my mind the fact that by Finnish law the Finnish Government upon the voluntary sale out of the Finnish Registry of a Finnish ship can charge the owners 2½ per cent. on the sale price, gives them absolutely no right in regard to such a sale as has taken place in this court. It does not appear that in Finnish law there is any right in rem or a maritime lien in respect of this charge, although I have no doubt that a ship sold in Finland can be prevented from leaving that country until the tax is paid. But the Eva was not sold under Finnish law. She was sold like any other chattel belonging to a foreigner which has been seized in this country under the powers of this court, and the title passes not by reference to Finnish law, but by reference to English law. To such a sale taxes leviable in a foreign country upon the voluntary transfer of a ship appear to me to have no reference whatever. Therefore, even assuming the Finnish Government has properly appeared here, they have no right such as they allege. Therefore I dismiss this application.

THE ARZPEITIA. (a)

Necessaries—Action in rem—Payments in respect of the cargo—Liability of the ship—Necessaries to the ship.

The agents at New York of a steamship made payments in connection with her discharge at New York. . In an action against the steamship in rem to recover these disbursements as necessaries it was contended that they were made in respect of the cargo only, and were not necessaries to the ship.

Held, that payments though made in respect of the cargo were necessaries to the ship if she could not go on her business without them. As the business of the ship consisted in entering the port of New York, discharging her cargo, and leaving the port, payment of charges which, being unpaid, would prevent her from doing any of these things was necessary to the ship, notwithstanding that the amount disbursed did not become due, nor was the disbursement made, until after the ship had left New York. Quay rent for cargo, and the cost of destroying putrid cargo, were necessaries to the ship, since by the law of New York she was liable for these charges, and could have been prevented from sailing had they not been paid.

ACTION for necessaries against the Spanish steamer Arzpeitia and her bail.

Bateson, K.C. and G. P. Langton, for the plaintiffs.

A. T. Miller K.C. and Noad for the defendants.

The facts and arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgment.

HILL, J.—This is a claim in respect of disbursements made by the plaintiffs as agents for the defendants steamship Arzpeitia at New York, when she was on a voyage inward with a cargo which included a large quantity of onions, in March 1920. The plaintiffs were appointed brokers and agents, and throughout were in touch with the master, and it is sworn that what they did had his approval. They incurred a large number of expenses, and it is quite clear on the evidence that the whole of them were expenses incurred within their authority, so as to bind the shipowners personally, and as the shipowners have appeared to a writ in rem they have subjected themselves to the jurisdiction of the court, and there is no difficulty in dealing with the case against them in personam.

The controversy has arisen because bail has been given, and the plaintiffs ask for judgment, not against the defendants as owners, but also against the bail, and it is in the interest of the bail, who have apparently failed to secure themselves vis-à-vis the Spanish shipowners, to show if they can that there is no right in rem against the ship. They seek to show that, not by evidence of their own, but by showing that the plaintiffs have not sufficiently proved that the disbursements were for necessaries, so as to give them (the plaintiffs) a right in rem against the ship.

What gives the defendants an opportunity for saying that some of these disbursements were not necessaries is that they were, in fact and immediately payments made in respect of the cargo of the ship, and they say it has become necessary therefore for the plaintiffs to prove that these disbursements made in respect of cargo were necessarily made for the ship, and were necessary in the sense that the ship, as a ship, could not go on her business without them.

It seems to me now that the matter has been ventilated that it is quite sufficiently proved that all these expenses were necessarily incurred on behalf of the ship to enable her to carry out her business. When the ship arrived it was found that a large part of the onions on board were unfit for any use, and the consignees never turned up to claim them. The health authorities interfered. A good part of the onions were finally removed, and dumped somewhere in the sea, and so got rid of at considerable expense. Others were sold. Two or three items show the sort of expenses which the defendants say were not necessary items. A good part of an item 6026.11 dollars, is for quay rent on space occupied by the cargo, some of it at a date before the ship sailed from New York, but the bulk of it subsequently to the time she sailed.

There is another item of 2873.14 dollars nearly all expenses for labour for loading cases and crates for onions into scows in connection with the dumping. These three items together made 12,839 dollars. By a payment on account on the 2nd April 1920 the plaintiffs received from the defendants the sum of 21,122.74 dollars being the whole of the disbursements account except 11,728.37 dollars, the amount claimed in the present action.

If the defendants are right in saying that this 12,839 dollars was not a necessary disbursement they would be right in saying that all the items, which were for necessaries had already been discharged, and that in respect of the balance there is no liability in rem.

After the ship arrived, and it was discovered what the condition of the onions was the plaintiffs cabled the shipowners and wrote them in reference to the matter, and saying that they were taking steps with the customs authorities to endeavour to get them to authorise the sale of the onions.

The cost of destroying was a charge upon the ship, and with 43,000 packages the cost would be considerable. On the 31st March the plaintiffs asked for money on account saying that the estimated amount required for dealing with the onions was 21,122 dollars. It was upon that estimate that authority to pay 21,122 dollars was called out, and the amount was paid. There was a statement that otherwise the plaintiffs would be obliged to hold the ship to protect themselves. That seems to me that the obligation of getting rid of the damaged cargo was a charge upon the ship by the law of New York, and would be enforced by the authorities there against the ship.

The employment of the ship that we have to consider is the inward and outward voyage, and any expenditure in relation to the ship or her cargo which she was bound to incur before she could either enter port, or discharge her cargo, or leave port seems to me to be a necessary expenditure for the ship within the meaning of the law. When I have looked at the plaintiffs affidavit it seems to me quite clear that the ordinary method of arranging discharge—the method which they were within their authority fully justified in adopting—was that they should hire quay space on behalf of the ship, and remain liable for the hire so long as the quay space remained occupied by the ship's cargo.

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

When the cargo was put out of the ship, she, in the circumstances, became under two liabilities: (1) To pay all expenses of the health authorities, and of the destruction of the cargo; (2) to pay for the quay space as long as the onions occupied it. They were liabilities which were incurred by the ships agents for the ship, not after the ship sailed, but before the ship came in at all. They were the terms which the agents were bound to enter into on behalf of the ship, or were a legal liability on the part of the ship from the moment the agents engaged the quay space for the ship's cargo. And it is quite immaterial that these liabilities accrued into money demands at a date subsequent to the sailing of the ship.

The money payments were all a result of liabilities which the ship's agents incurred in order to provide that which was necessary for the ship in the adventure of entering New York, discharging at New York and leaving New York.

Therefore it seems to me that the plaintiffs have established that the whole of these items were necessaries. There is no dispute as to their having been incurred, and as what I have stated covers the whole matter I see no advantage in sending the case to the registrar and merchants.

THE IBIS VI. (No. 2) (a)

Practice—Costs—Seafaring witnesses—Proper allowance for a witness detained on shore.

A. B., the mate of the plaintiffs' trawler, was detained on shore from the 8th Nov. to the 3rd Dec. 1918, by the plaintiffs to give evidence against the steamer I. VI. which had damaged their trawler in collision. The I. VI. was held to blame, and the damages were agreed at 300*l.*

Had A. B. not been detained he would have sailed on a fishing voyage on the 9th Nov., on which he would have earned 280*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* (which sum was actually earned by the mate who took A. B.'s place). The plaintiffs had paid this amount to A. B., and claimed to recover it on taxation. The assistant registrar allowed the item, and his decision was upheld by the President on appeal. The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal who held that the amount which A. B. would have received had he not been detained was not necessarily the measure of the sum which the plaintiffs should have paid him, though it was a factor to be considered in determining the sum properly payable to him. The case was sent back to the assistant registrar for reconsideration, and after further consideration he allowed 250*l.* The defendants appealed.

Held, that, the assistant registrar having applied the true measure of damage indicated by the Court of Appeal, the Court would not consider the accuracy of his application of that measure in point of amount.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (The Ibis VI., 125 L. T. Rep. 378 ; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 237 ; (1921) P. 255) considered and explained.

MOTION by the defendants objecting to the allowance on taxation of a sum of 250*l.* paid by the plaintiffs to their witness Alfred Burton.

Stranger for the appellants (defendants).

Dumas for the respondents (plaintiffs).

The facts and arguments of counsel fully appear from the head note and the judgment.

Oct. 28.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P.—I have had an opportunity of considering the judgments of the Court of Appeal (125 L. T. Rep. 379 ; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 237 ; (1921) P. 255) in this matter and of applying them to the question raised between the parties. The summons was to review an allowance by the assistant-registrar in respect of the costs of securing the evidence of a witness, who was the mate of a fishing vessel. The allowance is of rather a startling amount. North Sea fishermen at that time were making sometimes enormous profits, and the allowance in the first instance was 280*l.* odd. The basis of the allowance was that the witness had been detained on shore when otherwise he would have been employed on a steam trawler, in which event his share of the earnings would have been the sum of 280*l.*

In the first instance, as I have said, the full amount was allowed, it having been paid to the man by the plaintiffs in the action. The matter ultimately went to the Court of Appeal. Without determining the question of amount, the Court of Appeal decided (sup.) that the measure of compensation which had been applied was incorrect, and sent the matter back for review. Upon reconsideration the assistant-registrar has reduced the allowance to 250*l.* From that decision the defendants now appeal, upon the ground of principle that the wrong measure has been applied. Further, it is said that in any event the allowance is excessive. That further ground was always a matter for consideration upon the original taxation, and it has been considered again by the assistant-registrar.

As I say, the amount on the face of it is startling. It arose from the fact that at the time in question the earning capacity of steam trawlers in the North Sea was such as I suppose has never been known before, and may not be known again.

One question is whether the true measure, the proper principle, has been applied. That is important from the point of view of the practice of the court, and is a matter of administrative law. The other question is whether the principle has been applied having regard to the sum allowed, and that is a matter at any rate of some consequence to the parties. I will deal first with the larger question. All I have to do upon that larger question is to say what is the direction of the Court of Appeal on that matter of principle, and whether it has been applied. There is a conflict as to what was the direction of the Court of Appeal. Mr. Stranger, for the appellants, based his argument upon the contention that it is to be found in the reasons for the judgment which was pronounced by Younger, L.J. That learned judge said (125 L. T. Rep., at p. 383 ; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 241 ; (1921) P. at p. 273)

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Little objection, in the bulk of such cases, could, I think, be raised to an allowance for the detention of a necessary seafaring witness if that allowance be based upon a reasonable subsistence payment suitable to a person in his station in life while not exceeding any loss actually incurred by him by reason of his detention or any real remuneration which, but for that detention, the witness would have earned or of which by reason thereof he may have been deprived."

Now that ruling seems to me to set up, as a governing factor, the costs of a reasonable subsistence of the witness. If that were the result, it would be a result contrary to the practice of this court for a long period, and, at any rate, since the time of Dr. Lushington. I have looked at some typical bills of costs set out in the text books, and it is quite clear—as I am so advised in the registry and as appears from the judgment in the Court of Appeal—that the limitation of the allowance for a seafaring witness to the costs of his reasonable subsistence is not the measure which has been applied; but if the Court of Appeal directed that that was the measure it is for every judge sitting in this court to see that measure applied.

I have merely to see whether that is the direction of the Court of Appeal, and, of course, if I find that it is, I should follow it with the most scrupulous care, and it would be followed in the same manner in the registry. It happens that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was expressed in two reasoned statements—the first by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Sterndale (my predecessor here), in which Warrington, L.J. concurred, and the second by Younger, L.J. I have considered both judgments. This was the direction which the Master of the Rolls gave with the concurrence of Warrington, L.J. (125 L. T. Rep., at 379; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 238; (1921) P. at p. 261). "I think the only direction that can be given is that the assistant registrar must award the reasonable compensation to a person of the class of the witness, taking into account all the circumstances and considering the wages which the witness was earning about the time of detention not as an absolute measure, but an important indication and guide of what is fair. The fact that all persons are under an obligation to give evidence when called upon should also not be ignored."

That obviously is not the measure upon which Mr. Stranger relied. His argument was founded upon the passage referred to in Younger, L.J.'s judgment, which is a statement of reasons for the judgment given by one member of the court, and which is not consistent with the reasons given by Lord Sterndale with the concurrence of Warrington, L.J. What has to be followed here is the judgment of the court. Having now ascertained what was the judgment, I see what is the true measure; and I have to consider whether, upon the answers made by the assistant registrar to the objections, he in fact did apply the true measure. I am satisfied he did. Applying it, he abated the sum originally allowed by 30*l*. Into the accuracy of that application of the rule in point of amount it is not for me to enter, and it is a matter into which I am not competent to enter. The assistant registrar was the judge of fact in this case. I am satisfied that he has applied his mind to the question of fact with full assistance from the direction of the Court of Appeal.

THE ZELO. (a)

Collision — Collision with submerged wreck — Damage to the wreck—Salvage contractor—Contractor working on the wreck—Possession of the wreck—Bailment of the wreck—Right of contractor as bailee to sue the wrongdoing ship for damage to the wreck.

By a contract between a firm of salvage contractors and the agents for the underwriters of the M., then lying sunk in Barry Roads, it was agreed that the salvage contractors should endeavour to salve the M. on terms of "no cure, no pay." In performance of the contract the salvage contractors used pumps, opened holes, employed divers, fixed apparatus, attended with a salvage steamer on the M., and dealt generally with her as they thought fit. The authorities of the Trinity House, however, continued to light the wreck for some time after the salvage operations began, but by a later agreement between the contractors and the Trinity House the contractors undertook the responbility for lighting the wreck, the Trinity House reserving the right to retake possession of the wreck if the lighting was not properly performed. In these circumstances the steamer Z. negligently collided with the wreck of the M., which was destroyed. No servant of the salvage contractors was present at the M. at the time of the collision, nor was the salvage steamer of the contractors present on that night.

In an action by the salvage contractors against the owners of the Z., held that the control which the salvage contractors exercised over the M. was such as to enable them as bailees in possession to maintain an action against the owners of the Z. for damage done to the M.

ACTION for damage by collision. The plaintiffs were Maritime Salvors Limited, a firm of salvage contractors, and the defendants were the Pelton Steamship Company, the owners of the steamship Zelo of Newcastle.

By a written contract dated the 22nd May 1920 the plaintiffs contracted with the agents of the underwriters on the steamship Merkur, which was then lying sunk and damaged in Barry Roads, to salve the Merkur on a basis of "no cure, no pay." In performance of this contract salvage operations were commenced by the plaintiffs on the Merkur about the 29th May 1920, and successfully continued until some time in September, at which time the plaintiffs alleged that the raising of the Merkur and the success of the salvage operations was assured. In the course of the operations a large sum of money and a quantity of material were expended by the plaintiffs, who were patching a hole in the side of the Merkur, and had on board her a number of pumps and other valuable salvage plant. The Merkur was marked by night by a buoy of the usual wreck marking pattern, placed and maintained by officials of the Trinity House.

In these circumstances the plaintiffs alleged by their statement of claim that the Zelo was so negligently navigated that she collided with the Merkur, destroying and causing to be lost the plaintiffs' material and rendering the successful salvage of the Merkur impossible. The Zelo was also sunk. The plaintiffs claimed for the damage they had sustained, including the benefits which they might have received under the salvage contract.

The defendants by their defence denied that the plaintiffs had suffered damage by reason of the collision which they said was caused, not by the negligent navigation of the Zelo, but by the improper manner in which the Merkur was lighted. Alternatively if the plaintiffs had suffered damage by reason of the successful salvage of the Merkur being rendered impossible, the defendants contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover damages from them in respect thereof. The defendants further denied that the Merkur was at any material time in possession or under control of the plaintiffs. If the Merkur was in possession or under control of the plaintiffs the defendants by their counter-claim claimed the damage which they had suffered by the collision which they said was caused by the negligent and unsafe manner in which the Merkur was lighted by the plaintiffs in that they failed to mark the position of the wreck with a light of sufficient visibility.

On the issue of fact:

Nov. 1.—HILL, J. pronounced the collision between the Merkur and the Zelo to have been caused solely by the negligent navigation of Zelo.

On the issue whether the plaintiffs were entitled to sue in respect of the damage to the Merkur:

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs.—The case is within the principle of The Okehampton (110 L. T. Rep. 130; 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428; (1914) P. 103). In that case the ship and cargo were bailed to the plaintiffs and they were held to have such a possessory interest as to entitle them to sue and to recover the fruits of their contract with the bailors. Here the Merkur was bailed to the plaintiffs who were performing by her use a contract profitable to the bailor and the bailee. The plaintiffs may not necessarily have been bailees because they were working on the Merkur, but the evidence shows that they exercised possession on her; the plaintiffs had salvage plant on board the Merkur, their salvage steamer attended her, they had done work upon her, and their servants had charge of the salvage operations. In any case the plaintiffs had received possession from the Trinity House, who had notified them that they would retake possession if the wreck was not properly lighted. [HILL, J.—Had the Trinity House ever taken possession?] If the Trinity House had not taken possession the fact that the plaintiffs sought leave of the Trinity House to take possession, and leave was obtained, is evidence that the plaintiffs had possession. It matters not whether the Trinity House had taken possession: they agreed that the plaintiffs should take possession. The case must be distinguished from La Société Anonyme Remorquage à Hélice v. Bennetts (1911) 1 K. B. 243). If the plaintiffs were bailees in possession they have sufficient interest to maintain an action for damage to the bailed property and the wrongdoers cannot inquire into their liability to the bailors or otherwise:

The Winkfield, 85 L. T. Rep. 668; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 249; (1902) P. 42.

Wrongdoers are estopped from questioning the title of an injured party:

Jeffreys v. Great Western Railway Company, 1856, 5 E. & B. 802.

Laing, K.C. and Balloch for the defendants.—The plaintiffs were not bailees in possession. If they were bailees in possession they can have no better rights against the defendants than the bailors had. If the owners of the Merkur had been plaintiffs they could not, and would not, have claimed anything for the loss of the salvage contract, which was a source of expense, rather than of gain, to them. If the plaintiffs are entitled to recover anything other than the loss of their plant on board the Merkur they can only recover for damage to the hull of the Merkur. This they have not claimed. [The learned Judge gave the plaintiffs leave to amend their statement of claim by adding a claim for damage to the hull of the Merkur if they so desired.] It was the duty of the Trinity House to light the wreck. The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides:

Sect. 530. Where any vessel is sunk, stranded, or abandoned in any harbour or tidal water under the control of a harbour or conservancy authority or in or near any approach thereto in such a manner as in the opinion of the authority to be or to be likely to become an obstruction or damage to navigation . . . that authority may . . . (b) light or buoy any such vessel . . . until the raising, removal, or destruction thereof.

Sect. 531. [Confers a like authority upon lighthouse authorities in places where no harbour authority has power to act.]

This duty is imperative and not optional:

The Douglas, 47 L. T. Rep. 502; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 510; 7 Prob. Div. 151.

The duty to light does not necessarily involve taking possession of the wreck, which still remains in possession of the owners;

The Snark, 82 L. T. Rep. 42; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 50; (1900) P. 150;
The Utopia, 70 L. T. Rep. 47; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 408; (1893) A. C. 293.

The plaintiffs did not obtain possession of the wreck from the Trinity House. They were allowed to work upon the Merkur on terms, but had no possession. The Okehampton (sup.) does not apply.

Noad replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 4.—HILL, J. said:—The question which remains for decision in this case is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to sue in respect of the damage to the Merkur. I decide that question in the plaintiffs' favour, because I find that at the time of the damage done to the Merkur the plaintiffs were in possession of the Merkur. They say their claim is not a claim merely for the loss of contractual advantages which have been defeated by the damage to the Merkur. It is a claim for damage to the Merkur which lies in them by virtue of their possession. It is not a case within the principle of Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Company (33 L. T. Rep. 475; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 453) and La Société Anonyme de Remorquage à Hélice v. Bennetts (1911; 1 K. B. 243). It is a case within the principle of The Okehampton (110 L. T. Rep. 130; 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428; (1913) P. 173); and of The Winkfield (85 L. T. Rep. 668; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 249; (1902) P. 42). It was contended that possession was not in the plaintiffs, but either in the Trinity House or in the owners or underwriters, and that the plaintiffs were merely licensees permitted to do work upon the Merkur. It was not proved that the Trinity House ever took possession. They might have done so under their powers under sects. 530 and 531 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 They did exercise their powers to light the wreck, but it was not shown that they had yet exercised their powers to take possession. But if the Trinity House did take possession, then, by virtue of the agreement between the Trinity House and the plaintiffs of the 4th June 1920, I am of opinion that the Trinity House transferred the possession to the plaintiffs, reserving to themselves the power, on certain conditions, to retake possession. If the Trinity House did not take posesssion, then possession remained in the owners, or had been transferred to them by the underwriters. It was not proved whether the underwriters had received or had accepted notice of abandonment. But both underwriters and owners had representatives standing by at Cardiff, and whichever were concerned, they were either a party to or consenting to the contract made with the plaintiffs by Messrs Webster. In pursuance of that contract the plaintiffs—as the owners and the underwriters intended should be done, and as they knew was being done—the plaintiffs I say dealt with the Merkur in such a way as they thought fit, fixed upon it their apparatus, patched holes, opened holes, and worked at their own discretion under water by their divers, and also at suitable states of the tide above water, upon such portions as were exposed.

For the greater part of the time the plaintiffs salvage steamer was stationed on the spot, leaving it only when driven in to shelter by stress of weather. The plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs alone, were exercising complete control over the Merkur, and I hold that they were in possession. They were none the less in possession, because on the 19th Sept., at the time of the collision, there was no salvage steamer, and no servant of the plaintiffs' actually on the spot, the salving steamer having had to go into Barry because of bad weather on the 18th (a Saturday), and not returning until the Monday morning after the collision.

Finding possession in the plaintiffs, I hold that they were entitled to maintain an action for damages arising from damage to the Merkur. It is said that no claim in respect of damage to the Merkur is alleged in the statement of claim, and that apart from damage to the plaintiffs' plant, the only claim alleged is for the loss of the benefit of the salvage contract. I do not agree. The allegation is that the Zelo collided with the Merkur rendering the successful salving of the Merkur impossible, and it is further contended that the Merkur was in possession of the plaintiffs. It might have been more clearly expressed, but the allegation means, in my view that the Zelo collided with the Merkur and caused the Merkur to become a total loss. Insert the words "damaging the Merkur," and the allegation is clear of ambiguity. I gave leave to the plaintiffs to so amend, but I did not think that it was strictly necessary. I was informed that the owners of the Merkur have also brought an action. Of course care will have to be taken that the defendants are not made to pay twice over for the same damage, but between them, the plaintiffs and the owners, if the owners recover judgment, they will be entitled to recover the value of the Merkur as on the 19th Sept., immediately before the collision. Whether it had any value—and, if so, what the value was—will depend on whether the plaintiffs are right in saying that the salvage operations would have been successful, and if they are, then upon an estimate of the expenses subsequent to the 19th which would have been incurred, and an estimate of the salved value, and so forth.

I am not pretending to make an exhaustive statement of all the matters which will have to be taken into consideration. That will involve a difficult inquiry for the registrar, and when it is concluded, if a figure of value is arrived at, another difficult question will remain for the registrar as to what would be the relative interests therein of the plaintiffs and the owners on the one hand, and the underwriters on the other hand, under "a no cure no pay contract," the remuneration, in default of agreement, to be settled by arbitration. That is a difficult question for the registrar, but between them the plaintiffs, and the owners or the underwriters, will be entitled to the whole of the value, whatever it is. The plaintiffs, therefore, in this action in my view are entitled to recover their proportion, when determined, of the whole value. I hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages in respect to the Merkur. I think that is what I hold.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord FINLAY.—In this case there was a collision between the steamship Haugland and the steamship Karamea on the 12th Feb. 1919 between 10.10 and 10.25 p.m. near Montevideo.

The Karamea was coming out from Montevideo. She had come down the narrow channel marked by a line of buoys on each hand, running N. and S. When she left the channel she made for the Whistling Buoy, which lies S. by E. from the mouth of the channel, intending to get abreast of the buoy with it on her starboard side and then to starboard so as to proceed in a south-easterly direction and out to sea.

The Haugland was coming in towards Montevideo from the East. She passed to the S. of Flores Island on a W. by N. course and about an hour afterwards she changed her course to W. ½ N. both magnetic. As she neared the Whistling Buoy she sighted the two headlights of The Karamea coming in a southerly direction, on her starboard bow, and when the red light of the Karamea was seen the Haugland ported, bringing the Karamea slightly on the starboard bow. The Karamea starboarded and the Haugland failed to stop and reverse, with the result that ultimately the two ships came into collision, the stem of the Karamea striking the port side of the Haugland about amidships.

The above statement gives the case in broad outline, omitting all details which are indeed in some respects obscure.

The case was tried before Hill, J. He found both vessels to blame, and his judgment in this respect was affirmed in the Court of Appeal. In my opinion no ground has been shown for reversing the finding of the Court of Appeal on this point. The Karamea was wrong in starboarding, as she ought to have kept her course, and the Haugland, whether she was guilty of any other fault or not, was clearly to blame for not stopping and reversing.

The point really in dispute on this appeal is as to the apportionment of the damages. Hill, J., pronounced the Karamea liable in three-fourths and the Haugland liable in one-fourth of the damages. The Court of Appeal held that the case was one in which no special apportionment should be made, and that the damages should be equally divided.

The clause providing for apportionment in cases of damage is the first section of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57): "Where by the fault of two or more vessels damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels . . . the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault. Provided that, if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case it is not possible to establish different degrees of fault, the liability shall be apportioned equally. . . ."

This section was considered by your Lordships' House in The Peter Benoit (114 L. T. Rep. 147; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., 203). It was there laid down that only faults which contribute to the accident are to be taken into account for this purpose. The existence of fault on the part of one of the ships is no reason for apportionment unless it in part caused the damage.

There can be no doubt that the fault of the Karamea in starboarding, when she ought to have kept her course and speed, was a substantial cause of the accident. The only question is as to the amount of blame which should be attributed to the Haugland. Both courts have found the Haugland in default for not stopping and reversing, and it cannot be questioned that this contributed to the accident. Hill, J., thought that this was the only fault on the part of the Haugland, and as he considered that the blame of the Karamea in starboarding was greater he made the Haugland liable only for one-fourth of the damage.

The Court of Appeal, however, found that the Haugland was guilty at an earlier stage of another default contributing to the damage, by failing to comply with art. 28 of the Regulations for Preventing Collision at Sea. "When vessels are in sight of one another, a steam vessel under way, in taking any course authorised or required by these rules, shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or siren, viz.:—One short blast to mean: 'I am directing my course to starboard.' Two short blasts to mean: 'I am directing my course to port.' Three short blasts to mean: 'My engines are going full speed astern.'"

There is no doubt that the Haugland was guilty of an infraction of rule 28. The rule is peremptory that when vessels are in sight of one another a steamship under way and taking any course authorised or required by the rules shall indicate that course by the signal specified. In the present case the two vessels were in sight of one another, and it was therefore the duty of the Haugland under art. 28, when she ported to give one blast. The Chief Officer of the Haugland, when asked why he did not give the signal gave as his reason: "because it appeared to me that the Karamea was too far away; she would not hear it." (Question 64.) This was a clear infraction of the rule. If the vessels are in sight the signal must be given. The obligation is not conditional upon the signal being audible to the other vessel. It is easy to understand why the rule was drawn in these peremptory terms. It would be very dangerous if the officer in charge were encouraged to speculate as to whether the signal, if given, would be heard; he must give it if in sight.

On this point Hill, J. said: "I am not prepared to blame the Haugland for not whistling when she first ported. The ships were then too far apart.. The Haugland was guilty of disobedience to the rule, but it does not follow that she is liable to contribute to the damages. If it appears that the signal, if given, could not have been heard by the other vessel, the failure to give the signal cannot have contributed to the damage, as the signal would have been useless." Hill, J., must, in the passage of his judgment which I have just quoted, have meant that he found the signal could not have been heard at the distance at which the vessels were from one another, and that the failure to give it was therefore on this question of apportionment immaterial.

The Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal said that the Assessors in the Court of Appeal saw no reason in the circumstances (so far as they could judge of them without knowing exactly what the whistle was) why a helm signal should not have been heard by the Karamea. The Master of the Rolls referred to the fact that it was in question whether the Haugland should not have emphasised her position by porting more decisively as well as whether she was to blame for not giving the signal when she ported, and goes on to say: "Now, taking these two things together, I cannot myself see how the Haugland can be held not to blame for her manœuvres then. Had she at once opened her red light there certainly was a further chance of the Karamea being warned that she must not starboard. It ought not to have been necessary to warn her because she had no right to starboard by the rule. But as the Haugland omitted both to open her red light at once and also omitted to give any sound signal that she was acting for the Karamea I cannot help differing from the learned judge when he says that she was not to blame for that earlier port manœuvre. If she were, it seems to me that that is a fault which might very well and very likely did contribute to the collision, because it deprived the Karamea of the warning that she otherwise would have had, which might have induced her to correct her wrong manœuvre." On this ground the Master of the Rolls and the Lords Justices were of opinion that the damages should be equally divided.

It must be observed, however, that there is not now any enactment that a vessel breaking a rule shall be held to blame for the collision and therefore liable to bear some part of the damage unless the breach could not have contributed to the collision (see sect. 4 of the Act of 1911). The question must be one of fact in each case whether the breach of the rule did so contribute.

It is, of course, the duty of the ship to have a proper and efficient whistle. We have consulted our Assessors as to the conditions affecting the audibility of the blast in the present case. In the preliminary act the Haugland put the distance between the two ships when she first saw the Karamea as "by estimate about 3 miles," and the evidence from the Haugland was that the distance would then be 2½ to 3 miles. The Karamea put the distance when she first saw the masthead light of the Haugland in the act as about 1½ to 2 miles and in evidence as 2 miles. Our Assessors say that audibility of the sound in the present case must depend upon the exact distance between the vessels when the Haugland ported. This distance has not been found in the courts below, and I doubt whether it would have been possible to give it exactly. There are certainly no materials before this House on which we could ascertain that distance with any accuracy.

All the three members of the Court of Appeal indicate that if it were necessary to decide the point they would be inclined to say that the Haugland was to blame for not porting more decisively so as to bring red well to red at once, and Hill, J., would seem to have felt some doubt upon this point. It appears to me that the Haugland was to blame in this respect. It was essential that the Karamea should know the course the Haugland was taking. The officer of the Haugland says that owing to the distance the signal would not have been heard and that therefore he did not give it. Under these circumstances it was all the more incumbent upon him to make sure that the Karamea was informed, by porting decisively. There was nothing to prevent him from doing this, and if the Haugland, instead of steadying while the Karamea was still on his starboard bow, had brought his vessel round so that she was well port-side to port-side with the other, his red light would have given the information which he says could not be conveyed by signal. In the absence of a finding that the signal, if given, would have been heard I should have difficulty in agreeing with the Court of Appeal that the mere failure to give the signal would have made the Haugland contributory to the damage.

I think also that a finding that the signal, if given, would have been heard would be justifiable upon the evidence.

The Haugland broke the rule by not giving the signal. It is certainly possible that the signal, if it had been given, would have been heard. All that we have to the contrary is the statement of the officer who wrongfully failed to give the signal that he thought the Karamea was too far away to hear. It would be extremely dangerous if any encouragement were given to neglect the duty of giving the signal by accepting without some definite evidence the plea of the officer in default that the signal would not have been heard. I think we ought to presume in the present case as against the Haugland that if she had done her duty by giving the signal in the present case it would have been heard. She was in the position of a wrongdoer, and no satisfactory grounds are shown for coming to the conclusion that giving the signal would have made no difference in the result.

For these reasons I think that the appeal and cross-appeal should both be dismissed.

I am authorised to state that Lord Shaw concurs in this judgment.

Lord CAVE.—I have come to the same conclusion, and for the following reasons.

When the two vessels came in sight of one another the Karamea was outward bound from Montevideo and was heading south, and the Haugland was heading west and had the Karamea on her starboard bow. They were, therefore, crossing vessels; and under arts. 19 and 21 of the Collision Regulations it was the duty of the Haugland to keep out of the way and of the Karamea to keep her course and speed. The Karamea did not keep her course, but when abreast of the whistling buoy she starboarded and so brought about a position of danger. For this both courts have held her to blame, and with that finding I agree.

Turning now to the conduct of the Haugland, it appears that on seeing the Karamea she ported but failed to give a short blast as required by the rules; that she afterwards starboarded slightly; and that when on approaching the buoy she saw the Karamea bearing down on her, she put her helm hard aport and went full ahead until the collision occurred. I do not think that she showed her red light to the Karamea except for a short time after her first porting and for a few seconds immediately before the collision. The Haugland has been held by both courts to be to blame for going full ahead when a collision was imminent instead of reversing her engines; and I think it clear that this was a wrong manœuvre, and that to this extent she was responsible for the disaster. But is the Haugland also to be held responsible for not blowing her whistle when she first ported her helm? As to this, her master says that he ported partly to get closer to the buoy and partly for the Karamea. He was therefore in sight of the Karamea and acted for her; and it follows that he was within art. 28 and by not blowing infringed that rule. It is said that the neglect to blow did not contribute to the collision, or (in other words) that there was no causal connection between the neglect and the damage. But this contention rests wholly on the statement of the chief officer of the Haugland that it "appeared to him" when he ported that the Karamea was too far away to hear the whistle; and I think it would be dangerous to accept such a statement by the officer in default as a sufficient ground for absolving the ship from responsibility. The vessels were nearly two miles apart, and a light wind was blowing from the Haugland in the direction of the Karamea. The assessors advising the Court of Appeal saw no reason why at that distance the whistle (if an efficient one) should not have been heard; and the experts advising your Lordships on this appeal did not differ from that view. In the circumstances, it cannot be said to be proved that the whistle would not have been heard; and in the absence of such proof I think the presumption is against the ship which broke the rule. Upon this point I agree with the Court of Appeal and consider that the Haugland was responsible on this ground also.

My conclusions on the above points render it unnecessary for me to consider whether the Haugland is also to be held responsible for not porting more "handsomely" than she did so as to show her red light more clearly to the Karamea. My impression is that she ported sufficiently at the time—her chief officer's evidence is to the effect that she went round 3½ points—and that her mistake was in afterwards starboarding so as to obscure her red light; but the evidence on this point is confused, and it is not necessary to deal with it in detail. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I think that it is impossible to establish different degrees of fault, and accordingly that the liability should be apportioned equally.

I agree that the appeal and cross-appeal fail and should be dismissed with costs, such costs to be set off.

Lord DUNEDIN: My Lords, I concur.

Lord PHILLIMORE.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinions of the noble Lords already pronounced, and I desire to express my concurrence with them, and also with the judgments in the Court of Appeal.

There are considerable difficulties in the story of the Haugland; but upon the Karamea's own showing the vessels were at one time so heading that they might be considered as vessels crossing so as to involve risk of collision, and this being the case it was the duty of the Karamea to keep her course and not to starboard, as she did, and certainly her starboarding contributed to the collision. Therefore, she was rightly held to blame.

With regard to the Haugland, both courts found her to blame for not stopping and reversing her engines before the collision, and your Lordships have no doubt that this is right, and that she must be held partly in fault. I think that she was further in fault, for not blowing the whistle signal required by the rules to be given by one vessel taking action for another. The Haugland was the ship that had to give way, and her proper course was to do so by porting her helm, and signifying the same by a short blast on her whistle. She did not blow a blast when she ported her helm, not till just before the collision. The excuse given by her officer for not doing so is that the vessels were too far apart for the whistle signal to be heard. It is a lame excuse at the best, and in my view it has no firm foundation. If, as suggested, the vessels were two miles apart when the order to port was given, it might be that the signal would not have been heard, but as I read the evidence it is impossible that any effective order to port for the Karamea could have been given at two miles; if it had been given, there would have been no collision. I believe that the order to port for the Karamea was given much later. There might have been an order to port for the buoy to bring it ahead (I do not say there was), when the vessels were two miles apart, but, if so, it was not given for the Karamea. It might be the true explanation for not blowing the whistle, if, in fact, the action was not taken for the Karamea, but in the ordinary navigation of the Haugland to enable her to run into Montevideo. I believe that when the helm was ported for the Karamea, the vessels were within hearing distance.

Then I further agree with the Court of Appeal that the porting of the Haugland for the Karamea whenever this action was taken, was not sufficiently large and effective. It might be thought as a matter of law that all that the ship which has to get out of the way has to do is to take just sufficiently effective steps in just sufficient time, and it might be thought that she so doing ought not to be found to blame, even if the insufficiency and delay of the proper manœuvre has puzzled the other ship, and led her to do something which she should not.

I pronounce no opinion. But it is in order to prevent this state of things arising that the provisions for these whistle signals have been introduced into the regulations. When I was first acquainted with these matters, these provisions were not in the rules. It was only experience, when steamship collisions became frequent, that showed the necessity for them. Supposing that the Haugland had ported just enough to have avoided the collision if the Karamea had not starboarded. It was the very smallness and lateness of this porting, coupled with the absence of the affirming signal, which led the Karamea to starboard. The two matters cannot be separated. The signal might not have been wanted if the porting had been in itself sufficiently significant, but the porting being insignificant, the signal was required. And the disobedience of the rule in failing to give it was an important contributory cause of the collision.

(Before Lords HALDANE, FINLAY, DUNEDIN, SHAW and SUMNER.)

ANCHOR LINE LIMITED v. MOHAD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Workmen's compensation—Seaman—Round voyage—Accident—Partial incapacity—Rejoining ship while on unfinished voyage—Subsequent desertion during voyage—"Liability" to maintain seaman—Claim to immediate compensation—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 34 (1)—Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 58), s. 7 (1) (e).

The respondent, a Mohammedan seaman, was engaged by the appellants for a round voyage from Bombay to the United Kingdom and back to Bombay within a year. On the voyage he met with a rather severe accident to his right hand. He was treated in hospital at Marseilles, and then brought by the appellants in one of their steamers to Liverpool and thence by train to Glasgow, where he rejoined the ship. Shortly afterwards he deserted.

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 provides by sect. 7 (1) (e): "The weekly payment shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as amended by any subsequent enactment or otherwise liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured seaman, or apprentice."

Held (Lord Sumner dissenting), that when the seaman deserted, the liability of the shipowners, under sect. 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 to maintain him, ceased and the seaman was then entitled to put forward his claim for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906.

Judgment of the Court of Session affirmed.

APPEAL from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (the Lord Justice Clerk and Lords Dundas, Salvesen and Ormsdale) reversing the determination of the sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906.

The sheriff-substitute held that sect. 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 and sect. 7 (1) (e) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 should be read together, and that he, as arbitrator, was entitled to refuse an award of compensation. The Second Division held that there was, under the circumstances, a supersession of the right given by the Merchant Shipping Acts because of the desertion of the applicant and his repudiation of his rights under those Acts, and that the applicant had a right to an operative award of compensation at once, and they remitted the case to the arbitrator.

The shipowners appealed.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1906 by sect. 34 (1) provides:

If the master of, or a seaman belong to, a ship receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, or suffers from any illness (with certain exceptions) the expense of providing the necessary surgical and medical advice and attendance and medicine, and also the expenses of the maintenance of the master or seaman until he is cured, or dies, or is returned to a proper return port, and of his conveyance to the port, and in the case of death the expense (if any) of his burial, shall be defrayed by the owner of the ship, without any deduction on that account from his wages.

Moncrieff, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar) and B. Sandeman for the appellants.

Morrice Mackay, K.C., Craigie M. Aitchison and A. H. W. Gillies (all of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent.

Their Lordships, by a majority (Lord Sumner dissenting) dismissed the appeal.

Lord HALDANE.—The point in this appeal is a very short one, and it turns, in the view which I shall venture to submit to your Lordships, on the construction of a section in the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 and a section in the Workmen's Compensation Act of the same year.

The way in which the question arose was this. It was a question tried under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the arbitrator being the sheriff-substitute of Lanarkshire, and he has made a statement of his findings in the usual form, which is somewhat meagre, but which raises the point.

The respondent, who was a Mohammedan seaman, was engaged by the appellants, apparently at Bombay, for a round voyage from that city to the United Kingdom and back to Bombay within a year, and in the course of the voyage he met with an accident to his right hand, which appears to have been of a somewhat severe character. After the accident the respondent was treated in hospital at Marseilles, where the steamer appears to have stopped, and then he was brought, after treatment, by the appellants in one of their steamers to Liverpool and thence by train to Glasgow, where he rejoined the steamer, the Circassia. Just after this, in Sept. 1920, he left the Circassia without leave and deserted the service.

Now these are the facts as found, and on these facts the arbitrator raises this question, which went to the second division: "On the facts as stated, and in view of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, s. 34, and the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, s. 7 (1) (e), was I, as arbitrator, entitled to refuse an award of compensation?" The view he took was this, that the two statutes must be read together, and that the right given by the Workmen's Compensation Act was a right which could not be put into operation because of a provision as to liability in the other Act to which I will in a moment call your Lordships' attention. The provision in the Merchant Shipping Act is the one which comes first in the order of date; the two Acts were passed in the same year, but the Merchant Shipping Act was passed, I think, first. It is sect. 34, and provides sub-sect. 1. [His Lordship read the section and continued.] Now that is a right given to the seaman in the present case. The Workmen's Compensation Act, s. 7, sub-s. (1) (e), says this: "The weekly payment" (that is in the case of compensation being recovered under the Workmen's Compensation Act) "shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, as amended by any subsequent enactment, or otherwise, liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured master, seaman, or apprentice." Now the real question seems to me on those sections to be whether there was liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts to defray the expenses of maintenance.

The case, as I have said, went to the second division, and in the second division their Lordships answered the question adversely to the shipowner, adopting the construction that this was a case in which there was a right to an operative award compensation immediately. They hold that there was, under the circumstances, a supersession of the right which was given by the Merchant Shipping Act because of the desertion of the seaman and his repudiation of the right given by the Merchant Shipping Act for his own benefit. The Lord Justice Clerk, Lord Dundas, Lord Slavesen, and Lord Ormsdale took that view, and in the result they sent back the case to the arbitrator to proceed in the awarding of compensation at once under the Workmen's Compensation Act, taking all circumstances into account and following the usual procedure. They evidently thought that what the sheriff-substitute ought to do was to award compensation and determine its amount, all the circumstances relating to benefits actually already received under the Merchant Shipping Act being taken into account.

Turning back for a moment to the Workmen's Compensation Act, the words are that the weekly payment is not to be payable "in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is . . . liable to defray the expenses of maintenance." Now, the seaman deserted, and he abandoned thereby his right to claim under the section of the Merchant Shipping Act, and consequently there was no liability on the part of the shipowner. That is the interpretation I put on the two sections. If I am right, then the view taken in the second division was the true one.

For these reasons I move, your Lordships, that the judgment of the court below be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord FINLAY.—I am of the same opinion, I concur with the judgments delivered in the second division of the Court of Session. If I may respectfully say so, I think there is a fallacy in the judgment of the sheriff-substitute, and that is this, that he regards the provisions of sect. 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906 as being to prolong the contract of employment. What he says is this: "Under the contract both parties were bound for the period of a voyage from Bombay to the United Kingdom and back to Bombay, and it appears to me that the effect of sect. 34 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906" (that is the section which provides for the expenses of medical attendance in case of injury or illness) "is to prevent an earlier termination of the contract through the inability of the workman to continue in the performance of the duties of his service. The defenders, under the contract and the provision of the statute, are under an obligation to maintain the pursuer till they return him to Bombay, and the pursuer is under a reciprocal obligation to remain on the ship and perform the duties of his employment if and when, and to the extent he is able. The defenders may have, and I expect have, an interest to require the pursuer to return to Bombay, where he will be among his own people and have the best chance of obtaining such employment as his diminished capacity must in future restrict him to. In my opinion the pursuer is not entitled to desert his employment and have his rights under the Workmen's Compensation Act determined in advance." That judgment proceeds on the assumption that the contract of employment was continued by virtue of the section in question, and that the case turns on the point whether he can take advantage of his own breach of contract by deserting his service in the ship. It appears to me that the effect of this section is not at all what the learned sheriff-substitute has said. The effect of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act is to engraft on the contract of service certain statutory provisions for the benefit of the sailor. It does not prolong the contract of service. The provisions made by the Merchant Shipping Act for the benefit of the sailor are absolutely independent of the question whether the contract of service continues, or whether it does not. It may continue, or it may not continue, but the statutory provisions for the benefit of the sailor do not in the least imply that it does continue, and they do not depend upon its continuance. That seems to me to be the view that underlies the decision of the sheriff-substitute, in which he treats the case as resolving itself into the question of whether the sailor can take advantage of his own wrong in breaking the contract of service and deserting his employment. The question seems to me not to be of that sort at all. The question is whether the sailor is entitled to say: "I do not want the benefits which are conferred upon me by the Merchant Shipping Act. I prefer to go at once for the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act." In plain words it comes to this, whether the owners are entitled to say that the man must be repatriated to get compensation, and whether the owners have the right to say that the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, which seem to me to be intended in favour of the workmen, must be carried out for their benefit, I do not stop to inquire—it would be mere speculation—what the reason of the owners may be. The sheriff-substitute suggests that it may be because there would be more chance of the man's getting employment in Bombay among his own people so that the workman's compensation would be reduced. It may possibly be that, or it may be some other reason, but to seek for the reasons is to enter into the field of speculation. What we have to do is simply to determine what is the effect of the statutes.

Now, it appears to me that it is not a question of a part of the contract of service; there is no clause in the contract of service to affect the section of the Merchant Shipping Act for the benefit of the sailor; it is a mere statutory right given to the sailor for his benefit in the events which are contemplated by these sections; and, of course, it is obviously in the highest degree desirable that there should be such provision, for very cruel cases might indeed arise if a sailor were left in a foreign port. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that there was no consent of the owner wanted to a renunciation by the sailor of the benefits conferred upon him. It is not in the least material whether he deserted or whether he did not; what he did unequivocally desire was not to be taken back to Bombay. The owner's case is that he is entitled to require him to go back to Bombay, not in the sense that he could have him arrested and put on board and taken back, but that unless he goes back to Bombay he could not get the benefit of the workmen's compensation. I cannot find that anywhere in the provisions to which we have been referred. After all, the question comes back to be that of the construction of sect. 7 (1) (e) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906: "The weekly payment shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as amended by any subsequent enactment or otherwise, liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured master, seaman, or apprentice." The reading contended for by the appellants is that that denotes the period during which liability under the Merchant Shipping Act might exist. I think it denotes the period during which liability actually exists, and if the workman has done some thing which will afford a complete defence to any claim by the workman against the owner under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act for repatriation, maintenance, and all the rest of it, there is an end of the liability under the Merchant Shipping Act in respect of these provisions the owner is no longer liable, and what the heading to sub-sect. (1) of sect. 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, means is that so long as the owner of the ship is, in fact, on the facts of the case, liable under that section, the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act shall not come into play. As was said by several members of your Lordships' House in McDermott v. Owners of Steamship Tintoretto (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 103 L. T. Rep. 769; (1911) A. C. 35) I think the object is to prevent the overlapping of benefits, and it appears to me that it would be a very strange reading of the section to say that you are to take some period during which the right to the benefits under the Merchant Shipping Act would continue if the sailor had not renounced them. Inasmuch as the sailor has most effectually renounced them, and there is no possibility of the owner's being made liable under the Merchant Shipping Act, I think all question of overlapping is out of the question, and on the plain meaning of the Act the defence fails.

Lord DUNEDIN.—I have found this case one of considerable difficulty, but in the end I have come to be of the same opinion as those of your Lordships who have already addressed the House.

The effect of the 7th section of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, is to apply it to seamen, and the immediate effect of that is that, if there is an accident, a seaman, like other workmen, will be entitled to compensation in terms of the first schedule, and the terms of the first schedule provide for a weekly payment in respect of a "total or partial incapacity." But then sect. 7, while it applies the Act, does so under certain modifications, and one modification is that under sect. 7 (1) (e) there is cut out from the payments that the seaman would naturally receive all payments during a certain period, and that period is thus defined: "Compensation shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as amended by any subsequent enactment or otherwise, liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured master, seamen, or apprentice."

Now the whole point, I think, is whether that expression in the Act "liable" refers to the period under which there may be what I may call potential liability under the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, or whether it means the period during which under the exact circumstances of the case there is de facto liability. I have come to be of opinion that the more natural way of taking the two Acts together is to take the latter reading.

My great difficulty has arisen from this, that undoubtedly that does allow a person to take advantage of his own default, in this sense, that he may default in order to get the more ample provision under Act two than he would have got under Act one. If the Act gives it to him, it may be bad policy, but still he gets it. I say that because Mr. Mackay made an effort to show that here such benefits as the seamen was entitled to get were benefits outside the contract and after the termination of the contract. I do not go on that at all, because I do not think we have got in this case sufficient facts found to know whether this particular man's contract of service had been terminated or not. That the man's contract could be terminated by being landed at a foreign port I have no doubt. I have equally little doubt that it could not be terminated if he were landed only a few hours, even though a certificate were given. Therefore I have gone, I think, upon the natural meaning of the finding of the sheriff-substitute when he speaks of his deserting his service. Notwithstanding that, I I think, taking the two Acts of Parliament as they stand, they lead to the result to which I have eventually come, and I therefore also agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord SHAW.—I agree. When seamen were included under the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act, it was necessary, of course, to provide that there should be, if possible, no clash with the already existing beneficial provisions applicable to seamen under the Merchant Shipping Acts.

In the case of McDermott v. Owners of the Steamship Tintoretto in this House (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 103 L. T. Rep. 769; (1911) A. C. 35) we found that the principle to be applied was not to refuse the benefits under either Act, except in the sense that there should be no conflicting or overlapping provisions, but that, instead of that, the beneficial provisions of both sections should be applicable.

In the present case I confess that I have two difficulties on the matter of the statement of the case. I do not know to this hour now—nor does any of your Lordships—when this contract was made; accordingly none of us know when the period of twelve months from the making of the contract would have expired. In the second place, I do not know, nor has this House been informed, when this round voyage, on which this seamen was employed, came to an end. I find myself slow to accept the view that a voyage which began anterior to June—one of the incidents of which was the accident to this workman in the month of June 1920 was the round voyage contracted for which was only in course of completion in the subsequent month of September. The vessel was then in Glasgow, and presumably would reach Bombay in, shall we say, six or eight weeks' time thereafter. That is not in accordance with the usual despatch of vessels of that class; but it may be so. Your Lordships will observe the difficulty in which everybody is placed by the lack of knowledge definitely of that fact. For if the round voyage had been definitely concluded, then it appears to me humbly that this seaman's contract was at an end. It was not a contract for a period of twelve months' service to these owners; it was a contract for one round voyage—not a contract of service on a snippet of portions of a round voyage which counted up together would make one, but one continuous round voyage.

Fortunately the absence of knowledge of these facts does not, on further consideration, prevent us from settling how the law of this case stands. I agree with Lord Finlay that the view taken by the learned sheriff-substitute, which he embodies in a phrase in his note, as to the reciprocal obligations on the part of this seaman to remain and perform his duty, cannot be applied in this case. The seaman was an injured man. It seems out of the question to suggest that there were reciprocal obligations in September when he came back injured and unable to perform, as the learned sheriff-substitue finds, anything other than exceptional duties, or that he was able to continue as an A. B. seaman in the service of these employers.

The whole matter appears to me to be settled, as Lord Dunedin has said, by the construction of the single word "liable" in sect. 7 (1) (e) of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. What happened was this. In June the workman sustained his accident; he was put ashore in Marseilles; he remained in hospital for some weeks there, and afterwards he arrived in Glasgow under very proper arrangements, I am certain, made by the owners of the Circassia. He went on board the ship which was then going to sail for Bombay, and he left the ship. If the learned sheriff-substitute is of opinion that that was a continuing service, he is justified in using the word "deserting"; but whether the seaman deserted the ship or whether he left it as of right matters nothing in the construction of this section, because I am clearly of opinion that when the owners made this seaman the offer to convey him from Glasgow to Bombay, to his own home port, and when the seaman declined to accept that offer, the obligation of the owners was completely at an end, and it is mere finesse, without any sense or reason, to argue that they still remained liable to perform that obligation.

There is no such liability—it is at an end. And if there be no such liability, I have to construe now these words: "The weekly payment" (such a payment as is asked in this case) "shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of the ship is, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, as amended by any subsequent enactment, or otherwise, liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured master, seaman, or apprentice." There is no such liability; there are no such expenses to pay; they have been all paid except the return journey, and the return journey is not asked. It is a mere conjectural or imaginative liability that is set up, and I cannot construe the statute in any sense than that it applies to the actual fact of liability, not to an imaginative situation.

For these reasons I concur.

Lord SUMNER.—It is my misfortune to think that the judgment of the second division was wrong; it is my much greater misfortune to be unable to agree with the opinions of your Lordships. With all humility, but without any doubt, I will ask your Lordships to bear with me for a few minutes while I say why.

There is no sounder principle in Workmen's Compensation cases than to abide literally and loyally by the findings of the arbitrator; and to my mind it is perfectly clear that the arbitrator in this case found as a fact that the seaman in question was still in the service of the appellants at the time when he deserted. He says that after the man had been treated in hospital at Marseilles, and brought by one of the appellants' steamers to Liverpool, and thence by train to Glasgow, he "rejoined" the Circassia, and that while there, and while the appellants were in process of returning the respondent to the port of Bombay in terms of their contract (that is their contract of employment) and of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, "he left the said steamship Circassia without leave, and deserted his service." Those terms are perfectly appropriate in describing the conduct of a seaman, who, after a temporary absence in hospital, resumed his service on his former ship, did not like it, absented himself without leave, and committed the offence of desertion; they are absolutely inappropriate to describing what has been suggested at the Bar, that is to say, the position of a person whose contract of employment has terminated, who has been brought, without any great amount of acquiescence on his part, back to his ship, and has been invited to proceed in her as a passenger to Bombay, and has then said that he does not like it, and would prefer to remain even in Glasgow.

I wish to remind your Lordships that, if he deserted, as it is found that he did, he was not only liable for an offence punishable by summary conviction, but under sect. 222 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the master and owners were entitled to the services of the police, and were also entitled to use their own force, in order to bring the man back to his ship and make him resume his service and proceed with the ship to sea. The sheriff-substitute misused language strangely if he said this man had "deserted," that is to say, had committed an offence of that kind, if all that he had really done was to decline to take his passage by the ship that was tendered to him. It was also plainly assumed in the judgments below that his service continued, and that he was deserting in the true sense of the word; and the point argued and decided there was whether, in spite of his having broken his contract of service and not having brought it to an end, he could claim at his own hand to apply sect. 7 (1) (e) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 to his own advantage even although it conflicted with the corresponding section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906.

I think probably the most important thing is to look at these two sections together. It is to be borne in mind that the two Acts of 1906 received the Royal Assent at the same time and on the same day, and that one was complementary to the other.

The Workmen's Compensation Act provided for the terms on which seamen should be brought within the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act; the Merchant Shipping Act provided among other things for limitations upon that benefit, which arose out of the special treatment systematically extended to seamen under all the Merchant Shipping Acts. Now here is a man whose services has not been brought to an end in the manner provided by the Merchant Shipping Acts with the formalities strictly prescribed under them. He has never received his discharge; he was not in fact left at Marseilles under circumstances that terminated his employment, or, at any rate, it is not so found, and on the contrary it is found in my view that he was still in the employment of the ship. Under these circumstances he has sustained an accident. Now the weekly payment which in respect of that accident may be payable "shall not be payable in respect of the period during the owner of the ship is, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 as amended by any subsequent enactment, or otherwise, liable to defray the expenses of maintenance of the injured master, seaman, or apprentice," Considering that those two pieces of legislation are absolutely co-terminous, it seems to me that the natural construction is to treat the reference to the Merchant Shipping Act, as amended, as being a short way of inserting in the Workmen's Compensation Act the relevant provision, namely, sect. 34, sub-sect. (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906; for I will assume (as it has been assumed throughout) that it is sect. 34, sub-sect. (1), and not sect. 34, sub-sect. (2) which governs this case. I think the natural mode of reading that is to say that the weekly payment shall not be payable in respect of the period during which the owner of a ship, under the Merchant Shipping Act, when ever a seaman receives any hurt or injury in the service of the ship, is liable to defray the expense of attendance and medicine and the expenses of maintenance until he has returned to a proper return port, without any deduction on that account from his wages. Although in the case of McDermott v. Owners of the Steamship Tintoretto your Lordships' House was dealing with another question, I would quote the language of Lord Loreburn (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. at p. 516; 103 L. T. Rep. at p. 770; (1911) A. C. 35, at p. 39) as expressing what I take to be the construction of these two sections read together: "Before 1906 the seaman was not within the Act. In 1906 the right to compensation for accidental injury was extended to seamen, and begins when the injured seaman ceases to be entitled to maintenance. It is clear that compensation is to begin exactly where the right to maintenance ends." On that ground I think that this question does not depend upon what, in particular circumstances, a seaman might be able to sue for, or what might constitute a defence to a shipowner, if he chose to set it up, when sued. The reference to the Merchant Shipping Act is a mode of reading the two sections together. In view of the fact that the man was still in the service of the ship, in view of the fact that being in the service of the ship he was bound to render such service as he could in return for his wages, in view of the fact that the finding is that he was partially incapacitated, and, as anybody can see who knows the sea, there were many things he might have been employed to do, I think it is plain that, on the one hand, the owner was to pay wages and to defray all these various expenses, but, on the other hand, the seaman was bound to render services suitable to his state and capacity so far as he could. That being so, the Workmen's Compensation Act period had not begun because the Merchant Shipping Act period had not terminated.

Suppose the right way to look at it is as your Lordships are minded to do, and to say that the word "liable" means liable in the particular circumstances of the case, I regret to see—doubtless it must be my inadvertence—that in more than one passage in the judgment in the court below it has been assumed that it is possible for a seaman, by breaking his contract and deserting his service, to bring the contract to an end at his own hand, either in whole or in part. I do not understand it to have been contended before your Lordships that that doctrine is really true. I understand the two propositions presented here to be, first of all, that the benefit, whether it arose under the contract or arose under the statute, the contract having terminated, was a benefit of a unilateral character which the seaman could waive at any time that he chose, or, secondly, that the word "liable" in the Workmen's Compensation Act may have the effect of meaning that in this particular case the statute enacted that one party to a contract can, at his own hand, terminate reciprocal obligations in the contract without the assent of the other party. I cannot believe that such an invasion of the law of contract was intended by the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906; and, as to the other point, I think it is quite clear that, under the circumstances, the benefit of maintenance did not constitute a purely unilateral advantage which it was simply competent to the seaman to waive. Under the contract, as regulated by this statute, the shipowner has an interest in his obligation to maintain the seaman—that is one way of putting it—or he has a right, dependent upon the continuance of the period of maintenance which is of advantage to him, namely, to postpone in his favour the Workmen's Compensation Act period until the termination of the Merchant Shipping Act period. It follows that to say that by deserting the workman got rid of any obligation as to his maintenance, for he discharged it, is to overlook the circumstances that the existence of that obligation was a thing beneficial to the shipowner, and, being a thing which arose out of the contract, could only be discharged either by mutual consent, which was not given, or by a repudiation of the obligations of the contract on the one hand, assented to expressly, or by implication, on the other. Neither of these things is found to have occurred. Surely it is not a fair statement of the argument for the appellant to say, as I think the learned judges below did say, that the shipowner claims the right to repatriate a seaman, or to declare that his return to Bombay is a condition precedent to any obligation on his part under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The real point—at least, I should have thought so—is that to permit a workman, by refusing to proceed and be maintained on the voyage, and to perform such services for his wages as he is fit to perform and to receive his ultimate discharge in due statutory form, when he is returned to Bombay, to say that he, being under those obligations, is entitled to declare by committing the crime of desertion that he will not perform them any longer, and thereupon entitles himself to bring into operation, for his own advantage and for the disadvantage of the shipowner, the Workmen's Compensation Act earlier than it would otherwise come into operation, is to deprive the shipowner of his rights under the contract, namely, to hold the man to his service, to require that, being only partially incapacitated, he shall render any services that he can of a seamanlike character, and, above all, by maintaining in force the obligations of the service and of the Merchant Shipping Act to postpone the application of the Workmen's Compensation Act. It appears to me to be quite clear that, even if you read the words "liable to defray" as meaning "liable under the particular circumstances to defray," or "de facto liable to defray," or "possessed of no defence that he could plead to an action for not defraying"—even if you read the words in that sense—you cannot do so without affirming that this contract has been made by this harmless-looking sub-section, different from all other contracts, and is a contract which one party can break and thereupon dissolve to his own advantage without the consent of the other party. That, as I have already said, I do not think the statute provides. I, therefore, should have thought that the appeal should have been allowed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT.

Prize—Mails of a neutral state—Seizure—Transmission of mails by rail for examination— Damage by fire during transmission—Liability of captor—Duty to insure—Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915.

Certain parcels of goods of enemy origin and enemy property were consigned per the Swedish parcel mails to the claimants, who were domiciled in New York. The postal bags containing these packages were seized at the port of K. under the provision of the Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915. Eventually the bags came into the hands of the post office authorities at K., who sent them by rail to the censor of parcel post in London, there being no facilities for the examination of the postals bag at K. On the railway journey some of the goods were destroyed or injured by fire. Those packages which were delivered in London were seized and sold in due course, the net proceeds being subsequently paid to the claimants. The claimants sought to recover from the Procurator-General the loss of that part of the consignment which had been affected by the fire, contending that the captors had failed to exercise due care in the control of the goods; in sending them to London they had caused a deviation in the voyage which avoided the existing insurances upon them, and they had failed to hand them over to the Marshal, as provided by the Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915, by whom they would have been insured.

Held, that for unreasonable action for negligence and for wilful wrong doing the captors were liable from the time of seizure to the time when the res was placed in the custody of the Prize Court. There was neither principle nor authority for placing the responsibility of those who exercised a lawful right of search or who acted in accordance with the terms of a reprisals order any higher than that of actual captors. As far as the Marshal was concerned the question of insurance did not arise as the loss occurred before the bags were placed in his custody at all.

Held, further, that as the Order in Council provided for detention and for sale of the chattels detained, it was the net cash proceeds which were to be restored. If the court made an order just in itself, with regard to the disposal of such net proceeds as the Marshal had in his hands, so as to discharge him in accordance with its ordinary principles and refused to hold liable either its own officers or the officials who detained, forwarded and searched the parcels mail prior to the seizure in prize of the goods in question, no default having been proved against them, it was strictly adhering to the terms and sense of the Order in Council, and if neutral rights of property suffered, that result could be justified under the terms of the Order of the 11*th March* 1915.

Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. (reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 351; 126 L. T. Rep. 31; (1921) P. 473) affirmed.

APPEAL from a decision of the Prize Court, reported 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 351; 126 L. T. Rep. 31; (1921) P. 473.

The facts, which are sufficiently summarised in the headnote, are fully stated in their Lordships' judgment.

Sir Henry Duke, P. held that the decision in the United States No. 2 (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; 125 L. T. Rep. 446; (1920) P. 430) did not imply an obligation to insure in the duty of the captors to take reasonable care. The captors did not fail in their duty to take care of the goods in their custody when they forwarded the mail bags to London, as there were no facilities for examining mails at Kirkwall. The Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 did not require that seized goods should be placed in the custody of the Marshal as soon as they were brought into port, nor at any particular time. In the present case it could not have been known until after examination whether the goods were subject to seizure or not. In so far as the Order in Council was concerned, it was doubtful whether any breach of duty on the part of public officers as between themselves and the Crown, concerning a matter of administrative instruction, would give a cause of action to foreign owners of goods. Accordingly he came to the conclusion that the demand for damages failed and must be dismissed.

The claimants appealed.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—On the 16th May 1916, the steamship New Sweden, a Swedish vessel outward bound from Christiania to Newport News, put into Kirkwall by her owners' orders and delivered to the surveyor of customs there 157 bags containing postal packages. This was done in pursuance of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. According to the practice in force, these bags were placed in the hands of the postal authorities in the same condition in which they were received and were despatched by rail to London, in order that they might be searched there for goods which were of enemy origin or were otherwise liable to be detained under the order. Such a search at Kirkwall would have been impracticable.

By some accident, unexplained and probably inexplicable, the van containing these bags took fire while the train was passing through Perthshire. Ninety-five bags were destroyed altogether and only sixty-two reached London intact, but seven more were salved in a damaged condition. The mail bags had contained 301 parcels of leather gloves of German manufacture, which belonged to neutral owners, the appellants, but only 113 reached London. Upon examination of the bags there these parcels were discovered and were formally seized on the 9th June 1916 by the Surveyor of Customs, who placed them in the custody of the Marshal of the Prize Court. By decree, dated the 12th Nov. 1917, they were pronounced to be of enemy origin and ordered to be sold. The net proceeds—1073*l.* 17*s.* 3*d.* were ordered to be released to the appellants' solicitors by consent of the Procurator-General on the 6th May 1921, and thereafter the appellants moved for an order that the Procurator-General should pay them damages for the gloves lost. The President dismissed this motion and the present appeal was then brought.

Persons who claim the release of goods in prize or of money lodged in court to represent them, may charge the Procurator-General, in virtue of his office as the person liable to answer for the shortcomings either of officials, who have dealt with the goods before they were placed in the custody of the marshal, or of the marshal himself. It is plain that it was no part of the duty of those who brought the New Sweden in or received what she discharged, to place goods in the custody of the Prize Court which were neither enemy goods nor goods of enemy origin. Equally little was it the function of the Marshal, to take charge of such goods. Before any delivery could be made to him examination and discrimination were indispensable, and the case must therefore be considered both in regard to events happening before the seizure and in regard to those happening after it. As no actual neglect or default is alleged in connection with the way in which the goods were dealt with, the appellants' contention is either that some or all of these officials stand towards the owners of the goods in the position of insurers and are answerable for their safety and ultimate return in all events, or that they were under some obligation towards the appellants to effect policies of insurance for their benefit.

There has been from time to time some difference of opinion as to the exact degree of care which is required of captors, but their obligation has always been recognised as being one of care and prudence It has never been placed so high as that of insuring or answering in all events for the safety of the prize, whether by protecting it from all hazard or providing through policies of insurance a fund to make good its loss. The law is now well settled that it is for unreasonable action, for negligence and for wilful wrongdoing, that captors are liable from the time of seizure to the time when the res is placed in the custody of the Prize Court. If the obligation went beyond that of reasonable care and abstention from wilful wrong, most of the discussions and decisions on this subject would have been wholly beside the mark. There is neither principle nor authority for placing the responsibility of those who exercise a lawful right of search, or who act in accordance with the terms of a Reprisals Order, any higher than that of actual captors. On the other hand, insurance of the owners' interest is clearly a matter for the owners themselves. In this particular case the length of time elapsing between the Order in Council and the shipment in question raises the presumption that the owners were fully alive to the possibility and even the probability that the New Sweden would put into Kirkwall and that the goods, after being removed from the ship, would be despatched to London. It may be that they actually insured against the risks thereby incurred; it certainly does not appear that such an insurance was impracticable.

Their Lordships have already declared their opinion that "there is no obligation on the part of the Crown or its executive officers or the Prize Court Marshal to effect insurances against fire for the benefit of cargo-owners, whether the cargo be landed or kept on board a captured ship." (The Südmark (No. 2), 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 201; 118 L. T. Rep. 383; (1918) A. C. at p. 484; The Cairnsmore and The Gunda, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 162; 124 L. T. Rep. 553; (1921) 1 A. C., at p. 441), though in general the Marshal does insure goods in his custody. As against claimants, to whom goods which might have been condemned are in fact released, the premiums are not charged on them in ordinary circumstances. Where, however, the goods are detained only and cannot be condemned, it has been held (The United States (No. 2), 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; 125 L. T. Rep. 446; (1920) P. 430) that the premiums constitute an expense, which the goods must bear. On this principle a small sum was deducted for insurance in the present case in arriving at the net proceeds. Their Lordships do not understand this deduction to be challenged, but only to be used as an argument that the goods should have been insured at an earlier stage—namely, during the railway journey, when, as it proved, they ran some risk. As far as the Marshal is concerned, however, the point does not arise, for the fire took place before the bags were formally seized or were placed in his custody at all, and he could not be bound to insure goods which had not been seized, or liable for more than the goods which were delivered to him or their proceeds. The appellants' attempt to find some duty in the officers, who bring in and examine the goods, to accelerate the date of their delivery to the Marshal, in order that any policy kept afoot by him might attach and protect them at the earliest possible moment, is one not supported by any authority. It is true, that as their Lordships were informed, the President stated that he had it on high authority, apparently that of the Marshal himself, that the Surveyor of Customs at Kirkwall was one of his deputies, but not only is there no evidence that in taking possession of the bags and forwarding them that official was acting as such deputy, but the facts that he was then acting only in furtherance of a right of examination and search and that the delivery to the Marshal's custody is stated to have taken place in London after the fire, are conclusive that he was not. The loss therefore occurred before the functions of the Marshal had begun.

The appellants finally rested their case on the terms expressed in, or to be implied from, the Order in Council itself. Its validity has already been the subject of decision by their Lordships, and it was not suggested that transmission of the mail-bags to London for examination inflicted unreasonable or unnecessary risk or loss upon neutrals. In fact, examination in London is probably as much in favour of the security of the owners as it is of the efficiency of the examination in the interests of the belligerent. It is argued that the whole scheme of the Order is to provide for temporary detention only, which implies final restoration, and that the Order, being in itself an interference with neutral property, not warranted by ordinary rights of capture but dependent on abnormal circumstances which gave rise to a right of reprisal, nothing can be held to be authorised to the prejudice of the neutral beyond that which the order expressly sanctions. This is applied in two ways. The Marshal's duty, it is said, is to be in a position, quacunque viâ, to restore when detention ends, and to restore in value, if not in specie; and the duty of those who act before his custody begins is to put him in a position to discharge this duty—that is, to deliver to him, at all events, all the goods brought in, so that he may thereafter be in a position to detain and to restore them. Both duties must be derived from the Order in Council.

It is true that the Order in Council provides for detention, and that in no event is condemnation in question, though it is contemplated that the ownership in the goods may be divested, since this is the result of sale, but the terms of the order are precise and unambiguous, and no extension of them by implication is involved in the deductions which their Lordships propose to make from them. Detention no doubt implies ultimate restoration, but restoration of what? As the order expressly provides for sale of the chattels detained, the restoration is not necessarily or commonly restoration in specie. What is to be restored is the net cash proceeds. The Order requires that the goods in question "shall be placed in the custody of the Marshal of the Prize Court, and, if not requisitioned for the use of His Majesty, shall be detained or sold under the direction of the Prize Court. The proceeds of goods so sold shall be paid into court and dealt with in such manner as the court may in circumstances deem to be just." Since nothing further is directed, the court can but apply the same principles as it is accustomed and bound to apply in matters of prize, and there is a special provision that the ordinary practice and procedure of the Prize Court is to be followed, mutatis mutandis. This provision art. V, (2), is not exclusive of all other resort to the principles of prize law, but is inclusive of practice and procedure, such as they may be when the order is put into force. It follows that if the court makes an order, just in itself, with regard to the disposal of such net proceeds as the Marshal has in his hands, so as to discharge him in accordance with its ordinary principles and refuses to hold liable either its own officers or the officials who detain, forward and search the parcels mail prior to the seizure in prize of the goods in question, no default having been proved against them, it is strictly adhering to the terms and sense of the Order in Council, and if neutral rights of property suffer, that result can be justified under the terms of the order of the 11th March 1915. For these reasons their Lordships think that the order appealed from was right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and so they will humbly advise His Majesty.

Appeal dismissed.

THE ANICHAB AND OTHER VESSELS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT, ENGLAND.

Prize — Property of enemy — Maritime prize — Lighters and craft seized afloat—Lighters and craft seized when beached—Lighters and craft seized on land—Removal to avoid capture—Military and naval operations—"Hot pursuit"—Nature of operations—Right to damages for wrongful seizure—Jurisdiction of court—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), s. 34—Fourth Hague Convention 1907, art. 53.

A number of enemy-owned tugs, lighters, and other craft, as well as a quantity of material, were seized by the British forces during the course of the campaign in South-West Africa in 1914 and 1915. Some of the seizures took place in two ports which were occupied by the British forces, a part of the craft being afloat and a part being beached, some below and some above high water mark. Upon the approach of the British forces part of the craft was moved inland, and was eventually seized some six months later at the places which were respectively 148 and 310 miles distant from the coast. The Crown claimed condemnation of the whole.

Held, that the captures of property made inland by military forces did not subject such property to condemnation as maritime prize, and it was immaterial that the property thus seized might subsequently be used under conditions which would subject it, if so used, to condemnation as maritime prize.

Judgment of Lord Sterndale, P. (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 538; 122 L. T. Rep. 249; (1919) P. 323) affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of Lord Sterndale, P. (reported 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 538; 122 L. T. Rep. 249); (1919) P. 329).

This was an action in which the Crown asked for the condemnation of a certain number of tugs, lighters, and other craft and material belonging to the enemy. During the campaign in German South-West Africa in 1914 and 1915 the enemy territory was invaded and the ports of Swakopmund and Lüderitzbucht were occupied. These ports are respectively north and south of Walfisch Bay. Prior to the war the Woermann Line, which was a German steamship company, did considerable trade with South Africa generally, and at the ports named the company had a number of tugs, lighters, and other craft—of various sizes—which were used for the purpose of loading and discharging the German liners and of taking passengers and goods to and from the same. There was also at these ports a quantity of other property, such as buoys and rope fenders, also enemy property, some belonging to the Woermann Line and some belonging to other persons.

When the ports of Swakopmund and Lüderitzbucht were occupied, some of the craft were afloat, some were beached below high-water mark, whilst others were beached above high-water mark. The whole of these were seized. But a number of the craft, upon the approach of the British forces, were taken inland by the Germans in order to avoid capture. They were found some six months later at two places—Omaruru and Otavi—which were respectively 148 and 310 miles distant from the coast when they were seized by the military forces. The Crown claimed condemnation of the whole as prize, whilst the Woermann Line asked for the release of that part of the craft and material which was their property on the ground that it was not liable to condemnation by international law.

The President held that all the captures made in the ports, either afloat or beached above or below high-water mark, was good and lawful prize, but that upon the evidence the captures made inland were not made in "hot pursuit," and the claimants were entitled to have the craft so seized released, but that no damages could be awarded for wrongful seizure, such matters being subject to settlement by diplomatic action after the peace.

The Procurator-General appealed.

Wylie (Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) with him) for the appellant, ex parte.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—This is an appeal against the decree of the Prize Court releasing certain craft, namely, sixteen lighters, and one launch and certain rope fenders, the property of the respondents, captured at Otavi and Omaruru, then in German South-West Africa, by His Majesty's military forces. No case was presented on behalf of the respondents, and the appeal of His Majesty's Procurator-General was heard ex parte.

The question to be decided on the appeal is whether at the time of their capture the said craft had ceased to be the subject of maritime prize, and were private property seized on land by His Majesty's military forces. His Majesty's military forces, operating under the Government of the Union of South Africa, in German South-West Africa, occupied Lüderitzbucht (Lüderitz Bay) on the 19th Sept. 1914 and Swakopmund on the 14th Jan. 1915. A number of vessels, craft, and accessories seized at Lüderitzbucht and Swakopmund were condemned by the learned President as good and lawful prize, and against this decision there is no appeal. The learned President has found in accordance with the evidence of Sir Oswyn Murray that the craft in question in this appeal were found and seized, partly at Omaruru, 148 miles inland, when Omaruru was occupied on the 20th June 1915, and partly at Otavi, 310 miles inland, when Otavi was occupied on the 1st July 1915. There are no rivers in South-West Africa on which the said craft could have been or were intended to be used, and they had been dispatched up the railway line at the request of the respondents, under the authority of a German officer, in order to prevent them falling into the hands of the British forces. It is not disputed that they were property the subject of maritime prize at the declaration of the war, and at that time liable to seizure. The craft were first taken on rail to Richtofen, 12½ miles inland, during August and September, 1914, and were then taken by rail to Usakos, 94 miles inland, during Oct. 1914, where they remained till March 1915. They were forwarded to Omaruru and Otavi during April 1915, and were left standing on rail near the railway stations. There is no doubt but that they were intended to be returned to the coast for naval use.

Sir Oswyn Murray, Secretary to the Admiralty, states in his affidavit that His Majesty's forces, operating under the Government of the Union of South Africa, in German South-West Africa, occupied Lüderitzbucht and Swakopmund at the dates above mentioned, and that in the course of their operations the said forces occupied the northern section of the railway lines from Swakopmund to Otavi, and found and seized the lighters and craft in question at the dates mentioned. The learned President has found that there was no evidence before him that the forces in South Africa were "getting on as fast as they could after these craft to try and get them," and that it is just as consistent on the evidence before him that the first operations might have ceased for a time, and a new operation have begun. He states: "All I know is, that after the first taking possession of the ports, there was an interval of about six months before these craft were taken at places respectively 150 and 300 miles up the country and were taken on land by military forces. It does not seem to me, in those circumstances, that they are the subject of maritime prize."

Their Lordships see no reason for not accepting the findings of fact on which the learned President based his decision, but two points were raised on behalf of the appellant. In the first place it was argued that the craft had not ceased to be liable to capture as maritime prize, when they had only been removed inland in order to escape pursuit at the time when other craft of a similar character were seized at Lüderitzbucht and Swakopmund. It is no doubt accurate to say that property, the subject of maritime prize at the outbreak of war, may be lawfully seized as maritime prize in certain circumstances, although the actual seizure takes place on land. It was held by their Lordships in the case of The Roumanian (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) 1 A. C. 124) that the test of ashore or afloat was no infallible test as to whether goods could or could not be seized as maritime prize, and that it was perfectly clear that enemy goods, for instance, seized on enemy territory by the naval forces of the Crown, might lawfully be condemned as prize. It was held that petroleum on board The Roumanian (ubi sup.) having from the time of the declaration of the war onwards been liable to seizure as prize, did not cease to be so liable, merely because the owners of the vessel, not being able to fulfil their contract for delivery at Hamburg, pumped it into the tanks of the British Petroleum Company, Limited, for safe custody, and that its seizure there as prize was lawful. The fact, therefore, that in the present case the craft were not captured until after they had been carried inland is not conclusive against the case of the appellant; but the learned President has found that there was no evidence before him that after the enemy had succeeded "in getting ashore and running away with his property," the belligerent who was trying to capture it did pursue and take the craft in the course of such pursuit, and that in this respect the facts of the present case did not come within the principle accepted by their Lordships in The Roumanian (ubi sup.). The learned President further held that the capture should be regarded as a capture of property on land by the military forces of the Crown. The capture of property on land by military forces under these conditions would not subject such property to condemnation as maritime prize, and, as already stated, their Lordships see no reason for differing from the learned President in his conclusion of fact.

In the second place the appellant argued that the craft were the subject of maritime prize, on the ground that when they came into possession of their lawful owners they would be applied again to naval purposes. If the property is to be regarded as property on land, seized by the military forces of the Crown, it is not material that it might subsequently be used under conditions, which would subject it, if so used, to condemnation as maritime prize. It is not necessary, in the opinion of their Lordships, to refer to art. 53 of the 4th Convention of The Hague 1907, or to go further than to say that, in their opinion, the learned President was right in his decision that the craft were not subject to condemnation as maritime prize.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

As the respondents have not appeared, there will be no order as to costs.

Preliminary question—Res Judicata—Production of record—Rights of neutral trader.

The plea of res judicata cannot be entertained unless the record of the act of the court on which it was founded is forthcoming, or some valid reason is given why it cannot be produced.

Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. affirmed.

APPEAL from a decision of Sir Henry Duke, P., sitting in the Prize Court who had condemned certain shipments of sole leather and dry hides which had by proclamation of the 11th March 1915 been declared to be absolute contraband as good and lawful prize on the ground that the goods had an enemy destination.

The facts of the case are fully set forth in their Lordships' judgment.

Sir M. Macnaghten, K.C. and H. Hull for the appellants raised the preliminary question whether the action should not be dismissed either on the ground that there was a concluded agreement or on the plea of res judicata. Further they contended that as regards the shipment of the goods the appellants had discharged the onus of proof incumbent on them.

T. Mathew (Sir Gordon Hewart, A.-G. with him) for the respondent.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Lord PARMOOR.—These appeals relate to four shipments of hides and leather, viz.:—

(a) Sixty-eight rollers sole leather shipped at Rio de Janeiro by the appellants on the 20th Sept. 1915, on board the Swedish steamer Annie Johnson consigned to the Svenska Aktiebolaget, Stockholm, Sweden (hereinafter called the Svenska), and seized on the 30th Oct. 1915.

(b) 600 dry hides and 300 rollers sole leather shipped by the appellants at Rio de Janeiro on board the Swedish steamer Kronprinsessan Margareta on the 22nd Oct. 1915, and consigned to the Svenska, and seized the 6th Dec. 1915.

(c) 300 rollers sole leather shipped by the appellants at Rio de Janeiro on the 9th May, 1916, on board the Swedish steamer Kronprins Gustav Adolf, consigned to the Malmo Laderfabrik, Malmo, Sweden, and seized the 9th June, 1916.

(d) 3,660 dry hides shipped by the appellants at Rio de Janeiro on board the Swedish steamer, Kronprinsessan Margareta on the 6th May 1916, consigned to the Malmo Laderfabrik, and seized on the 16th June 1916.

At all material times hides and leather were absolute contraband, having been so declared by proclamation of the 11th March 1915. The appellants are G. Larue and Co., of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, a firm consisting of two partners, Georges Larue and Ernest Durisch. The main question in the appeal is whether the learned President was right in holding that the goods had an enemy destination. There was, however, a preliminary question, raised at the hearing, whether the suit ought not to be dismissed, either on the ground that there was a concluded agreement, upon which the claimants could rely as a bar to the claim for condemnation, or on the plea of res judicata. It appears to have been admitted in the proceedings of the Prize Court that there was no agreement in this case under which the claim of the respondent could be barred. Assuming, however, the point is one which the appellants are entitled to raise, their Lordships can find no evidence of any estoppel, such as would be necessary to bar a claim. On the plea of res judicata it is said that on the 16th Sept. 1916, a letter was sent from the Procurator-General to E. G. Svanstrom, the managing director of the Import Department of the Transmarina Kompaniet Aktiebolag of Stockholm, to which, on the 1st July 1916, the trade of the Svenska with South America had been transferred, informing him that consent had been given to an order being made for the release of the goods to him, upon presentation of the bill of lading in respect of each consignment to the collector of customs, and on payment of any expenditure incurred in connection with the detention of the goods. It was also stated that it would be necessary for him to obtain a licence from the War Trade Department to export goods to Archangel, and that that Department is being notified of the release. The necessary licences were obtained, but E. G. Svanstrom was unable to obtain shipping space for shipment of the goods to Archangel. The delivery of the goods was not in fact taken by the said E. G. Svanstrom, and on the 12th Sept 1918, a letter was written from the Procurator-General informing E. G. Svanstrom that, on consideration, he was not prepared to consent to an order for release of goods, and that the case must therefore proceed in the Prize Court. Their Lordships do not doubt that the plea of res judicata is available in prize, if the necessary conditions exist, but there has been no act of the court in this instance which takes away its jurisdiction to deal with goods still in custody of the marshal. The rules contained in the Prize Court procedure, relating to release, do not appear to have been followed, and no application has been made on behalf of the appellants to ascertain whether an order for release has ever been made judicially. The counsel for the appellants argued that the procedure in this case was the procedure ordinarily followed in a great number of cases. Their Lordships do not know whether this is the case or not, but the plea of res judicata cannot be entertained unless the record of the act of the court on which it was founded is forthcoming, or some valid reason is given why it cannot be produced. The appellants therefore fail on the preliminary question.

The appellants were a firm of merchants dealing in hides, leather, horns, timber and cereals, who had for many years prior to the outbreak of war exported their goods to Havre, mainly for sale in Eastern Europe. It was not possible to carry on the trade of the appellants through Havre after the outbreak of the war. The appellants, therefore, sought a new outlet for their trade, and in the early part of 1915 made arrangements with Holmberg, Bech, and Co., of Rio de Janeiro, to ship goods to be sold on their behalf in Sweden by the Svenska, for whom Holmberg, Bech, and Co. acted as agents in Rio de Janeiro. At the date of all the shipments in question in the appeal, hides had been declared absolute contraband, and consequently, to escape liability to seizure, it was necessary to take such precautions as would be effective to reasonably insure that their destination, or the destination of such products made from them, as military boots, was not an enemy country. The appellants accordingly before shipping any hides did obtain a guarantee that these hides would be used in Sweden, although not obtaining an assurance that manufactured products, if in themselves contraband, such as military boots, would not be exported after being manufactured. The export of hides and leather from Sweden had been prohibited since the 19th Nov. 1914, but the Swedish Government, as they were fully entitled, had refused to prohibit the export of products manufactured from hides and leather. On the 12th Oct. 1915, the Svenska did make a declaration in the following terms, p. 68 :—

"We, the undersigned, who are consignees of sixty-eight rolls of sole leather (about 1000 half-hides) shipped by the Brazilian firm G. Larue and Co., of Rio, in steamship Annie Johnson, from Rio de Janeiro to Gothenburg, hereby certify and bind ourselves that no part of said parcel shall by us or by other person be re-exported in their present condition, nor in any future state or form be exported to countries at war with Great Britain. The goods, which are still unsold, will be sold by us on arrival only against similar guarantees of the buyers, as our above, i.e., that no part of the goods shall either directly by them or by any other person be re-exported in their present condition, nor be exported to countries at war with Great Britain in any future state or form."

Except in this declaration no guarantee was brought to the notice of their Lordships which covered the manufactured products as well as the raw material. The sixty-eight rollers shipped on the Annie Johnson, according to the evidence of Mr. Rooke, who was appointed as a chartered accountant to inspect the books of the Transmarina Company, Stockholm, had been sold prior to seizure to the Stockholm Skofabrik. There may be some doubt whether this sale took place before or after seizure, but the actual date is not of great importance. There is no doubt that the Skofabrik Stockholm did manufacture for export to enemy destination a large number of military boots, and that the rollers in question were suitable raw material for use in such manufacture. There is no evidence that the Svenska required from them any guarantee except against the export of the hides and leather. The question therefore which arises is whether, at the date of seizure, it was probable that military boots made out of the hides and leather seized would, but for such seizure, have had an enemy destination. It cannot be doubted that there was such a probability as would throw on the appellants the burden of proving affirmatively that the destination of any boots manufactured from the hides and leather was in itself innocent. It is said that it is difficult for a neutral trader to discharge the onus thus placed upon him. It would be competent for him to show that the raw material, if it had not been seized, would either have gone to manufacturers who did not export military boots from Sweden; or, if it had gone to manufacturers making military boots for export, to prove that the hides and leathers sold by them had been exclusively used in the manufacture of boots for home use. In the opinion of their Lordships the appellants have not adduced any sufficient evidence to discharge the onus placed upon them. The principles involved are to be found in The Louisiana and other ships (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; 118 L. T. Rep. 274; (1918) A. C. 461), but this case has been so often followed that further reference to it is not necessary.

According to the evidence of Mr. Rooke, no part of the goods of any other of the above ships had been sold either by the appellants to the Svenska, or at all at the date of seizure. The goods shipped by the Kronprins Gustav Adolf and the Kronprinsessan Margareta (second voyage) were consigned to the Malmo Laderfabrik, a Swedish firm which is stated in the affidavit of Mr. Rooke to have carried on business at Malmo as manufacturers of boots, and to have manufactured during the war military boots for the Austrian Government. There does not appear, however, to be any corroboration of this statemant, and Mr. Svanstrom states that the firm was chosen because it was one of the biggest tanneries, financially sound, and there was reason to believe that its standing with the British authorities was good. The arrangement made was that the Malmo Laderfabrik should be consignees, on the understanding that they were to have the right to buy the lots after arrival and inspection. It is said, on behalf of the appellants, that the Transmarina obtained a guarantee from the Malmo Laderfabrik, including not only the hides and leather, but also the goods manufactured from them. No doubt this form of extensive guarantee was mentioned in a letter from Stockholm of the 13th May 1916. The declarations of the Malmo Laderfabrik contained in the evidence do not, however, cover the manufactured products, but only the imported merchandise, and are in the following form:

"We, the undersigned, hereby declare that 300 rollers sole leather shipped about the 10th May 1916 from Rio de Janeiro on the motor ship Kronprins Adolf to Malmo, and consigned to us, are exclusively intended for consumption in Sweden, and that the said merchandise will not be re-exported."

Mr. Svanstrom, in his evidence, states that for all sales made by the Svenska or Transmarina Company guarantees were obtained, saying that goods were exclusively intended for consumption in Sweden. If the guarantees given by the Malmo Laderfabrik had extended to goods manufactured from the imported hides and leather, such guarantees would not in themselves have discharged the burden placed upon the appellants without some evidence that the guarantees, so given, had in fact been complied with. But the conclusion is that the guarantees were limited to imported merchandise. If the guarantees had been intended to cover the manufactured products they would not have been enforceable in Sweden, seeing that the Swedish Government, within its undoubted rights of sovereignty, had refused to prohibit exportation of manufactured products. The result is that the appellants have not in the case of any shipment discharged the onus of proof incumbent on them.

During the hearing in the Prize Court allegations were made affecting the conduct and good faith of the appellants and the Svenska. Sir Malcolm Macnaghten referred at length to the evidence, the letters, and other documents, on which these allegations were founded. In the opinion of their Lordships, it is not necessary for the purpose of determining whether, at the time of seizure, the appellants had discharged the burden of proving that the destination of the goods or of manufactured products made from them was not an enemy country, to determine whether the neutral traders mentioned had rendered themselves liable to the allegations of bad conduct and bad faith made against them. A neutral trader has the right to carry on his trade with an enemy, or to consign his goods to an enemy destination, subject always to the risks and liabilities which international law may impose. In the present case the appellants transferred all control over the goods to be exported to Sweden to the consignees or their representatives, taking guarantees which, whatever they may have thought as to their adequacy, were in their operation not effective. It is fair, however, to say that, in the opinion of their Lordships, the counsel for the respondent exercised a proper discretion in stating that he did not rely on the allegations made against the appellants as any part of his case, and that he did not propose to challenge the explanations given by Sir Malcolm Macnaghten as to the conduct and good faith of the appellants.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, Dec. 6, 1921.

(Before BANKES, SCRUTTON, and ATKIN, L.JJ.).

GRAHAM JOINT STOCK SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED v. MOTOR UNION INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Loss of ship—Discovery of documents — Ship's papers—Action on policy by mortgagee—Duty to disclose documents and to obtain documents for disclosure—Affidavits by owner and other persons interested.

The mortgagees of a ship sued on a policy insuring the ship against war risks. The ship was alleged to have been lost at sea off the east coast of Spain in Feb. 1921 by striking a mine. She was insured against war risks to an amount greatly exceeding the amount of the mortgages. The defence was that the ship had been wilfully lost by her master and crew with the connivance of her owner.

Held, that the action should be stayed until the plaintiffs should make a proper affidavit of ship's papers, and should procure an affidavit from persons interested, and especially from the owner; or should satisfy the court that they had employed all possible means to procure such affidavits.

In an action upon a policy of marine insurance, a plaintiff must disclose every material document in his possession and in the possession of other persons interested; or else he must show that he has made every effort to obtain these documents and failed. He must also account on oath for the disappearance of any material documents which have been in the possession of himself or of other persons interested. Otherwise the action will be stayed.

Fraser v. Burrows (1877, 2 Q. B. Div. 624) overruled.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of Greer, J., in chambers dismissing an application by the defendants.

(1) That the plaintiffs should file a further and better affidavit of ship's papers;

(2) That an affidavit of ship's papers should be filed by one Elie Angelis and J. and C. Harrison (London) Limited and any other persons, firms, or corporations having an interest in the proceedings;

(3) That pending compliance with pars. (1) and (2) the action should be stayed.

The plaintiffs, who were mortgagees, on the 19th April 1921, brought an action to recover for the total loss of the steamship Ioanna upon a policy of insurance against war risks effected with the defendants on the 30th Nov. 1920. They claimed under two mortgages. The first was dated the 28th July 1920, and made between Elie Angelis, of Athens, the owner of the ship, and the plaintiffs, and it declared that the plaintiffs had lent, on the 21st May 1920, to Angelis the sum of 145,000*l.* upon the security of a first mortgage on the whole of the shares in the ship. The loan was effected by bills drawn by

(a) Reported by W. C. SANDFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Angelis on the plaintiffs at three months to be discounted in London by the plaintiffs, and Angelis agreed to pay the cost of bills, stamps, and expenses of preparing and enforcing the mortgage and a commission on the bills. The loan was to be repaid in instalments extending over five years. J. A. Mango, shipowner, of London, was thereby appointed by Angelis to act as his attorney during the currency of the mortgage. The ship was to be insured at the expense of the owner against all risks, especially risks resulting from the war, and the policies of insurance were to be indorsed to the plaintiffs, who were empowered to enforce the mortgage to the fullest extent in the British courts. The costs and discount charges and commission on bills mentioned above amounting in all to 12,000*l.* were the subject of the second mortgage dated the 1st Sept. 1920.

On the 28th April 1921, an order was made that the action should be transferred to the commercial list and "that an affidavit as to ship's papers be given by the plaintiffs and parties interested. Stay unless given in twenty-one days."

On the 22nd June 1921, an affidavit of ship's papers was filed by the chairman of the board of directors of the plaintiff company, who deposed that the plaintiff company was only partly interested in the proceedings or in the insurance the subject thereof, and he stated: "To the best of my knowledge information and belief the plaintiff company has not now and never had in its possession custody or power or in the possession custody or power of its brokers solicitors or agents" any of the documents specified in Form 19 in Appendix K to the Rules of the Supreme Court "save and except the documents mentioned in the schedule hereto . . ."

The schedule contained a list of nineteen policies of insurance amounting in all to 399,500*l.* against war risks, including the policy sued upon; originals or copies of seventeen documents, and copies of fourteen letters.

On the 6th July 1921, an order was made in chambers on the plaintiffs' application fixing the 8th Dec. 1921, for the trial of the action.

On receiving the affidavit of the 22nd June 1921, the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiffs' solicitors on the 25th July 1921, to say that it was insufficient, and they specified the following omissions among others:

(1) Marine risk policies.

(2) Slips for marine and war risk policies.

(4) Debit notes for premiums and receipts therefor.

(5) Builders' specifications and plans for hull and machinery of the vessel.

(8) Marconi operator's log.

(9) Copies of all Marconi messages sent to the vessel on the voyage from Newport News on which she was lost.

(13) Correspondence between Messrs. Simpson, Spence, and Young (the agents for the owners of the Ioanna in New York), and Mr. Papadakis the captain.

(14) Correspondence between Mango and Angelis.

(15) Correspondence between the captain and Mango or Angelis after the loss.

(16) Correspondence between Angelis or Mango and the plaintiffs relating to the mortgage, payment of interest thereon, chartering and loss of the steamer.

(17) The ship's register and crew list.

On the 29th July 1921, the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote:

We will deal seriatim with the various documents of which in your letter you demand production:—

(1) We will obtain these documents.

(2) The slips have never been in the plaintiffs' possession. Presumably they are held by the brokers, but we will endeavour to obtain them. . . .

(4) These are quite irrelevant and their production obviously unnecessary.

(5) Is it seriously suggested that production of the builders' specification for hull and machinery will in any way assist your clients in their defence? . . .

(8) The Marconi operator states that he saved nothing.

(9) We are ascertaining if any copies of Marconi messages exist. . . .

(13) and (14) We are asking our clients to make further inquiries as to whether any such correspondence exists. It is obviously not in their possession.

(15) We are instructed that no further correspondence exists other than that already produced.

(16) We are again inquiring of our clients whether any such correspondence exists.

(17) We will endeavour to obtain this. . . .

[The letter concluded:] When we have ascertained from our clients whether the further correspondence and documents to which you refer exist we will consider whether we can comply with your request for a further affidavit of ship's papers.

The defendants' solicitors wrote on the 4th Oct. 1921, that the order for ship's papers had not yet been properly complied with; that of the seventeen heads mentioned in their letter of the 25th July the further documents produced since then appeared to dispose of Nos. 3, 10, 11 and 12, and partially of Nos. 4, 14, and 15, but that none of the other heads had been dealt with at all, nor had any explanation been given of the failure to produce these documents; and that in addition to these they noticed references to the following documents which should be produced:

(A) A telegram from Angelis to Mango referred to in a letter from the former of the 24th Jan. 1921.

(B) telegram from Angelis to Captain Papadakis referred to in the same letter;

(C) earlier telegram of the 25th Jan. 1921, from Angelis to Mango referred to in later telegram of same date;

(D) "my previous letters" referred to by Angelis in a letter to Mango of the 28th June 1921;

(E) two letters from Captain Papadakis to Angelis referred to in this same letter;

(F) Correspondence between the plaintiffs and Messrs J. and C. Harrison (1920), Limited, with reference to the mortgage and charter of the vessel.

(H) The writ, orders and pleadings in an action commenced for the plaintiffs by Messrs. Crump against Messrs. Barber and D'Ambrumenil and Mr. Angelis, and any correspondence which has passed between the plaintiffs and Messrs. Crump, and Messrs. Crump and the defendants or their solicitors in connection therewith. The letter continued:—

In view of the issues which are raised in this action we must insist that all documents produced should be produced upon oath, and we must therefore ask for a further and better affidavit covering both the documents produced since the first affidavit was filed and also the further documents referred to in this letter and in our letter of the 25th July last.

On the 17th Oct. 1921, the plaintiffs' solicitors replied that the items (A), (B) and (C) were altogether irrelevant; that the letters included under (D) and (E) were written after action brought, and that there was nothing to show that these letters related to the loss; and that the documents under (F) and (H) were irrelevant and outside the scope of the order for ship's papers.

On the 28th Oct. 1921, on the defendants' application, an order was made in chambers that the plaintiffs should file a further and better affidavit of ship's papers.

On the 12th Nov. 1921, the chairman of the plaintiff company made a further affidavit of ship's papers in which he deposed that on the date of making his affidavit of the 22nd June he had disclosed all the documents which were in possession of the plaintiff company as mortgagees, but upon written requests being made by the defendants' solicitors the plaintiff company had obtained further documents which were set out in the schedule, and that apart from the last mentioned documents and those set out in the former affidavit, the plaintiff company to the best of his knowledge information and belief had not then and never had in its possession, custody or power or in the possession, custody or power of its brokers, solicitors, or agents any insurance slips, policies, letters of instruction, &c. (continuing in the terms of Form 19, in appendix K to the Rules of the Supreme Court), save and except the documents set out in the schedule. The affidavit continued thus:

4. I have read the letter from the defendants' solicitors to the plaintiffs' solicitors dated the 25th July, and with regard to the various items mentioned therein and numbered (1) to (17) I say as follows:—

(1) The marine risk policies are set out in the schedule to this affidavit and have been produced.

(2) The slips for marine and war risks insurances have never been in the plaintiff company's possession and presumably they are in the hands of the brokers who acted on behalf of the owner in effecting the insurances.

(4) Such of these as the plaintiff company have been able to obtain have been produced and they are set out in the schedule to this affidavit.

(5) Such plans of the S.S. Ioanna as the plaintiffs have been able to obtain have been produced, but the builders' specification for hull and machinery is not in the plaintiffs' possession, and, it is submitted is not material. . . .

(8) The Marconi operator states that he saved nothing and the plaintiff company is informed that there is no log of his in existence.

(9) So far as the plaintiff company is aware there are no copies of Marconi messages sent to the vessel on her voyage from Newport on which she was lost in existence. . . .

(13 and 14) This correspondence was not in the plaintiff company's possession at the time of making my former affidavit, but such of it as the plaintiff company has since been able to obtain has been produced to the defendant company's solicitors.

(15) There is no correspondence in the plaintiff company's possession other than that already produced and to the best of the plaintiff company's information knowledge and belief there is no other such correspondence in existence.

(16) So far as the plaintiff company is aware there is no correspondence in existence other than that which has been produced.

(17) The plaintiff company has been informed that the ship's register and crew list which were saved by the captain were lost by him during his journey back to Greece.

The affidavit then stated as to (A) (B) and (C) (see above):

The plaintiff company has been unable to obtain the telegrams referred to or copies thereof, but it is obvious from the letters in which they are referred to that they are irrelevant.

(D) and (E). The letters referred to were written after the action was brought. They are not in the plaintiff company's possession and there is nothing to show that they relate to the loss of the Ioanna.

(F) and (H). The correspondence and documents referred to are irrelevant. . . .

The first part of the schedule specified various policies of insurance against marine risks amounting in all to about 399,000*l*., and about 150 documents, including certificates, telegrams, letters, and copies of letters and telegrams, and others.

The statement of claim in the action was delivered on the 17th Nov. 1921. It alleged that on the 19th Feb. 1921 the Ioanna struck a mine off the east coast of Spain and thereafter was totally lost. The defence, delivered on the 30th Nov. 1921 alleged that the loss was not caused by war perils, but was caused by the wilful casting away of the steamer by her master or officers and crew or by the fraud of the owner, Elie Angelis, or his agents in procuring or conniving at the wilful casting away of the steamer.

On the 24th Nov. 1921 application was made for a further and better affidavit of ship's papers as aforesaid to Greer, J., who refused the application. The Court of Appeal gave leave to appeal. On the hearing of the appeal an affidavit by D. T. Garrett, a member of the firm of solicitors representing the defendants, was read, which, after setting out (inter alia) the grounds for suspecting that the ship had been wilfully lost by the master and crew, concluded by submitting "having regard to the circumstances of this loss and to the fact that the plaintiffs are suing as mortgagees only, in which capacity many of the most important documents bearing upon the case would not be in their possession or power, it is essential to the proper investigation of this case by the court and to the preparation of the underwriters' defence that an affidavit of ship's papers should be sworn by the said Elie Angelis and by all other parties interested in the subject matter of the action. . . ."

Raeburn, K.C. and Beazley for the appellants, the defendants.

Hogg, K.C. and Jowitt for the respondents, the plaintiffs.

Bankes, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Greer, J. which raises the question whether there should be a further and better affidavit of ship's papers in this action. The order was made on the 28th April upon an order for directions: "That an affidavit as to ship's papers be given by the plaintiffs and parties interested. Stay unless given in twenty-one days." I am not sure whether any formal order was drawn up for ship's papers or not. After the discussion that we have heard I cannot help thinking that either some form should be adopted in the Commercial Court to follow such a general order as the one I have just read, or that the parties should draw up an order in each case. There is a formal order given in the Appendix to the Rules of the Supreme Court, Form No. 19 in Appendix K. There is a note appended to that form by the editors of the Annual Practice that the form of order omits certain words which were held in the China Transpacific Steamship Company v. Commercial Union Assurance Company (45 L. T. Rep. 647; 8 Q. B. Div. 142) to be words that might be, or ought to be, included in the order, and it further appears that there is a Law Stationers' form of order in use which is apparently in proper form including the words which are omitted from the official order, and which fills up the blanks in the official order with proper language. The only observation that I have to make about the Law Stationers' form is that there may be cases in which, in addition to the order, "the plaintiffs and all persons interested in these proceedings and in the insurance, the subject matter of the action do produce," and so forth, the name of some party interested from whom an affidavit is required should be specifically inserted.

This action is brought by the mortgagees of a ship called the Ioanna owned by a Greek subject claiming against war risk underwriters an amount which the plaintiffs say is due to them upon their mortgage, the ship having been sunk through coming into collision with a mine. Among other defences the defence is raised that "the loss, if any, was caused by the wilful casting away of the steamer by her master or officers and crew." It is obvious, therefore, that a very serious issue is raised and a very large amount of money is involved. The order, as I have said, was made in that general form, and an affidavit was made by Mr. Graham on behalf of the plaintiffs. The first affidavit that he made was clearly insufficient. A second affidavit was asked for and an order was made for a further and better affidavit, and it is said that the second affidavit is also wholly insufficient. The matter came before Greer, J., on an application for a further and better affidavit, and we are told by counsel for the plaintiffs that certain offers were made by the plaintiffs of an affidavit which they were prepared to have sworn by the agent in this country of the Greek owner. Apparently the learned judge thought that having regard to the date fixed for the trial and the offers which were made by the plaintiffs in reference to this further affidavit, and probably also some explanations that may have been given by counsel for the plaintiffs, he ought not to make any order.

I do not agree with that view. I think this case is one in which the court ought to say that the defendants are entitled to a strict observance of the practice with regard to ship's papers. It now appears at a very late stage that the Greek owner is very largely interested in the policies on this vessel, which the defendants allege was cast away. One of the documents for which the defendants were pressing was the current account between the plaintiffs, the mortgagees, and the Greek owner. This was not disclosed either in the first or second affidavit of ship's papers; because, it is said, the materiality of it was not recognised. That means that sufficient attention was not paid to the real issues in this case; but whatever was the reason, the fact of the non-disclosure is in itself a ground for saying that in this case the defendants are entitled to have the practice strictly followed.

The plaintiffs' affidavits are defective in several respects: first, there is no affidavit by the Greek owner, who, it now appears, is a person deeply interested, and no reason is given for its absence. Documents which have been in the possession of the owner or the plaintiffs, and which are not forthcoming, are not accounted for. The affidavits are insufficient on these points and on the other points referred to in Mr. Garrett's affidavit. We are told that in the court below considerable reliance was placed upon the case of Fraser v. Burrows (2 Q. B. Div. 624), and the respondents still rely upon it. That case was decided by a court which consisted of Kelly, C.B. and Field, J. The facts there were that the plaintiffs were insurance brokers who had effected a policy on a cargo of oats on board the Speedwell on a voyage from Prince Edward's Island to the United Kingdom. The plaintiffs acted as agents for Hindman, the owner of the vessel and her cargo. The defendant underwrote a policy for 100*l*. After the policy was effected the cargo was sold to Hurrell, the real plaintiff in the action. Hindman was still in Prince Edward's Island, and it would appear upon those facts that he had ceased to have any interest at all in the cargo. Cleasby, B., who had great knowledge and experience in matters of marine insurance, made an order staying proceedings until the plaintiffs should produce an affidavit by Hindman of ship's papers and other documents in Hindman's possession. There was an appeal from that order. It is not necessary to say whether or not the court might, in its discretion, have allowed the appeal having regard to the fact that Hindman had ceased to have an interest in the cargo, and there is no evidence that the defendant was setting up that there had been any concealment on Hurrell's part; it is not necessary to consider that. But it is necessary to consider whether the decision of the court was based on grounds consistent with the practice then established or subsequently recognised. Kelly, C.B. said (2 Q. B. Div., at p. 625): "It does not appear that there has been any fraud on the part of either the nominal plaintiffs or the real plaintiff." Of course that at once distinguishes that case from this, where fraud is alleged. "The order stays the action until they shall have done something which it is in effect impossible for them to do. This order could not have been maintained before the Judicature Acts, and sect. 21 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875 shows that it was intended to preserve existing procedure, so far as it was not inconsistent with the new procedure." Field, J. came to the same conclusion. In my opinion, the statement by Kelly, C.B. that this order could not have been maintained before the Judicature Acts is not in accordance with the practice, and I do not think that this case ought to be regarded as an authority so far as the grounds upon which the order was made are concerned. I think that it is apparent from what is said in one or two other cases to which I will refer.

The next case is West of England and South Wales District Bank v. Canton Insurance Company (1877, 2 Ex. Div. 472). That was decided in May of the same year and by a court consisting of Kelly, C.B., who had been a member of the court in Fraser v. Burrows (1877, 2 Q. B. Div. 624) in the preceding March, and Cleasby, B., who had made the order then appealed against. The order in the later case was that all parties interested in addition to the parties to the action should make an affidavit. Kelly, C.B. said (2 Ex. Div., at p. 474): "I regret that the notice of motion prays for an order in this peculiar and unsatisfactory form—namely, that the action shall be stayed—not till the plaintiffs shall have satisfied the court that they have resorted to all reasonable, lawful, and practicable means in their power to produce, or cause to be produced, the ship's papers—but that the action shall be stayed till they have caused or procured affidavits to be made by a number of other persons over whom they may possess no control. I regret that the form is in those terms; but as it appears to be the form in which in actions of this kind orders have been made at chambers for a very long time, I think we shall be doing no injustice by making this order absolute." It seems to me that the Chief Baron directly went back from what he had said in Fraser v. Burrows (sup.) and recognised that he had been wrong in there saying that the order could not be maintained before the Judicature Acts. He went on to point out that "If the plaintiffs on another occasion apply to us showing that there is an absolute impossibility on their part in complying with the order, we may then consider what it is our duty to do." In the later case of China Transpacific Steamship Company v. Commercial Union Assurance Company, Brett, L.J., who also had great experience in these matters, said (45 L. T. Rep. 647, 8 Q. B. Div., p. 145): "Long before the Judicature Acts, the peculiarity of insurance business had given rise to a practice, both in Chancery and at common law, of granting discovery to a larger extent than in ordinary business. The reasons for this are not far to seek. The underwriters have no means of knowing how a loss was caused; it occurs abroad and when the ship is entirely under the control of the assured. In addition to this the contract of insurance is made, in peculiar terms, on behalf of the assured himself and all persons interested, and who these persons are, expecially at the time of the loss, is entirely unknown to the underwriters. The practice, therefore, arose of making the order on all parties interested, without an affidavit. Then after the Judicature Acts, the question arose whether this practice had been altered, and it was held in West of England and South Wales District Bank v. Canton Insurance Company (sup.) for the reasons there given, that it had not. As for the hardship on the plaintiffs, Cleasby, B., who was beyond all others conversant with this head of the law, points out in the same case that a plaintiff must show that he has used every effort to discover, and that if he has bonâ fide done all he can he will not be prejudiced." I think Brett, L.J., there, although he does not say so in terms, is expressly disapproving of what Kelly, C.B. said in Fraser v. Burrows (sup.). The practice, therefore, being what it is, in my opinion this affidavit is wholly insufficient and an order must be made for a further and better affidavit, and in that order I think the provision should be inserted that one of the parties to make an affidavit shall be the Greek owner. It will then lie upon the plaintiffs either to procure an affidavit from the Greek owner or to satisfy the court that they have used all possible means of getting him to make an affidavit and that he has refused. I think they must also in the further and better affidavit deal with those points which I have already referred to and upon which the affidavit appears to me to be quite insufficient.

The appeal must be allowed, and the further affidavit ordered, and the trial must be adjourned until the order has been sufficiently complied with.

Scrutton, L.J.—I agree. This is an appeal against an order refusing to order a further affidavit of ship's papers to be made and refusing to postpone the trial. The subject-matter of the case, on which I express no opinion, as I have no materials for forming one, is the alleged total loss of a Greek ship, insured for between £300,000 and £400,000, by a mine some very considerable time after mines ceased to be used on the seas. The underwriters allege, whether correctly or not I do not know, that just about this time, when insured values were much above the market values of shipping, an extraordinary epidemic of disasters fell upon Greek ships, including this one, by which mines attacked them in places where fortunately no loss of life occurred to the crew and where incidentally the loss of the ship was a gain to her owner. Such a case is obviously one in which the underwriters are entitled to the fullest investigation.

One of their means of investigating is the affidavit of ship's papers, which strikes anyone not accustomed to marine insurance as an odd proceeding until its history and the reasons for it are explained. An order for ship's papers is strictly limited to marine insurance, which is a contract of the greatest good faith. When a loss occurs the underwriters know nothing about the circumstances, and the owner and persons interested may know everything. When the contract of insurance is made it is the duty of the owner to make the fullest disclosure of every material fact to the underwriters; not merely to abstain from active misrepresentation, but to tell the underwriters all the material facts he knows; and consequently for centuries it has been the practice in actions on polices of marine insurance to order the assured as soon as the writ is issued to make by himself and procure other persons interested to make an affidavit of ship's papers which should disclose not only every document in his possession but every document in the possession of those interested, though they are not known to himself, or else he must show that he has made every endeavour to obtain those papers and has been unable to obtain them; and his action is stayed until he has complied with the order. It is of the greatest importance to marine insurance and to the existence of underwriters that this security of theirs should be preserved. In this case it seems to me quite clear that the plaintiffs, against whom no charge whatever is made, and their advisers, have not understood what is meant by an affidavit of ship's papers. It does not mean that the assured may wait until he is asked by the underwriters to disclose a document, which appears to be one of the untenable positions taken up by the plaintiffs in this case; it does not mean that the assured may withhold material documents merely because he thinks they are not material. He must make the fullest disclosure of documents that he has in his possession, and if the documents are in the possession of other persons interested he must do his utmost to get them and explain on affidavit, if he has not been able to get them, what he has done to get them, and why he has not been able to get them; and he must account on oath for the disappearance of documents which have been but are no longer in the possession of himself or persons interested. This last remark is peculiarly relevant in this case, because it is alleged that the disaster which sent this ship to the bottom sent with her all her logs and all the documents connected with her voyage. If so, the affidavit of ship's papers must deal with the matter. The writ in this action was issued on a policy of 20,000*l*. The plaintiffs are mortgagees. Their actual interest under their mortgage is said to be about £140,000. It appears the ship was insured for between 300,000*l.* and 400,000*l.*, and at a very early stage, as is very proper and right in this action, a consolidation agreement was made by which the underwriters on the whole 300,000*l.* or 400,000*l.* were bound by the result of the action. The person interested in the balance over and above 140,000*l.* is the owner. It is, therefore, a case in which it is essential that the owner should be concerned in the affidavit of ship's papers. I am quite satisfied that so far the plaintiffs have not complied with the order for an affidavit of ship's papers. They have not shown the efforts that they have made to obtain the papers in the possession of other persons interested, or the results of those efforts. They have not shown on oath that the documents in the possession of the persons interested have now ceased to be in the possession of those persons, and they seem to me to have completely misunderstood the materiality of the current account. It is perfectly true that there is a mortgage with a sum indorsed on it for £145,000. That sum may not be right. It may have been paid off. The current account is, therefore, a most material document, and I cannot conceive why it was not mentioned in the first affidavit of ship's papers.

Therefore, there are abundant grounds for making the order for a further and better affidavit of ship's papers against the plaintiffs; but further the owner on the facts stated is interested to a very large extent, and he also should be ordered to make an affidavit of ship's papers, and the action should be stayed until that has happened. The learned judge below, I understand, refused to make the order on the owner relying on the decision of Fraser v. Burrows (2 Q. B. Div. 624) decided in 1877. When the Judicature Acts came into force there was for some time a question in this as well as in other matters of their effect on the preceding practice, and one of the questions was whether an order for discovery had superseded the marine insurance practice as to ship's papers. In Fraser v. Burrows (sup.) Cleasby, B., to whose knowledge of marine matters I need add nothing to the testimonial given by Lord Esher, made the ordinary order under the old form for an affidavit by the owner of ship's papers. It was objected that the Judicature Acts did not allow such an order; that the owner was out of the jurisdiction of the court, and ought not to be ordered to make such an affidavit. Kelly, C.B., and Field, J., relying on the procedure of the Judicature Acts, declined to make such an order. Two months later a similar case, an action by a mortgagee, came before Kelly, C.B. Again it was argued that the only order for discovery that should be made on the mortgagee was an order to produce documents in his possession. Of course, the ship's papers in his possession were practically none. On that occasion Cleasby, B. was sitting with Kelly, C.B., and was able to inform him of the old practice. In the result the Chief Baron went back on his former decision, and adopted the old practice as explained to him by Cleasby, B. In 1881, four years later, the matter came before the Court of Appeal, including Jessel, M.R., who had been the chairman of the committee which drafted the Judicature Rules, and Lord Esher, then Brett, L.J., whose familiarity with marine insurance matters needs no testimonial from me, and they adopted the view taken in the second case that the procedure in marine insurance was not affected by the provisions of the Judicature Acts. In my view Fraser v. Burrows (sup.) was wrongly decided, and should no longer be followed.

This is peculiarly a case where the plaintiffs and all persons interested should be ordered to make an affidavit of ship's papers and the order should be enforced on the owner who is largely interested in these policies. The plaintiffs must make a further affidavit; an affidavit must also be made by the owner as a person interested: documents which were, but are no longer, in the possession of the persons interested must be accounted for; the plaintiffs must show on oath what steps they have taken to obtain documents from those interested, and the result of their efforts, and there must be a stay until the order is complied with. I am not deciding what will happen or under what circumstances that stay can be removed; it may be that if no affidavit can be obtained from the owner the plaintiffs may be allowed to go on. Speaking for myself I should require to be very thoroughly satisfied that the owner could not be induced to make the affidavit before I allowed this action to go on; a merely formal statement of request and refusal would certainly not satisfy me.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree with both the judgments which have been delivered, and it seems unnecessary to repeat what has already been said. I merely desire to call attention to two points. First of all, I think attention should be directed to the form of order to be used in the Commercial Court when an order for ship's papers is made. Form 19 in Appendix K to the rules does not seem to me to be a satisfactory form at the present time.

I would only add my agreement with the other members of the court that Fraser v. Burrows (2 Q. B. Div. 624) must now be taken to be overruled.

Ariadne Steamship Company v. James McKelvie and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Signature by charterers — "As agents"—Effect of signature—Liability of charterers.

A charter-party stated as follows: "It is this day agreed between Thomas H. Seed and Co. Limited, agents for the owners of the steamship Ariadne Irene, and James McKelvie and Co. Newcastle-on-Tyne, charterers." It was signed "By authority of owners, for Thomas H. Seed and Co. Limited, A. D. Cadogan, as agents" and "For and on behalf of James McKelvie and Co., as agents, J. A. McKelvie." The plaintiffs as owners sued the defendants as charterers for demurrage which by the charter-party was to be paid by the charterers.

Held (Scrutton, L.J. dissenting) that upon the true construction of the charter-party the defendants by their signature had deliberately expressed their intention to exclude any personal liability.

Judgment of Bailhache, J. reversed.

(a) Reported by Edward J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEAL by the defendants from the judgment of Bailache, J.

The facts which are sufficiently summarised in the headnote are fully set out in the judgments. The defendants contended that they were not liable as they were only agents without personal liability.

Bailhache J. held on the authority of Lennard v. Robinson (5 E. & B. 125) that the defendants were personally liable.

The defendants appealed.

Dec. 9, 1921.—The following judgments were read:

BANKES, L.J.—This appeal raises the much-discussed question as to whether an agent has, by the form of language used in a particular document, sufficiently protected himself against personal liability. The question must always resolve itself into a question of construction of the document in question. Decided cases, therefore, except where the language of the two documents is practically identical, can serve only as guides, and not as authorities. In dealing with any particular case it seems to me material to determine first of all whether the words relied on as relieving an agent of personal liability are merely words of description, or whether they are words of qualification. If the former, then no effect can be given to them. If the latter, then the document must be read as a whole for the purpose of ascertaining whether the qualification is sufficiently expressed to govern the document. In dealing with this last point, I think that the form in which the signature to a document is expressed should have great weight attached to it, because it is by the signature that the party expresses his consent to the terms of the document. If the consent is expressed with the qualification that it is given only as agent, I think that it must require very strong and plain language in the body of the document to get rid of that qualification and to establish that the agent really intended to make himself personally liable on the document in spite of the form in which the signature is expressed. In some of the decided cases no special attention appears to have been paid to the question of whether the words of qualification were annexed to the signature or appear in the body of the document. My own view is that it is a sound rule of construction applicable to cases like the present, that where the signature is unqualified the presumption is that the agent is personally liable, but that where sufficient words of qualification are annexed to the signature to indicate that the person signing signs as agent, the presumption is the other way. No doubt the presumption in either case may be rebutted, and it must always be a question of construction merely whether, taking the document as a whole, the presumption is or is not rebutted.

This view is, I think, quite in accordance with the decided cases, some of which are decisions in reference to charter-parties and some in reference to contracts in writing other than charter-parties. The case of Tanner v. Christian (14 E. & B. 591) was decided in the year 1855. In that case the contract was signed by the agent in his own name, and the court, consisting of Lord Campbell, C.J., Wightman and Crompton, JJ., found nothing in the body of the document to displace the presumption of personal liability, although the agent was described as a party "for and on behalf of" a named person. In giving judgment in that case, Wightman, J. said that one test for ascertaining whether a person acting for and on behalf of another has contracted so as to bind himself personally is to see who by the provisions of the contract is to act in the performance of it. The Court in that case did place reliance on certain provisions in the contract as indicating an intention that the agent should be personally bound. But both Lord Campbell, C.J. and Crompton, J. lay special stress upon the fact that the agent signed in his own name without qualification. Lennard v. Robinson also decided in 1855, by a court consisting of Lord Campbell, C.J., Coleridge and Erle, JJ. (5 E. & B. 125) was a charter-party case. It was upon the decision in this case that Bailhache, J. founded his judgment. The charter-party in that case commenced thus: "It is this day mutually agreed between Mr. John M. Lennard, owner," &c. "and Messrs. Robinson and Fleming, of London, merchants," and it was signed "By authority of, and as agents for, Mr. A. H. Schwedersky, of Memel, pro Robinson and Fleming; Wm. F. Malcolm, John M. Lennard." In his argument the counsel for the plaintiff laid great stress upon the special form in which the document was signed. He interpreted it as meaning only that the principal authorised Messrs. Robinson and Fleming to make the contract in the form in which it was made; that is as between the plaintiff and the defendants on their own behalf. Lord Campbell, C.J. appears to have accepted this argument. He says at p. 130: "Looking at the whole of the contract itself, I think the defendants are made personally liable. There is nothing in the signature to prevent them from being so. In the body of the contract they are contracting parties, and they may well become so "by authority of, and as agents for," their employer; that is, he may be made liable to them. That, however, does not alter the effect of the instrument by which they become contracting parties as between themselves and the plaintiff." Coleridge and Erle, JJ. give no grounds for their decision, though the former attaches importance to the fact that the alleged principal was a foreigner. I cannot regard this as a decision in reference to a contract signed by a person "as agent" without more. It appears to me to be a decision in reference to the special language of the particular document. Parker v. Winlow, decided in 1857 (7 E. & B. 942) was also a charter-party case, where the charter-party, though expressed to be made between Parker and Winlow, agent for E. Winlow and Son, was signed by Winlow without restriction. The judgments of Erle, and Crompton, JJ. appear to me to strongly support the view I have ventured to express. The former says, at p. 948: "I agree that the defendant has bound himself. He says that he is agent for E. Winlow and Sons, but that is not enough to rebut the inference of personal liability arising from the rest of the contract." The latter at p. 949: "Mere words of description attached to the name of a contractor, such as are used here, saying he is agent for another, cannot limit his liability as contractor. A man, though agent, may very well intend to bind himself; and he does bind himself if he contracts without restrictive words to show that he does not do so personally. It is important that mercantile men should understand that, if they mean to exclude personal recourse against themselves on contracts which they sign, they must use restrictive words as if they sign per procuration, or use some other words to express that they are not to be personally liable." Deslandes v. Gregory decided in 1860 (2 E. & E. 602) is another charter-party case. There the contract was expressed to be between the plaintiff and the defendants "as agents to Samuel Ferguson," and was signed by the defendants "as agents." All three judgments in that case support the view I am taking, but the judgment of Hill, J. in the court below and of Williams, J. in the Exchequer Chamber are so much in point that I read them. Hill, J. says, at p. 610: "The point seems to me to be determined by the form of the signature to the charter-party, which is in effect the signature of Ferguson, by Gregory, Brothers, as his agents, not the signature of Gregory, Brothers binding them personally. The description of the defendants in the introductory part of the charter-party, as Ferguson's agents, is ambiguous, and might not, taken alone, have been sufficient to exclude the defendant's personal liability, but the signature clearly shows that the intention of the parties was that Ferguson should be the party to the contract: hence the signature of the defendants imposes no further obligation upon them than that implied by law, namely, that they had authority, as agents, to bind Ferguson." Williams, J. says at p. 611: "We are all of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was right. The form of the charter-party and the mode of signature, taken together, are decisive to show that the defendants did not bind themselves by the contract as principals. They sign 'For Samuel Ferguson, Esq., of Anamaboe, Gregory, Brothers, as agents.' It would require extremely plain words in the body of the contract to control the effect of that mode of signature, and no such words are to be found there, the contract purporting to be made by 'Messrs. Gregory, Brothers, as agents to Samuel Ferguson, of Anamaboe, merchants and charterers.'

The only argument that can be relied upon by the appellant is that the words "merchants" and "charterers" are in the plural; but this evidently happened by mistake, and the words occur, moreover, in the printed part of the charter-party. It must be noted that a very strong court found no difficulty in that case in reading the clauses in the charter-party dealing with the obligations of the charterer as applicable to the defendants' principal, even though he was, according to the report, "a black man resident and trading on the coast of Africa." The charter-party in that case provided for notice of the vessels being ready to load or to discharge being given to the charterers or their agents. I see no difficulty, in a case where an agent attempts to exclude any personal liability by signing, as agent, in reading those clauses in the charter-party which impose a personal liability upon the charterer as referring to the agent's principal and those clauses which refer to the giving of notices as referring to the principal or his agent. I do not find any charter-party case where an agent signed "as agent" merely in which the court has held that the references in the body of the charter-party to obligations undertaken by the charterers are sufficient to negative the contention that the agent was not personally liable. Gadd v. Houghton, decided in 1876 (35 L. T. Rep. 222; 1 Ex. Div. 357) was not a charter-party case, but it is a decision which has been very generally approved of and which contains very strong expressions of judicial opinion with regard to the qualification of a signature. In that case the qualification relied on was in the body of the document, and the signature was without qualification. The court held that the words in the body of the document were sufficient to exclude the personal liability of the agent, but in reference to the expression "as agents" and to the importance of the form of the signature several of the members of the court expressed a strong opinion. James, L.J. at p. 359, referring to Paice v. Walker (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 173) says this: "As to Paice v. Walker (sup.), I cannot conceive that the words 'as agents' can be properly understood as implying merely a description. The word 'as' seems to exclude that idea." Quain, J. says at p. 360: "It seems extraordinary that there should be any doubt whether this binds the principal or the agent. It is said that in order to relieve the agent from liability, he must sign 'as agent' or 'on account of' Morand and Co." I cannot see the necessity for adding those words to the signature if you can gather from the contract that he makes it on account of Morand and Co. And Archibald, J. says at p. 361: "The usual way in which an agent contracts so as not to render himself personally liable is by signing as agent." The decision in Gadd v. Houghton (sup.) must, I think, be treated as containing the rule of construction to be applied where an agent signs a contract such as the one in that case "as agent."

In the present case the document under consideration is a charter-party. The agent is described in the body of the document as the charterer, but he signs as agent. If it is correct to consider that a signature "as agent" controls the entire document, unless a clearly expressed intention to the contrary appears, I do not find anything in the charter-party under consideration which is, in my opinion, a sufficient expression of such an intention. I do not think that the authorities dealing with the cases of charter-parties to which I have referred, are opposed to this view, and I think that it is to the interest of the commercial community generally that a signature "as agent" should have a generally accepted meaning as a deliberate expression of intention to exclude any personal liability of the signatory, and that in reference to the meaning to be attributed to such a signature, a distinction should not be drawn between classes of contracts, nor should it be considered necessary to search each clause in a possibly long and complicated printed document in order to discover some ambiguous expression on which to found an argument that the parties intended that the agent should be personally liable. I differ on such a matter from so very experienced a judge as Bailhache, J. with considerable hesitation, but I do not feel the difficulty he felt in relation to the provision for giving notice to the charterer which would, as it seems to me, be complied with by giving notice to the person whom the principal appointed as his agent with authority to describe himself as charterer, though at the same time limiting his personal liability; nor for the reasons which I have endeavoured to explain do I share the learned judge's view in drawing the distinction which he suggests may well be drawn between charter-parties and contracts made by brokers. There are, of course, certain classes of documents, such as cheques, bills and promissory notes to which the considerations as to signing "as agent" do not apply. I only mention this fact in order to make it clear that nothing that I have said in this judgment applies to such documents as these. For the reasons I have given I think that the appeal succeeds, and the judgment must be set aside, and entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

SCRUTTON, L.J., read the following judgment: The charter-party in this case began: "It is this day agreed between Thomas H. Seed and Co. Ltd., agents for the owners of the steamship Ariadne Irene and James McKelvie and Co., Newcastle-on-Tyne, charterers." It was signed "'By authority of owners, for Thomas H. Seed and Co., Ltd. A. D. Cadogan, as agents,' and 'For and on behalf of James McKelvie and Co., as agent or agents'—the writing is not clear—'J. A. McKelvie.'" The owners of the steamer, the Ariadne Steamship Company Limited then sued James McKelvie and Co., as charterers, for demurrage which by the charter, was to be paid by "charterers." The defendants contended they were not liable, as they were only agents without personal liability. Bailhache, J. decided against them on the authority of Lennard v. Robinson (sup.) which is very similar in its facts..

The defendants appeal, contending amongst other things, that Lennard v. Robinson (sup.) was wrongly decided. The argument before us let loose the bewildering number of authorities with which all who have experience of this branch of the law are acquainted. After hearing them Parker, J. in Chapman v. Smith (96 L. T. Rep. 662); (1907) 2 Ch. 97) was driven to say (p. 103), that he need not consider them as the question was in each case a question of construction, having regard to the surrounding circumstances. This of course, makes any one case of very little use as a guide how the court will decide another case, but is a tempting conclusion when one considers the conflicting character of the decisions reported. If it is possible to find any principles that should guide future controversies, the attempt should be made. Primâ facie the persons liable on a written contract, the parties to it, should be discovered from the writing itself. It is possible, however, to add by oral evidence the liability of a party to that of the party named in the instrument, as where evidence is given to bind an undisclosed principal of the named party but in such a case the named party remains liable even if the other party knew he was an agent. Both undisclosed principal and his agent described as a party may be liable, see the well-known case of Higgins v. Senior (8 M. & W. 834). It is possible also, according to Wake v. Harrop (6 H. & N. 768) to discharge a person stated as a party in an instrument by evidence that it was orally agreed between the parties that he should not be liable but his principal should, though the members of the court did not agree whether it was a good defence in law, or only in equity.

Wilde, B., following Lennard v. Robinson (sup.), p. 777, thought it was a bad plea in law. Bramwell, B., who thought it was a good plea in law, distinguished Lennard v. Robinson (sup.), inasmuch as in that case there was only knowledge of agency, and this was consistent with the agent's taking a personal liability; no agreement that he should not be liable was alleged. The House of Lords in Fred. Drughorn Limited v. Rederi Aktiebolaget Transatlantic (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400; 120 L. T. Rep. 70; (1919) A. C. 203) allowed evidence to be given to add the liability and rights to sue of an undisclosed principal of a person described as "charterer" on the ground that a person described as "charterer" might yet be an agent; but Lord Sumner expressly states that the person described as "charterer," though he proved an undisclosed principal, "was personally liable to perform the obligations which the contract imposed on the charterers." The old form of cesser clause expressly provided that as the charterer entered into the charter on behalf of another his liability as charterer ceased on the happening of certain events, recognising that many shippers of cargo appeared as charterers on the terms that they should cease to be liable when they had shipped the cargo. On principle it seems to me that there are two places in the contract of special importance in ascertaining who is personally liable on it. The first is the description of the parties to the contract; the second is the form in which they assent to the contract by affixing their signature. Where in both cases they describe themselves as agents, it is almost impossible they should be held liable, except in the case of deeds. Where in neither case do they qualify their liability, it is almost impossible they should escape liability. What is to happen where they assume personal liability in the one place and describe themselves as agents in the other? It appears to me, to use the words of Archibald, J. in Gadd v. Houghton (sup.), you must be able to gather that they contract only as agents—that is, that they undertake no personal liability, but merely as agents effect a contract on which their principal is the only contracting party. Mellish, L.J. in Gadd v. Houghton (sup.) treated unqualified signature as primâ facie implying liability, and requiring "something very strong on the face of the instrument" to displace it. The same view was stated by the majority of the Court of Appeal in H. O. Brandt and Co. v. H. N. Morris and Co. Limited (117 L. T. Rep. 196; (1917) 2 K. B. 784). The facts which displaced the strong primâ facie presumption in Gadd v. Houghton (sup.) were that the purchaser told a broker in Liverpool to "telegraph out" (to Spain) "an order on my account for . . . oranges of the brand James Morand and Co. . . . f.o.b." The broker telegraphed out the order to James Morand and Co. and received an acceptance. So far the transaction was clearly between the buyer and James Morand and Co. The broker then sent a sold note to the buyer: "We have this day sold to you on account of James Morand and Co.' and signed without qualification.

The court held that the transaction so effected displaced the presumption, and the first letter of the buyer seemed to exclude any idea of a contract with the broker. It appears to me that unqualified description as a party to the contract is at least equally strong as importing personal liability as unqualified signature, unless negatived by very strong language in the rest of the contract, and that a later description as agent does not necessarily exclude personal liability, particularly when the person described as a party is himself going to perform some of the duties of a charterer. It is true that the signature assenting to the terms of the contract is affixed "as agent," but it assents to the terms of a contract in which the writer is described as a party to the contract. The person supplying and loading the cargo and to whom telegraphic advice of readiness to load is addressed is frequently the person described as charterer; and it was for his benefit that the cesser clause in its original form was inserted to free him from his original liability when he had completed the shipping of the cargo, a lien on which would provide security for the performance of the rest of the obligations. This position of shippers undertaking the first obligations of charterers has been recognised in numerous cases which I gather we are invited to overrule. In Cooke v. Wilson (1 C. B. (N.S.) 153), in 1856, the charter was made between Wilson and Cooke on behalf of the Geelong and Melbourne Railway Company to ship goods in England and deliver them to Geelong in Australia, and signed in Cooke's name without qualification. Cooke was held a party and liable, as there were things in the charter he was to do, and the description did not exclude his personal liability. Lennard v. Robinson (sup.) was decided by the Queen's Bench in 1855. Robinson and Fleming, merchants, were one of the named parties to the contract and signed by authority of and as agents for Mr. A. H. Schwedersky of Memel. The charter contained a number of terms that "merchants" should perform, and again the description as a party to the contract was held sufficient in spite of the signature. In Parker v. Winlow (sup.) in 1857, the charter was between Parker and G. W. Winlow, agent for E. Winlow and Son, and was signed G. W. Winlow in his own name. Martin, B. and the Court of Queen's Bench held G. W. Winlow liable, Lord Campbell saying that a man might pledge his personal liability, though he was agent, as both agent and personally liable. These cases were decided on the lines on which Bailhache, J. decided the present case. He also refers to the terms of the charter in this case which the defendants would be concerned with, shipment and sailing telegram, and he follows Lennard v. Robinson (sup.). He adds a remark with which I entirely agree: "I may perhaps add that in my opinion it requires clearer words of intention to exonerate a merchant who allows himself to be described in a charter-party as charterer from personal liability than are necessary in contracts made by brokers who may be presumed from the very fact of their calling to be acting as agents merely and not as principals." I also think that when the facts of Gadd v. Houghton (sup.), a case of broker's liability, are appreciated, it is quite unnecessary to conclude that the Court of Appeal meant to lay down a principle which would overrule at least three decisions on a different form of business which had then stood for twenty years without question. For these reasons I concur in the judgment of Bailhache, J. and think the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Atkin, L.J. read the following judgment.—This case raises anew the question as to the effect to be given to the words "as agents" qualifying the signature to a written agreement. In the present case the dispute arises over a charter-party, but a charter-party differs not from any other contract in respect of the principle applying to its formation and construction, and I apprehend the dispute must be determined on principles common to contracts as a whole. A contract in writing appears to be a term capable of more than one meaning. The parties may agree verbally, and subsequently may reduce the terms of their agreement into writing. If such is their intention the terms can only be ascertained by the construction of the writing; the assent of the parties to those terms, if they have not signed the document, may be proved by parol evidence. If the parties have signed it, or if the document itself constitutes the contract, i.e., if the parties only arrive at a consensus ad idem by assenting to the written terms by adding their signature as part of the document, their assent is conclusively proved by the signature. The terms of the contract to which they have assented will be ascertained from the body of the document. One of the material terms is the identity of the parties between whom it is made and this term may be only apparent from the signature. "We mutually agree, &c., signed A. and B.," shows that the parties to the agreement are the two signatories. But when the assent of the party sought to be charged is proved it matters not what the terms of the contract expressed in the body of the document may be. Signature unconditionally appended is proof of unconditional assent to the terms recorded in the body of the contract. If the body of the contract records that the signer is a party or leaves the name of the party to be inferred from the signature, the signature will be proof that the signer has assented to a contract made with him. The contract may, however, record that the contract is made between A. and B. acting by his agent C., and may be signed by C., in which case C. has assented to a contract between A. and not C., but C.'s principal B. But the assent signified by the signature may be qualified so as to show that the signer is not assenting unconditionally to the contract, but is assenting in a representative capacity on behalf of a principal. "B. by C. his attorney," written by C. is plainly an assent only by B. "C. on behalf of B." is, I think, equally plain an assent of C. to the contract not so as to bind himself but to bind B. If the assent to the contract clearly appears from the form of the signature to be qualified it appears to me to be impossible to charge the signer on the footing that there is an unqualified assent by him. Thus in the two instances given above, "B. by C. his attorney," or "C. on behalf of B.," it would seem irrelevant that the body of the contract expressed the contract to be made between A. and C. C. has not assented to such a contract. On the other hand, the party signing may append words to his signature which leave it doubtful whether he intends an unqualified assent, e.g., he may sign "C., broker," or "C., agent." In such a case you must look to the body of the contract to see whether C. was intended to be a party or not. If the contract does not purport to be made with him, but with someone else, or uses words that make it plain that the only contracting party is C.'s principal, disclosed or undisclosed, C. will not be chargeable. Some confusion, I think, has been introduced into the cases by not sufficiently distinguishing between cases of construction of the body of the contract and cases turning on the proof of assent to the signature. There can be little doubt that the law on the matter has not been uniformly stated, and that it has required some time to settle it. What words in the body of the contract are sufficient to negative personal liability and what words qualifying signature sufficient to negative assent as principal were up to 1876 in doubt. But since June 1876, when the case of Gadd v. Houghton (sup.) was decided in the Court of Appeal by James, Mellish, and Baggallay, L.JJ. and Quain and Archibald, JJ., I have always understood the law to be that the words "on account of" and the words "as agents" are conclusive when qualifying the signature to negative liability as principal, and that whether the actual principal is disclosed or not. If there is a principal, the principal is bound, if not, the agent may be liable for breach of warranty of authority, but not otherwise. If used in the body of the document they are very strong to negative liability, but as you must read the document as a whole you may possibly find other words and clauses so plainly indicating personal liability that they outweigh the words in question. As qualifying signature, however, they may have been used for thirty-five years in business transactions as negativing personal liability, and since 1876 there has been, so far as I can discover, no decision to the contrary. As is plain from cases prior to Gadd v. Houghton (sup.) and from Archibald, J.'s judgment in that case, the qualification of the signature "as agents" had been usual before 1876 to negative personal liability. That decision merely gave it final authority. To my mind, it is irrelevant to consider whether the qualifying words occur more than once in the document on the principle that what I say three times is true, but what I say once is doubtful. If the words qualify the signature they qualify the assent and nothing more matters. It follows from what I have said that in my opinion the case of Leonard v. Robinson (sup.), decided in the year 1855, while the law was still unsettled, was wrongly decided and should no longer be treated as an authority. In so deciding I am fortified by the view expressed by the learned editors of Smith's Leading Cases, of whom the late Lord Collins was one, in the edition published next after the decision in Gadd v. Houghton (sup.) that Lennard v. Robinson (sup.) must be considered of doubtful authority. I think, therefore, that the defendants in this case who were conceded below to have signed as agents and whose signature, on looking at the original, I consider to be in that form plural and not singular, were not personally liable on the contract. But if the distinction between the signature as recording assent and the body of the contract as recording the terms were not well founded, I agree entirely with the judgment of Bankes, L.J., in holding that on the construction of the document as a whole the same result is arrived at. In Deslandes v. Gregory (sup.) in 1860, where the signature to a charter-party was "For Samuel Ferguson, Esq., of Anamabo, Gregory, Brothers, as agents," Williams, J., delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said: "It would require extremely plain words in the body of the contract to control the effect of that mode of signature." As I have said, I think that now no words in the body could control it, but if they could, there are no such plain words here. The words relied on in the body as to notice to the charterers of readiness to load and so on, are words which would appear in the printed clause though the charter which is expressed to be a Mediterranean coal charter, had been expressly made with a named foreign charterer. They would obviously be complied with by notice to the known charterer's agent in this country. If the question arose I should find it difficult to distinguish between the position of Messrs. Seed and Co., Limited, agents for undisclosed owners and the defendants, agents for undisclosed charterers. No one, I think, would construe the charter-party as one where Messrs. Seed and Co., Limited were contracting as owners, and, in my opinion, no one should hold the defendants are contracting as charterers. I think that the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs here and below. Appeal allowed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

June 22 and July 1, 1921.

(Before MCCARDIE, J.)

DIAMOND ALKALI EXPORT CORPORATION v. H. BOURGEOIS. (a)

Contract—Sale of soda ash on c.i.f. terms—Validity of shipping documents tendered as bill of lading and policy of insurance respectively—Buyer's right to reject — Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 21, 22, 50 (sub-s. 3), 90.

A contract provided for the sale of goods to be shipped from American seaboard c.i.f. Gothenburg. Under the contract the sellers tendered, with the invoice for the goods, two documents purporting to be a bill of lading and a policy of insurance respectively. The material part of the bill of lading was as follows: "Received in apparent good order and condition from . . . to be transported by the steamship Anglia, now lying in . . . or failing shipment by said steamer in and upon a following steamer, 280 bags dense soda." The policy of insurance was represented by a certificate of insurance issued by an American insurance corporation, which, as declared by the certificate, "represents and takes the place of the policy and conveys all the rights of the original policy holder . . . as fully as if the properly was covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate."

Held, that the buyers were entitled to reject the goods under the contract on the ground that proper documents had not been tendered by the sellers. The bill of lading did not contain an acknowledgment that the goods had been shipped and was therefore not a good bill of lading under a c.i.f. contract; no document of insurance is good tender in England under a c.i.f. contract unless there is an actual policy which complies with the provisions of the Marine Insurance Act 1906.

SPECIAL case stated by arbitrators for the opinion of the court.

By a contract in writing, dated the 7th Aug. 1920, the Diamond Alkali Export Corporation (hereinafter called "the sellers" agreed to sell to H. Bourgeois (hereinafter called "the buyer") 50 tons soda ash for September-October shipment from American seaboard at $4.70 per 100 lb. c.i.f. Gothenburg to be paid by cash against documents under confirmed banker's credit at London. The said contract contained (inter alia) the following condtions:

Seller not liable for failures or delays in delivery due to strikes, lockouts, fire, accident, embargoes, stoppage of navigation, lack of transportation, war restrictions or seizures by any governmental agency or any contingencies whatever beyond sellers' control. In case any deliveries are delayed owing to any such contingency the delayed shipments shall be made as soon as possible after such contingency has been removed, or such shipments may be cancelled at sellers' option. Date of bill of lading is to be considered date of shipment.

Disputes as to the meaning of the said contract arose between the parties, who ultimately agreed to refer the same to arbitration. Before the arbitrators the sellers alleged that the buyers had committed a breach of the said contract by refusing or neglecting to accept and pay for the goods sold thereunder in accordance with the terms and conditions thereof.

The buyer denied his alleged breach of contract on the following grounds:

(a) That the goods tendered or delivered by sellers were not tendered or delivered in accordance with the terms and conditions of the said contract, not having been shipped until the 8th or 9th Nov. 1920.

(b) That sellers did not present to buyer the contractual document against which he was required to pay for the said goods, namely, a bill of lading in proper form and an appropriate policy of insurance together with the invoice for the said goods.

The sellers further contended that they were excused from shipping the said goods within the time specified in the said contract by reason of accident, embargo, stoppage of navigation, lack of transportaion, war restrictions, or seizure by governmental agency or other contingency beyond their control within the meaning of the contract, and that the contractual documents had been duly presented to the buyer, and were in proper form, and sufficient, according to mercantile usage or custom and law.

The arbitrators, after hearing the parties, published their award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court as follows:

SPECIAL CASE.

The transport of goods for export is regulated in America by the general operating committee, and no railroad company in America is permitted by law to accept car-load quantities of goods intended for export unless the exporter presents a permit from the traffic control manager (New York) of the American Railway Association which specifies the port from which the shipment is to be made and is obtainable only after the exporter has produced evidence that he has definitely arranged for the shipment to be made by a particular steamer to sail at a specified date from that port. After accepting such goods for shipment the railroad company is bound to ship same viâ the route and port specified in such permit, and neither the railway company nor the exporter can divert the shipment from the route or the port specified therein. In pursuance of the requirements of American law, sellers arranged shortly after the said contract was made for the goods which they had agreed to sell to buyers as aforesaid to be carried in the Swedish steamship Anglia, which was originally scheduled to sail from Philadelphia for Gothenburg on the 13th Oct. 1920, and obtained from the traffic control manager (New York) a permit which enabled them to despatch the said goods for shipment accordingly. The said goods were only delivered to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and arrived on the 11th Oct. 1920 at Philadelphia where they were unloaded on the dock on the 13th Oct. 1920 for shipment by the steamship Anglia. The said steamship Anglia did not sail from Philadelphia on the 13th Oct. 1920 as originally intended and advised. She did not arrive at Baltimore until the 15th Oct. 1920, and did not arrive at Philadelphia until after the 4th Nov. 1920, on which date she left Baltimore for that port. The said steamship's date of sailing from Philadelphia was first postponed from the 13th to the 28th Oct. 1920, and then to the 30th of that month on account of the steamer being kept by her owners at Baltimore awaiting cargo there. Thereafter she was delayed by her owners for the same reason from day to day, and did not actually clear from Philadelphia until the 9th Nov. 1920, when she sailed for Gothenburg with the said goods on board. Sellers' consent was not asked for or given to any postponement of the sailing date of the said steamship, and such delay was at all times beyond sellers' control. The bill of lading the date of which according to the said contract is to be considered as the date of shipment is dated the 8th Nov. 1920.

No vessel carrying general cargo for Gothenburg other than the steamship Anglia sailed from Philadelphia between the 13th Oct. 1920 and 9th Nov. 1920, but there were and normally are more frequent sailings of such vessels from either New York or Baltimore. Sellers might have selected either of the latter ports in the first instance, or alternatively it was to have been possible to transport the said goods from Philadelphia to New York or Baltimore, and ship them by a vessel sailing from one of the latter ports before the 31st Oct. 1920, if a fresh permit had been obtained from the traffic control manager (New York), and the said goods had arrived in time for such shipment. It was not suggested that in the circumstances the sellers would have had any difficulty in obtaining a fresh permit, but it would have taken two or three days to obtain, and by the time the sellers knew definitely that the steamship Anglia would not sail until after the 31st Oct. 1920, it was too late to obtain such a permit and transport the said goods from Philadelphia so as to ensure their being carried on a vessel sailing from another port on or before that date.

A true copy of the bill of lading given by or on behalf of the owners of the said steamship Anglia is annexed hereto, and is to be taken as part of this case.

It was objected by or on behalf of the buyer that it was not in the usual and proper form by reason of the said goods being described therein as having been "Received in apparent good order and condition to be transported by the steamship Anglia instead of as 'shipped' per steamship Anglia."

A true copy of the certificate of insurance effected upon the said goods is annexed hereto, and is to be taken as part of this case.

It was objected by or on behalf of the buyer that he was entitled to a policy of insurance and not obliged to accept a certificate of insurance in that form. The original bill of lading and certificate of insurance were presented with an invoice for the said goods to the buyer on or about the 24th Nov. 1920, for payment against the said documents of the price of the said goods in accordance with the terms and conditions of the said contract, but payment was deferred by or on behalf of the buyer.

The questions for the opinion of the court are the following:

(1) Whether upon the true construction of the said contracts the failure to ship the goods until after the 31st Oct. 1920, was in the circumstances hereinbefore stated due to an accident, embargo, stoppage of navigation, war restrictions or seizures by any governmental agency or any contingency whatever beyond sellers' control within the meaning of the condition stated in paragraph 2 of this case.

(2) Whether according to the true construction of the said contract or the usage or custom of merchants and the law of England, the documents presented by the sellers, namely the said bill of lading and certificate of insurance were together with the invoice for the said goods (which was admitted by or on behalf of the buyer) valid and sufficient to entitle the sellers to payment of the price of the said goods.

Patrick Hastings, K.C. and Lord Tiverton for the sellers.

J. Compston, K.C., Simner, and Kenelm Preedy for the buyers.

July 1.—McCARDIE, J. (after stating the facts) read the following judgment.—By a written contract of Aug. 1920 the Diamond Alkali Export Corporation of New York sold to H. Bourgeois of London fifty tons of soda ash. Shipment was to be September-October from American sea board. Terms of payment were cash against documents under confirmed bankers credit at London. Price was c.i.f. Gothenburg. The contract contained (inter alia) this condition: "Seller not liable for failures or delays in delivery due to strikes, lockouts, fire, accident, embargoes, stoppage of navigation, lack of transportation, war restrictions or seizures by any governmental agency or any contingencies whatever beyond sellers' control. In case any deliveries are delayed owing to any such contingency, the delayed shipments shall be made as soon as possible after such contingency has been removed or such shipments may be cancelled at sellers' option. Date of bill of lading is to be considered date of shipment." The buyers rejected the documents when tendered in London upon several grounds, namely (1) That the sellers had not shipped the goods until the 8th and 9th Nov. 1920; (2) that a proper bill of lading was not presented; (3) that a proper policy of insurance was not presented. The sellers assert that their non-shipment of the goods in Sept.-Oct. 1920 is met by the strike clause. They also assert that the documents tendered to the buyers complied with the contract. It is admitted, and the award states, that the points are to be decided by English law. I shall not narrate the circumstances whereby (as is admitted) the goods were not shipped on board till the 8th and 9th Nov. 1920. The facts found fall, I think, within the strike, &c., clause. The arbitrators state that the delay was at all times beyond the sellers' control. The strike clause is very broadly worded. It is not confined to prevention. It refers to delay also. The words "or any contingencies whatever" seem to exclude the operation of the ejusdem generis rule. See, for example, Larsen v. Sylvester (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 78; 99 L. T. Rep. 94; (1908) A. C. 395), and Travers v. Cooper (111 L. T. Rep. 1088; (1915) 1 K. B. 73).

That being so, the next question is whether the effect of the strike clause was merely to save the sellers from liability, or whether it operated also to debar the buyers from insisting that the goods had not been shipped in the months specified in the contract. Upon the whole I think that the effect of the clause was to enable the seller (if facts within the strike clause prevented shipment in September-October) to ship at a later date. I am not aware of any direct authority on the point. The case of Brown v. Turner, Brightman and Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 105 L. T. Rep. 562; (1912) A. C. 12) and the like decisions do not really touch the point. The decision in Brooke Tool Co., v. Hydraulic Co. (122 L. T. Rep. 126) turned upon different considerations. The clause must be read in a fair business sense. It effects two things, I think. It firstly saves the vendor from liability for delay, etc., caused by circumstances within the clause; and, secondly, it enables the seller, as a matter of right, to ship as soon as possible after the cause of delay has ceased to operate. It gives power to the seller to cancel. It gives no like power to the buyer. In the case of J. Aron and Co. v. Comptoir Wegimont (1921, 3 K. B. 435), I stated my views on the meaning and contractual effects of a condition for shipment at a specified time. I do not repeat them. Here an express clause of the bargain enables the sellers as a matter of right to ship at a later date than that expressed in the earlier part of the contract of sale. I therefore find in favour of the sellers on the first objection of the buyers.

It thus becomes my duty to consider the serious and powerfully argued contention of the buyers that the documents tendered did not conform to the contract. I will deal with those documents separately. I take first what I will call for convenience the bill of lading. That document was issued by the Swedish America Mexico Line Limited of Gothenburg, Sweden. It is dated the 8th Nov. 1920. It contains many clauses. The arguments before me turned on the earlier words of the bill of lading, and those only I set out. They are these: "Received in apparent good order and condition from D. A. Horan to be transported by the steamship Anglia now lying in the port of Philadelphia and bound for Gothenburg, Sweden, with liberty to call at any port or ports in or out of the customary route, or failing shipment by said steamer in and upon a following steamer, 280 bags dense soda." Perhaps I should add that the first of the many clauses in the bill of lading is this; "It is mutually agreed that this shipment is subject to all the terms and provisions of and all the exemptions from liability contained in the Act of Congress of the United States approved on the 13th Feb. 1893 and entitled "an Act relating to navigation of vessels, bills of lading, and to certain obligations, duties, and rights in connection with the carriage of property." This Act of 1893 provides by sect. 4 "That it shall be the duty of the owner or owners, master or masters or agent of any vessel transporting merchandise or property from or between ports of the United States and foreign ports to issue to shippers of any lawful merchandise a bill of lading or shipping document, stating, amongst other things, the marks necessary for identification, number of packages or quantity, stating whether it be the carriers' or shippers' weight, and apparent order or condition of such merchandise or property delivered to and received by the owner, master, or agent of the vessel for transportation, and such document shall be prima facie evidence of the receipt of the merchandise therein described." I call attention to the words "bill of lading or shipping document." The Act recognises that there may be shipping documents fulfilling the requirements of the section and yet not bills of lading.

Now the buyers strongly contend that the document here tendered was not a bill of lading at all, and that in any event it was not such a bill of lading as was required by the contract. They call attention to the fact that the document does not acknowledge the goods to have been actually placed on board. It merely says that the goods have been received "to be transported by the steamship Anglia." They further call attention to the words "or failing shipment by said steamer in and upon a following steamer." I need scarcely say that I appreciate the vital nature of the buyers' contention inasmuch as the form of document now before me is of frequent use at American ports. In order to test the matter it is necessary in the first place to consider the rights of a buyer under a c.i.f. contract. The strike clause here is a mere accident, and does not seem to affect the point at issue. For inasmuch as the duty of the vendors was to ship as soon as the contingency ceased to operate and inasmuch as they were able to ship on the 8th and 9th Nov. 1920, it follows that the time of shipment under the contract was that date.

What, then, are a seller's duties and buyer's rights under a c.i.f. contract? They were stated by Lord Blackburn in Ireland v. Livingston (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; 27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 H. L. 395, at p. 406), where he refers to a "bill of lading." So, too, in the well-known judgment of Hamilton, J. in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 103 L. T. Rep. 661; (1911) 1 K. B. 214, at p. 221), where he says: "It follows that against tender of those documents, the bill of lading, invoice, and policy of insurance which completes delivery in accordance with that agreement, the buyer must be ready and willing to pay the price." So per Kennedy, L.J. in the same volume at p. 956: "How is such a tender to be made of goods afloat under a c.i.f. contract? By tender of the bill of lading accompanied, in case the goods have been lost in transit, by the policy of insurance. The bill of lading in law and fact represents the goods." See also Scrutton, J. in Landauer v. Craven (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 106 L. T. Rep. 298; (1912) 2 K. B. 94, at p. 107). The latest statement is the opinion of Lord Birkenhead in Johnson v. Taylor Bros. and Co. Limited (122 L. T. Rep. 130; (1920) A. C. 149), where he says in speaking of the duties of a vendor under a c.i.f. contract: "He is bound in the second place to tender to the purchaser within a reasonable time after shipment the shipping documents, for example, the bill of lading and a policy of insurance reasonably covering the value of the goods." I should mention also the notes to Scrutton and Mackinnon on Charter-parties, art. 59. If then a vendor under an ordinary c.i.f. contract is bound to tender a bill of lading, the question next arising is: What is meant by a bill of lading within such a contract? The contract decides the right of the buyer. The question I feel is not as to the meaning of the phrase in a particular Act of Parliament or as to the possible meaning under other forms of contract. Nor is it material that a buyer objects to the document for ulterior motives. See, for example, Lord Cairns in Bowes v. Shand (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 461; 36 L. T. Rep. 857; 2 App. Cas. 455, at p. 465) and per Lord Hatherley in the same volume, at p. 476. A buyer, as those noble Lords pointed out, is entitled to insist on the letter of his rights. As Lord Hatherley said: "You must bring the buyer within the four corners of the contract." A buyer, moreover, may have obvious business reasons for so insisting as he may have to implement his own bargain with rigorous sub-vendees. Now I consider that the phrase "bill of lading," as used with respect to a c.i.f. contract, means a bill of lading in the sense established by a long line of legal decisions. Unless this meaning be given the matter is thrown into confusion. In art. 3 of Scrutton and Mackinnon on Charter-parties and Bills of Lading, 10th edit., is a definition which says, "A bill of lading is a receipt for goods shipped on board a ship, signed by the person who contracts to carry them, or his agent, and stating the terms on which the goods were delivered to and received by the ship." This statement suggests at once an obvious and serious distinction between a receipt for goods actually shipped on board a particular ship and a receipt for goods which are at some future time to be shipped on board either a particular ship or an unnamed ship to follow her. This business distinction and varying results of the two seem to me to be plain. The legal distinction seems to me to be equally plain. From the earliest times a bill of lading was a document which acknowledged actual shipment on board a particular ship. In Bennett's History of the Bill of Lading (Cambridge Press 1914), at p. 8 is this passage: "Desjardins says that towards the close of the sixteenth century the use of the bill of lading was widespread. He quotes a definition from Le Guidon de la mer, a document of that epoch, which defines the bill of lading as "the acknowledgment which the master makes of the number and quality of the goods loaded on board": (see Desjardin's Traité de Droit Commercial Maritime, tome 4, art. 904. Paris, 1885). It is clear, I may add, that the bill of lading sprang from the ship's book of lading, which was a document of weight, showing the goods actually put on board. The famous case of Lickbarrow v. Mason (5 Term Rep. 683) was discussed. It decided that bills of lading were transferable by the custom of merchants. The finding of the jury as to the custom is set out at p. 685 as follows: "By the custom of merchants, bills of lading, expressing goods or merchandizes to have been shipped by any person or persons to be delivered to order or assigns, have been, and are, at any time after such goods have been shipped, and before the voyage performed for which they have been or are shipped, negotiable and transferable by the shipper or shippers of such goods . . . &c. . . . The word 'negotiable' in that special verdict means no more than the word 'transferable' or 'assignable.'" See Scrutton on Charter-parties, art. 56 (note 1). I am not aware of any decision which has modified the finding of the jury in Lickbarrow v. Mason as to the subject matter to which alone the custom of transferability applied. Apparently that custom and that custom only was operative when the Bills of Lading Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 3) was passed. Now that Act expressly recites the custom found in Lickbarrow v. Mason, and then proceeds: "And whereas it frequently happens that the goods in respect of which bills of lading purport to be signed have not been laden on board." It thus seems plain that the Act was referring to documents acknowledging an actual shipment on board a specified ship. I need not refer to sects. 1 and 2 of the Act. But sect. 3 says: "Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or endorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other persons signing the same . . . " &c. It seems clear that no assignee can invoke the benefits, for example, of sect. 3 unless the document actually asserts that the goods have been shipped on board. The whole point of the section seems to go if the document does not contain such an assertion. I will refer to this Act later.

In Blackburn on Sale, 3rd edit., p. 421, is this statement: "A bill of lading is a writing signed on behalf of the owner of the ship in which the goods are embarked acknowledging the receipt of the goods and undertaking to deliver them at the end of the voyage (subject to such conditions as may be mentioned in the bill of lading)." The common type of a bill of lading is given in Carver on Carriage by Sea, 6th edit., sect. 54. It is worthy of observation that in the U.S.A. case of Rowley v. Bigelow (12 Pick. 307 Mass.) Shaw, C.J. said: "The bill of lading acknowledges the goods to be on board and regularly the goods ought to be on board before the bill of lading is signed." See the note in Parsons on Shipping (Boston), vol. 1, p. 187, where the learned author somewhat pointedly says: "It is a fraud on the part of the master to sign the bills before the goods are on board." In Benjamin on Sale, 6th edit., p. 846, is this passage giving the result of the cases: "When delivery is to be made by a bill of lading the rule is that the seller makes a good delivery if he forward to the buyer, as soon as he reasonably can after the shipment, a bill of lading whereunder the buyer can obtain delivery duly indorsed, effectual to pass the property or the goods, made out in terms consistent with the contract of sale, and purporting to represent goods in accordance with the contract and which are in fact in accordance therewith." Apart from any authority to the contrary it seems to me that I must hold that the document here is not a bill of lading within the c.i.f. contract before me. It does not acknowledge the goods to be on board a specific ship, nor does it acknowledge a shipment on board at all. It leaves it uncertain as to whether the goods will come by the Anglia or some following ship. The word "following" is loose and ambiguous in itself. The document does not even say "immediately following," nor does it indicate that the "following ship" will belong to or be under the control of the person who issues the bill of lading. The document seems to me to be (in substance) a mere receipt for goods which at some future time and by some uncertain vessel are to be shipped. It is not even in the form of the New York Produce Exchange bill of lading set out in Carver, 6th edit., appendix A, p. 971. The buyer is left in doubt as to actual shipment and actual ship. The sellers, however, submit that I am bound by the opinion of the Privy Council in The Marlborough Hill (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; 124 L. T. Rep. 645; (1921) 1 A. C. 444). The buyers, on the other hand, contend that that opinion is erroneous and that I ought not to follow it.

I need not scarcely state the deep diffidence and embarrassment I feel in discussing that weighty opinion. As Lord Phillimore himself, however, pointed out in Dulieu v. White (85 L. T. Rep. 126; (1901) 2 K.B. 669, at p. 683) a Privy Council advice is not binding on the King's Bench Division even as to the res decisa. I wish to point out first that the actual decision in that case was merely that the bill of lading there in question (which closely resembles the one now before me) fell within sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court 1865. It may be that the phrase "Bill of Lading" in that section permits of a broad interpretation.

I point out next that there is no express statement in the Marlborough Hill, that the document there in question actually fell within the Bills of Lading Act 1855. In the third place it seems to me to be clear that the Board did not consider the nature or effect of an ordinary c.i.f. contract, or the decisions thereon in relation to the question before them. The case of Bowes v. Shand (sup.) was not even cited to the board. Lord Phillimore in reading the advice of the Privy Council said (p. 451): "There can be no difference in principle between the owner, master, or agent acknowledging that he has received the goods on his wharf, or allotted portion of quay, or his storehouse, awaiting shipment, and his acknowledging that the goods have been actually put over the ship's rail." With the deepest respect I venture to think that there is a great difference between the two, both from a legal and business point of view. Those differences seem to me clear. I need not state them. If the view of the Privy Council is carried to its logical conclusion a mere receipt for goods at a dock warehouse for shipment might well be called a bill of lading. At p. 452 of the report the board say: "Then as regards the obligation to carry either by the named ship or by some other vessel, it is a contract which both parties may well find it convenient to enter into and accept. The liberty to tranship is ancient and well established, and does not derogate from the nature of a bill of lading, and if the contract begins when the goods are received on the wharf, substitution does not differ in principle from trans-shipment."

I do not pause to analyse these words. I only say that in my own humble view substitution and the right of trans-shipment are distinct things, and rest on different principles. The passage last cited can, I think, have no application at all to a c.i.f. contract which provides for a specific date of shipment. It will suffice if I say two things. First, that in my view the Marlborough Hill case does not apply to a c.i.f. contract such as that now before me. Secondly, the grounds for challenging the dicta of the Privy Council will be found in art. 22, and the notes and cases there cited, in Scrutton and Mackinnon (10th edit.) as to what are called "through" bills of lading, in the lucid article in the "Law Quarterly Review" of Oct. 1889, vol. 5, p. 424, by Mr. Bateson, K.C., and of July 1890, vol. 6, p. 289, by the late Mr. Carver, and in Carver on Carriage by Sea, notes to art. 107. I do not doubt that the document before me is a "shipping document" within the U.S.A. Harter Act 1893. I feel bound to hold, however, that it is not a bill of lading within the c.i.f. contract of sale made between the present parties.

I now consider the second document discussed before me. The buyers contend that the "Certificate of Insurance" tendered by the sellers was not a policy of insurance within the c.i.f. contract. It is headed "certificate of insurance." It is No. 767,922. It is issued by the Firemen's Fund Insurance Company of San Francisco, a well-known office. The substantive words are these: "This is to certify that on the 8th of Nov. 1920 this company insured under Policy No. 2319 for D. A. Horan, $5790 on 280 bags, 58 per cent. dense soda ash, N.Y. and L. Test valued at sum insured, shipped on board of the steamship Anglia and/or other steamer or steamers, at and from Philadelphia to Gothenburg. And it is hereby understood and agreed that in case of loss such loss is payable to the order of the assured on surrender of this certificate. This certificate represents and takes the place of the policy, and conveys all the rights of the original policy holder (for the purpose of collecting any loss or claims) as fully as if the property was covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate, and free from any liability for unpaid premiums. Not valid unless countersigned by D. A. Horan. (Signed) F. H. and C. Robson, Managers. Countersigned D. A. Horan." Notice: "To conform with the revenue laws of Great Britain in order to collect a claim under this certificate it must be stamped within ten days after its receipt in the United Kingdom." On the front of the certificate are certain conditions of which the first is this: "This certificate is subject to the full terms of the policy in respect of being free from claim in respect of capture, seizure, detention, or the consequences of hostilities." At the back of the certificate, are other conditions which I need not detail. Is this certificate a proper policy of insurance within the c.i.f. contract here made? I have read, I believe, all the cases on the rights and obligations of buyer and seller under c.i.f. contracts from Ireland v. Livingston (27 L. T. Rep. 79) and Hickox v. Adam (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 142; 34 L. T. Rep. 404), to Johnson v. Taylor Bros. and Co. and others (122 L. T. Rep. 130). Many decisions are cited in Benjamin on Sale (6th edit.), p. 850, and so on. In all the cases a "policy of insurance" is mentioned as an essential document. The law is settled and established. I may point out that in Burstall v. Grimswade (11 Com. Cas. 280) it was expressly provided by the contract that a certificate of insurance might be an alternative for an actual policy. I ventured in Manbre Saccharine Company v. Corn Products Company (120 L. T. Rep. 113; (1919) 1 K.B. 198) to discuss the relevant authorities, including the lucid judgment of Atkin, J. in Groom Limited v. Barber (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 594; 112 L. T. Rep. 301; (1915) 1 K.B. 316)—a judgment which I have again most carefully read. It seems plain that a mere written statement by the sellers that they hold the buyers covered by insurance in respect of a specified policy of insurance, is not a policy of insurance within a c.i.f. contract: (see the Manbre case (sup.) It seems plain also that a broker's cover note or an ordinary certificate of insurance are not adequate agreements within such a contract: (see Bailhache, J., in Wilson, Holgate and Co. v. Belgian Grain and Produce Company (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 566; 122 L. T. Rep. 524; (1920) 2 K. B. 1). Does the present document fulfil the sellers' contractual duty? In the Wilson Holgate case, p. 7 of L. Rep., Bailhache, J. said: "It must be borne in mind that in dealing with certificates of insurance I am not referring to American certificates of insurance which stand on a different footing and are equivalent to policies, being accepted in this country as policies."

It will be observed that Bailhache, J. used the word "accepted" and not the words "bound to accept." The sellers here rely on that passage and also on the notes to Scrutton and Mackinnon on Charter-parties, 10th edit., p. 185, where it is said: "A certificate of insurance issued by an insurance company under a floating policy upon which document the company can be sued would suffice in any case." The buyer strongly challenges that view, and his counsel require me to express an independent opinion on the point.

I do so with the greatest diffidence and reluctance in view of the weight carried by even the dicta of such experienced and distinguished judges as Scrutton, L.J. and Bailhache, J., I feel bound to express my view not upon a question of business convenience, but upon the strict law of the matter. I assume that this document (which is not stamped) was given under a floating policy issued by the insurance company to D. A. Horan. Now the certificate is not a policy. It does not purport to be a policy. This is conceded by Mr. Hastings in his able argument for the sellers. It is a certificate that a policy was issued to D. A. Horan, and it incorporates the terms of that policy. Those terms I do not know, nor is there anything before me to indicate that the buyers knew them. The certificate does not show whether that policy was in a recognised or usual form or not. The certificate, therefore, does not contain all the terms of the insurance. Those terms have to be sought for in two documents—namely, the original policy and the certificate. But even if this document is not a policy yet the sellers say it is "equivalent to a policy." In connection with that phrase it is well to quote from another part of the judgment of Bailhache, J. in the Wilson Holgate case. He says at p. 9 of the report: "He, the buyer, cannot be compelled to take a document which is something like that which he has agreed to take. He is entitled to have a document of the very kind which he has agreed to take or at least one which does not differ from it in any material respect." This leads me to ask whether the document before me differs in any material respect from a policy of insurance. The latter is a well-known document with clearly defined features. It comes within definite, established, and statutory legal rights. A certificate, however, is an ambiguous thing; it is unclassified and undefined by law. It is not even mentioned in Arnould. No rules have been laid down upon it. Would the buyer sue upon the certificate, or upon the original policy plus the certificate? If he sued simply on the certificate, he could put in a part only of the contract, for the other terms of the contract, namely, the conditions of the actual policy, would be contained in a document not in his control, and to the possession of which he is not entitled. In the third place I point out that before the buyer could sue at all, he would have to show that he was the assignee of the certificate. See Arnould, 9th edit., sects. 175-177. In what way can he become the assignee? It is vital to remember the provisions of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. Now the relevant statutory provision is sect. 50 (3) which says: "A marine policy may be assigned by endorsement thereon or in any other customary manner." This sub-section, however, only applies so far as I can see, to that which is an actual marine policy. Sect. 90, the interpretation clause, says: "In this Act unless the context or subject matter otherwise requires," policy means "a marine policy." The Act contains no reference, express or implied, to a certificate of insurance. Sect. 22 says: "Subject to the provisions of any statute a contract of marine insurance is inadmissible in evidence unless it is embodied in a marine policy in accordance with this Act." If, as is admitted, this document be a certificate only, and not a policy, it therefore seems not even to be admissible in evidence before me. If the certificate does not fall within the Marine Insurance Act it appears to be only assignable by writing in accordance with the provisions of the Judicature Act 1873, s. 25 (6). The certificate may have less legal effect than a slip, as to which see Arnould par. 34, and sect. 21 of the Marine Insurance Act.

I mention these considerations briefly. Time does not permit to discuss them further or to develop their significance or to emphasise the points arising under sects. 91 to 95 of the Stamp Act 1891. In my view the Act of 1906 deals with marine policies only. It does not, I think, cover other documents, although they may be said to be the "business equivalent" of policies. I do not think that the Act of 1906 covers the document now before me. In my humble view a document of insurance is not a good tender in England under an ordinary c.i.f. contract unless it be an actual policy, and unless it falls within the provisions of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. As to assignment and otherwise I must, therefore, hold that the buyers were entitled to reject the documents upon the ground that no proper bill of lading and no proper policy of insurance were tendered by the sellers in conformity with the c.i.f. contract. I abstain from amplifying this judgment by the citation of other authority or the mention of further reasons in support of the conclusions I have deemed it my duty to state. It may well be that this decision is disturbing to business men. It is my duty, however, to state my view of the law without regard to mere questions of convenience. I desire to add four remarks: (1) That there is no finding or evidence before me of any course of dealing between the parties. (2) That there is no finding or evidence before me of any custom or general usage which modifies the long and clearly established legal rights of a buyer under a c.i.f. contract. If any such custom or usage be asserted then the point can be dealt with in some future action in the Commercial Court. Whether such an assertion can be proved may well be a question of doubt in view of the matters appearing in the Manbre case. See, too, the Wilson Holgate case, where Bailhache, J. said: "I am not satisfied that since Ireland v. Livingstone was decided any custom has arisen which obviates the necessity for a tender by the seller of a policy of insurance if the buyer requires it." (3) It may well be that legislation is needed to enlarge the operation of the Bills of Lading Act 1855 and the Marine Insurance Act 1906. (4) That the difficulties indicated in this judgment can be easily, promptly, and effectively met by the insertion of appropriate clauses in c.i.f. contracts.

For the reasons given I find in favour of the buyers with the results stated in the award. The sellers must pay the costs of the proceedings before me.

The Blonde and other ships. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT, ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Ships owned by Danzig corporation—Seizure in British port on outbreak of war—Requisition—Owners' right to release—Applicability of Hague Convention—Delinquencies of German forces—Hague Convention, No. VI., arts. 1, 2, 6—Treaty of Versailles, Part VIII., annex. III., art. 1, Part X., art. 297.

Three merchant ships, each of which was under 1600 tons gross, the property of a German corporation which had its head office in Danzig, were in British ports at the commencement of hostilities, and were accordingly detained there. Under Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules 1914 they were then requisitioned for the service of His Majesty. While thus requisitioned one of the ships was lost by stranding, and another was sunk by enemy action. By a decree of Sir Henry Duke, P. the three vessels had been condemned. The owners appealed.

Held, that the Sixth Hague Convention having been recognised as binding upon Great Britain, it was not possible in regard to the general delinquencies of the German forces during the war, to find juridical grounds for releasing His Majesty's Government from their obligations under the convention when once they had attached, and the provisions under art. II. against the confiscation of enemy merchant ships coming under the convention were therefore obligatory. Further, there was no evidence of any conduct on the part of the German Government down to the Armistice which put it out of her power to return ships which had been detained.

Where a requisitioned ship had been lost the owners were entitled to the appraised value of the ship, even although she had been sunk by German forces. As regards the Treaty of Versailles, while part VIII., annex III., art. 1 operated to transfer the property in all ships of 1600 tons gross and upwards, it made no such transfer in the case of ships of less tonnage, at least until they had been selected for surrender as part of those which under the Treaty were to be handed over.

By Part X., art. 297, the Treaty did not modify or annul the obligation which arose under the Hague Convention. Under any order of release the res should not be removed out of British territory for a reasonable time, lest otherwise the Treaty right might be defeated.

In the result, therefore, the appeal succeeded; and an order was advised that the appraised value of the two lost ships, and the ship remaining in specie be released to the custodian of enemy property to be delivered up to the owners if after the lapse of six months no proceedings had been begun for an order for delivery up to the Crown.

Decision of Sir Henry Duke, P. reversed (1921) P. 155).

Further advised on the petitions that the ships, all of which were over 1600 tons gross, and in respect of which orders for detention had been made, should be released to the Crown.

APPEAL from the decision of Sir Henry Duke, P., reported (1921) P. 155; also petitions and cross-petitions for the release or condemnation of enemy ships.

The action was brought by the Procurator-General on behalf of the Crown for the condemnation of the merchant steamships, Blonde, Hercules, and Prosper, as enemy property. The ships were in British ports at the outbreak of hostilities in 1914, and having been seized were ordered by the Prize Court to be detained until the conclusion of peace or further order. The three ships, each of which was under 1600 tons gross, were requisitioned for the service of His Majesty by orders made by the Prize Court under Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules 1914. At the time of seizure the vessels were the property of a German corporation, which had its business seat in the port of Danzig, and they were registered in the port of Danzig. The Blonde was lost by stranding, the Hercules was sunk by enemy action while under requisition, and the Prosper was still afloat. After the conclusion of peace the Danzig owners filed claims asking for restoration of the Prosper with compensation for her use and compensation in respect of the loss of the other two ships. On behalf of the owners it was contended that as a result of diplomatic correspondence between Great Britain and Germany in the autumn of 1914, there was an agreement whereby German ships which were then in British ports and were being detained were to be restored at the end of the war and compensation was to be paid; and that even if that agreement, so far as German nationals were concerned, was not binding on Great Britain because of Germany's breaches of international law, the citizens of Danzig stood in a different position, because under sect. 11 of the Treaty of Versailles 1919, they were no longer German nationals. Sir Henry Duke, P. held that the Treaty left the citizens of Danzig in the same position, so far as their property, rights, and interests were concerned, as if they had remained German subjects; that certain negotiations between Great Britain and Germany in Aug., Sept. 1914, as to the ultimate treatment of detained enemy vessels did not constitute a binding agreement, and that as in the absence of agreement to the contrary merchant ships of a belligerent found in an enemy port at the outbreak of hostilities were subject to condemnation, the ships must be condemned. The owners appealed.

There were also before the Privy Council petitions and cross-petitions relating to the Gutenfels, Rabenfels, Werdenfels, Lauterfels, Anna Rickmers, Barenfels, Prinz Adalbert, and Kronprinzessin Cäcilie. In each of these cases the Prize Court had made similar orders for detention until further orders. The petitions and cross-petitions were on the part of the respective owners for the release of the ships, and on the part of the Crown for their condemnation. Each of these vessels was over 1600 tons.

The arguments in all these cases were heard together, and the judgment deals also with the petitions and cross-petitions.

The Hague Convention No. VI. of 1907 provides:

Art. 1. Where a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities had broken out.

Art. 2. A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.

Art. 6. The provisions of the present Convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the Convention.

The Treaty of Versailles provides in annex III. of part VIII.:

1. Germany recognises the right of the allied and associated powers to the replacement, ton for ton [gross tonnage] and class for class, of all merchant ships and fishing boats lost or damaged owing to the war.

Nevertheless, and in spite of the fact that the tonnage of German shipping at present in existence is much less than that lost by the allied and associated powers in consequence of the German aggression the right thus recognised will be enforced on German ships and boats under the following conditions: The German Government, on behalf of themselves and so as to bind all other persons interested, cede to the allied and associated governments the property in all the German merchant ships which are of 1600 tons gross and upwards; in one half, reckoned in tonnage, of the ships which are between 1000 tons and 1600 tons gross, in one quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the steam trawlers; and in one quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the other fishing boats.

8. Germany waives all claims of any description against the allied and associated governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any German ships or boats, exception being made of payments due in respect of the employment of ships in conformity with the Armistice Agreement of the 13th Jan. 1919, and subsequent Agreements.

Part X., sect. IV.:

Art. 297. The question of private property, rights and interests in an enemy country shall be settled according to the principles laid down in this section and to the provisions of the annex hereto: (b) Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present Treaty, the allied and associated powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights and interests belonging, at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present Treaty.

The liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the allied or associated state concerned, and the German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights, or interests nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of that State.

By Part III., sect. XI., arts. 100 to 108 inclusive, Danzig together with all property situated within its territory was created a Free City:

Art. 105. On the coming into force of the present Treaty German nationals ordinarily resident in the territory described in art. 100 will, ipso facto, lose their German nationality in order to become nationals of the Free City of Danzig.

Part XV.:

Art. 440. Germany accepts and recognises as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning German ships and goods and all orders relating to the payment of costs made by any Prize Court of any of the allied or association powers.

The further facts and the arguments appear sufficiently from their Lordship's judgment.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—These are consolidated appeals from the President's judgment rejecting the claims of the appellant company for release with compensation and condemning the vessels in question, the Blonde, the Prosper, and the Hercules. They were small German steamers, two under 800 and one under 1100 tons gross, which at the outbreak of the war happened to be in London and Liverpool, and were seized and proceeded against in prize. Orders were in due course made for their detention in the form which was settled in The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 112 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) P. 212), and followed in many cases during the war. Shortly afterwards they were requisitioned by order of the court for the use of His Majesty, and passed into the service of the Admiralty. Two have since been lost while under requisition—the Blonde by grounding off Flamborough Head, and the Hercules through being struck by an enemy torpedo. The Prosper still remained in the hands of the Crown under the requisition order at the time when the case was heard.

The appellants are a shipping company registered and carrying on business at Danzig, where the ships also were registered, and at the outbreak of war they owned a number of the shares in each vessel, though not all; but they have been throughout treated as the full owners for all present purposes. Danzig having become a Free City under the Treaty of Versailles, the appellants, as citizens of Danzig, claim to be in a better position in these proceedings than if they had still been subjects of the German Empire, and no point has been taken on behalf of His Majesty's Procurator-General that, as Danzig was not a party to the Hague Conventions, citizens of Danzig should not be allowed to claim the benefit of them. All that is said is that, in respect of Germany's actions during the war, the appellants, as they enjoyed the benefit, must also take the burden, although, as regards disabilities and liabilities imposed on Germany by the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, they may escape, having ceased to be Germans at the moment when the treaty first became operative. The principal point is one turning on the Hague Conventions of 1907, which, though not argued below owing to some misunderstanding as to the state of the authorities, must be dealt with on one or other of the present groups of appeals. The appellants claim the benefit of the sixth convention, or in the alternative of a supposed agreement to the like effect, arrived at ad hoc by Great Britain and Germany in the early months of the war. The Procurator-General denies that the sixth Hague Convention ever became applicable, firstly, for want of ratification by all the belligerents; and secondly, because art. 2. on which the appellants rest their claim, would only apply if Great Britain had put art. 1 in force, which never was done. As to the supposed agreement ad hoc, he says that the negotiations were entered into for other purposes and, further, broke down without any conclusion.

The history of the matter is this. Early in Aug. 1914, pursuant to an Order in Council of the 4th of the month, a proclamation was issued, which declared that German ships in British ports would be detained, but that His Majesty proposed ultimately to apply the sixth Hague Convention, provided that a Secretary of State certified, before midnight of the 7th Aug., that he was satisfied, from communications received, that Germany had expressed a similar intention. This period expired without the receipt of any sufficient communication, and the fact was duly intimated to the Admiralty. Thereupon, it is said, the sixth Hague Convention, so far as Great Britain and Germany were concerned, failed to come into operation, and accordingly the provisions of art. 2 had no effect in the late war.

In spite of this notice to the Admiralty, communications passed between the two Powers through the good offices of the diplomatic service of the United States. Letters and telegrams were exchanged, and sometimes they crossed one another. The German Government were concerned not merely as to the treatment of detained ships under the sixth convention, but also as to that of the crews under the eleventh. They asked whether His Majesty's Government intended to observe the provisions of these conventions, and in what sense they understood some of their obscurer terms. By the end of September or the beginning of October both parties had stated distinctly that the sixth convention would be observed, and had expressed their construction of it, in senses which were substantially identical. As to the eleventh, though not far apart, it does not appear on the documents which are forthcoming, that they were ever in absolute accord. Their Lordships were not informed that His Majesty's Government ever published this correspondence at the time as the formal record of a new agreement therein arrived at.

The learned president came to the conclusion that this correspondence, viewed as a negotiation for a final agreement, never passed beyond the stage of mere negotiation, the discussions as to the two conventions not being severable and no agreement having been arrived at as to the eleventh convention. The contrary was strenuously urged before their Lordships. Logically, however, there is a prior issue, namely, whether this correspondence was entered upon or was pursued as a negotiation intended to lead to a new international agreement at all. The treaties and conventions, which Courts of Prize are accustomed to construe and give effect to, are written instruments duly executed and ratified. It is a novelty to call on them to spell out such an agreement from a series of messages passing to and fro. Here there is not so much as a protocol, and although no doubt consensus ad idem is fundamentally necessary to an international agreement, as it would be to a private offer and acceptance under municipal law, it does not follow that in the intercourse of sovereign states every interchange of messages, some formal and some informal, should be deemed to result in a new and binding agreement as soon as the parties have reached the stage of affirming identical propositions. Each power was anxious to know the intentions of the other, and in their Lordships' opinion their object, and their sole object, was to ascertain whether and in what way effect would be given to the old agreement, namely, the sixth Hague Convention, and was not to enter into a new agreement, dealing with the same subject and tending to the same effect, but concluded under conditions as embarrassing and with a result as superfluous as could be imagined.

It is true that expressions are to be found on the German side, in the latter part of these communications as well as at the outset, which are not inappropriate to a negotiation for, and to the conclusion of, a new agreement. The German Government in August states its acceptance of a British proposition to release merchant ships, made in the Order in Council of the 4th Aug., and in October declares that "there now exists between the German Government and Great Britain an agreement as to the treatment of merchant ships." These expressions were not, however, adopted by His Majesty's Government. They throughout stated their intention to abide by the sixth Hague Convention, provided Germany would do the same, and there are dispatches from Germany at the end of August and in September which show that this which was the real aspect of the matter, was fully recognised by the German Government. The language of the communications, when carefully examined, does not support but displaces the theory that a new agreement was in negotiation between belligerents to effect what could have been better secured by reciprocal recognition of a convention, to which both parties had adhered while they were still at peace.

In the result His Majesty's Government became satisfied that there existed on the German Government's part such an intention to observe the convention reciprocally as justified them in proceeding publicly to observe the convention for their own part, and thenceforward orders were made in the Prize Court, at the instance of the Crown, which were always regarded as being framed to carry out the obligations of the sixth Hague Convention, while securing the interests of this country in the possible event of Germany's failing at the conclusion of the war to be of the same mind as to her obligations as that which had been manifested at the beginning, Their Lordships may further observe that, on balance of the importance of the German merchant ships detained by Great Britain against that of British merchant ships detained by Germany, the latter power had a strong material interest in continuing to execute the convention to the end, and was little likely to intend to abandon or to desire to forfeit the ultimate advantages, which observance of the convention would assure. It therefore becomes necessary to consider in what the obligations of that convention consist according to its terms.

The sixth article of the sixth convention of 1907 declares that "the provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention." The French text for the last part of this sentence reads: "et seulement si les belligérants sont tous parties à la convention," and there may be significance in the different positions in the sentence occupied by the respective words "all" and "tous." Of the powers belligerent in some theatre or other and against one combination of opponents or another during the late war, Serbia and Montenegro never ratified the convention in question. The United States were not parties to it at all. At the time when the ships now under discussion were first detained, Germany had not declared war on Serbia, nor had Serbia become formally the ally of Great Britain, and, so far as their Lordships are aware, actual hostile action by Germany against Serbia and actual military support to Serbia by Great Britain both belong to later stages in the war. A nice question arises, therefore, whether Serbia was a belligerent in such a sense that her failure to ratify the convention prevents its being applicable as between Germany and Great Britain in the matter of these ships? If the position of Serbia does not prevent the obligations of the convention from attaching, still less can this result from that of the United States, who were not one of the "contracting powers." To put the point otherwise, are the "belligerents," who are to be taken account of for the purposes of this article, the belligerents merely who detain or suffer detention, or are they all the powers who are simultaneously engaged in war, whether acting in alliance or in direct conflict with one another or not? Is the adherence of all the belligerents, however remote from each other or unconnected with the ships and their detention, the consideration for the attaching of the obligation of any one of them, or are the mutual promises of the powers concerned—that is, of the detainer and the detained—a sufficient consideration to bind them together? Mutuality is of the essence of the convention. Is that mutuality complete if the detaining sovereign and the sovereign of the ships detained ratify and abide by the convention, or is it imperfect, so as to prevent the application of the convention, unless and until other powers, in no way concerned in the ships or their fortunes, but merely connected with one or both of those sovereigns in the general war, have likewise ratified and likewise abided by the convention, whether or no they have ships or harbours, and whether or no they make or suffer captures or are ever directly affected by maritime war at all?

It is very hard to credit that the operation of an agreement, so earnestly directed to the attainment of the highest practical ends in war, should have been deliberately made to depend on the accidents, or the procrastinations of diplomatic procedure in time of peace, even when no real relation existed between the condition and the consequence, between the ratification of all the parties and the detention of the ships of one of them. Their Lordships, however, have not found it necessary to give a final answer to these questions. Whether in the circumstances of these cases the convention was applicable or whether it might be successfully objected that it had never become applicable, the result is the same, for the objection is clearly one that can be waived, and in their Lordships' opinion it was waived by His Majesty's Government, alike by the whole tenor of the above-mentioned correspondence and by the whole attitude of the Crown in matters of prize affecting such cases as these throughout the war. De facto as well as de jure the position of Serbia and the other powers, as regards both the convention and the conduct of the war, was well known to His Majesty's Government at all material times. Yet days of grace were in fact allowed to Austrian ships by proclamation dated the 15th Aug. 1914, as to which see The Turul (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 423; 120 L. T. Rep. 393; (1919) A. C. 515). The Chile order was wholly inept if the convention had and could have no application, and the Crown should have applied to the court not for leave to requisition, but for decrees of condemnation. The fact that, in spite of the doubt expressed by Sir Samuel Evans, P. in The Mowe (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 17; 112 L. T. Rep. 261; (1915) P., at p. 12), the Crown acquiesced in numerous orders in that form and never asked for condemnation of these detained ships so long as hostilities lasted, is conclusive to show that any right to rely on the non-fulfilment of art. 6 was waived. The arguments of the Attorney-General on behalf of the Crown in the case of The Gutenfels, The Barenfels, The Derfflinger (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 346; 114 L. T. Rep. 953; (1916) 2 A. C. at p. 115, and His Majesty's Procurator in Egypt v. Deutsche Kohlen Depot Gesellschaft (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 384; 120 L. T. Rep. 102; (1919) A. C. 291) are of special importance in this connection.

In construing such an international instrument as that now in question, it is profitable to bear in mind from the outset sundry considerations, which are not the less important for being doubtless somewhat obvious. It results from deliberations among the representatives of many powers, in which none can expect without some concession to insist upon his country's interests, its language or its law. It is expressed in what is by tradition the common language of international intercourse, but it would be unreasonable in the circumstances to expect of it either nicety of scholarship or exactitude of literary idiom. Neither the municipal law nor the technical terms of the negotiating countries can be expected to find a place in its provisions. Where interests conflict, much must be allowed to the effects of compromise; where the principles, by which future action is to be guided, are laid down broadly, leaving to the Powers concerned the actual measures to be taken in execution of those principles, it is unreasonable to expect a greater precision than the circumstances admit of, or to reject as incomplete provisions, which are expressed without much detail and sometimes only in outline.

On the other hand, it is specially necessary to discover and to give effect to all the beneficent intentions, which such instruments embody and which their general tenor indicates. It is impossible to suppose, whatever the imperfections of their phrasing, that the framers of such instruments should have intended any Power to escape its obligations by a quibbling interpretation, by a merely pedantic adherence to particular words, or by emphasising the absence of express words, where the sense to be implied from the purport of the convention is reasonably plain. Least of all can it be supposed that His Majesty's Government could have become parties to such an instrument in any narrow sense, such as would reserve for them future loopholes of escape from its general scope.

Turning to arts. 1 and 2 of the sixth Hague Convention, it is important to remember that, before its date, and since its date whenever it is not in force, the law of nations permitted and entitled a belligerent to make prize of an enemy merchantman found within his ports at the outbreak of war (Lindo v. Rodney, 2 Doug. 612 n). It is true that in several instances during the nineteenth century belligerents mitigated the rigour of the rule and granted days of grace for the free departure of such vessels. The practice was certainly modern, but it was neither uniform nor universal, and on each occasion it rested with the belligerent to elect whether the rule recognised by the law of nations should be mitigated or not. It is not surprising that the negotiators of 1907 got no further than agreeing that permission to depart freely, within a time to be fixed by the Power entitled to capture, was a thing desirable indeed, but not obligatory.

Under these circumstances it is asked with much force: Why should Powers, who could not agree that days of grace should be given at all, find themselves able to concur in a more extensive modification of the law then existing and to agree that ships, unable to avail themselves of permission to depart, should not be made prize but should only be detained? The argument finds some support in the fact that the article dealing with days of grace precedes that limiting the right to such condemnation, and in the further fact that art. 2 certainly is closely allied with art. 1 and is so far dependent on it that, instead of stating the circumstances in which it applies, as a self-contained article might be expected to do, it finds their definition only in a reference to the first article and to those circumstances mentioned in it, which depend on the choice and the clemency of the capturing Power. Why, then, should Powers, which fail to agree to such a modification of belligerent right as is involved in the grant of days of grace, be deemed capable of the graver modification, which is involved in abandoning the right to capture and being content with a right to detain?

The true question, however, is not why they should have but whether they have done so, and it may be usefully met, if not completely answered, by asking another. The Powers, great and small, assembled at the Hague in 1907 in what was undoubtedly a great effort, involving mutual concessions and separate sacrifices, to regulate and to humanise the practices of maritime war. Is it consistent with their dignity or with the seriousness of the negotiations to read a part of their handiwork as meaning that a belligerent need not spare an enemy ship in his own port at all unless he chooses, but that if, from good nature or improvidence, he waives his right to bar her exit absolutely, he is to be bound by convention to do more than he chooses to do by express grace, and may then only detain, when otherwise he could seize? To say that the compact expressed in art. 2 has been providently entered into in case two belligerents should reciprocally grant days of grace under art. 1, but that until that event happens it is a mere foretaste of things to come, is to attenuate this convention to the very verge of annulling it. It is all the more unworthy of such an occasion to place so narrow a meaning on the article because the length and character of the opportunity for departing in peace rests entirely with the grantor of it. In itself a concession requiring immediate departure differs only notionally from a belligerent act inhibiting departure altogether. Is the modification of belligerent right to take place only in the one case and not in the other? And, if so, on what show of reason can it be founded or to what inveterate prejudice or ingrained self-interest has so illogical an arrangement been conceded?

Arts. 3 and 4, however, which are strictly in pari materia, seem to place the matter beyond doubt. Art. 3 contains no reference to arts. 1 and 2. It deals with a case to which days of grace and opportunities of departure have no application—that is, to ships that are found by their enemy at sea on the outbreak of war. The argument is unaffected by the fact, that as to this article Germany made reservations at the time when the convention was ratified, for the effect of the reservation is limited to the article with which it deals. A reservation as to a part of the convention is quite consistent with adoption of the rest of it. The article, clearly and independently of the others, requires that such ships, though by the law of nations good prize, may not be confiscated—that is, seized and brought before a court of prize for condemnation. They may only be detained—of course, under the order of such a court and upon conditions imposed by it. Further, when art. 4 comes to deal with cargo on board "vessels referred to in arts. 1 and 2," it prescribes the same measure of liability as that laid down in art. 3, and describes that prescription as being an identical principle. Their Lordships, therefore, think it clear that in effect this convention says: "Ships which find themselves at the outbreak of war in an enemy port shall in no case be condemned, if they are not allowed to leave or if they unavoidably overstay their days of grace, but it would be better that they should always be allowed to leave, with or without days of grace." In effect, while art. 1 is only optional, art. 2 is obligatory. They reject the construction, which makes the prohibition upon confiscation depend on a prior election to do what art. 1 desiderates but does not require.

Assuming that the sixth convention was binding on this country in the early stages of the war in such a sense as would prevent the condemnation of these vessels at the end of it, the Procurator-General further contends that during its progress Germany has by her conduct given this country the right to refuse to be bound any further by its terms so far as German ships are concerned. It appears that in 1915, though the fact did not become known to His Majesty's Government till afterwards, the German Foreign Office instructed the German diplomatic officials in Spain to inform the owners of these detained ships of the arrival of any of them in Spanish ports when navigating under requisition. The object of this instruction seems to have been to give the owners the opportunity of taking proceedings in Spanish courts, if so advised, for recovering possession of them in Spanish waters under judgments pronounced for the purpose. It does not appear whether any such proceedings were ever taken, or, if so, with what result. Furthermore, in correspondence with the Government of the King of Siam the German Foreign Office had advanced, as a ground for refusing to be bound by the eleventh Hague Convention, that it had never been ratified by all the then belligerent powers. Finally, it was contended that the many outrageous and indefensible measures adopted by Germany during the war, and especially her defiance of the Hague Conventions applicable, notably by the use of poisonous gas and of contact mines, by the destruction of hospital ships, the deportation and forced employment of civilians and the bombardment of open towns, amounted to an intimation that she intended to repudiate all obligations, and especially all conventional obligations, as to the conduct of war, and thus gave to Great Britain the right to treat herself as released from her correlative obligation under the sixth Hague Convention of 1907. There are two obvious flaws in this argument. First, so far as concerns the intentions of Germany she may have flagrantly disregarded obligations, which fettered her freedom of action to her disadvantage. It does not necessarily follow that she intended to repudiate a convention under which she stood to gain largely in the long run. There is, in fact, no evidence of any conduct on Germany's part down to the conclusion of the Armistice which put it out of her power to return detained ships in pursuance of art. 2. Secondly, so far as concerns the consequent rights of this country, even if the rules of English municipal law as to the discharge or dissolution of contracts be applicable to a case arising between sovereign powers, repudiation by Germany could do no more than give to this country the right to accept that repudiation and to treat the convention as no longer binding. There is no evidence whatever that this was ever done; indeed it is plain that His Majesty's Government continued, down to the conclusion of hostilities and even to the conclusion of peace, to treat this convention as binding. Most, if not all, of The Chile orders had been made by the end of 1916, since which date, as well as before it, most of the facts now relied upon were notorious, yet no step was taken to obtain a "further order" in any case, and it is to be observed that the reason for making provision for a "further order" was not doubt as to the declared intentions of Germany with regard to recognition of the convention, but uncertainty as to the continuance of that intention on her part. If so, in the language of the English cases, the contract was kept alive for the benefit of both parties, since one party cannot of his own choice put an end to it by disregarding its obligations, and so long as the contract subsists, each party can claim the fulfilment of the provisions which are in his favour, just as he remains bound to answer for his disregard of obligations which he ought to satisfy. Their Lordships, however, do not rest their conclusions on rules applicable to private contracts in English courts. The principle of ascertaining the intention of the parties to an agreement by giving due consideration to what they have said is no doubt valid in international matters, but there are many rules both as to the formation, the interpretation and the discharge of contracts, which cannot be transferred indiscriminately from municipal law to the law of nations. They prefer to rely on a wider ground. It is not the function of a Court of Prize, as such, to be a censor of the general conduct of a belligerent apart from his dealings in the particular matters which come before the court, or to sanction disregard of solemn obligations by one belligerent, because it reprehends the whole behaviour of the other. Reprisals afford a legitimate mode of challenging and restraining misconduct, to which, when confined within recognised limits and embodied in due form, a Court of Prize is bound to give effect. In a matter, however, which turns on the obligation of a single and severable compact, the court must inquire whether that very compact has been discharged, and ought not to be guided by considerations arising only out of the general conduct of war. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that neither in regard to the instructions given to the German Embassy in Madrid, which were after all a domestic matter and were at most a threat never communicated by Germany to His Majesty's Government; nor to the answer given to the Government of the King of Siam, which not only was res inter alios acta but related to a separate convention and proved nothing as to the German Government's intention to observe convention VI.; nor in regard to the general delinquencies of the German forces during the war, is it possible to find juridical grounds for releasing His Majesty's Government from their obligations under the sixth Hague Convention, when once they had attached. It has not even been shown that on the termination of the war Germany was not willing to return such British ships as she had detained, in so far as they had not been previously released under the Armistice or otherwise.

It would follow from the foregoing considerations that the owners of the vessels in question would be entitled to orders of release, but now arises the difficulty, that of these vessels only one survives, and that all matters occurring during the war are, as between German claimants and the Procurator-General, now to be considered in the light of the Treaty of Versailles.

Art. 2 of the sixth convention, after prescribing that the belligerent's right is limited to detention of the ship "under an obligation of restoring it after the war without compensation," proceeds: "or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation." What is this compensation, and when and in what events is it to be paid? The question is material, because during the period of requisitioning the Blonde was lost by perils of the sea, without fault on the part of any one responsible, and the Hercules cannot now be restored because the German combatant forces themselves destroyed her, purporting to do so as a legitimate act of war. The provision is that a detained vessel is simply to be restored without compensation. Nothing is said to impose on the belligerent any duty to provide for her safety or to effect repairs. If he restores her, he does so without compensation, and meantime she has been detained at her owners' risk. Next, the belligerent is given an express right to requisition, but on condition of paying compensation. Whether requisition has the same meaning in the convention that it has in Order XXIX., or whether, in addition to the right to use, it includes a right to appropriate, are questions not now material; for present purposes it is sufficient to assume that the meaning of the word in both instruments is the same. While on the one hand nothing is stipulated as to payment of freight or of compensation for the use of the ship while under requisition and nothing is expressed as to repairs, on the other hand, apart from circumstances, which discharge the requisitioning Government from all the obligations of the convention, the exercise of the right to requisition during detention involves that, if she is not restored at all, compensation takes her place, and for this purpose her money value, when requisitioned, is the obvious substitute for the ship herself in specie.

It is no doubt paradoxical that, the ship having been lawfully requisitioned by the Admiralty without any obligation to pay for using her or for the consequences of mere use, His Majesty's Government should be called on to compensate her German owners because the German forces have sunk her by an illegitimate act of war. The question, however, is one of construction of the article. It begins by substituting detention for confiscation, thus ensuring to the owner the right to get his ship back, so far as the detaining belligerent is concerned. On this is engrafted a proviso for the benefit of the belligerent, of which he may avail himself or not as he pleases, and this proviso imposes on him an unqualified condition—that of compensation. This must be read literally, and as nothing further is prescribed in favour of the detaining belligerent, he cannot have the benefit of exceptions by implication. The convention says that requisitioning is to be on condition of paying compensation: the condition would be frustrated, if, though the obligations of the convention had not been terminated, neither ship nor compensation were forthcoming.

The convention furthermore does not define the compensation, or the mode of calculating it, or the time of payment. These are matters which it leaves for subsequent determination, and it is reasonable to infer that at any rate the determination of the court of prize, before which the vessel in question has been duly brought, is within the purview of the convention. Accordingly, if the recognised procedure as to requisitioning has been followed, as was done in the present case, and if that procedure provides for the substitution of money for the ship, that money cannot be regarded as being other than the compensation to which the article applies. Under the Prize Rules and Orders the court can allow the ship, which is in the custody of its marshal, to be requisitioned by the Crown, and in the course of such requisitioning to be necessarily exposed to maritime and belligerent hazards. This involves the court's parting with the custody and with the immediate control. For the security of the owner the court may require the deposit or a binding undertaking for the deposit in court of the ship's appraised value, and although the court by no means parts with its control over the ship for all purposes, or precludes itself altogether from ordering her re-delivery, it treats the fund for all ordinary purposes as the subject on which subsequent decrees will operate. The advantage to the owner is obvious. This procedure substitutes for such a wasting asset as a ship, which in either event he cannot use, a money fund in court, which possesses a relative stability and suffers no wear and tear. Their Lordships' conclusion is that under the sixth convention the subjects to be restored are the Prosper, being a ship which is in specie, and the appraised values of the Blonde and Hercules, which were lost. No question as to freight was raised before their Lordships.

A further point may be briefly disposed of. It was that in all cases where a ship is requisitioned otherwise than "temporarily" under rule 6 of Order XXIX., the substitution of the appraised value for the ship is definitive, and no order can thereafter be made to take the ship herself out of the possession of the Admiralty. There is no authority for this. It is not supported by the special provision for a temporary, as distinguished from a general and indeterminate, requisitioning, which was only introduced by amendment into Order XXIX., some considerable time after the beginning of the war, nor does the provision that such requisitioning may be without appraisement, preclude the power of ordering appraisement, when on the destruction of the vessel it becomes necessary that a fund should be determined which will represent her. It is opposed to the nature of requisitioning, which is for the use of His Majesty (including, no doubt, consumption in the case of goods whose normal use consists in using them up), and would confound a thing requisitioned for use with a thing acquired for the purpose of sale. Furthermore, in cases where release in specie is the right of a claimant, the court might prove to have disabled itself from making the due decree, if a mere order for leave to requisition were to operate as a final abandonment to the Crown. Apart from the Treaty of Versailles, their Lordships conclude that the Prosper must, as a matter of form, be restored by the Admiralty to the custody of the marshal, in order that she may be released to the owners in specie.

The provisions of the Treaty of Versailles, which are invoked to the contrary, are twofold. There can be no doubt that Germany was competent on behalf of those nationals who were German subjects within the operation of the treaty, to make cessions which would bind them and effect a transfer of their rights of property, as if the cession had been made personally by the owner concerned. By art. 1 of annex III. of Part VIII. of the Treaty Germany ceded to the Allied and Associated Powers all vessels of 1600 tons gross and upwards, and a part of those under 1600 tons, and by par. 8 she further "waived all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments or their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any German ships," with an exception not now material. By art. 440 Germany further recognised as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning German ships and goods made by any Prize Court of any of the Allied and Associated Powers.

In their Lordships' opinion, while annex III. operates to transfer the property in all ships of 1600 tons gross and upwards, it makes no such transfer in the case of ships of less tonnage, at least until they have been selected for surrender as part of those, which under the treaty are to be handed over. It is not suggested that the vessels in question have been so selected, and accordingly in their case this provision of the treaty does not affect the owners' rights to restoration in specie. Had they been over 1600 tons the property and rights of the owners would have been transferred by the operation of the treaty, and they would have had no locus standi to appeal against any order dealing with them or with the money in court or to be brought into court after appraisement in substitution for them. Sect. 1 of the third annex to Part VIII., being a cession by the German Government, "so as to bind all other persons interested," not only binds the German shipowners as persons interested in appraised values brought into or to be brought into court, but also binds them in respect of their property in the ships, which, until duly divested by a decree having that effect, remains in them, even though it may be liable to be divested at any time; accordingly it would be an answer both in regard to detained ships still in specie, whether remaining in the custody of the court or under requisition, and to the funds, which represent them under the practice of the court.

Their Lordships further think that par. 8 does not affect the matter. It would be otherwise if the appraised value were regarded, not as a substitution for the requisitioned res, taking its place when lost, but as a payment in consideration of being allowed to requisition at all, for in that case there might be a claim, which par. 8 would bar. Their Lordships, however, reject this view. The owners of these detained ships have no claim against His Majesty's Government either for detaining or for using the vessels. Both were regular proceedings taken as of right under regular decrees, the validity of which Germany recognises by the Treaty of Peace. The loss of the vessels gave no claim, for the owners' rights arise not out of the loss, but out of the substitution of the appraised values of the ships, the release of which is the indemnity which the convention provides for. There is, therefore, in this case nothing to waive.

The Treaty of Versailles contains a further provision (art. 297), not specially applicable to shipping, by which the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property within their territories belonging to German nationals or companies controlled by them at the date of the coming into force of the treaty, the liquidation to be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied or Associated State concerned. It has been urged on the one hand and denied on the other, that an answer can be found to the claim of the Danziger Rederei Aktien Gesellschaft for the release of these vessels in the application of this article to the ships and funds in question. Beyond observing that the contentions raised on both sides deserve full and careful consideration by the appropriate tribunal, their Lordships do not feel called upon to express any opinion about them, for they are satisfied that the Prize Court is not such a tribunal. Nor do the terms of the Armistice affect the matter. It is enough to say that art. 30, which was cited, does not purport to touch the obligations of the Crown under the sixth Hague Convention, when duly determined by a Court of Prize whether before or after the conclusion of hostilities. It merely put it out of the power of Germany, when delivering the ships demanded, to insist on an anticipation of the actual end of the war by delivery of the detained German ships forthwith.

As soon as the conclusion has been arrived at that under the treaty obligations of 1907 this country is bound to restore the res, whether now existing in specie or only in the form of a substituted fund, the duty of the Prize Court prima facie is to give effect to that obligation and thereby to discharge itself and its officials from further custody of or control over it. The decision of course involves a duty to ascertain that the private party claiming is a party presently entitled, who has not, by his own act or by the public act of those who bind him, been divested of his rights of ownership or of possession. Where rights and claims arise out of the way in which the prize has been dealt with prior to the decree for its release and the execution of that decree, no doubt the Prize Court retains its jurisdiction over them, notwithstanding that the res no longer remains in its custody. Here, however, there is no such case. Whatever rights may have been reserved to His Majesty, as one of the Allied and Associated Powers, to liquidate these ships or their value, they have not, so far as their Lordships have been informed, been hitherto put in force. The right referred to is not the right, existing independently of and prior to the convention of 1907, to claim condemnation of these ships in prize in accordance with the law of nations, nor is the reservation of it equivalent to the discharge of the restrictions, which the sixth convention imposes. It is a right to liquidate in accordance with municipal law, that is to say a new right, which does not become effective unless and until it is exercised. If this were to be done hereafter, it would be a new act not arising out of dealings with the prize as prize, not modifying the rights of ownership as they now exist, and therefore it would be cognisable by some other tribunal. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the Treaty of Versailles, which neither names nor seems to consider the sixth Hague Convention, does not in this article modify or annul the obligations, which arise under it. So much they decide but no more: the rest is open and, apparently, in accordance with the terms of art. 297, is cognisable by the High Court of Justice. As this potential claim has been brought to their Lordships' attention they think that under any order of release the res should not be removed out of British territory for a reasonable time, lest otherwise the treaty right might be defeated; but they see no reason for delaying the grant of a decree for release, since no ground remains for continuing the responsibilities of the Prize Court or prolonging its possession. The right course will be to release the res physically to the Public Trustee as Custodian of Enemy Property, or to such other officer as may be discharging such duties, to be retained by him for a reasonable time free of expense to the claimants, say for six months, in order that the Crown may have the opportunity of commencing proceedings if so advised, and in that case further until the final determination of those proceedings, but in any other case to be thereafter forthwith delivered up to the claimants.

It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the appellants' claim to a special position as a company registered in and under the laws of the Free City of Danzig except as to one point. It was urged that a Court of Prize can condemn only as against an enemy subject. Conceding that the power is exercisable after the conclusion of peace, it was said only to apply to those whose allegiance or citizenship is the same as it was before that time, though peace has converted enmity into amity; hence as against the subjects of a newly constituted state, though formerly they were German, the right to condemn has ceased. The contention was not rested on any authority, nor was it explained why proceedings which were regular from the beginning should be frustrated as against the captors by a stipulation in the treaty, which does not deal with their rights but is directed to another and a very different object. Their Lordships think the contention groundless.

In the result the appeals succeed with costs; the decrees of condemnation should be set aside; the matter should be remitted to the Prize Court to make such orders as may be necessary for the appraisement of the Blonde and the Hercules, and to make a decree releasing those appraised values and the Prosper in specie to the Custodian of Enemy Property to be delivered up to the claimants, if after the lapse of six months no proceedings have been begun for an order for delivery up to the Crown, but otherwise to abide the final determination of such proceedings. There is also an appeal by leave from the president's refusal of a rehearing, as to which nothing need be said beyond formally dismissing it.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

The Rabenfels, the Werdenfels, the Lauterfels, the Aenne Rickmers, the Gutenfels, the Barenfels, the Prins Adalbert, the Kronprinsessin Cecilie.

In these cases their Lordships, at various dates in the earlier part of the war, made orders on appeal that the ships should be detained until further order. All were over 1600 tons.

The owners in the first, second, third, fifth, and sixth now petition that orders be made for the release of such as remain and for payment of of the appraised values of such as are lost, while the Crown petitions in all that orders condemning both may be made.

The relevant considerations have been fully dealt with in the case of the Blonde and other ships. In the case of ships of this size the Treaty of Versailles operates as a transfer of the former owners' rights, nor have they any locus standi before the board to discuss how the Allied and Associated Powers may deal with them inter se. The petitions for release should be dismissed with costs.

As their Lordships understand that His Majesty's Government have come to arrangements with the Allied and Associated Powers with regard to the shipping surrendered and transferred under the treaty, and that no question now arises as between them in relation thereto, they think that the proper course is to discharge the orders for detention previously advised by their Lordships; and to release the vessels to the Crown as the present owner.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE PELLWORM AND OTHER SHIPS. (a)

Prize Court—Enemy vessels—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Test of capture—Requisition of captured ships by Admiralty—Requisitioned ships sunk by enemy submarines—Appraised value—Restitution—Rights of neutral government—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XXIX.—Treaty of Versilles, Part VIII., annex III., arts. 1, 297, and 440.

Capture consists in compelling the vessel captured to conform to the captor's will. Hauling down the flag by an enemy merchant vessel, taken in conjunction with stopping the engines, is not an unequivocal act of submission.

Four German merchant ships were captured by British warships on the 16th July 1917, the chase beginning outside and ending inside Dutch territorial waters. The ships were on the 31st July 1917 requisitioned for the use of the Crown upon the usual undertaking to pay the appraised values into the Prize Court. Two of the ships while under requisition were sunk by German submarines. By the Treaty of Versailles, Germany recognises the validity of the orders of the Prize Court, and made certain cessions of German ships in the territories of the Allied Powers. The Dutch Government claimed the restoration of the ships to Dutch waters, or their appraised values, and compensation for the use of them.

Held, that the Dutch Government were entitled to have the two existing ships restored to Dutch waters, and to receive the appraised values of the two ships sunk, but not to compensation for the past use of them. The terms of the treaty, to which the Dutch Government was not a party, as regards the cession of German ships did not affect the rights of the Dutch Government in the British Prize Court.

CONSOLIDATED appeal and cross-appeals from two decrees of the Admiralty Division (in Prize), dated the 30th July 1919 and the 21st April 1920.

On the 16th July 1917 four German merchant ships, namely, the Pellworm, Breitzig, Marie Horn, and Heinz Blumberg were captured off the coast of Holland by British destroyers, and were brought to England for adjudication before the Prize Court. Writs for condemnation as prize were issued on the 25th July 1917. On the 31st July 1917 orders were made by Sir Samuel Evans, P., giving liberty to the Procurator-General to requisition the four ships for the use of His Majesty, and they were accordingly requisitioned. Undertakings were given by the Procurator-General for payment into court on behalf of the Crown of the amounts fixed by the court, and the values were subsequently appraised. Subsequently the Pellworm and the Marie Horn, while under requisition, were sunk by German submarines.

In Feb. 1918 claims were filed by the Dutch Government, alleging that the four ships had been captured within the territorial waters of Holland.

The action was tried by Lord Sterndale, P., who found that the ships, though outside territorial waters when called upon to stop, were within them when the captures were effected; and that there had been no intentional violation of Dutch territorial waters. He refused to condemn the ships, rejected the claim for costs and damages, and adjourned the matter for further consideration.

The Dutch Government on the 18th March 1920 delivered particulars of their claim, namely, (1) that the ships should be restored within the territorial waters of Holland in the like condition as at the time of capture, or alternatively with compensation for any loss or depreciation; (2) compensation for the user of the ships under the requisition order; (3) if any of the ships had been lost during their use by His Majesty, or otherwise, they claimed the insurance effected thereon; or (if not fully insured) a sum representing its full value at the date of the loss.

The Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany signed at Versailles on the 28th June 1919 was ratified after the hearing before Lord Sterndale, P. It contained the following provisions material to this report. By part VIII., annex III., art. 1, Germany ceded to the Allied and Associated Powers the property in all German-owned merchant ships of 1600 tons gross and upwards, and an unascertained moiety of certain ships of less tonnage. By art. 297 the Allied and Associated Powers reserved the right to retain and liquidate all property and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the treaty to German nationals. By art. 440, Germany recognised the validity of decrees and orders made by the Prize Court.

Of the four ships the Heinz Blumberg only was of over 1600 tons gross.

Duke, P. held (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 102; 123 L. T. Rep. 686; (1920) P. 347) that the capture had created no proprietary right in the Dutch Government, and that the claim was a claim for the use of the enemy owner; that the requisition by the Crown was effectual to vest the property in the vessels in the Crown; that the claim was therefore for restitution in value by the payment of sums of money, being the appraised amounts, to a neutral sovereign for the use of German owners; that such sums were within art. 297 of the treaty and must be retained to be dealt with pursuant thereto; and that the claim of the Dutch Government must be dismissed.

The Procurator-General and the Dutch Government both appealed.

Dunlop, K.C. (Sir Ernest Pollock, K.C., S.-G. and Aspinall, K.C. with him) for the Procurator-General.—The ships were captured outside the Dutch territorial waters. Being at the mercy of the destroyers, they hauled down their flags and stopped their engines outside the limit, and that constituted a surrender. Having surrendered outside, it is immaterial that the ships afterwards drifted inside the limit, where possession was taken. They referred to:

The Vrow Anna Catharina, 1803, 5 C. Rob. 15;
The Anna, 1805, 5 C. Rob. 373;

(a) Reported by W. C. SANDFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Rebeckah, 1799, 1 C. Rob. 233;
The Esperanza, 1822, 1 Hag. Adm. 91.

R. A. Wright, K.C., Bisschop, and A. T. Bucknill, for the Dutch Government.—The hauling down of the flags is quite consistent with a continuing intention to escape, and was part of their method of attempting an escape. In any case possession was taken by the British inside Dutch waters, which was a violation of Dutch rights:

The Adela, 1867, 6 Wall, 266.

Secondly, the Dutch Government are entitled to have the two existing ships restored to Dutch waters, free of expense, and to the appraised value of the two ships sunk:

The Dusseldorf, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 84; 123 L. T. Rep. 732; (1920) A. C. 1034.

The requisition order did not transfer the property in the ships to the Crown. The rights of the Dutch Government are not affected by the Treaty of Versailles, to which they were not a party. Their rights having been violated they are entitled to a restitutio in integrum.

Sir Ernest Pollock (S.-G.) on the cross-appeals.—The Dutch Government are not entitled to compensation for the use of the ships: (The Dusseldorf, sup.) and as the violation of neutrality was unintentional, they are not entitled to costs or damages. They are entitled only to a decree that the capture was made in their waters, assuming that is the fact, but to nothing further. They have no property in the ships, and are not entitled to their appraised value:

The Valeria, 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 218; 122 L. T. Rep. 751; (1920) P. 81.

Under the Treaty of Versailles the ships were ceded to Great Britain, and that being so, there is no reason for handing them over to the Dutch Government, to be restored to Germany. Two of the ships have been lost by enemy action, and it is impossible to restore them, and the Dutch Government is not entitled to their appraised value. If there is no obligation to restore the res, there is no obligation to pay the appraised value; and if the appraised value represents the res, the loss of the res by sinking is an answer to the claim for the appraised value thereof.

Wright, K.C. replied on the cross-appeals.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—These are consolidated cross-appeals from decisions of Lord Sterndale and of Sir Henry Duke. In the Prize Court (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 101; 123 L. T. Rep. 685; (1920) P. 347), when the Procurator-General claimed the condemnation as good prize of four German steamers, the Pellworm, Marie Horn, Breitzig, amd Heinz Blumberg, seized on the 16th July 1917, Lord Sterndale found that they had been captured in Dutch territorial waters and refused condemnation, but at the same time he dismissed the claim for damages put forward by the Dutch Government and adjourned further consideration. This was in 1919. When the matter came on again, Sir Henry Duke dismissed the claim for delivery up of the ships or their appraised values, ordered that the latter be retained in court to be dealt with pursuant to the Treaty of Versailles, and directed that consideration of the claims to the cargoes should be reserved for further inquiry. Accordingly their Lordships are not concerned with the cargo claims and do not deal with them. The Procurator-General has appealed against the decision that the captures were made within the territorial waters of Holland and against the refusal to condemn the ships, and there is a cross appeal by the Dutch Government against the refusal to order their delivery or payment of their appraised values with damages and expenses.

The facts were that a flotilla of British destroyers was proceeding along the Dutch coast at no great distance outside the three-mile limit, on the look-out for a number of German vessels, which were also shaping their course as near as they could to that limit, obviously for the purpose of effecting a quick escape into neutral waters in case a British patrol should heave in sight. The destroyers did heave in sight, and closed. The German ships made for Dutch waters, but eventually were signalled to stop their engines and change course to the westward at a moment when they were within too short a range to make it safe to disobey. They hauled down their flags and stopped or appeared to stop their engines, but did not alter course to the westward. The wind and tide were then from the north-west, though of no great strength, and the steamers continued to keep their way and, aided by wind and tide, drew nearer to the shore. The destroyers then sent in their boats. Some of the German steamers were abandoned by their crews. When boarded, as they all eventually were, they had travelled a considerable distance towards the coast of Holland, but no resistance was made, and the prize crews took them out to sea and brought them into an English port.

The questions of fact arising in connection with this story are these: (1) Were any of the German steamers within the three-mile limit (a) when ordered to stop their engines; (b) when they hauled down their flags and purported to stop their engines; (c) when they were abandoned by their crews; (d) when they were boarded and taken possession of by the prize crews? (2) If any belligerent act was committed by the British forces within the territorial waters of Holland, was it done intentionally or in the belief that both the British and the German ships were still outside the territorial limit?

The learned President, Lord Sterndale, answered the first of these questions in the following words:—"The conclusion to which I come on the evidence is that the German vessels were outside the territorial limit when sighted and signalled to stop, and were close upon it, if not within it, when they stopped, but were well within it when a boarding party was put on board and possession actually taken of them."

After carefully examining the evidence with the assistance of counsel, their Lordships have arrived at the same conclusions. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the particular facts deposed to, or to discuss them in detail, but their Lordships may observe generally, (1) that the German ships, when boarded, were far enough inshore to make it impossible that they should have been first brought to at any considerable distance from the territorial limit; (2) that the wind and tide and the way the ships were carrying were hardly sufficient in themselves to account for the distance, which they eventually covered towards the land, but their Lordships are not to be taken to assert (whatever they may suspect) that, after the order to stop, the engines were kept running, though with calculated unobtrusiveness; and (3) that, whatever may be the effect of it in law, the German steamers in fact disregarded the signal to alter their heading, in order to profit by the forces, natural or artificial, which were seen to be carrying them towards the land. No doubt the contingency of meeting English men-of-war had been carefully considered, for the German vessels, which were all following one another en échelon, all promptly acted in the same way and with the same results. It is true that in his evidence one of His Majesty's officers surmised that the signal to alter course to the westward was not readily understood, but no German captain says so, and their Lordships think that the surmise does less than justice to the vigilance and intelligence of the enemy.

The claimants' proof that possession was finally taken well within the territorial waters of Holland makes it incumbent on the captors to establish affirmatively, at least that capture was legally complete while both the captors and the captured were still outside of them. Whether or not, in these or any circumstances, a prize, duly captured outside the three-mile limit, but carried intentionally or by accident or inadvertence across the line before she can be boarded, may nevertheless be legitimately followed up and reduced into possession within the line is a question which need not now be decided. There are observations on the subject by Sir William Scott in The Anna (1805, 5 C. Rob., at p. 385 385 d, e), when discussing the dictum of Bynkershoek in his Quæstiones Juris Publici, p. 66; but, besides being unnecessary to the decision in that case, they do not apply to such a case as the present, where the neighbouring shore was inhabited and the actual field of operations was under observation by Dutch officials, stationed there for the very purpose. Such a case bears no analogy, at any rate, to salving a prize, which, after being duly captured, has broken adrift or has otherwise by marine perils come involuntarily within the three-mile limit, a contention advanced by the Procurator-General's counsel. Boarding the prizes within Dutch waters was a belligerent act in any view, and thereafter and in consequence of the boarding, the German ships were taken as captured prizes out of those waters to British ports. It was contended that this action could be justified, if what had already been done on the high seas did not amount to capture; but the case for the Crown was that a complete deditio had taken place outside the territorial limit.

When completed captures are made on the high seas, it can rarely matter by what steps they become complete or in what the conclusive indicia of capture consist. The question, however, becomes material when a series of naval movements take place in such a position that the invisible limit of territorial waters intersects them, for this at once creates the necessity for a logical analysis of them, in order to determine whether or not territorial rights have been violated. Singularly enough, the reported cases on claims of territory throw little or no light on this question. The Scottish Prize Cases, some of very early date, which are reported in Morison, generally turn on circumstances so special as to be of little assistance in solving modern problems. There is one case of a claim of territory by the King of Denmark, viz., Hunter v. De Bothmer (1764, Mor. Dict. 11,957), but there the whole capture was deliberately made within the waters of Norway. The cases before Sir William Scott are of limited application in any case, and do not touch this particular point, nor is it determined by any of the decisions of their Lordships' board in the recent war. In the unreported case of The Loekken (J. C. July 26, 1918) which alone approximates to the present case, it was shown upon the facts that, when in response to a signal to stop and another threatening to fire, if she did not stop, the Loekken stopped and reversed, both she and the captor were outside territorial waters, and she was thus captured on the high seas. It was further shown that, when the captors commenced to head her off from escaping into territorial waters, as she tried to do, they were themselves on the high seas, and if the two vessels afterwards drifted accidentally over the line, which was at best doubtful on the facts, this happened at a considerable interval after the completion of the capture.

In principle it would seem that capture consists in compelling the vessel captured to conform to the captor's will. When that is done deditio is complete, even though there may be on the part of the prize an intention to seize an opportunity of escape, should it present itself. Submission must be judged by action or by abstention from action; it cannot depend on mere intention, though proof of actual intention to evade capture may be evidence that acts in themselves presenting an appearance of submission were ambiguous and did not result in a completed capture. The conduct necessary to establish the fact of capture may take many forms. No particular formality is necessary (The Esperanza, 1822, 1 Hagg. at p. 91). A ship may be truly captured, though she is neither fired on nor boarded (The Edward and Mary, 1801, 3 C. Rob., 305), if, for example, she is constrained to lead the way for the capturing vessel under orders, or to follow her lead, or directs her course to a port or other destination, as commanded. If she has to be boarded, she is at any rate taken as prize when resistance has completely ceased. It was contended before their Lordships by counsel for the Crown that hauling down the flag was conclusive in the present case, or at least was conclusive when taken in conjunction with stopping the engines as ordered. It was said to be an unequivocal act of submission, as eloquent as the words "I surrender" could have been, an act which could not be qualified by any intention that did not find expression in action. This is to press The Rebeckah (1799, 1 C. Rob., 227) beyond what it will bear, for there the facts showed that after the act of formal submission by striking colours, there was no discontinuance of that submission either effectively or at all, whereas Sir William Scott intimates that, if any attempt had been made to defeat the surrender, he would not have treated the deditio as complete till possession was actually taken. It is true that by tradition, when ships are engaged in combat, striking the colours is an accepted sign of surrender, but to do so without also ceasing resistance is to invite and to justify further severe measures by the victorious combatant. In the case of a merchantman, where the traditions of commissioned men-of-war are not of equal application, the hauling down of the flag, like any other sign or act of submission, is to be tested by inquiring whether the prize has submitted to the captor's will. What a combatant seeks to intimate by acts signifying surrender is, first and foremost, that he ceases to fight and submits to be taken prisoner; what a merchantman intimates is, that she means to do as she is told, and that the chattel property may be captured in prize though the seamen in charge of it are not made prisoners or placed under personal restraint. In the present case, according to evidence given for the Crown, the hauling down of their flags by the German steamers was accompanied by a change of course towards the land, and, as it preceded any British signal by flag or cannon shot, it was in the circumstances anything but a clear intimation of submission. On the contrary, it is obvious that the German ships continued to move towards and shortly crossed the three-mile limit, and that this was neither inadvertent nor was incapable of being prevented. They had not abandoned the intention to escape, nor had they arrested their movement towards the region of safety. They submitted just so far as to minimise the risk of being fired on; they disobeyed orders just so far as to ensure that the ships would of themselves glide or be carried over the line. They were already heading towards the territorial waters, and desired to obtain whatever advantage might be derivable from getting within them. This was why they did not obey the order to alter course to the westward. It is not shown that they could not have done so. Under these circumstances their Lordships see no reason to differ from Lord Sterndale's conclusion, that the vessels were not captured till they had entered Dutch waters, for up to that time they were endeavouring to escape and were resisting or evading submission to the captors' will.

Nor can they differ from his conclusion that the conduct of His Majesty's officers was neither reckless nor careless, and that their violation of Dutch neutrality was inadvertent, since they believed in all good faith that both captors and prizes, throughout and until capture was complete, remained outside the three-mile limit. He saw these officers and judged of their demeanour, and their evidence is quite consistent with his conclusion. It may well be that they were keen in pursuit and determined to make a capture, if it could legitimately be made, but their minds were alive to the question of the rights of Holland, and they are not shown to have allowed meritorious zeal to degenerate into determination to snatch success at all costs. Even if it be taken, that when the German vessels were actually boarded they, or some of them, were obviously within Dutch waters and should have been known to be so by the captors, their Lordships do not think that this alone is a ground for reversing Lord Sterndale's decision apart from the other features of the case, nor indeed were they really pressed by counsel to do so. They are not to be taken to mean that ignorance of the law would excuse improper action, where the facts were or ought to have been known, but it is one thing to say that capture, effected within Dutch waters, by boarding or otherwise, involves the restoration of the prize, and quite another to say, that to board within the territorial limits a prize honestly believed to have been captured outside them must necessarily justify a claim for damage by the neutral sovereign concerned. It is not shown that the act of shelling other ships, which went ashore in another part of the area of operations, was connected with the capture of the vessels in question, in any way that ought reasonably to affect the matter. The further contention that a promise to pay costs and expenses can be inferred from a suggestion made in the course of diplomatic correspondence, that the whole matter was one for the Prize Court, is really not worth examination. When, therefore, the case again came up to be dealt with by Sir Henry Duke on Lord Sterndale's findings, it followed that there could be no award of damages in favour of the Dutch Government, but primâ facie they were entitled to restoration of the ships, which had been wrongly captured within their territorial waters.

Here arise two classes of difficulty. After being brought before the Prize Court, all four ships were duly requisitioned for the use of His Majesty by Order, dated the 31st July 1917, but made before the Dutch Government had entered an appearance. As to the claim for profits and usufruct, it was not nor could it have been seriously contended, that they were entitled to the profits of or to payment for the use of the ships, but while requisitioned two of them—the Pellworm and the Marie Horn—were torpedoed and sunk by enemy action, and subsequently, under the Treaty of Versailles, Germany ceded to the Allied and Associated Powers all German ships of over 1600 tons gross, and undertook to cede an unascertained moiety of certain ships under 1600 tons. It was accordingly urged before Sir Henry Duke and again before their Lordships that, as the Heinz Blumberg at any rate is over 1600 tons gross, and both she and the Breitzig are ships in the hands of His Majesty's Government under an order of the Prize Court, which by art. 440 Germany undertakes to recognise as valid, the Treaty operated as if there had been a private cession of the property in the two vessels by the German owners to new proprietors; that under the Treaty the seizing Power had thus acquired an independent title, arising out of matters subsequent and not grounded in any wrongful act or involving the retention of any profit due to that wrong; that the former owners, having now no interest, could have no cause of complaint against the Dutch Government, and that the Dutch Government being immune from claims had neither occasion nor right to demand redelivery of the vessels. It was urged, on the other hand, on behalf of the Dutch Government, that not only were they entitled to redelivery of the ships which survive, but of the appraised values of those which have been lost; and that being strangers to the Treaty of Versailles, they were entitled to treat it as irrelevant and res inter alios acta.

Their Lordships have already stated in The Dusseldorf (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 84; 123 L. T. Rep. 732; (1920) A. C. 1034) and The Valeria (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 218; 124 L. T. Rep. 806; (1921) 1 A. C. 477), and need not now repeat, what is the general position of a sovereign claimant, whose territorial waters have been violated by a belligerent force. In their opinion it follows from that position that changes in the ownership of the vessel, which is the subject of the proceedings in prize, cannot defeat the claim of territory, which is independent of ownership, but that, on the other hand, where there has been no intentional misconduct or affront on the part of the captors, and the loss of the vessel in question, without default on the part of those in control of her, has made her return in specie impossible, the payment of damages to the claimant is a wholly inappropriate remedy. A separate and much more difficult question, however, arises where prizes have been requisitioned on the terms of bringing, or of undertaking to bring, the appraised values into court. It is this: Ought a claim to those appraised values, advanced on behalf of the neutral sovereign, to be treated as a claim for a solatium in money or as a claim for the res itself, in the only form in which it can now be returned ?

In the first aspect the following arguments arise. Where, under orders regularly and lawfully made, money has been substituted for the res, which has been brought into prize, the substitution is ordered not only to secure the captors, but also for the benefit of such claimants as have a right of property in the res, and whose interest in it is therefore an interest in its value. A claim to the appraised value is a proprietary claim ; a claim by a sovereign in virtue of his violated rights is the antithesis of a proprietary claim, and finds its sole satisfaction in the return of the res to enable him to assert his rights as a sovereign and to discharge his duties as a neutral. The affronted Power had no property in or possession of the ship seized, and cannot assert a claim merely on behalf of or for the benefit of those who have the ownership or are entitled to the possession. The remedy for taking away the prize from neutral waters, without justification or permission, is the restoration of that which was seized to the waters, whence it was taken, as honourable amends for a belligerent act, which, when once it has been established, a friendly Power cannot seek to profit by or to defend. An offer of money, so far from constituting amends, would rather aggravate the affront ; a claim of money, in the absence of misconduct on the part of the captors, could only be a claim in the interest of private owners, which the aggrieved sovereign is not entitled to make. Money was not taken, therefore money has not to be returned. The State, whose officers have captured the prize in neutral waters, cannot retain it consistently with the satisfaction of its obligation to make amends ; but the State whose waters have been invaded cannot ask, nor can a Court of Prize grant, the imposition of a money penalty, where no international wrong was done, or decree the payment of money as the price of an invasion of sovereignty. In their Lordships' opinion these considerations, which are generally valid, fail to apply in the present case for the following reason. The ships were requisitioned by the Admiralty for the use of His Majesty, but ex hypothesi the requisition operated on something, which never should have been brought into the custody of the Prize Court at all. Had it not been for the requisitioning they would have been restored by decree of the court. It is true that there is no claim for compensation in respect of the loss, as such, but the requisitioning was ordered at the instance of the Crown and the court parted with the custody of them in accordance with the regular practice. Thereafter the ships were represented for all ordinary purposes by their appraised values. If a requisitioned ship is condemned, the undertaking to bring her appraised value into court fails, since the Crown is not bound to pay for her ; if she is not condemned, the money is brought into court and paid to the party entitled to a release of the ship. If the court were to refuse to release the appraised values in this case when it would have released the ships if they had remained in the Marshal's custody, the result would be that the Dutch Government's right to restoration would be defeated merely as a consequence of the British Government's exercise of the right to requisition, and the British Government's obligation to bring the appraised values into court would cease to be performable. As it is, though the ships are lost there is something to restore, viz., the money which represents them. In their Lordships' opinion this consideration must prevail. It is not a sufficient objection to say that the Dutch Government have no proprietary interest in money, or that they would recover money only as trustees for or for the benefit of ex-enemy owners. Trustees in strictness they are not, but, even if they were, this would in their Lordships' opinion be less incongruous with principle and more consistent with international amity than that the same law, which requires the return of a prize wrongly captured, should justify the retention of the sum, which is to be deemed to be in court as representing it. If the prospect of the return of the restored ships to their ex-enemy owners does not prevent their restoration to the neutral Government, no different result should follow from the prospect that the money, when restored, will be handed over likewise. It follows that His Majesty's Government ought to return to the waters of Holland the vessels which survive, let the present rights of property or possession be what they may ; and ought to do so free of expense to the Government of the Queen of the Netherlands, and that the like obligation to return applies to the appraised values, which otherwise would be a profit growing out of their own wrong.

Accordingly, in this appeal, their Lordships refrain from expressing any opinion as to the effect of the Treaty of Versailles on the ownership of the Breitzig and the Heinz Blumberg, or the title to the sums representing the appraised values of the Pellworm and of the Marie Horn.

It is true that the general practice has been to use the same form of order, viz., " decreed the same to be restored to the said claimant for the use of the owners and proprietors thereof," both in cases of claims of territory and in cases of claims made by and on behalf of private owners, but this has not been followed without exception ; for the order made in the case of The Dusseldorf was for release to solicitors, acting " on behalf of the said claimant," viz., the Norwegian Consul-General as representing his Government, and the owners were not mentioned. In either case, however, there is no precedent for an order seeking to fetter the possession of the State, whose claim has been successfully asserted, or to derogate from the full measure of the amends, which the Court of Prize has decided to be due. There appears to be no such settled practice as would affect the principle of the matter. On the other hand, it is necessary to correct the decree actually made by Lord Sterndale to this extent. The questions arising on the effect of the Treaty of Versailles had not at that time been mooted, and accordingly the decree, as drawn up declared in ordinary form, that the ships captured belonged to the enemies of the Crown. Now that these questions have arisen, their Lordships think that, to prevent any appearance of prejudging them, the words " at the time of capture " should be inserted after the word " belonged." If the right of His Majesty's Government to the property in and possession of those ships or sums by virtue of the Treaty of Versailles or otherwise is plain, their Lordships cannot doubt that the Government of the Netherlands will promptly recognise the right of a friendly sovereign and direct their return to this country. If it is susceptible of doubt, they make no question of the competence and freedom of the Courts of Holland to decide it in proceedings properly commenced for that purpose, or of the willingness of the Dutch Government to abide by their decision, and, pending that decision, merely to retain possession of the ships and sums on behalf of whom it may ultimately prove to concern. It would be little consonant with the principle of honourable amends between friendly Powers, which is the foundation of claims of territory, to clog it with any distrust of the justice and regularity of the proceedings of the successful sovereign. They find nothing in the Treaty, or in the Statute and Order in Council framed to make it executory, to interfere with this view of the matter.

It has, however, been contended that there is something in the practice of Courts of Prize in this country with regard to requisitioning for the use of His Majesty of ships that are in the custody of the court pending their adjudication in prize, which is at variance with the principles above stated. Their Lordships think that the contention is fallacious. When a ship is placed in the custody of the Prize Court with a view to adjudication in prize, then and there it is either liable to condemnation or is not. Time is necessary in order that the evidence may be got together on both sides and may be considered in due course by the court; but if all the evidence were immediately forthcoming and the claimant had a proper opportunity of being fully heard, he would have no grievance if the adjudication were to take place forthwith. Furthermore, pending adjudication he has no benefit from the use of the ship, and she remains at his risk in the marshal's custody. Accordingly, under orders and rules validly made, a practice has been established, which is beneficial alike to the captors, to the court, and to the claimant. This is no mere matter of municipal law, which does not bind a foreign Government except in virtue of some submission to the jurisdiction; it is part of the practice of a court which administers the law of nations, none the less so that it is regulated by orders which are made in virtue of statutory authority. The ship, if requisitioned for the use of His Majesty, may be released to the Admiralty for an indefinite period, on the terms of substituting for the ship in the marshal's custody her appraised value, paid or payable into court, or for a short and definite period without any terms requiring appraisement. In the former case, at any rate, which is the case in question, the claimant is thus protected from depreciation and marine risks, and the court is relieved from the responsibility of her custody. If ultimately a decree is made in his favour, the claimant could desire nothing better than payment of the appraised value; if a decree for condemnation is made, all necessary effects are secured by the release of the Admiralty from the obligation to pay the value into court, and by the change of property as against all the world by a judgment in rem. An order for requisition in itself, however, is not a judgment in rem; it does not purport to change property; it authorises use and using up—that is, consumption—but it does not make the thing requisitioned a subject of sale. The orders and rules make separate provision for orders for sale, and their Lordships must not be taken to agree with the statement of Sir H. Duke, P. in the court below that an order for leave to requisition, though followed by delivery, in itself changes the property. In cases where the law of nations requires the return of a ship in specie, the court has no authority to defeat its duty in advance, and an order merely as to the use of the ship does not purport to do so; as Sir William Scott says in the Vrouw Anna Katerina (5 C. Rob., 1803, at p. 16), "the court is at all times very much disposed to pay attention to claims of this species, . . . when the fact is established it overrules every other consideration; the capture is done away; the property must be restored, notwithstanding that it may actually belong to the enemy." In fact the order made provides only for release and delivery to the Crown or for temporary delivery, as the case may be. Furthermore, the court's own rules condition the requisitioning of ships liable to condemnation quite differently from art. 2 of the sixth Hague Convention of 1907, which gives a contractual right to requisition detained ships subject to an express condition of paying compensation. They impose no liability to answer for accidental loss, but are fully satisfied by the deposit of the appraised values. Their Lordships can find nothing, either in the decisions or in the words of the orders and rules, to warrant the contention that for the purposes of a claim of territory, the appraised value of a ship, when once it has been requisitioned, must be treated in all circumstances as if it were the ship herself, lost or not lost; nor can they find anything to restrict the right of the Prize Court to require the return to its marshal, of a requisitioned ship, which is still in specie, in order that it may decree its release to the claimant Government. The order, giving leave to requisition, which the court itself made it is also competent in such a case to revoke. The Dusseldorf (sup.), for which an order of release was made, had herself been requisitioned, and this was not raised as an objection to her release. In the present case the importance of this point has been somewhat removed by the undertaking, given by the Solicitor-General, that, if their Lordships should be of opinion that the ships should be restored, the Admiralty would give them up accordingly.

It may be that if, by arrangement or otherwise, the two ships are returned to Dutch waters by the British Government, no expenditure in the matter will fall on the Government of the Queen of the Netherlands. If so, part of the order which their Lordships think is the right one will become inoperative. The case of such expenditure being incurred ought, however, to be provided for.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that, subject to the above-mentioned addition to the decree of Lord Sterndale, the appeal of the Procurator-General should be dismissed with costs, and that the cross-appeal, so far as concerns damages should also be dismissed with costs; but that it should be allowed with costs and the order of Sir H. Duke, which is appealed against, should be set aside, so far as concerns the restoration of the Breitzig and Heinz Blumberg and the payment over by way of restoration of the appraised values of the Pellworm and the Marie Horn; that a decree should be entered for the claimants accordingly, and for payment of the expenses, if any, falling upon the claimants in connection with the return to Dutch territorial waters of the Breitzig and the Heinz Blumberg, and that the cause should be remitted to the Prize Court to make any order required for an inquiry into the fact and the amount of such expenses and for payment of them to the Dutch Government and also for the discharge of any undertaking given by the Admiralty in respect of the appraised value of the ships restored in specie.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, Jan. 17, 1922.

(Before Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.)

The Mogileff (No. 2). (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Practice—Interpleader—Summons issued to the Crown—Power to make the Crown a claimant in interpleader proceedings—Register of shipping—"Government ships"—Registered owner—"His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller"—Evidence of ownership—Interpleader Act 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 58)—Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 36), s. 25 (11)—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 ((57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 1, 11, 64, 695, 741—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 80—Order in Council, the 29*th Sept,* 1917.

The Crown cannot be summoned to appear upon an interpleader summons or made a party to an interpleader issue.

Under a writ of fi. fa. the sheriff seized in satisfaction of a judgment debt two vessels owned by a foreign corporation. The Crown then intimated that the vessels had been requisitioned and were the property of the Crown. The register showed that the registered owner of the vessels was : "His Majesty, represented by the Shipping Controller, London, sixty-four shares." There was no evidence that the ships were in the active service of the Crown, and they were in fact laid up. The judgment creditors disputed that the vessels were the property of the Crown, and the sheriff accordingly took out an interpleader summons calling upon the judgment creditors and the Crown to appear and state their claims.

Hill, J. held that the vessels had been registered under sect. 80 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, and the Order in Council of the 29*th Sept.* 1917 made thereunder. They were not ships to which sect. 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 applied, and therefore sect. 695 of that Act was applicable to them. By sect. 695 the entry in the register was evidence of the facts stated therein. In this case the facts so stated indicated no more ownership in the Crown than was described by sect. 80 (3) of the Act of 1906, which might amount to no more than a holding "by the Shipping Controller on behalf of or for the benefit of the Crown." Having regard to the fact that foreign owned ships and ships detained by the Prize Court under the Chile form of order were registered under sect. 80 of the Act of 1906 no certain inference could be drawn from the register as to the Crown's ownership whether legal or otherwise.

On the objection that the Crown cannot be summoned to answer an interpleader, Hill, J. held that as the Crown did not consent to submit to the jurisdiction of the court the court had no power to order the Crown to do so. Interpleader proceedings, though they may not amount to maintaining an action against the Crown, come within the wider principle that the King cannot against his will be made to submit to the jurisdiction of the King's courts. Sect. 25 (11) of the Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66) does not make the old equity rule prevail, or apply to alter the rights of the Crown.

The passage of Blackstone at vol. 1, chap. 7, par. 1 (quoted and approved by Brett, L.J. in The Parlement-Belge, 42 L. T. Rep. 273 ; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234, 5 Prob. Div. 197) applied and followed.

The Court of Appeal upheld the decision of Mr. Justice Hill.

Interpleader.

This was an appeal from an order of the assistant registrar dismissing an interpleader summons taken out by the sheriff of Lincolnshire and directed to the Borneo Company who were plaintiffs in an action against the owners of the steamship Mogileff, the Russian Volunteer Fleet, seeking to levy execution of their judgment debt, and to His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller.

The Mogileff had been sold by the Marshal in satisfaction of the judgment obtained against her in rem by the Borneo Company, but the proceeds failed to satisfy the judgment debt. The Borneo Company accordingly proceeded to levy execution in respect of the balance of the amount for which they had obtained judgment, and under a writ of fi. fa. the steamships Krasnoiarsk and Vologda, said to belong to the Russian Volunteer Fleet, were seized on behalf of the plaintiffs by the sheriff of Lincolnshire.

The Crown then gave notice that the Krasnoiarsk and the Vologda were the property of His Majesty. An interpleader summons was thereupon taken out by the sheriff directed to the Borneo Company, and the Crown calling on them to appear and state their claims. The assistant registrar dismissed this summons, ordering the sheriff to remain in possession pending the hearing of an appeal or to withdraw if no notice of appeal was given. The Borneo Company appealed.

At the trial it was stated that a petition of right had been presented by the Russian Volunteer Fleet asking for a declaration that the Krasnoiarsk and the Vologda were their property.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) provides :

Sect. 11. . . . The registrar shall enter in the register book the following particulars respecting the ship : . . . . (d) the name and description of her registered owner or owners, and if there are more owners than one the proportions in which they are interested in her.

Sect. 64. . . . . (2) The following documents shall be admissible in evidence in the manner provided by this Act, namely, (a) Any register book under any part of this Act. . . . (b) A certificate of registry under this Act. . . .

Sect. 695. (1) Where a document is by this Act declared to be admissible in evidence, such document shall, on its production from proper custody, be admissible in evidence in any court or before any person having by law or consent of parties authority to receive evidence, and, subject to all just exceptions, shall be evidence of the matters stated therein in pursuance of this Act. . . .

Sect. 741. This Act shall not, except when specially provided, apply to ships belonging to Her Majesty.

(a) Reported by W. C. Sandford and Geoffrey Hutchinson, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48) provides:

Sect. 80. (1) His Majesty may by Order in Council make regulations with respect to the manner in which Government ships may be registered as British ships for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and these Acts, subject to any exceptions or modifications which may be made by Order in Council, either generally or as respects any special class of Government ships, shall apply to Government ships registered in accordance with these regulations as if they were registered in the manner provided by these Acts. . . . (3) In this section the expression "Government ships" means ships not forming part of His Majesty's Navy which belong to His Majesty or are held by any person on behalf of or for the benefit of the Crown, and for that reason cannot be registered under the principal Act.

The Order in Council of the 29th Sept. 1917 provides (inter alia):

1. An application for registry of a Government ship in the service of the Shipping Controller shall be made in writing. . . . Such application shall contain the following particulars: . . . (3) A statement of the nature of the title to the said ship whether of original construction by or for the Shipping Controller or by purchase, capture, condemnation or otherwise. . . .

2. The registrar upon receiving such application in respect of a Government ship in the service of the Shipping Controller shall (1) enter the ship in the register book as belonging to "His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller. . . ."

10. Sect. 1 and sects. 8 to 12 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 shall not apply to Government ships in the service of the Shipping Controller registered in pursuance of this Order in Council. . . .

F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the appellants, the Borneo Company.—The registers show no ownership in the Crown. The practice of interpleader was introduced by the Interpleader Act 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 58). now repealed, and continued in the Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66). Decisions under the earlier statute are still binding. There is authority that the Crown may be summoned in interpleader proceedings to appear and state a claim:

Creighton v. Attorney-General, 1731, Bunb. 303; Reid v. Stearn, 1 L. T. Rep. 539; 6 Jur. (N.S.) 237.

In the latter case Stuart, V.-C. rejected a submission that the Crown could not be made a party to interpleader proceedings. These cases are ruling authorities, and the doubt thrown upon them in text books (see Robertson's Civil Proceedings by and against the Crown, p. 610; Merlin's Practice of Interpleader; and a doubtful expression of opinion in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 17, p. 596) is not well founded. By sect. 25 (11) of the Judicature Act 1873 the equity rule under which Reid v. Stearn (sup.) was decided is continued. It is not now a ground for refusing relief that an order for costs might have to be made against the Crown, nor is it universally true that the Crown cannot be made party to proceedings other than by petition of right:

Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company v. The King, 122 L. T. Rep. 731; (1920) 2 K. B. 214.

Darby for the Crown.—There is no power to make the Crown party to proceedings except by petition of right (see Baker, p. 21). The Crown cannot be made to answer an interpleader summons:

Candy and Dean v. Maugham, 1843, 1 Dow. & L. 745.

Bunbury's report of Creighton v. Attorney-General (sup.) is inadequate. It may be that the Attorney-General may be made a party. The proper procedure is by petition of right:

Diplock v. Hammond, 2 Sur. & G. 141.

A petition of right is now proceeding for a declaration of title to these ships. The question ought to be decided then and not in these proceedings.

J. R. Ellis Cunliffe for the Sheriff of Lincolnshire.

Langton replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 8, 1921.—HILL, J.—The plaintiffs, the Borneo Company Limited, in a necessaries action in rem, recovered a judgment against the owners of the Mogileff. The owners appeared, and judgment went against them as well as against the Mogileff. The owners were a Russian corporation, styled the Russian Volunteer Fleet, which at the date of the trial had its principal place of business at Constantinople. Under an order for sale the marshal sold the Mogileff, but the proceeds satisfied only a portion of the judgment. The plaintiffs are still judgment creditors of the Russian Volunteer Fleet in a large sum, stated to be about 46,000*l*.

Under a writ of fi. fa. directed to the sheriff of Lincolnshire, and taken out by the plaintiffs, the sheriff seized two ships, the Krasnoarsk and the Vologda, which the plaintiffs allege to be the property of the Russian Volunteer Fleet. The ships were lying at Immingham. They were there laid up. There is no suggestion that they were being presently employed in the active service of the Crown. The solicitor for the Board of Trade gave notice to the sheriff that the ships were the property of His Majesty, and requested him to withdraw. This was followed by a letter from the solicitor to the Board of Trade, dated the 5th Aug. 1921, and a certificate of the same date by Mr. Hipwood, assistant secretary of the Mercantile Marine Department of the Board of Trade, to which were attached what purported to be certified copies of the transcripts of registers of the ships—I say purported because, as we know now, they were not correct transcripts. In those transcripts the Shipping Controller was named as the representative of His Majesty.

The plaintiffs disputed the claim put forward by the Board of Trade. The sheriff on the 11th Aug. 1921 took out an interpleader summons directed to the plaintiffs and to His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller as claimant, calling upon the plaintiffs and the claimant to appear and state the nature and particulars of their respective claims to the ships, and maintain or relinquish the same and abide by such order as might be made therein. The assistant registrar dismissed the application, and ordered the plaintiffs to pay the costs of it. He ordered the sheriff to remain in possession for five days, or, if notice of appeal were given, then, pending appeal, or until further orders, otherwise he ordered the sheriff to withdraw. From that order the plaintiffs appeal, and ask that an issue be directed.

Two questions arise (1) whether the Crown can be summoned to appear upon an interpleader summons, and made a party to an interpleader issue; (2) whether the court ought to order the sheriff to withdraw.

I have come to the conclusion on the first question in favour of the Crown, and on the second question in favour of the plaintiffs. I decide the first question in the Crown's favour, not because there is not an issue to be tried—I think there is—but because the court has no power to compel the Crown to answer the sheriff's summons or to submit that issue to the court.

I decide the second issue in the plaintiffs' favour because I think there is a serious issue to be determined before it can be held that the ships belong to the Crown and not to the Russian Volunteer Fleet; and until that issue has in some way been determined against the plaintiffs, I am not prepared, and have no right, to deprive the plaintiffs of the benefit of the execution.

I think there is a serious issue to be determined because I have not before me any sufficient evidence putting it beyond doubt that the ships belong to the Crown and not to the Russian Volunteer Fleet. No one appeared for the Russian Volunteer Fleet to say that the ships do not belong to that corporation; and for the Crown counsel was not able to say more than appears in the documents, and the documents, in my judgment, do not show that the ships are the property of the Crown.

The solicitor for the Board of Trade says in the letter of the 9th Aug. 1921: "I am forwarding herewith a certificate signed by the assistant secretary of the Mercantile Marine Department of the Board of Trade, certifying that the vessels above named have been the property of the Crown since 1918, and annexing to such certificate transcript of the registers of the vessels in question." But the certificate of the assistant secretary does not certify that the vessels are or ever were the property of the Crown. It certifies "that the Krasnoiarsk was registered in London in the name of His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller on the 21st June 1918, and the Vologda was registered in London in the name of His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller on the 26th June 1918," and adds: "Appended to this certificate are certified copies of the transcript of register for the vessels in question." In this certificate Mr. Hipwood, than whom no one knows better what he is saying in matters of merchant shipping, does not say that His Majesty is the owner of the ships, or that the ships are the property of the Crown. He only says that they were on the dates named registered in the name of His Majesty. Do the registers show anything more? The certified copies appended to Mr. Hipwood's certificate, if correct transcripts, would show that His Majesty was registered not as owner, but as "registered owner." The transcripts were, however, incorrect. The registers have been produced before me. They agree with the blue transcripts certified by the registrar-general, which were also produced before me. In each register the ship is described as "formerly under the Russian Flag," and in the space headed in print, "Names, Residences, and Description of Owners, and the number of 64th Shares held by each" are the words "His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller, London, 64 shares."

The registers also show that the Krasnoiarsk was on the 22nd April 1918 registered at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in the name of "His Excellency the Governor-General of Canada," and that this register was closed on the 24th July 1918, and that the Vologda was on the 29th April 1918 registered at St. John's, New Brunswick, in the name of the "Governor-General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, Ottawa," and that this register was closed on the 23rd Jan. 1919. The Vologda register states that this Canadian registration was by order of the Marine and Fisheries Department Order in Council, dated the 17th April 1918. Do the registers give any evidence of ownership in the Crown?

For the purpose of the present case, it is enough if they are sufficient evidence of legal ownership. If they are, and the legal estate is in the Crown, even though the beneficial interest is not, the plaintiffs remedy cannot be by execution under a fi. fa., but must be by some form of equitable execution. But are the registers evidence that the Crown is the legal owner of the ships? By sect. 64 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), the register, and a certified transcript of the register, are made admissible in evidence, and by sect. 695 are made evidence of the matters stated therein in pursuance of this Act. In the case of a British ship privately owned, one of the matters stated in pursuance of the Act is by sect. 11, "the name and description of the registered owner or owners." In the case of such a ship the register is therefore prima facie evidence of ownership. But by sect. 741 the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 does not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to His Majesty. Such ships cannot be registered under the Act of 1894. By sect. 80 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1908 (6 Edw. 7 c. 48), provision is made for the registration of "Government ships" which are defined as "ships not forming part of His Majesty's Navy which belong to His Majesty or are held by any person on behalf or for the benefit of the Crown and for that reason cannot be registered under the principal Act." Sect. 80 (1) provides as follows: "His Majesty may by Order in Council make regulations with respect to the manner in which Government ships may be registered as British ships for the purpose of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and those Acts, subject to any exceptions and modifications which may be made in the Order in Council, or generally or as respects any special class of Government ships, shall apply to Government ships registered in accordance with these regulations as if they were registered in manner provided by those Acts." By Order in Council of the 29th Sept. 1917, regulations were made as regards any Government ships in the service of the Shipping Controller. By these regulations sect. 1 and sects. 8 to 12 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 are not to apply to Government ships in the service of the Shipping Controller registered in pursuance of the provisions of the Order in Council. Sect. 1 of 1894 is the section which prescribes the qualifications for owning a British ship. Sects. 8 to 12 prescribed the method and conditions of registration and include sect. 11 quoted above. Under the Order in Council application for registration is to be made by the secretary to the Ministry of Shipping, and such application is to contain a statement of the nature of the title to the said ship, whether by original construction by or for the Shipping Controller or by purchase, capture, condemnation or otherwise. Upon receipt of the application the registrar shall enter the ship in the register book as belonging to His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller." It must have been under sect. 80 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 and this Order in Council that the Krasnoiarsk and Vologda were registered. The assistant registrar who produced the registers said they were. It will be observed that the registrar has no discretion in the matter. It will also be observed that "title" is used in a wide sense, for it includes title by capture, but capture does not vest the ownership in the captor. We are quite familiar with at least one class of ship which during the war were registered in the name of His Majesty as represented by a Department of State and which unquestionably were not the property of His Majesty. Enemy ships seized in port at the outbreak of war and ordered by the Prize Court to be detained under the Chile form of order were so registered for the purpose of being employed by the Government under the British flag. But the effect of the Chile form of order was to reserve all rights intact for decision when the war was over (per Privy Council in Prinz Adalbert (118 L. T. Rep. 161; 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 296; (1918) A. C. 500), and until those ships were condemned as prize, which was not done till after the armistice, they remained the property of their original enemy owners pending a final decision of the Prize Court. Now I apply sect. 695 of 1894 to a ship registered under sect. 80 of the Act of 1906 and the Order in Council. The register is evidence of the matters stated therein in pursuance of sect. 80 of the Order in Council. What is stated in these registers is that a ship formerly under the Russian flag is owned by "His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller," but having regard to sect. 80 and the Order in Council that denotes no more than this, that the ship is a "Government ship" in the service of the Shipping Controller, and "Government ship" denotes no more than this that the ship either belongs to His Majesty or is "held by the Shipping Controller on behalf or for the benefit of the Crown." "Held" is a word which may cover any sort of possession. If ships detained under a Chile form of order could be registered under sect. 80 of the Order in Council, I see no reason why ships which were not the property of the Crown, but had come into the possession of the Crown otherwise than by the requisition of a captured but not condemned ship should not be so registered. For instance, if a Russian owner had lent the use of his ship to the Crown for the duration of the war, I see no reason why it shold not be registered as detained ships were registered, if the Chile class of ships could be so registered. It is a possible view that neither class could properly be so registered, for it may be that the reason why they could not be registered under the principal Act was not because they were held on behalf of His Majesty, but because they had not ceased to be foreign owned; and, if so, sect. 80 (3) did not apply. But the fact that ships foreign owned were registered under sect. 80 and the Order in Council shows that no sure reference as to ownership can be drawn from the statement in the register. I can draw no certain inference from the register as to the Crown's ownership, whether legal or otherwise. Nothing outside the register makes me draw any such inference. On the contrary, if I consider anything outside, my doubts are only strengthened. On the trial of the Mogileff it was proved that the Mogileff was released from the service of the Crown to the Russian Volunteer Fleet on certain terms, and for a specific voyage, but there was nothing whatever to suggest that the Crown claimed to be the owner of the Mogileff. Reference was made to a petition of right by the Russian Volunteer Fleet that the Krasnoiarsk and the Vologda and other ships were by agreement taken over or requisitioned by His Majesty's Government on certain terms for the duration of the war, and claiming that the Russian Volunteer Fleet as owners of the said ships are entitled to a return of the ships not already re-delivered.

To this petition the plaintiffs are a party, but the only allegation with regard to them is that five of the ships, including the Mogileff, had been re-delivered to the plaintiffs as agents for the Russian Volunteer Fleet.

In this petition of right the suppliants set out a letter from the Foreign Office which says that the vessels can only be returned to the parties who own or control the Russian Volunteer Fleet. The answer and plea denies that there was any agreement with the suppliants, refers to the documents for their contents, and does not admit the allegations in the petition. Of course I cannot accept the allegations of the petition as evidence, nor treat the letter from the Foreign Office as proved. But at least the petition and answer show that it cannot be treated as proved that the ships are the property of His Majesty.

While the question whether the Krasnoiarsk and the Vologda are the property of His Majesty or of the Russian Volunteer Fleet is still undetermined, I cannot order the sheriff to withdraw.

But I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that I cannot compel the Crown to the determination of that question by the trial of an interpleader issue.

The plaintiffs' rely on Creighton v. Attorney-General (1731, Bunb. 303), amd Reid v. Stearn (1 L. T. Rep. 539; 6 Jur. (N.S.) 267). The Crown relies on Candy and Dean v. Maughan (1843, 1 Dow. & L. 745).

In the cases relied on by the plaintiffs an interpleader issue between the Crown and the subject was ordered to be tried. In Candy v. Maughan (sup.) it was refused. The plaintiffs contend that what was said by Tindal, L.J. and Maule, J. in the course of the argument in Candy v. Maughan were obiter dicta, and that the refusal of an issue was right upon the facts of the case. But the dicta, if obiter, are very strong, and are to the effect that the Crown cannot be compelled to appear before the court or be made a party to an interpleader issue. Mr. Robertson in his work on Civil Proceedings by and against the Crown, at p. 611, says that Candy v. Maughan had, in his own knowledge, been followed several times in chambers.

All these cases relate to stakeholders' interpleaders. I can see distinction for the purpose in hand between such interpleaders and sheriffs' interpleaders. The plaintiffs suggested that, as in 1873 there was a conflict between the common law and the equity case, sect. 25 (11) of the Judicature Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66) makes the equity cases the ruling authority. I do not think that section applies to alter the rights of the Crown.

Let us get back to the underlying principle. The plaintiffs say the principle is that no action lies against the Crown at the suit of a subject, and they say that in asking for an interpleader issue no one is seeking to maintain an action against the Crown; the Crown has asserted a claim, and is invited either to withdraw it or prove it and, as it does not withdraw it, is directed to prove it. I, however, am of opinion that the rule that no action lies against the Crown at the suit of the subject is part only of the wider principle that the King cannot, against his will, be made to submit to the jurisdiction of the King's courts. For this I cite the passage in Blackstone, vol. 1, chap. 7, quoted by Brett, L.J. in the Parlement-Belge (42 L. T. Rep. 273 ; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 234 ; 5 Prob. Div. 197, at p. 206). Brett, L.J., in the Parlement-Belge (sup.) quotes Blackstone, par. 1, chap. 7, as follows : —" Our King owes no kind of subjection to any other potentate on earth. Hence it is that no suit or action can be brought against the King, even in civil matters, because no court can have jurisdiction over him. For all jurisdiction implies superiority of power ; authority to try would be vain and idle without an authority to redress, and the sentence of a court would be contemptible unless the court had power to command the execution of it, but who shall command the King ? "

In this case the Crown does not consent to submit to the jurisdiction of the court, and the court cannot command it to do so.

The result of my decision is to leave matters in a most unsatisfactory position. The difficulties of the sheriff are obvious. The plaintiffs are in hardly less difficulty. It was suggested that they can get the matter in issue determined by proceeding with the petition of right I have already referred to. But of that petition they are not masters, and the evidence in support of it must mainly come from the Russian Volunteer Fleet who in the Mogileff action are the plaintiffs' judgment debtors.

It was also suggested that the plaintiffs could bring a position of right claiming that the register be rectified. But it may well be that the ships are properly registered, and yet that they are the property of the Russian Volunteer Fleet. It may be questioned whether petition of right lies where the suppliant seeks to recover nothing from the Crown, neither land, nor goods, nor money, nor any incorporeal right (Robertson, p. 331), even supposing that petition of right is an available remedy for the purpose of having it declared that the ships are not the property of the Crown. Plaintiffs on such a petition would have upon them the burden of proving a negative, whereas, if an interpleader issue could be tried, the Crown would naturally be made plaintiff, and have to establish its claim. But while I feel all the difficulties and the risk of a denial of justice to the plaintiffs, I must administer the law as I find it, trusting that some method may be devised for the speedy determination of the matter in issue, and that the advisers of the Crown will assist to that end. They must bear in mind that at times when the Crown by its servants, and in the various departments of government engages in commerce, as shipowner and charterer, as marine underwriter and wholesale dealer in commodities, great hardships may be occasioned to the subject by too strict an insistence upon the constitutional rights of the Crown.

I vary the order by dismissing the summons simply, without costs either here or below. The sheriff has failed. Neither the plaintiffs nor the Crown have wholly succeeded.

The Borneo Company appealed.

MacKinnon, K.C. and G. P. Langton for the appellants.

Sir Gordon Hewart (A.-G.) and Darby for the Board of Trade.

Holman Gregory, K.C. and J. Ellis Cunliffe for the sheriff.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Hill, J. I very much regret that it is not possible, in my opinion, to take any other view of the matter than that taken by the learned judge. In my opinion the view which he took was entirely right.

The matter arises in this way : the appellants were execution creditors, and they obtained a judgment against the Russian Volunteer Fleet Committee. In execution of that judgment they caused a writ of fi. fa. to be issued, directed to the sheriff of Lincolnshire to seize two vessels which they asserted belonged to the Russian Volunteer Fleet Committee. The sheriff, acting upon the writ, seized the vessels, and thereupon a claim was made, which is contained in a letter written by Mr. Barnes, the solicitor for the Board of Trade, of the 6th Aug. 1921, in which he says he confirms his telegram of the previous day addressed to the sheriff, which he sets out, and then he goes on to say : " As indicated in the above quoted telegram, the vessels are registered in the name of His Majesty, represented by the Shipping Controller, London. I shall be happy to produce to you or your representative transcripts of the registers of these respective vessels showing that they are the property of His Majesty, and, not having heard from you in reply to my telegram, I am to request that you withdraw your officer immediately and report to me that you have done so." The registers were afterwards produced, or verified, and it appeared that the vessels were registered in London in the name of His Majesty represented by the Shipping Controller, and it seems to me quite plain that that was a claim on behalf of the Crown, and it was understood by the sheriff as being a claim on behalf of the Crown. Upon that the sheriff issued an interpleader summons, a copy of which is set out on p. 12 of the proceedings. It is dated the 16th Aug. 1921, and the heading, of which we have not got a copy, we are told refers to the claimants as the Crown on the one side and the execution creditors on the other. Then the summons directs all parties concerned to attend before the registrar and so forth " on the hearing of an application on the part of the sheriff of Lincolnshire that the plaintiffs and the claimants appear and state the nature and particulars of their respective claims."

Interpleader, as its name indicates, was a proceeding instituted for the purpose of relieving persons, sheriffs, and others, who made no claim themselves to a subject matter which was claimed by two other parties, to appear before the court and in a summary proceeding at their instance get a decision from the court as between the two claimants as to which of them was entitled to the subject matter of the claim.

It is not necessary to refer to the history of the proceeding, because now the procedure is contained in the rule of court which deals with interpleader. The learned judge has held that Order LVII. does not apply to the Crown, or bind the Crown, and that it is not possible to compel the Crown to interplead. On p. 22 of the proceedings he sums up his view in this way : " Let us get back to the underlying principle. The plaintiffs say the principle is that no action lies against the Crown at the suit of a subject, and they say that in asking for an interpleader issue no one is seeking to maintain an action against the Crown; the Crown has asserted a claim and is invited either to withdraw it or to prove it, and, as it does not withdraw it, is directed to prove it. I, however, am of opinion that the rule that no action lies against the Crown at the suit of the subject is part only of the wider principle that the King cannot, against his will, be made to submit to the jurisdiction of the King's courts." For that he cites an authority, and, in my opinion, the view there expressed by the learned judge is quite correct.

Mr. MacKinnon has based his argument, as I understand it, upon two grounds. He says, first of all, there is authority to the contrary of the view expressed by the learned judge, and he relies for that upon the case of Reid v. Stearn (1860, 1 L. T. Rep. 539; 6 Jur. N. S. 267). I desire to say that in my opinion that case is really no authority for the proposition for which Mr. MacKinnon cites it or for which apparently it has been cited on other occasions. It is quite true that in his judgment in that case Stuart, V.-C. (6 Jur. N. S. at p. 268) said that he "conceived, if the Crown was adversely claiming against the stakeholders, that they had a right, when other persons were claiming the same money, to file a bill of interpleader, and to make the Crown a defendant to the bill, because the Crown was one of the parties contesting the right. The question of title had not been seriously argued, and he did not decide it one way or the other, but he should not hold that the Crown was an improper party. He thought the bill had been rightly framed, in bringing all the claimants before the court." When one looks at the facts of that case one finds that it was a suit instituted by the plaintiffs against the four defendants claiming the return or the payment of a certain sum of money, or a direction that the defendants might be decreed to interplead, and one of the four defendants, so added apparently, was the Crown—in what form we do not know. It may have been in the form of an action against the Attorney-General, but that does not appear. But whatever form the action was in, it is manifest, I think, that whoever was made a defendant as representing the Crown, consented to the jurisdiction, and appeared, and, therefore, was a party properly before the court. It was in those circumstances that Stuart, V.-C. made the observation he did and made the order he did.

It seems to me that that case has no application to the present case, or any similar case where the Crown is objecting that it ought not to be made a party, or in this particular case where the Crown is objecting that there is no jurisdiction to make an interpleader order as against the Crown. I pass, therefore, from that case by repeating that, in my opinion, it is no authority for the proposition for which it is cited by Mr. MacKinnon.

There are, on the other hand, in Candy v. Maugham (1843, 6 M. & G. 710; 13 L. J. C. P. 17) very clear dicta by the learned judges who were parties to that decision, that interpleader would not lie against the Crown, and, for the reason which Hill, J. has given, and which is a much broader and deeper reason, it seems to me that interpleader proceedings cannot be taken against the Crown and that the court cannot make an order either directing an issue against the Crown or barring the claim of the Crown. Now the other point taken by Mr. MacKinnon does not seem to me to be open upon these proceedings. That point is that it is competent for these parties, or a party under similar circumstances, to bring an action against the Attorney-General claiming a declaration as to the rights of the execution creditors. Now that may or may not be; I express no opinion about it. All I need say is this, that it does not seem to me that in the proceedings where an interpleader summons has been taken out by the sheriff, asking and asking only that the Crown may appear and state its claim and be a party to the interpleader, it is not competent, upon such a summons, to take the course suggested by Mr. MacKinnon, and to treat this as though it were an action against the Attorney-General claiming a declaration of the rights of the execution creditors.

I do not know that I need say any more except that, in my opinion, the appeal fails. We are not asked to make any direction that the sheriff shall remain in possession. Therefore, the order will simply be that the appeal is dismissed with costs, and that so far as the sheriff is concerned, the sheriff's costs will be added to the costs of the execution creditors.

Scrutton, L.J.—I agree that in the matter which is now before the court we cannot do anything else than dismiss the appeal. In this case, however, I desire to say that it seems to show the extreme advisability of action by the committee which it is stated has been appointed under the presidency of the Attorney-General to consider in what respects the rights of the Crown should or should not be altered in legislation, for I cannot help feeling that the objection that has been taken by the Crown in this case, which, I think, is a good objection in law, has the effect of preventing an order of this court being enforced, and of delaying justice to one of His Majesty's subjects. However, all this court can do is to enforce the law, and not to express any opinion on the desirability of the action taken by the Crown of insisting on its legal rights.

The case comes before the court on an interpleader summons that the plaintiffs and the claimant shall appear and state the nature of their claims, and maintain or relinquish the claim. The plaintiff is a person who got a judgment in rem against the owners of the particular ship, and obtained a writ of fi. fa. against property, which he alleges is the property of the owners of the ship in respect of which he has got a judgment in rem for a certain sum of money.

The Crown has stated to the sheriff that the Crown itself is the owner of the property seized, and therefore has requested him not to proceed on a writ of fi. fa. The sheriff has taken out a summons that the plaintiffs and the claimant—which must mean the Crown, as it appears from the title the Crown is represented by the Shipping Controller—shall appear and shall maintain or relinquish their claim. The Crown does not consent to the court's making the order. It appears to me, therefore, that the court has no jurisdiction to make an order adverse to the Crown without the Crown's consent.

In my view the interpleader rules which have the force of statute do not bind the Crown. The principle, I think, is that statutes do not bind the Crown in any case where they would affect any existing prerogative or interest of the Crown, unless either express words or necessary implication compel the court to come to that view. There are no express words in this case making the interpleader rules apply to the Crown, and I cannot see that there is any necessary implication. In those circumstances I think that the interpleader rules do not bind the Crown.

I should come to that conclusion without authority, but as far as the authority is concerned, I think the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Candy v. Maughan (6 M. & G. 710; 13 L. J. 17 C. P.) did decide, as far as the Interpleader Act was concerned, that the Crown was not bound by the existing Interpleader Act.

The second point was then argued by Serjeant Manning, which was that if the Interpleader Act did not apply, without the Interpleader Act the Crown had power to interfere. His argument in the report (6 M. & G. 710), edited by himself, and therefore I expect accurately stated, is that: "Wherever the court sees that the Crown, though no party to the record, has an interest in the matter in suit, they may pronounce judgment for the Crown. And if a presumption of title only appears for the Crown, the court will, in some cases, proceed to give judgment in the action; but will suspend execution until the party has interpleaded with the Crown. For these positions a variety of authorities will be found collected in Mann. Exch. Prac., 2nd edit., 123 (vide Adam Penreth's case, T. 29, E. 1).

Then follow some twenty or thirty authorities. I have looked at Manning's Exchequer Practice, and for the passage. If a presumption of title only appears for the Crown, the court will in some cases proceed to give judgment in the action, but will suspend execution until the party has interpleaded with the Crown. The only one other authority is cited, which is apparently in the Year Books of the 23th of Edward I. That case is known as Adam Penreth's case. Mr. MacKinnon, with whose industry the court generally has no reason to be dissatisfied, is quite unable to find that report, and certainly I have not been able in the intervals of listening to counsel in this case to discover that particular report in the Year Books, but I notice that Maule, J. then asks the questions how was the court put in motion, and Serjeant Manning reports himself as answering on the suggestion of the King's Serjeant or sometimes proprio motu. In 13 L. J. 17 C. P. he is only reported as answering proprio motu, to which Maule, J. replies in the Law Journal: "Then this can hardly be the proper subject of a motion from the bar," that is, it cannot be a matter for application to the court by adversely claiming; it is in the power of the court, and not in the power of any party to come to the court and say "Make the order." As stated by Serjeant Manning (6 M. & G. at p. 712), and I have no doubt, more accurately, if it is done on the suggestion of the King's Serjeant the Crown waives its privileges, and if proprio motu it is not open to some party to the action to come to the court and say as a right, "Exercise these powers."

It seems to me, therefore, that applying the strict law the summons taken out by the sheriff was wrong because it purported adversely to the Crown to require the Crown to appear and to maintain or relinquish its claim. I, therefore, think that this appeal must be dismissed, though, as I have said, I feel that the result of the action taken by the Crown in this case is to delay justice to a British subject. That, however, is not a matter for this court. I desire to say, as my brother has said, that I express no opinion as to the rights and duties of the sheriff which are not before us. The sheriff has got a writ to execute, if he determines not to execute it that will be, as Mr. Gregory says, at his risk. We are not deciding one way or the other in the circumstances of this case that he is, or is not, entitled to withdraw.

Atkin, L.J.—I agree. This is a summons taken out by the sheriff under the interpleader order, which is Order LVII. of the Rules of the Supreme Court. That is an order which took the place of the statutory provisions under the Act of William IV. and the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act of 1860. It is an order which provides for the originating of process by a stakeholder, or by the sheriff, and it gives power to the court to exercise coercive authority over the persons who are brought before the court by an interpleader summons, namely, the sheriff himself and the claimants. I think it only necessary to refer to the rules—I do not propose to do it in detail—to show that there is a complete code by which in the first place the summons calls on the claimants to appear and state the nature and particulars of their claim, and to maintain or relinquish it. The rules then proceed to give power to the judge to order that the claimant be made a defendant in the action, or that an issue be tried, and to direct which of the claimants be plaintiff, and which may not, and the court has power to decide the matter in a suitable case in a summary way. If the claimant has been served, and does not appear—that is to say if the Crown in this case having been served does not appear—the courts may make an order declaring him, and all persons claiming under him for ever barred, and there are many other provisions including a provision as to costs. Now it appears to me quite plain that the order does not bind the Crown, and is not intended to give, and does not give, the court the coercive jurisdiction against the Crown that it plainly has against claimants who are properly brought before it on an interpleader summons.

It appears to me that that is sufficient to dispose of this case, but I think myself that it is very unfortunate that it should be so, because not only is the subject delayed in obtaining the amount of money for which the court has decided he is entitled to have judgment, but also as it appears to me that as an officer of the Crown, and a very important public officer of the Crown, the sheriff is harassed by reason of the difficulties that he is put into as to the course that he should take. Nevertheless, that seems to me to be the position at present. I say nothing as to whether there is any other process of law by which the execution creditor can have the matter determined as against the Crown, and I say nothing at all as to the rights of the execution creditor as against the sheriff, or of the sheriff against the execution creditor. The position merely remains in this way, that according to our decision the sheriff is not in a position to take out an interpleader summons making the Crown claimants. We determine nothing else as to the rights of the parties at all. I agree that Hill, J.'s judgment is right, and for the reasons that have been given by him, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs, and with the order that was made by my Lord protecting the sheriff as to his costs.

The Cumberland Queen. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision at night—Insufficient lights on sailing ship—Failure of steamship to see loom of sailing ship until about 300*ft. away—Look-out—Negligence.*

A steamer, making sixteen knots, collided with a sailing vessel at night. The night was "fine, clear, dark, and overcast." The sailer's lights were defective. Those on board the steamship did not see the loom of the sailer until they were within about 300*ft. of her.*

The President found, on the advice of the Elder Brethren, that the loom of the sailer ought to have been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile. He held, that, although the lights of the sailer were grossly improper, the steamship was alone to blame, because if she had seen the loom of the sailer at a distance of a quarter of a mile, as, he found, she ought to have done, the collision might and ought to have been avoided. The owners of the steamship appealed.

On appeal the Assessors expressed the opinion that in the circumstances it was very doubtful whether the loom of the sailer could have been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile, or at a distance appreciably greater than that at which it was first seen by those on the steamship.

Held, that the sailer was to blame for carrying improper light, and that she was alone to blame for the collision, as it had not been proved that the look-out on the steamship was in any way defective.

Decision of Duke, P. reversed.

Action of damage by collision, and counter-claim.

The plaintiffs were the London and North Western Railway Company, owners of the steamer Slieve Gallion, and the defendants were the owners of the schooner Cumberland Queen.

The plaintiffs alleged by their statement of claim, that shortly before 4.40 a.m. on the 9th Oct. 1920 the Slieve Gallion was in the Irish Sea in the course of a voyage from Holyhead to Greenore, making about sixteen knots. The weather was clear and dark, and the tide was first of the flood of the force of about a knot. A good look-out was being kept on board. In these circumstances those on board the Slieve Gallion saw the loom of a vessel which proved to be the Cumberland Queen about a ship's length away and about a point on the starboard bow. The Cumberland Queen was heard to blow two blasts on the foghorn, but came on and struck the starboard side of the bridge of the Slieve Gallion with the bowsprit, doing damage. Just before the collision a defective red light was seen, and also a white light aft apparently moving.

The defence alleged (inter alia) that a good look-out was not kept on board the Slieve Gallion, and that her speed was excessive in the circumstances.

Laing, K.C. and J. B. Aspinall for the plaintiffs.

Raeburn, K.C. and G. P. Langton, for the defendants.

Jan. 28, 1921.—Sir Henry Duke, P.—This was a collision in the Irish Sea in the neighbourhood of the Skerries about five miles W.N.W. of the Skerries, and the time of its occurrence is put by the defendants as having been in the early morning of the 9th Oct. last. The plaintiffs are the London and North Western Railway Company and their vessel the Slieve Gallion was on a voyage from Holyhead to Greenore in the ordinary course of her plying in the service of the plaintiffs. The defendants' vessel was the four-masted schooner Cumberland Queen belonging to a port in Nova Scotia, and she was on a voyage from Preston to Parsboro. The Cumberland Queen had left Preston the previous day; and the Slieve Gallion had left Holyhead an hour before the collision. A variety of questions have arisen in the case, but owing to the course of events the questions which decide the case are—What were the conditions as to weather? What was the state of the lights on the Cumberland Queen? and What was the character of the look-out of the Slieve Gallion? The collision, it is to be observed, was almost avoided by action which was taken on board the Slieve Gallion at the very last period in the history of the events in question when the collision was observed by those on board the Slieve Gallion to be inevitable. I accept what was said by the chief officer of the Slieve Gallion, Mr. Gill, with regard to that matter. He described how the Slieve Gallion left Holyhead at ten minutes before four o'clock. He said that he was on the fo'c'sle head till they were passed the breakwater light at Holyhead at 4.13, that he then made the rounds, and that after making the rounds he went upon the bridge where he found the captain in charge of the bridge, the quartermaster at the wheel and two look-out men. He describes the weather as clear, and he says that just before the collision—three minutes before the collision—the captain left the bridge in order to look at his compass and to make a calculation which it was necessary should be made for setting the course of the ship having regard to the conditions of tide, and to the time at which the passage was being made. The master he said went down to consult his course book, and then he said that at a point of time which he fixes—he did not fix it with exact certainty, but which must have been within a minute of the collision—the nearest period at which he can fix it was two or three minutes before the collision—the master of the Slieve Gallion left the bridge; the quartermaster at the wheel called out, "I think I see a vessel on the starboard bow;" he says that he was looking at that time on the port bow and that he, the chief officer, wheeled round and looked with his glasses. One of the look-out men described how the chief officer was on the bridge with his glasses slung round his neck, and that corroborates his statement that from time to time he was looking out with his glasses. He says, "I looked round and looked with my glasses and I picked up the loom of a sailing vessel. I could see no light whatever, red, white nor anything. I had heard nothing, the vessel was about a point on the starboard bow, about a ship's length away." (His length is 311 ft.) He gave an order hard astarboard; turned to see it carried out; rang the port engine full speed astern; helped to reverse the port propeller; and then he describes the bow of the Cumberland Queen at about the bridge of the Slieve Gallion, and in fact the collision carried away the shelter in which one of the two look-out men had been standing during the period before the collision. That is the description of the collision by the chief officer of the Slieve Gallion.

I come first to consider the question of weather. It is material in various aspects of the case. If the weather was of anything like the nature described by those on board the Cumberland Queen a speed of sixteen knots was a speed which involved the highest degree of recklessness and the matter must be considered in view of the conclusion which would result, as well as in the light of the evidence as a whole. The witnesses of the Cumberland Queen described with great particularity the course of their voyage from Preston—how, after they passed, I think it was, the Nelson Buoy, they were sounding fog signals continuously in accordance with regulations right up to the time of the collision. Some of them gave a great many circumstances in corroboration which they said they remembered. They say that on the day of the collision there was a fog during their passage from Preston to the point of the collision and they referred to the fact that a dense fog set in not long after the collision. They called the master of the steamship Primrose which rendered assistance to the Cumberland Queen, and they relied upon statements by members of the ship's company of the Slieve Gallion that they heard certain fog signals. On the other hand what is said is that the master of the Slieve Gallion was on his bridge from the time he left Holyhead until two or three minutes before the collision; that the chief officer was on duty; that the look-out men were there; that the speed was deliberately set; that the records of the lightships and the lighthouses in the region which would be affected by a fog of the prevalence of that described by the Cumberland Queen do not show fog at any such time as is in question in this case; and that, on the contrary, they show a high degree of visibility. They rely, too, upon the bearings taken by the chief officer of the Slieve Gallion immediately after the collision—bearings which were recorded in the log and in which the distance of various lights up to a range of seven miles or thereabouts from the point of the collision are set down. It is a direct conflict. The case of fog is set up by the Cumberland Queen deliberately, and with the intention of relying upon the kind of proof which is stated here. The case, on the other hand, is stated with great clearness and without any misapprehension of the grave conflict that there is in the case, and it is necessary to examine the evidence closely in order to see what is the true conclusion. I have been struck by one or two things with regard to the evidence in the case of the Cumberland Queen.

[The learned President dealt with some of the evidence offered by the defendants, and continued:] I attach weight to those discrepancies in averment in the case of the Cumberland Queen, and, on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that I ought to accept the evidence of the Slieve Gallion with regard to the state of the weather. I find that the weather from the time at which the Slieve Gallion left Holyhead before four o'clock to the time of the collision—for an appreciable period of time after the collision was such as is described in their statement of the weather conditions, namely, that it was a fine, clear, dark, overcast night.

The second material question in the case is that of the lights of the Cumberland Queen. Mr. Raeburn frankly admitted—as he had no alternative but to admit—that the port light of the Cumberland Queen (which is the light here in question) was such that the light failed to comply with the collision regulations, and failed to comply to such an extent, and in such a way that there was an infringement of the regulations which amounted to a possible cause of collision. I must carry the matter further than that. I must see what was, in truth, the state of the port light of the Cumberland Queen, and to what extent, if at all, it was visible from the Slieve Gallion. At the instance of the plaintiffs the Elder Brethren, who are advising me in the case, made an inspection of this light, and no complaint at all has been made of the procedure they adopted. They got the assistance of an engineer at Trinity House, and they themselves have made personal experiments, and the evidence furnished by the observations of the Elder Brethren, and by the report of the engineer, are part of the evidence in the case by common consent of the parties. Now, having seen the engineer's evidence, it comes to this, that the light had a maximum initial intensity of five candles; that the lamp in which it burned was set in an indifferent lense; that no part of the flame was in the focus; that the flame was to some extent out of centre in the lense; only the second prism from the bottom in the lense of the lantern—the enclosing lantern—showed a full beam; a third prism from the bottom showed only a glimmer and looked at from its own level there was only a dull loom visible from the central belt and the prisms above. As to the light emitted by the second and third lowest prism, the only effective part of the beam, the engineer says, does not exceed one candle. And he points out that certain uprights by which the lamp could and would be lifted are capable of blocking the visibility of the lights if turned in the direction of an observer, and would obscure 30 per cent. of the range of the light with a maximum intensity of obscuration amounting to 80 per cent., and that if they were turned to the side they would obscure 15 per cent. with a maximum intensity of obscuration of 90 per cent. I do not give the weight to that matter of obscuration which I was invited to give to it. The Elder Brethren take the view that, although there is that degree of obscuration, when you come to the distances which are here in question the obscuration is not so effective as it is close at hand, but what is seen upon the near view, on the handling of this lamp in a room, is a defect in the vision of the rays of light which is to a great extent obliterated when the light is in action at a considerable distance, or even at such distances as are in question here. That justifies some part of the evidence which was given by the experts for the defendants, though I do not think it justifies the whole of it. I think they gave too favourable an account of this light as a working ship's light. As to the practical tests, I am told by the Elder Brethren in their report that on a very clear and fine night where an ordinary red sea light would be visible at upwards of two miles—two miles with the naked eye and substantially more than two miles with the aid of binoculars—this light from 100 yards to 1000 yards was an ordinary red light which could be observed as a ship's red light would be observed, but that beyond 1000 yards (in fact, at some distance within 1000 yards) the light became invisible because of this defective intensity, and that very close at hand, within 100 yards, its construction had the effect of reducing the rays which proceeded from it to the form of a thin pencil of red light. Close at hand it was a thin pencil, and as the light was removed to a great distance the power of the light was increased and overcame the mechanical difficulties in the diffusion of the light. That was the light with which the Cumberland Queen had crossed the Atlantic, and was setting out to cross the Atlantic again. It is not necessary to discuss its defects in detail. It is sufficient to say here that it was a light which did not come within any measurable distance of complying with the regulations against collisions at sea, and that there was on the part of the Cumberland Queen in respect of light a gross infringement of these regulations.

The question which is next to be considered is the question of look-out on board the Slieve Gallion, and that is a question of very considerable difficulty. Something is to be said, I think, as to what was the duty imposed upon those in charge of the Slieve Gallion, if they were going to cross the Irish Sea where they crossed it at a speed of sixteen knots an hour. It is a speed which it is very beneficial in the public interest that a steamship should be able to use. Everybody who has had to travel by sea is grateful for the power and skill which permit of high speed, such as that, and, in some cases, of a higher speed. But the power of travelling at sea with a speed of that kind imposes on those who exercise it the highest degree of obligation in respect not only of care, but in respect of the standard of efficiency by which their performances are to be measured. You must not travel at sixteen knots even on a fine, clear, dark night across the Irish Sea without providing against all the risks which that navigation involves. Other vessels are put under the obligation by the Collision Regulations of showing their lights, but lights fail, men in charge of lights are negligent, and accidents happen. You may not have a light, or you may have a light which from some cause inherent in the light or the management of it, is not available as a warning. Not only so, but lighted vessels are not the only obstacles to navigation or which involve risk to persons who are on board vessels navigating at high rates of speed. There may be causes of risk which cannot be seen, but there are notorious causes of risk which can be seen, so that it does not discharge the liability which is upon those navigating at high speed, or at whatever speed they may choose to navigate at, to say, that a collision has occurred with an unlighted ship, or that a collision had occurred with an imperfectly lighted ship. The question still has to be asked, What was the nature of the look-out, were the conditions such that with a diligent and efficient look-out the collision could have been avoided or the consequences of the collision could have been diminished?

Now, the look-out on board the Slieve Gallion consisted at the time in question of two look-out men stationed each in a shelter on either side of the bridge with the help, not provided for purposes of look-out but valuable, of an officer on the bridge, the officer of the watch, and a helmsman at an open wheel on the bridge. The eyes of the ship are the eyes of the two look-out men. It is said here that the eyes of the ship—the look-out man on the starboard look-out—were not effective, that the look-out was not a look-out with which you could safely navigate the Irish Sea at the point, and on the course in question, at a speed of sixteen knots. The test must be made at that point. So far as the chief officer was concerned I accept all he said. If I may say so, I was well impressed with his evidence. I think he came on duty to do his duty well and qualified to do it. I was quite satisfied there was no dullness on his part, and that in taking over the charge when the master went below he was quite alert, and that in the multitude of his duties, he could not be blamed for what he failed to see. He would look in the first instance for lights, and so far as I know he had not stood on the starboard look-out on his ship long enough to have any responsibility upon him for what might be there, and so far as the helmsman was concerned his business was with the wheel and the compass. So far as the port look-out man was concerned, he had that quarter to attend to, and he was attending to it, and was very vigilant. Can the same be said with regard to the look-out man on the starboard side? He was in the box and gave his evidence to the best of his ability. He certainly did not establish affirmatively that he was giving a diligent and sufficient look-out. A great deal depends, in forming an opinion as to the character of his look-out, upon the limit of visibility of a sailing ship of the type of the Cumberland Queen on a night such as the night in question. It is quite true it must be said in favour of those who were concerned that to pick up the loom of a vessel on a night such as they had to deal with is a totally different thing and a much more exacting task than it is to observe a vessel proceeding under her lights. But it has to be done. I have consulted the Elder Brethren as to the range within which I might say with any confidence that a diligent and efficient look-out man on such a night as was described, and as is insisted upon in the case of the Slieve Gallion, could be excused for not seeing the hull and sails—the outline, or the loom, as it is called—of the Cumberland Queen, and those who advise me cannot bring it down to a quarter of a mile.

Their belief is that with a diligent and efficient look-out the loom of the Cumberland Queen might have been and would have been observed at substantially more than a quarter of a mile. It was said with very great force that the chief officer and various of the rest of the company of the Slieve Gallion stated accurately many things. They saw little things which showed their vigilance. On the whole, I accept their evidence on the subject; their look-out is not stronger than the evidence of Hughes (the starboard look-out man) makes it; and, having regard to the evidence which Hughes gave and to the advice which I have received as to the limit within which it would be impossible on such a night that an efficient look-out should fail to observe the loom of a large vessel like the Cumberland Queen, I have come to the conclusion that in the particulars that I have mentioned the Slieve Gallion had a defective look-out, and therefore was not complying with the regulations.

The crucial question comes to be this: the Cumberland Queen having been navigated in breach of the regulations, and the Slieve Gallion having failed in discharge of her obligations under the regulation as to look-out, where does the responsibility for this collision fall either in whole or in part? I take the law to be that by the exercise of that degree of care and skill which is to be expected of competent seamen, those who are confronted with a breach of the regulations are bound to avoid mishap as the result of that breach of the regulation, and if they fail to avoid a mishap, the liability in respect of it falls upon them. I have to consider whether, with care and skill, those on board the Slieve Gallion could have avoided the grave default of the Cumberland Queen, in her failure to be equipped with efficient lights—having in fact lights which had an insufficient range of visibility—a range of visibility which Mr. Raeburn would only insist upon at which he thought it must be said the Slieve Gallion could have seen the loom of the hull of the Cumberland Queen, namely, a quarter of a mile. Now, so far as the lights are concerned, the Slieve Gallion had not the proper warning; but, notwithstanding that, if the look-out had been the kind of look-out which is to be expected from a steamer navigating in the Irish Sea, say, at a speed of sixteen knots, the Cumberland Queen would have been seen at upwards of a quarter of a mile, at any rate, from the point at which this collision occurred. She was so well under control that the Cumberland Queen being observed at a distance of 400ft. the collision was nearly avoided. I have come to the conclusion that if she had been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile, or ever less than a quarter of a mile, the collision would have been avoided, and I confess that I come reluctantly to the conclusion that the Cumberland Queen, which sailed the seas in a condition in which she ought not to have sailed, must be exonerated from blame for this collision, and that the Slieve Gallion must be held to be wholly to blame for this collision.

Now, I must consider the question of costs. I have said something as to the case which was set up here about fog, and I have pronounced judgment as to the state of the lights of the Cumberland Queen; and, if I were to apportion costs, I should apportion the costs arising out of the question as to fog, and the costs arising out of the question as to the lights of the Cumberland Queen, against the Cumberland Queen. I do not propose to deal with it in that manner; but I propose to give the Cumberland Queen one half only of her costs of the trial.

The Slieve Gallion held alone to blame.

The owners of the Slieve Gallion appealed.

Laing, K.C., Bateson, K.C., and J. B. Aspinall, for the appellants.

Raeburn, K.C. and G. P. Langton, for the respondents, the owners of the Cumberland Queen.

Lord STERNDALE, M.R.—This is an appeal from the President of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division, in a case arising out of a collision between the Slieve Gallion and the Cumberland Queen. The Slieve Gallion is one of the London and North-Western Railway Company's boats, 311ft. in length, a steel twin screw steamer with engines working up to 3000 horse-power indicated, and she was on a voyage from Holyhead to Greenore; she had only got a few miles out of Holyhead when the collision happened. The Cumberland Queen is a wooden four-masted schooner, belonging to the Port of Parsboro, Nova Scotia, 680 tons gross, 179ft. in length, and she was on a voyage from Preston to Parsboro. The Slieve Gallion was doing about sixteen knots. The speed of the Cumberland Queen I do not think is material; she was in fact, with all sails set, making about four knots close hauled. The Slieve Gallion saw the loom of the Cumberland Queen about a ship's length away, and had not seen her before, about a point on the starboard bow. The helm was put hard astarboard and the port engine ordered full speed astern, and the Cumberland Queen was then, and then only, heard to blow two blasts on her foghorn; but the starboard side of the bridge of the Slieve Gallion and the bowsprit of the Cumberland Queen came into contact.

Now, if that were the whole of the case, of course it is a simple case of a steamer going not at an excessive speed in the weather as found by the learned President—as to which I shall have something to say—but going at a considerable speed and failing to keep out of the way of a sailing ship, and it would be a very simple case indeed; but that is not the whole of the case. The case for the Slieve Gallion is that the Cumberland Queen was not seen before because she had a defective red light which could not be seen, and that the loom could not have been seen at a greater distance than it was seen at. Now the Cumberland Queen, of course, defended her red light, and it seems to be a red light which she had been in the habit of using for some considerable time. It is worthy of notice that the Cumberland Queen came into court setting up a case, and setting it up as the President found deliberately, which he finds to be a wholly untrue case—that is as to the weather. According to her evidence it was foggy, and she was blowing her foghorn, and she sets up that case no doubt in order to blame the Slieve Gallion for her speed and also to blame her for not stopping when she heard, or ought to have heard, a foghorn forward of the beam. Now that case the President has entirely disbelieved, and he has disbelieved it after finding that it was set up deliberately by the Cumberland Queen with the intention of relying upon the proof which was stated by them in court, so that the Cumberland Queen does not enter the case on the facts as found by the President in a very creditable position. She entered it setting up a false case for the purpose of making an allegation against the other vessel which was not well founded. The President has found that the weather was such as is described in the statement of the weather conditions by the Slieve Gallion, namely, that it was a fine, clear, dark, overcast night. I do not know that those adjectives are altogether consistent with one another, but that is the finding of the President.

With regard to the light, his conclusion is stated in two or three passages in his judgment. He says: "It is not necessary to discuss its defects in detail. It is sufficient to say here that it was a light which did not come within any measurable distance of complying with the Regulations against Collisions at Sea, and that there was, on the part of the Cumberland Queen in respect of light, a gross infringement of these regulations." Then he says that the Cumberland Queen was obviously in fault in respect of her light, but, for a reason which he gives, he does not find that was a contributing cause to the collision, because he finds chiefly on the advice, though not perhaps entirely on the advice of the Elder Brethren, that the loom of the Cumberland Queen could and ought to have been seen by those on board the Slieve Gallion at a distance of, at the very least, a quarter of a mile, and that if they had seen her and acted for her at that distance there would have been no collision. Therefore, he has held the Slieve Gallion alone to blame and acquitted the Cumberland Queen of any default which was in any way a contributing cause of the collision. The evidence as to the light, and the conclusion as to the light, except the general one that I have stated, are not very definite. A test was made of this light by the Elder Brethren and also an examination was made of it by experts on each side, and the report of the Elder Brethren during that test is—I had better take it as stated by the President—"That the light had a maximum intensity of five candles; and the lamp in which it burned was set in an indifferent lens; that no part of the flame was in the focus; that the flame was, to some extent, out of centre in the lens." Then they say that, "On a very clear and fine night where an ordinary red sea light would be visible at upwards of two miles—two miles with the naked eye and substantially more than two miles with the aid of binoculars—this light from 100 yards to 1000 yards was an ordinary red light which could be observed as a ship's red light would be observed, but that beyond 1000 yards—in fact at some distance within 1000 yards the light became invisible because of this defective intensity, and that very close at hand, within 100 yards, its construction had the effect of reducing the rays which proceeded from it to the form of a thin pencil of red light. Close at hand it was a thin pencil and as the light was removed to a great distance the power of the light was increased and overcame the mechanical difficulties in the diffusion of the light." The "thin pencil of light" was what the chief officer of the Slieve Gallion saw when he got close upon the Cumberland Queen; he did not see anything until then. I do not attach very much importance to the question of the "thin pencil of light," because in this test which was made with the accused light close to an ordinary red light the ordinary red light was shown at a very close distance to show a thin pencil too. I do not know whether that is always the case with ship's lights; I should have doubted it myself, but it was so on this occasion. If the result of this test is to be accepted as what could be seen upon that particular night, then it would appear that the red light ought to have been seen before the Cumberland Queen was seen, but the President, when the test was suggested, pointed out that the test might not be conclusive because you could not be quite certain that the state of the light at the time of the test was the same as at the time of the collision, and he did not seem to think himself that the test would be very much guidance to him. When it was suggested he said to Mr. Raeburn who was appearing for the Cumberland Queen: "You see, so many questions arise. There is the question of the state of your wick, the question of the amount of oil in your reservoir, and other questions. I am not sure it is helpful"; and afterwards he says: "My impression is that in the facts of this case it would not be a valuable piece of evidence in the case. I have mentioned the matter to the Elder Brethren, and they concur with my opinion." I think that last remark was probably referring to the advice that had been given to him as to the distance at which the loom could have been seen, but the first part was referring to the difficulty of reproducing at the test the actual conditions existing at the time of the collision. It is also the fact that some four or five hours before the collision this light had been found to be defective and had been taken down and cleaned by an ordinary seaman, the son of the master of the Cumberland Queen, and certainly, to my mind, his description of what he found wrong with the light is rather difficult to understand; but at any rate there had been something wrong, and if it were the fact—I do not know whether it was or not—that he had not thoroughly cleaned it when he did take it down for the purpose of cleaning and wiping, the light would be made worse. What the exact state of things as to the light on this particular night was the President has not found, and I should have less difficulty in dealing with the case if he had found it; but forming the best judgment I can upon what he did find with regard to it, I think the proper conclusion to be drawn from his judgment is that he did not find that the light could, or ought to, have been seen at any reasonable distance. It must be remembered also with regard to the test that the test was made by skilled persons, who knew in what direction to look for the light, who were looking in that direction, and who were guided as to the direction by the ordinary red light being placed close to the accused light in order to guide them as to the direction in which to look; and apparently there was a considerable difference of opinion amongst the experts who examined it, either at that test or another, as to the distance at which the light could be seen. The experts on behalf of the Cumberland Queen could see it much more distinctly and at a much greater distance than the experts called for the Slieve Gallion; perhaps that is not altogether to be wondered at, but I am taking the test made by the Elder Brethren.

Now the first thing that strikes me about it is this. The President, though he has found that the Slieve Gallion was to blame for not seeing the loom of the ship sooner than she did, has not found that she was to blame for not seeing the light, and also he says this: "So far as the lights are concerned the Slieve Gallion had not the proper warning," and he also says that which I have already quoted, that the light was one which did not come within measurable distance of complying with the regulations. I think the result of that, although he has not found it specifically, is that he does find the light was such that the Slieve Gallion is not to be blamed for not seeing it before she did; in fact, she never saw it until the collision was actually on the point of taking place, if it had not already taken place. But he has also found that that default did not contribute to the collision. Now on that point, I regret to say, I cannot agree with the President. Here is a vessel on the findings—as I think they are—navigating without a light which can be seen at a proper distance to warn other vessels that she is there. That is found in the passage I have already mentioned by the President. That, of course, puts the other vessel into a very much greater difficulty than she otherwise would have been, and that again I find is accepted by the President, because he says: "It is quite true it must be said in favour of those who were concerned that to pick up the loom of a vessel on a night such as they had to deal with is a totally different thing, and a much more exacting task than it is to observe a vessel proceeding under her lights." "Proceeding under her lights" I take it must mean proceeding under her lights, they being such as could be seen at a reasonable and proper distance, whether the full range or not. If a vessel is entirely in fault for a breach of the regulations and by that default puts the other vessel which has to navigate for her into an exceptionally difficult position, I do not think that she can escape blame, even if the other vessel does not do exactly what is right, and even indeed if she be guilty of a default in look-out, because I think it has been decided, and I think it is good law—in accordance with the case of The Ovingdean Grange (87 L. T. Rep. 15; 9 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 242; (1902) P. 208), and the principle laid down there, although that was not a case of lights—that a vessel which does put another into an exceptionally difficult position of this kind and continues to do so up to the time of the collision, cannot escape blame simply because the other vessel does not do what she ought to do. The other vessel may be to blame too, but the vessel which is navigating in this way in breach of the regulations cannot, in my opinion, escape blame for the collision, and I think, therefore, on any finding as to the Slieve Gallion the Cumberland Queen was here to blame for her bad light and was to blame in a way which contributed to the collision.

That leaves to be decided the question, whether the Slieve Gallion was to blame, and as to that I feel much greater difficulty. The President has found that she was to blame for not seeing the loom, and he thinks that the look-out—I shall deal with the look-outs in a moment—on the starboard side of the bridge of the Slieve Gallion was negligent in not observing the loom at any rate about a quarter of a mile off. In all probablilty if it had been observed at a quarter of a mile the collision might have been avoided by the Slieve Gallion. He has found that, as I have said, chiefly upon the advice of the Elder Brethren. Now the look-outs were a look-out man on the port side and a look-out man on the starboard side of the bridge, and in addition, the chief officer, whose evidence was this: He was on the bridge in charge, and he was asked: "Q. Did you yourself—speaking for yourself now—did you keep a sharp look-out?—Yes. Q. Did you keep a look-out on both sides, I mean, did you look both sides?—On both sides. Q. Both bows?—Both bows, from port to starboard, right round. Q. Had you anything else to do except to keep a look-out?—Nothing else except to keep a look-out and see the course was steered." I read that witness's evidence because he was a witness whom the President thought was a witness whose evidence ought to be accepted. He says: "So far as the chief officer was concerned, I accept all he said. If I may say so I was well impressed with his evidence. I think he came on duty to do his duty well and qualified to do it. I was quite satisfied there was no dullness on his part, and that in taking over the charge when the master went below he was quite alert and that in the multitude of his duties, he could not be blamed for what he failed to see." I think that, if I may say so, is rather a slip—to speak of the "multitude of his duties," because the evidence that he gave—and it was the only evidence there was, and the President accepted him as a truthful witness—was that all the duties that he had were to keep a look-out and to see that the course was steered, and he said that he did keep such a look-out on both bows. It is very difficult to see how the look-out on the starboard side can be negligent in not having seen the loom sooner than he did without also blaming the chief officer who was keeping a look-out on both sides. As a matter of fact, just before the Cumberland Queen was sighted at a distance of only a ship's length, which sighting was by the man at the wheel, the chief officer was looking on the port side, but then the quartermaster told him there was a vessel, he thought, on the starboard side, he looked round with his binoculars and he did see the loom of the Cumberland Queen quite close to him, as I have said.

What the President says is this: "On the whole I accept their evidence on the subject"—that is, the witnesses of the Slieve Gallion on the subject of their look-out. "Their look-out was not stronger than the evidence of Hughes makes it." Now, with the greatest respect, I think it is rather stronger, because I do not think you can neglect the chief officer, who was keeping a look-out ahead, and as he says, on both bows. Then he goes on: "And having regard to the evidence which Hughes gave and to the advice which I have received as to the limit within which it would be impossible on such a night that an efficient look-out should fail to observe the loom of a large vessel like the Cumberland Queen I have come to the conclusion that in the particulars that I have mentioned the Slieve Gallion had a defective look-out, and, therefore, was not complying with the regulations." I think that may be put in other words: That the look-out was a bad and negligent look-out on the Slieve Gallion. I leave for the moment the advice, which, really, I think was the most important factor in the President's decision, because he also does speak of having regard to the evidence which Hughes gave. He does not tell us exactly in what particulars the evidence of Hughes leads him to, or assists him in arriving at, his conclusion. Again, I should have found it more easy to deal with the case if I had had a specific finding on that point, but I think, reading Hughes's evidence, that probably the most important part, though perhaps not the whole of the evidence, to which he was referring, was the answer which Hughes gave to some questions put by the President himself at the end of the witness's examination. He asked him this: "Q. You could see her"—that is the Cumberland Queen—"at that time"—that is the time that the other look-out man called to him to jump out of the shelter in which he was stationed, because the other vessel was on the point of striking; the shelter was in fact swept away by the collision. The answer was "Yes. Q. Could you see if she had any lights showing?—I could. Q. Well, had she lights showing?—Well, I did not see any. Q. Why was that, was it because your eyes were failing you, or because they were not there?—No, I have good eyesight. Q. Had she any lights showing?—I do not say she had not any. Q. Were there any visible to you?—No." Now we come to the evidence on which I think the learned

President was relying: "Supposing you had been looking on the spot where she was, how far off do you think you could have seen her?—I could have seen her a good distance. Q. What would attract your attention to a vessel like that on a night such as you had? Would you find her by looking for her, or would you find her when she happened to come into sight?—When she happened to come into sight. Q. Was the night a night on which you would be likely to find a vessel by looking for her?—That is right. Q. You would?—Yes. Q. What we want to know is, if you would have found her if you were looking for her; were you looking for her?—No, I was not looking for her. Q. What were you looking for?—I was keeping a look-out for lights." There is another answer that I think it is possible may have been relied upon, though I hardly think it can have been. This man, who had been a gunlayer on the well-known destroyer Broke at the time of the Battle of Jutland, was asked this: "Do you think you could have seen the Cumberland Queen on that night so as to be able to train a gun on her at 6000 yards"—that means the loom of the Cumberland Queen—"A. Well, I would if I had been looking in that direction—I would have seen her all right." I do not know whether he meant to say that, but nobody can possibly accept it. It is not the case of either side that you could have seen the loom at 6000 yards, and I think he was only magnifying his skill as a gun-layer and making, possibly, a foolish answer, and I do not think that that is the part of the answer which the President considered important, but the other part that I have read I think very likely he did, and if that is to be taken to mean this: If I had been looking out I could have seen her, but I was not looking out because my only business was to look for lights, then I think he would have been wrong. Primâ facie no doubt the light is what you look for, but if he means that if you see no light you can dispense with any necessity to keep a further look-out I think he was wrong, but I do not read the evidence in that way, and as the President has not, if I may say so, told us specifically what the evidence was and what was the construction he put upon it, I feel bound to put on it my own construction as best I can, and I think that it really means this: If I had had my attention directed to that spot where the vessel in fact was I should have seen her at some considerable distance—"a good distance," is the expression; but I should have only done that if I had been looking for her there, and I was not looking for her there, because there had been nothing to direct my attention to the probability of a vessel being in that direction. I think that is what he meant. I was looking out for lights and prima facie that was his duty. As there was no light my attention was not directed to that particular spot, and therefore I was not looking out for her as I should have been if I had any indication that there was a ship there to look for. That, I think, is a fair construction of that evidence, and I do not think on that construction it shows a negligent or improper look-out.

But now there is a much more important point, which is this. The President took the advice of the Elder Brethren on the point at what distance ought an efficient look-out to have seen the loom of the Cumberland Queen. He says this: "I have consulted the Elder Brethren as to the range within which I might say with any confidence that a diligent and efficient look-out man on such a night as was described, and, as is insisted upon in the case of the Slieve Gallion, could be excused for not seeing the hull and sails—the outline or the loom as it is called—of the Cumberland Queen, and those who advise me cannot bring it down to a quarter of a mile." Now, it did occur to me, not knowing anything about these matters practically at all, that unless you have a more accurate and particular description of the weather than that it was a fine, clear, dark, overcast night it would be rather difficult for anybody who was not there to predict exactly at what distance the loom of a ship like the Cumberland Queen could have been seen, and it is to be noticed that the master of the Slieve Gallion—he was not on deck but he was asked as an expert witness, he was on deck three minutes before, and therefore he knew what kind of night it was—was asked rather as an expert, this question: "Q. What was there during the darkness of that night to render it likely or unlikely that you would see the loom of a ship?—Well, it was a very, very dark night with an overcast sky; it was not a clear dark night. Q. What sort of sea?—The sea was smooth. Q. Does that make a difference?—It does. Q. As to whether you are likely or not to see an oncoming ship?—Yes. Q. Well, how?—Well, I think you can see better with a little breeze—a better defined horizon. Q. That breaks the water?—Yes. Q. You say it was dark and overcast?—Yes. Q. Have you considered at all whether you would be likely to see the loom of a ship on a night like that more than 300ft. or 400ft. away?—You would not see her any more than that—not much more—not going at sixteen knots. Q. Well, taking her as she was, and you as you were?—Yes. Q. Have you considered it at all before you came into the witness box?—No, I have not." These were questions asked by the learned President. That was the evidence of a man no doubt interested, because he was the master of the accused ship, but the evidence of a man of experience who actually knew what the conditions were upon that night; but as this advice had been given to the President by the Elder Brethren, and I think is really the foundation of his judgment against the Slieve Gallion, I thought it right to consult our Assessors on the matter, and I put to them these questions: "The night is found to be a dark, clear, overcast night"—I took those words from the President's judgment. There is also information in the weather reports as to the visibility of lights. The weather reports were put in, and they gave indications of the visibility of the Skerries Light, and, I think, some other lights. "Is it possible, on this information, to say that the loom of the Cumberland Queen could have been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile, or at an appreciably greater distance than that at which it was seen?" And what our Assessors tell us is that they consider it very doubtful, and I say, for what it is worth—and I do not think it is worth anything—that that agrees entirely with my own view. With simply a description of a night like this it is very difficult indeed, without having been there, to know exactly at what distance a loom could be seen, because although you may have two nights which might be fairly described as fine, clear, dark, overcast nights, the amount of visibility on one night may differ very much from the amount of visibility on the other, and I think, if I may say so with the greatest possible respect, that the advice which was given to the President was rather more positive than the circumstances and the information in the possession of the court justified, and I feel bound to act—I should feel bound to act anyhow, and I feel bound to act still more because it is my own view—on the advice that it is very doubtful, unless you were there, whether you can say positively that the loom could have been seen at the distance mentioned by the President. The question therefore arises in those circumstances, in that doubtfulness, and in the circumstances of the Slieve Gallion having been misled by the action of the Cumberland Queen and by that action deprived of the warning that she ought to have had from the light, is it possible to say that the look-out—I take the whole look-out, not only Hughes, the starboard look-out, but the look-out on the Slieve Gallion—was defective, and that there was a negligent and bad look-out? I do not think that it is, and, therefore, I think the Slieve Gallion ought not to be held to blame for a bad look-out in these circumstances. The Cumberland Queen was obviously to blame in about as many respects as she could be. She came into court with an entirely false case; she had a light which I think I am justified in saying the President has found did not afford any proper assistance to the Slieve Gallion, and that, in my opinion, was the real cause of the collision, and, therefore, although with great diffidence, as I am differing from the learned President's judgment, I think this appeal should be allowed, and that the Cumberland Queen should be held alone to blame for the collision, and that will involve also, of course, the costs here and below.

Atkin, L.J.—The Cumberland Queen at the time this collision happened, undoubtedly was committing a breach of the regulations, because her port light was defective, and defective to a quite extraordinary degree. Taking it at the very best which can be said for her, which I think would fairly represent the circumstances of the trial, when the lamp had been trimmed and lighted by an experienced lamp-trimmer of Trinity House, the range of the port light was not more than half a mile, that is to say, it was about 25 per cent. of of the range that was required by the regulations, and, undoubtedly, if the absence of the light caused the collision, there can be only one answer as to whether the Cumberland Queen should be held to blame or not.

Now the question, and the material question, that arises is whether or not the absence of the light did cause the collision, and what is suggested, and what, I think, has been found, is, that it did not cause the collision because in spite of the defect of the light the Cumberland Queen could have been picked up, or should have been seen, by those on board the Slieve Gallion, if they had maintained an efficient look-out in time to enable the Slieve Gallion to perform what was undoubtedly her duty and keep out of the way of the Cumberland Queen, and, of course, if they could have seen her at such a distance, light or no light, then the absence of the light would not have caused the collision, because the object of a light is merely to indicate that the vessel is there, and if you can see the vessel, even without the light, in time to act there is no need for the light, and action must be taken. Therefore, to my mind, the first question is whether or not it was possible for those on board the Slieve Gallion, if they had kept an efficient look-out, to have seen the Cumberland Queen at a distance sufficient to enable them to avoid the collision? Now they did in fact see her, according to their story, at about 300ft. off, and it is not suggested that if they could only see the vessel at that time and at that distance they omitted to do anything which they ought to have done or that they did anything which they ought not to have done; in other words, the Slieve Gallion would not be responsible for the collision. But it is said that even assuming there was no light at all, the loom of the vessel coming without a light could have been observed at a distance of about a quarter of a mile. I think that some distance such as that is almost the closest that you could bring the Cumberland Queen to the Slieve Gallion so as to give the Slieve Gallion sufficient time to act—I will assume a little nearer. That undoubtedly is a very material question, because it not only deals with this question as to whether or not the fault of the Cumberland Queen caused the collision, but it also covers the question as to whether or not those on board the Slieve Gallion were keeping an efficient look-out, and therefore one has to consider the finding of the learned President in that respect. What he has found is this: He had been advised that the loom could be seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile or more, certainly at a quarter of a mile, and on the basis that the loom could have been seen at a distance of a quarter of a mile he says the man on the look-out did not see it until 300ft. away, and that indicates to me that the look-out was not an efficient look-out, and I have no doubt at all that he bases his finding upon that question as to the limit of visibility of the sailing ship, because one passage in the judgment, which I think has not been read, is this—he is dealing with the question of look-out, and he says: "So far as the port look-out man was concerned, he had that quarter to attend to, and he was attending to it, and was very vigilant. Can the same be said with regard to the look-out man on the starboard side? He was in the box and gave his evidence to the best of his ability. He certainly did not establish affirmatively that he was giving a diligent and sufficient look-out." I am not quite sure what that really means; I do not think it is a finding that he established from his evidence that he was keeping a bad look-out. "A great deal depends"—this is the passage I want to read—"in forming an opinion as to the character of his look-out, upon the limit of visibility of a sailing ship of the type of the Cumberland Queen on a night such as the night in question," and then he proceeds to discuss it and to state the advice he has received from his advisers, the Elder Brethren. Now the Master of the Rolls has read the advice that we have received—which, I think, is different advice from that received by the President, and acting upon that advice—if it is to be accepted, and I do accept it—that is to say, the advice that we have received—it seems to me that the whole substratum of the President's finding on this point has disappeared, because then it becomes very doubtful as to whether or not the Cumberland Queen could have been seen at a greater distance than about 300ft., and if it could not have been seen at a distance of more than 300ft. two things seem to follow: one is that there was nothing that could have been done on the part of the Slieve Gallion to avoid the collision; another is that there is no evidence of an inefficient look-out on her part, and therefore no breach of the regulations on her part, because, as I have said, the ground for saying that there was a bad look-out is that the ship could have been observed a quarter of a mile away; they did not see her until 300ft. away, therefore you cannot have been looking. That disposes of the first proposition and you obviously have no evidence of a bad look-out. The only other evidence of a bad look-out is that upon which it seems to me quite plain, and the President in his judgment makes it quite plain he would not have acted, if it had been left by itself, namely, the answers made by Hughes who was the look-out on the starboard side, and, I think, very naturally, because the evidence of Hughes as reported seems to me to indicate that his answers are not to be relied upon. I doubt very much whether he understood the bearing of the question, or understood what was really being put to him, but if he did, it is quite plain at any rate that he largely exaggerated his powers, and, therefore, he is an unreliable witness upon the very point which is used against him, namely, as to what his powers of vision were in that particular respect. Therefore, it appears to me that on this question about the loom of the vessel, which is the ground, to my mind, upon which the President has decided, upon the advice that we have received we are bound to come to the conclusion that in fact there was no evidence of an inefficient look-out on board the Slieve Gallion and that the ship could not have been observed at a greater distance than about 300ft., and, therefore, the collision was caused by the fault of the Cumberland Queen.

But the question does not really rest there, and it cannot be rested entirely upon that, and it is as to this part of the question in the case that I have felt very considerable difficulties—that is the question of the light, because, whether the loom could have been observed at 300ft. or not, if, in fact, there was a light that could have been observed at a quarter of a mile or so, then the whole of the inferences which were drawn in respect of the power of seeing the loom can be drawn, and to my mind should be drawn, in reference to seeing the light. Now we have no finding from the President in respect of the light, and the question, as I say, does present undoubted difficulties. The evidence of the trial of the light is that when it was tested under the conditions which are mentioned—favourable conditions to the light—then it could be seen at a range of about half a mile, and if it could be seen, as I have said, even at a quarter of a mile range, I imagine there would be great difficulty in acquitting the Slieve Gallion of blame. But I think this has got to be said, not as a matter of law but, as I think, a plain question of drawing the right inference of fact: If a ship is found to have had a defective light, an extremely defective light, and there is a question as to at what range it could have been seen, and it is clear that, at any rate, the range was defective to 75 per cent., it is plain, to my mind, that there is a very substantial burthen thrown upon the ship of showing, if she says: Well, you could have seen the light half a mile or for a quarter of a mile off; that, in fact, that light could be observed at that particular distance which she alleges. She starts with a defective light—she starts with an admittedly very defective light—and it appears to me that there is a very serious burthen cast upon her of showing what the distance is at which the light could have been seen, if she desires to cast the blame upon the other ship. To my mind that burthen, on the whole, is not discharged in this case. We do not know anything about the light in itself except as a result of the test, but we do know that there was a look-out on board the Slieve Gallion. We do know that the chief officer was keeping a look-out and had not seen any light; we do know that, upon any footing, the starboard look-out man, Hughes, was keeping a look-out for lights and did not see the light, and we do know that the quartermaster at the helm only picked her out by the loom and did not pick her out by the light, and we know that, apparently, no light was visible, no genuine light, once she had been picked up at 300ft. I do not attach so much importance to that because the evidence of the test was that, apparently, with a light burning and visible at half a mile range, still within 100 yards you would only see a thin pencil of light; but upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that in this case there is no evidence that the light could have been seen at all, so as to have guided a man on the look-out on the Slieve Gallion. Now, if that is so, the same result follows, as I have said in reference to the loom, namely, that there is no evidence that the look-out on the Slieve Gallion ought to have picked up this vessel any earlier than in fact they did. The result of that will be that in fact, first of all, there is no evidence of an inefficient look-out. If there were other independent evidence of an inefficient look-out it would still prevent the Slieve Gallion from being affected, because even if there had been an efficient look-out there would have been nothing for them to have seen earlier than at this distance of about 300ft. I think it follows from that that the Cumberland Queen must be held alone to blame.

I must say I have no compunction in coming to that conclusion once I am forced to come to it by the facts, because it is perfectly obvious that with that light in that condition in the Irish Channel she was a very serious danger to navigation, and we find her coming into court in order to protect herself by a certainly perjured tale. I myself am a little surprised, under any circumstances, that she was allowed any costs at all on that finding by the learned President, and I think that she alone ought to be held to blame.

I should like to add this: Once one comes to this conclusion it becomes unnecessary to consider the question as to whether or not, even if the Slieve Gallion could have picked her up earlier than at a quarter of a mile, she could then have escaped her liability. All I can say about that is that as at present advised it seems to me that even so there would be a continuing negligence on the Cumberland Queen's part, namely, the absence of light, which, at even a quarter of a mile, put the Slieve Gallion in a position of exceptional difficulty, and which would, at any rate, have contributed to the accident; but in view of the advice we have received it seems to me to follow that the Cumberland Queen was alone to blame.

Younger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I desire to add only a few words by way of explanation of the conclusion at which, along with my Lord and the Lord Justice, I have arrived, that the Cumberland Queen was alone to blame for this collision.

The learned President, as I understand his judgment, has arrived at the decision that the Slieve Gallion was alone to blame upon two grounds, which he states towards the end of his judgment. The first was that he was of opinion that the look-out upon the Slieve Gallion must not be regarded as having been stronger than the evidence of Hughes made it, and his second ground of decision was that he was advised by the Elder Brethren that on the night in question the loom of a vessel like the Cumberland Queen should have been visible to those keeping a look-out on board the Slieve Gallion at a distance of not less than a quarter of a mile, a distance which I think it must be taken the President was of opinion would have been sufficient to enable the Slieve Gallion by ordinary care and skill to avoid the collision. Now those are both, in a sense, findings of fact, although the second is based upon technical advice; but I should not, myself, presume to question them and to arrive at a contrary conclusion of my own unless I felt myself able to do so by applying to the facts of the case the standard of truth and accuracy which, with reference to other witness, and particularly the chief officer, the President has, in his judgment, himself set. It is by applying that standard to that evidence so approved by the President that I have reached the conclusion at which I have arrived. I think, when one reads that evidence, one must feel that the President failed to attach sufficient weight to it, particularly to the evidence of the chief officer. I think that he himself would not have been able to discount that evidence on which he placed such complete reliance to the extent he did had he not been under the misapprehension, which the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, that at the relevant moment the chief officer was engaged in a multitude of duties which precluded him from keeping a look-out as vigilant as that which might have been expected from a responsible witness of his capacity and integrity. When one refers to his evidence one finds, as the Master of the Rolls has already pointed out, that at the moment not only was he, as he says, keeping a sharp look-out on both sides, but that at the time he had nothing else to do except to keep a look-out and see the course that was steered.

In these circumstances, we find that this vessel, the Cumberland Queen, was first seen by the steersman. It is, I suppose, a matter of fair observation that it was not in fact the primary duty of the steersman to be looking out for vessels like the Cumberland Queen, but if, in point of fact, it did happen that this steersman whose evidence appears to be perfectly reliable, was at the moment on the look-out and did see the Cumberland Queen, then, I think, it is a little difficult to arrive at the conclusion which seems to be implicit in the learned President's judgment, that somebody other than the steersman on the look-out and being the look-out man, would have, and ought to have, seen this vessel at an earlier moment. Further, I think that the terms in which the steersman, the quarter-master, announced the discovery by him of the Cumberland Queen are not without some significance. He says: "I think I see the loom of a vessel," or words to that effect—a certain element of doubt, confirmed by the fact that the chief officer apparently saw this loom of a vessel through his glasses, which he at once applied to the place pointed by the steersman where he saw it. That, to my mind, apart altogether from the evidence of Hughes, is a strong primâ facie case going to show that at that moment there was a vigilant and effective look-out being kept on board the Slieve Gallion which did not depend on the evidence of Hughes at all, and, therefore, that the look-out was much stronger than the evidence of Hughes made it; and on that ground, it seems to me, the first portion of the President's finding is open to criticism, judged by, as I have put it, the standard of accuracy set by him with reference to the witnesses, and particularly the chief officer, to whom I have referred. But then, when one comes to consider the evidence of Hughes, I think that this observation may fairly be made. There are passages in his evidence which it is, I think, impossible to understand, except upon the footing that he was a witness who was liable to exaggeration with reference to his own physical capacity of vision or otherwise; but when one compares Hughes's evidence with the evidence of the quarter-master and of the first officer, I think that portion of the evidence which is most in harmony with all that is deposed to on this occasion is the part of it in which, in answer to the President, Hughes indicated the difficulty that he had in accurately determining the size, shape and character of this vessel, the Cumberland Queen, after her presence had been brought to his notice by the intimation made by the quartermaster and the first officer; and when you take that also in conjunction with the evidence of the man that the darkness of the night in question was such that the visibility of an unlighted vessel like the Cumberland Queen would not be greater than the distance at which she was first seen, you have, as it appears to me, a body of positive evidence supporting the view put forward by the Slieve Gallion, that in fact there was, at the moment when this vessel became visible, a vigilant look-out being maintained on board of her, relieving her from all imputations in respect of negligence for not keeping a look-out at that moment. Further, I think it is fair to say this: Mr. Raeburn, quite properly, in supporting his case before us, stated that throughout, or anyhow, in the court below, with reference to Hughes, his case had been that Hughes was asleep. I think it is well to point out this, that when the chief officer was being examined and cross-examined, and when Hughes was being cross-examined in the court below, the case which was being presented to the court by the Cumberland Queen was not that a vigilant look-out was not being kept on board the Slieve Gallion as a primary case, but it was this: That the Slieve Gallion, in a misty night, was going at the rate of sixteen knots when no look-out would have been of any use. In other words, the case which at that moment those appearing for the Cumberland Queen hoped to be able to establish was a case which, on the judgment of the President, had it been made good, would, as he says, have involved the highest degree of recklessness. Now, I think, myself, that if a case of that kind is being presented to the court at a moment when the witnesses on the other side are being cross-examined and that that cross-examination is, to put it at its lowest, primarily directed towards obtaining evidence which will be at least consistent with that case, one looks at it narrowly if afterwards that cross-examination is relied upon for the purpose of establishing, not that the Cumberland Queen could not have been seen, but that it was not seen because the witness himself was asleep. In my judgment, the cross-examination and the evidence of Hughes do not justify any such finding, and I do not, myself, think from the way in which the President has dealt with the evidence of Hughes, that he intended so to find.

Accordingly, it appears to me that the first ground upon which the President proceeded may be displaced by reference to the rest of the evidence not held by him to have been inaccurate or otherwise than truthful.

With regard to the second ground upon which he proceeded, namely, the advice which he received from those who were there to advise him, we have, as my Lord has intimated, received somewhat different advice from those who advise us, and if I may respectfully say so, I do—knowing personally, of course, nothing of these matters, but judging only by the probabilities of this case—most heartily accept the advice which we have received, confirmed, as it appears to me, by the definite evidence of those on board the Slieve Gallion to which I have referred.

One question only remains, namely, the question of lights. With reference to that, I, for myself, feel on stronger ground, because here, I think, I can accept wholeheartedly the decision of fact, the finding of fact of the learned President. It appears to me that, although he has not said so in words, he must have been of opinion that the red light on board the Cumberland Queen was not visible in any effective sense because had he not been of that opinion it would have been quite unnecessary for him to trouble himself about the loom of the vessel. Accordingly, I think that the question of lights is really disposed of by that implicit finding of fact on the part of the President, and the result is that, in my judgment, this collision was directly and solely due to the Cumberland Queen navigating these seas on a dark night, a practically unlighted ship.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

ADMIRALTY BUSINESS

Dec. 10, 17, 19, 29, 1921, and Feb. 15, 1922.

(Before HILL, J. and Elder Brethren.)

THE HERMIONE. (a)

King's ship—Ship's agent—Salvage claim by the ship's officers and crew—Instructions to agent to prosecute the claim—Settlement—Authority of the agent—Naval Agency and Distribution Act 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 116).

The authority of an agent for the officers and crew of a King's ship, under the Naval Agency Act 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 116) is not wider than that of a solicitor, and does not therefore extend to the settlement of claims by the ship's officers and crew without their express authority.

Thus a ship's agent who settles a claim by the officers and crew of a King's ship for salvage reward without the consent, express or implied, of the commanding officer, is liable in damages to the extent of the award which the officers and crew would have received if the salvage claim had been duly prosecuted, less the amount received under the terms of settlement.

The agent has no authority to settle the claims of the officers (other than the commanding officer) and crew without their instructions when the commanding officer has been giving instructions on their behalf as well as his own, notwithstanding that the commanding officer takes an exaggerated view of their claims.

THIS was an action brought by Commander Noakes, R.N., on behalf of himself and the officers and crew of H.M.S. Daffodil, against Stillwell and Sons, who were at all material times the only appointed ship's agents for H.M.S. Daffodil, under the Naval Agency and Distribution Act 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 116). The plaintiff's claim was for a declaration fixing the amount of salvage award proper for certain salvage services performed by them to the steamer Hermione in April 1917, and for an order that the defendants should pay to them such sum less the sum of 100*l.*, which the plaintiff had already received under the terms of a settlement of his claims in respect of these services effected by the defendants, as the plaintiff alleged, within his authority.

The plaintiff by his statement of claim alleged that on the 14th April 1917 and subsequent days they performed certain salvage services (particulars of which were alleged in the statement of claim, and appear, so far as relevant, in the judgment of the learned judge) to the steamer Hermione, which resulted in benefit to her, and in her cargo, to the value of 76,359*l.*, being saved. The statement of claim further alleged that by letter dated the 23rd April 1917 the plaintiff, on behalf of himself and the officers and crew of H.M.S. Daffodil, instructed the defendants to put forward a claim for salvage in respect of these services. In or about June 1917 the permission of the Admiralty to put forward the claim was received, and was forwarded by the plaintiff to the defendants on the 18th June 1917. The defendants employed as their agent Mr. Arthur Tyler, solicitor, to act for the commander, officers, and crew of the Daffodil, and on the 23rd June 1917 a writ in rem was issued in the Admiralty Division of the High Court against the owners of the steamship Hermione, her cargo and freight. Service of the writ was accepted by Messrs. William A. Crump and Sons, solicitors for the defendants in the said action, and Messrs. Crump gave an undertaking to appear, but refused to give an undertaking to prove values or put a bail. Upon receipt of the plaintiff's instructions to put forward a claim for salvage and (or) after the refusal of Messrs. Crump to prove values or to put in bail, the defendants and (or) their agent, Mr. Tyler, negligently and in breach of their duty failed to take the necessary or any steps to arrest the cargo which had been salved from the Hermione, and (or) to obtain security for the claim of the plaintiff and (or) to enforce the said undertaking, to appear and (or) to proceed in personam against the defendants. On or about the 18th Nov. 1919 the defendants and (or) their agent, Mr. Tyler without communicating to the plaintiff the offer of settlement, negligently and in breach of their duty, and contrary to the express instructions of the plaintiff, contained in letters to the defendants dated the 5th July and the 14th Aug. 1919, accepted the sum of 100*l.* and 10*l.* 10*s.* costs in full satisfaction and settlement of the plaintiff's claim, the sum of 100*l.* did not represent a fair and reasonable remuneration for the said services.

The defendants by their defence admitted that at all material times they were the duly appointed ship's agents for H.M.S. Daffodil under the Naval Agency and Distribution Act 1864. They denied that the plaintiff rendered services to the Hermione as alleged, or that the cargo of the Hermione was saved or that the Hermione was benefited, saying that the plaintiff acted negligently in handling her. The defendants admitted that they received a letter from the plaintiff dated the 23rd April 1917, but denied that it contained any instructions to put forward a claim for salvage. No instructions to put forward a claim and no information upon which to base such claim was received by the defendants until the receipt of a letter from the plaintiff dated the 18th June 1917. The defendants admitted that they took no steps to arrest the cargo salved from the Hermione, or to obtain security for the claim of the plaintiff or to proceed in personam against the defendants in the said action. Such failure did not in the circumstances of the case amount to or constitute negligence or breach of duty. By letter dated the 28th Feb. 1918, Mr. Tyler requested Messrs. Crump, the solicitors for the owners of the Hermione to give an undertaking to prove values. Messrs. Crump refused to give any such undertaking and stated that there were no values to prove. The plaintiff had acted negligently in failing to obtain a salvage bond from the master of the Hermione, or otherwise preserve his claim against the Hermione and her cargo, as it was his duty in the interest of his officers and crew to do. Appearance was entered by Messrs. Crump on the 6th March 1918. Upon the advice of counsel the defendants took no steps to proceed to search for and arrest with a view to appraisement the cargo alleged by the plaintiff to have been saved by the officers and crew of H.M.S. Daffodil, and they did not abandon the said action in rem against the ship, cargo, and freight, and proceed in personam against the owners of the cargo alleged by the plaintiff to have been saved. Under the circumstances then known to the defendants they acted reasonably, and without negligence and bonâ fide in the best interests of the plaintiff, his officers and crew. The defendants further admitted that they settled the action against the Hermione. In so doing they acted upon the advice of counsel, who advised that the plaintiff had no chance of success against the owners of the Hermione, and had no prospect of success under the circumstances of the case against the owners of the cargo. The sum of 100*l.* was a fair and reasonable remuneration for the services rendered by H.M.S. Daffodil. The defendants denied that they accepted the offer of 100*l.* in settlement without communicating it to the plaintiff, or that they were negligent or guilty of breach of duty in accepting it, or that they accepted it contrary to the express instructions of the plaintiff. The letters of the 5th July 1919 and the 14th Aug. 1919 contained no express instruction as alleged. In reply to the plaintiff's letter of the 14th Aug. 1919 the defendants, acting under the advice of counsel, informed the plaintiff by letter dated the 4th Sept. 1919 that they were in agreement with the opinion of counsel, which had previously been sent to the plaintiff, and advised the plaintiff, in reply to his specific inquiry, to accept the sum of 100*l.* in settlement, failing an increased offer. The plaintiff failed to reply to the letter, whereby he intimated his agreement with the advice given by the defendants and his willingness that the defendants should settle the action. The defendants, acting as reasonable men and without negligence and in good faith, were entitled to believe and in fact did believe that they were authorised by the plaintiff expressly to negotiate for a settlement of the said action on the basis of 100*l.* as a minimum figure. The defendants did in fact, through their agent, Mr. Tyler, endeavour to get an increased offer from Messrs. Crump, but on their failure to get any increase in the offer, on the 18th Nov. 1919, no communication having been received from the plaintiff either instructing them to the contrary, or at all, they accepted the sum of 100*l.* together with 10*l.* 10*s.* costs, in full settlement and satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim in the action.

Alfred Bucknill held a watching brief for the Salvage Association.

Feb. 15.—HILL, J. said:—In this action the plaintiff, as former commander of H.M.S. Daffodil, suing on behalf of himself and those who were her officers and crew on the 14th and 15th April 1917, claims damages against the defendants, alleging that the defendants, by themselves and their agents, Mr. Arthur Tyler, solicitor, were negligent in the prosecution of a salvage claim; and further, that they compromised that claim for the sum of 100*l.* and 10*l.* 10*s.* costs, contrary to the express prohibition of the plaintiff. The defendants were appointed by the plaintiff to be ship's agents under the Naval Agency Act 1864 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 116) Mr. Tyler was a solicitor; he died on the 30th April 1919, in the course of the proceedings, and was succeeded by the firm of Arthur Tyler and Co., Mr. Arthur Tyler was instructed by the defendants in the salvage proceedings which were instituted on the plaintiff's instructions, and appeared on the writ as solicitors for the plaintiffs in those proceedings, who were described as the commander, officers and crew of H.M.S. Daffodil. It is admitted in the pleadings in the present case that Mr. Tyler acted as agent for the defendants. But for that admission I should have been of the opinion that he was not an agent of the defendants, but only of those persons whose solicitor he was, appointed by the defendants in their capacity as ship's agents, but acting not for the defendants, but for the plaintiffs upon the record. In view of the admission, I deal with the case on the basis that Mr. Tyler was the agent of the defendants, but on the facts as I find them, this point is not of importance in the present case. I may say that there is no action brought against Mr. Tyler. There are two distinct breaches of duty alleged: (1) Negligence in the prosecution of the salvage action; (2) settling it contrary to an express prohibition. I have come to the conclusion that there was no negligence on the part of either the defendants or Mr. Tyler or his successors in the prosecution of the salvage action. And as to the charge of settling it contrary to an express prohibition, there is no doubt at all that Messrs. Tyler and Co. had the authority of the defendants to settle as they did; and the only question left is, whether the defendants gave that authority contrary to the express prohibition of the plaintiff. I base my finding that Messrs. Tyler & Co. had the defendants' authority to settle upon the correspondence, which shows a previous authority [the learned judge referred to the correspondence] and a ratification (if there was not a previous authority, which there was). [The learned judge again referred to the correspondence.] As regards the defendants I have, with some hesitation, come to the conclusion that they authorised the settlement contrary to an express prohibition, and that, while in the absence of such prohibition, they could not, in all the circumstances of the case, have been held negligent to settle as they did, yet they were guilty of a breach of duty in settling contrary to an express prohibition and are liable in damages for the consequences. Their duty under the Act, and apart from the Act as plaintiff's agents, was to do all things necessary or proper in the course of the salvage claim. That in my view included an authority to settle a salvage claim, provided it was done reasonably, but the authority to settle in a ship's agent is not wider than that of a solicitor, and does not extend to a settlement on terms forbidden by the principal.

The main facts of the case are as follows: On the 14th April 1917 the steamship Hermione, homeward bound with a cargo of wheat, frozen meat, and other goods, was mined in the neighbourhood of the Coningbeg Light vessel. Her crew took to the boats. The Daffodil, a sloop of 868 tons, with a complement of ninety-one, was on duty near by, and went to the assistance of the Hermione. The Hermione was badly holed. No. 1 hold was full of water, No. 2 had 18ft. of water, there was also a crack in the upper part amidships, the windlass was disabled; she was badly by the head. An officer, engineer, and men from the Daffodil boarded her, as did the master and boatswain of the Hermione. The pumps were got to work and prevented the water from increasing. The Daffodil took the Hermione in tow, and brought her to an anchorage in Dunmore Bay. The Hermione's own crew returned, and the Daffodil left for duty outside. An armed trawler remained alongside. The intention of the plaintiff was to return and take the Hermione further in on the following morning and beach her. About half-past ten in the evening the bulkhead between Nos. 1 and 2 holds was heard cracking, and the water in No. 2 rapidly increased, with the result that the Hermione sank forward, and the engine and stokehold were flooded. On the following morning the Daffodil returned, and her men spent the day in breaking out a quantity of rubber and ipecacuanha, which formed part of the cargo. This the Daffodil landed. A number of horses on board were landed by the steamship Arklow. The ship and the rest of the cargo were subsequently taken in charge by the Salvage Association acting for the underwriters. The bulk of the cargo, including all the frozen meat and most of the wheat, was worthless, but other parts of the cargo were landed and forwarded to destination. The value of the salved portion was considerable. The ship became a constructive total loss, but a few movables were saved. Expenses were incurred by the Waterford Harbour Commissioners in breaking up the wreck, and apparently these were in part recouped out of the value of the cargo salved, I presume under powers of the Waterford Harbour Commissioners to treat ship and cargo as a common fund for recouping expenses.

What the Daffodil succeeded in doing was to bring the Hermione from a place where she would have sunk in deep water to a place where she sank in shallow water, so that part of her cargo could be salved. They further broke out and landed the rubber and ipecacuanha. That is the only part of the cargo of which they completed the salvage. The services were short, the towage seven hours, the distance was twenty-five miles, the weather was fine. The Daffodil was exposed to some extra risk from mines and possibly submarines while towing. She had three armed trawlers acting as escort. As between the Daffodil and the Hermione, each accuses the other of negligence. The Daffodil says that the Hermione was negligently allowed to sink at anchor in Dunmore Bay. The Hermione says the Daffodil ought to have taken assistance of a pilot which was offered and ought to have beached the Hermione at once. Now that the case has been tried out, and the facts investigated, I am unable to find negligence. I am unable to find that these charges of negligence are made out. No. 2 hold was full of wheat. The bulkhead between Nos. 1 and 2 must have been damaged by the explosion, for water was flowing in to No. 2. I am advised that the wet wheat in No. 2 would rapidly swell and be likely to cause the damaged bulkhead to give way. I accept the evidence of the master of the Hermione that there was a sudden increase of water which no pumps could have controlled. It was said that the master ought to have used the trawler alongside to beach the ship, but it is very doubtful whether there was time to do anything effective. I cannot find that the sinking was due to the negligence which is charged against the master and crew of the Hermione. On the other hand, the master was satisfied to have the Hermione brought to anchor where she was, and the plaintiff, who did not know that the cargo in No. 2 was wheat, was not negligent in bringing the ship to an anchor instead of immediately beaching her; and, except to assist in beaching, the help of a pilot was not required. There was no negligence of the plaintiff or his men. The sinking was a misfortune, both for the owners and underwriters and for the plaintiff and his officers and crew. Had the service been completed up to the point of beaching, it would have been valuable. As regards the cargo, whether the Hermione, which was twenty-eight years old, would in any event have escaped becoming a constructive total loss, is more doubtful, but much more of the cargo would have been saved. The sinking turned the service into one of very moderate success whereby a comparatively small part of the whole cargo was brought into greater comparative safety, and of that again a small part was actually brought into final safety by being landed by the Daffodil at Waterford. Even of what was actually saved, the commander, officers, and crew of a King's ship could look for no reward as to part, for the wheat was the property of the Crown, and in respect of it no action would lie in this court and no claim would be recognised by the Crown for services rendered by servants of the Crown.

Such, on the facts as now ascertained, was the service in respect of which the plaintiff was anxious to prosecute a claim. It was a good claim for what it was worth. In my opinion the suggestion that it had been lost by the failure of the plaintiff to hand over the rubber and ipecacuanha to the receiver of wreck is without foundation. The receiver of wreck in his letter makes no complaint of it, and I can see no ground for saying that when there are people representing the owners on the spot, as there were shipowners' agents at Waterford, the salvor forfeits his claim because he does not hand over the property salved to the receiver of wreck. On the other hand, it was not a certain claim, for it was always open to the suggestion, which, in fact, was made by Messrs. Crump and Son for the underwriters and owners as early as the 25th July 1917, that the plaintiff had improperly failed to beach the ship at once, a suggestion which we now know to be unsound, but which had to be considered by anyone who was advising the plaintiff.

I now come to the prosecution of the claim. A good deal of complaint was made as to delay in issuing a writ, failure to arrest and obtain bail and have values proved, and so forth. I need not investigate this closely. I do not find that there was any just cause of complaint in these respects. By the time the plaintiff gave adequate instructions, all or nearly all the salved cargo of any substantial value had been landed and forwarded to destination. But I do not think it is necessary to consider that matter further because I am clearly of opinion that no damage resulted from any such delay, if delay there was. A writ was issued; an undertaking to appear was given on the 6th March 1918; appearance was entered by Messrs. Crump and Son on the instructions of the Salvage Association, which represented both the owners of the Hermione and of the cargo interests other than the Government. The plaintiffs were therefore put in a position to proceed in personam and to obtain discovery, and the values would have been ascertained, and a judgment in personam would have resulted in payment of award and costs. Mr. Tyler twice took the opinion of counsel. The plaintiff does not complain of the particular counsel chosen. He frequently appeared for commanders, officers, and crews of King's ships. The first instructions consisted of the writ, which bore upon it the endorsement of undertaking to appear, a statement of the services with the log and chart, a bundle containing the Admiralty consent and the reports by the plaintiff and correspondence. They were put before counsel. The first opinion, given on the 13th April 1918, treated the case against the ship as hopeless, because she had become a total loss, and as to the cargo, assumed that only certain small values had been saved. Upon this opinion being submitted to the plaintiff, he wrote a long letter on the 10th June 1918, giving his views of the facts and referring to portions of the cargo salved as of the value of at least 10,000*l.* This letter, with the other papers, was put before counsel by a letter of the 18th June 1918, p. 62, and counsel gave a second opinion dated the 24th June 1918. He advised that there was no chance of success in respect of the ship, and that as to the salved cargo, apart from the difficulties of appraisement of a dispersed cargo, the plaintiff had lost his claim by not taking the necessary steps at the time of the salvage, by informing the receiver of wreck and obtaining a bond before the cargo was dispersed. Counsel, in coming to this opinion, was apparently misled by a prize salvage case of the Otway [unreported], and an Admiralty war order relating thereto. The Otway had no bearing at all, so far as I can see, upon a case in which a claim in personam had been made effective by the appearance of the owners of the property alleged to have been salved.

In view of these opinions of counsel, I am of opinion that Mr. Tyler and the defendants were justified in thinking that it was to the plaintiffs' interest that the action should be settled upon any terms that could be obtained; and if, in the unfettered exercise of their authority as solicitor and as ship's agents respectively, they had settled for 100*l.* and payment of 10*l.* 10*s.* costs, I do not think it could be said that they had acted negligently. It is said that they ought to have done more to ascertain the value of the cargo saved, but if the opinion of counsel was sound, it made no difference whether the cargo was worth more or less, and money spent in continuing the action until values were ascertained would only have been money thrown away. The settlement was not made until Nov. 1919, when it was obvious that Messrs. Crump would make no better offer.

Now comes the question whether the settlement was not made contrary to the express prohibition of the plaintiff. The answer depends on some half dozen letters which appear in the correspondence. [The learned judge referred to the correspondence] and upon the absence of a reply by the plaintiff, to the letter on p. . . . [The learned judge again referred to the correspondence]. In his long letter of the 10th June 1918, the plaintiff had said: "I still wish to prefer my full claim . . . and I request that you will not interpret the foregoing to any relinquishment of our claim," and then he went on: "I think these small values amount to a very considerable sum: I should say at least 10,000*l.* without taking the wreck into consideration. I should be very much obliged if you would carefully consider these remarks, and it is for you to say if there is any prospect of success in the High Court." Later on he expressed the hope "that you will be able to get some offer from the people who, without doubt, have made considerable gain out of the risks and labours of the Daffodil's crew. Without prejudice as to any further action we may take, we are of course entirely in your hands as to the legal position." The defendants wrote to the plaintiff on the second opinion of counsel. There were often delays in the correspondence because by this time the plaintiff was serving, I think, in the Eastern Mediterranean. On the 28th May the defendants wrote to the plaintiff: "Our solicitors inform us to-day that the defendants' solicitors have made a suggestion that if you are prepared to accept 100*l.* they will advise their clients to agree to this proposal. Would you kindly let us know whether this would be agreeable to yourself and the crew of H.M.S. Daffodil?" On the 5th July, he replied to that: "I do not think I should be justified in accepting the offer of 100*l.* In order to avoid a lot of expensive litigation, I would accept an offer of 10,000*l.* . . . I cannot agree with Captain Anderson's opinion." . . . [i.e., counsel's opinion]. "If you have no objection, I propose on my return to England to obtain independent advice, unless something better can be done, with reference to this claim." On the 26th July, Messrs. Stilwell write acknowledging receipt of the letter of the 5th inst.: "With reference to your estimate of the value of your claim for salvage, we regret that this is far in excess of the amount that the High Court or any arbitrator now awards, and venture to suggest that when you return to England you should call on our solicitors. . . . Of course, if you prefer to take an independent opinion, you are quite at liberty to do so." On the 14th Aug., Commander Noakes wrote first of all: "I definitely withdraw my offer on behalf of the ship's company of H.M.S. Daffodil to accept 10,000*l.*"; and then: "I request that you will be good enough to inform me the exact position in which this claim now stands:—(a) If you are in complete agreement with your counsel's opinion or not? (b) What further steps, if any, you propose to take? (c) If I have been informed of all the steps already taken? (d) If you recommend me to accept the 100*l.* offered by the owners?" Then he ends: "I will at once inform you on my return to England, which I expect will be shortly, so that this claim may be proceeded with." On the 4th Sept. Messrs. Stilwell wrote to him in reply to that: (1) "We agree with our counsel's opinion, he is now Attorney-General at Gibraltar; (2) the only step that we can suggest is to try to screw the owners to a more liberal offer; (3) we have informed you of all the steps so far taken; (4) failing any increased offer the 100*l.* had better be accepted."

That letter was received by the plaintiff in the Mediterranean towards the end of September; he sent no reply, and it was in that state of their instructions that the defendants authorised Messrs. Tyler to settle, and they did settle; giving up most of their own claim for costs, getting 10*l.* 10*s.* for costs from the other side and the 100*l.* which had originally been offered. The result was that the plaintiffs got 100*l.* and no costs at all chargeable to them because Messrs. Tyler gave up the difference between their own costs, which were said to have amounted in out-of-pockets to 60*l.* at this time, and the 10*l.* 10*s.* Messrs. Tyler accepted the 10*l.* 10*s.* in satisfaction of their costs. On the 19th Nov. Messrs. Stilwell wrote to Commander Noakes reporting the settlement. Again he ents no reply, came to England early in the following year, and the next letter from him was a letter from his present solicitors complaining of the settlement.

Taking all these letters up to the 4th Sept. 1919, coupled with the fact that the plaintiff sent no reply, can it be said that the plaintiff authorised the defendants, or by his conduct induced the defendants to believe that he had given them authority to settle or to make a settlement of the kind which was made? I think not. He had refused to accept 100*l.*, and proposed on his return to England to obtain independent advice, "unless something better can be done with reference to this claim." He has later on withdrawn his own absurd figure of 10,000*l.*, and asked whether the defendants recommended him to accept 100*l.* He did not assent to the accepting of 100*l.*, and in that letter said he expected to be in England shortly, so that the claim might be proceeded with. The defendants expressed in reply their opinion as to the wisdom of accepting the 100*l.*, but without receiving a reply, although the time for reply in the ordinary course had gone by, authorised a settlement. I cannot find in those matters, first of all, that the plaintiff authorised the settlement. It is to my mind quite clear he did not. Did he by his silence induce the defendants to believe that he had authorised it? Again, in face of the specific prohibition in the letters, I cannot find that by not replying to the last letter he led the defendants to suppose that they had authority. On this matter I may also add that it was not the want of a reply to their last letter which induced the defendants to do anything, because they had begun the final settlement before any reply could have been received. I think, though as I say, I came to the decision with some hesitation, I must find that the defendants settled in breach of their duty towards the plaintiff. It was said with truth that the defendants were agents, not only of Commander Noakes, but of his officers and crew, and they were also entitled to have some regard to this fact, that Commander Noakes was apparently a person who sometimes expressed very rash opinions, because in one of his letters he stated he did not mind if the whole of the award recovered was used up in costs, he still wanted to fight. It is also quite true that as agents for the officers and crew, the defendants had their interests to consider, but that gave them no authority to settle Commander Noakes's claim against his prohibition; and their only alternative, if they thought he was a wholly unreasonable man, would seem to me to be to communicate with him and the other people for whom they were acting and say: "Well, we cannot go on: we must cease to act as your agent." Therefore, I can see no way by which I can acquit them of a breach of duty.

Then I have to consider what are the damages. This again is a different point. The damages are the difference between the 100*l.* received and the sum which would have been recovered, less perhaps the difference between solicitor and client and party and party costs which the plaintiffs might have had to bear, had the salvage action been continued, and of course that might have been not a wholly negligible amount if the issue of negligence had been raised in the salvage action and had been fought out. Now the amount which would have been recovered, on the facts as we now know them, would not have been large in my judgment, but it would have been substantially more than 100*l.* It is not possible now to ascertain with exact precision the values of the property salved, and I must say that the plaintiff has given me very little assistance in ascertaining what they probably were. An official from the office of the Salvage Association was called, but he spoke only of the value of certain wheat and cases of preserved meat sold by the Salvage Association. He also produced the manifest and statement of insured values. Besides that, an officer of the Salvage Association was called who superintended the salvage operations, and his report was put in. There was also a statement by the receiver of wrecks of the values declared to the Customs and the goods landed. I should have thought that, long before this, the adjustment of the general average and salvage expenses must have been completed and the salved values proved. But I was not given the benefit of anything of the sort. I am left very much to conjecture. The wheat and frozen meat represented, according to the manifest, 2806 tons out of the total weight on board. The wheat was Government wheat and does not come into account. The frozen meat was only a cause of expense in getting rid of it; it was absolutely worthless. What was saved was fifty seven horses landed by the steamship Arklow at a salvage cost of 710*l.* Their value was put forward as 3000*l.* If one deducts the 710*l.*, one gets about 2300*l.* left after deducting the salvage paid to the Arklow. There were twenty four bales of rubber, consisting of 24½ tons landed by the Daffodil or one of the ships. The evidence was given of its value; that it was of good quality, and it was said only good quality rubber was being shipped at that time. I took that at about 8000*l.* There were thirty-six packages of ipecacuanha, of which no evidence was given, which was put forward as being worth 500*l.* I accept that. There were 179 bales of wool. Thirty-six are described in the manifest as arriving at Liverpool on the 27th April, "more or less damaged by sea water and heating"; and others were described in evidence as being wet and black. The costs of breaking them out and landing varied from 10*s.* to 40*l.* a bale. The insured value was 70*l.* a bale, and the declared value of the 130 bales at the Customs was 48*l.* all round. Well, I do not know; one must write these down very heavily from their damaged condition. I took about 4000*l.* as the value of the wool. There were 250 barrels of Premier Jus described in the manifest as arriving at Liverpool on the 27th April "apparently sound." The cost of breaking out and landing was 10*s.* a barrel. There were twenty-nine casks of sterine, which have been similarly described; and five casks of pickled meat similarly described. There is nothing to assist in arriving at these values. I tried to identify these particular items with the goods mentioned in the receiver's letter giving the values declared to the Customs and with any particular items in the statement of insured value, but one cannot identify them. A large quantity of packing house products are mixed up which probably included the Premier Jus and sterine, but I cannot get my feet on to any sure ground in ascertaining the value of these particular things. I think 1000*l.* was their value. Then there were 7585 cases of preserved meat, which were from the 'tweendecks and were landed at Dunmore East at a cost of 1*s.* 3*d.* per case, and were there loaded on the steamship Pine on the 2nd and 3rd May. There were 3014 more cases, part of 5337 cases, which were sold to a Mr. Mann at 20s. a case, as they lay on the ship, but these were under water. He gave 1*l.* a case and paid the owners 3014*l.* I took that figure as certain. The balance of the 5000 odd cases to be sold to him were seized or their proceeds were seized by the harbour authorities for wreck raising expenses. Then apart from those cases there are 7595 cases which had not been badly under water; they are spoken of as wet. Again, I have tried to get at either the insured value or the landed value of those. To my mind it is exceedingly difficult. The documents do not agree, and the matter has not been cleared up by the plaintiff. Taking the evidence of what was landed as 7585*l.* and adding to that 5000*l.*, I get 12,900*l.*, but the receiver gives 13,000*l.* odd as landed. The receiver gives the value as 45,000*l.* There were on board altogether, according to the manifest, 18,000*l.* The insured value of the total was 39,900*l.* I have done the best I could to get any results out of these figures, but I cannot; I am only making a guess. I take the values at 2*l.*, which is double what Mr. Mann paid for his, which were not so good. That gives 15,000*l.* for these. Now adding up all these figures, it will be found that what was saved comes to something over 35,000*l.*, or 36,000*l.*, or 37,000*l.*; it does not matter; it is substantially under 40,000*l.* I take that. No doubt there would have to be very considerable deductions made from that, but no claim has been made in respect of freight; it may be none was saved. Very likely it is not claimed because the expenses of forwarding the small parcels of cargo that were saved would eat up any freight there was upon them. I ignore the expenses on the one side and the freight on the other, and take it that the plaintiffs completed the salvage of property worth 8500*l.*; that is the rubber and ipecacuanha brought into greater comparative safety. In taking the property as being worth something under 40,000*l.*, I think I am being generous to the plaintiff.

Now what, in such circumstances, would the court have awarded the commander, officers and crew of a King's ship, remembering that nothing had to be awarded to the Daffodil as the instrument of salvage, and that only a personal award had to be made for the personal risk and exertions of the commander, officers and crew, and that in a case in which by the misfortune of the salvors, and of everybody the service had turned out to be one which saved only a small portion of the property at risk. I think the amount would necessarily have been a very moderate amount. At the outside I think, if I had been trying the case, I should not have given more than something between 500*l.* and 600*l.* I think something would have had to come off that for costs incurred by the plaintiff which would not have been recovered; and if (and I do not see why it should not) the issue of negligence had been fought, that might well have run into 50*l.* I think I shall be dealing with the plaintiff quite fairly if I say that, if the case had been continued and had been fought out, the net result would have been to give the plaintiff 500*l.* instead of 100*l.*; the damages therefore are 400*l.*, and for that amount I give judgment.

ACTION of limitation of liability.

The plaintiffs were Cory Lighterage Limited, owners of the steam tug Harlow and five lighters which were being towed by the Harlow at the time of the collisions causing the damage in respect of which the plaintiffs sought to limit their liability. The defendants were the owners of the steamship Dalton and all other persons claiming to have sustained damage by reason of the collision or collisions between the Harlow and her tow and the steamship Dalton on the 2nd Jan. 1921.

This limitation suit arose out of an action brought by Cory Lighterage Limited against the owners of the steamship Dalton claiming for damage to their tug Harlow and their lighters Agenor and Fifteen in tow of the Harlow at the time of the collision. The owners of the Dalton counterclaimed against Cory Lighterage Limited and their bail for damage sustained by the Dalton. Judgment in that action was pronounced on the 7th June 1921 by Hill, J. who found against the plaintiffs' claim and in favour of the defendants' counterclaim, pronouncing judgment against Cory Lighterage Limited and their bail. The judgment of Hill, J., in so far as it was material to this action, was as follows :

"The collision in this case happened early in the morning of the 2nd Jan. of this year in Barking Reach about abreast of Murrell's Rubbish Wharf, on the north side, which is just about the point marked "False Point" on the chart. The plaintiffs say it happened well north of mid-river. The defendants say it happened in mid-channel. The tug Harlow, 59 tons gross and 68ft. long, was proceeding up the river with five loaded, or partly loaded, barges in tow, ranged two, two, and one. The total length of the flotilla was about 300ft. The Harlow intended to drop one of the barges on the south side a little above Tripcock Point. The Dalton was 1275 tons gross, and 225ft. long, in ballast, and in charge of a pilot. She had left the pier on the north shore, which is unnamed on the chart and is next above Beckton Pier. Having backed and turned under her port helm, she was proceeding down river. The weather was fine and clear, the wind about south-west, a fresh westerly breeze, the tide just quarter flood, half a knot to one knot, with little, if any, force in the bight in the south side of Barking Reach. The stem of the Dalton was in collision with the port quarter of the Harlow, and following that one of the barges struck the starboard bow of the Dalton. The Dalton was not damaged by impact with the Harlow. The Dalton was damaged by the impact with the barges. Two of the barges were also damaged. The Harlow, having its rudder or steering gear disabled, subsequently struck a sailing barge and then a steamer, the Taormina, and then ran on the mud on the north shore. There was no evidence as to the damage to the Harlow by impact with the Dalton. Unhappily four men were drowned with the engineer and fireman of the Harlow and two lightermen. They appear to have been right aft on the Harlow at the moment of the collision, which pushed the stem of the Harlow under water before the towing-ropes parted, as they did."

[The learned judge then considered the cases made on behalf of the two vessels, and continued :]

"I find first that (as, indeed, is agreed) the collision was at an angle of seven to eight points ; secondly, that at the collision the Dalton was heading straight down, and the tug and tows were heading nearly athwart the river ; thirdly, that the Dalton did not alter her heading to port. Her starboarding merely kept her straight under reversed engines. She has created the main difficulty in her case by giving two short blasts. But it is not an uncommon thing for steamers to make that unauthorised helm signal which the Dalton said she made. It is not according to the rules, but we are quite familiar with vessels giving these signals, not as indicating the course they are taking, but as indicating how they intend to pass some other vessel. I am satisfied that her head did not go to port or get further towards the north shore than her position when she sighted the tug.

"I find that the collision was in mid-river, and not to the north of mid-river. It follows from those findings that the tug and tows were, at the collision, crossing the Dalton from starboard to port, and had come from southward to mid-river. I reject the evidence of the master of the tug that the light of the Dalton which was seen first was a red light. Until the moment of collision he was on the Dalton's starboard bow. His is the only direct evidence for the plaintiffs on the point. The mate was in the cabin with the lightermen, who, according to the Thames rule, ought to have been on the lighters. The tug is to blame for proceeding up on the wrong side of the river, and attempting to get across at an improper time, having regard to the Dalton. I accept the Dalton's evidence that she was in mid-river and that faced with the upcoming vessels, the sailing barge, the tugs and tows, and the steamship Taormina, the engines were immediately stopped, and after an interval, reversed, and that her way was substantially off at the collision. [The learned judge then considered the conduct of the Dalton and continued :] I therefore pronounce the tug alone to blame."

The following discussion then took place :

Counsel for the defendants (Digby) : In this case, my Lord, the plaintiffs are suing as Cory Lighterage Limited, and in par. 1 they are suing as owners of the Harlow and of the lighters Fifteen and Agenor, and I ask that the judgment be against the plaintiffs the owners of the tug and also as the owners of the two lighters.

HILL, J.—You mean there may be some question of limitation.

Digby: There may be. They sue as that and they claimed damages for the two lighters.

HILL, J.—Yes.

Counsel for the plaintiffs (Bateson, K.C.): I suppose your Lordship will give judgment for the defendants on the claim and counter-claim?

HILL, J.: Yes. When they come to limit their liability that remains to be seen.

Digby: I understand there is a case pending now in the Court of Appeal. (Counsel referred to the Graygarth, infra.)

HILL, J: Yes, Messrs. Rea's tugs. I do not know if I can do what you ask. I should have to find out what the negligence was.

Digby: The negligence of the lighters would be the negligence of the tug. The evidence before your Lordship was that there was nobody on the lighter at all, and the negligence was the tug towing the lighter into collision with the Dalton—wrongful navigation of the tug.

HILL, J.: Yes, it was. Of course, it has not been necessary, in my judgment, to-day to consider whether the absence of the lightermen from their lighters, which was certainly a breach of the Thames Rules, contributed to the damage to the Dalton.

Digby: If your Lordship would find it did not, then we should be thrown back on the negligence of the Harlow.

HILL, J.: Your damage was certainly caused by the negligence of those in charge of the tugs, who were servants of Messrs. Cory.

Digby: And equally of the lightermen. So, whether your Lordship found there was negligence on the part of the lightermen or not, they contributed equally.

HILL, J.: Do you ask me to find on the question whether the lighter ought to have been cast off? It is one of the things that was argued, and whether, if she had been cast off, it would have avoided the collision. As it may become important when the question of limitation arises, I think I ought to add this, that having consulted the Elder Brethren in this matter I come to the conclusion that if the lightermen had been, as they ought to have been, on board their lighters, the lighters could have been cast off, and ought to have been cast off, in such a time as would, if it did not avoid the collision between the barge and the Dalton, at any rate have greatly lessened the damage done to the Dalton. The very object of the Thames Rule of having the men on board the lighter is that they may be handy in circumstances like these, and the ropes ought to be so attached that they could be very easily let go. Is that enough for you? What do you want me to do on that?

Digby: I should submit that the form of the order would be: Judgment against the owners of both the tug and the two lighters, as you have found negligence.

HILL, J.: They were all Cory's, were not they?

Digby: Yes.

HILL, J.: Both the lighters were damaged. I was only told that one lighter struck the Dalton. I was never told how the second lighter was damaged. I think this matter will have to be investigated, if you want to do so, at some later stage, because we have not the materials to do it. I do not want to shut you out by pronouncing the tug alone to blame, because it may be that some other servant, in fact some other servant of Cory's was to blame. All I shall do is to pronounce for the defendants and to give judgment for the defendants against the Cory Lighterage Limited on the claim and counterclaim."

On the 17th June an action was begun by the owners of the Taormina against Cory Lighterage Limited. Cory Lighterage Limited then commenced the present limitation proceedings, addressing their writ, in the usual form, "to the the owners of the steamship Dalton and all other persons claiming to have sustained damage by reason of the collision or collisions between the Harlow and her tow and the steamship Dalton on the 2nd Jan. 1921." Notice of the action was given in the newspapers; the owners of the Taormina, as well as the owners of the Dalton, delivered a defence.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) provides:

Sect. 2 (1): Every British ship shall, unless exempted from registry, be registered under this Act. (2) If a ship required by this Act to be registered is not registered under this Act she shall not be recognised as a British ship. (3) A ship required by this Act to be registered may be detained until the master of the ship, if so required, produces the certificate of the registry of the ship.

Sect. 503: The owners of a ship, British or foreign, shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity (that is to say) . . . (c) where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person carried in any other vessel by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; (d) where any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other vessel by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; be liable to damages, beyond the following amounts (that is to say) . . . (ii) in respect of loss of, or damage to, vessels, goods, merchandise of other things whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury or not, an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

Sect. 508: Nothing in this part of this Act [i.e., Part VIII., in which sect. 503 (sup.) is contained] shall be construed . . . to extend to any British ship which is not recognised as a British ship within the meaning of this Act.

Sect. 742: In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them, that is to say . . . "Vessel" includes any ship or boat or any other description of craft used in navigation. "Ship" includes any description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars.

The Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 44) provides:

Sect. 1: Sections five hundred and two to five hundred and nine inclusive of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 shall extend and apply to the owners, builders, and other parties interested in any ship built at any port or place in Her Majesty's dominions from and including the launching of such ship until the registration thereof under section two of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. [Provided always that such owners, builders, or other parties interested as aforesaid shall not benefit under this section for a period beyond three months after the launching of such ship.]

The Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 85, sched. 2, repeals the words of sect. 1 of the Act of 1898 bracketed in italics above.

Bateson, K.C. and Bucknill for the plaintiffs.—The Dalton was damaged in collision with the barge Silver in tow of the Harlow. The finding of negligence in the bargemen is not material because the plaintiffs are entitled to limit liability on the tonnage of the vessel which did the damage, i.e., the Silver:

The Graygarth, 126 L. T. Rep. 675; (1922) P. 80.

The Silver is a "'ship" within the meaning of sects. 503, 742 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the plaintiffs are therefore entitled to limit liability in respect of her. [Counsel read affidavits from which it appeared that the Silver and the other lighters belonging to the plaintiffs were open steel barges, built in the United Kingdom and used in the Thames navigation. They were always towed and were never propelled by oars]:

The Mudlark, 1911, P. 116;
The Mac, 4 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 555; 46 L. T. Rep. 907; 7 Prob. Div. 126.

The Silver is a ship "recognised as a British ship," notwithstanding she is not registered in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. The right to limit liability is extended to the plaintiffs by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1898. The proviso which this section formerly contained restricting this right to a period of three months from the launching of the ship was removed by sect. 85, sched. 2, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906. The right to limit is now absolute. The plaintiffs are entitled to limit on the Silver alone:

The Graygarth (sup.).

In that case the owners of a tug and her tow were held entitled to limit for damage done by the tow on the tonnage of the tow, though the negligence was in the tug. The judgment decides affirmatively that the limit of liability is based on the tow, and not negatively that the limit is not the limit of the tug. Alternatively the plaintiffs are entitled to limit on the Harlow and the Silver, and should not be liable beyond that amount.

Dunlop, K.C. and Digby for the defendants (the owners of the Dalton). The plaintiffs are not entitled to limit their liability on the Silver or any of the barges. The judge treated the tug and her tows as a unit, and the onus is on the plaintiffs to show that some of the barges did not contribute to the damage. They should have proved in the collision action that if the barges astern of the Silver had been let go the damage would have been minimised. Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the owners of lighters are not entitled to limit liability. Nor is there any case where an unregistered ship has obtained a decree. The Merchant Shipping Act 1921 was passed to remove this disability under which the Act of 1894 placed persons in the position of the plaintiffs. The Act was unnecessary if these persons were already entitled to limit. The Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1898 was passed to remove the difficulty which arose in The Andalusian (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 22; 39 L. T. Rep. 204; 3 Prob. Div. 182). It does not excuse registration, since a penalty is provided for failing to register by the Act of 1894. Nor does the Act of 1906 excuse registration by removing the proviso that registration must be carried out within three months. If an unregistered ship whose owners did not intend to register it were entitled to the benefits conferred by the Act of 1894 there would no longer be any point in registration. Immunity is only allowed for such period as is reasonably necessary to effect registration. There must be an intention to register in the owners. If the plaintiffs are entitled to limit on the barges, they must limit on an aggregate tonnage of all the vessels which caused the damage. In the Graygarth (sup.) the defendants were content if they obtained a fund limited on the tonnage of the tow. The court was not asked to decide, and did not decide, whether the defendants could claim against a fund limited on the tonnage of the tug as well as the tonnage of the tow.

Langton for the defendants, the owners of the Taormina.—These defendants are "one of the other persons who suffered damage by reason of the collision" to whom the writ was addressed, and are entitled to be heard on the question of the constitution of the fund. [It was objected on behalf of the plaintiffs that their liability to the owners of the Taormina not having yet been determined, counsel for the Taormina was not entitled to be heard. The learned President considered that counsel was entitled to be heard.] A "barge," a "lighter," a "hopper," are distinct classes of craft [counsel referred to the definitions under these headings in Murray's dictionary]. The cases cited were hopper barge cases. A hopper is part of a ship. In The Mac (sup.) the decision that a hopper barge is a "ship" was obiter dicta. In Gapp v. Bond (57 L. T. Rep. 437; 19 Q. B. Div. 200) it was decided that a dumb barge is not a ship. Every craft is not a "vessel" or a "ship." Other types of craft have been considered: see

The Blow Boat, 1912, P. 217.

There is nothing in The Graygarth (sup.) which limits the owners' liability to either the tug or the tow.

Bateson, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P. in a written judgment, said: At 2.30 a.m. in the morning of the 2nd Jan. 1921 the steamship Dalton outward bound was proceeding down the Thames when the steam tug Harlow, which was bound up river with five coal laden barges in tow in three ranks—two, two and one—finding herself and her tow on the wrong side of mid-channel, made to cross the course of the Dalton, came into collision with her, and brought into collision one or more of the Harlow's barges. There was damage to the Harlow, attended by loss of life. The Dalton sustained damage by collision with a barge or barges. In an action in rem in respect of the collision—which I will call the damage action—in which there were cross claims, the owners respectively of the vessels concerned claimed damages. The owners of the Harlow were owners also of the lighters. The crew of the tug and the various lightermen were their servants. Judgment was given in favour of the owners of the Dalton against the owners of the Harlow. The Harlow was held to blame for the collision and the Dalton free from blame. There was also a finding that the lightermen of the five barges were guilty of improper navigation, which was expressed in these words:

"If the lightermen had been, as they ought to have been, on board their lighters, the lighters could have been cast off, and ought to have been cast off, in such a time as would, if it did not avoid the collision between the barge and the Dalton, at any rate have greatly lessened the damage done to the Dalton. There was, therefore, a finding which establishes that the defendants, owners of the Harlow and the barges, were by their servants on all these vessels guilty of improper navigation, and that the plaintiffs suffered damage.

The owners of the Harlow and of the barges she had in tow are plaintiffs in the present action which is brought for the purpose of limiting their liability in respect of damages by the collision in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503. Their statement of claim as originally framed claimed a decree of limitation to an amount to be measured by the tonnage of the Harlow. The owners of the Dalton by their defence resisted this claim on the ground that the damage to the Dalton was caused not by the Harlow alone but by the joint action of the Harlow and her tow. After the pleadings had been closed judgment was given in the court of Appeal in the case of the Graygarth (ante, p. 675; (1922) P. 80) [the learned President was supplied with a proof copy of the judgments of the Court of Appeal, which now appear in Law Reports 1922, p. 80], an action which raised questions as to the incidence of damage in the Admiralty jurisdiction where a vessel is brought into collision by improper navigation directed or controlled by persons outside such vessel. For the purpose of raising a contention sought to be founded upon this judgment, the plaintiffs amended their statement of claim by alleging that the damage to the Dalton was caused by collision with her of one among the Harlow's tow of barges, the barge Silver. They claimed alternatively to limit their liability by the tonnage of the Silver alone, or of the Harlow alone, or of the Harlow with the Silver.

After the amendments of the pleadings as between the original parties an appearance was entered for other defendants, the owners of the steamship Taormina. They allege that by reason of the same acts of improper navigation of the plaintiffs' servants which caused damage to the Dalton, the Harlow came into collision with the Taormina, and they dispute the right of the plaintiffs to limit their liability as claimed in the statement of claim or at all. Whether, or to what extent, if at all, the plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability in the circumstances of the case is a matter on which the owners of the Dalton and the owners of the Taormina to some extent made common cause in argument, though in the event of a decree of limitation based upon the tonnage of the Silver alone or of the Harlow alone, their interests might hereafter be found in conflict.

It is convenient to deal in the first place with a contention which was argued on different grounds by counsel for the respective defendants, and which was to the effect that in respect of the five barges and each of them the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 gives no right to the plaintiffs to limit their liability. Both arguments depend upon the true effect of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 508, and certain amending Acts. By sect. 508 it is enacted that the provisions of the statute in relation to limitation of liability "shall not extend to any British ship which is not 'recognised as a British ship'" within the meaning of that Act.

For the owners of the Taormina it was contended that upon the true construction of the statute neither of the lighters in question is a ship within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 503, 742. Ship is defined in sect. 742 as including "any vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." These barges were admittedly not propelled by oars. Each was a vessel used for navigation in the transport of goods on the Thames, in tow of tugs and upon the tides, fitted with a rudder and managed by her own crew. The judgments of the Court of Appeal in the Mac (46 L. T. Rep. 907; 4 Asp. 555; 7 Prob. Div. 126) were cited, and for the owners of the Taormina it was urged that the decision in that case is not decisive of the question now under consideration. It is true that some of the matter debated in the Mac arose on the construction of the words "ship or boat" in a section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1852, and that the court had to decide whether a mud hopper—like in construction and mode of navigation to the barges here in question—was a ship "or boat." Each member of the court, however, considered whether she was a "ship," and held that she was. Upon the reasoning which Lord Esher applied in the Mac, as reported at length in 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555, I ought, in my opinion, to hold that each of the barges here in question is a "ship" within the definition contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 742. Gapp v. Bond (57 L. T. Rep. 437; 19 Q. B. Div. 200), which was relied on in some measure by Mr. Langton for the owners of the Taormina, was a case under the Bills of Sale Act 1878, and the craft in question was a barge propelled by oars. It does not help in the decision of this case.

The question whether by reason of the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 508, the plaintiffs are excluded from the benefit of limitation of liability under that statute depends upon the combined operation of sects. 502, 503, and 508 of that Act, and of the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 14), s. 1, Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 85, sched. 2, and perhaps the Merchant Shipping Act 1921 (11 & 12 Geo. 5, c. 28). The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, sect. 2, enacts that "every British ship shall, unless exempted from registry, be registered under this Act, and if not registered shall not be recognised as a British ship." Sect. 508 has the restrictive words with regard to limitation to which I have already referred. But the Merchant Shipping Act of 1898 as amended by the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, s. 85, and sched. 2, extends the privilege of limitation of liability to the owners, builders, and other parties interested in any ship built at any port or place in His Majesty's dominions, "from and including the launching of such ship until the registration thereof under sect. 2 of the Act of 1894." I was invited by Mr. Dunlop to construe the words I have just cited as amounting to no more than a grant of the power to limit liability before registration of a ship for such period of time between launching and registering as may be required for the doing of the things necessary for the purpose of registration. To induce such a construction reference was made to the fact that in the Act of 1898, s. 1, the power of limitation before registration was confined by proviso to a period not exceeding three months after launching, and that the Act of 1906 simply repealed the proviso, leaving the section in a form which does not abrogate the general enactment in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 2, against recognition of an unregistered ship. The Merchant Shipping Act 1921, s. 1, was cited as supporting this view in that it extends rights of limitation of liability to "every description of lighter, barge or like vessel used in navigation in Great Britain, however propelled," and provides for a modified process of registration. I get no distinct guidance from this Act of 1921, and I do not see my way to construe, as I am invited to do the Merchant Shipping Act 1898, s. 1 as amended by the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, s. 85, and sched. 2. So long as a ship which has been launched remains capable of being registered under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 2, the amending enactments in their literal terms give her owners a right to claim limitation of liability for damages at any time after her being launched and before her being registered. The statute seems to me to be capable of literal and practical application in the present case. The plaintiffs' five barges were admittedly built within the King's dominions, namely, in Great Britain, and I must hold the plaintiffs to be entitled to limit according to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, their liability in respect of damage caused by negligent navigation of them. Had my opinion been otherwise I think I must still have held that the plaintiffs could limit their liability in respect of the Harlow.

There remains the question what is the right of the plaintiffs as to limitation in relation to the several craft concerned, having regard to the circumstances of the collision or collisions between the Harlow and her tow and the Dalton.

It is established that the whole of the barges in the Harlow's tow were improperly navigated. Which of them, by reason of this improper navigation, caused damage to the Dalton? The case for the defendants as presented to me was that the barges constituted in reality a floating mass, and that even if the blow upon the Dalton which caused her damage was delivered by the stem of one, namely, the Silver as the plaintiffs allege, all five contributed by their weight and momentum to the damage. Taking into consideration the oral testimony at the trial, as well as the affidavits used by consent at the hearing before me, I find that the Silver alone collided with the Dalton. The further facts which seems to me to be material and to be established can be shortly stated. The Silver and the Sokoto were the barges in tow immediately astern of the Harlow. At the collision of the Dalton with the Harlow, the Silver and the Sokoto were following the Harlow from the southern side on a course nearly athwart the river. The angle of the collision was nearly a right angle. The Silver struck the Dalton on that vessel's starboard bow with her huff or swimhead. The direction and the nature of the blow were determined in part by the fact that the Silver and the Sokoto swung round when the tow rope of the Harlow parted. The Sokoto was at the time alongside the Silver and moving with her, and increased the severity of the blow. Both were loaded with coal. The barges in the next rank behind the Silver and the Sokoto were the Sixteen and the Fifteen behind the Sokoto. A single barge, the Agenor was in tow in the third rank. The Sixteen escaped without damage. The Fifteen and the Agenor were damaged by collision, the one with the other. The sternpost of the Fifteen was split, and damage done on her port quarter and her starboard side. The damage to the Agenor was on her starboard side amidships. Having regard to the character of the damage to the Fifteen and the Agenor, and the absence of any damage to the Sixteen, the Silver, and the Sokoto by any collision among themselves, as well as to the fact that the barges in the tow ranged alongside the Dalton after her impact with the Harlow, I have come to the conclusion that the five barges were not massed at the time of the collision of the Silver with the Dalton, and that they did not add by their combined weight or momentum to the force of that collision. The Sokoto, however, does appear to me to have moved with the Silver at the Silver's collision, and have contributed by her weight and momentum to the damage.

The result of these findings in point of fact is that the negligent navigation of the Harlow, the Silver, and the Sokoto caused the damage to the Dalton, which was immediately caused by the huff or swim of the Silver.

Except for the question which was raised by Mr. Bateson for the plaintiffs upon the view which he presented on their behalf of the effect of the recent judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Graygarth (126 L. T. Rep. 675; (1922), P. 80), I should have thought that upon principle the damage to the Dalton having been caused by the negligent navigation of three vessels jointly, each vessel might be proceeded against in rem in respect of such damage, and that the plaintiffs, as the employers of all the negligent persons, might be held liable for all the damage, not only in each action in rem, but in proceedings in personam. Mr. Bateson contended, however, that the result of the judgment in The Graygarth is to establish a rule that where tug and tow are both negligently navigated, and damage is done by a blow struck by one of them in the course of the negligent navigation, liability for the damage is to be limited by reference to the tonnage of the vessel which in fact struck the blow. To examine this contention it is necessary to see what were the facts, and the judgment of the court in the case cited. The tug Graygarth being negligently navigated, brought her tow, the Ran into collision with the Para. The owners of the Para proceeded against the owners of the Ran by an action in rem, and the Graygarth and Ran being in one ownership, the owners of the Para proved that the servants of the common owner who were navigating the tug had brought the tow into collision with the Para, and thereby caused the damage alleged. They claimed in their action judgment for an award of damages to be enforced against the tow, the Ran, and did not make any claim in rem against the tug Graygarth. Following upon the judgment which they received in their action, they were confronted by the owners of the Ran with a claim to limit their liability in respect of the collision by the tonnage of the Graygarth. This claim succeeded at first instance, but upon appeal, the owners of the Para, who had claimed a decree in rem against the owners of the Ran, were held entitled to the decree which they sought, and, inasmuch as their right in rem was against the Ran, were held entitled to damages measured by the tonnage of the Ran, and not by the tonnage of the Graygarth. Mr. Bateson insisted that the Court of Appeal had held the owners of the Para entitled to damages against the Ran, and not entitled to damages against the Graygarth. This contention is, in my judgment, erroneous.

The owners of the Para had not claimed a decree against the owners of the Graygarth as such. The Master of the Rolls, it will be seen, said this: "The action having been brought against the owners of the Ran, they, as represented by their bail, could only be responsible if the Ran was improperly navigated, and such improper navigation caused the collision. As owners of the Graygarth, they might be liable also, but in the action in which they were sued as owners of the Ran they could only be responsible if the Ran was improperly navigated. The Ran was found to have been improperly navigated, and judgment went against her owners accordingly. To say that this decision proceeded upon a rule that the vessel in collision can alone be involved in liability, is directly contrary to the statement of the Master of the Rolls with regard to the owners, that "as owners of the Graygarth they might be liable also." The simple explanation of the substitution of a judgment in respect of the Ran for the judgment which had been entered up in respect of the Graygarth seems to me to be that stated by Mr. Dunlop, namely, that the bail given in respect of the Ran to the extent of her owners' liability as limited by her tonnage was sufficient to satisfy the claim of the successful plaintiffs, whereas a liability limited by the tonnage of the Graygarth would not have been, and they did not weakly select a smaller, or needlessly seek a larger security than their claim required.

To attribute to the decision in the case of the Graygarth (sup.) the effect attributed to it by the plaintiffs would, in my opinion, be contrary to the declared reasons of the judgments there delivered. It would also ignore the principle laid down in the House of Lords in the Devonshire (107 L. T. Rep. 179; 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 210; (1912) A. C. 634) that except in cases where litigants in collision cases in the Admiralty jurisdiction are held both to blame and division of damages follows, owners of vessels which, by improper navigation inflict damage on a third vessel by their joint wrongful act are each made liable for all the damage he helps to inflict.

The plaintiffs are entitled to limit their liability in respect of the improper navigation of the Harlow and her tow on the occasion in question to an aggregate amount made up of 8*l.* per ton of the several tonnages of the tug Harlow, the dumb barge Silver and the dumb barge Sokoto. Questions of limitation in respect of loss of life, which were raised by the pleadings, were admitted to have been disposed of pending the litigation.

In view of the claim asserted on behalf of the owners of the Taormina to be entitled to prove for their damages against the amount limited in respect of the Harlow, it will be necessary that that amount when paid into court shall stand in a distinct account pending the determination of the question of the right of the owners of the Taormina to share in the distribution of it.

[March 6.—On the application of counsel for the Taormina the learned President ordered that the directions contained in the last paragraph of his judgment (sup.) for setting up a separate fund for the Harlow should be struck out on the ground that they were superfluous.]

Solicitors: for the plaintiffs, Keene, Marsland, Brydon, and Bennett; for the defendants, the owners of the Dalton, Thomas Cooper and Co.; for the defendants, the owners of the Taormina, Ince, Colt, Ince, and Roscoe.

PRIZE COURT.

Dec. 13 and 21, 1921.

THE SULMAN PAK AND OTHER VESSELS. (a)

Prize bounty—Operations in Mesopotamia—Gunboats on the Tigris—Co-operation with land forces—Capture of armed enemy vessels—Claim for prize bounty—Joint operations of sea and land forces—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), sect. 42—Order in Council of the 2*nd March* 1915.

H.M.S. T., Ma., and Mo. took part in the advance along the Tigris in the course of the British operations in Mesopotamia in 1917. In these operations which were planned under the direction of the General Officer Commanding in Mesopotamia, the ships co-operated generally with the land forces in fighting which took place between the 23*rd and* 25*th Feb. at S., where the passage of the river, which had been blocked by Turkish forces, was effected. The flotilla was then able to pass up the river, and on the* 26*th Feb. the General Officer Commanding directed it to "push on and inflict as much damage as possible." On the same day the flotilla was again held up at N. K. by the Turkish rearguard, and the passage of the river was again opened by the land forces operating with cavalry and field guns. The flotilla then again advanced, overtook the vessels of the Turkish river service, and made the capture. It then anchored for two days near the furthest point reached by the operations, and sent the prizes down the river. At some time before the* 25*th Feb. one of the captured vessels had been bombed by an army aeroplane.*

The officers and crews of the flotilla claimed prize bounty. It was contended by the Treasury that the operation constituted a joint naval and military operation.

Held, that the fact that the flotilla and the land forces were engaged in a joint scheme of operations did not establish a joint capture; it was necessary to show that both forces were in fact participating in the operation of capture. As the troops in fact took no part in the operation of capture, as they were in fact out of reach when the capture was made, and as the flotilla got far enough up the river to be able to act effectually for itself, without requiring or receiving help from the land forces in the immediate enterprise, the prizes were made by the flotilla alone.

Judgment in favour of the claim.

MOTION for prize bounty.

This was a motion by Captain Wilfrid Nunn, R.N., and the officers and crews of H.M. gunboats Tarantula, Mantis, and Moth for a declaration under sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864, and the Order in Council of the 24th March 1915 that they were entitled to prize bounty amounting to 7745*l.* in respect of the capture by them in the Tigris in Feb. 1917 of the Turkish armed vessels Sulman Pak, Sumana, Pioneer and Basrah.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P. said:—This is the claim of Captain Wilfrid Nunn, R.N., and the officers and ships' companies of H.M.S. Tarantula, Mantis, and Moth for an award of prize bounty under sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 for the capture of the armed Turkish vessels Sulman Pak, Sumana, Pioneer, and Basrah in the river Tigris on the 26th Feb. 1917, during the operations in Mesopotamia which resulted in the overthrow of the Turkish authority in that region, the capture of Baghdad, and the occupation of the country by His Majesty's forces. The number of persons on board the captured vessels at the beginning of the engagement in which they were captured was placed at 1,549, and the claim for bounty at the rate of 5*l.* a head is 7745*l.* The validity of the claim depends on the answer to be made to the question whether the capture of the Turkish vessels was a purely naval operation or was a conjoint operation of sea and land forces. Apart from this contention nothing was in dispute between the claimants and the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury.

The grounds of objection to the claim were that the action of the naval flotilla was ancillary to that of the Army, that the capture was made in the course of carrying out directions of Sir Stanley Maude, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army in Mesopotamia, and that the capture was rendered possible by the operation of the Army under Sir Stanley Maude's command. The flotilla in the Tigris, which was under the immediate command of Captain Nunn, formed part of the naval forces on the East India station under Vice-Admiral Sir Rosslyn Wemyss, Commander-in-Chief. It acted in concert with the army, the commander doing all in his power to meet the requirements of the General Officer Commanding in Chief. Sir Stanley Maude's dispatch of the 10th April 1917, which was put in evidence, describes fully the plan of the campaign in the course of which the capture was made. Turkish forces of great strength centred at Sannaiyat on the Tigris and holding positions of wide extent on both banks barred the intended British advances upon Baghdad. Down river British naval forces operated. Up river Turkish armed craft and river transport occupied the waterway and maintained the river communications of the enemy. To capture Sannaiyat, to cross the Tigris higher up, to clear the right bank, to advance in force on the left bank, and to drive the enemy beyond Baghdad appear to have been the operations which were resolved upon by the Commander-in-Chief. Of the part played by the flotilla, Sir Stanley Maude says in his dispatch: "They carried out somewhat restricted but none the less important duties in the earlier part of the period. The fact that the enemy barred the way at Sannaiyat necessitated their work being at first limited to assisting in the protection of our water communications, co-operating with our detachment on the Euphrates front, and occasionally shelling the enemy's position at Sannaiyat, where the naval kite balloon section rendered good service in observation work. Their opportunity came later, when, after the passage of the Tigris, they pressed forward in pursuit and rendered brilliant and substantial services."

The services designated consisted substantially of the forcing of the passage of the Tigris beyond the Turkish rearguard position. Sir Stanley Maude's dispatch divides the military operations into eight periods, of which two come in question here—namely, "Capture of Sannaiyat and passage of the Tigris the 17th to the 24th Feb.," and "The advance on Baghdad, the 25th Feb. to the 11th March." The flotilla co-operated on the 22nd and 23rd Feb. in the operations against Sannaiyat and in the fighting which attended the crossing of the Tigris. On the 24th Feb. it moved up river and late at night took possession of Kut. During the whole day of the 25th Feb. fighting with the Turkish rearguard proceeded. By a forced march during the night of the 25th the main force of the Turkish Army placed a substantial distance between themselves and the British forces. Sir Stanley Maude early on the 26th directed the flotilla to "push on and inflict as much damage as possible." Advancing up the Tigris they encountered at Nahr Kellah formidable fire from Turkish rearguard forces in occupation of a strong position on the Nahr Kellah bend. The course of the river gave a great advantage to the enemy. It changes at the extremity of a narrow peninsula from a course of about due north to a course of about due south. Strong Turkish forces occupied the banks and although the cavalry of the British forces supported by field guns engaged this powerful rearguard the general British advance appears not to have reached Nahr Kellah during that or the next day. The main body of the Turkish Army was retreating through the desert on the left bank of the Tigris. The flotilla, however, forced its way beyond the extremity of the peninsula and steamed up the Tigris, and at a distance, as Captain Nunn showed, of from fifteen to twenty miles in a direct line beyond Nahr Kellah, overtook the vessels of the Turkish river service and made the capture. The capture took place in the early evening. The vessels anchored for the night near the furthest point reached in the operation and remained there the next two days. The prizes were sent down the river. On the 1st March the flotilla again advanced and on the morning of that day the Tarantula reached Azizjeh just as the troops were entering that village. The reach in which the last captures were made was stated to be about five miles as the crow flies below Azizjeh and about twenty miles in a direct line above Nahr Kellah. By reason of the tortuous course of the Tigris the distances in the waterway greatly exceed the distances over land.

The contention that the capture of the Turkish vessels was a joint operation of the flotilla and the Army was founded on the existence of a general plan of campaign directed by Sir Stanley Maude, the general co-operation between the forces to which I have referred, the order or request to push on and inflict as much damage as possible, the cavalry attack on Nahr Kellah, and the fact that the Basrah, the largest of the captured vessels, had been, in the fighting before the 25th Feb., bombed from an Army aeroplane. On the part of the flotilla reliance was placed upon the arrest of the military advance at or below Nahr Kellah during and after 26th Feb., and on the absence of any participation by land forces in the actual operation of capture. Reference was made for the Treasury to the description of the general scheme of operations by Sir Stanley Maude and Captain Nunn in operations in which both the troops and the flotilla were engaged, and to the terms in which the general included the vessels as part of the spoils of war taken in his advance.

Care is required in defining the exact grounds on which head money by way of prize bounty is awarded and the character of the participation of land forces which suffices to prevent a capture from being attributed to naval forces in such a way as to entitle them to an award.

Sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 appoints the bounty of the Crown to "such of the officers and crew of any of his Majesty's ships of war as are actually present at the actual taking or destroying of any armed ship of His Majesty's enemies." It is well settled that, as was said by Lord Stowell with regard to an earlier statute, in La Bellone (2 Dods. 343, at p. 351), "conjunct expeditions are entirely out of the statute with respect to both the Services." To establish a joint capture, however, requires proof that both forces concerned were in fact participants in the operation of capture. "The actual captor," Lord Stowell said in The John (1 Dods. 363), "is the favourite of the law and the court will not suffer his interest to be affected but by evidence the most satisfactory. The onus probandi lies upon the party setting up the claim as joint captors, who, in order to establish it must bring very clear proof in support of his case." Blockade by a squadron, or chase by a squadron, and capture by one ship of a squadron in the prosecution of the common enterprise; and presence upon the scene of a capture in readiness to assist; are instances in which the seizure by one vessel has moved for the benefit of her consorts. But, as was said by Sir William Grant in pronouncing the judgment of the Privy Council in The Nordstern (1 Acton 128, 135, 140), the question is "whether such a co-operation existed as to make the capture in question necessarily consequent and dependent thereon. . . . It is not sufficient a joint enterprise shall exist at the time, except it expressly refer to the capture in question. . . ." The judgment in El Rayo (1 Dods. 42) shows that where two ships of war are in sight at the time of capture the prize may be the prize of one of them if the act of capture was the independent act of that one.

The question as it presents itself to me is not whether the flotilla and the troops on the 26th Feb. 1917 were engaged in a joint scheme of operations, but whether the flotilla and the troops were engaged jointly in the capture of the Turkish ships, and I have come to the conclusion that the troops in fact took no part in the capture. I do not lay stress on the fact that the flotilla was under purely naval command. Without unity of command there might have been joint action. The troops were in fact out of reach when the captures were made. The bombing of the Basrah by army airmen was not an incident of the capture. The flotilla got away past Nahr Kellah far enough and effectually enough to be able to act for itself, and without requiring or receiving help from land forces in the immediate enterprise it alone made the prizes in respect of which the bounty is claimed. I find the facts correctly alleged in the affidavit of Captain Sherbrook, filed in support of the claim, which says that "the capture of the armed vessels was solely effected by His Majesty's ships Tarantula, Mantis, and Moth, in the circumstances set out in the affidavit and that no other ship or vessel was present at the actual taking of such enemy ships." My judgment, therefore, must be in favour of the claim, and I pronounce that the amount to be distributed is 7745*l*.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Dec. 14 and 15, 1921.

THE JOANNIS VATIS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Collision—Damage to ship and cargo—Action by the owners of the ship—"As owners of ship and her cargo"—Bail—Underwriters on cargo invited to join in proceedings—Refusal by some of the underwriters—Rights of those underwriters to share in sum subsequently recovered in the action—Right to intervene—Costs—Order XII., r. 24.

It is the duty of the Court, when by its process a sum has been recovered in Admiralty, to see that it goes to the persons entitled to claim, and it should be divided pari passu between them. The Glamorganshire (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; 59 L. T. Rep. 572; 13 App. Cas. 454) considered.

Where a person sued as owner of a vessel and cargo and established the liability of the defendant to pay damages in respect of both ship and cargo, and certain of the cargo owners refused to, or elected not to, take their share in the expenses connected with establishing the liabitity, it was held that the cargo owners were not shut out from any benefit in the judgment.

The steamer W. H. and her cargo was damaged in collision with the steamer J. V. The owners of the W. H. commenced an action "as owners of the W. H. and cargo," claiming for the damage sustained thereby. The owners of the J. V. gave an undertaking for bail in the sum of 100,000*l.*, which exceeded their statutory liability, the owners of the W. H. giving bail in a like amount.

The underwriters on the cargo of the W. H. were afterwards invited by the shipowners' solicitors to join the shipowners in the proceedings.

Some of the underwriters did not assent to this proposal. Nevertheless, after judgment had been given against the J. V. these underwriters instructed the solicitors acting for the owners of the W. H., and those underwriters who had agreed to join with them in the litigation, to put forward claims against the sum obtained from the owners of the J. V. The solicitors agreed to do so, and received the documents supporting these claims. The total claims then exceeded the amount for which the owners of the J. V. had given bail, and for which they had been held liable. The owners of the W. H. and those underwriters who had joined with them in the litigation accordingly took up the position that those underwriters who had not agreed to join were not entitled to share in the fund before the court.

At the reference the registrar reported that those underwriters who had refused to join in the litigation were nevertheless entitled to share in the fund on the ground that the writ had been issued in the names of the owners of the W. H. and her cargo, and that the solicitors for the owners of the W. H. and the other underwriters had agreed and consented to the underwriters who had at first refused to take part in the action subsequently becoming parties to it in its second stage.

The owners of the W. H. and the underwriters who had joined in the action, moved that this report be rejected.

Held, on appeal, that all persons having a claim on the fund, including the non-assenting underwriters, were entitled to share in the distribution.

Judgment of Hill, J. affirmed.

Motion in objection to a report of the Admiralty registrar.

On the 22nd Aug. 1917 a collision occurred off Bizerta between the steamer Worsley Hall and the Greek steamer Joannis Vatis. Proceedings were commenced against the Joannis Vatis at Bizerta, but were discontinued. On the 27th Aug. 1917 Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. telegraphed to the owners of the Joannis Vatis:

We are instructed on behalf of the owners of the Worsley Hall concerning collision Joannis Vatis. Please instruct your English agents or lawyers arrange exchange bail in England and for question liability to be decided English Admiralty Court, otherwise will be necessary arrest your steamer.

The owners agreed and gave bail to the extent of 100,000*l*., being the statutory liability of the Joannis Vatis. The owners of the Worsley Hall gave bail in a like amount. On the 30th Aug. 1917 Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. issued a writ, which was intituled in the usual manner, the plaintiffs being described as "the owners of the steamship Worsley Hall and cargo." The endorsement of the writ was: "The plaintiffs' claim is for damages arising out of a collision between the steamship Worsley Hall and the Joannis Vatis. . . ." The subsequent litigation ended in a decision of the House of Lords on the 19th Dec. 1919 pronouncing the Joannis Vatis alone to blame.

On the 22nd Jan. 1918 Messrs. F. C. Danson and Co., who were the average adjusters employed to adjust the claims against the Joannis Vatis, wrote to the underwriters of the cargo of the Worsley Hall:

In view of the steps taken to safeguard the interests of the cargo, and of the large extent to which the cargo is interested, the solicitors who have the case in hand (Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co.) have expressed the opinion that it would be reasonable for the cargo interests to join the owners of the ship in collision proceedings, and we have been requested by the owners to bring the matter before the leading underwriters interested for their consideration and decision . . . we shall be glad to have your views on the matter. . .

In reply to this invitation, some of the underwriters agreed to join the owners of the Worsley Hall in the litigation and some refused to do so on the ground that no special circumstances arose in the case to justify the departure from the usual practice. Nevertheless, Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. subsequently received instructions from the underwriters who had refused to join in the litigation to put forward claims on their behalf. They also accepted documents supporting these claims. The claims against the Joannis Vatis then amount to 146,953*l*. 15*s*. On the 22nd July 1920 Messrs. Hill, Dickinson and Co. accordingly wrote to those underwriters who had not agreed to join the shipowners in the litigation:

As you are aware we have for some time been engaged in gathering together the documents supporting the claims for loss of or damage to cargo with a view to the parties interested therein obtaining the benefit of the bail obtained.

We have now made out the claims the documents in support of which have up to the present reached us and find that these added to the shipowners' claim amount to approximately 136,000*l*. The shipowners claim amounts to 62,190*l*. 14*s*. In these circumstances as the total claims considerably exceed the amount of bail those cargo underwriters who did not agree to share the burden of the expense incurred by the shipowners in carrying on the proceedings against the Joannis Vatis are not entitled to the benefit of the bail obtained.

To this, the underwriters objected, and instructed other solicitors to put forward claims at the reference on their behalf.

On the 14th March 1921 the registrar reported that the underwriters were entitled to share in the 100,000*l*. notwithstanding that they had refused to join in the proceedings. He gave the following reasons for his decision:

Reasons for Report.

In this reference the parties were the owners of the steamship Worsley Hall and two sets of, strictly speaking, cargo owners, but in fact underwriters, who for the purposes of description may be called assenting and non-assenting underwriters.

The defendants did not appear, having no interest in the reference, having given bail for 100,000*l*., which was more than the limit of their liability.

The collision occurred off Bizerta, on the 22nd Aug. 1917, and the Worsley Hall put into Bizerta for temporary repairs.

Proceedings were begun against the Joannis Vatis at Bizerta, and the owners of the Joannis Vatis gave bail in 100,000*l*., the value of their vessel. Subsequently, by arrangement between the parties, the proceedings at Bizerta were discontinued and fresh proceedings were brought in the High Court in England.

The writ was issued in the name of the owners of of the Worsley Hall and of her cargo, and, as arranged, the same bail, 100,000*l*., was given in the action in the High Court.

Messrs. F. C. Danson & Co. the average adjusters, who had this matter in hand, on the 22nd Jan. 1918, wrote to various underwriters asking if they would "join the owners of the ship in the collision proceedings." The Alliance Marine Insurance Company and some other companies refused. These are called above non-assenting underwriters. After litigation, which culminated in a decision of the House of Lords that the Joannis Vatis was alone to blame, the non-assenting underwriters asked Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co., the solicitors for the Worsley Hall, to prepare and put forward their claims against the 100,000*l*. (see letter of Union Marine Insurance, the 3rd Dec. 1918, and subsequent letters) and Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. did so, acting as if the non-assenting underwriters had a full right to claim against the 100,000*l.*

Subsequently, when it was clear that the above sum was insufficient to satisfy all claims in full, Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. wrote to the non-assenting underwriters (see letter the 28th July 1920 to the Reliance Insurance Company and following letters) that as they had not agreed to share the burden of the proceedings against the Joannis Vatis, they were "not entitled to the benefit of the bail obtained," in other words, to claim against the 100,000*l.* which that bail represented. The non-assenting underwriters contested this view, and thus arose a preliminary point for decision.

The above is a short outline of the facts. It was argued on behalf of the non-assenting underwriters that there was a custom that underwriters on cargo should not join in an action by the shipowners but had right, if such action terminated in favour of the shipowners, to bring a claim against the wrongdoing ship, as though an original party to the action.

This is, no doubt, a convenient practice for underwriters of whom there may be many interested in a single shipment in large and small amounts, but it is not a custom as legally understood. I am clearly of opinion however, that the refusal to join in this action was, if such refusal stood alone, a bar to a claim in this particular action.

If the names and addresses of the parties to the action had been demanded by the defendants it is clear the non-assenting underwriters suing in the names of the assured would not have been given, for they were not parties to the action. The true position is, that they stood by to see what might be the result of the litigation in its first stage, viz., as regards liability for the collision.

I am, however, also of opinion that as Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. must be taken to be the agents in the conduct of the litigation of the owners of the Worsley Hall, and of the assenting underwriters that they subsequently agreed and consented to the non-assenting underwriters sharing in the 100,000*l.*, and becoming parties to the action in its second stage. Having regard to the form of the writ there is no technical difficulty in the non-assenting underwriters joining in the action at this later stage. However, after Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. obtaining documents from the non-assenting parties and preparing the claims against the fund, the earlier clients are in my view estopped from refusing, at the eleventh hour, to allow the non-assenting underwriters to share pari passu in the fund available for all claimants. It was argued on behalf of the owners of the ship and the assenting underwriters that the defendants only gave bail to satisfy the claims of those underwriters who were actually consenting parties to the action.

This is, I think, a fallacy, for 100,000*l.* represented the value of the Joannis Vatis, and the defendants had no more knowledge of or interest in those who might claim as owners of cargo, many or few, than has a wrongdoer when he pays money into court in a limitation action.

Therefore, I decide that the non-assenting underwriters are entitled to share in the 100,000*l.* It is desirable to state that the merchants who sat with me concur in this view on non-legal grounds.

(Signed) E. S. ROSCOE, Registrar.

The owners of the Worsley Hall and the assenting underwriters moved that the registrar's report be rejected in so far as he allowed the claims of the non-assenting underwriters.

Butler Aspinall, K.C., Dunlop, K.C., and A. T. Bucknill for the owners of the Worsley Hall and the assenting underwriters.—The respondents are not entitled to share in the bail. They took no part in obtaining it. The shipowners' solicitors did not agree to put forward claims for the non-assenting underwriters. There was no consideration for such an agreement; nor had they authority to make it. The owners of the Worsley Hall gave consideration for the undertaking of the Joannis Vatis to give bail, for they themselves gave a similar undertaking. The non-assenting underwriters had an opportunity of becoming parties, of which they did not avail themselves. If they were parties, when did they become parties? There is no material upon which the registrar could find an agreement to allow the non-assenting underwriters to share in the bail fund. The solicitors only agreed to put forward the claims. There is no analogy to limitation proceedings. In this case bail was provided to satisfy the claims of those who were parties to the writ, not of all those who were injured by the collision. The bail bond is an agreement to pay to the parties to this action:

The Saracen, 1 Will. Rob. 451;
The Africano, 70 L. T. Rep. 250; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 427; (1894) P. 141.

In this case the proceeds were brought into court. There is no estoppel.

Stephens, K.C. and Balloch for certain non-assenting underwriters.—The non-assenting underwriters are entitled to come in without paying the costs of the action:

The Duke of Buccleuch, 67 L. T. Rep. 739; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; (1892) P. 201.

There was a claim against the Worsley Hall. The refusal of the underwriters was a refusal to bear the costs of any part of this claim. The shipowners were suing as owners and bailees of the cargo. Bail was obtained in this capacity. The underwriters accordingly took no steps to obtain bail. The shipowners obtained bail for the underwriters; they are now estopped from refusing to allow them to share in it. If the underwriters were not parties they now ask leave to intervene. They are entitled to intervene at any time before final judgment—that is to say, at any time before the report of the registrar is confirmed:

The Duke of Buccleuch (sup.).

Raeburn, K.C. and Hayward for certain other non-assenting underwriters.—If the contention of the appellants is upheld the underwriters will have lost all rights against the Joannis Vatis, since the limitation period had expired before Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. refused to put forward their claim. They gave a retainer to Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. before the limitation period expired. The underwriters were always parties; if they were not parties, Messrs. Hill, Dickinson undertook to put forward claims for persons who were not parties to the action. The writ was issued in the name of the cargo owners; there was, therefore, nothing for the underwriters to ratify. An action must be commenced on behalf of some existing person or persons:

Keighley, Maxsted, and Co. v. Bryan, Durrant and Co., 84 L. T. Rep. 777; (1901) A. C. 240.

If it is necessary for the underwriters to ratify the issue of the writ, on whose behalf was it issued, and on whose behalf was bail demanded, if not on behalf of the owners of the cargo ?

Dunlop, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30.—Hill, J.—The questions in this case arise out of a collision between the ships Worsley Hall and Joannis Vatis, for which the Joannis Vatis was held alone to blame. The dispute relates to the right to share in a limited fund by persons who suffered damage by the negligence of the Joannis Vatis, being the owners of the Worsley Hall and the owners of cargo on board the Worsley Hall, or rather the underwriters on cargo subrogated to the rights of the cargo owners. This dispute arises not in a default action nor in a limitation action, but in proceedings in which bail was given, and in which there has been no limitation decree. These exceptional circumstances create the difficulties. I will first state the facts.

In Aug. 1917 the ships were in collision in the Mediterranean, and both put into Bizerta. Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. were instructed by the owners of the Worsley Hall. On the 27th Aug. 1917 Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. sent a telegram to the owners of the Joannis Vatis: "We are instructed on behalf of the owners Worsley Hall concerning collision with Joannis Vatis; please instruct your English agents or lawyers arrange exchange bail in England and for question liability be decided English Admiralty Court, otherwise will be necessary arrest your steamer." The owners of the Joannis Vatis instructed Messrs. Crump and Son, who, in turn, threatened to arrest the Worsley Hall. These arrests, if made at Bizerta, would have been governed by French law, and the limit of liability would have been the value of the ship. Negotiations followed, and ended in an agreement expressed in the letters of the 17th and 18th Sept. 1917, whereby each gave an undertaking to provide bail in 100,000*l.* or the value of the steamer, whichever should be less, and agreed to proceedings in the Admiralty Court in England, and each accepted the writ in rem issued by the other. The writ issued by the plaintiffs was in the name of "the owners of the Worsley Hall and cargo," and the plaintiffs were stated to reside in Liverpool. The indorsement is: "The plaintiffs' claim is for damages arising out of a collision, &c." At the date of the issue of the writ the only authority to sue was that given by the owners of the Worsley Hall. In pursuance of the undertaking to put in bail in respect of the Joannis Vatis, a bail bond in the usual form was executed on the 19th March 1918. The cross-actions proceeded to trial. This court on the 25th Oct. 1918, held the Joannis Vatis one-third to blame, and condemned the owners of the Joannis Vatis and their bail in one-third of the plaintiffs' claim. On appeal the Court of Appeal on the 9th Feb. 1919 affirmed by the House of Lords on the 19th Dec. 1919, held that the Joannis Vatis was solely to blame, pronounced for the plaintiffs' claim, and referred the damages to the registrar.

The decree of the Court of Appeal as drawn up condemns the defendants, but not their bail. I have inquired in the registry as to why the decree was so drawn, and was informed that it was by a clerical error. In form, it is a judgment against the owners of the Joannis Vatis. While the action was proceeding, the owners of the Worsley Hall, through Messrs. F. C. Danson and Co., who had the owners' adjustment in hand, circularised the underwriters on cargo by a letter on the 22nd Jan. 1918, in which they said: "The owners of the vessel obtained bail from the owners of the Joannis Vatis to include claims for loss of cargo, as well as for damage to ship, and general average expenses," and stated that Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. had expressed the opinion that it would be reasonable for the cargo interests to join the owners of the ship in the collision proceedings. To this request some of the underwriters agreed; others of them refused to agree. The two groups are referred to in the registrar's report as the assenting and the non-assenting underwriters. The phrase "join in the collision proceedings" is not altogether free from ambiguity. It might mean that they became plaintiffs to the action, or it might mean that they were to share the costs of the action. There is the same ambiguity in the letters on the subject which are printed in the records. The action proceeded after these assents had been given and refused. Between the decree of this court and the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and also after the judgment of the Court of Appeal, some of the non-assenting underwriters asked Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. to put forward their claims in due course, and Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. said they would do so at the proper time. After the judgment of the Court of Appeal, all the underwriters on cargo were circularised—the assenting underwriters by a letter of Messrs. Danson and Co. of the 20th June 1919, and the non-assenting underwriters by a letter of Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. of the 26th July 1919. The assenting underwriters were asked for any additional claims and documents not already sent in, and the non-assenting underwriters were asked for names and addresses of the cargo owners, and for the documents to prove the claims. Of course, the underwriters could have no claim against the owners of the Joannis Vatis except as subrogated to the rights of the cargo owners' claims. The claims were cargo owners' claims.

In the result, a large number of cargo claims reached Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co., and it then turned out that the amount of them, added to the shipowners' claim, exceeded 100,000*l.* Upon this, Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. wrote the letter of the 28th July 1920:—"The collision between the above-named vessels occurred on the 2nd Aug. 1917, near to Bizerta. After the collision both vessels, being badly damaged, put into Bizerta for repairs, being whilst there within the French jurisdiction. Legal proceedings were commenced at Bizerta, but it was agreed between the parties to the proceedings to drop those proceedings and have the matter tried in the English Admiralty Court, the owners of the Joannis Vatis providing bail in a sum not exceeding 100,000*l.* or the value of that steamer, whichever should be least. The amount of bail so obtainable largely exceeds the statutory limit of liability of the vessel, which is the maximum amount for which her owners would be liable in the ordinary course of legal proceedings in this country. As you are aware, we have for some time been engaged in gathering together the documents supporting the claims for loss of or damage to cargo, with a view to the parties interested therein obtaining the benefit of the bail obtained. We have now made out the claims, the documents in support of which have, up to the present, reached us, and find that those, added to the shipowners claim, amount approximately to 136,000*l.* The shipowners' claim amounts to 62,190*l.* 14*s.* In these circumstances, as the total claims considerably exceed the amount of bail, those cargo under writers who did not agree to share the burden of the expense incurred by the shipowners in carrying on the proceedings against the Joannis Vatis are not entitled to the benefit of the bail obtained. As your company did not agree to join the shipowners in their proceedings, they will not participate in the recovery guaranteed by the bail given."

The dissenting underwriters protested, and claimed that they were entitled to have their claims put forward, and that the shipowners and cargo owners were all entitled to share in the 100,000*l.* Some of the non-consenting underwriters consulted Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., and others consulted Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co. As to those represented by Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., on the 3rd Aug. 1920 Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. wrote to Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co.: "The whole of the cargo interests were included in the action which you commenced, and are entitled to participate in the recovery." On the 4th Aug. 1920 Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. wrote to Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co.: "The shipowners, on their own behalf and as bailees of the cargo, obtained bail in the sum of 100,000*l.* subject to reduction in the event of the value of the Joannis Vatis in her damaged condition proving less. Legal proceedings were then instituted on behalf of the owners of the Worsley Hall and cargo. When the names of the underwriters interested in the damaged cargo could be ascertained, the adjusters wrote and requested the underwriters interested to join in the proceedings. At that time the extent of the damage to the Worsley Hall and her cargo was not known. The case was then pending in the Admiralty Court. In reply to Messrs. Dansons, some of the underwriters adopted the steps which had been taken on behalf of the cargo in which they were interested by the shipowners, whilst others, including the Eagle, Star, and British Dominions Co. and the Ocean Marine Insurance Co. did not. Our clients, the owners of the Worsley Hall, in the circumstances maintain that those underwriters who did not ratify their action by agreeing to join in the expense of the proceedings, are not entitled to participate in the bail." As to those who were represented by Messrs. Weightman, Pedder and Co., on the 20th Sept. 1920, Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. wrote to Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co.:—"The right course to take will be to file all the cargo claims and let the reference proceed with the assessment of claims in respect of ship and cargo. Should the assessment result in the total amount being substantially in excess of the bail of 100,000*l.*, the question of the right of those cargo owners who did not agree to share the expenses of legal proceedings when the question of liability was in issue to participate in the bail, can be decided by the judge of the Admiralty Court. . . . If you approve of the course we have indicated, we will file the claims and keep you advised as to the position, so that you will have a full opportunity of looking after the interest of the underwriters you represent." Then they add that Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. concurred in the course suggested—that Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. did concur appears from a letter quoted. Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co. did not concur. Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. thereupon sent to Messrs Weightman, Pedder, and Co. the documents relating to the claims of Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co.'s clients. Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. upon this filed the claims of the owners of the Worsley Hall and of the cargo owners, insured by the assenting underwriters, and also, without prejudice to the question of their rights to participate, those of the cargo owners insured by the non-assenting underwriters represented by Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co.; and Messrs. Botterell and Roche filed the claims of the cargo owners insured by the non-assenting underwriters represented by them.

By letters dated the 26th Feb. 1921, Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. formally intimated to both that, on reference, objection would be made to the claims of the non-assenting underwriters, and this was done.

The reference was heard on the 8th March 1921. Figures were proved, as stated in the report. The damages sustained by the owners of the Worsley Hall were 61,518*l.* 14*s.* The total damages sustained by the cargo owners were 181,487*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.*, less realised by sale of damaged cargo 96,052*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* leaving a net total of 85,435*l.* 1*s.* The total damages, therefore, amount to 146,953*l.* 15*s.* The net figures of the several cargo owners are not stated in the report; the gross figures are given. The cargo represented by Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co.—that is the assenting underwriters—comes to 121,888*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.*, and the non-assenting underwriters, represented by Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., amounts to 41,845*l.* 6*s.* 3*d.*; the cargo represented by Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co. amounts to 17,353*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, making a total of 181,087*l.* 6*s.* There is a difference of 400*l.*, which I do not understand, between these figures and those given in the report.

The only evidence on the question as to the right to participate was given by Mr. Harris, of the Reliance Marine Insurance Company, one of the non-assenting group of underwriters. His contention appears to have been that the cargo owner, to whose rights the Reliance was subrogated, was a party to the action right through, but not so as to be bound by any judgment.

The registrar reported: (1) That there was due to the plaintiffs in respect of their claim the sum and interest as stated in the schedule. The schedule gives the figures:—"Claim of owners of the Worsley Hall, 61,518*l.* 14*s.* and the cargo: 181,487*l.* 2*s.* 2*d.* making a total of 243,005*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*; from this amount there has to be deducted the sum of 96,052*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, the amount realised by the sale of the damaged cargo." (2) At the foot of his reasons he says:—"I decide that the non-assenting underwriters are entitled to share in the 100,000*l.*" In his reasons he states the facts, and he holds that the non-assenting underwriters having refused to join in the action, would have barred their claim in the action, but that Hill, Dickinson, and Co., receiving claims from the owners and the assenting underwriters, had assented to the non-assenting underwriters becoming parties to the action in the second stage, and sharing in the 100,000*l.*, and that by reason of Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co., receiving claims and documents from the non-assenting underwriters, the earlier clients were estopped from refusing to allow the non-assenting underwriters to share.

The owners of the Worsley Hall objected to this part of the report, and contended that there was no such agreement and no such estoppel. For the non-assenting underwriters it was not contended that there was either agreement or estoppel, as held by the registrar. One contention was that they were parties to the action from the beginning, and entitled to share in its net results. This was not pressed, and was clearly not according to the facts. Their real contention was that the plaintiffs to the action were the owners of the Worsley Hall, and no others, and that the owners sued and obtained bail as owners of the ship and bailees of the cargo, and had recovered as owners of the ship and bailees of the cargo, and could not be heard to say that they had not: for the cargo owners, on the faith of the statement that the owners had obtained bail to include claims for loss of cargo, had taken no action against the owners of the Joannis Vatis, and the limitation period had run out before the 26th July 1920, when for the first time the owners of the Worsley Hall, through Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co., informed the non-assenting underwriters that they would not be entitled to share in the recovery, and they, therefore, contended that the bail being a fund in court, the non-assenting underwriters were entitled to intervene at any time before final decree. They said they had intervened at the reference, and, at any rate as to those represented by Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., it had been agreed they should, if necessary, they asked to be joined as plaintiffs.

For the owners and the assenting underwriters, it was agreed that the owners of the Worsley Hall sued as owners of the ship and bailees of the cargo—this was supported by affidavit—and that they recovered as owners of the ship and bailees of the cargo; that the non-assenting underwriters were not, and could not, become, and never became, parties; that the owners of the Worsley Hall had recovered a personal judgment against the defendants, and that the security in shape of a bail bond was a personal contract of suretyship, and there was no res or fund in court in which the non-assenting underwriters could have any interest so as to entitle them to intervene; and that the non-assenting underwriters at this stage ought not to be added as plaintiffs, for they had elected not to share in the burden of the litigation, and ought not to be permitted to share in the recovery. And that when the plaintiffs, the owners, recovered, they would not be bound to account to the non-assenting underwriters, and, in any case, could not be called upon to account in this court or in these proceedings.

Now, if, as both parties contend, the true view of the facts is that the only plaintiffs were the owners of the Worsley Hall, suing as owners of the ship and bailees of the cargo, and they alone recovered judgment, then, unless there was a fund in court and a right to cargo owners to intervene, it would seem that no one except the owners were entitled to be heard on the reference, and that the final decree for the amount of damages, as found by the registrar, should be a decree awarding those damages to the owners alone. If that be the true view of the facts, neither the assenting underwriters nor the non-assenting underwriters had any right to be heard; neither recovered any judgment of liability; neither is entitled to any finding of the registrar or judgment of the court in their favour. The judgment must be for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Worsley Hall. It must also be for the full amount of the damages proved, for, as bailees, they were entitled to recover from the wrongdoers the full value of the cargo lost, or the full amount of the damage to the cargo damaged. Having proved the amount, they would be entitled to have the report as to damages confirmed, and the judgment of liability converted into a final judgment. And to-day all the court would have to do would be to confirm the report as to the damages and order final judgment to be entered for the owners of the Worsley Hall for the amount paid, with interest, and say that the registrar had no power to decide anything as to the rights of the non-assenting underwriters or of the assenting underwriters. Plaintiffs, the owners of the Worsley Hall, would enforce the bail. When the 100,000*l.* was in their pockets, questions would arise as to whether they were, as to part of it, trustees for the assenting underwriters, or for the non-assenting underwriters, or for both of them. But that question would not arise in this action, or in this court. Nor could this position be displaced on the ground that there was an agreement to submit to this court the question of the non-assenting underwriter to participate. There was an agreement between Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. and Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. that the question of the non-assenting underwriters' right to participate in the bail should be submitted to the judge. But, as between Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. and Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co. there was no agreement at all; and as to Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co. the question to be submitted was the right to participate in the 100,000*l.* bail, not the liability of the owners of the Worsley Hall when they had got the 100,000*l.* in their pockets.

The contention of the owners of the Worsley Hall would, therefore, seem to be sound upon the agreed facts, if there is no fund in court and no right of intervention. It is, therefore, necessary to determine whether plaintiffs are right in contending that there is no fund in court. In my view they are wrong. It is true the ship was at Bizerta, and was not under arrest of this court nor capable of being presently arrested by this court. But the agreement was to give bail in this court, and bail was given in this court. The effect was that, as regards the claim for which bail was given, the bail took the place of the ship. It is much more common for an undertaking for bail to be given to prevent arrest than for bail to be given after arrest. That is contemplated by Order IX., r. 10: "In Admiralty action in rem no service of writ or warrant shall be required where the solicitor of the defendant agrees to accept service and to put in bail, or to pay money into court in lieu of bail." As a corollary of this, by Order CXXII. 1918, "a solicitor not entering an appearance or putting in bail, or payimg money into court in lieu of bail in an Admiralty action in rem, in pursuance of his written undertaking so to do, shall be liable to attachment." And, on the other hand, when the undertaking is accepted and, a fortiori, when the bail is accepted as sufficient, the right to arrest the ship for the same cause of action is at least suspended, if not altogether gone.

By giving bail, the defendants saved the Joannis Vatis, if she came within the jurisdiction, from arrest for the claim to answer which bail was given. I see no difference in principle between bail given when the ship is actually within jurisdiction and bail given when it is not. And the bail was given in this court, and, by the terms of the bond, the sureties submitted to the jurisdiction of the court and consented that execution might issue against them if the defendants did not pay. It was suggested that these phrases in the bond were only survivals from the form in use when the Admiralty Court was not a part of the High Court of Justice. But they have to-day a meaning and effect. They enable the court to order execution to issue against the sureties immediately upon default of the principal debtors. It is said that in this case the bond is merely a personal contract of suretyship between the owners of the Worsley Hall and the sureties. In form it is not that at all. In substance, whatever else it is, it is an undertaking to the court, and in my view it is, for the present purpose, equivalent to the res, or a fund in court produced by the sale of the res. It is none the less a fund in court, because the judgment of the court of Appeal does not in terms condemn the bail. If, then, the bail is equivalent to a fund in court, it remains to consider whether the non-assenting underwriters had any right to intervene and claim an interest in it. By Order XII., r. 24, "in an Admiralty action in rem any person not named in the writ may intervene and appear as heretofore on filing an affidavit showing that he is interested in the res under arrest or in the fund in the registry." I take that to apply to a case where bail has been given. The bail is the equivalent of the res and of a fund in the registry.

On the assumption made by both parties that the only plaintiffs were the owners of the Worsley Hall, suing in respect both of ship and cargo, the non-assenting underwriters were persons not named in the writ. No affidavit was filed, but the facts have been proved.

That leaves only the question whether upon the facts proved the non-assenting underwriters were interested in the fund. The owners of the Worsley Hall, as they informed the cargo owners on the 27th Aug. 1917, obtained bail, "to include claims for loss of cargo as well as for damage to ship, and G.-A. expenses." They did not then say they had obtained it as bailees of cargo only; either they did or did not obtain the bail to include claims for loss of cargo. If they did, the cargo owners, the assenting underwriters and non-assenting underwriters alike are all interested in the fund. If they did not they cannot be heard to say that they did not, for they never withdrew or qualified that representation until after the period had expired within which the cargo owners could as of right bring an action against the owners of the Joannis Vatis. It is quite true that they invited the cargo owners to participate in the litigations, or the costs of it; but it was not until after the limitation two years had run out that they informed the non-assenting underwriters, on the 23rd July 1920, that the bail was not obtained for them. In the meantime, the non-assenting underwriters had altered their position, for they had continued to act on the basis that their claims would rank against the bail, instead of taking any steps to recover their own damages by separate action. In my judgment, both the non-assenting underwriters and the assenting underwriters were entitled to intervene at any time up to final judgment. And final judgment will not be until the report is confirmed. (Duke of Buccleuch, 67 L. T. Rep. 739; 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; (1892) P. 201.)

When they intervene they must take the recovery as they find it. The first charge upon the 100,000*l.* will be the shipowners' costs of recovery, so far as they have not been paid by the defendants. But in the balance the non-assenting underwriters are, in my judgment, entitled to participate. In principle, the result is only what would have followed if no bail had been obtained in respect of cargo, and after judgment in an action in respect to the ship alone. The owners of the Joannis Vatis had obtained decree of limitation, and paid the limited amount into court. Under a decree so made, all the cargo owners would have been entitled to appear and become parties to the limitation action and to file claims.

The owners of the Worsley Hall are, in effect, seeking to put the non-assenting underwriters in a worse position than if bail for cargo damage had never been obtained, and the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship, and each of the cargo owners would have claimed, by virtue of the order of the court, a judgment for his proportion of the limited fund, and it would be immaterial that plaintiffs, the owners of the ship, had sued in the damages action for themselves alone, and that they had obtained bail for their own claim alone. In the reference under the limitation decree the registrar would have seen that the cargo damages were not included twice over in the award, first as damages to the shipowner as bailee, and secondly as damages to the cargo owners as cargo owners.

I have decided this case upon the ground, common to both sides, that the writ was in the name of the owners of the Worsley Hall alone, suing in respect of ship and cargo. But for that consensus, I confess I should have had some doubt whether the writ was not also in the name of the cargo owners. "Owners of the steamship Worsley Hall and cargo" seems to me an inapt description of owners of steamship Worsley Hall suing in respect of ship and cargo. And, though the writ was issued on the instructions of the owners of the Worsley Hall alone, and, as is proved, they intended they alone should sue, yet, if the writ was in the name of the owners of the cargo, I see no reason why owners of cargo could not by ratification make it their writ. Keighley, Maxsted, and Co. v. Bryan Durrant and Co. (84 L. T. Rep. 777; (1901) A. C. 240) throws no doubt upon the principle that an act done in the name of a person, though without authority, can be ratified by him, and it then becomes his act. Ancona v. Marks (31 L. J. Ex. 163). If the writ was, without authority, in the name of cargo owners, it may be that the assenting underwriters ratified and the non-assenting underwriters refused to ratify, and the assenting underwriters became and the non-assenting underwriters did not become plaintiffs to the action. But it is unnecessary to decide upon this. The case was not argued upon the footing that the writ was issued in the name of the cargo owners. Probably it was rightly argued, for in addition to the address of the plaintiffs given in the writ, the statement of claim at which I have looked alleges that the plaintiffs have suffered damage by reason of a collision between their steamship Worsley Hall and the steamship Joannis Vatis, and alleges that the Joannis Vatis struck the stern of the Worsley Hall, doing considerable damage. Except in the description of the Worsley Hall as carrying a general cargo, there is no reference to the cargo. And the true view may well be that neither the assenting underwriters not the non-assenting underwriters were in a position to become parties to the action as plaintiffs without an order of the court, and no order was made, and their rights have to be determined, as I have determined them, as of interveners having an interest in the fund in court represented by the bail.

For these reasons I dismiss the motion in objection, with costs, and confirm the report, with this variation only, that the non-assenting underwriters are entitled to share in the 100,000*l.* after payment of the plaintiffs' costs in the damage action.

The owners of the Worsley Hall and the assenting underwriters appealed.

Aspinall, K.C., Dunlop, K.C., and A. Bucknill for the appellants.—Order XII., r. 24, does not give the non-assenting underwriters the right to intervene, for this is not an action in rem, where the bail or proceeds of sale are in court. Here there is no bail or fund in court, but merely an undertaking to provide bail, a mere contract of suretyship. The judgment is in personam, and the non-assenting underwriters have no claim against any res. Secondly, the non-assenting shareholders refused to join in the action and not entitled to the fruits of the appellants' diligence; nor are they bound by the judgment. The owners of the Worsley Hall are claiming as bailees, and can put forward such claims on behalf of the various cargo owners as they please. They referred to:

Stephens, K.C., and Balloch, and Raeburn, K.C., and R. F. Hayward, for non-assenting underwriters, were not called upon.

Bankes, L.J.—The short point raised on this appeal is whether a person, who has sued as owner of a vessel and cargo and has established the liability of the defendant to pay damages in respect of ship and cargo, can exclude certain cargo owners from any share in the benefit of that judgment, because they refused or elected not to take their share in the expenses connected with establishing the liability. That really is the issue, although it seems to have been decided in rather an irregular and informal way, but I think the decision was asked for by all parties, and it was right that the learned judge should have decided the point under the circumstances in which it was brought before him. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The position of the plaintiffs was that they were owners of the Worsley Hall, and had a right, therefore, to maintain an action for damages in that capacity. They also claimed as owners of the cargo. They were not, in fact, owners of the cargo, but merely bailees; but as bailees they had a right of action against the wrongdoer, and the measure of the damages would be the value of the cargo or, of course, if they desired it and if they had some special cause of action as bailees, they might have limited their claim either in the indorsement on the writ or in the statement of claim to a limited claim—not a claim to the value of the cargo, but a limited claim to some damage to themselves by reason of the damage to the cargo. But they did not take that course. The action proceeded and continued to the end with the full claim for damages as bailees of the whole of the cargo. No amendment was ever made to the writ; no limitation was ever included in the statement of claim, and the action began and continued in that form. Certain of the underwriters did not agree to join in the action, in the sense that they did not agree to pay any of the expenses; but they never agreed to withdraw from the action. They never agreed that their claims were not included in the action. Their position was: "We are not prepared to allow our claims to be put forward by Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co., nor are we prepared to pay part of the costs of the action, but we insist upon our right to bring in our claims in this action by our own solicitors." I gather that from a letter of the 26th Feb. 1921, in which Messrs. Hill, Dickinson, and Co. wrote to Messrs. Thomas Cooper and Co., who were the solicitors representing some of the non-assenting underwriters, in these terms: "As you know, Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co. took over the claims of certain of the underwriters who did not consent to join in the legal proceedings and you represent other underwriters on cargo who took up the same position. We suggested without prejudice to this question that all claims should be assessed and the point subsequently dealt with by the judge, and you assented to this course, but Messrs. Weightman, Pedder, and Co. did not. We accordingly handed them the papers relating to the claims of the underwriters who had consulted them and they have been separately filed through Messrs. Botterell and Roche. . . . We intend at the reference to object to the claims represented by Messrs. Botterell and Roche on the ground that the parties interested in putting forward the claims declined to ratify the proceedings which had been taken on their behalf by the shipowners. As your clients are in the same position we shall take the same point, but we think the proper course will be to agree, as we did with you, that all claims should be assessed by the registrar without prejudice to this question, and it can then be afterwards decided." That seems to me to have been a most reasonable proposal.

The matter then came before the registrar. He was directed by the order of the Court of Appeal, which had been affirmed by the House of Lords, to ascertain the damages which the defendants were liable to pay to the plaintiffs, suing in the capacity in which they were suing, and the only way in which he could do that was to ascertain the proper amount of the claims which were brought before him. Those claims were the claim of the shipowners, the claim of the people who were called the assenting underwriters, and the claim of the people who were called the non-assenting underwriters. At the reference, as one would expect, the question was raised which had been raised in Messrs. Hill, Dickinson's letter, although it was suggested the matter should not come up for decision till the matter came before the judge. But it was argued by counsel and the registrar was apparently invited to come to a decision as to whether plaintiffs had any right to exclude the non-assenting underwriters from presenting their claims, and the registrar decided that the plaintiffs had no such right. The plaintiffs moved by way of objection to the registrar's report, and it would seem from the notice of appeal that the only point to which objection was taken was that the registrar had said that the non-assenting underwriters were entitled to participate. There is a long notice of appeal, but I think the substance of it is contained in this paragraph: "That the owners of the Worsley Hall and the assenting underwriters were entitled to the full fruits of the bail and judgment which they obtained at their own risk and expense, and they ought not to be deprived thereof by the non-assenting underwriters who deliberately elected not to join in the action."

When the matter came before the learned judge he found ground for supporting the registrar's view by referring to Order XII., r. 24, and saying that in his view these non-assenting underwriters had a right under the circumstances of this case to intervene. But it does not seem to me necessary to decide the case on those grounds, or to look at the matter from any other point of view than what the position of the plaintiffs was. It is true it was not a representative action in the ordinary sense of the word, but it was a case of persons who were claiming as bailees—and they were bailees—the full value of all the cargo on this vessel and saying at the same time: "When we get the money, which is limited to 100,000*l.*, which is not sufficient to meet all claims, we intend to pay it over to a certain class of cargo owners and to exclude the other class, because they would not help us by sharing in the expenses of the litigation which was necessary to establish the liability." In my opinion, when once that fact comes to the knowledge of the court, it is the court's duty to stay the distribution of this fund until the rights of the parties have been established and until it has been determined whether or not the plaintiffs had the right they claimed; and that is really in substance what happened.

Mr. Butler Aspinall and Mr. Dunlop have argued that they are entitled to a judgment, and that it must be left to some future occasion to decide what is to be done with the money. That would be so, it seems to me, but for the fact that from the time the question first arose it has always been treated between the parties as a matter that had to be decided by the judge after the registrar had reported upon the amount of the damages. In my opinion, the court should treat this question as though with the assent of the parties the judge was asked to decide how this money had to be distributed, and to decide at the same time as he either affirmed or rejected the registrar's report.

Now all the registrar has done is to decide, for the reasons he has given in his report, that the non-assenting underwriters were entitled to participate, and, having done that, all he reports is that the claim of the owners of the Worsley Hall has been allowed at 61,518*l.* odd, and the claim of the cargo owners at 181,487*l.* odd, and that from this amount has to be deducted 96,000*l.* odd, the amount realised by the sale of the salved cargo. I do not think he professes to deal with the question as to which of the cargo owners' claims must be considered in reference to the amount to be deducted. He leaves that to be dealt with by the persons who have charge of this matter on behalf of all the cargo owners, and he does not in terms, as it seems to me, decide that as between the persons entitled to share in this fund that the amount is to be distributed pro rata. When the matter came before the learned judge, he affirmed the registrar's view that the non-assenting underwriters were entitled to participate. I do not think he in terms says that the amount is to be distributed pro rata. What he says is: "When they (the non-assenting underwriters) intervene they must take the recovery as they find it." Then he does say this: "The first charge upon the 100,000*l.* will be the shipowner's costs of recovery, so far as they have not been paid by the defendants. But in the balance the non-assenting underwriters are, in my judgment, entitled to participate," and it is, as it seems to me, from that point only that the appeal to this court is made. But it is said that in the Admiralty Court a judgment such as the learned judge has now pronounced is a decision that the cargo owners and the shipowners will participate rateably. I assume it is, and I see no reason to think that that view is wrong. That is not appealed from, but Mr. Dunlop has contended that it has not yet been decided, or that it ought to be decided hereafter. If, however, that is the correct view of the learned judge's judgment, I see no reason to doubt that that part of it is right as well as the part in which he agrees with the registrar, and I will only, in conclusion, refer to this sentence in the judge's judgment, which seems to me to sum up the result. He says: "In principle, the result is only what would have followed if no bail had been obtained in respect of cargo and after judgment in an action in respect to the ship alone, the owners of the Joannis Vatis had obtained a decree of limitation, and paid the limited amount into court. Under a decree so made, all the cargo owners would have been entitled to appear and become parties to the limitation action, and to file claims." In other words, it is not the practice of the Admiralty Court to allow money to be distributed until the claims on the money have been dealt with. That seems to me to be what was done in The Glamorganshire (59 L. T. Rep. 572; 6 Asp. Mar. L. Cas.344; 13 App. Cas. 454), and I think it is right. I see no reason whatever to interfere with the course taken by the learned judge, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Scrutton, L.J—I agree that this appeal must be dismissed, but, as these proceedings are a little complicated, I think it is best to express my judgment in my own way. The exact point on the notice of appeal which we have to decide is, as I understand, whether certain persons described as non-assenting underwriters—which is commercially accurate but technically quite wrong, because the Admiralty Court has nothing to do with underwriters—whether the cargo owners to whose rights the underwriters were subrogated have any right to share pari passu in the sum of 100,000*l.*, which sum was received from certain persons who have given a bail bond. I mention that as the only point to be decided, because Mr. Dunlop has raised a number of other points which are not in the notice of appeal, and which I am not purporting to decide, though I have a strong opinion on some of them.

The case arises in this way. [His Lordship stated the facts.] The question is, amongst whom is the bail in 100,000*l.* to be divided? In my view, the bail, when recovered, would be a substitute for the res. I am not expressing any opinion as to whether it would be possible to enter personal judgment against the owners of the Greek ship for the amount of the damages which the registrar has found, or as to what steps the owners can take to limit their liability at all. But obviously the question will arise as to how this 100,000*l.* is to be divided. In my view the practice of the Admiralty Court has been, and should be, that when it has a fund under its control it should take care that it is divided among all the proper claimants on the record, and it should not let the fund be paid out to any party until it has been seen that all people who may properly claim on the fund have put forward, or have had an opportunity of putting forward, their claims.

I referred during the argument to the opinion expressed by the Privy Council in The Glamorganshire (59 L. T. Rep. 572, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 344; 13 App. Cas. 454), which seems to me to confirm what I have stated. In that case the owners of the cargo sued. Their interest was as shippers under a bill of lading which they had pledged for nearly the value of the goods with a bank, and the bank was not a party. What was the court to do with the fund when recovered? The Privy Council said "that the plaintiffs have an interest to maintain the suit to recover the money"—that is, the whole of the money—"for the benefit of those persons who on inquiry are proved to be entitled, and under circumstances in which the money will be not be paid out till the owners of The Glamorganshire are completely freed from all claims." That is to say, the money must be so appropriated that the defendants are not to be hit by further claims; and in my opinion the money must be so appropriated that no persons who have a claim on the fund can be shut out from sharing it.

What is the interest of the plaintiffs in this cargo? It is correctly said that they have a right to sue as against the wrongdoer for the full amount as bailees. That follows from the decision in The Winkfield (85 L. T. Rep. 668, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 259; (1902) P. 42). The leading authority cited in that case is the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Turner v. Hardcastle (1862, 5 L. T. Rep. at p. 750; 11 C. B. N. S. at p. 708): "The defendant is a mere wrongdoer, having no right either under Cooke, the mortgagee, or anyone else. The defendant, therefore, is liable to the plaintiffs for the full value of the goods; and the plaintiffs are liable to Cooke for his proportion." That is to say, in this case the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover the full value of the cargo against the wrongdoers, but would have to account over and would be liable to the owners of the cargo for their proper share. I express no opinion as to what their proper share is, because Mr. Dunlop has some point about general average, which I have not quite understood, and I did not think it was necessary to follow it up.

If I understood the figures correctly the ship put in a claim which the registrar assessed at the sum of 61,518*l.*, the solicitors for the plaintiffs put in cargo claims which were assessed at 163,000*l.* odd, and that 163,000*l.* included a large percentage of claims by underwriters who had assented and were ready to bear their share of the costs, and some proportion of underwriters who had not assented—the reference does not distinguish which. But the registrar stated that, against the total of 181,000*l.*, 96,000*l.* would have to be deducted as the value of the cargo salved and sold as damaged. He did not in any way apportion to which claims that salved cargo related. While, therefore, as against the fund it would reduce the amount claimed, as between the claimants the registrar's report did not in any way state what was the amount payable to each claimant.

It is not quite clear, exactly, what happened at the reference. As between some parties there had been a sort of agreement beforehand that the judge was to determine who was to share. Others parties did not agree to that. Then, apparently, in some way the point was taken before the registrar that certain non-assenting underwriters were not entitled to share in the 100,000*l.* at all, and the registrar gave a formal report, saying: "I find that there is due to the plaintiffs in respect of their claim the sum and interest as stated in the schedule." The formal report does not in any way decide the point which is the subject of this appeal. The registrar, however, gave some reasons for his report, which undoubtedly show that in his view, though it is not included in the formal report, he was deciding that the non-assenting underwriters were entitled to share in the 100,000*l.* Thereupon the shipowners appealed to the judge, and one of their reasons is that which has been read by my Lord, that the owners of the Worsley Hall and the assenting underwriters were entitled to the full amount of the bail, and that the registrar was wrong in including the non-assenting underwriters. The learned judge dismissed the appeal, and the view he seems to have taken was that on the 100,000*l.*, when recovered, the first charge would be the cost of recovery—which would be natural for a bailee accounting for a sum—but in the balance the non-assenting underwriters were in his view entitled to participate. It is against that part of the order declaring that the non-assenting underwriters were to be allowed to share in the 100,000*l.* that the appeal is brought, and that is the point we have to decide.

In my opinion it should be decided against the shipowners on the ground that it is the duty of the court, when by its process a sum has been recovered in the Admiralty, to see that it goes to the persons entitled to claim. It is the same principle, in my view, as is stated in The Glamorganshire (sup.), and it appears to be a principle which does justice between the parties concerned. When I heard Mr. Dunlop argue that the money should be paid to his clients, the shipowners, and that then they would first appropriate the whole to their claim and the cost of recovery, and then leave any balance to be divided, leaving the non-assenting underwriters out in the cold, it struck me as so manifestly unjust that if it were not already the practice of the Admiralty Court it was desirable it should be made its practice as soon as possible. But, in my view, it is the practice of the Admiralty Court, when it recovers a sum in lieu of the res, to see that all persons having a claim on the fund have the amount divided between them, and in my present view, though I have not heard the matter fully argued, it should be divided between them pari passu. Further than that I do not express any opinion, but I certainly must not be taken as giving any assent to the idea that the shipowners' claim for damages is to be alone first considered, and that the cargo owners are only to come in when the shipowner's claim has been fully satisfied.

For these reasons I think the contention that the non-assenting underwriters should not be allowed to share in the 100,000*l.* recovered from the bail is erroneous, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

ATKIN, L.J.—I agree, but I think it advisable to add my reasons because of the arguments addressed to us, and because of the somewhat unusual complications that are to be found in this case.

This action was commenced in what is quite common form in the Admiralty Division by a writ which does not specify the names of any of the parties. It is between "the owners of the steamship Worsley Hall and cargo" and "the owners of the steamship Joannis Vatis." That is a proper mode of issuing a writ, as was held in The Assunta (86 L. T. Rep. 660; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; (1902) P. 150) which decided that the old practice of the Admiralty prevailed notwithstanding the provisions of the rules in the Judicature Act. The difference in the practice has led to confusion in this case, because it has been the contention on the one hand that "the owners of the ship and cargo," if written out at large, would include, first, the names of the shipowners, and secondly, the names of all the owners of the cargo and the different items of cargo that were damaged. The other view is that in using the words "the owners of the ship and cargo" only one set of persons were meant to be described, and those were the owners of the ship suing also as the owners of the cargo. It has been held by the learned judge, as he says by the common assent of the parties who argued it before him, that it was the latter view only that was intended, and that the owners of the ship intended to sue also as owners of the cargo. I think that is probably right, because the solicitors appeared to have had no authority to act for anybody at the date of issuing the writ except the owners of the ship, and they had a right to sue as owners of the cargo by reason of their being bailees of the cargo. Therefore the right view is that the writ was issued by the shipowners claiming in respect of their own ship, and claiming also by reason of their special property as the bailees of the cargo, and they eventually by negotiation procured the owners of the Greek ship to put in bail to the extent of 100,000*l*. Now when a bailee sues he is entitled to recover the full value of the article converted or the full amount of the deterioration of the value of the chattel wrongfully injured. It is not necessary to decide in this case whether he can confine himself, if he sues, to the value of his own particular interest or the deterioration in the goods to the extent to which he himself has suffered. It is plain, at any rate, that he is entitled to claim, and he clearly could recover in the action, the full value of the damage; and it is plain in this case that it is upon that footing that the shipowners sued. At one time they suggested the damages would be 150,000*l*., and it is sufficient to say that early in the action they sought to induce the other cargo owners, as they described them, to join in the action; and it is plain that they did so upon the footing that these cargo owners were entitled to share the expenses of the action, whether they won or it failed, and that could only have been on the footing that the action was brought to recover the values in which they would be interested. In other words, the claim went beyond the shipowners' own special interest, if they had any, in the fund. Under those circumstances the action was fought, some cargo owners accepting the invitation and some refusing, and the decree was made eventually by this court pronouncing for the claim of the plaintiffs. That claim was that the damages to ship and cargo should be assessed, and the decree went on to provide that the defendants should be condemned "in the said damage" and that "the said damage" should be assessed by the registrar and merchants.

It appears to me, therefore, that it clearly was the duty of the registrar to assess the whole of the damage to the cargo in respect of which the plaintiffs, as bailees, were suing. So far no question would arise, but when that order was made the cargo owners, who had not responded to the invitation to share in the expenses, put forward a claim, first to be represented at the assessment, and secondly to share in the proceeds of the judgment, and that claim was, it appears to me, repudiated by the plaintiffs. The rights of the bailee have been plainly determined, so far as this court is concerned, by the memorable judgment of the late Lord Collins in The Winkfield (85 L. T. Rep. 668; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 259; (1902) P. 42), and I need only read this passage, which, I think, sums up the whole of the law, so far as it is necessary to this decision: "As between bailee and stranger, possession gives title—that is, not a limited interest, but absolute and complete ownership, and he is entitled to receive back a complete equivalent for the whole loss or deterioration of the thing itself. As between bailor and bailee, the real interests of each must be inquired into, and, as the bailee has to account for the thing bailed, so he must account for that which has become its equivalent and now represents it. What he has received above his own interest he has received to the use of his bailor. The wrongdoer, having once paid full damages to the bailee, has an answer to any action by the bailor."

It appears to me to be plain that bailees, having recovered on the footing of the full amount of the damage done to the cargo, would have to account to the bailors for what they had received over and above their own interest as bailees. But the contentions that have been put forward by the bailees in this case were, first, that the registrar was not to consider in the assessing of the damages the claims that were made by the cargo owners who had in the course of the trial refused to make themselves at that stage responsible for the costs; secondly, that even if the whole of the damages were to be taken into account by the registrar, the non-assenting cargo owners were not to have any interest in the amounts that were so recovered; and, thirdly, they contended—at any rate, they contended it before us—that in any case, even if the non-assenting cargo owners had any rights, the proper procedure was to hand over the whole of the money to the bailees, who were repudiating the right of the non-assenting cargo owners to receive anything, and then leave them to formulate their rights against the bailees to account to them. I think the plaintiffs, the bailees, were wrong in every one of those contentions. It appears to me plain that it was the duty of the registrar to assess the whole of the damage as he had been ordered to do, and it appears to me also plain that the non-assenting cargo owners, being bailors, had a right to have the bailee account to them for so much as he would receive in respect of claims made in respect of their cargo. Those matters seem to me to be beyond dispute. One could well understand a man saying, this was an action that involved some risk, and by your standing aside you have shown that you were prepared to take the benefits and have not been prepared to shoulder the burdens, and to some extent that is true. But, on the other hand, the bailor may say, you chose to sue as bailee for the whole of the damage, you recovered a sum of money, and if you did recover anything for me, then I have got my rights at law against you. I think that is the true view, and that the bailors cannot be shut out because they refused to bear part of the costs.

The question as to whether the proper procedure has been adopted is to my mind the only substantial question in this case—it is the only question on which there was any doubt—but on considering it I think we ought to have no hesitation in deciding that the proper procedure has been adopted. A sum of money is available to the bailee; it is not yet in court, but it undoubtedly represents the whole of the sum of money which can be enforced against the defendants in respect of the whole damage to the cargo, and when the bailee receives it he will be under an obligation to account to all the cargo owners.

Before he has received it, and before the court even has taken the necessary steps to enable the money to be paid, or given authority to him to collect it, he repudiates before the court the obligation to recognise the rights of his bailors. Under those circumstances it seems to me impossible that any self-respecting court could act in such a way as to enable that bailee to receive the whole of the money as long as the court had any control over it at all, and it appears to me perfectly proper that the court should allow the claimants against the bailee to come to the court to say that they seek in that action to establish their claim. That is what has been permitted in this case. If the sum of money were in court, such claim would be made under ordinary circumstances in the common law courts, and possibly an issue might be directed in respect of each claimant, or a general inquiry might be directed, and I think it is perfectly right that the registrar under the direction of the judge or with the assent of the judge, should have undertaken such inquiry in the present circumstances. I am not quite satisfied that the learned judge's decision under Order XII., r. 24, was necessary or even well-founded. That rule provides that: "In an Admiralty action in rem any person not named in the writ may intervene and appear as heretofore, on filing an affidavit showing that he is interested in the res under arrest, or in the fund of the registry." I can understand that may apply where the claimant would come in the nature of a defendant, who would, therefore, ordinarily enter an appearance; and that would, no doubt, apply in the ordinary limitation suit, where the plaintiff is the person who provides the money, and where the writ is directed to all persons who have claims in respect of the damage in respect of which liability is sought to be limited. In that case the claimants are strictly and in form in the nature of defendants. I am not at all sure that that rule applies where claimants come in who really are claiming as being interested in what has been recovered by the plaintiffs. But that is merely form, and I am quite sure that there is ample jurisdiction in the court to give effect to claims which are made to the court to share in the fund, or the equivalent of the fund, before the money is released to persons whom the court may consider have no right to it all. Here it is quite plain that the amount for which bail has been found cannot be made available at all except by permission of the court, and I think the court has ample jurisdiction to say that it will have an inquiry as to who are the persons beneficially, and therefore truly, entitled to this money, and will only give permission to enforce the bail bond to the persons who are beneficially entitled to receive their money.

The only other point is, upon what terms are they entitled to receive it? It appears to me that the learned registrar meant to decide, and I think he will decide, that all the cargo claimants were entitled to share pari passu. In one event he says the claimants' solicitors are "estopped from refusing, at the eleventh hour, to allow the non-assenting underwriters to share pari passu in the fund available for all claimants." That means that the shipowners, in respect of the damage to the ship, and the cargo owners, in respect of the damage to the cargo, share in the fund available for all claimants. I think that the learned judge clearly was of the same opinion. He says: "The first charge will be the shipowners' costs of recovery, and in the balance the non-assenting underwriters are entitled to participate." That must mean, I think, pari passu, especially as he then makes a reference in principle to the proceedings by analogy for limitation of liability where, as we all know, the fund is under the statute distributed rateably to the claimants.

It appears to me, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge below was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

THE RAN; THE GRAYGARTH. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Limitation of liability—Tug and tow belonging to same owners—Tow navigated by tug—Collision of tow with another vessel—Negligent navigation of tow by tug—Owners liable on tonnage of tow—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.

Where a tug and her tow belong to the same owners, and the tow is brought into collision with a third vessel by the negligence of the tug, the liability of the owners of the tug and her tow is not limited to a fund calculated upon the tonnage of the tug alone, notwithstanding that there was no negligence on the part of any person on board the tow. The owners are liable in respect of a sum calculated upon the tonnage of the tow.

A barge was damaged in collision with another barge; the latter barge at the time of the collision was being towed by a tug which belonged to her owners. In an action in rem against the barge, her owners were held liable in personam on the ground that the collision was caused by the negligence of their servants on board the tug. The owners of the tug and tow then claimed to limit their liability under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 on the tonnage of the tug alone. Hill, J. held that they were entitled to do so.

Held, that the judgment of Hill, J. should have been an ordinary judgment in rem against the owners of the tow because of the improper navigation of the tow through the acts of the defendants' servants on the tug and that the tow and not the tug was the vessel in relation to which liability should be limited under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Decision of Hill, J. reversed.

Appeals from Hill, J., in two actions, the first by the owners of the barge Para against Messrs. Rea, Limited, owners of the barge Ran and also of the steam-tug Graygarth, for damages for the sinking of the Para by collision with the Ran, and the second by the defendants in the first action against the plaintiffs in that action to limit their liability to 8*l.* per ton of the vessel whose navigation was at fault, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, sub-s. 1, provides :

The owners of a ship, British or foreign, shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity, that is to say . . . (d) Where any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel, or to any goods, merchandise or other things whatsoever on board any other vessel, by reason of the improper navigation of the ship ; be liable in damage beyond the following amounts, that is to say . . . (ii.) In respect of loss of, or damage to, vessels, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life, or personal injury or not, an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

The following is taken from the written judgment of Hill, J. in the Admiralty Division :

" The plaintiffs in this limitation suit are Messrs. Rea, Limited. They are owners of the tug Graygarth and of the vessel or dumb-barge Ran. On the 29th Oct. 1919, while the Graygarth had in tow the Ran and two other craft in the river Mersey, the Ran was brought into collision with the laden barge Para, and the Para was sunk. The owners of the Para and her cargo suffered damage to the amount of about 3000*l.* By a judgment of this court Messrs. Rea, Limited have been condemned, in those damages. By the present action they seek a decree limiting their liability to 8*l.* per ton on the tonnage of the Graygarth.

" The defendants contend that Messrs. Rea are not entitled to so limit their liability, but are only entitled to limit it on the basis of the aggregate tonnage of the Graygarth and the Ran. The tonnage of the Graygarth, ascertained in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Acts, at 8*l.* per ton equals a sum of 1131*l.* ; and the tonnage of the Ran, ascertained in accordance with the Act, at 8*l.* per ton equals about 3000*l.* There has, so far, been no judgment against the Ran, and no decision that Messrs. Rea, are liable as owners of the Ran. At the trial that question was not discussed. The proceedings in the damage action were as follows : On the 5th Dec. 1919, the writ in rem against the owners of the barge Ran was issued. An appearance was entered. I infer there was an undertaking to put in bail, as a bail bond was executed on the 21st July 1920, the day following delivery of the statement of claim in the limitation action. The statement of claim in the damage action alleged that the collision was caused by the negligent navigation and (or) management of the Ran and (or) her tug or the flotilla of barges in which she was, by the defendants or their servants. The decree, dated the 10th Feb. 1920 was as follows : 'The judge doth pronounce the collision in question in this action to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the tug Graygarth, which was towing the barge Ran, and for the plaintiffs' claim for damages in consequence thereof ; and doth condemn the said defendants, the owners of the said barge Ran, in the said damages and costs.'

" That was a judgment in personam only against the persons who were the owners of the Ran, namely, Messrs. Rea. It does not condemn the Graygarth, against which no writ in rem was issued. It did not condemn the Ran or bail. It found fault in the master and the crew of the Graygarth, and therefore made it clear that Messrs. Rea, were liable as owners of the Ran for the fault of their servants on board the Graygarth. In my delivered judgment I said : I find fault on the part of the Graygarth and the defendants, who have appeared, being the owners of the Graygarth, there must be judgment for the plaintiffs against the defendants.

" Such being the judgment, the question whether Messrs. Rea, as owners of the Ran, were liable, has never been decided. As to whether it is open to the owners of the Ran now to raise the question in a proper proceeding, I say nothing. But in this action the plaintiffs, Messrs. Rea, are entitled to the relief which they ask for, namely, that their liability as owners of the Graygarth be limited to 8*l.* per ton on the tonnage of the Graygarth. There will be a decree that Messrs. Rea, Limited, as owners of the steam-tug Graygarth, are not answerable in respect of loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things occasioned by the said collision between the barge Ran, while in tow of the Graygarth, with the barge Para on the 29th Oct. 1919, beyond the aggregate amount of 8*l.* per ton on the tonnage of the Graygarth."

His Lordship gave leave to appeal. The owners of the Para appealed.

Inskip, K.C. and J. B. Aspinall for the appellants. —In the collision action the learned judge should have entered judgment in rem against the owners of the Ran and their bail. The collision was caused by the negligent navigation of the Ran by those on board the tug, who were the servants of the owners of the Ran :

The Quickstep, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 603 ; 63 L. T. Rep. 713 ; 15 Prob. Div. 196 ;
The Devonshire, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 314 ; 107 L. T. Rep. 179 ; (1912) A. C. 634.

The fact that the persons responsible for the negligence were on the Graygarth and not on the Ran does not excuse the Ran, as she was being navigated by her owners' servants on the Graygarth :

The Warkworth, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 194 ; 49 L. T. Rep. 715 ; 9 Prob. Div. 20 ;

In The American and The Syria (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350; 31 L. T. Rep. 42; L. Rep. 6, P. C. 127) the facts were special, and that case is distinguishable. If the decree should have been against the Ran, the limitation proceedings should be in respect of her tonnage, and not the tonnage of the Graygarth.

Dunlop, K.C. and Noad for the respondents.—Those on board the Ran were not negligent; the negligence was not the Ran's, but that of those on board the Graygarth; the Graygarth was to blame, and judgment was rightly entered against the owners of the Graygarth in personam. The case is governed by The American and The Syria (sup.). Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, it is the wrong-doing vessel, in this case the Graygarth, whose tonnage must be considered; the Ran did nothing wrong, and it is immaterial that she had the same owners as the Graygarth. The observation of Evans, P. in The Umona (sup.) were obiter; and in The Warkworth (sup.) the tow herself was at fault in not answering her helm.

No reply was called for.

Lord STERNDALE, M.R.—This case came before us during the last sittings on appeal from a judgment or decree in a limitation suit by Hill, J., and the circumstances out of which the matter arose may be stated, I think, fairly shortly. The collision action was brought by the owners of a barge named the Para, and the owners of her cargo, for damages sustained consequent on the defendants' barge Ran negligently colliding with the plaintiffs' barge in the river Mersey. Therefore it was an ordinary action in rem against the owners of the Ran. The writ was issued on the 5th Sept. 1919, and on the 30th Oct., the defendants' solicitors had given an undertaking to provide bail in respect of the claim. As a matter of fact the actual bail was not given until after the judgment in the collision action, but that, in my opinion, is immaterial. It is, I think, everyday practice that where an undertaking has been given to give bail, the actual bail is not given until after the decision in the action, and the matter must be taken as if the bail was given at the time at which the undertaking was given.

The action was brought for damages consequent on the defendants' barge Ran negligently colliding with the plaintiffs' barge, and the defendants are the owners of the Ran. The indorsement was made upon the writ by the defendants' solicitors: "We accept service herein, and we undertake in due course to give bail." Therefore they repeat the undertaking that had been given earlier before the writ was issued. Then the statement of claim was delivered, and the allegation was that the plaintiffs "have suffered damage by reason of a collision between their barge Para and the barge Ran, which was solely caused by the negligent and improper navigation"; then there follow a lot of and (ors), and then "or the flotilla of barges in which she was by the defendants or their servants as hereinafter appears." Then it states the facts, and in the charge it says: "Those on board the Ran and (or) her tug negligently" did a number of things—it is the ordinary statement of claim. The action went for trial, and it appeared that the Ran with a number of other barges was in tow of a tug called the Graygarth, and the Graygarth was a tug belonging to the same owners as the Ran. Whether they were the owners of the rest of the flotilla of barges I do not know, and that does not matter, but then, as they were coming up the Mersey, in consequence of the negligent navigation of the tug, the Ran was brought into collision with the plaintiffs' barge. The action was brought against the owners of the Ran, and as owners of the Ran, they, as represented by their bail, for which the undertaking had been given, could only be responsible if the Ran was improperly navigated, and by such improper navigation caused the collision. As owners of the Graygarth they might be liable also, but in the action in which they were sued as owners of the Ran, they could, as owners of the Ran, only be responsible if the Ran was improperly navigated.

The learned judge tried the case, and found that the plaintiffs' barge and her tug were not to blame, and that the defendants' barge was not to blame with regard to those who were on board of her. I do not know really how many were on board, or what they were doing, but we are told there was somebody on board the Ran, and she was abreast of another barge called the Halibut, and all the navigation she could possibly do was to follow the tug, and what this person or these persons on board the Ran were doing we do not know, or at least I do not, but in consequence of the negligent navigation of the Ran, the Ran was brought into collision with the plaintiffs' barge. The learned judge held that the defendants were responsible, and liable for that negligence because they were owners of the tug, and therefore the persons on board and navigating the tug, and also navigating the flotilla of barges of which the Ran was one, were their servants, and the decree was made in, I suppose, the ordinary form, and I am told that it was approved by the solicitors on both sides. But it strikes me as rather an odd form, because the learned judge says he meant it, not as a judgment in rem in the ordinary course against the defendants as owners of the Ran, but as a judgment in personam against them, because the master and crew of the Greygarth were their servants. The decree runs thus: "The judge doth pronounce the collision in question in this action to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the master and crew of the steam-tug Graygarth which was towing the barge Ran and for the plaintiffs' claim for damages in consequence thereof. And doth condemn the said defendants the owners of the said barge Ran in the said damages and in costs." The condemnation of them, as stated by the learned judge, had nothing to do with them as owners of the barge Ran, and I cannot see why these words "the defendants the owners of the barge Ran" were put into the decree, but the learned judge says that was his intention.

The defendants in that action subsequently began a limitation suit, asking that their liability should be limited to the value of 8*l.* per ton of the tug Graygarth, because they said, "there is no judgment against us in respect of any improper navigation of the Ran; the ship which was improperly navigated and which caused the collision was the Graygarth, and therefore the Graygarth is the ship according to which our liability ought to be measured under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894." That was the position when the case first came before us, and as we thought the form of the decree was curious and to a certain extent embarrassing, and as there was a serious question whether the learned judge ought not to have given judgment against the Ran in the ordinary way, and the owners of the Ran in rem, and against their bail, we gave leave to appeal against the judgment in the collision action in order to see whether the decision of the learned judge was right on the point that there ought to be judgment against them in the ordinary way as owners of the Ran. Now we have heard the arguments on that point, and in order that the case might not go down for a new trial certain admissions were made on the first hearing. They appear in the record, and they are these—that there was no personal negligence by anybody on board the Ran, that the collision damage was caused by the negligence of those on board the tug, or some of them; and that the barge and the tug belonged to the same person, and that the control of the navigation of the tug and flotilla was in the tug.

We have heard the appeal on these admissions, and on what appears in the judgment of the learned judge. In my opinion the judgment as given was wrong in this sense, that it ought to have been a judgment given against the owners of the Ran in the ordinary way, and against their bail, on the ground that the Ran was improperly navigated, and that the improper navigation of the Ran was improper navigation for which the defendants were responsible; and in that case, of course, the Graygarth would not be the ship according to which the liability would be measured, but it would be the Ran. Butt, J. said as long ago as 1890, in the case of The Quickstep (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 603; 63 L. T. Rep. 713; 15 Prob. Div. 196) that in any such cases "the real question is whether or not the relation of master and servant exists between the defendants, the owners of the vessel towed, and the persons in charge of the navigation of the steam-tug," and he cites with approval the decision of an American judge, in the case of Sturgis v. Boyer, who points out (24 Howard's Rep. at p. 122) that even if the crew of the tow was on board, that does not make any difference if the master and crew of the tow are not expected to participate in the navigation of the vessel. Now in this case it seems to be quite clear that those on board the tow were not doing so, and that their navigation was controlled by the tug; in fact, that the tug navigated the tow. What, then, is the position where the tug and the tow belong to the same owners? In my opinion, the tow is improperly navigated by the servants of the owners of the tow, although these servants may not be upon the tow at all, but upon the tug. If they are the servants of the owners of the tow, and are navigating the tow, then the owners of the tow are responsible for the negligence of the tow, and that is the vessel they are improperly navigating. The tug may be improperly navigated, but that does not prevent the tow being improperly navigated. It seems to me that that is the result of the cases cited—The Quickstep (sup.) and The Umona (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 527; 111 L. T. Rep. 415; (1914) P. 141). In The Umona it may be a dictum, but it was a direct statement of the opinion of Sir Samuel Evans, P. in that case. It seems to me ordinary law and logic that if you have got a vessel which is in tow, and that vessel is improperly navigated by your servants, it does not matter where your servants are. If they are really the persons controlling the navigation, you are responsible for their doing it improperly. I should have thought that was quite clear on principle, and I think it is clear on authority. I think the cases of The Devonshire and The Leslie (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 314; 107 L. T. Rep. 179; (1912) A. C. 634) in the House of Lords in 1912 show that, with what I have read from The Quickstep (sup.)

But there is said to be a decision against that, and that is the case always cited as The American and The Syria, although that is not its proper name, which is Union Steamship Company v. The Aracan (Owners) (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350; 31 L. T. Rep. 42; L. Rep. 6, P. C. 127). In that case the circumstances were odd. The Syria was a disabled vessel. The American was a tug belonging to the same owners, and without any orders from the owners, and without being asked to do so by the master of the Syria, the American took in tow, and while in tow an accident happened, both the American and the Syria coming into contact with another vessel. The Privy Council held that the owners of the Syria were not responsible for the negligence of those on board the American. I doubt very much if they had present to their minds the question whether the owners of the Syria were not responsible because those on board the American were their servants, and engaged by them for the ordinary navigation of the American. What they were discussing was which was in control. But as a matter of fact, they did refer to the very special circumstances in which the American took the Syria in tow. They said this, after going through a number of cases (31 L. T. Rep. at p. 51; L. Rep. 6 P. C. at p. 133): "The master of the American appears to have undertaken to tow the Syria under circumstances quite exceptional. Their Lordships collect that he determined to take home the Syria partly because he thought it was his duty to his employers, who owned both vessels, partly with a view to obtain salvage from the owners of the Syria's cargo (which he succeeded in doing). There is no evidence of his having been hired by the captain of the Syria, or having acted in any way under the captain of the Syria's control. On the contrary, it would appear that the 'governing power' was wholly with the American." That case has been cited in The Quickstep (sup.) and in The Devonshire and Leslie (sup.) to which I have referred, and in the latter case Lord Atkinson, who was the only one who referred to that case, said that that meant that those on board the American, although generally servants of the owners of the Syria, were not in that case acting within the scope of their employment. I do not know whether that was right on the facts or not, but I think that is the explanation of that judgment. If it be not the explanation, then it is contrary, in my opinion, to the principles laid down in the House of Lords some years afterwards in The Devonshire and The Leslie (sup.). I think that is the explanation, and that was taken to be the correct explanation by the House of Lords and, therefore, in my opinion, that case does not prevent us in any way from following what I think is the ordinary and logical rule, and saying that this collision and damage was occasioned by the improper navigation of the Ran, and the improper navigation of the Ran was the improper navigation by the servants of the owners of the Ran although they happened to be, in fact, on board another vessel, and not on board the Ran. I think the judgment should have been an ordinary judgment in rem against the owners of the Ran by reason of the improper navigation of the Ran through the acts of the defendants' servants on board the Graygarth, and that therefore the Ran is the vessel which should be alluded to under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as the one in relation to which the liability should be limited, and not the Graygarth.

I think therefore that the appeal should be allowed in the collision action, and judgment given in accordance with what I have said. It follows that the decree in the action for limitation in relation to the value of the Graygarth is wrong and improper and must be dismissed, and I think it should be dismissed with costs. I think the appellants should have the costs of both appeals and the costs of the limitation action.

Atkin, L.J., stated the facts, and proceeded.—I do not intend to go particularly into the proceedings which have brought the case here, but the question we have now to determine in this action is: Was the judgment right or wrong? Now it appears to me, with great respect, to be wrong because I think that, on the findings of fact of the learned judge, he ought to have held that the Ran was to blame, and ought to have condemned the bail on the Ran on the ground that the Ran was improperly navigated by the servants of the owners, namely, the persons who were navigating the tug. It appears to me, in those circumstances, that the plaintiffs ought to be upheld in their statement of claim that the Para was damaged by the wrong navigation of the barge Ran by the servants of the owners. I think, for myself, that the principle is established sufficiently by referring to the cases. One is The Quickstep (sup.), and although it is true that in The Quickstep, and I think also in The Devonshire (sup.), the ultimate decision was to absolve the owners of the tow, the principles laid down expressly support what I have said as being the true rule of law to apply. I wish only to repeat the passage read by Butt, J. (63 L. T. Rep. at p. 715; 15 Prob. Div. at p. 201) from the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in Sturgis v. Boyer, delivered by Clifford, J. He said there (24 Howard's Rep., at p. 122): "whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the usual and ordinary course of such employment, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, over waters where such accessory motive power is necessary or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels. . . ." Then he says: "Assuming that the tug is a suitable vessel, properly manned and equipped for the undertaking, so that no degree of negligence can attach to the owners of the tow, on the ground that the motive power employed by them was in an unseaworthy condition, and the tow, under the circumstances supposed, is no more responsible for the consequences of a collision than so much freight; and it is not perceived that it can make any difference in that behalf, that a part or even the whole of the officers and crew of the tow are on board, provided it clearly appears that the tug was a seaworthy vessel, properly manned and equipped for the enterprise, and from the nature of the undertaking, and the usual course of conducting it, the master and crew of the tow were not expected to participate in the navigation of the vessel." That is quoted with approval by the Divisional Court, and it appears to me to be sound, with this qualification, that the master and crew of the tow are not expected to participate in the navigation of the vessel at the stage at which the collision took place. But subject to that it seems to me to state this: that there are circumstances in which the tow, whether she has people on board her or not, is not being navigated by the people on board her, but by the tug, and, under those circumstances, if she is being navigated so as carelessly or negligently to damage another vessel, then it is the barge which is being improperly navigated; and the only question then arising is: Are the defendants, the owners of the two, responsible for that improper navigation? That will depend on whether those on board the barge are, or are not, the servants of the owners of the tow to navigate the tow, and they may be so, because they are put in the ordinary position in which there is a skilled and expert crew on the tow and the tug has got to obey their orders. They are then taken to be the servants of the owners of the tow.

But another state of things may arise in which there is nobody on the tow to direct it at all, but the tug is provided by the owners of the tow, under such circumstances that the servants and crew of the tug, are, in fact, the servants and crew of the owners of the tow. Under those circumstances it appears to follow logically and necessarily that the improper navigation which, on the hypothesis, is the improper navigation of those on board the tug who are improperly navigating the tow, is the improper navigation of the servants of the owners of the tow for which they are responsible. That seems to me to establish the liability. The passage in Lord Atkinson's judgment in The Devonshire and The Leslie (sup.) accepts that view because he, in dealing with the case there, is setting out the effect of The Quickstep (sup.), and he says (1912, A. C., at p. 654): "in the judgment of the court composed of Sir J. Hannen and Butt, J., it was laid down that the real question on which the liability of the tow in such cases depends is whether or not the relation of master and servant existed between the owners of the tow and the persons in charge of the tug." Now in this case there is no controversy but that that relationship did in fact exist, and if it existed, it appears to me to follow that the tow was being improperly navigated by the servants of the owners of the tow.

I agree that the case of The American and The Syria (sup.) is a case where a similar question might have arisen. It appears to me that in that case in fact the judgment of the Privy Council was rather directed to the question whether, there being a master and crew on both vessels, the master and crew of the tow were in fact directing the master and crew of the somewhat smaller vessel that took the other vessel in tow for the purpose of salving it, and I do not think really was directed to the point of identity of ownership so as to make the servants of the tug the servants of the owner of the tug. But as it can be distinguished on those lines and on the lines suggested by the Master of the Rolls, I think it is plainly my duty rather to follow the decision in The Quickstep (sup.), as affirmed in the House of Lords, which decision is, I think, supported by the very weighty authority of the late President in The Umona (sup.).

For these reasons it appears to me that the plaintiffs were right in bringing their action in rem against the Ran, and I think they ought to have had a decree to carry that out, and it appears to me that in substance the notice of appeal asks for the right order, except this, which we may consider afterwards—I am not sure that it is right to ask for a pronouncement that the collision was occasioned by the fault or default of the owners and their servants. That might lead to trouble in the limitation suit as to the actual fault or privity. I think it would be sufficient and right to say: "By pronouncing the collision in this action to have been occasioned by the fault or default of the servants of the owners of the barge Ran and their servants, the crew of the steam-tug Graygarth in the navigation of the Ran, and by pronouncing for the plaintiff's claim for damages in consequence of the improper navigation of the barge Ran, and condemning them in the said damages and costs." I think that would be a proper order. I think that if that decree had been made, as it ought to have been made, it follows that the limitation suit must fail. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed in that case also.

Younger, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that the case of The American and The Syria (sup.), both as reported before Sir Robert Phillimore and in the Privy Council, leads to some trouble, but I think that that case should be distinguished from the present on the ground mentioned by my Lord.

Requisition—War Risk—Vessel requisitioned by Australian Government—Collision—Loss of vessel—Colliding vessel carrying ambulance wagons from one military base to another—Warlike operation—War risk or marine risk.

In 1916 the claimants' vessel G., which had been requisitioned by the Australian Government under a charter-party by which the Government accepted war risks usually excluded by the f. c. and s. clause, collided with another vessel, which had also been requisitioned. The latter vessel at the time of the collision was carrying ambulance wagons between two war bases. Both vessels were travelling without lights in accordance with Admiralty instructions. The G. was not at the time of the loss engaged in hostilities or warlike operations.

Held, (affirming the decision of Bailhache, J.) that having regard to the circumstances surrounding the date at which the collision occurred (of which the court took judicial notice) the colliding vessel was carrying out an operation of war at the time of the collision, and that the loss of the claimants' vessel was due to a war risk and not to a marine risk.

Appeal from an arbitrator in the form of a special case.

The facts as stated in the case by the arbitrator were as follows:

(1) On or about the 17th April 1915, the Geelong, belonging to the claimants, was requisitioned and taken for use by the respondents for transport purposes in connection with the war.

(2) The terms of requisition provided (inter alia) as follows: "The Commonwealth Government accepts full war risks and will indemnify owners against any claim arising from the requisition in this connection, but owners must take all ordinary sea risks which could be covered by an ordinary marine policy in ordinary times of peace."

(3) It was agreed before the arbitrator and the case was argued on the basis that the effect of the foregoing clause was to make the respondents responsible only for such risks of war as would be excluded from an ordinary marine policy by the presence therein of the usual f. c. and s. warranty, including in such warranty all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations.

(4) On the 1st Jan. 1916, the Geelong, whilst under requisition as aforesaid, collided with the British steamship Bonvilston in the Eastern Mediterranean, and as the result of such collision was sunk and totally lost.

(5) At the time of the said collision the Geelong was bound from Port Said to Gibraltar for orders. She had come from Australia via the Suez Canal, and had discharged some troops at Suez. She was laden at the time of the collision with a part cargo of general goods, laden on Government account in accordance with the terms of the requisition, whereby cargo might be carried for stability purposes, and the profitable utilisation of such space as might not be required to accommodate troops, horses, stores, &c., the freight received by the owners for the carriage of such cargo to be credited to the Commonwealth Government.

(6) At the time in question the Mediterranean was the scene of considerable activity on the part of enemy submarines, and the Geelong was being navigated in accordance with confidential instructions received from the naval authorities at Port Said with a view to minimising the risk of submarine attack. These instructions prescribed the courses to be followed, and, in addition, provided that the vessel was at night to be navigated at best speed continuously and without showing any lights.

(7) The Bonvilston at the time of the collision was proceeding from Mudros to Alexandria. She was under requisition by the British Government, and was carrying ambulance wagons and other Government stores from one war base (Mudros) to another war base (Alexandria). In accordance with the orders of the naval authorities given for the purpose of minimising the risk of submarine attack she was steaming at her best speed and was showing no lights.

(8) The collision occurred about 7.25 p.m. on the 1st Jan. 1916, in approximately lat. 32° 46′ N. long. 30° 5′ E., the vessels being in fact on crossing courses with the Bonvilston on the starboard side of the Geelong.

(9) In an action in the Admiralty Division between the claimants and the owners of the

(a) Reported by J. L. Denison, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Bonvilston arising out of the collision, Sir Samuel Evans, P. held that in the circumstances there was no negligence in the navigation of either vessel. This finding was not disputed before the arbitrator, and accordingly he found that the said collision occurred without negligence on the part of either vessel, and was solely due to the fact that both vessels were navigated at night under naval orders at full speed and without lights.

(10) The claimants contended: (a) That the service upon which each of the said steamers was engaged at the time of the collision was of a warlike character, or at any rate that the Bonvilston was engaged on a service of a warlike character, and that the operation of navigating on such service was a "warlike operation"; (b) that, given a warlike operation and the combination of circumstances causing the loss being unimaginable without the war, the loss was the consequence of hostilities or warlike operations.

(11) The respondents contended that the loss of the Geelong was caused by a marine peril, viz., collision, and not by any consequences of hostilities or warlike operations. [Having set out the facts and the contentions of the parties the arbitrator proceeded:]

(12) In so far as it is a question of fact I find, and in so far as it is a question of law (and in such case subject to the opinion of the court), I hold that the loss of the Geelong was caused by a marine peril and not by a war peril.

(13) I accordingly award, subject to the opinion of the court, that the respondents are under no liability to the claimants in respect of the loss.

(14) The question for the opinion of the court is whether I am right in holding that the loss of the Geelong was in the circumstances hereinbefore stated caused by a marine peril and not by a war peril.

(15) If the court should answer this question in the affirmative the award in par. 13 hereof shall stand. If the court should answer the question in the negative then I award that the claimants are entitled to be indemnified by the respondents in respect of the loss of the Geelong.

Bailhache, J.—This is a case as to whether the Geelong, which was lost in collision with another steamer known as the Bonvilston, was lost as a war risk or a marine risk. The case is stated by Mr. Raeburn, and what he says about the facts is this. [His Lordship read pars. 4, 5, and 6 of the case, and continued:] Then he states that the collision took place, and he says it was found in the Admiralty Court there was no negligence, and then he sets out the contentions on the one side and the other, on one side that it was a marine risk and on the other side that it was a war risk, and then he finds that it was a marine peril and not a war peril. I thought till this case came before me that the whole of the ground had been already covered, but it looks as if this case was not absolutely covered by authority. The Geelong had only general goods on board. It is true that they were Government goods, and she was requisitioned, and had come from Australia to discharge troops at Suez. She had no troops on board at the time, and was not at the time of the collision so far as she was concerned, engaged in any warlike operation. The collision took place in the Mediterranean at a place where there was a good deal of submarine activity. The Geelong was sailing at night without lights, going full speed, but the mere fact that she was sailing without lights and going full speed ahead in the dark in obedience to Admiralty orders, would not in itself make her engaged in a warlike operation, or collision with her a war risk. The Bonvilston was proceeding from Mudros to Alexandria carrying ambulance wagons and other stores from one war base to another. She, too, was proceeding without lights and full speed ahead. In my opinion, a vessel engaged as the Bonvilston was in carrying Government stores and ambulance wagons from one war base to another war base is engaged in a warlike operation. That seems to me to be Lord Atkinson's opinion in the House of Lords in The Petersham case (ante, p. 58; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) A. C. 99) when, dealing with the The St. Oswald case (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270; 118 L. T. Rep. 640 (1918) 2 K. B. 879) he says: "In that case the vessel which was lost was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and bound to obey the orders given through its accredited officers. She was, at the time of her loss, employed in obedience to these orders on a service which was, and in its own nature, a 'warlike operation'—namely, in carrying some of the combative forces of the Crown from Gallipoli (upon its evacuation) to some other destination. It is true that at the time of her collision with the French battleship, the Suffren, she had not got these troops on board. but she was, under Admiralty orders, hurrying at full speed to the port at which she was to take them on board. This circumstance does not, in my view, alter the character of the operation she was at the time of the collision performing." If it be a warlike operation to take troops from one place to another, I am unable to see myself that it is not equally a warlike operation to convey munitions of war or ambulance wagons for the use of wounded soldiers from one place to another. It is very much a case of first impression, although one, of course, bears in mind the numerous cases which have been decided upon what is a war risk and what is a marine risk. I do not think this case is quite covered by authority; the nearest approach to authority seems to be the passage I have cited from Lord Atkinson's judgment in the House of Lords. In my opinion the Bonvilston, at any rate, was engaged in a warlike operation, and the collision between her and the Geelong, while they were both of them proceeding at night full speed ahead without lights, was a war risk and not a marine risk.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—This is an appeal from a decision of Bailhache, J. on a special case stated by an arbitrator, and it raises the question of war risk or marine risk which has so often been in the courts. The arbitrator found that the loss of the ship, the Geelong, was caused by a marine peril and not by a war peril. The learned judge has found that it was a war peril, and the question arises in this way: The Geelong was a ship requisitioned by the Government of the Australian Commonwealth and by the terms of the requisition it was provided: "The Commonwealth Government accepts full war risks, and will indemnify the owners against any claim arising from the requisition in this connection; but owners must take all ordinary sea risks which could be covered by an ordinary marine policy in ordinary times of peace."

The vessel with which the Geelong came into collision was a vessel called the Bonvilston. What she was doing is stated in this way: The Bonvilston at the time of the collision was proceeding from Mudros to Alexandria. She was under requisition by the British Government, and was carrying ambulance wagons and other Government stores from one war base (Mudros) to another war base (Alexandria). She was steaming at her best speed and was showing no lights.

I think Mr. Mackinnon is probably right in saying that the arbitrator was not addressing his mind very much to any particular difference in the facts of this case and those of other cases, but he did find as I said as a question of fact, so far as it was one, that the loss was caused by a marine peril and not by a war peril.

The learned judge has reversed that decision and said that the collision was caused by a war peril, and he has decided that, in a great measure, upon what was said in Lord Atkinson's speech in the House of Lords in The Petersham case (sup.), when dealing with The St. Oswald's case (sup.). The learned judge stated his judgment in this way: "Now in my opinion a vessel engaged as the Bonvilston was in carrying Government and British stores and ambulance wagons from one war base to another war base is engaged in a warlike operation," and he must state that as a conclusion of law because otherwise he does not get away from the finding of fact of the arbitrator.

I am not prepared myself to assent to such a broad proposition as that. I can quite conceive that a merchant vessel may be carrying ambulance wagons and other Government stores from one war base to another war base and still in certain circumstances may not be engaged in a warlike operation, and I think, if left to myself, I should have said that we have not sufficient information here or sufficient findings of fact to determine whether the learned judge is right in his decision or not, and I should myself personally have been inclined to ask for a more distinct finding as to what this vessel was in fact doing and for this reason: she was carrying these goods from Mudros to Alexandria—she was carrying them upon the 1st Jan. 1916, and I suppose, at any rate, we may take judicial notice of this, that that was about the time that the evacuation of the troops from Gallipoli was taking place. Now if what she was doing was a part of the operation of the evacuation of Gallipoli I think she would be carrying out a warlike operation just as much as she would have been if she had been carrying things for the purpose of the landing upon Gallipoli. It seems to me that it is just as much a warlike operation to withdraw in the face of the enemy (it may not be as pleasant a one) but it seems to be, at any rate, consistent with what is stated in the special case that she might have been doing these things independently of the evacuation of the troops from Gallipoli altogether. Therefore, I should personally have liked to have had a more complete finding as to what she was really doing and what the incidents and the circumstances of her particular occupation were at the time, but both the other members of the court are of opinion that we have sufficient material upon which to deal with this matter and that we are entitled to consider the fact that this evacuation was going on and to consider the neighbourhood and the position of the two bases between which these goods were being moved, and therefore we have enough to lead us to the same conclusion to which the learned judge came that this was a warlike operation—i.e., that the Bonvilston was engaged in a warlike operation at the time she came into collision with the Geelong. If so, then upon the authorities in the House of Lords this arose from a warlike operation and was a war risk, and not a marine risk. That being so, I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed, because I do not dissent (although I think for myself I should have required further information if I had had to decide it entirely myself) from the opinion of the other two members of the court.

Warrington, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

The question really is whether the Bonvilston which ran down and sank the Geelong was at the time of the collision engaged in a warlike operation, because if so the loss of the Geelong would be a consequence of a warlike operation, namely, the particular voyage of the other ship the Bonvilston.

The collision happened on the 1st Jan. 1916 in the Eastern Mediterranean; the Geelong was bound outwards from Port Said and was certainly not herself engaged in a warlike operation. It was true that she was carrying a cargo on account of the Government, but that it was on account of the Government was a purely immaterial fact, and there is no question about it, her voyage was not a warlike operation. The Bonvilston was in a different position; she was bound from Mudros to Alexandria, and her cargo consisted of ambulance wagons, and some other Government stores which were being transported from Mudros to Alexandria. Now, Mudros is found by the arbitrator to have been a war base; Alexandria also is found by the arbitrator to be a war base, and he has found, therefore, that the Bonvilston was at the time of the collision engaged in carrying ambulance wagons and other Government stores from one war base to another war base. Upon that state of things, taken as he expressed it, the arbitrator came to the conclusion and found as a fact, so far as the question was one of fact, and held at last so far as the question was one of law, that the risk incurred by the Geelong was a marine risk and not a war risk. The learned judge has come to the opposite conclusion and has founded his judgment upon the fact that the Bonvilston was engaged in carrying equipment consisting of the ambulance wagons from one war base to the other war base. I express no definite opinion as to whether on that state of facts I should have come to the same conclusion as the learned judge, but I think we are at liberty to look at the facts from a rather wider point of view.

The collision happened, as I have said, on the 1st Jan. 1916. I think we are at liberty to take notice of the main historical facts surrounding what happened. Now of those facts two I think are material. First that that was about the time when the evacuation of the Gallipoli Peninsula was going on—I think the first part of the evacuation had been completed so far as troops were concerned, the evacuation of Helles I think took place a few days later, but, at any rate, it was in the middle of the operations connected with the evacuation of the Gallipoli Peninsula; not only that, but it is a notorious fact that Mudros was the advanced base for the operations in Gallipoli. Now, bearing that in mind—and I think we are at liberty to bear that in mind—I think the conclusion is almost inevitable that the Bonvilston was carrying warlike equipment from Mudros which had been the base for the Gallipoli operations to Alexandria, which was then and afterwards the base both for the Palestine and Salonica operations. The Bonvilston was employed in carrying warlike equipment from base to base in connection with the evacuation.

I now turn to look at what Lord Atkinson says about a similar operation, namely, that as a consequence of which the St. Oswald was lost. That is the ship which was the subject of the British and Foreign Steamship Company v. The King (sup.). That was a case which it was necessary to distinguish from The Petersham case (sup.), for this reason: that the loss of the Petersham happened by reason simply that two merchant ships had been sailing under Admiralty orders at night without lights, and that, first, owing to the form of an admission which had been made in The St. Oswald case (sup.), it would appear that the decision in The St. Oswald case (sup.), was exactly contrary to the decision at which the House of Lords were arriving in The Petersham case (sup.). Accordingly it was necessary for Lord Atkinson to distinguish it. One of the distinctions which he points out is this: "She was at the time of her loss employed in obedience to these orders"—that is, the Admiralty orders—"on a service which was in its own nature a 'warlike operation'—namely, in carrying some of the combative forces of the Crown from Gallipoli (upon its evacuation) to some other destination. It is true that at the time of her collision with the French battleship, the Suffren, she had not got these troops on board, but she was under Admiralty orders, hurrying at full speed to the port at which she was to take them on board." There is, in my opinion, no material distinction between carrying the actual combative forces of the Crown and carrying the equipment which will be necessary for their effective use in the field. Now, the equipment which the Bonvilston was carrying consisted of the ambulance wagons, which were part of the equipment for troops operating in the field. It seems to me, therefore, that if, as Lord Atkinson thought, the St. Oswald was engaged on a service which was in its nature a warlike operation, so in this case, looking at it in the broader way in which I have ventured to do, as connected with the evacuation of Gallipoli, I think the Bonvilston was engaged on a service which was in its nature a warlike operation.

If that is so, then I think we are at liberty to hold that the arbitrator came to a wrong conclusion in finding that the risk was a marine risk, and that the judgment of Bailhache, J. was correct, and the appeal ought, therefore, to be dismissed.

Scrutton, L.J.—The exact question in this case is whether a particular ship was lost in the Mediterranean by a marine risk or a war peril. That turns on the question whether the loss would have been recovered under the main body of a Lloyd's policy, or would have been excluded by a warranty free of all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations. The question, therefore, is whether the loss was the consequence of hostilities or warlike operations. The vessel was sunk by a collision at night, without negligence and without lights, with a vessel called the Bonvilston which, under the requisition of the British Government was carrying ambulance wagons and other Government stores from one war base, Mudros, to another war base, Alexandria. I am prepared to hold that carrying ambulance wagons and Government stores from one war base to another in time of war was a warlike operation. I notice that some of the noble Lords have seen that the definition of "warlike operations" is a very difficult matter, and have postponed it till various indefinite periods. It is possible that our decision in this case may anticipate the opportunity they have been looking for and give them an opportunity of defining it there. If I am right that the carrying of war stores from one base to another war base was a warlike operation, then I am bound by the second set of decisions in the House of Lords, there being no negligence, to hold that the sinking of the ship by a collision with a vessel engaged in such a warlike operation does make the matter a war risk; it makes the matter a consequence of warlike operations. I also think, though, of course, it is not necessary for my decision on the view I take, that we are at liberty to take from The St. Oswald case (sup.), the fact that Gallipoli was being evacuated on the 31st Dec. 1915 and the 1st Jan. 1916, and to conclude that this voyage from Mudros to Egypt on the 1st Jan. was part of the warlike operation of the evacuation of Gallipoli which, of course, if correct, makes the case much stronger. I, therefore, agree that the decision of Bailhache, J. should be affirmed.

Appeal dismissed.

The suppliants claimed damages from the Crown, on the ground that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations. PETITION OF RIGHT tried by McCardie, J., without a jury, in the Commercial Court.

The suppliants were an Australian steamship company at Melbourne. In Aug. 1915 the Warilda, belonging to the suppliants, was requisitioned by the Australian Government for transport service. In July 1916 she was taken over by the British Admiralty for use as a military hospital ship under the terms of a charter party known as T. 99, which provided that the Admiralty should accept liability for war risks while the suppliants continued to take the marine risks. She was described as an "ambulance transport to be treated as a troop transport." She was armed with one twelve-pounder gun and had instructions to ram any submarine sighted. On the 24th March 1918, the Warilda was carrying wounded men from Havre to Southampton when, about 4 a.m., she came into collision with another steamer, the Petingaudet, and both vessels suffered considerable damage. The night was dark and hazy, and the sea smooth. By order of the Admiralty the Warilda was being navigated at full speed without lights, and the Petingaudet was being navigated without masthead lights and with dimmed side lights. The suppliants claimed damages on the ground that the collision was a consequence of warlike operations; the Crown in their plea asserted that the collision was due to the negligent navigation of the Warilda, and was the result of a marine risk.

The owners of the Petingaudet had brought an action against the suppliants, and in that action the collision was held to be due to negligence of the Warilda; and the suppliants were made liable for the damage to the Petingaudet. The Warilda herself was withdrawn for repairs after the collision, so the suppliants had suffered in three ways: they had had to pay the cost of their own repairs, they had had to pay for the repair of the Petingaudet, and they had lost the hire which would have been payable to them during the time while the Warilda was undergoing repairs.

MacKinnon, K.C., Dunlop, K.C. and Dumas for the suppliants.—It is submitted that the loss was due to a warlike operation, because at the time of the collision the steamship Warilda, though not a warship, had the status of a warship, and was engaged in a warlike operation. At the time of the collision the master was obeying the orders of the Admiralty. Any service rendered to the fighting forces was a warlike operation. The test was, what was the vessel doing at the time of the collision. She was conveying wounded soldiers to Southampton, and that was as much a military operation as the conveyance of unwounded troops. The suppliants were entitled to judgment.

Raeburn, K.C. and Balloch for the Crown.—The collision was not due to a warlike operation, and the claim failed. The loss was not caused by a warlike operation. The steamship Warilda was a hospital ship, and she had never lost her status as such: Hall's International Law, 6th edit., p. 395. A hospital ship cannot be a warship: The Ophelia (1915) P. 129, affirmed in P. C. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; 114 L. T. Rep. 1067; (1916) 2 A. C. 206). The purpose for which the wounded soldiers were being carried on the Warilda was not a warlike purpose. She was not engaged in a warlike operation, and therefore the suppliants claim failed. They referred to:

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 14. — McCARDIE, J. read the following judgment.—This case raises anew the meaning of the words "all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations." The petition of right claims a large sum of money in respect of damage to the steamship Warilda of which the petitioners were owners. In 1915 she was requisitioned by the Australian Government for use as a transport for bringing Australian troops to England. On the completion of that service in July 1916 she was taken over by the British Government for use as a military hospital ship. It is agreed that the rights of the parties are governed by the terms of charter-party T. 99—a well-known form.

The following clauses must be cited: Clause 18: "The Admiralty shall not be held liable if the steamer shall be lost, wrecked, driven on shore, injured or rendered incapable of service by or in consequence of dangers of the sea or tempest, collision, fire, accident, stress of weather or any other cause arising as a sea risk." Clause 19: "The risks of war which are taken by the Admiralty are those risks which would be excluded from an ordinary English policy of marine insurance by the following or similar but not more extensive clause: 'Warranted free of capture, seizure and detention and the consequences thereof or of any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after declaration of war.'" Clause 22: "The master shall obey all orders and instructions which he may receive from the Admiralty or from any officer authorised by them, and shall in all respects comply with the instructions for masters of colliers and oiler transports, but he shall be solely responsible (on behalf of the owners) for the management, handling and navigation of the steamer." Clause 25: "If from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery or any other cause the working of the steamer is at any time suspended for a period exceeding twelve running hours, pay shall cease for the whole of such and any subsequent period of whatever duration during which the vessel is inefficient." Clause 26: "Throughout this charter losses or damages whether in respect of goods carried or to be carried or in other respects arising or occasioned by the following causes shall be absolutely excepted, viz., the act of God, perils of the seas . . . negligence, default or error of judgment of the pilot, master or crew or other servants of the owners in the management or navigation of the steamer."

The Warilda was for some time used as an ordinary military hospital ship; she was painted white, she carried lights, and she bore the white flag with a red cross as provided by the Geneva Convention of 1907: (see The Ophelia, 1915, P. 129) at pp. 138-140, affirmed in P.C. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; 114 L. T. Rep. 1067; (1916) 2 A. C. 206), and Higgins on the Hague Peace Conferences, pp. 383-4.) Then occurred the outrages on hospital ships by German submarines, which awoke the indignation and horror of men. The British Admiralty was compelled to adopt protective precautions. On the 26th April 1917 the following letter was written by the Ministry of Shipping to the petitioners: "I beg to inform you that circumstances have rendered it necessary to take steps for the protection of vessels engaged in cross-channel hospital service, and arrangements have accordingly been made for the Warilda to be armed and painted grey. The vessel has been removed from the list of hospital ships and will in future be known as an ambulance transport, and will be treated in the same manner as a troop transport so far as her actual sailing is concerned."

Pursuant to the change of circumstance the Warilda was painted grey with dazzle markings, the Red Cross flag ceased to fly and she steamed without lights. A 12-lb. gun was placed aft and two or three Royal Navy men were taken aboard for the purpose of working the gun if the need arose. She became subject to certain Admiralty orders and instructions made under the Defence of the Realm Regulations. Briefly put they were these. Her master was informed of the imperative necessity of showing no lights when at sea. She was to proceed without navigation lights. No unnecessary delay was to take place in effecting a passage from one port to another.

The following was a specific instruction: "As far as possible the passage is to be made during the hours of darkness and at maximum speed compatible with safe navigation in order to elude submarine attack." And this also: "You are not to reduce speed in a fog except when near the land or approaching shoal water unless you consider it is absolutely imperative for the safety of the ship to do so." And this too: "If a submarine is sighted by the escorting destroyer she will turn to attack. The transport is at once to turn away from the submarine and steer a zigzag course unless she has an exceptional opportunity of ramming the submarine which she should at once take advantage of." Finally this: "You are warned that safety very largely depends on the absolute darkness of the ship and not showing a glimmer of light." These were the instructions under which she worked at the time of the collision which gave rise to this litigation.

The Warilda was a twin-screw steamship of 7713 tons gross register and 426ft. in length. At the time of the collision her duties were to carry wounded from Havre to Southampton and occasionally to carry nurses or medical staff from Southampton to Havre. At about four o'clock on the morning of the 24th March 1918 the Warilda (acting under the instructions I have referred to) was proceeding at her full speed af about 15 knots, and without any lights showing from Havre to Southampton. The weather was somewhat dark and hazy. She had on board about 600 wounded men with the usual staff of doctors and nurses.

Henceforward I need only summarize very briefly the facts as found by Hill, J. in the Admiralty action of Owners of Steamship Petingaudet v. Owners of Steamship Warilda (unreported), heard in Dec. 1918. His decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords.

Whilst the Warilda was steaming at full speed she sighted on the starboard bow the Petingaudet, which was steaming at high speed with side lights dimmed. The Warilda saw the Petingaudet about half a mile away. She did not alter her course or speed till too late. She struck the Petingaudet. The ships (it has been held) were "crossing" ships, and the Warilda (it has also been held) was the "give way" of the two vessels.

Reg. 23 of the Collision Regulations 1910 (see Temperley on the Merchant Shipping Acts, 3rd edit., p. 634) provides: "Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse."

It was suggested in the Admiralty action that the instruction I have stated, viz., that "As far as possible the passage is to be made during the hours of darkness and at maximum speed compatible with safe navigation," was in conflict with reg. 23. Hill, J. held that "there was nothing in the Admiralty instruction which justified the maintenance of the speed of the Warilda in the way in which it was maintained." In the result he ruled that the Warilda was guilty not of a mere error of judgment but of negligence, and that she alone was to blame for the collision. This view was also adopted by the House of Lords. The matter is therefore finally settled. Both the Warilda and the Petingaudet were seriously injured by the collision.

The Petingaudet was an ordinary British steamer of about 2540 tons gross register. She was on a voyage under Admiralty requisition from Shields to Rochefort laden with a cargo of coke. No German warship was seen by either vessel. There is no suggestion that any submarine was about to attack.

Upon these facts two broad questions were raised and ably argued before me:—(1) whether the Warilda at the time of the collision was engaged in a warlike operation within clause 19 of the charter party T. 99; (2) whether (should the answer to the first question be yes) the injury to the Warilda arose as a consequence of warlike operations or whether it may more properly be described as a consequence not of warlike operations but of the negligence of her master. I recognise the difficulty of these questions, and the wide range of possible consequence which they may involve. I frankly confess my diffidence in expressing a view upon matters which have caused embarrassment to the ablest judges, and which have led to a striking conflict of opinion.

The second question, I may say, seems to me to be conspicuously distinct in some ways from the first.

Now, was the Warilda engaged in a warlike operation? It is plain that the words "warlike operation" have a wider reach than the word "hostilities": (see per Atkin, L.J. in Britain Steamship Company Limited v. The King (The Petersham case) (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507, at p. 511; 121 L. T. Rep. 553, 559; (1919) 2 K. B. 670, at p. 695; and per Lord Atkinson in The Petersham case (in the House of Lords) (ante, p. 58, at p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at p. 115). The phrase, it may be noted, is "warlike operations" and not "operations of war." Each phrase, indeed, is ambiguous in its stretch. In The Petersham and The Matiana cases (123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at p. 133) Lord Wrenbury said in referring to words like those now in question: "All the decisions have, I think, proceeded, and in my judgment have rightly proceeded, upon the footing that the word 'hostilities' does not mean 'the existence of a state of war,' but means 'acts of hostility' or (to use the noun substantive which follows) 'operations of hostility.' The sentence may be read 'all consequences of operations of hostility (of war) or operations warlike (similar to operations of war) whether before or after declaration of war.' To attribute to the word the longer meaning—namely, 'all consequences of the existence of a state of war'—would give the expression a scope far beyond anything which one can conceive as intended. To define the meaning of 'operation' in this connection is, no doubt, a matter of great difficulty, and for the purpose of these cases is not, I think, necessary."

The difficulty of definition acutely arises here. In this litigation the whole point is as to the idea denoted or connoted by the words "warlike operations." Lord Sumner said in Attorney-General v. Ard Coasters Limited, Liverpool and London War Risks Insurance Association Limited v. Marine Underwriters of the Steamship Richard de Larrinaga (ante, p. 353, at p. 356; 125 L. T. Rep. 548; (1921) 2 A. C. 141, at p. 153): "Operations in war and operations of war are not necessarily the same things." This is a pointed and guiding remark.

Now a primary question to decide is whether the Warilda was a warship. The importance of this question arises from the decision of the House of Lords in the Ard Coasters and Larrinaga cases (ante, p. 353; 125 L. T. Rep. 548; (1921) 2 A. C. 141). Those cases decide, I think, (in substance) that practically every movement of a warship for the purpose of carrying out her war duties, is a warlike operation. This seems to follow the view of Atkin, L.J. in the Petersham case (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507; 121 L. T. Rep. 553, 559; (1919) 2 K. B. 670) where he said: "I incline to think that during war almost any action or movement of the combatant forces in the course of their combatant duties whilst exercised in the area of war could be included in the phrase warlike operations." See, too, the language of Lord Atkinson in The Petersham case (ante, p. 58, at p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at p. 114). Thus a British warship patrolling the seas for German submarines is engaged in a warlike operation. So, too, if a warship be proceeding on a voyage to pick up another convoy: (see The Ard Coasters and Larrinaga cases (ante, p. 353; 125 L. T. Rep. 548; (1921) 2 A. C. 141). If the Warilda was a warship and was, at the time of the collision, fulfilling her duties as such, she was engaged in a warlike operation.

What is the test to apply? I can think of no other test than that which I humbly stated in Harrison's v. Shipping Controller (ante, p. 270; 124 L. T. Rep. 540; (1921) 1 K. B. 122, at p. 134) when I ventured to say: "The dominant features of the ship and the dominant object of her voyage must, I humbly venture to think, be looked at."

It is true that the Warilda was painted grey and with dazzle colours. But so also were the majority of merchantmen. It is true that she sailed without lights. So also did the majority of ordinary merchantmen. It is also true that she had a gun. But so, too, had the majority of ordinary merchantmen. She also carried a few Royal Navy men. But as I said in Harrison's case (ante, p. 270; 124 L. T. Rep. 540; (1921) 1 K. B. 122, at p. 134): "Many merchantmen during the war carried several Royal Navy men for the purpose of serving the protective guns, or for other reasons. Such fact would not, I conceive, turn a merchantman into the equivalent of a man-of-war."

See also the striking facts in The Matiana case (ante, p. 58; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99). It is true that she might have tried to ram a submarine in order to save herself from a terrible fate. If she had actually done so then the words of Lord Atkinson in that case (ante, p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C., at p. 115) would have applied. He said: "Of course, if a merchantman chose to take combative action, such as attempting to ram an enemy submarine, that action would, while it lasted, be a 'warlike operation.'"

I may venture to say that a civilian does not become a soldier merely because he protects himself from an attempt at murder. Looked at broadly, the features of the Warilda were those of a hospital ship only. She was fitted as such, and she carried 600 wounded with doctors and nurses. In hull, fittings, crew and arrangements she was nothing but a hospital ship.

What was the object of her voyage? Was it offence? Clearly not. Her one aim was to carry the wounded safely to England. To borrow the language of Lord Cave in Britain Steamship Company Limited v. The King (ante, p. 59; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921), A. C. 99, 108). She was proceeding upon a peaceful mission and her desire was not to engage in but by all means to avoid warlike operations. I do not overlook the Admiralty instructions under which she sailed. But was the object of those instructions to turn her into a vessel of offence? I think not. The object was the very opposite. Their very aim was to enable her to reach England as peacefully and expeditiously as she could—and to give her the greatest possible safety as a hospital ship. The character of the ship was not changed. Everything done was to secure her a greater immunity. To alter slightly the wording of Duke, L.J. in The Matiana case (14 Asp.

Mar. Law Cas. 507, at p. 510; 121 L. T. Rep. 553; (1919) 2 K. B., p. 690) she never lost her character of a hospital ship carrying wounded. The nature and purpose of the vessel is, I think, rightly described in p. 5 of the petition of right as follows: Par. 5: "The Warilda was afterwards employed by the British Government in carrying wounded from Havre to Southampton and occasionally carrying nurses or medical staff from Southampton to Havre; the navigation of the ship was in charge of the master, but he received orders from the Admiralty, or their authorized officers as to light, speed, and route." If the Warilda had been a transport in the ordinary sense, I presume that she would either have acquired the status of a warship, or at all events be engaged in a warlike operation. But a transport filled with armed men seems wholly different from a hospital ship filled with wounded men. That an ordinary transport may be deemed a warship, see per Lord Atkinson in The Petersham case (ante, p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at p. 114), where he says: "The transfer of the combative forces of a power from one area of war to another, or from one part of an area of war to another part, for combative purposes, would, I think, be a warlike operation." (See also Harrison's case, ante, p. 270; 124 L. T. Rep. 540; (1921) 1 K. B. 122, at p. 133.) The Warilda, I hold, was not a transport in any fair sense of that word. So far as her belligerent features were concerned they seem to me to be less marked than those of many a merchantman in the course of the war.

The case of The British Steamship Company (The St. Oswald) v. The King (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270, 404; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B. 879) was referred to in the argument before me. That case is fully dealt with by Lord Atkinson in The Petersham case (ante, p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at p. 116). As the noble Lord there points out, the St. Oswald was, at the time of her loss, engaged in a warlike operation, namely, in carrying some of the combative forces of the Crown from Gallipoli (upon its evacuation) to some other destination. She collided with the French warship Suffren, which was itself engaged at the very time in carrying out warlike operations in an area of naval warfare. The St. Oswald case (sup.) is, therefore, wholly different to the present.

Mr. Dunlop, in the course of his argument for the petitioners, presented an ingenious contention. Briefly put it ran thus. To remove the wounded from the area of active war eases the position of the belligerent. It leaves him freer for action. To cure the wounded (if cure can be made) turns an inefficient unit into a fighting man. Therefore the conveyance of wounded for the purpose of cure is a warlike operation.

I appreciate the argument but I cannot adopt it. It seems to me to reject the distinction between warlike operations and acts done in the course of a war. If the contention be correct then every ship which carries doctors, nurses or medical stores is engaged in a warlike operation. For the object of those persons and things is to restore wounded soldiers to health. Indeed, it would follow that every hospital ship is necessarily engaged in a warlike operation. So, too, every chaplain who gives solace to the wounded, and every entertainer who brightens the camp with humour would legally be engaged in a military operation. They help to restore health and spirits. I cannot so hold. I recognise the difficulty of defining where warlike operations end and other operations begin: (see the illustration given by Lord Atkinson in The Petersham case (ante, p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at p. 114), and by Atkin, L.J. in The Petersham case (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 507, at p. 511; 121 L. T. Rep. 553, 559; (1919) 2 K. B., at p. 696). But if Mr. Dunlop be right his ratio can only be that indirect assistance given to the furtherance of British war interests is in itself a warlike operation.

Take, however, the case of The Petersham (ante, p. 58; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99). She was under Admiralty requisition when lost. She carried a cargo of iron ore. For what purpose was the ore to be used? Mainly, I conceive, for the purposes of the war. But can it be said that she was, when carrying the cargo, engaged in a warlike operation? Surely not. If Mr. Dunlop be right, then, the decision of the House of Lords in The Petersham case (sup.) must have been erroneous. So, too, of The Matiana case (ante, p. 58; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C. 99). She carried cotton. Cotton can be used for the clothing of troops. Indeed, in the very case now before me, the Petingaudet was under Admiralty requisition and was carrying a cargo of coke which I presume was for the use of the Navy. Yet even the ability and ingenuity of Mr. MacKinnon, K.C., Mr. Dunlop, K.C. or Mr. Dumas has not led them to suggest that the Petingaudet was engaged in a warlike operation. Investigations analogous to those in The Kim (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; 113 L. T. Rep. 1064; (1915) P. 215) have not as yet been made in litigation like the present.

It follows from what I have said that I find myself unable to adopt the view apparently taken by Bailhache, J. in P. and O. Branch Service v. Commonwealth Shipping Representative (38 Times L. Rep. 93; affirmed in C. A. 38, Times L. Rep. 93) He there held that a merchant vessel carrying ambulance wagons was engaged in a warlike operation. I entertain a very deep respect for the opinion of that learned and experienced judge, but I feel bound to form a different opinion after considering the able arguments addressed to me. I fully share the doubts expressed by Rowlatt, J. in Atlantic Transport Company v. Director of Transports (38 Times L. Rep. 160).

I hold that the Warilda was not a warship, and that she was not engaged in a warlike operation. It is therefore not strictly necessary to determine the materiality of the question of negligence. That question, however, was so fully argued before me by counsel for the petitioners and by Mr. Raeburn, K.C. for the Crown, that I ought briefly to express my opinion upon it. The material words are "All consequences of hostilities or warlike operations." The word "consequence" is closely interwoven with the notion of causation.

It was submitted by the petitioners that if the Warilda suffered injury whilst engaged in a warlike operation, the question of negligence was immaterial. It seems that in certain cases negligence may be, for some purposes, immaterial; for example, if an ordinary merchantman be struck by a warship whilst the latter is patrolling for submarines, it may be immaterial (for the purpose of such words as those now in question) that the warship was also guilty of some act of negligence contributing to the injury to the merchantman. Compare the judgment of Roche, J. in Charente Steamship Company v. Director of Transports (38 Times L. Rep. 148; affirmed in C. A., 38 Times L. Rep. 434).

But the present facts are quite different. The question does, I think, arise directly as to whether it was the warlike operation (if the Warilda was so engaged) or the negligence of the master which led to her injury. Now, if Hill, J. and the House of Lords held that the Warilda was guilty of negligence, and was alone to blame for the collision, is this finding of negligence material? No express decision on the point exists. It is of value, however, to observe the cases where the point arose incidentally.

In the St. Oswald case (sup.) the Attorney-General expressly abandoned any charge of negligence against either of the vessels concerned: (see per Swinfen-Eady, M.R., 14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 270, at p. 272; 118 L. T. Rep. 640; (1918) 2 K. B., at p. 883). Duke, L.J. clearly points out in the same case that no case of negligence on the part of either vessel was set up by the Crown. In The Petersham and Matiana cases (sup.) it was stated in plain language by the noble lords, that none of the vessels concerned were guilty of negligence: (see, for example, per Lord Cave and Lord Atkinson, ante, p. 58; 124 L. T. Rep. 540; (1921) 1 A. C. 99, at pp. 101, 105, and 117). So, too, in the Ard Coaster's case the arbitrator had expressly found that neither vessel was to blame: (see per Bankes, L.J., ante, p. 46, at p. 47; 123 L. T. Rep., at p. 487; (1920) 3 K. B., at p. 70).

It would appear, therefore, that the highest authority regards the question of negligence as material, and this, I think, was the view of the Court of Appeal in the unreported case of Inui Gomei Kaisha v. Bernardo Attolico, on the 7th Feb. 1919. The reason was, I conceive, put clearly by Scrutton, L.J. in The St. Oswald case (sup.) where he said that the military operation must be the direct or dominant cause of the loss. If the petitioners were correct in their argument, then it would matter not how gross the negligence was which led to the injury. It seems to me that the contention of the petitioners here is opposed to the principle of the basic decision of Ionides v. Universal Marine Insurance Company (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. (O. S.) 253; 8 L. T. Rep. 705; 14 C. B. N. S. 259), and the principle there indicated. I do not gather that the reference by Erle, C.J. (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. (O. S.) 253; 8 L. T. Rep. 705; 14 C. B. N. S., at p. 286) to "unskilful navigation" was dissipated (as to the materiality of negligence) by Lord Sumner (ante, p. 62; 123 L. T. Rep. 721; (1921) 1 A. C., at p. 130). The noble lord, I think, merely explains the dictum of Erle, C.J. If, then, negligence be material (as I hold) in such a case as the present, the only question seems to be whether the hurt to the Warilda was caused through the negligence of the master or through a warlike operation—if such was the operation (contrary to my own view)—in which the Warilda was engaged. The question of "cause" may often be difficult. As Lord Shaw felicitously said in Leyland Shipping Company Limited v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Limited (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 258, at p. 263; 118 L. T. Rep. 120; (1918) A. C. 350, at p. 369): "Causation is not a chain, but a net." A concise statement of several weighty dicta with respect to causation will be found in the judgment of Duke, L.J. in the St. Oswald case (sup.). It is well said by Sir Frederick Pollock in his work on Torts, 11th edit., p. 36, that "The lawyer cannot afford to adventure himself with philosophers in the logical and metaphysical controversies that beset the idea of cause." See, too, per Bankes, L.J., in Polemis v. Furness, Withy, and Co. Limited (ante, 398, at p. 399; 126 L. T. Rep. 154; (1921) 3 K. B. 560, at p. 570).

In the present case, I respectfully adopt the words of Lord Sumner in Weld-Blundell v. Stephens (123 L. T. Rep. 593; (1920) A. C. 956, at p. 983), and I ask the question what was the "direct cause" of the injury to the Warilda? In my opinion, the direct cause was the negligence of her master. Unless this be so I do not see how the House of Lords could have held that she was responsible for the whole damage to the Petingaudet. The warlike operation (if it was one) did not cause the loss. The negligence of the master was more than a causa magna et gravis. It was the new, independent dominant, and directly operative cause of the collision.

For these reasons, I hold that the petitioners fail.

ADMIRALTY COMMISSIONERS v. OWNERS of STEAMSHIP VOLUTE; THE VOLUTE. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL, ENGLAND.

Collision—Contributory negligence—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 1 (a) (b).

The question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it.

In establishing liability for collision at sea, if a clear line can be drawn between the acts of negligence of two vessels, the subsequent act of negligence is the only one to look to. There are cases where the two acts of negligence come so closely together and the second act of negligence is so mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act that the party secondly negligent, while not held free from blame under the rule in The Bywell Castle, might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution.

A collision occurred between the V., an oil tank vessel, the leading vessel of a convoy, and the R., a destroyer, the escort on the starboard hand. If the V. had signalled as she should have done before she ported, there would have been no collision; if the R. had not gone full speed ahead after the position of danger brought about by the action of the V. arose there would have been no collision.

Held, that there was not a sufficient separation of time, place, or circumstance between the negligent navigation of the R. and that of the V. to make it right to treat the negligence of the R. as the sole cause of the collision and that both ships must be held to have been equally to blame.

The law of contributory negligence at sea reviewed and applied.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal, holding the R. alone to blame, and affirming the judgment of the President, reversed.

APPEAL from the judgment of the Court of Appeal affirming the judgment of Duke, P., who found the Radstock alone to blame.

STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

1. The plaintiffs have suffered damage by reason of a collision between H.M.S. Radstock and the defendants' steamship Volute, which was solely caused by the negligent navigation of the Volute by the defendants or their servants as hereinafter appears.

2. Shortly before 3.51 a.m. on the 12th April 1918, the Radstock, a destroyer of 1173 tons, 276ft. long, and fitted with engines of 27,000 H.P.I., and manned by a crew of eighty-five hands all told, was, whilst engaged as one of two escorts to three vessels of which the Volute was one, in about lat. 55° 35′ N. and long. 7° W. The wind was W. by S., force 1; the weather was calm; and the tide was setting to the N.W. of a force of about one knot. The convoy was proceeding on a course of N. 44° W., and was making about eight knots. The Volute was leading the convoy with another vessel on her port beam and a third astern of her. The Radstock was proceeding on a course of N. 44° W. by compass at a speed of about eight knots and was about two points abaft the starboard beam of the Volute and about three cables distant from her. The Volute carried a dim stern light only, which at the material time was not open to the Radstock; the Radstock carried no lights. A good look-out was being kept on board the Radstock.

3. In these circumstances those on board the Radstock observed the Volute altering her course to starboard without sounding one short blast as she had been directed to do when making an alteration of course. The helm of the Radstock was immediately ordered hard-a-port. When the helm had been got over ten degrees the steering gear jammed. The revolutions of the engines of the Radstock were increased so as to give her speed of twenty knots, but the Volute coming on at a considerable rate of speed with her stem struck the port side of the Radstock in the way of the engine-room, doing her considerable damage.

4. A good look-out was not being kept on board the Volute.

5. The Volute improperly failed to indicate by the appropriate signal, which she had been directed to give, that she was making an alteration of course.

6. The Volute improperly failed to slacken her speed or to stop or reverse her engines or to do so in due time.

7. The Volute improperly failed to comply with arts. 28 and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

DEFENCE.

1. The defendants deny that the collision mentioned in the statement of claim was caused or contributed to by the negligent navigation of the Volute, and say that the same was solely caused by the negligent navigation of H.M.S. Radstock by those in charge of her, as hereinafter appears. Save as is hereinafter expressly admitted, the defendants deny each and every allegation in the statement of claim contained.

2. Shortly before 2.56 a.m. on the 12th April 1918 the Volute, a steel screw steamship belonging to the Port of London, of 4500 tons gross and 3290 tons net register, of 347ft. in length, fitted with engines of 357 H.P. nominal, and manned by a crew of forty-five hands all told, was off Oversay Light on the West Coast of Scotland in the course of a voyage from Hampton Roads, Chesapeake, to Scapa Flow, laden with a full cargo of oil. The weather was fine and clear, the wind variable of little or no force, and the tide unknown. The Volute, together with two other vessels, was proceeding in convoy escorted by two destroyers, of which one was H.M.S. Radstock. Instructions had been received that the Volute was to be responsible for the navigation of the convoy, and that a course was to be set from a position one and a half miles East Magnetic from Altacarry Head to pass at least twelve miles West True from Oversay Light, and to continue to a given position, from which a course should be set for the South Coast of Mull. The Volute, having passed Oversay Light at the required distance, was on a course to comply with the above instructions, and was making about eight knots. According to instructions, no vessels in the convoy were exhibiting lights, with the exception of the Volute, which was exhibiting a shaded stern light only. A good look-out was being kept on board the Volute.

3. In these circumstances, when Oversay Light was observed to be distant about seventeen miles, and and bearing S. 85 E. true, the whistle of the Volute was sounded one short blast, and after receiving a reply of one short blast from the other vessels in the convoy, her helm was ported. At about the same time H.M.S. Radstock was seen distant about a quarter of a mile, and bearing on the Volute's starboard bow, but her movements were not specially observed, as instructions had been received that the Volute was not to pay heed to the movements of the escorting destroyers. The other vessels in the convoy ported their helms to conform with the course of the Volute, and the Volute, having got on her appropriate course, her helm was steadied, but shortly afterwards it was seen that H.M.S. Radstock, instead of altering her course to starboard to conform with the course of the convoy and to keep out of the way of the Volute, was shaping to cross the bows of the Volute, causing imminent risk of collision. The engines of the Volute were immediately stopped and put full steam astern, and her helm was starboarded, but notwithstanding these measures, the port side of H.M.S. Radstock abaft the midship line struck the stem of the Volute, doing considerable damage.

4. Those in charge of H.M.S. Radstock negligently failed:—(a) To keep a good look-out; (b) to conform with the alteration of helm made under instructions by the Volute; (c) to keep clear of the Volute; (d) to ease, stop, or reverse her engines in due time or at all; (e) to port her helm in due time to avoid a collision; (f) to indicate her manœuvres by the appropriate or any whistle signal; (g) to comply with arts. 27 and 29 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

5. Alternatively the said collision was due to the conditions under which the vessels were navigating, and could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and nautical skill on the part of those in charge of the Volute.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of Duke, P., in the Admiralty Division:

"The collision which is in question in this case occurred under circumstances which illustrate, as vividly as any set of circumstances could do which have come under my notice for a long time, the conditions under which the commerce of this country was being carried on at the height of the war. It is impossible that a story such as we have had here to-day in the course of this trial should not excite the sympathies of all who heard it, for both the men of the Navy and the men of the Merchant Service who were engaged in the services which were being performed on the night of the 11th April of last year, or, rather, in the early morning of the 12th April, when this collision occurred. The Atlantic Convoy had reached the north east coast of Ireland upon the night of the 11th April and during the day of the 11th April it had warded off, at any rate, nine submarine attacks. The point on the Irish coast to which the course of the Atlantic Convoy was directed was a point to which it was notorious at that time, among those who knew of the movements of merchant ships, that mercantile traffic was customarily directed; and during the day of the 11th April there had been nine submarine attacks which were known of at that point, as the result of which vessels of His Majesty's fleet had been either disabled or sunk as well as other serious damage inflicted by torpedo attack. The commanding officer of the torpedo boat destroyer Radstock—which is a boat under the control of the Commissioners of the Admiralty, who are plaintiffs in the suit—had been on his bridge for forty hours, and then when night fell, and the convoy here in question had been detached from the Atlantic Convoy and was making its way to the west coast of Scotland in comparatively narrow waters, he was able to lie down on his settee in his chart room for a short time, kept awake, as he was, by wireless signals and by all the variety of duties which called for his attention. As far as the commander of the merchant vessel is concerned, he had been vice-commodore of the Atlantic Convoy on his way over and he had come through the perils of the 11th April. He was a man who evidently had suffered in his health by the strain which he was undergoing at that time, and at the time in question he also was lying down in his chart room, taking a short spell of rest during a time when the zigzagging had ceased because of the comparative relaxation of risk, and the smaller convoy which was here in question was making its course under the orders which Commander King had given on the evening of the 11th April.

"It is under circumstances of that kind that the facts occur of which witnesses come here to-day to speak with a recollection particular enough and certain enough to make the basis of a legal decision. I am quite sure that neither on the one side nor the other would it be supposed that, having come to a conclusion upon questions of fact here, on the narrow difficult problem, I have any doubt at all about the integrity of those who have come to give, according to their belief, their respective accounts of the events which transpired in connection with this collision. I have no doubt about the integrity of the witnesses in this case; and that, as may be supposed, adds to the difficulties of the case. But I should not like that men who come here, and in a court of law have their evidence examined, and invite a decision on the facts one way or another, should suppose that the enormous difficulties of the service which they were rendering at that time—difficulties which might affect the capacity of other men for particular observation in critical circumstances—were not fully appreciated by the judge whose duty it is to give a decision in the face of a direct conflict of fact.

"The material facts with regard to this matter may be set forth without any very great difficulty. The flotilla which is here in question, as I have said, had broken away from the Atlantic Convoy on the 11th April. The escort was in charge of Commander King of the Radstock; and that small convoy of three oil tank ships was making its way up the west coast of Scotland in order to come round to Scapa Flow. A point had been given at which there was to be a change of course. Two courses have been spoken of which had been set—one a course of N. 32 W., and the other a course of N. 44 W. At a point on the S.W. of the Island of Islay, and within a certain distance of it, it was the business of the Commodore of the small convoy of three ships to change the course of the convoy, and to change his course which was very little different from N.W.—into a course which was practically N.E. Those were the instructions he had, and he had received those instructions by semaphore from the Radstock on the previous evening. The instructions had been written down in the signal book of the Radstock and the commander of the Volute had them definitely written down as he received them. It is to the credit of the merchant ship as well as of the ship of the Fleet, that there is not the least discrepancy as to the instructions which were then given. The master of the Volute afterwards communicated by one of his officers—the officer of the watch at the moment—with the officer of the watch at the moment on board the Radstock with regard to the movements of the escort during the night, and received an answer. I have said in the course of this hearing that in my opinion—with the concurrence of my assessors—that was an answer which did not absolve those responsible on the Volute from taking all proper and necessary care in their navigation to see that they did not put themselves and the Radstock into a position of mutual peril. It was a perfectly natural inquiry to make, and a perfectly natural answer to give; but it did not absolve those in charge of the Volute from any of their obligations to take care with regard to the Radstock. The orders which were given so far as they are material, were first of all as to the courses which I have indicated, and then to the effect that upon reaching the indicated point the Volute should signify to the other vessels of the convoy her intended change of course by the proper steam signal. The intended change of course was a course to starboard; she was going to change from a course which was very nearly N.W. to a course of N.E., and she was to give the suitable indication of her intention to change that course. The relative positions of the vessels were defined, and the position of the Radstock was on the starboard side of the convoy. The exact position is not material at this moment. The Volute, it was defined, 'will lead, Laurel Leaf on port beam, and Thermidor astern of Volute. Destroyers will zigzag either side'—that is during the day—'Volute is to be responsible for navigation and has to sound necessary blasts when altering course. Ships are to keep as close to each other as possible and are to show no light except Volute, who is to show a shaded stern light. Ships will not zigzag after dark, speed will be eight knots.' The appointed place was reached and it was the business of the officer who was in charge of the navigation of the Volute to give his steam signal and to change his course moderately in the manner in which a change of course must be made by those who are in charge of vessels in convoy.

One of the questions in this case is as to whether the Volute before making the change—which she undoubtedly made—gave the steam signal. I will deal with that presently. There is no question that the Volute made the change of course, and she completed the change of course for all practical purposes. It may be that there was a point or something less than a point lacking of the complete change of course, but for all practical purposes—so far as the event of the collision is concerned—she completed her change of course. When she had completed her change of course she found herself in a position with regard to the Radstock, and the Radstock found herself in a position with regard to the Volute, in which a collision was inevitable. There was some management of the vessels on each side—some skilful management—and as the result of the combined operations, and of the courses on which the vessels were, the Volute struck the Radstock opposite her engine room. Her stem penetrated almost to the port engine of the Radstock, and the Radstock was very seriously damaged. Fortunately she got into a port of refuge under the steam of her starboard engine, but had not there been management at the point of time immediately before the collision, there seems to be very little doubt that she must have been sunk. She was struck with a blow of the force that would be delivered by a tank steamer of, it is said, 7000 or 8000 tons burden, being as she was fully laden, but at any rate by a vessel having a very great weight to impart momentum to any blow which might be struck by it, a blow which in this case fell short of running the Radstock down, but which penetrated to the proximity of her port engine.

The President held the Radstock alone to blame on the ground that her look-out was defective, and that, when the course of the Volute was observed, the Radstock failed to take proper measures to prevent the collision.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Sterndale, M.R., Atkin and Younger, L.JJ.) affirmed the decision of the President.

Raeburn, K.C. and Balloch for the Admiralty.

Stephens, K.C. and Carpmael for the respondents, the owners of the Volute.

The House, having taken time to consider, gave the following judgments allowing the appeal.

Lord BIRKENHEAD, L.C.—This action was brought by the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty against the owners of the steamship Volute for damage suffered in a collision between the Radstock, a destroyer, and the Volute, an oil tank ship, which occurred shortly before 4 a.m. on the 12th April 1918 off the West coast of Scotland.

On the occasion in question, the Radstock was one of two destroyers in charge of a convoy of three oil tank vessels, and the ships were proceeding in this order: The Volute was the leading merchant vessel, having one of her consorts on the port hand and one astern. The Radstock was the escort on the starboard hand, and the Undine, another destroyer, was the escort on the port hand. The station distances between the merchant vessels were two cables and between the destroyers, and the merchant vessels three cables. The Volute was made the leader of the convoy and had instructions when to alter her course. She was to be responsible for the alteration and was to sound the necessary short blast helm signals when altering course. She was directed to alter course to port a little before midnight, and she starboarded her helm and blew the appropriate signal of two blasts, which was answered as intended by the other vessels of the convoy, and the course was altered without mishap.

On this altered course. N. 44 degrees W., the vessels then proceeded till a particular bearing of the Oversay Light was reached, when it would be right for the course to be altered about seven points to starboard, from N. 44 W. to N. 32 E., and this the Volute proceeded to do. She ought to have signified this very striking alteration by the blowing of a short blast of her whistle. Whether she did so was a serious matter in dispute at the trial. The night was dark, and no lights were being carried except that each vessel in the convoy carried a shaded stern light.

The Radstock, whose officer and crews said that they heard no whistle, did not alter course when the Volute ported her helm and the result was that a position of danger arose. Only the master of those on board the Volute was examined, and he, though awake and in the chart room, was not on the bridge till the last moment; their Lordships do not precisely know at what stage and in what circumstances those on board the Volute realised that there was going to be a collision. But there was some evidence which will be dealt with later that she stopped and reversed her engines before the collision. She also pleaded that she hard-a-starboarded. Her master says that when he came to the bridge the helm was amidships, but it is hardly possible that she checked her port helm as the collision is agreed at a right-angled blow, and the Radstock, though her helm jammed, had ported somewhat.

As far as the Radstock is concerned, the evidence was that the first they knew of the approach of the Volute was a report about two minutes before the collision from the port look-out that the Volute was altering to starboard. She was then seen to be at a good distance—three to four points on the port bow; the helm of the Radstock was altered hard-a-port, but jammed when it had got to ten degrees, and the officer in charge then gave the order to increase the speed of the Radstock, which had been proceeding at the convoy speed of eight knots, up to a speed of twenty knots. It was agreed that the two vessels came into collision at about right angles, the port side of the Radstock in the engine room, just abaft amidships, and the stem of the Volute, the Radstock having at the time of the collision attained to a speed of about eighteen knots. Great damage was done to the Radstock, but she did not sink, and ultimately got into port.

As the trial of the case proceeded, it became clear that there were only two questions of fact in dispute, though there might be much discussion as to the actual or probable consequences of the various manœuvres. These two facts were whether the Volute did or did not blow a whistle as the appropriate helm signal, and whether she did nor did not stop and reverse her engines and if she did, when.

I will take the latter point first. It was urged on behalf of the Volute that she must have reduced her speed and reduced it considerably. Otherwise, with her momentum and a right-angled blow, and the not very stout scantling of the Radstock, she would have cut so far as to cause the Radstock to sink. This is a very unsafe point to rely on, unless there has been some careful scientific calculation of forces, and one of the assessors who assisted your Lordships has stated on consideration that he thinks no conclusion could safely be drawn from the fact that the Radstock was not sunk. But there is the evidence of the master of the Volute, who says that he heard the telegraph ring before the collision, and that of the captain of the Radstock, who says, in answer to Question 78, "The Volute appeared to me to be stopped, nearly stationary, and I believe going astern." It was suggested, and is possible, that as he came on deck on the impact, he may have meant to refer to her action after the blow was struck, but upon the whole, I think it would be safer for your Lordships to conclude that the Volute did stop and reverse her engines in sufficient time to save her from blame in this respect, particularly as this was the view both of the learned President who tried the case and of the members of the Court of Appeal.

As to the other issue of fact about the whistle signal, the matter stands in this way: The President believed that the signal was given and he therefore held the Radstock to blame. He also held that she was to blame for going full speed ahead. The judges of the Court of Appeal were evidently in great difficulty on the subject of the whistle. The Master of the Rolls dealt with the case on the assumption that the whistle was not sounded, while at the conclusion of his judgment he thought it best to express no opinion as to the conclusion of fact which the President came to on that point. The Lords Justices did not decide the point, but gave a very strong indication of their opinion that the whistle was not blown. It became unnecessary, however, in the opinion of all three members of the Court of Appeal, to come to a decided conclusion as to the whistle, because they thought that even if it was not blown, nevertheless the Radstock was to blame and alone to blame for the collision.

Your Lordships, after a careful examination of the evidence, are all, I believe, convinced that the signal was not given. The only witness for the Volute was the master. He no doubt said that the second officer, whom he had left in charge, had instructions to blow one blast, to listen to the other steamships to see that they answered before the course was altered and to port slowly, and that he in his chart room heard one blast blown and answered by the other steamships. He further says that after the impact he stopped his engines, which were working astern to keep the two ships together, and then when he backed out he blew three short blasts, the appropriate signal for going astern, no such signal having been given before the collision. There is no entry of any whistle signal in his log book.

On the other hand seven witnesses were called from the Radstock: the officer of the watch, the captain, who was in the chart house and had just received a signal from the wireless operator and therefore was awake, the signal man, one of the look-out men, the helmsman, and two other seamen on deck, who all said that there was no port helm signal and no whistle blown till just after the collision, when there was a prolonged blast. Some of them also said, in agreement with what was said by the master of the Volute, that she blew three short blasts when she was backing out. Others did not mention these three blasts, but counsel for the Volute intimated in the course of the trial that he conceived what happened after the collision to be immaterial. There was an eighth witness, a leading seaman on deck, who did not speak to the long blast but only to the three short blasts. The learned president thought that this imported some discrepancy between the witnesses of the Radstock. I think your Lordships have failed to find any such discrepancy. There were no witnesses from either of the other convoy ships, but one witness, the officer of the watch, was called from the other destroyer. He was expecting a short blast. He never heard one, but he did hear a long blast, and as he expected the convoy to alter course about that period, he began to turn under his port helm, when he saw a morse light flash as a signal from the Radstock and went up to her assistance. As he did not hear the shock of the collision all that he can say is that the long blast preceded the signal with the Morse lamp, and that it was the only signal he heard. The log books of the Radstock were put in and they did not help the case of the Volute on this point.

As the learned president said in his judgment that he believed that the witnesses from the Radstock came to tell the truth, the matter resolves itself into an inference which can be nearly as well drawn by your Lordships as if you had seen the witnesses yourselves. As I have already stated, there can be no doubt in your Lordships' minds, when the matter comes to be carefully considered, that the conclusion on this point at which the learned president arrived was incorrect. And here it should be observed that though the destroyers were supposed to look after themsleves and the convoy ships to pay no attention to their movements in a general way as they might wish to range ahead, or astern, converge or diverge, yet the captain of the Radstock had protected himself by instructing the other vessels of the convoy to answer the signal of the Volute, and was entitled, therefore, to expect a triad of short blasts. In fact, no blasts were sounded. Your Lordships will therefore, I apprehend, hold that the Volute was negligent and to blame in not blowing a short helm blast. Whether it was negligence which should be held in law to have contributed to the collision or not is a matter of greater difficulty.

As regards the alleged negligence of the Radstock, the president, while exculpating her on the charges of not stopping and reversing, did, with the concurrence of his assessors, find her to blame for increasing her speed which, as has been stated, reached eighteen knots at the time of the collision. The Master of the Rolls, with the concurrence of the Lords Justices and following the advice of their assessors, came to the same conclusion, and your Lordships have been advised by your assessors to the same effect. There is no doubt that the officer in charge was influenced by the fear lest he should be struck forward, where he carried depth charges, or in the boiler room. But it seems that if he had not increased his speed there would have been no collision at all; and though no doubt he was put in a position of some difficulty by the action of the Volute in porting and bringing herself on a crossing course without whistling, it is, in the eyes of all nautical men who have dealt with this matter, so patent that it was wrong to put the engines full speed ahead, that your Lordships cannot do otherwise than agree with both courts below and hold the Radstock at least partly to blame for the collision.

The matter therefore rests in this way. On the one hand, if the Volute had signalled or had postponed her porting unless and until she signalled there would have been no collision. On the other hand, if the Radstock had not gone full speed ahead after the position of danger brought about by the action of the Volute, there would have been no collision.

In all cases of damage by collision on land or sea, there are three ways in which the question of contributory negligence may arise. A. is suing for damage thereby received. He was negligent, but his negligence had brought about a state of things in which there would have been no damage if B. had not been subsequently and severably negligent. A. recovers in full. See among other cases Spaight v. Tedcastle (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; 44 L. T. Rep. 589; 6 App. Cas. 217) and The Margaret (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 371; 52 L. T. Rep. 361; 9 App. Cas. 873).

At the other end of the chain, A.'s negligence makes collision so threatening that though by the appropriate measure B. could avoid it, B. has not really time to think and by mistake takes the wrong measure. B. is not held to be guilty of any negligence and A. wholly fails: (The Bywell Castle, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 41 L. T. Rep. 747; 4 Prob. Div. 219; Stoomvart Maatschappy Nederland v. Peninsular and Oriental Company (The Khedive) 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567; 43 L. T. Rep. 610; 5 App. Cas. 876).

In between these two termini come the cases where the negligence is deemed contributory, and the plaintiff in common law recovers nothing, while in Admiralty damages are divided in some proportion or other.

Lord Blackburn, in The Margaret (sup.), was of opinion that the area of this middle space was the same for Admiralty as for common law, and his opinion may be accepted subject to a possible qualification arising out of the subsequent passing of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911.

How, then, are its limits to be ascertained? Contributory negligence certainly arises when the negligence is contemporaneous, but are the only cases of contributory negligence cases where the negligence is contemporaneous? Is it to be the rule in all cases if the tribunal can find a period at which A.'s negligence has ceased and after which B.'s negligence has begun that then the negligence of A. is to be disregarded? If such should be the rule it will be found that the cases of contributory negligence would be few.

If two roads intersect each other at right angles and there is a large building at the point of intersection, and two people are running or riding or driving at a reckless pace, one down each street, and meet at the corner, it would be easy to say that both were in fault and equally so. If the courses of two motor-cars cross and there is no rule of the road such as that at sea requiring one to give way and the other to keep her course and both hold on both are equally to blame. In The Margaret (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 375; 44 L. T. Rep. 291; 6 Prob. Div. 76), a badly navigated barge came into collision with a schooner which was improperly carrying her anchor over her bows in a dangerous way contrary to the rule. An impact ensued which would have done no damage but for the fact that the fluke of the anchor knocked a hole in the barge. Sir Robert Phillimore put the whole blame on the badly navigated barge, but the Court of Appeal thought that though the collision was solely due to her the damage was due to both, and divided it.

But even this class of case was varied by the subsequent decision of Gorell Barnes, J., in The Monte Rosa (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 326; 68 L. T. Rep. 299; (1893) P. 23), where he distinguished The Margaret (sup.), saying that the collision there occurred at night and the anchor could not be seen and held the badly navigated vessel alone to blame for the collision because those on board of her might have seen the dangerous position of the anchor.

It is very difficult, except in the cases just mentioned, to think of any cases where there is strictly synchronous negligence. And if that be the rule the application of the doctrine of contributory negligence to collisions, whether on land or sea, would be rare. Still rarer would be cases where the more minute calculations required by the Maritime Conventions Act could find place. In Dowell v. General Steam Navigation Company (1855, 5 E. & B. 195) a collision between a sailing vessel which had taken in her light and a steamer, the questions put to the jury were: "(1) Was there negligence on the part of the plaintiff with respect to the light which led to the collision? (2) Could the defendants have avoided the collision with ordinary skill and care? (3) Was the damage occasioned by the accident the result of circumstances for which more blame attaches to the one side or the other?" And the jury answered—(1) We find there was fault on the part of the collier in not continuing the light till the danger was past. (2) It is the opinion of the jury that the steamer was going at too great a speed on so dark a night, in which respect there was want of caution; but that it was impossible to have avoided the accident when the steamer was within two or three of the collier's lengths. (3) We are much inclined to think the preponderance of blame to be with the steamer."

On these answers the judge entered a verdict for the plaintiffs, giving the defendants leave to move.

But the court set this aside and said that the answers of the jury to the questions put to them amounted, in point of law, to a verdict for the defendants.

In the course of his judgment, Lord Campbell, who delivered the judgment of the whole court (himself, Coleridge, Erle and Crompton, JJ.) said: "The jury appear to have come to the conclusion . . . that the collier did show a light . . . but did not continue to show it for a reasonable time, and that while the danger still existed, and the light ought to have been shown, the collier was in fault and broke the regulations by not continuing to show it.

"We likewise think that the jury must be taken to have found that this fault led to the collision. If it was a proximate cause of the collision, however much the steamer might be in fault, this action cannot be maintained.

"According to the rule which prevails in the Court of Admiralty in a case of collision if both vessels are in fault the loss is equally divided, but in a court of common law the plaintiff has no remedy if his negligence in any degree contributed to the accident. . . .

"In some cases there may have been negligence on the part of a plaintiff remotely connected with the accident, and in these cases the question arises whether the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care and skill might have avoided the accident notwithstanding the negligence of the plaintiff as in the often quoted donkey case, Davies v. Mann (1842, 10 M. & W. 546). There, although without the negligence of the plaintiff, the accident could not have happened, the negligence is not supposed to have contributed to the accident within the rule upon this subject; and if the accident might have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care and skill on the part of the defendant to his gross negligence it is entirely ascribed he and he only proximately causing the loss. But in the present case the jury appear to have concluded . . . that the negligence of the master of the collier in not properly complying with the Admiralty regulations directly contributed to the accident although there was negligence on the other side, and the preponderance of blame was upon the steamer."

"We have further to consider whether the answer of the jury to the first question is at all neutralised or qualified by their answer to the second and third questions. On the contrary, by these the finding against the plaintiff seems to be strengthened. . . .

"To the second, the jury say that the steamer was going at too great a speed on so dark a night; in which respect there was want of caution; but that it was impossible to have avoided the accident when the steamer came within two or three collier lengths. While the jury here impute blame to the steamer they do not retract or vary anything they had before said about the non-observance of the Admiralty regulations by the collier and the concluding part of the answer beginning with the word 'but' may be explained by the jury having believed . . . that the collier was not seen by the steamer till within two or three lengths, and that this arose from the fault of the collier in not continuing the light till the danger was past.

"The answer to the third question is unequivocally unfavourable to the plaintiffs. . . ."

It is not necessary for the court to determine whether both vessels were in fault or only the sailing vessel, but the whole trend of the judgment seems to me to point to the idea that both were in fault and that if it had been a case in Admiralty, the damages would have been divided.

This case has been cited at length because it seems to be an instance of acts of negligence close together, but still in sequence.

For the purpose of considering the Admiralty doctrine of both to blame a mass of cases occurs where both ships have been held to blame in collisions before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1876, which may be put on one side. That Act provided that if a collision occurred and a ship was found to have broken one of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea she should be deemed to be in fault, and the courts generally and this House in particular construed this as meaning that if the bad navigation could be shown to have contributed to the collision it was to be deemed contributory negligence. This, however, did not prevent the tribunals from determining where the real fault lay, and if it was of opinion that it lay with the other ship in holding both to blame.

This law prevailed from 1876 till it was repealed by the Maritime Conventions Act of 1911. During the period from 1876 to 1911 the only cases useful to consider are cases at sea where, owing to the peculiar circumstances, no regulations applied, or cases in rivers and inlets to which neither the regulations nor the statute applied.

By the Martime Conventions Act 1911, sect. 1, it is enacted that: "Where by the fault of two or more vessels damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels . . . the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault. Provided that (a) If having regard to all the circumstances of the case it is not possible to establish different degrees of fault the liability shall be apportioned equally, and (b) Nothing in this section shall operate so as to render any vessel liable for any loss or damage to which her fault has not contributed."

Effect was given to this last provision in The Peter Benoit (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 203); 1915, 114 L. T. Rep. 147.

In The Westmoreland (24 Federal Rep. 703, cited in Marsden p. 37), a schooner, contrary to regulations, brought up opposite a launching slip and refused to move. The launch attempted to get under way and fouled her, and both were held to blame. But on the other hand in this country in The Andalusian (39 L. T. Rep. 204; 2 Prob. Div. 231), and The George Roper (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 134; 49 L. T. Rep. 185; 8 P. Div. 119) the launch was held wholly in fault, and the American case probably goes too far.

The following are cases of negligence in sequence.

In The Sans Pariel (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 78; 82 L. T. Rep. 606; (1900) P. 267) where a tug with a vessel in tow was crossing the line of a squadron of warships, the tug and tow were held in the Court of Appeal to blame for persisting in trying to cross the Fleet. But it having been admitted by the Attorney-General acting for the Queen's ship in the court of first instance that there was negligence in the managment of the Sans Pariel in acting for the tug only and not noticing the tow as she was crossing, the Sans Pareil was held alone to blame. But, as one of your Lordships pointed out in the course of the present argument, the admission by the Attorney-General made in the way in which it was, might partly account for this decision.

In The Hero (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 108; 106 L. T. Rep. 82; (1912) A. C. 300) the House of Lords, in a not dissimilar case, held that without applying the penal clause of the Merchant Shipping Act both vessels must be held in fault, the Hero, because, having improperly ported, she ran across the bows of three destroyers and "in the ordinary plain common sense of this business the Hero not only contributed but mainly contributed to this accident." On the other hand, the King's ship was not held free from fault, because an order to port which had been given by the navigating officer and which would have saved the vessels from collision was countered by an order to starboard, given by the commander when he came on deck.

This case was decided by the Court of Appeal upon the breach of the statute by the merchant ship, but the point was made that the statute did not apply, and your Lordships in this House appear to have decided upon common law principles. It would seem that in chronological sequence there would have been no collision but for the negligence either of the navigating officer in not informing the commander that the helm was a-port or of the commander in countering the port order. This, therefore, seems a case where the two acts of negligence were not synchronous but in sequence.

In The Ovingdean Grange (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 242; 87 L. T. Rep. 15; (1902) P. 208), a collision in the Thames where the statute did not apply, Sir Francis Jeune and the Court of Appeal held that a steamship proceeding down the river against the tide and having under the Thames rules to wait under the Point till the up-coming steamer passed clear, was partly to blame, although the actual fault was in the up-coming steamer, for not keeping a proper look-out and for turning without a proper regard to the passing traffic. There again the negligence seems to have been in sequence.

In Cork Steamship Company Limited v. Kiddle (1920, 2 Ll. L. Rep. 505), which was recently before your Lordships' House and is not reported in the regular reports, there was a division of opinion among your Lordships on this question. But it was finally held by the House that it was a case where the subsequent negligence was the only material one to be considered. In that case, which happened during the war, the King's ship Active committed a negligent act in proceeding out of Dover Harbour on a cross-channel course with lights necessarily shaded, at great speed, thereby bringing about risk of collision with vessels proceeding down channel. But the Ousel, a vessel proceeding down channel, could, as it was held, if she had had a proper look-out, have seen the red light of the Active in time. Your Lordships disregarded the prior negligence of the Active and treated the two vessels as being, at the material time, however they had got into the position, ships crossing so as to involve risk of collision. This being so, the Ousel became the give way ship and ought to have ported; and for her failure to port and her bad look-out she was held alone to blame.

In this connection the numerous cases of collision between two steamships, where A. is held to blame for bad look-out and wrong helm action, but B. also to blame for not stopping and reversing, must not be disregarded.

Some of them can be explained on the footing that A.'s action made the collision unavoidable, but B.'s speed increased the damage. This may well be if B. goes stem on into A. But if B. is hit in the side or flank it is frequently the case that it will not even be suggested that B.'s speed had any effect on the damage. If these cases be analysed in chronological sequence, either A.'s action made the collision unavoidable or brought about such a sudden peril that B.'s people had not time to think out properly what they should do and A, is alone to blame (such decisions have been given).

Or, on the other hand, notwithstanding A.'s prior negligence it was the subsequent negligence of B. in not reducing speed which caused the collision and B. should be alone to blame. It would be difficult to find an instance of such a decision; but many decisions will be found of both to blame.

Mr. Marsden, writing before the Maritime Conventions Act passed, suggests as matters of contributory negligence, acts or omissions either concurrent in time or identical in character or equal in degree of fault.

If this be correct, the acts of negligence need not be synchronous.

Upon the whole I think that this question of contributory negligence must be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common sense principles as a jury would probably deal with it. And while no doubt where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is the only one to look to, there are cases in which the two acts come so closely together, and the second act of negligence is so much mixed up with the state of things brought about by the first act that the party secondly negligent, while not held free from blame under The Bywell Castle (41 L. T. Rep. 747; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 207; 4 Prob. Div. 219) rule, might, on the other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution. And the Maritime Conventions Act with its provisions for nice qualifications as to the quantum of blame and the proportions in which contribution is to be made may be taken as to some extent declaratory of the Admiralty rule in this respect.

Your Lordships have now to apply these considerations of law to the facts of the present case.

As already stated, if the Volute had not neglected to give the appropriate whistle signal when she ported there would have been no collision. On the other hand, if the Radstock, in the position of danger brought about by the action of the Volute had not gone full speed ahead, there would have been no collision.

The case seems to me to resemble somewhat closely that of The Hero. In that case, as in this, notwithstanding the negligent navigation of the first ship, the collision could have been avoided if proper action had been taken by the second ship. Indeed, that case is remarkable because the proper order was actually given, but unfortunately countermanded. In that case this House held both vessels to blame, apparently considering the acts of navigation on the two ships as forming parts of one transaction, and the second act of negligence as closely following upon and involved with the first. In the present case there does not seem to be a sufficient separation of time, place or circumstance between the negligent navigation of the Radstock and that of the Volute to make it right to treat the negligence on board the Radstock as the sole cause of the collision.

The Volute, in the ordinary plain common sense of this business, having contributed to the accident, it would be right for your Lordships to hold both vessels to blame for the collision. And accordingly I move your Lordships to reverse the order appealed from, and to pronounce the Volute partly to blame for the said collision, with the usual consequential directions. And I think that there should be no costs in the courts below, but that the plaintiffs should have the costs of the appeal to your Lordships' House, and I so move. Lord Cave has signified to me his concurrence with the conclusions of this judgment.

Lord FINLAY.—I concur, and I have nothing to add beyond this one sentence, that I regard the judgment to which we have just listened as a great and permanent contribution to our law on the subject of contributory negligence, and to the science of jurisprudence.

Lord SHAW.—I have had, in considering this case, much difficulty. In the end I have resolved my difficulties by adhering, as I now fully do, to the judgment which your Lordship has just read. I would venture to concur with my noble and learned friend on my left as to the quality of that judgment.

Lord PHILLIMORE.—I concur.

THE TURID. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Expense of unloading timber—"Cargo to be taken from alongside at charterers' expense as customary"—Custom of port—Custom inconsistent with term of charter-party.

By a charter-party of the 1st Oct. 1914, it was agreed between the plaintiffs the owners, and the defendants the charterers, that the steamship T. should load a cargo of timber at Soroka for carriage to Yarmouth, and deliver there "as ordered, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, always afloat"; and that the cargo should be "taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." The T. was ordered to discharge at a part of the quay occupied by the charterers, to which she was "always afloat" unable to get nearer than about 13*ft., and the cargo was there discharged by stagings slung from the ship's side to the quay, the stevedore's men working in two gangs, one carrying the timber to the ship's rail, and the other carrying it ashore.*

It was proved that there was a custom of the port of Yarmouth that the whole of this work should be done by and at the cost of the ship. The shipowners objected that the alleged custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party; and sued the charterers to recover the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail.

Held, that the custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and that the shipowners were entitled to recover from the charterers the cost of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail.

Holman v. Wade (Times, 11*th May* 1877) applied.
Stephens v. Wintringham (3 Com. Cas. 169) overruled.
Decision of the Court of Appeal (reported ante, p. 184; 125 L. T. Rep. 154; (1921) P. 146) affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants, the charterers, from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Sterndale, M.R., Warrington and Scrutton, L.JJ.), (reported ante, p. 184; 125 L. T. Rep. 154; (1921) P. 146).

The defendants, who were timber merchants, carrying on business at Great Yarmouth, chartered the plaintiffs' steamship Turid to carry a cargo of timber to Great Yarmouth. By the charter-party which was dated the 1st Oct. 1914, it was mutually agreed between the plaintiffs as owners of the Turid and the defendants as charterers, that the said steamship should proceed to Soroka and there load, always afloat, from the agents of the charterers, a full and complete cargo of mill-sawn deals, battens, boards, and ends and being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Great Yarmouth as ordered, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the same, always afloat, on being paid freight as specified.

By clause 3 it was provided "the cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary."

The Turid arrived at Great Yarmouth with the cargo consisting of 576 standards on the 8th Nov. 1914. Her draught was such that in order to be afloat at Great Yarmouth she could not come nearer than within about 13ft. of the quay at which she was to discharge. In order to discharge the cargo a staging was erected between the ship's side and the edge of the quay abreast of the several holds, such staging being constructed of baulks of timber carried from the quay to the ship's side at a level of 4ft. or 5ft. below the bulwarks, with planks resting upon the baulks. This method of discharge was in accordance with a custom of the port of Yarmouth, and was as follows: That a wooden staging should be erected between the ship about to discharge and the quay, and that stevedores employed by the shipbrokers for and on behalf of the shipowners should carry the cargo from the ship's rail over the said wooden staging and dump the same at not less than 10ft. from the quay side, and that the cost of so discharging the cargo and erecting the said staging should be borne by the shipowners.

The plaintiffs said that if the alleged custom existed it was inconsistent with an express term of the charter-party which required the defendants to take the cargo from alongside at their own risk and expense, and was not admissible in evidence to vary such express term. The plaintiffs under protest carried the said standards from alongside over the said staging and stacked the same on the defendants' quay as directed by the defendants accordingly. The plaintiffs' claim was for the cost incurred by them in erecting the said staging and having the timber carried across it and deposited on the quay in the above manner.

The Court of Appeal held (ante, p. 184) that the case was indistinguishable from Holman v. Wade (Times, the 11th May 1877) and that the court was bound by that case to hold that the custom was inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the costs of discharge over and above the rate for delivery at the ship's rail.

The defendants appealed.

F. W. Mackinnon, K.C. and E. A. Harney, K.C. for the appellants.—The word "alongside" is not a word of such precise meaning as to exclude any evidence of custom of a particular port defining or explaining what, in the customary methods of discharge in that port, is its meaning. It does not mean "at the ship's rail," as claimed by the plaintiffs. Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided, and should be overruled.

Raeburn, K.C. and Trapnell for the respondents were not called upon.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord BIRKENHEAD, L.C.—The amount in dispute in this case is very small, 46*l.* 17*s.*, but the main, if not, indeed the only, point for decision is of some importance and requires careful consideration. It may be shortly stated: Whether the proved custom of the port of Great Yarmouth touching the discharge and delivery there of a cargo of timber, such as that in fact carried by the steamer Turid, is inconsistent with the contract in writing binding on the parties to this appeal and dealing with the same matter, or is only explanatory of the terms of this contract.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The facts are few and simple. By a charter-party dated the 1st Oct. 1914, it was agreed that the owners of the Turid should load on that ship at Soroka a cargo of deals, battens, boards, and short ends, and thence carry the same for the appellants to Great Yarmouth as ordered, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the said cargo to the appellants always afloat on being paid the freight therein mentioned in full and all port charges and pilotage. Clause 3 of the charter-party runs as follows: "The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch, as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted. Should the steamer be detained beyond the time stipulated as above for loading or discharging, the money shall be paid at 25*l.* per day, and pro rata for any part thereof. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary."

The Turid arrived at Great Yarmouth on Sunday, the 8th Nov. 1914, and was berthed about 12ft. from the appellants' quay, but her draught was such that while afloat she could not be brought into a position in which her bulwarks would be nearer than 13ft. out from this quay. To discharge her cargo a staging was necessary between the ship's side and the quay abreast of her several holds in order to bridge over the separating space. This staging was constructed with baulks of timber carried from the quay to the ship's side at a level of 4ft. or 5ft. below the bulwarks, with planks resting upon these baulks. The cargo was discharged in this way under directions given by the stevedores.

The appellants refused to pay the extra cost of erecting the staging, amounting to 46*l.* 17*s.*; whereupon the owners of the Turid, the respondents, instituted a suit in the County Court of Norfolk holden at Great Yarmouth to recover this sum as damages for breach of the charter-party, or alternatively as money paid at the appellants' request. In the statement of claim it was averred that the Turid was always ready and willing to deliver her cargo alongside in accordance with the charter-party; that the appellants refused to accept delivery alongside as so provided, but compelled the owners of the ship to place the cargo on the appellants' quay, to which access could only be obtained by carrying the cargo over a wooden staging, which it became necessary to erect and which they did erect accordingly between the steamer and the quay in order to take delivery; that the respondents under protest carried the cargo from alongside their vessel over this staging and stacked the same on the appellants' quay as directed by the latter.

The real defence pleaded in answer to this claim was that by clause 3 of the charter-party it was agreed that the Turid should be discharged according to the custom of the port, and that the cargo should be taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary; that it was the custom of the port of Great Yarmouth that a wooden staging should be erected between the ship about to discharge and the quay, and that stevedores employed by the shipbrokers, as agents for and on behalf of the shipowners, should carry the cargo from the ship's rail over the said wooden staging and dump the same at a place not less than 10ft. from the quay's edge; that the cost of thus discharging the cargo and erecting this staging should be borne by the shipowners; and that the cargo of the Turid was discharged according to this custom.

To this defence a reply was filed which, after denying that the custom relied on existed, and also denying that the cargo of the Turid was discharged in accordance with it, alleged that the custom was inconsistent with the express terms of the contract between the parties, which required the appellants to take the cargo from alongside the steamer at their own risk and expense, and that it was not admissible to vary them. The case was tried before Judge Mulligan, the learned County Court judge. Evidence was tendered to prove the custom relied on; it was objected to by counsel for the shipowners, but was admitted subject to objection. Several authorities were cited to the learned judge, including Holman v. Wade (Times, the 11th May 1887). He held that the custom as pleaded flatly contradicted the express terms of the charter-party, viz. (i) that the cargo was to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at the charterers' risk and expense as customary; (ii.) that the words "as customary" related to the means of doing the work and not to the expense of doing it, the incidence of the expense having been fixed by the preceding words; and (iii.) that the evidence of the custom was therefore not admissible. The learned judge, therefore, gave judgment for the shipowners. On the 23rd Dec. 1919 the defendants in the action (the present appellants) gave notice of appeal to the Divisional Admiralty Court. The appeal was heard by the President and Hill, J. (ante, p. 155), who differed in opinion. The President, after an elaborate review of the relevant authorities, was of opinion that the custom pleaded was inconsistent with the charter-party, and Hill, J. was of opinion that it was not so, and said that if he had not felt himself bound by the case of Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) he would have decided in favour of the defendants. The appeal was accordingly dismissed. The defendants then appealed to the Court of Appeal. The case was heard on the 17th Jan. 1921, by a court composed of the Master of the Rolls and Warrington and Scrutton, L.JJ. (ante, p. 184). The Master of the Rolls, in delivering judgment, said:—"In my judgment the case is governed by the decision to which we have been referred in Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), and, that being so, I do not think it necessary, or indeed advisable, to express any opinion of my own as to what my decision might have been if I had not thought the case to be governed by this authority."

He points out that the two learned judges in the Divisional Court differed in the manner already stated, and then adds:—"There is a great deal to be said on both sides, and I do not think it necessary or right to express any opinion upon it." He then utters a regret, which everyone must feel who has to deal with the case Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), that it is not well and fully reported. He points out that no opinion was ever delivered about it by the Court of Appeal in England, but that it has often been cited in courts of first instance and, so far as he was aware, no disapproval of it had ever been expressed. He then states the facts of the case as disclosed in the pleadings, and points out that the custom relied on in the defence was stated in that case in the following words:—"It is the customary and recognised mode of discharge of the Victoria Docks at Hull for ships laden with timber to discharge their cargo upon the quay alongside and to continue the discharge as long as there is quay space vacant for the discharge thereof, and the cargo is then taken from alongside by the consignees thereof," which, though strangely expressed, he thought meant that when the cargoes had been discharged upon the quay, but not till then, had the vessel been discharged "alongside," and that the consignees, taking it thence, were taking it from "alongside." He says it would appear as though the custom put to the jury was not exactly in the terms pleaded, because from the associate's certificate it appeared that "the jury found that according to the terms of the charter-party (apart from the question of usage or custom) the cargo was not to be taken by the shipowners from the ship's rail by means of a stage supplied by him to the quay and there stacked by and at the risk and expense of the shipowners; that was to be done by and at the risk and expense of the merchants." The jury also found that "the alleged usage or custom was proved to their satisfaction."

Upon these findings Manisty, J. he says, entered judgment for the plaintiff on the ground that the custom was inconsistent with the charter-party, and his decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. The Master of the Rolls concludes his judgment by saying that in his opinion the case before them could not be distinguished from Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), and that therefore the appeal failed and should be dismissed with costs. The Court of Appeal which affirmed Manisty, J. was composed of Lord Coleridge, Lord Bramwell, and Brett, L.J. The judgment was delivered by Lord Bramwell, who stated that both Lord Coleridge and Brett, L.J. concurred with him.

Warrington, L.J. in delivering judgment, said: "I am of the same opinion. I think we are bound by the decision in Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.). It is quite true that the report of Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) is a somewhat unsatisfactory one, and the rest of the materials for considering the case are afforded only by the record. But this, at all events, is clear both from the report and from the record that the question between the parties was, who was to pay for the expenses of the process by which, according to the alleged custom, the cargo was to be discharged? The shipowner said 'By the terms of the contract you, the charterers, are to pay the expenses of discharging from alongside.' The charterers said, 'By the custom which we have proved you, the shipowner, are not only to perform the operation of landing the cargo in the way we say the custom prescribes, but you must pay the expense of it.' The ultimate decision was that that part of the custom, at all events, which was said to throw the expense upon the shipowner was inconsistent with the terms of the contract, which provided that the cargo should be taken from alongside the ship at the risk and expense of the charterers." The learned Lord Justice then expressed the opinion that in the case of The Nifa (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 324; 69 L. T. Rep. 56; (1892) P. 411), and in that of Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 244; 76 L. T. Rep. 537; (1897) 2 Q. B. 83), the view taken by Lord Esher was that the mode of discharge was to be regulated by the custom, and that the payment of the expense was an absolute obligation thrown by the contract on the charterers, and therefore was not capable of being thrown upon the shipowner by any such custom as is alleged. On the whole, however, for the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls, he was of opinion that they were bound by Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), and held that the appeal should be dismissed.

Scrutton, L.J. found great difficulty in holding himself bound by a decision in a case about which they knew so little as they did about Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), but ultimately came to the conclusion—not without considerable doubt—that they were bound by it, and held that the appeal should be dismissed.

The words of the charter-party in this case are: "Taken from alongside of the steamer at charterers' risk and expense." I am, myself, of opinion that the word "alongside," if it does not suggest actual contact, does at all events suggest close contiguity, and not the less so because the ordinary obligation of the shipowner is admittedly only to deliver to the consignee the cargo his ship carries at ship's rail. A contract which requires delivery elsewhere extends this legal obligation. It will be observed that the custom proved in this case does not refer at all to the extent of the distance which may separate the ship from the quay. A vessel with a greater draught than the Turid might, in order to keep always afloat, have to be berthed at over 8 yards distance from the quay instead of, as in this case, about 4 yards from it. There was no evidence given upon this point. All that was proved is that the Turid could not get nearer to the quay if she was to keep always afloat, as the charter-party provided. The custom relied upon was proved by two witnesses examined on behalf of the appellants. Their evidence, as given in the note of the learned County Court judge, was as follows: "William Summers Wharton, manager of defendant company, was then sworn, and said: It was the custom to erect a wooden staging between the ship and the quay, and for stevedores to be employed by the shipbrokers to carry the cargo for the shipowners from the ship's rail over the wooden staging, and to put it down 10 or 12ft. from the edge of the quay. This was all done at the cost of the shipowners. That had been the practice for the thirty-three years he had been in the trade. William Brown, shipbroker, with thirty years' experience of Yarmouth, and Richard Jewson, President of the Timber Trade Federation, with thirty-six years' experience of the timber trade at Yarmouth, gave evidence to the same effect as Wharton. They were not cross-examined."

Hill, J. when giving judgment, said, when dealing with this evidence: "The method of discharging was that a staging was slung from the ship's side abreast of each of the three holds, and the stevedore's men, working in two gangs, carried the timber from the ship's deck and holds across the staging and on to the quay, and stacked it on the quay, leaving a space of 10 to 12ft. between the edge of the quay and the outer edge of the stack. One gang broke out the timber and carried it to the ship's rail, the other received it on the staging and carried it to the place of stacking on the quay, and there stacked it. The contention of the charterers was that, by the custom of the port of Yarmouth, the whole of this work was done by and at the expense of the shipowners; the contention of the shipowners was that the custom was inconsistent with the express terms of the charter-party and that their obligation was to deliver at the ship's side; that the work of the first gang was ship's work, but the work of the second gang, including the erection of the staging, was charterers' work. The amount in dispute was the difference between the cost of the whole of the work and the cost for delivery at the ship's rail."

In Humfrey v. Dale (7 E. & B. 266) Lord Campbell, C.J. at p. 279, states the rule of law as to the admission of evidence of a custom to contradict or qualify the tenor of the terms of a written contract. He says: "Neither collateral evidence nor the evidence of a usage of trade is receivable to prove anything which contradicts the tenor of a written contract." And, at p. 274, he says: "Whether this evidence be treated as explanatory of the language used or as adding a tacitly implied incident to the contract beyond those which are expressed is not material. In either point of view it will be admissible unless it labours under the objection of introducing something repugnant to or inconsistent with the tenor of the written instrument." (Of these words, "or as adding a tacitly implied incident to the contract," more presently.) On the following page he apparently suggests a test by which the repugnancy or non-repugnancy of the something sought to be introduced may be determined. He says: "To fall within the exception of repugnancy the incident must be such as if expressed in the written contract would make it insensible or inconsistent." I shall endeavour presently to apply this test, for I accept and agree with it.

The case of Humfrey v. Dale went to the Exchequer Chamber (El. Bl. & El. 1004) and was argued before seven learned judges, of whom four, Cockburn, C.J., Pollock, C.B., Williams, J., and Crowder, J. affirmed the judgment of the Queen's Bench that the evidence of custom tendered was admissible, and three, Willes, J., Martin, B., and Channell, B. were of a contrary opinion. None of these learned judges, however, seemed to disapprove of Lord Campbell's statement of the principle or of the test suggested by him to determine the question of repugnancy. They differed as to the result of the application of those principles to the facts of the particular case, which was not a case touching ships or charter-parties. In Southwell and another v. Bowditch (35 L. T. Rep. 196; 1 C. P. Div. 3741), Jessel, M.R. whose judgment is much more fully reported in 45 L. J., Q. B. 630, said that the difference of opinion in Humfrey v. Dale (ubi sup.) depended on this—the Statute of Frauds required a contract in writing, and of course, usage could not be contradictory to the contract or it would not be binding. It must be explanatory of the contract, and the point upon which the judges differed was whether the usage was explanatory or contradictory. They all agreed that if explanatory it might be admitted, if contradictory it could not be admitted. He then proceeds: "The real point, as I have said before, was whether in that particular instance the usage was contradictory or explanatory. I know some of the judges attempted to get over the difficulty by saying it was additional; but addition, if pure addition, is not explanation. It is a new contract, and therefore a pure addition would require to be in writing; but, again, there could have been no difficulty in saying this, that though, in an action upon the written contract, the mercantile usage might not be admissible for the purposes of contradicting the contract because it would be additional, the contract implied by usage might still be available for the purpose of charging the defendant."

Let me now apply the test suggested by Lord Campbell, and write in after the words "as customary" in the charter-party words describing the custom relied on in this case. The clause in the charter-party will then run somwehat thus: "The cargo to be taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary; that is to say, at the shipowners' risk and expense be carried from the rail of the vessel, over a wooden staging bridging the distance between the ship's rail and the quay constructed at the risk and expense of the shipowners, and dumped at a place on the quay not less than three yards from its edge." These added words seem to me to be absolutely inconsistent with the tenor of the language of the charter-party. Whatever may be the locality indicated by the words "alongside the steamer always afloat," it can hardly be a spot on dry land, in this instance about eight yards away from the ship's rail and about 3½ yards from the water on which she floats. The operation of taking the cargo from "alongside the steamer" is, according to the charter-party, to be conducted at the risk and expense of the charterers; but according to the custom nothing is to be done at the risk and expense of the charterers unless it be the taking away of the timber from the place at which it is dumped upon the quay. Therefore the taking of it from that dump must be the removal of it from "alongside the steamer" within the meaning of the custom. The risk and expense of bringing it there is to be borne by the shipowner just as in the ordinary case would be the risk and expense of bringing it to the ship's rail. To satisfy the condition in the charter-party as to this risk and expense one must, in order to reconcile it with the custom proved, hold that the dump on the quay about eight yards away from the rail of the ship is the "alongside the steamer," and that the taking of the cargo away from the dump is the taking of it "from alongside the steamer" within the meaning of the charter-party. I cannot reach such a conclusion.

With one exception, namely, the case of Stephens v. Wintringham (1898, 3 Com. Cas. 169) the cases cited on behalf of the appellants on the hearing of this appeal support the case of the respondents rather than that of the appellants. The other cases cited are easily distinguishable from the present case. The first of the former class is The Nifa (ubi sup.), the second is Hayton v. Irwin (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 212; 41 L. T. Rep. 666; 5 C. P. Div. 130), In the case of The Nifa (ubi sup.) the charter-party provided that her cargo, composed of deals, should be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at the merchant's risk and expense where she could lie always afloat, and further, that being so loaded therewith she should proceed to Yarmouth or so near thereto as she could safely get and deliver the same always afloat. The following additional clause was then written in: "The cargo to be supplied as fast as the steamer can load and stow same." On arrival at Yarmouth the ship was moored 15ft. from the edge of the quay, which was as near to it as she could always lie afloat, and in consequence of this 9*d.* per standard extra cost was incurred in the discharge of the cargo. In an action brought by the shipowner to recover this extra cost the County Court judge admitted evidence of a custom that the shipowners must deliver on the quay and therefore should bear the extra cost of bringing the timber from the ship's rail to the quay. The shipowner appealed to the Admiralty Division. The appeal was heard by Sir Francis Jeune, P., and A. L. Smith, J. They held on the authority of Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) and Hayton v. Irwin (ubi sup.), that evidence of the custom was not admissible, as it was inconsistent with the written contract. In Hayton v. Irwin (ubi sup.) by the terms of the charter-party the vessel was to deliver the cargo at Hamburg or as near thereto as she could safely get, to discharge as customary, the cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the ship at the merchant's risk and expense. The draught of the vessel with the cargo on board would not allow her to proceed to Hamburg. The point nearest to Hamburg which she could reach was Stade. The merchants refused to take delivery of any part of the cargo there. In order to lighten the vessel part of the cargo was discharged into lighters at Stade and was sent in them to Hamburg. The shipowner sued the charterer to recover the lighterage expenses, and the case was heard on appeal by Bramwell, Brett, and Cotton, L.JJ., who held (confirming the decision of Grove, J.) that the defence alleging that by the custom of the port of Hamburg the defendant was not bound to take delivery elsewhere than at Hamburg was bad on demurrer inasmuch as it sought to set up a custom inconsistent with the written contract.

The first of the cases which are distinguishable from the present case is Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (ubi sup.). There, as here, the words of the charter-party were "brought to and taken from alongside the ship at merchants' expense." Barges were sent by the consignees alongside the ship to take the cargo, and the point in controversy was whether by the custom of the Port of London the shipowner was bound not only to deliver the cargo into these barges but to stow it on them. The consignees asserted that by the custom of the Port of London in the case of ships discharging timber at that port an obligation lay upon the shipowner to stow the long lengths of timber, of which the cargo in question was partly composed, in lighters brought alongside the ship by the consignees for the purpose of receiving the cargo. Collins, J., who tried the case, found that upon the evidence there was a custom of the Port of London by which, in the case of a ship discharging long lengths of timber, the shipowner was bound to put the timber into lighters in such a way and to such an extent that the lighters might fairly be deemed to be loaded, but he found it unnecessary for the purposes of the case to decide whether the obligation imposed by the custom embraced stowing the timber in the barges in the sense of so arranging it that a barge might be conveniently navigated and should be loaded to her full capacity, and held that the custom so found by him to exist was not inconsistent with the charter-party.

The Court of Appeal, composed of Lord Esher, M.R., A. L. Smith and Chitty, L.JJ., held that the custom was not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter-party. Chitty, L.J. put the reason for the decision neatly in these words:—"The custom merely diminishes the obligation of the merchants to this extent, namely, that the timber coming over the ship's side is to be put on board the lighter by the ship's crew. When that operation has been performed it is the duty of the merchants, in accordance with the charter-party, to take from alongside the cargo thus delivered."

The second of these distinguishable cases is Glasgow Navigation Company Limited v. Howard Brothers and Co. (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 376; 102 L. T. Rep. 172). In it the charter-party provided that the cargo was "to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterer's risk and expense," and provided further that "if discharged in London cargo shall be discharged as customary with customary steamer dispatch in accordance with the custom of the port as fast as the steamer can deliver during ordinary working hours of the port, Sundays and holidays (unless used) excepted." The bill of lading contained the following clause:—"If discharged in London cargo shall be discharged as customary with customary steamer dispatch."

The question in dispute between the parties was the extent to which the custom of the Port of London affected the mode in which the timber constituting the cargo should be stowed and arranged in the craft which the merchant sends alongside. It was held by Hamilton, J., (as he then was) that by the custom and practice of the Port of London in the case of cargoes of timber the receiver is only liable to provide sufficient open craft alongside ready to receive the goods from the ship, and is under no obligation to have any men on such open craft to receive the goods from the ship's tackle or to stow the goods therein; that the shipowner is bound to do the whole work of delivering the goods into the craft and of stowing the goods therein in the reasonable and ordinary manner, so that the goods may not be damaged or imperilled, and so that the craft may be loaded to the usual and reasonable extent and may be properly and safely navigable.

It is apparent, therefore, that the matter in controversy in that case was not that now under debate before your lordships, but, to a large extent, as the learned judge said, the controversy was what was included in the word "discharging" used in the documents.

The decision in the case of Northmoor Steamship Company v. Harland and Wolff (1903) 2 Ir. 657) is not directly in point; but the judgment of Palles, C. B., is well worth perusal, especially in view of his criticism of the judgment delivered by Bigham, J., in the case above mentioned, Stephens v. Wintringham (ubi sup.). The charter-party in Stephens v. Wintringham (ubi sup.) provided, as does the charter-party in the present case, that the cargo should be taken from "alongside" the ship at the merchant's risk and expense according to the custom of the port. And the custom of the port was that after the cargo was raised from the hold by means of winches and slings it was taken by stevedores employed and paid by the shipowner and carried to the only place on the quay fit to receive it, which was about 60 or 70 feet from the vessel's side, and there dumped in piles. The merchant did not interfere in any way with these stevedores. The learned judge held that this mode of discharge amounted to "taking the cargo from alongside and nothing more than alongside." The Chief Baron said: "I think the ground of that decision was that according to the custom of the port the shipowner was bound to discharge on the quay, and that the only part of the quay on which he could discharge was a place which was 60 or 70 feet from the ship's side, so that he did no more than perform his obligation, although the mode of performance was rendered more expensive and onerous to him by the acts of those over whom neither he nor the merchant had control. This is the only view of the case which is consistent with Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) and The Nifa (ubi sup.)." This observation suggests, I think, that the learned Chief Baron approved of the decision of these two last-mentioned cases. I concur in this criticism of Stephens v. Wintringham (ubi sup.). As to the case of Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), I may for myself say that, on the additional facts, which, by the helpful industry of the Master of the Rolls, we are now in a position to consider, the case was rightly decided. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs, and I so move. My noble and learned friend, Lord Parmoor, concurs in the opinion I have just expressed.

LORD ATKINSON.—I concur.

LORD SUMNER.—All the Courts below have felt themselves bound to follow and apply the decision of the Court of Appeal in Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), which your Lordships are free to overrule. The first question is, how far would it be expedient to do so; for no one suggests that it can be distinguished. It is a decision on words which have long been common in timber charters, and it regulates the relation of such charters to established customs in a number of places of great importance. It was, indeed, only reported in the Times newspaper, but, so far from being lost sight of by those interested in timber charters and timber cargoes, it has all along been set out in one at least of the classic treatises on the subject—Carver on Carriage by Sea; it has been cited in argument over and over again, in the cases of The Nifa (ubi sup.), The Helios (ubi sup.), and Stephens v. Wintringham (ubi sup.), to name no others; and in particular was relied on as an authority which they applied in their judgments by both Sir Francis Jeune and A. L. Smith, J., in The Nifa (ubi sup.). The Master of the Rolls in the Court below says that Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) "is only reported in a most unsatisfactory manner, that is to say, it is only reported as a piece of news in the newspaper . . . the only difficulty about it is the difficulty of ascertaining exactly what it decided." As for this, if it had not been reported at all it would still have been a decision which when brought to light by any means must have been regarded as an authority. I have often wondered what would happen if some learned and industrious person compiled from the records and cases lodged by the parties in your Lordships' House, and the transcripts of your Lordships' opinions preserved in the Parliament Office, a selection of "Unnoticed Cases in the House of Lords." The results might be somewhat unexpected, but the decisions themselves all courts, your Lordships' House included, would be bound to follow wherever they applied. As for the actual report of Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.), it turns out on reference to the original pleadings to be very correct, and I think it is plain what was decided. It is true the report is very brief, and I wish this model were more often followed. We, who deliver judgments, would alone regret it.

I should not in these circumstances have thought it necessary to inquire whether this decision, now forty-four years old and never doubted, was or was not right, had it not been that Hill, J., and Scrutton, L.J., whose opinions command the greatest attention, would have been inclined, if free, to decide the other way. Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) is in line with all other cases on this kind of point except Stephens v. Wintringham (ubi sup.), which cannot in my opinion be distinguished unless on the ground that "taken from alongside" gave a greater latitude in determining where "alongside" was than the words "from alongside the ship" would have done. This is not the ground taken in the judgment. The learned judge seems to have merely dealt with the case as a question of fact, and if so it is not of general importance. He apparently put to himself the question, "If the captain whose ship is at the quay delivers the cargo in, at any rate, the customary method, when does he get it to a place that can be called 'alongside' the ship so as to complete the performance of his duty?" His answer on the facts was, "When he has got 70 ft. away." As this involved the ship in extra and special expenses, I think it was not in accordance with the charter.

In The Nifa (ubi sup.), on the other hand, the Divisional Court held that this very custom of Great Yarmouth was inconsistent with the express words of the charter, because in imposing on the ship the cost of doing something after the cargo was clear of the ship (which in the case of long lengths of timber is what I suppose A. L. Smith, J., meant by "putting the goods on the ship's rail") it contradicted the charter, which said that whatever was done thereafter the merchant must pay for it. On the other hand, in Aktieselskab Helios v. Ekman and Co. (ubi sup.), to which A. L. Smith, L.J. was a party, The Nifa (ubi sup.) and Holman v. Wade (ubi sup.) were cited but were not commented on, the case being regarded, and rightly, as being quite different from them. The question was not "How far off from the ship can a spot be said to be alongside the ship?" but "Is it inconsistent with such a charter to require the ship when lowering a long length of timber out of the ship into a lighter alongside to get the piece of timber fore and aft of the barge before releasing it." And as this was a question of the mode of handling the goods when delivering in the agreed place it fell within the custom to which the charter referred. The decision in Northmoor Steamship Company v. Harland and Wolff (ubi sup.) follows the same reasoning as that adopted in The Nifa (ubi sup.).

The views of Hill, J. in the present case, that the place in question was "reasonably along the side of the ship" and so was within the express contract, and of Scrutton, L.J. who, agreeing with Hill, J. further says that the custom simply explains what the delivery of the cargo alongside is, are based on an examination of the locality denoted by "alongside." Presumably they thought that if the place of delivery was alongside, though 23ft. away, no question of expense arose. Conversely, in The Nifa (ubi sup.) and The Northmoor case (ubi sup.) I presume the court would have said that the spot of which they spoke was not alongside, and therefore the prescriptions of the charter as to expense were paramount.

I do not think that the two considerations of place and expense can be so completely severed. Doubtless the words "alongside the steamer" may be satisfied though the apparatus of reception, be it barge or cart or what not, may not be in actual contact with the ship's side. It may well be that the ship can be required to deliver to the full reach of her tackles; but here not distance only but cost, also conditions, the customary mode of delivery, and the question of being alongside depends not only on the distance to be traversed to reach the customary place of alongside delivery, but also on the trouble, which is, of course, commercially convertible into the expense, of getting there. Here an extemporised pier had to be built out at the ship's expense, although no one says she could have got any nearer to the quay or was not an arrived ship. The quay was the defendants' quay, and there was not enough water at it for the ship to lie alongside of it always afloat. The quay was one which, from circumstances affecting the receivers only, had to be clear of timber piles to a depth of 10ft. from its edge, and along or behind that 10ft. line the custom required the ship to deliver her timber.

Though the ship was in a position in which she was entitled to require the process of delivery to begin, the merchants say that they were duly taking the cargo from alongside the steamer, though they could not reach the steamer from their selected spot, nor could the ship's stevedores reach it from the steamer without the interposition of a temporary structure, and of a new form of transport by man-handling the timber. I am unable to reconcile this with being alongside the steamer, the steamer being where she was entitled to be at the commencement of the process of delivery. The fact is the steamer is the starting point. It is from her side that the extension is to be measured, which ultimately reaches the customary spot, and when that extension involves 13ft. of water bridged by a staging, and at least 10ft. of quay, traversed by porters, I think the spot is too far away.

Accordingly in my opinion the appeal fails.

L. French and Co. Limited v. Leeston Shipping Company Limited.(a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Broker—Commission on hire paid and earned—Sale of ship during currency of charter by shipowner to charterer—Claim for commission for whole period.

The appellants carried on the business of shipbrokers, and the respondents were shipowners. By a charter-party made between the respondents and J. H. and Co. as charterers, it was provided that a commission of 2½ per cent. on the hire paid and earned under the charter, and on any continuation thereof, should be payable to the shipbrokers, the present appellants. The charter was a time charter for the period of eighteen months. After four months had expired the owners sold the vessel to the charterers, with the result that the charter came to an end.

In an action by the shipbrokers against the shipowners to recover commission in respect of the period subsequent to the sale of the vessel,

Held, that if it had been intended on the part of the shipbrokers to provide for the continuance of their commission in any event, they could and ought to have arranged for that in express terms. There was no evidence that the shipowners had sold the ship for the express purpose of relieving themselves from liability for payment of any further commission. The action therefore failed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

White v. Turnbull, Martin and Co. (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; 78 L. T. Rep. 726) approved and followed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of the Court of Appeal (reported 26 Com. Cas. 337). The plaintiffs were shipbrokers carrying on business in London. The defendants were owners of the steamship Clematis. In May 1919, the plaintiffs were employed by the defendants as brokers in connection with the chartering of the said vessel, and after considerable efforts they succeeded in arranging a charter for the said vessel to Messrs. John Holt and Co. Limited, for eighteen calendar months for the sum of 28*s.* 9*d.* on the steamer's dead weight on summer marks. The said charter-party was made on the 30th May 1919. By clause 30 of the said charter-party it was provided that "a commission of 2½ per cent. on the hire paid and earned under this charter and on any continuation is payable to L. French and Co. for division." The defendants, having paid to the plaintiffs commission on four months' hire of the said vessel at 2½ per cent., negotiated with the charterers for the sale of the said vessel and eventually sold the said vessel to the charterers. As a consequence the charter-party was cancelled and no further hire was paid or earned thereunder. The plaintiffs accordingly brought the present action claiming to be entitled to recover from the defendants 2,876*l.* 6*s.*, being commission at 2½ per cent. on hire for the remaining fourteen months of the charter-party period. The appellants contended that the respondents having received the full benefit of the appellants' services were not entitled so to act as to deprive the appellants of part of their remuneration for such services, and the commission claimed was the agreed and/or fair and reasonable remuneration. The appellants further alleged that there was an implied term in the charter-party that the respondents would not by their wilful act prevent any commission from becoming payable thereunder, and that the chartered hire for the fourteen months was taken into account in fixing the sale price of the steamship.

Roche, J., gave judgment in favour of the respondents and held that the payment of commission was contingent upon the question whether hire under the charter-party had been earned and that no term could be implied that under no circumstances would the parties to the charter-party by mutual consent terminate the charter. This judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Bankes, Scrutton and Atkin, L.JJ) on the authority of White v. Turnbull, Martin and Co. (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; 78 L. T. Rep. 726).

The plaintiffs appealed.

(a) Reported by Edward J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. and W. A. Jowitt, for the respondents.

Lord BUCKMASTER.—The appellants are a company that carry on the business of shipbrokers, and the respondents are a shipping company owning a line of steamers. The action out of which this appeal has arisen was brought by the appellants against the respondents claiming commission upon freight that ought to have been earned by one of their steamships known as the Clematis. The commission was payable under a charter-party dated the 30th May 1919, and made between the respondents as the owners and John Holt and Co. as charterers of the vessel. The charter was a time charter for the period of eighteen months, and it contained among other clauses a clause No. 30, which provided that "A commission of 2½ per cent. on the hire paid and earned under this charter and on any continuation" was to be payable to the present appellants. There are other provisions in the charter to which it is not necessary to refer, for none confer any larger rights upon the appellants. There is no other document in the case and no claim made or indicated by the evidence based upon any other contract. The rights, therefore, as between appellants and respondents are to be found in the terms of that document and nowhere else, and the initial difficulty due to the fact that the appellants are suing on a contract to which they were not parties has been overcome by assuming that the charterers were trustees for them of the benefits of it. I accept, without any opinion for the purpose of this appeal, that that assumption is well founded. Freight was earned under the charter-party and commission was paid, but on the 16th April 1920, the vessel was sold and from that time no further freight was earned and no further commission was paid. It is to recover the balance of commission for the remainder of the term that proceedings were originally brought.

Those proceedings have met with uniform ill success. The plaintiffs' action failed before Roche, J., and an appeal from his decision was dismissed by the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal have, quite rightly, based their judgment upon the fact that the case of White v. Turnbull, Martin and Co. (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 406; 78 L. T. Rep. 726) is a complete and conclusive authority upon the point which, at any rate, bound their judgment. My lords, that decision does not bind your lordships' House, and it becomes necessary to consider whether you agree with its effect. I have no hesitation in saying that I agree entirely with the conclusion that was then reached and with the reasoning upon which it was based. It is pointed out by Chitty, L.J., in that case, in which the facts were closely similar to the present, and where the charter-party had been cancelled, though under different conditions from the conditions which have caused the cessation here, that in order to enable the plaintiff to succeed it would be necessary to introduce into the charter-party an agreement by which the shipowner must be taken to say, "I will not terminate the charter-party under any circumstance by agreement," and he adds, "It seems to me that that implication cannot be maintained."

I agree that it is always a dangerous matter to introduce into a contract by implication provisions which are not contained in express words, and it is never done by the courts excepting under the pressure of conditions which compel the introduction of such terms for the purpose of giving what Lord Bowen once described as "business efficacy" to the bargain between the parties. There is no need whatever in the present case for the introduction of any such term. The contract works perfectly well without any such words being implied, and if it were intended on the part of the shipbroker to provide for the cessation of the commission which he earned owing to the avoidance of the charter-party, he ought to have arranged for that in express terms between himself and the shipowner.

I have not referred, in what I have said, to the circumstances that would need to be regarded provided it were established that the destruction of the position upon which the right to commission arose was expressly effected by the person bound to pay the commission for the purpose of relieving himself from liability for payment. There is no evidence of anything of the kind before your lordships in this case; we only know that in the exercise of the undoubted rights of ownership which the respondents possess, the vessel in this case was sold, and the charter-party came to an end.

Lord DUNEDIN.—I concur. I would only like to add one observation as to the reservation which was made in White's case, and which seems to have rather troubled Bankes, L.J. in this case, as to wilful default. I think that wilful default would only arise if it could be shown that the act which had been done and which should have had as its sequel the non-earning of further commission, had been done by the doer of it, not primâ facie for a purpose of his own, but simply and solely to avoid payment of the commission.

Lord ATKINSON.—I concur.

Lord SUMNER.—The words which define the subject-matter, on which this commission is to be paid, are to be found in the print in clause 30, namely, "On the hire paid and earned under this charter." As no hire was paid and earned in respect of the period in question, it appears to me to be clear that debt could not lie for the sum sued for. It must, therefore, be damages, that is to say, the plaintiff must satisfy your lordships that there has been a breach by the defendants of some obligation in his favour to be implied from the charter. That obligation virtually is that the shipowner will not sell his own ship during the chartered term. No authority has been produced for the implication of such a stipulation. It would be all the more curious, because it is not suggested that there is any stipulation that the other parties, the charterers, to whom, on behalf of the plaintiffs, the promise to pay commission is given, will not buy the ship during the term of the charter, and the odd part of it is that, there being no direct contract between the brokers and the shipowner (the contract being made on their behalf by the charterer), it is supposed that the undertaking arises only between the shipowner, who is deemed to be the employer, and the charterer, who is neither broker nor employer, although the charterer equally with the shipowner puts an end to further commission by joining in the purchase and sale.

I see no reason to doubt that White v. Turnbull, Martin and Co. (ubi sup.) was correctly decided, or to think that it can be distinguished from the present case.

I agree that the appeal fails.

HANSSON v. HAMEL AND HORLEY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Bill of lading—C.i.f. contract—"Through" Bill of Lading—Goods shipped from Norway to Japan—Transhipment at Hamburg—Tendering "through" bills of lading issued at Hamburg—Rejection by buyer.

The appellant in Sweden sold to the respondents in London 600 tons of cod guano to be shipped from Norway to Japan c.i.f. Kobe or Yokohama, payment net cash against documents in London. The guano was shipped in April 1920 from three Norwegian ports, and was carried by a local steamer to Hamburg under a bill of lading of the 22*nd April* 1920, and was there transhipped to a Japanese steamer, the A. M., which carried it to Japan. L., the agent of the A. M. at Hamburg, issued through bills of lading as soon as the goods came into his possession in the following form: "Through bills of lading from Braatvag according to bill of lading on the 22*nd April* 1920. Shipped in apparent good order and condition by Messrs. Hamel and Horley Limited, on board the steamship Kiev lying in or off the port of Braatvag, and bound to Hamburg for transhipment into the . . . Altas Maru 1500 bags cod guano . . . to be delivered . . . at . . . Yokohama unto order." The respondents refused to accept these bills of lading as not fulfilling the conditions of a c.i.f. contract.

The Court of Appeal (reversing Bailhache, J.) held, without deciding whether the bill of lading would have been a through bill of lading or not had it been issued at the proper time, the fact that it was not issued at a proper time entitled the defendants to refuse to accept it in satisfaction of their c.i.f. contract.

Held, that the bills of lading were not a good tender. They were the contract of the subsequent carrier without any complemetary promises to bind the prior carrier in the through transit; the buyer being left with a considerable lacuna in the documentary cover to which the contract entitled him. Further, a bill of lading issued thirteen days after the original shipment at a port in another couniry many hundreds of miles away was not duly procured "on shipment"; and the so-called through bills of lading were too late in point of time.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal (infra) affirmed.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal in England reversing a judgment of Bailhache, J., whereby he ordered judgment to be entered for the appellant against the respondents, for 4683*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* The appellant was a Swedish subject carrying on business as a merchant at Gothenburg. The respondents were an English company carrying on business as merchants in London. The question on the appeal arose under contracts for the sale of goods on c.i.f. terms and was whether the through bills of lading tendered were proper bills of lading and in compliance with the contract. The appellant's claim was for the price of certain bags of cod guano.

By his points of claim the appellant alleged that by two contracts contained in contract notes signed by him dated the 9th and 14th Feb. 1920, and a letter from the respondents dated the 5th March, 1920, the appellant had sold to the respondents the cod guano shipment March-April from Norway c.i.f. Kobe or Yokohama payment net cash against documents in London, that the appellant had shipped between the 20th and 22nd April from Norwegian ports by the steamship Kiev for transshipment via Hamburg by the steamship Atlas Maru to Kobe or Yokohama five parcels of cod guano totalling 5650 bags or 565 tons, that the appellant procured to be issued at Hamburg on the 5th May 1920 by the Osaka Shosen Kaisha Steamship Company the owners of the steamship Atlas Maru five through bills of lading relating to the said five parcels respectively covering the entire voyage from the Norwegian ports to Kobe or Yokohama showing on the face thereof, as the fact was, that the goods were shipped from Norway within the contract period on board the steamship Kiev for transhipment into the steamship Atlas Maru, that the shipments under through bills of lading were made in accordance with the universal custom obtaining in Norway well known to the respondents when goods are sold c.i.f. Japan or the East and in accordance with the course of dealing between the parties in previous transactions of the same kind, that the shipping documents were duly tendered and refused by the respondents, and the appellant claimed the agreed price or alternatively damages.

By their amended points of defence the respondents said that the appellant were bound to ship the guano c.i.f. to Japan without transhipment and to tender documents for such direct shipment, that the bills of lading tendered were not such through bills of lading as were regular and valid tender under the contracts, and that the policy of insurance tendered with the shipping documents was irregular and insufficient in that it covered transit in the steamship Kiev and the steamship Atlas Maru, and in no other vessel. They also said that there was unreasonable delay in the transhipment by the Atlas Maru as that vessel did not leave Hamburg until the 5th June and that such delay entitled the respondents to refuse to accept the documents. They also denied the alleged custom and its validity and the alleged course of business.

Bailhache, J. held that the shipments had been duly made in accordance with the established practice at a Norwegian port for transhipment at Hamburg and in accordance with the contracts, that at the time of shipment the appellant had a contract which covered the goods from the port of origin to the ultimate port of destination, and held that the through bill of lading by which the Japanese company took upon themselves liability for the whole voyage was a proper document and was properly tendered and complied with the contractual obligations of the seller.

The buyers appealed.

BANKES, L.J.—I differ from the learned judge who gave the judgment in this case on a matter such as has been discussed before us with great hesitation, and I should desire to have time to consider my judgment had it not been that I have formed quite a clear opinion on the matter. The question is whether or not the plaintiff tendered to the defendants the documents to which they were entitled under a c.i.f. contract of purchase which they had entered into with the plaintiff. The contract was made in Jan. 1920, and it is contained in letters that passed between the parties, the sellers being Scandinavian merchants, and the buyers being a firm carrying on business in London. The contract was for 600 tons of cod guano to be shipped 300 tons March-April and the balance May-June at a price c.i.f. Kobe or Yokohama: the terms of payment were to be net cash against documents in London. What happened was that in anticipation of the fulfilment of this contract the plaintiff entered into a contract with Mr. Lind representing a Japanese steamship company in reference to the carriage of the goods from Hamburg to their destination in Japan. It appears that there was no through line of steamers from Norway to Japan, and therefore goods intended for Japan from Norway had to be transhipped somewhere, and one customary place of transhipment was Hamburg. The plaintiff made this contract with Mr. Lind with reference to that part of the transit which lay between Hamburg and the final destination, and it is contained in letters which passed between Lind and the plaintiff on the 17th and the 23rd Feb. Lind quotes a freight from Hamburg to the destination of the goods, and he says the transhipment is to take place to a direct port in Japan, either to Kobe or Yokohama, the freight of 80*s.* is to be understood according to the contract, and so forth, and then he says: "I will sign the through bill of lading as soon as the goods are in my possession. That is, I will either take them over in lighters on your behalf or direct into the vessel." That was the contract which the plaintiff made in February. On the 22nd April the plaintiff shipped a quantity of these goods by a vessel which called at different Norwegian ports, and in respect of those goods bills of lading were given by the captain of that vessel which covered the transit from the port at which the goods were taken on board to Hamburg. The plaintiff's position, therefore, having shipped those goods, was this, that he held a bill of lading which covered the goods until their arrival at Hamburg. There was then a hiatus (if I may use that expression) which was not, as far as we know, covered by any particular contract, but there was another contract which affected those goods as soon as Mr. Lind or his firm took the goods over in lighters or direct into the ocean vessel in which they were to be carried to Japan. That was the position. The Japanese shipowners, when the goods were taken on board at Hamburg, issued a bill of lading dated the 5th May. It is a curious document, because it is dated the 5th May, and it purports to be issued to the buyers, Messrs. Hamel and Horley, and it purports to cover the goods from the time they were shipped upon the local steamer Kiev at the original port of shipment and bound to Hamburg until the goods arrived at their ultimate destination. On the face of it, therefore, it purports to be a through bill of lading from the port of shipment to the port of destination. As a matter of fact, it came into existence after the goods had been carried by the local steamer from the port of shipment to Hamburg and is dated some considerable time after the goods had started.

It is said that that document constitutes a through bill of lading, and that was a matter upon which Bailhache, J. expressed an opinion. He accepted the contention that this was a through bill of lading which gave the defendants a right of action as against the Japanese shipowners in respect of anything that occurred on the voyage from the port of shipment to Hamburg. He seems doubtful as to what the rights under this document may be of the defendants in respect of the interval between the goods being taken out of the coasting ship or the vessel which brought them down to Hamburg and the time they were put upon the ocean vessel, but the general conclusion he seems to arrive at is that this must be treated as a good through bill of lading. Mr. Wright contests that view, and he says the document bears on the face of it an intimation that the goods were in fact shipped under a local bill of lading of the 22nd April 1920. I think if it had been necessary to decide that point, I should have felt very considerable hesitation in accepting the view expressed by Bailhache, J. But it does not seem to me necessary to decide that point, and for this reason: The shipment to be a good shipment under the contract must at latest have taken place by the end of the month of April. This document comes into existence for the first time and is dated the 5th May and in my opinion it comes into existence too late to satisfy the obligation of the seller of the c.i.f. contract in regard to the documents which he has to bring into existence and hand over to his buyer. The reason I say that is because I think it has been clearly established by authority what the obligation of the seller of a c.i.f. contract is. I will read a passage from a judgment of Scrutton, J. in Landauer's case (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 106 L. T. Rep., at p. 301; (1912) 2 K. B., at p. 105) in which he quotes the judgment of Hamilton, J. in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Company (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 103 L. T. Rep., at p. 662; (1911) 2 K. B., at p. 220): "The first two duties of the seller c.i.f. are as follows: 'A seller under a contract of sale containing such terms is, firstly, to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract; secondly, to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract.'" Then the learned judge goes on to say: "I should add to the first requisite the words 'within the time named in the contract' and to the second that such a contract must be procured on shipment."

These goods were shipped at the port of shipment within the contract time, but the question is whether the seller in this case did procure a contract of affreightment on shipment. What is meant by the expression "contract of affreightment"? In my opinion to satisfy the requirements with reference to a contract of affreightment, the seller must bring into existence a contract embodied in a form capable of being transferred to the buyer and which when transferred will give the buyer two rights: (1) a right to receive the goods; and, secondly, a right against the shipowner who carries the goods should the goods be damaged or not delivered. If that is a correct view of what is meant in this case and other cases by a contract of affreightment, no such contract ever came into existence on shipment or within the period fixed by the contract for shipment. It is said that that is not the correct view, because of this contract which was entered into between the sellers and Lind in February, and Bailhache, J. has accepted that contention, but I am unable to take that view. It seems to me that for this purpose it is quite immaterial that that contract was entered into at all. It was not a contract which gave the buyers any rights at all. It is true it is a contract which might have been assigned to the buyer, but if it had been assigned to the buyer, it would not have given him any right as against the shipowner who carried the goods from the port of transhipment to Hamburg, and it seems to me that you cannot have a contract of affreightment which satisfies the obligation of the seller under a c.i.f. contract unless it gives a right to the purchaser of the goods as against the shipowner in respect of the whole of the transit. I am unable to follow the reasoning which suggests that the seller's position in this case is in any way improved by reason of the contract that he entered into with Lind. From the point of view of the buyer, it is no more effective than what Scrutton, J. describes in Landauer's case (sup.) as an intention to enter into a contract of affreightment. Giving the matter the best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that in tendering this document of the 5th May the sellers, if they were tendering a contract of affreightment at all, were tendering a contract of affreightment which came into existence too late to enable them to comply with their obligations under their c.i.f. contract.

I wish to make this further observation only: If the contention with reference to the value or efficacy of the contract which Lind made in February is correct, it would seem necessarily to follow that if, instead of electing Hamburg as the port of transhipment, the sellers had selected Hongkong and had then entered into a contract with Mr. Lind or some firm representing the Japanese shipowners at Hongkong for transhipment at Hongkong, that such a contract would equally avail the sellers as the present one, and to say that seems to me to indicate the extreme difficulty from a business point of view, apart altogether from the legal aspect of the matter, of contending that the seller under a c.i.f. contract of goods from Norway to Japan can keep his buyer waiting for the documents until the vessel has arrived at Hongkong, because until the vessel has arrived at Hongkong the documents will not have come into existence. For these reasons, in my opinion, the appeal must succeed, and the judgment which was entered for the plaintiff be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

If Bankes, L.J. differs with hesitation from a judge so experienced in these matters as Bailhache, J., I need not say with what hesitation I venture to differ also from that learned judge. Still I do differ. I have formed a clear opinion upon the matter, and I am bound to express it.

The question to be determined is whether or not the seller of goods under a c.i.f. contract has performed his obligation with reference to the contract of affreightment. Now that obligation is that he is on shipment to procure a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract. That expression of the vendor's obligation is taken, though not absolutely word for word, from the statement of Scrutton, J. in Landauer v. Craven (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 106 L. T. Rep. 298; (1912) 2 K. B. p. 94) and I will add to that that the contract of affreightment which he so procures must be one which is transferable to the buyer, so that the buyer may be in a position to obtain delivery of the goods, and also to resort to the carrier direct in case the carrier should commit any breach of his contract of carriage. In the present case the only document tendered to the buyer as purporting to be in fulfilment of the seller's obligation was this rather curious document which is called a through bill of lading. The shipment of the goods took place during the third week in April and the contract time for shipment expired within the month of April. This document is dated the 5th May. Unless, therefore, the seller had procured some other contract of shipment within the time limited by the contract, he has not fulfilled his obligation. Whether this peculiar document is really a through bill of lading, I feel considerable doubt. It was issued under a contract made by letters between the shipowners and the seller of the goods, which letters provided that a bill of lading should only be issued upon the goods being actually delivered to the shipowners. Therefore, so far as that contract was concerned, this shipowner never was under any liability at all with regard to the carriage of the goods during the first part of their journey, for his obligation only arose when ex hypothesi that journey had been completed. I really, therefore, feel considerable doubt whether this bill of lading was a contract of affreightment in one sense from the original point of departure to the point of delivery. But passing that by and assuming that it was so, still I am clearly of opinion that it was not a contract made during the period in which under a c.i.f. bargain the seller was bound to procure that contract. For that reason, in my opinion, the judgment of Bailhache, J. was erroneous, and this appeal ought to be allowed.

ATKIN, L.J.—The first question that arises in this case appears to me to be this: Has the seller procured a contract of affreightment covering the whole of the transit and tendered to the buyer the document which will give to the buyer the rights under such contract of affreightment for the whole of the transit, that is to say, the right to sue the ship if necessary? I think that is a question of considerable difficulty. The supposed contract, the bill of lading, was issued in pursuance of a contract which the seller had made with the owner of the ocean ship, and it was a contract under which the owner of the ocean ship, agreed for the freight therein mentioned to transport the goods from Hamburg to Japan, and he undertook to issue a bill of lading in respect of the ocean ship as soon as the goods had arrived and were in his possession at Hamburg. To my mind it is quite plain that the owners of the ocean going ship undertook no obligation at all to the seller in respect of the transit between Norway and Hamburg. It seems to me idle to suppose that for the freight from Hamburg to Japan he was going to incur liabilities from Norway to Hamburg, and I think the construction of the document makes it quite plain that there was no such obligation. Indeed, the learned judge has so found, because he has found that there would be a breach of contract if in fact the goods had been lost between Norway and Hamburg. Therefore, if in fact the seller had no rights against the shipowners under the original contract, I think it would be very difficult for him to say at any rate that he had got any rights against the shipowner under the through bill of lading which from that point of view would be, as far as he was concerned, it appears to me, either a mere receipt for the goods, or at any rate only to express terms of contract as between Hamburg and Japan, and if he had no rights he could transfer no rights to the endorsees. But in fact this bill of lading is taken out by the seller of the goods. He is not named in the bill of lading ; he does not purport to make the contract. The shipper named in the bill of lading is the consignee, and I myself have very considerable doubts as to whether the shipowner who clearly, to my mind, had never contracted to give rights to the seller of the goods as between Norway and Hamburg ever intended to give rights to the buyer of the goods in respect of the transit between Norway and Hamburg. If any such question had arisen in respect of sea damage or goods injured, or otherwise, at that stage of the transit, it appears to me that the buyer in accepting this document would acquire a somewhat difficult right of suing rather than have plain rights against the ship. I think it would be a very difficult position, and I doubt myself whether under the circumstances this document would be a satisfactory tender at all.

But I do not propose to decide this case upon that footing, because upon the assumption that this document would give rights to sue to the buyer, the question arises whether the document is in order as having been made at the time stipulated for impliedly under the contract on c.i.f. terms. Now in respect of that matter there is the authority of Scrutton, L.J. in Landauer v. Craven (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 106 L. T. Rep. at p. 301 ; (1912) 2 K. B. at p. 105). He read a passage from Hamilton, J.'s judgment in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Co. (Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1 ; 103 L. T. Rep. at p. 662 ; (1911) 2 K. B. at p. 220) : " A seller under a contract of sale containing such terms, has firstly to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract ; secondly, to procure a contract of affreightment, under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract." Then Scrutton, J. adds this on his own account : " I should myself add to the first requisite the words ' within the time named in the contract.' " About that, of course, there can be no question—and then he adds : " And to the second, that such a contract must be procured on shipment. I should make the last addition for the reason that the seller must as soon as possible after he has sent forward the cargo, send forward the documents to the vendee or consignee." That is what Scrutton, J. says, and Bailhache, J., in commenting on that says : " Now if I may respectfully say so, I entirely agree with what Scrutton, J. said in that case, and the question here is whether there has been a compliance with those requirements in this case." It is upon that footing of the proposition stated by my brother and acquiesced in by my brother Bailhache in this case that we have to determine this case, and I am not conscious that any other proposition was put before us at all in the matter, and therefore I assume that that is correct. Was this contract of affreightment made on shipment ? I think the answer is quite clearly that it was not. The contract of affreightment is a contract of affreightment of rights in or to be under the contract transferred to the buyer, and for this purpose the only contract of affreightment that is so tendered is this through bill of lading. That is dated the 5th May, some fortnight or so after shipment. It is a contract which is only made with the buyer who is the named shipper and the consignee after the goods had in fact arrived at Hamburg, therefore not made on shipment, but only made after part of the transit had been completed. I have stated the circumstances under which it was made, and it appears to me that there never was a contract with the buyer at all until the 5th May, nor has there been any attempt to transfer to the buyer the benefit of any contract made upon shipment. It is true that it is said that this contract with the buyer which purports to be a through contract was made in pursuance of a contract that had been made with the seller in April, but that is not an assignment of the rights, and it is not in fact giving the buyer the benefit of the original contract. In truth the difficulty that the seller is in in this case seems to be shown on the face of the judgment of the learned judge, because he deals with the different objections in this way ; objection one, there is no such contract. The answer of the learned judge is : " Oh, yes, there is in substance ; there is the bill of lading which is a through contract." Then it is said : " Very well, that contract is not made at the time of shipment." " Oh, yes," says the learned judge, " it is because the contract is the contract in the letter of Lind." Then there is a further objection made : " But that contract is not delivered forthwith in time to send to the seller." " Oh, yes," says the learned judge, " it is, because the contract you have to send to the seller is the bill of lading." So that the position is shifted in answering each objection, sometimes reliance being placed on the through bill of lading, sometimes reliance being placed on the contract expressed in the letter to Lind. I think myself that the true answer is that the only contract which is relevant for this particular purpose is the document which is tendered to the buyer so that he may have the rights under it against the shipowner for the whole of the transit, the only document which could be suggested to comply with that test is that of the 5th May, and that document was not made, as it seems to me, within the time stipulated by the contract.

There is another objection. Nothing that we have said, speaking for myself, and speaking for the whole court, I am sure, is intended to throw any doubt upon the commercial practice which prevails when goods are shipped from one destination to another where there is no direct means of transport, and it is therefore impossible to load in one ship at the port of lading and discharge from the same ship at the port of destination. C.i.f. contracts can be properly carried out in accordance with commercial practice by means of transhipment and are carried out, and the courts are not in the least likely to interfere with that commercial practice. The objection here is that the practice adopted does not conform to that which is necessary and that which can be adopted for the purpose of strictly carrying out the terms of the cost, insurance, and freight contract. Now the matter does not rest there in this particular case, because the actual practice proved by the witnesses does not appear to me to have been adopted in this particular case. It is undoubtedly of the essence of such a contract as this that the buyer should be put, as soon as reasonably possible, in possession of the documents that represent the goods for the obvious reason that he desires to dispose of them in the ordinary course of commerce as soon as he can. The practice appears to me, as proved, to be this, that the owner of the ocean-going ship who has to perform the greater part of the transit will, on a proper contract having been made with him, at or before the time of shipment, either allow the master of the local vessel to sign a through bill of lading, or will authorise his accredited agent at the port of loading to sign a through bill of lading, or if he not able to do that, will as soon as he receives the bill of lading for the goods in the local ship, then issue his through bill of lading. Now that is a process that requires normally a short period of time. It does extend the time for getting the document by the time that it takes to dispatch by the ordinary commercial business a bill of lading to the place where the ocean shipowner carries on his business and to get back the ocean bill of lading, because the shipowner then has control of the goods and is able to issue his through bill of lading, though the goods have not been placed on board the ship. The evidence that was adduced before the learned judge, both by parol evidence and in the depositions, appears to me to be quite plain that that is the practice. In this case nothing of the kind was done, because instead of a through bill of lading being issued in exchange for the ocean bill of lading as soon as it was available, the owner of the ocean-going vessel refused to issue his through bill of lading till the goods had actually arrived at Hamburg, and that, it appears to me, must cause a definite period of time and cause delay which is not contemplated under the contract. I think a bill of lading issued under those circumstances and at that time, and dated as of the date when the goods are put on board the ocean-going vessel, would not be a compliance with the practice as proved. For that further reason it appears to me that the buyers were entitled in this case to reject these documents when they were handed to them. I think the result is that this appeal should be allowed and judgment should be entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

Appeal allowed.

The seller appealed on the following grounds, namely, that (1) the established practice and course of business in the case of shipments from Norway to Japan was that such shipments are shipped from Norway to a port of transhipment for Japan, Hamburg being the usual port of transhipment; (2) the appellant shipped in due time at a Norwegian port to be transhipped at Hamburg to the Japanese Port, goods in accordance with the contracts; (3) at the time of shipment the appellant had a contract or contracts of affreightment for the carriage of the goods so shipped from the Norwegian to the Japanese port; (4) the through bills of lading tendered to the respondents were proper and sufficient documents procured in due time in accordance with the established practice and course of business; (5) the through bills of lading contained the contract of affreightment for the whole voyage from Norway to Japan in a form transferable to the respondents and which would have been transferred to the respondents if they had accepted the tender.

Leck, K.C., and N. L. Macaskie, for the appellant.

R. A. Wright, K.C., and O'Hagan, for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time to consider their judgments.

LORD SUMNER delivered the judgment of the House.—The only question argued on this appeal was whether the respondents were right in refusing to take up and pay for certain shipping documents tendered to them, on the appellant's behalf, by his bankers in London. The bill of lading was the actual document in dispute. Why the respondents really refused the document does not matter, nor does the case turn on the particular objection put forward by them at the time.

It was common ground that the whole transaction is governed by English law. The cargo—cod guano in bags—was sold c.f. and i., Kobe or Yokohama, to be shipped from Norway, 300 tons, March/April, and the balance, May/June. There was no stipulation as to the months within which the bill of lading itself must be dated, or as to the date of the bill of lading being conclusive evidence of the date of the shipment. The bags in question were shipped at Braatvag in Norway. A direct steamer to Japan was not available from Braatvag, nor do I imagine that the buyers supposed that it would be, and the seller shipped the consignment at Braatvag on board the Kiev, a steamer belonging to a Norwegian company, to be carried to Hamburg, where it was to be transhipped into the Osaka Shosen Kaisha's s.s. Atlas Maru for Yokahama. The appellant had made a contract, partly expressed in a "freight contract" and partly in correspondence, with a Mr. Lind, of Hamburg, the representative of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha, for the conveyance of the cod guano from Hamburg to Japan on the terms, among others, that bills of lading to Japan would be signed in Hamburg on presentation of the local bill of lading—that is, the bill of lading for carriage by the Kiev—as soon as the goods were in Mr. Lind's possession, being there either taken over in lighters on the appellant's behalf or direct into the steamer for Japan. If they arrived in Hamburg too late for the steamer scheduled, the appellant reserved to himself the right to ship them by the next steamer of the line.

The first, or local, bill of lading was signed on behalf of the master of the Kiev on the 22nd April, 1920, and acknowledged receipt of the cod guano from the appellant, to be delivered to "order Yokohama," the Kiev being bound for Hamburg, with the right to tranship and send on the goods by another steamer, freight being prepaid to Hamburg, the Kiev's destination.

At Hamburg there was issued to the appellant an ocean bill of lading, signed by Mr. Lind on behalf of the captain of the Atlas Maru and dated the 5th May 1920. The respondents were named in it as the shippers in accordance with a stipulation they had made, and the cod guano was made deliverable to order at Yokohama. The case is another instance, like The Parana (124 L. T. Rep. 609; (1921) 1 A. C. 486), of tranactions in which, in spite of the insertion of the consignee's name in the bill of lading, the intention to reserve the jus disponendi to the seller till the documents are taken up is manifested by the way in which the transaction is carried through with regard to the presentation of the documents. The respondents being named as the shippers, no question arises of any estoppel as against the carriers in favour of persons taking the bill of lading by endorsement and on the faith of the statements recited in it. The document was headed: "Through Bill of Lading," and it contained in the margin these statements: "From Braatvag to Yokohama" and "shipped from Braatvag according to bill of lading on the 22nd April 1920," and it began thus: "Shipped in apparent good order and condition by Messrs. Hamel & Horley, Limited, on board the steamship Kiev, lying in or off the port of Braatvag and bound to Hamburg for transhipment into the Osaka Shosen Kaisha's steamship Atlas Maru . . . 1500 bags cod guano . . . to be delivered . . . at the port of Yokohama . . . unto order."

This bill of lading accordingly was itself dated after the contract time of shipment, viz., March/April, but it is stated in the margin, and truly so, that, according to a bill of lading (that is the local one), shipment at Braatvag was within the contract time. It stated further that the goods, when shipped on the Kiev, were in apparent good order and condition, but it was silent as to their condition at Hamburg. There was no express statement that any goods had been shipped on the Atlas Maru at all, or, if so, in what order and condition they were when shipped, and it was reasonably plain that the Kiev did not belong to the Japanese owners of the Atlas Maru. The undertaking to deliver in Japan would, in the absence of special authority to those signing the bill of lading, apply only to such cargo as might, in fact, have been shipped at Hamburg on board the Atlas Maru, and no one would assume without actual evidence of it that a person like Mr. Lind, signing on behalf of the captain of the Atlas Maru had any authority to bind her owners for the carriage by the Kiev or the owners of the Kiev for anything at all. The question is whether this ocean bill of lading was a good tender under the contract of sale and whether the respondents were bound to take it up and pay for the consignment.

A c.f. and i. seller, as has often been pointed out, has to cover the buyer by procuring and tendering documents which will be available for his protection from shipment to destination and I think that this ocean bill of lading afforded the buyer no protection in regard to the interval of thirteen days which elapsed between the dates of the two bills of lading and presumably between the departure from Braatvag and the arrival at Hamburg. The initial words, on which the matter depends, may be put as a mere recital of a fact, or as words of contract, and in the latter case the contract may be that the owners of the Atlas Maru will (i) be answerable for the safe carriage of the goods from Braatvag to Hamburg, though they have not actually carried them, subject always to the perils excepted in their own bili of lading, though these do not correspond with the exceptions in the Kiev bill of lading, or (ii) will make good any loss or damage to the goods during the transit from Braatvag to Hamburg, if the owners of the Kiev fail to do so, or (iii) will indemnify the respondents against loss or damage affecting the goods during that voyage. Unless the words are words of contract to the effect first above-mentioned, they are useless to the appellant, and even so the question arises on the face of the document what authority, if any, the captain of the Atlas Maru or his agent, Mr. Lind, who signs for him, has to bind his owners by words of promise in respect of a voyage, which is already over before he has anything to do with the goods on behalf of the Osaka Company. Primâ facie he has none, and there is nothing shown to rebut the presumption. No doubt a question may arise on any bill of lading whether the captain has, in fact, signed for more goods than were put on board, and, if so, whether he has any special authority to do so, but the doubt raised here, if not dissimilar in kind, is different in its actual form and much greater in degree. Of course, no contract by way of indemnity or by way of guarantee or of anwering for the default of another will satisfy those requirements of a c.f. and i. sale which involve a contract of affreightment, since different defences are available on them and different incidents attach to them to those applicable to a bill of lading. Still less can a mere recital of facts avail.

With all deference to the very weighty opinion of Bailhache, J. to the contrary, in my judgment these words are mere words of recital, but, even if they were what the appellant contends that they are, I think it is clear that they do not make the ocean bill of lading a good tender in this case. The bill of lading by the Kiev was originally a contract with the appellant himself, and never was, nor in any normal course of business ever would be, tendered to the respondents. As there were not, I suppose, to be two contracts for carriage as far as Hamburg, this is strong to show that the appellant never intended the ocean bill of lading to be a contract of carriage from Braatvag to Hamburg. When documents are to be taken up the buyer is entitled to documents which substantially confer protective rights throughout. He is not buying a litigation, as Lord Trevethin (then A. T. Lawrence, J.) says in the General Trading Company's case (1911, 16 Com. Cas., at p. 101). These documents have to be handled by banks, they have to be taken up or rejected promptly and without any opportunity for prolonged inquiry, they have to be such as can be re-tendered to sub-purchasers, and it is essential that they should so conform to the accustomed shipping documents as to be reasonably and readily fit to pass current in commerce. I am quite sure that, under the circumstances of this case, this ocean bill of lading does not satisfy these conditions. It bears notice of its insufficiency and ambiguity on its face: for, though called a through bill of lading, it is not really so. It is the contract of the subsequent carrier only, without any complementary promises to bind the prior carriers in the through transit. The appellants' contract with Mr. Lind was not transferable by endorsement and delivery, nor was it tendered; the Kiev bill of lading he kept to himself, and endorsed to Mr. Lind under his own contract with him. I do not suggest that tender of either document would have carried matters any further, but, as things stood, the buyer was plainly left with a considerable lacuna in the documentary cover to which the contract entitled him.

The point is also put in a slightly different way, which equally relates especially to bills of lading. Scrutton, J. points out in Landauer v. Craven (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 106 L. T. Rep. 298; (1912) 2 K. B. 94), that in a sale of goods c.f. and i., the contract of affreightment must be procured "on shipment." Of course this is practicable and common even when a through bill of lading is necessary, containing provision for transhipment at an intermediate port from a local to an ocean steamer not in the same ownership. I do not understand this proposition as meaning that the bill of lading would be bad, unless it was signed contemporaneously with the actual placing of the goods on board. "On shipment" is an expression of some latitude. Bills of lading are constantly signed after the loading is complete and, in some cases, after the ship has sailed. I do not think that they thereby necessarily cease to be procured " on shipment," nor do I suppose that the learned judge so intended his words. It may also be that the expression would be satisfied, even though some local carriage on inland waters or by canal or in an estuary by barge or otherwise, preceded the shipment on the ocean steamer, provided that the steamer's bill of lading covered that prior carriage by effectual words of contract. " On shipment " is referable both to time and place. In principle, however, and subject to what I have said, I accept this opinion of so great an authority, and I am quite sure that a bill of lading only issued thirteen days after the original shipment, at another port in another country many hundreds of miles away, is not duly procured " on shipment." Indeed the ocean bill of lading was not procured as part of this c.f. and i. shipment at all, and " on shipment " does not at any rate mean on re-shipment or on transhipment. It is not enough that at the time of the initial shipment the c.f. and i. seller procured a contract by correspondence with Mr. Lind for the forwarding of the goods by an ocean steamer, for that was not procuring a bill of lading. If the Kiev had been lost with the cod guano on the coast of Norway, no contract of affreightment to Japan would have been procured or forthcoming at all. The matter was well tested thus in the Court of Appeal. In the absence of express stipulation, shipping documents under a contract of sale on c.f. and i. terms must be tendered by the buyer as soon as possible after shipment (Biddell v. Horst, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 104 L. T. Rep. 577; (1911) 1 K. B. 958). If, then, the port of transhipment was late on in the through voyage, a buyer might be entitled to tender the documents long before any through bill of lading to Japan had been signed or procured at all, and when there was no bill of lading in existence except that to the intermediate port. This ocean bill of lading was, therefore, on this ground also, in my opinion, a bad tender.

Though the document is called a through bill of lading it is not really so, for no one contracted by it for the carriage through from Braatvag to Yokohama. Accordingly, I express no opinion adverse to the sufficiency of through bills of lading, properly so called, as a tender under a contract like this. I would add that the evidence, given to prove a course of business between the contracting parties or a custom of merchants generally affecting the normal requirements of a c.f. and i. contract, failed to establish any distinction in this case, and I have no observation to make on the effect of such evidence had it been sufficient. The gist of it, however, was that, although in some cases the Japanese line either appointed an agent at the Norwegian port, or gave authority to the captain of the local steamer to sign a bill of lading on their behalf at and from that port, which would, of course, be a real through bill of lading, in cases where they had no control over the cargo till it reached Hamburg, of which this was an instance, they would sign only at and from Hamburg, and would not issue a through bill of lading, since they were not booking the cargo for the whole journey at a through rate.

An experienced witness called by the appellant further stated that he did not recall any other instance of a through bill of lading dated (that is, signed and dated) at the port of transhipment, and it was admitted by counsel that no such instance could be found in any reported case. Nor was any instance forthcoming of a ship's signing for the carriage of goods, already carried and delivered by another ship, as a prior part of the entire transit. It was admitted by another of the appellant's witnesses that a through bill of lading ought to be issued at the original port of shipment. Plainly, what the seller ought to have done was either to get Mr. Lind to sign a bill of lading from Braatvag to Yokohama with the right to tranship at Hamburg, if he had authority so to sign, or to have sold c.f. and i. Hamburg for Yokohama, and have forwarded the goods to Hamburg on his own account. I have only to add that, judging by the report in (1912) 2 K. B. 107, the decision in Cox, McEwen and Co. v. Malcolm does not touch the present case. Being a decision on a case stated and on questions put by an arbitrator, the issue was limited by his findings and by the terms of his questions. What those terms were is only to be gathered from the judgment, but they plainly did not include the the question now in issue, viz., whether a bill of lading signed at and operating from an intermediate port of transhipment is a sufficient document for tender to the buyer under a c.f. and i. sale. The contract was for goods to be shipped from Manila to London by steamers " direct or indirect," and the buyers rejected bills of lading from Hong Kong, partly on the ground that they did not comply with a stipulation as to the date of shipment, and partly because they did not conform to the words " shipment direct or indirect." The arbitrator found as facts that transhipment at Hong Kong was usual, and that through bills of lading from Manila, though usual, were not essential. Evidently he was proceeding on some recognised custom of the trade affecting the meaning of the contract. Accordingly the decision was that the contract did not require a through bill of lading; that the goods were, in fact, shipped to London " indirect," and were shipped at Manila within the contract time. The production of the Hong Kong bill of lading alone did not show that the conditions of the contract were not fulfilled, and the form of the arbitrator's question prevented the buyers from raising the contention that they were entitled to reject the tender because a Hong Kong bill of lading was not one which they were bound to take up. On the facts found it was assumed that the Manila bill of lading was not one of the shipping documents which had to be tendered and taken up, since, on a contract to which a through bill of lading was not essential and which was in terms satisfied by indirect shipment, the tender of the Hong Kong bill of lading sufficed. The arguments of counsel on both sides in the case of Landauer v. Craven (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 182; 106 L. T. Rep. 298; (1912) 2 K. B. 101) show that Cox, McEwen and Co.'s case (sup.) was understood not to turn on any question of the shipping documents which are required by c.f. and i. terms in general, and I do not think this case can affect the present appeal. I would suggest to your Lordships that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

(Before P. O. LAWRENCE, J.)

Re LONDON COUNTY COMMERCIAL RE-INSURANCE OFFICE LIMITED. (a)

Marine insurance—Policy—Gaming or wagering—Loss in event of peace not being declared by date named—P.p.i. clauses—Insurable interest—P.p.i. clauses detached and not detached at time of claim—Short slips—No mention of p.p.i.—Instructions for insertion of in long slips—Rectification—Life Assurance Act 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48)—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 4.

The risk insured against by certain policies of insurance or re-insurance issued on marine insurance forms and containing the p.p.i. and f.i.a. clauses, meaning "policy proof of interest" and "full interest admitted," was a total loss in the event of peace not being declared on or before a certain date. The company also issued policies of marine insurance or re-insurance to which were attached at the date on which they were signed the detachable p.p.i. clause which at the time at which the claims were made on the policies were in some cases detached and in other cases not detached. The short slips for these marine policies contained no mention of p.p.i., but the long slips or concluding instructions did contain instructions for the insertion of the p.p.i. clause. On the question being raised by the voluntary liquidator of the company as to the validity of these policies

Held, that though the provisions of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 were not applicable to the peace policies they were insurances within the meaning of the Life Assurance Act 1774 and insurances on an event in which the assured had no interest or insurances by way of gaming or wagering within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Act of 1774 and therefore illegal and no premiums paid on them were recoverable. The fact that the policies were re-insurance policies and that the re-assured had paid under the policies which they had issued did not enable the claims to be substantiated.

Held also, that the marine insurances were void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, being policies which at the time of issue had the detachable p.p.i. clause attached, and whether such clause was detached or not detached at the time the claim was put forward made no difference; the court would not rectify such policies as the long slips contained instructions for the insertion of the p.p.i. clause, and therefore the policies contained the real terms agreed upon.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS in companies winding-up with witnesses.

Lionel Maltby, as the voluntary liquidator of the London County Commercial Re-insurance Office Limited (hereinafter called the company) in conjunction with his special adviser appointed under the scheme of arrangement sanctioned by order of the court dated the 21st Feb. 1919, made an investigation of a number of claims on policies which had been issued by the company subject to a condition known as "policy proof of interest" (p.p.i.) The total amount of the claims on these disputed policies was 97,535*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* The liquidator made an affidavit stating the following questions upon which he desired to obtain the opinion of the court:

(a) A policy of insurance or re-insurance issued by the company in the name of G. Chatelain and (or) as agent for the sum of 300*l.*, the risk insured against being a total loss in the event of peace not being declared between Great Britain (England) and Germany on or before the 31st March 1918 pursuant to the corresponding long slip. To this policy was attached a perforated slip which could be detached or not, apparently at the option of the assured, and as appeared from the wording on such perforated slip it was alleged that it formed no part of the policy and was not attached thereto, but was to be considered as binding in honour on the underwriters, the assured, however, having permission to remove it from the policy should he so desire, but it purported to allege that in the event of claim the policy should be deemed to be sufficient proof of interest, and that full interest was admitted. The question arose whether this policy issued pursuant to the long slip and policies in similar form were illegal and void as being gambling policies or otherwise falling within sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 and whether, being a policy of indemnity, it was competent for the parties thereto to make it subject to the conditions of "p.p.i." and "f.i.a.," which indicated "full interest admitted."

The form of the above policy was as follows:

Whereas G. Chatelain, Esq., and (or) as agent represented to the London County Commercial Re-insurance Office Limited that he is interested in or duly authorised as Owner Agent or otherwise to make the insurance hereinafter mentioned and described with the London County Commercial Reinsurance Office Limited. Now this policy of insurance witnesseth that in consideration of the premises and of the sum of twenty-eight pounds seven shillings paid by the said insured to the said company by way of premium at and after the rate of nine guineas per centum for such insurance the said London County Commercial Reinsurance Office Limited do covenant with the said insured that the said company shall be subject and liable to pay and make good all such losses and damages hereinafter expressed as may happen to the subject matter of this policy and may attach to this policy in respect of the sum of three hundred pounds hereby insured which insurance is hereby declared to be upon [then followed a blank space; the above except the name of the insured and the amounts of the premium and the sum assured was printed, then followed typed in red ink:] To pay a total loss in the event of peace not being declared between Great Britain (England) and Germany on or before the 31st March 1918.

P.P.I.
F.I.A.

[After the above was printed the following:]

in the ship or vessel called the whereof is at present master or whoever shall go for master of the said ship or vessel lost or not lost at and from [Below this were small print clauses relating to ship insurance. This policy was dated the 10th Oct. 1916, and had attached the perforated slip referred to The corresponding long slip or concluding instructions for issue of the policy was as far as material in the following form :]

London County Commercial Reinsurance Office Limited, Marine Department.

Policy in the name of G. Chatelain and (or) as agent. To the debit of Chatelain and Co.

On. Ship's name. Voyage. Including all risk of craft. [Typed in red ink below :] Warranted free of Capture, Seizure and Detention and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities, or warlike operations, whether before or after Declaration of War. Warranted free of loss or damage caused by Strikers, Locked-out Workmen, or persons taking part in labour disdisturbances, or riots or civil Commotions.

[Then typed in black the following :]

To pay a total loss in the event of Peace not being declared between Great Britain (England) and Germany on or before the 31st March 1918.

p.p.i., f.i.a.

[The sum insured and premium per centum were also set out.]

(b) Further policies of insurance and reinsurance had been issued by the company in pursuance of the corresponding long slip subject also to the detachable slip, and were issued to cover the risk of loss on certain steamships therein referred to. A number of these policies had been issued, and the question arose whether even if they had been issued to cover a legitimate risk the attaching of the detachable slip on the policies or the terms of the long slip rendered them invalid.

(c) The company had also issued a number of policies on ships subject to a long slip against war risks, but prior to the claims thereon having been made the detachable slip which had been attached thereto had been detached. Assuming that the risks under these policies were ordinary marine risks, the question was whether in view of the fact that at the time the claim was put forward the slip which had been attached thereto was detached, the policies were valid, or whether they were invalid by reason of the attachment of the said detachable slip or of the terms of the long slip.

(d) The company had also issued a number of policies to which was attached the long slip and which were issued subject to the conditions of p.p.i. and f.i.a. (full interest admitted), and the question was whether these policies were in the nature of "wager" policies and within the scope of sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. The condition "p.p.i." and "f.i.a." on which these policies were issued appeared both on the long slips and on the policies, in addition to which there were also the detachable slip above referred to. The insurance in this case was upon increased value of grain.

(e) The company also issued a number of policies on steamships subject to the condition of "free of all average and war risk as per original ex delay," which had attached thereto the detachable slip above referred to, and the question arose whether these policies were also invalid under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and whether claims should be admitted thereon as valid. Other policies were issued "warranted f.a.a.," meaning free of all average without benefit of salvage, but to pay loss on such portion of the interest as might not reach its destination in the said ship or ships as above. Here latter policies were also issued subject to the condition "f.p.a.," meaning free of particular average, and claims have been made upon these latter policies, and the question arises whether such claims can be admitted.

The liquidator in these circumstances issued this summons in the winding-up of the company against G. Chatelain and Co., Auton Alrik Sunden-Cullberg and Erik Olof Nordgren, trading as Alrik Sunden-Cullberg of Stockholm, Sweden, Hamilton Smith and Co., Eagle Star and British Dominions Insurance Company Limited, and B. N. L. Whiteaway for the decision of the following questions: (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), and (g), and for the purpose of the decision of such questions that G. Chatelain and Co. might be appointed to defend on behalf of and represent all the holders of the policies mentioned in question (a); And the said Auton Alrik Sunden-Cullberg and Erik Olof Nordgren might be ordered to defend on behalf of and represent all the holders of the policies mentioned in question (b); that the said Hamilton Smith and Co. Limited might be ordered to defend on behalf of and represent all the holders of the policies mentioned in question (c); that the Eagle Star and British Dominions Insurance Company Limited might be ordered to defend on behalf of and represent all the holders of the policies mentioned in question (d); that the said B. N. L. Whiteaway might be ordered to defend on behalf of and represent all the holders of the policies mentioned in question (e); and that the said Hamilton Smith and Co. might be ordered to defend on behalf of and represent all the holders of the policies mentioned in question (f).

(a) Whether Lionel Maltby as such liquidators ought to admit as valid the policies of insurance or re-insurance issued by the company in the form known as p.p.i. policies more particularly described in the affidavit of Lionel Maltby to be filed in support of this summons.

(b) Whether as such liquidator he ought to admit as valid the policies of insurance or re-insurance issued by the company in the form known as p.p.i. policies, more particularly described in the said affidavit to each of which policies a slip capable of being detached in the words stated in the said affidavit had been attached, but which slip had not been detached at the date when such claim was put forward.

(c) Whether he ought as such liquidator to admit as valid the policies of insurance or re-insurance issued by the company in the form known as p.p.i. policies, more particularly described in the said affidavit to each of which policies a slip capable of being detached in the words stated in the affidavit had been attached, but which slip had been detached at the time the claim was put forward.

(d) For the decision of the questions raised under (a), (b), (c), treated as relating to a policy in the form f.i.a., more particularly described in the said affidavit.

(e) For the decision of similar questions referred to in the policy in the form f.a.a. without benefit of salvage, more particularly described in the affidavit.

(f) For the decision of similar questions referred to in the policy in the form v.o.p., and meaning "valued as in original policy."

(g) Whether in the event of it being held that all or any of the said policies were void and that no claims could be maintained under them, the liquidator ought to admit a claim for the premiums paid in respect of the policies.

An affidavit was sworn to by L. H. Hobbs, a director of Hamilton Smith and Co. Limited, insurance brokers, of thirteen years' experience as a marine insurance broker, as to the customary course of marine insurance or re-insurance business, the material parts of which were as follows:

The practice where the underwriters are a limited company or an insurance company in marine insurance or re-insurance has always been as follows: The broker, who is the agent of the assured, writes on a short slip the necessary particulars of the insurance proposed, such particulars as a rule, and more especially in cases of re-insurance, are in themselves sufficient to enable a policy to be drawn up. The broker then submits the short slip to the company's underwriter who, if he is prepared to accept the risk offered, enters on the slip the amount he is willing to insure and signs the slip with his initials and generally dates the signature. In this way by one or by several underwriters the full amount is insured. It is this short slip thus initialled (and not the so-called long slip) which, according to the practice of marine insurance and in the understanding of those engaged in marine insurance is deemed to be a complete and final contract, fixing the terms of the insurance, including the premium, and neither party can without the assent of the other deviate from the terms so agreed upon without a breach of faith. When, under the contract thus concluded, the broker requires a policy in the case of an insurance with Lloyd's underwriters, he prepares it himself and submits it to the underwriters concerned for signature, but in the case of an insurance with a company (such as is here in question) he hands to the company what are known as closing instructions on a document which is sometimes called the long slip, and on these instructions the company prepare and sign the policy. The broker acting for the assured makes out the long slip without which the company could not prepare the policy, as the broker takes away and keeps the short slip after it has been initialled. The underwriter signs the short slip only, and it is by the terms of the short slip alone that he is bound. If there is any variation between the short slip and the long slip the former not the latter is the authoritative expression and evidence of the contract. This is so in the case of an insurance with Lloyd's underwriters, and also in the case of an insurance with a company and sect. 21 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 applies (as I submit) to both cases.

In the ordinary understanding of brokers and underwriters engaged in marine insurance the terms "p.p.i.," or other similar terms (such as are mentioned in par. (1) (a) and (e) of the affidavit of Lionel Maltby), in a policy do not necessarily indicate that the assured has no insurable interest or does not expect to acquire an insurable interest thereunder. In many cases where there is an insurable interest the p.p.i. clause is inserted because the insurable interest is such that a loss in respect of it, though real, would be difficult to prove or assess. By the addition of such terms to the contract the underwriters agree to release the assured in the event of a claim from the difficulty and expense of proving his interest. It has become usual to add a p.p.i. clause (when required) in the form and with the reservation appearing on the policies referred to in the said affidavit of Lionel Maltby, viz.: "This slip is no part of the policy and is not to be attached thereto but is to be considered as binding in honour on the underwriters, the assured, however, having permission to remove it from the policy should they so desire." I submit that where a p.p.i. or other similar clause is attached to a policy in the form and with the reservation as aforesaid such a clause is not part of the contract at all but is only an obligation binding in honour on the underwriters, and the assured is entitled to (whether the said clause has been removed from the policy or not) to prove interest and to recover in respect of any claims that have arisen under the policy.

The claims on the policies which are not disputed by the liquidator amounted to over 500,000*l.*, and as the assets were insufficient to pay all these claims it was important to policy holders under the policies, the claims on which were admitted, that the liquidator should not have to pay the claims amounting to 97,500*l.* on the policies in dispute in this case.

On the 17th March 1917 the Danske Genforsikring Aktieselskab presented a petition to wind up the company. The Danske Company was formed during the war under some arrangement with the company to guarantee all the risks of the undertaking, providing a certain amount in the £. That arrangement was disputed by the Danske Company, and in the winding-up of the company a scheme was drawn up under the terms of which the creditors other than the Danske Company were to receive a composition at the rate of 6*s.* in the £ in full satisfaction of their claims against the company and the Danske Company. The court sanctioned this scheme on the 21st Feb. 1919, and on the 28th Feb. 1919 a resolution was passed for a voluntary winding-up in accordance with the scheme, and Lionel Maltby was appointed liquidator.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and F. Whinney for the liquidator.—The liquidator submits the questions in the summons for the decision of the court, but contends that the p.p.i. policies, even should there be an insurable interest, are nevertheless void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 (see Cheshire and Co. v. Vaughan Brothers and Co., ante p. 69, 123 L. T. Rep. 487; (1920) 3 K. B. 240, 254), and that the policies issued to insure the risk of peace not being declared before the date named are gaming or wagering policies within the meaning of the Life Assurance Act 1774.

Stuart Bevan, K.C. and Le Quesne for G. Chatelain and Co. Chatelain and Co. are brokers, and acted as principal. The first question is as to the effect of the detachable p.p.i. slip, but it is proposed to leave the argument as to that to the respondents, Hamilton Smith and Co. and Sunden-Cullberg. My view will be submitted on the assumption that the detachable slip is held to be part of the contract, and therefore the question remains on question (a) of the summons, whether the policies included in that question are void as being within sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. At common law prior to the statute (19 Geo. 2, c. 37, the Marine Insurance Act 1745), p.p.i. contracts were not void (Arnould on Marine Insurance, 10th edit., sect. 311, p. 428), but after that Act they were made illegal right down to the year 1906. Sect. 4 of the Act of 1906 for the first time included foreign ships, declaring that wagering contracts with regard to British and foreign ships were void. Persons whose profits in a business were dependent on whether war continued or not naturally desired to insure and where their livelihood was affected by the continuance of the war they had an insurable interest. These policies under question (a) concerned no marine losses or marine adventure, and are clearly not marine policies within sect. 1 of the Act of 1906, and that Act is not applicable to them. But it is contended these policies are void as being within the Marine Insurance Act 1745. There exists no authority as to this, though Arnould on Marine Insurance, 10th edit., p. 434, sect. 315, seems to think such policies are void. These policies are being attacked, and it is for those who do so to prove they are gambling policies. They are perfectly consistent on the face of them with the assured having an insurable interest. These re-insurances were effected by G. Chatelain and Co. in respect of insurances effected by them against similar risks, and they have paid in every case, and that constitutes his proof of interest and is sufficient proof of interest. Even if G. Chatelain were liable in honour but not in fact there would still be an insurable interest. There has been here a new consideration and a new contract not tainted with illegality which can be sued upon :

Hyams v. Stuart King, 99 L. T. Rep. 424 ; (1908) 2 K. B. 696, 704, and 707.

[Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 17, p. 514, was also referred to.] It is the duty of the court always to lean in favour of an insurable interest if possible :

Stock v. Inglis, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294 ; 51 L. T. Rep. 449, 12 Q. B. Div. 564.

F. D. Mackinnon, K.C. and H. C. Scott for the firm of Alrik Sunden-Cullberg, and F. D. Mackinnon, K.C. and Le Quesne for Hamilton Smith and Co.—Hamilton Smith and Co. are respondents as being the brokers in London, though the Alliance Insurance Company are the real parties interested in nearly all Hamilton Smith and Co.'s policies. The firm of Sunden-Cullberg support the policies coming under question (b) and Hamilton Smith and Co., all those falling within questions (c), (d), and (f). In every case these policies were genuine business and nobody ever knew or thought that any of these policies contained the p.p.i. clause. As these policies are not in fact gaming or wagering policies, and as actual loss can in each case be proved to have been sustained, not only by the re-assured but also by the original assured, the liquidator ought as an honourable man to admit the claims made under them, and being in the position of an officer of the court, he is bound to be as honest as other people. See :

Ex parte James ; Re Condon, 30 L. T. Rep. 773 ; 9 Ch. 609, at p. 614 ;

Ex parte Simmonds ; Re Carnac, 54 L. T. Rep. 439 ; 16 Q. B. Div. 308, at p. 312 ;

Re Contract Corporation ; Gooch's case, 26 L. T. Rep. 177 ; L. Rep. 7, Ch. 207.

And the fact the applicant is a voluntary liquidator does not alter the case, and companies of the highest class constantly issue p.p.i. policies. [P. O. LAWRENCE, J.—You might address the legislature as to that.] If a claimant had no real insurable interest but was merely using his insurance to effect a bet, the above argument that the liquidator ought to admit these claims would not hold, but where he has an insurable interest the liquidator would be relying upon a mere technicality in trying to deny his claim. As to question (b) the firm of Sunden-Cullberg are in quite a different position as their agents exceeded or did not act on their instructions. That firm asked the company to re-issue a perfectly proper risk, and did not ask that the p.p.i. clause should be attached, and never even saw the policy. There was no variation, therefore, of the original contract if the p.p.i. clause was attached by mistake. The firm of brokers, instructed by Sunden-Collberg, were directors of the company, and were, in fact, that company, so that there was no opportunity for the assured to read the policies. In the case of Hamilton Smith and Co., if the policies as they stand are void, then as the short slips did not show that the policies were intended to be p.p.i. policies, but the p.p.i. clause was in fact attached, there was a mistake, and that is a ground for having these policies rectified by the court. The liquidator though bound to raise these questions, as he represents the interests of other misleaded creditors, is not wishful that these policies should be held void. A case where the defendants themselves were wishful that the policy should not be held void on account of its having been made in terms prohibited by the statute, was heard as if the policy did not contain the p.p.i. clause. See :

Buchanan and Co. v. Faber, 4 Com. Cas, 223, 227 n ;

Gedge v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 57 ; 82 L. T. Rep. 463 ; (1900) 2 Q. B. 214.

If there was a perfectly proper policy in perfectly good terms, but contemporaneously with the policy the company were to write to the assured that they saw a difficulty for him to prove his interest so that if a loss occurred they would not insist on proof of interest, that would be practically p.p.i., but it would be no defence for the underwriters to plead that such a policy was void because of the contemporaneous agreement. The decision in Cheshire and Co. v. Vaughan Bros. and Co. (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, as there the broker was told to insert the p.p.i. clause, but in this case a clerk or office boy put in the clause in the long slip with no authority to do so.

W. Werninck for B. and L. Whiteaway.—We produce no evidence. The three policies which go to make up this group amount to 1200*l*. They have the detachable slip on, and there seems to be no distinction from question (b) as these policies have only f.a.a. on them in addition.

Whinney in reply.—The peace policies included in question (a) are clearly insurance policies and not mere wagers, but fall within the Life Assurance Act 1774, and are illegal, or they are null and void under the Gaming and Wagering Act 1845. They took the form of re-insurances moreover, and are for that reason insurance policies : Arnould on Marine Insurance, 10th edit., p. 514, sect. 1012.

As to the distinction between a policy of insurance and a mere wager, see :

Wilson v. Jones, 15 L. T. Rep. 669 ; L. Rep. 2 Ex. 139, 150.

What is stated in Arnould on Marine Insurance, 10th edit., p. 375, sect. 744, I adopt as part of my argument. This case is nothing like Hyams v. Stuart King (99 L. T. Rep. 424 ; (1908) 2 K. B. 696), which is in no way applicable for the purpose it was cited. There is no case in which it has been decided that a person such as a voluntary liquidator is an officer of the court. This liquidator is merely carrying out the trusts of a scheme of arrangement; but assuming he were to be treated as an officer of the court, then I rely upon Re Wigzell; Ex parte Hart (125 L. T. Rep. 361; (1921) 2 K. B. 835, 854). The trustee is acting under a statutory provision. The respondents, except Sunden-Cullberg, are not entitled to rectification, as no one has ventured to suggest the p.p.i. clause was attached by mistake. The liquidator cannot claim not to be liable to pay on the policies of the firm of Alrik Sunden-Cullberg, which are on an entirely different footing. They never gave the brokers (their agents) any authority to enter into p.p.i. policies, and as principals were unaware such policies had been entered into.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22.—P. O. LAWRENCE, J.—The first question which arises on this summons is as to the validity of the peace policies. In my judgment these policies are not contracts of marine insurance. It is true that they are made out on the printed form which the company generally uses for its marine policies, but that fact alone does not, in my opinion, make them marine policies. None of the printed clauses contained in these policies have any application to the subject matter of the insurance, and when the substance of these policies is looked at it is obvious that the losses insured against are not losses incident to any marine adventure. These policies, therefore, do not come within the definition of contracts of marine insurance contained in sect. 1 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and the provisions of that Act do not apply to them.

The next question to be determined is whether these policies are insurances forbidden by the Life Assurance Act 1774 (14 Geo. 3, c. 48). Although it would appear from the title of this Act as if the Act were confined to life insurances, yet its operative part extends to insurances on any events whatsoever except insurances on ships, goods, and merchandise. This Act, however, does not extend to all contracts by way of gaming and wagering, but is confined to contracts of insurance. The first matter to be considered, therefore, is whether these policies are insurances whithin the true meaning and intent of sect. 1 of the Act. In the case of Wilson v. Jones (15 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2, Ex. 139, at p. 150) Blackburn, J., in pointing out the distinction between a policy of insurance and a mere wager defines a policy as a contract to indemnify the insured in respect of some interest which he has against the perils which he contemplates it will be liable to. Applying that definition to the facts of this case, it will be seen that in form these policies undoubtedly are contracts of insurance as they purport to indemnify the assured against loss in the event of peace being declared before a certain date. Moreover, the policies were all effected by way of re-insurance having been issued to Mr. Chatelain as broker on behalf of the Lloyd's de France Insurance Company as the English and Foreign Iusurance Company for the purpose of re-insuring the risks undertaken by those companies under certain policies issued (also by way of re-insurance) to certain underwriters at Lloyds, who had underwritten the original policies. In these circumstances I am clearly of opinion (and indeed Mr. Stuart Bevan in the course of his argument felt himself constrained to admit) that the peace policies are contracts of insurance in the ordinary sense of the words, and not mere wagers.

That being so, the next question arises whether these policies are insurances on some event wherein the assured has no interest, or insurances by way of gaming or wagering within the meaning of the Act of 1774, and consequently illegal and void. In my opinion the fact that the policies contain the p.p.i. clause does not of itself prove that the assured has no insurable interest in the subject matter of the insurance, or that the policies are gaming or wagering policies, as that clause may have been inserted on account of some difficulty in proving interest. Mr. Stuart Bevan has called my attention to the judgment of Sir William Brett, M.R., in the case of Stock v. Inglis (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; 51 L. T. Rep. 449; 12 Q. B. Div., 564, at p. 571) where that learned judge states that in his opinion it is the duty of the court always to lean in favour of an insurable interest if possible, and I have assumed that this opinion correctly expresses the attitude in which the court ought to approach the present case. In my judgment, however, the facts disclosed by the evidence here are such that it is impossible to hold that the assured had any insurable interest. In my opinion the description of the subject matter of the insurance, the existence of the p.p.i. and f.i.a. clauses on all the policies, and the absence of any attempt on behalf of the claimants to prove that the original assured had any insurable interest, lead to the irresistible inference that these policies were insurances by way of gaming or wagering, and I should require the clearest possible evidence to convince me to the contrary. If I were to accede to the argument addressed to me by Mr. Mackinnon that I ought to uphold these policies because the original assured might possibly have had some insurable interest, I would be shutting my eyes to the true nature of these policies, and stretching the rule referred to, expressed by the Master of the Rolls in Stock v. Inglis (ubi sup.), beyond its proper limits. The fact that the policies are re-insurance policies, and that the re-assured have paid under the policies which they have issued does not, in my judgment, operate to enable them to substantiate their claims against the company. It is well settled that (subject to anything to the contrary in the re-insurance policy) the re-assured in order to recover from their underwriters must prove the loss in the same manner as the original assured must have proved it against them, and the re-insurers can raise all defences which were open to the re-assured against the original assured. This is equally true whether the re-assured had or had not paid their assured, inasmuch as it would be inequitable for them to renounce any of their defences so as to prejudice the re-insurers. (See the article written by the late Mr. Arthur Cohen in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 17, sect. 744, p. 375.) Nor does the fact that the re-assured in this case were only themselves re-insurers assist the claimants as it only operates to throw the position one step further back. If it once be established that the original insurances were illegal, it follows, in my judgment, that all the re-insurances are tainted with that illegality, and are themselves illegal and void.

In the result I hold that the peace policies are gaming or wagering policies within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Act of 1774, and are consequently illegal and void. It follows from the fact that these policies are illegal that the claimants cannot recover either the amounts thereby insured or the premiums paid for effecting them.

A further point, however, was taken on behalf of the claimants, namely, that the company had agreed not to dispute the claims under these policies in consideration of the claimants' supporting the scheme of arrangement which was then about to be submitted to the creditors for their approval. There are at least three answers to this contention; each of which, in my opinion, is conclusive. In the first place the letter of the 30th Dec. 1918, which was relied upon as constituting the bargain, was not in fact written on behalf of the company, and therefore does not bind the liquidator. In the second place a bargain not to dispute a claim arising under an illegal contract is one which the court would not give effect to under any circumstances, much less where it purports to affect persons who were no parties to it. In the third place this bargain, which, if valid, would have materially affected the rights of the general body of creditors, was not disclosed to the court when it was asked to sanction the scheme, and therefore the court ought not to pay any attention to it when adjudicating upon the rights of the creditors in the liquidation.

In the result I propose to make a declaration that the liquidator ought not to admit any claims under the peace policies, either for the moneys purporting to be assured thereby or for the return of the premiums paid in respect thereof.

The next policies as to which questions arise are those issued by the company to Hamilton Smith and Co. These are undoubtedly marine policies. They were taken out to re-insure genuine marine risks which the re-assured has underwritten, and were in no sense gaming or wagering policies. The first question which arises on these policies is whether the fact that a detachable p.p.i. clause was gummed on to the policies when they were signed and issued does not render them void under sect. 4 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906. In my judgment there is no difference between those policies which still have the p.p.i. clause attached to them and those from which the p.p.i. clause has been detached. It is not necessary to consider what course the court would have adopted if before the policies had been brought to its attention the p.p.i. clause had been detached, and neither of the litigating parties had raised the point that such a clause had ever formed part of the policies, because in the present case evidence has been adduced on behalf of the liquidator which proves clearly that the p.p.i. clause was attached to all the policies when they were signed and handed to the assured. In my judgment the proper time to judge whether these policies are valid or void as at the time when they are issued. The subsequent tearing off of the p.p.i. clause by the assured (even though it was done with the permission of the insurers) cannot in my opinion have the effect of rendering the policies valid if they were null and void when they were issued. It was contended, however, that the court ought not to regard any of the policies as p.p.i. policies because of the introductory words preceding the p.p.i. clause on the detachable slip, which stipulated that the p.p.i. clause was no part of the policy but was to be binding in honour on the underwriters, and might be removed by the assured. In my opinion that contention cannot prevail. The stipulation relied upon is a palpable and, in my opinion, wholly futile attempt to evade the provisions of sect. 4 of the Act of 1906. A stipulation that an important clause affecting the whole tenour of the policy should form no part of the policy, and might be removed by the assured, stands self-condemned, and cannot, in my opinion, have the effect of making the policy what it is not, namely, a policy not containing such a clause. Moreover, the statement that the p.p.i. clause should be binding on the insurer in honour only does not affect the position at all, as even without that statement the clause would not have bound the insurers in any other way. The policies as issued were in substance and in fact p.p.i. policies, and the effect of attaching the p.p.i. clause was in my judgment to render the policies void by virtue of the provisions of sect. 4 of the Act of 1906.

In my judgment, therefore, unless the assured can succeed in their claim for rectification all the policies to which the p.p.i. clause was attached at the time of issue are void. The question then arises whether the claimants are entitled to have these policies rectified by striking out the p.p.i. clause. It is argued that the court ought to rectify the policies because the short slips, which it is said contain the true terms of the bargain arrived at between the parties, did not stipulate for a p.p.i. clause. In my opinion the claim for rectification cannot possibly succeed, as there is no evidence whatever of a common or even of a unilateral mistake. The reason why the company attached the p.p.i. clause to these policies is because the closing instructions expressly stipulated that the policy should be a p.p.i. policy. It is true that none of the short slips mentioned the p.p.i. clause as one of the terms of insurance, but (according to the custom prevailing where the insurer is a company) these short slips were in each case followed by the long slips or closing instructions drawn up by or on behalf of the assured, and presented to the company in order that the company might prepare the policy in the terms of these long slips. In every case the long slips contained instructions for the insertion of a p.p.i. clause, and I have no doubt whatever that the assured desired to have p.p.i. policies. It was suggested that the long slips did not contain the real terms agreed upon, but were prepared by office boys or clerks who had no authority to insert the instructions for a p.p.i. policy. Even if this suggestion were true, it does not prove that the company made any mistake, but as a matter of fact there is no evidence whatever to support the suggestion. The true inference to be drawn from the evidence is that the long slips were prepared in the office of the brokers and presented to the company in the ordinary course of business. In these circumstances the court cannot possibly assume that the persons who made out the long slips acted without authority, more especially as Mr. Hobbs, a director of Hamilton Smith and Co. Limited, has made a long affidavit, and has not ventured to say that the insertion of the p.p.i. clauses in the closing instructions was not authorised by him. No doubt the company could, without any breach of faith, have refused to issue p.p.i. policies because when it underwrote the risk on the short slips the p.p.i. clause was not mentioned, but as a matter of fact the company in every case accepted the closing instructions without demur, and issued policies in accordance with those instructions. The policies were accepted by the re-assured with full knowledge that they contained the p.p.i. clause in accordance with the closing instructions; and in the circumstances it is plain that the terms contained in the short slips were by agreement between the parties superseded by the terms which were eventually embodied in the final contracts of insurance. The policies, therefore, contain the real terms agreed upon between the parties and, in my judgment,, the claim that they should now be rectified at the instance of the assured by omitting the p.p.i. clause is a hopeless claim, and one which the court cannot possibly entertain.

But then it is contended that the court ought to order the liquidator to admit the claims under these policies, in spite of the fact that they are void, on the ground that the liquidator is in the position of an officer of the court, and that the principle that the court ought to be as honest as other people (per James, L.J., in Ex parte James; Re Condon, 30 L. T. Rep, 773; L. Rep. 9, Ch. 609, at p. 614) and will direct the officers to do that which any high-minded man would do (per Lord Esher, J.R., in Ex parte Simmonds; Re Carnac (54 L. T. Rep. 439; 16 Q. B. Div. 308, at p. 312) applied to the facts of this case. It is said that as these policies were not in fact gaming or wagering policies, and as actual loss could in each case be proved to have been sustained not only by the re-assured but also by the original assured, the liquidator would only be acting as an honourable man would act if he were to admit the claims, and therefore the court ought to compel him to admit them notwithstanding that the statute makes the policies void. In my judgment the court cannot possibly accede to this contention. Even if the voluntary liquidator were in the position of an officer of the court for this purpose (which I think is open to doubt) I am of opinion that the doctrine has no application to a case such as this where a claim is made under a contract which the legislature has for sufficient reasons thought fit to declare void. Under sect. 4 (2) (b) of the Act of 1906 every policy containing the p.p.i. clause is to be deemed to be a gaming or wagering policy. (See Cheshire and Co. v. Vaughan Bros. and Co. (ante p. 69; 123 L. T. Rep. 487; (1920) 3 K. B. 240.) Moreover, it is by no means clear that the court, on having its attention drawn to the p.p.i. clause, ought not to treat the policies as void even though the parties themselves may not desire to have them so treated, Cheshire v. Vaughan (ante p. 69; 123 L. T. Rep. 487; (1920) 3 K. B., at p. 252). In these circumstances it is in my opinion hopeless to contend that the court ought to hold that it is contrary to honourable or high-minded conduct for an insurer (or as in this case a liquidator of an insolvent insurer) to rely on the provisions of this section. To order the liquidator to admit these claims would, in effect, be repealing this section so far as this liquidation is concerned (see Re Wigzell; Ex parte Trustee (125 L. T. Rep. 361; (1921) 2 K. B. 835, at p. 863). There remains to be considered the question whether the claimants under these policies are entitled to the return of the premiums which they have paid. Having regard to the fact that the Marine Insurance Act 1745 (19 Geo. 2, c. 37) which rendered marine policies affected by way of gaming or wagering illegal, was repealed by sect. 92 of the Act of 1906, and that the latter Act merely renders such policies void, I am of opinion that the claimants are entitled to prove for the amount of the premiums paid by them in respect of these policies. It is admitted that the original assured, and therefore the re-assured, had an insurable interest in the subject matter of the policies, and that there was no fraud or illegality on the part of the assured or re-assured or their agents. In these circumstances I am of opinion that as the consideration for the payment of the premiums has totally failed, sect. 84 (2) of the Act of 1906 applies, and the premiums are returnable by the company. In my judgment, therefore, the liquidator ought to admit the claimants under these policies as creditors in respect of the premiums paid by them. I propose, therefore, to make a declaration that the liquidator ought not to admit the claimants under the policies issued to Hamilton Smith and Co. Limited, or under any other marine policies to which the p.p.i. clause was at the date of issue attached (except the Sunden-Cullberg policies which have yet to be dealt with) as creditors in respect of the moneys thereby insured, but ought to admit them as creditors for the amount of the premiums paid by them to the company.

I now come to the Sunden-Cullberg policies, which relate to the steamers C. Sundt, Robert, and Theodor Williams. These policies stand on an entirely different footing from the Hamilton Smith and Co.'s policies, and the liquidator has by his counsel stated that he is not in a position to contest the claims made by the assured under them. In these circumstances I will content myself by stating quite shortly why I think the court is justified in holding that these policies ought to be treated as rectified by deleting the p.p.i. clause. Mr. Davies, the managing director of the company, acted as broker for the Stockholm firm who had instructed him to re-insure certain risks which they had underwritten. I am satisfied on the evidence that the instructions given to Mr. Davies by the Stockholm firm were instructions to effect ordinary re-insurance policies, and that the Stockholm firm never contemplated having p.p.i. policies, and never knew until after the liquidation that p.p.i. policies had in fact been issued. As Mr. Davies was managing director of the company, both short and long slips seem to have been dispensed with, and Mr. Davies himself signed and issued the policies. In these circumstances he either made a mistake which must be treated as a common mistake, or else he knowingly exceeded his instructions in which case the company cannot take advantage of the wrongful act of its own managing director. The assured have produced satisfactory proof of interest and loss, and I, therefore, propose to make a declaration that the liquidator ought to admit the claimants under the Sunden-Cullberg policies as creditors in respect of the amounts covered by their policies. In conclusion, I will only add that the policies referred to under the headings (d), (e), and (f) in the summons are covered by my decision in the case of Hamilton Smith and Co., as it appears from the exhibits to the liquidator's affidavit that p.p.i. clauses are attached to all these policies. That being so, I am relieved from dealing with the further objection to the policy mentioned under head (e) of the summons on the ground that it is made subject to the term "Warranted f.a.a. without benefit of salvage," as to the effect of which I prefer not to express an opinion. The costs of all parties to this application will be taxed as between solicitor and client, and retained and paid by the liquidator out of the assets.

Limitation of liability — Claims settled abroad — Limitation fund—Right of the plaintiff to claim for the amount paid in settlement of claims abroad— "Claims"—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 503.

Where the plaintiff in a limitation suit has settled claims abroad arising out of the collision in respect of which the decree of limitation has been obtained, he is entitled to bring payment of such claims into consideration before the registrar when the administration of the limitation fund is decided upon. Proof of such payment may be brought before the registrar notwithstanding that such payment was made under a foreign system of limitation, or for an amount not limited according to the English rule of limitation. It is not material that the claimants to whom such payments were made were not subject to the jurisdiction of the court.

The steamer D. and her cargo were sunk in collision with the steamer C. After the collision the C. put into a French port, where her owners were forced to give bail in order to secure her immunity from arrest at the suit of the owners of the D. Bail was given in an amount equal to the value of the C. at that time, which was the full amount of the liability of her owners under the law of France. In subsequent proceedings in France the C. was held alone to blame, and her owners were condemned in the amount of their bail and costs. The owners of the C. discharged the judgment debt and then commenced proceedings to limit their liability in England. A decree of limitation was pronounced and at the subsequent reference a claim was filed by the owners of the cargo laden on the D., and the owners of the C. themselves also filed a claim for the amount they had paid under the judgment in France, together with their costs in the French proceedings. The registrar allowed their claim for the amount paid to the owners of the D., i.e., the amount of the statutory liability of the owners of the C. in France.

Held, on appeal from the registrar, that the claim was properly allowed.

MOTION in objection to a report of the registrar.

The plaintiffs in this limitation suit were the "T" Coasters Limited, the owners of the steamship Coaster, and the defendants were the owners of the cargo lately laden on board the steamer Dokka and other persons claiming to have suffered damage in a collision between the Coaster and the Dokka on the 21st Oct. 1917.

The collision took place in the English Channel. The Dokka was sunk, and the Coaster subsequently put into Fécamp, where proceedings were instituted against her by the owner of the Dokka. In order to secure her immunity from arrest the owners of the Coaster gave bail at Fécamp in the sum of 200,000 francs, which sum represented the full value of the Coaster at that time. In subsequent proceedings at Fécamp the total loss suffered by the owners of the Dokka was assessed at 3,550,500 francs. Judgment was pronounced on the 21st Feb. 1921 by the Tribunal of Commerce awarding the owners of the Dokka 200,000 francs, together with interest, costs, and surveyors fees amounting to 24,422.80 francs. On the 21st May 1921 the owners of the Coaster paid to the owners of the Dokka in settlement of this judgment 224,422.80 francs.

The owners of the Coaster then commenced the present action to limit their liability in England, and on the 18th July 1921 a decree of limitation of liability was pronounced. Under the decree the owners of the Coaster paid into court the sum of 2047*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, being the amount of their statutory liability. The reference was held on the 11th Nov. 1921, when the owners of the cargo laden on the Dokka put forward a claim which was agreed at 2645*l.* The owners of the Coaster also put forward a claim for 4943*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*, being the amount paid to the owners of the Dokka together with their own costs at Fécamp converted to sterling at the appropriate rate of exchange. The claim of the owners of the Coaster was made up as follows:

Principal sum awarded to the owners of the Dokka for claims	200,000 francs
Legal expenses, expenses providing security, payments to surveyors, registration of judgment	24,422.80 francs
Legal expenses of the owners of the Coaster in France	4,068.85 francs

On the 21st Nov. 1921 Hill, J. decided in chambers in proceedings at the instance of the owners of the Coaster, that the owners of the Dokka could not make any claim against the fund.

On the 22nd Nov. 1921 the registrar reported that there was due to the owners of the cargo on the Dokka the sum of 2645*l.* and to the owners of the Coaster the sum of 4319*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, being 200,000 francs converted to sterling at the appropriate rate of exchange. The registrar gave the following reasons for his report:

REPORT.

This reference came before me on the 11th Nov. 1921, in the course of a limitation action, in which the owners of the Coaster had obtained a decree limiting their liability. The sum paid into court amounted with interest to 2047*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* One set of claimants were the owners of cargo on the Dokka, which vessel had been in collision with the Coaster, for which collision the Coaster had been held to blame by the court. After the collision the Coaster put into Fécamp, and proceedings were taken against her in the Tribunal of Commerce at that port by the owners of the Dokka. In these proceedings, the Coaster was held alone to blame. The course of proceedings is fully narrated in the affidavit of Thomas Edward Brown, one of the firm who were managers of the Coaster. The result of the proceedings in France was the payment of a sum of 200,000 francs, the value of the Coaster to the owners of the Dokka. In the limitation action the owners of the Coaster claimed against the fund in court in respect of this sum and in respect of expenses of the litigation in France. The owners of cargo objected to this claim. The Crathie (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256; 76 L. T. Rep. 534; (1897) P. 178), and The Kronprinz Olav (15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 312; 125 L. T. Rep. 684; (1921) P. 52) were referred to by counsel.

I am of opinion that the owners of the Coaster are entitled to claim on the fund in court a sum equal to the amount recovered in France by the owners of the Dokka. Strictly, the owners of the Coaster cannot be claimants, but rather are the plaintiffs in the limitation action, entitled to safeguard their rights, just as when plaintiffs who have paid a sum into court in order to limit their liability, consider that by appearing at the reference they may be able to reduce the claim below the limit of liability, so that there would be in court a balance due to the parties limiting: (see The Kronprinz Olav (sup.).

In The Crathie (sup.) one set of claimants, who had recovered damages in Holland, did not make a claim against the fund in court in England, nor do the owners of the Dokka in this reference. But it was held in The Crathie (sup.) that "the plaintiffs (i.e. the owners of the limiting vessel) will also take out of the fund a sum equal to the amount received by the Atlantic Insurance Company" (i.e. the non-claiming cargo owners).

Applying The Crathie (sup.) to the present case, this decision is an authority that the limiting parties are entitled to receive the sum and only that sum which the owners of the Dokka have received in France out of the fund in court. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the various points raised before me at this reference or to consider upon what grounds the decision in The Crathie (sup.) is based.

The claims as allowed are stated on the schedule hereto. (Sgd.) E. S. ROSCOE, Registrar.

In the schedule the claims were set out as stated above.

The owners of the cargo on the Dokka appealed.

Dunlop, K.C. and Dumas for the defendants, the owners of the cargo on the Dokka.—The registrar was wrong in allowing the claim of the owners of the Coaster. If the owners of the Coaster are allowed to make claims they will in effect be claiming against themselves, since the fund in court is provided by themselves to satisfy claims arising from their own negligence. They cannot sue themselves. If the claim is made on the ground that the rights of the owners of the Dokka are now subrogated to those of the owners of the Coaster the claim ought not to be allowed, since Hill, J. has decided that the owners of the Dokka have no rights against the fund, and, therefore, the owners of the Coaster can have none. A person whose rights arise by subrogation to the rights of another can have no greater rights than that other had. A plaintiff in limitation proceedings cannot claim for damage which he himself has suffered:

Simpson v. Thompson, 38 L. T. Rep. 1; 3 App. Cas. 279; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 567.

The only claims which can be made against a limitation fund are claims made by persons within the jurisdiction. Limitation only affects liability in so far as claims made within the jurisdiction are concerned. Claims not made under the provisions to the Merchant Shipping Acts cannot be preferred against a limitation fund:

The Kronprinz Olav, 125 L. T. Rep. 684; (1921) P. 52; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 312.

This proposition is established by the judgment of Atkin, L.J. The claim which the owners of the Coaster have been allowed to make was not a claim within the meaning of sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It was not a claim in respect of a payment made to settle a claim extra-judicially, nor to avoid proceedings in England. It was a payment made in satisfaction of a judgment debt abroad. This is not a claim within the meaning of sect. 503: The Crathie (76 L. T. Rep. 543; (1897) P. 178; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256) is distinguishable, since in that case the owners of the Crathie had been under no liability abroad, i.e., as judgment debtors, to the parties to whom they had already made payments, with the exception of the Atlantic Insurance Company. With regard to that claim, the amount was so small that this point was never taken in argument: (see full reports of the arguments of counsel in 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.). Rankin v. Rashen (4 Ct. of Sess. Cas. 4th ser. 725) is distinguishable because there the claims were claims within the jurisdiction. It is on these grounds that The Crathie (sup.) and Rankin v. Rashen (sup.) were distinguished by the Court of Appeal in The Kronprinz Olav (sup.): (see judgment of Bankes, L.J.).

Raeburn, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Coaster.—The report of the registrar is right and ought to be confirmed. The policy of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is to limit the liability of shipowners, not to limit claims; the court must give effect to this intention of the Legislature so far as it can do so. The owners of the Coaster are not claiming against themselves; nor are they asserting rights derived by derogation from the rights of the owners of the Dokka. They are bringing to the notice of the court the fact that they have paid certain claims. The law is correctly stated in The Crathie (sup.) and Rankin v. Rashen (sup.) and is in no way affected, or intended to be affected, by anything decided in The Kronprinz Olav (sup.). In The Kronprinz Olav the Court of Appeal upheld the decision of Hill, J. not to exercise his discretion to extend the time within which claimants to the limitation fund might bring in their claims: (see judgment of Hill, J. at p. 685 of 125 L. T. Rep.; p. 54 of (1921) P.; p. 313 of 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.). It was within the discretion of Hill, J. to extend such time in suitable circumstances: (see The Disperser, 123 L. T. Rep. 683; (1920) P. 228; 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 112). In The Kronprinz Olav (sup.), Hill, J. decided that the circumstances did not warrant the exercise of this discretion. The judgment of Atkin, L.J. is obiter dicta in so far as it decides anything beyond this. In any event it does not decide, or purport to decide, the propositions contended for. The law is as stated in The Crathie (sup.).

Dunlop, K.C. replied. Cur. adv. vult.

March 23.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P. said: This case was before me in the form of an objection to the report of the registrar on a reference in an action for limitation of liability. The proceedings arose out of a collision which took place in the English Channel on the 31st Oct. 1917, between the vessel of the plaintiffs in the limitation suit Coaster, and a French vessel called the Dokka. As the result of the collision the Dokka was sunk, and her cargo, which was of considerable value, went down with her. The particulars as to amount of damage it is not necessary to consider, but obviously the casualty was one which exposed the owners of the Coaster, in case it had arisen by error of navigation or by fault or default of their servants, to very serious claims in respect both of the Dokka and her cargo. The plaintiffs in the limitation suit found themselves with their vessel under arrest in France, at Fécamp, and were called upon at Fécamp to meet the claims of the owners of the Dokka. That is a material matter in this case, and I shall have to refer to it more in detail. They, in fact, made a payment in satisfaction of that claim. The decree in the limitation suit was obtained after the payment in satisfaction had been made, and is dated the 18th July of last year. After the payment in satisfaction had been made there was an attempt in the proceedings in the limitation action to obtain for the plaintiffs in limitation, by proceedings in the name of the owners of the Dokka, the advantages of limitation in respect of the claim of the owners of the Dokka. That claim came before Hill, J., and was disposed of. For various reasons, which are apparent on the face of it, it is clear that there should have been no claim by the owners of the Dokka—they were at the time of their application out of time under the Limitation Act; they were out of time under the Maritime Conventions Act, and they had been satisfied, so that they were not good claimants and their claim was dismissed, quite properly as it seems to me. There was no appeal against Hill, J.'s decision dismissing that claim.

In that state of the case, a reference to the registrar and merchants was held, and before the registrar there were brought in two claims. There was brought in the claim to the owners of the cargo on board the Dokka (that was a claim which was agreed at a sum of 2645*l.*) and there was also before the registrar the claim of the plaintiffs in the limitation suit to have the benefit of the payment which they had made under compulsion of the proceedings before the French tribunal, and which claim amounted to 4319*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* The fund in court in the limitation suit, which was necessarily assessed in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, was a fund of only 2047*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* The cargo owners claimed to be entitled to receive the whole of it, and then they would have received something like five-sixths or five-sevenths of the amount of their loss, not taking into account the expenses to which they might have been put. The question upon the objection in the registrar arises with regard to the claim of the plaintiffs relative to their payment to the owners of the Dokka. The registrar considered the matter and came to the conclusion that by operation of Lord Gorell's well-known decision in The Crathie (76 L. T. Rep. 534; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 256; (1897) P. 178) made as long ago as 1897, the plaintiffs were entitled to have credit in the proceedings as against claimants to the fund for a sum of 4319*l.*, being the sum they had paid to one of the claimants against the fund. The question is whether, in view of the recent consideration of the combined operation of sects. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, that decision of the registrar ought to be affirmed. There is no dispute that the payment in respect of which the plaintiffs in the limitation action brought their claim was in fact made. There was no application before the registrar to ascertain what was in truth the claim under French law or any other law of the owners of the Dokka in respect of their damage by the collision. The proceedings to the registry upon those two matters were not challenged, and they are not in question here. There were two technical grounds of objection which were raised, and there were certain substantial grounds of objection—I mean substantial in point of law. They are of a refined character—I am not sure whether Mr. Raeburn said they were of a sophisticated character—but of a refined character undoubtedly.

They have, however, to be seriously considered. The technical objections which were taken were two. There was an objection that the proceedings before Hill, J., in which it had been sought to raise a claim by the owners of the Dokka, was a bar to the claim of the plaintiffs.

I do not propose to discuss that matter. My own view of it is that it was simply an error in procedure, and had no other effect than such as might be involved in any liability for costs arising from it. There was the further ground that in the decree in the limitation suit there was no reservation of the question of the appropriation of the funds which would of itself found this claim for the plaintiffs. As to that matter, I think it is a purely technical one. It seems to me that the procedure which has been followed—which has grown up in the exercise of the jurisdiction with regard to limitation of liability and the distribution of funds in court—is such as to deprive that objection of any substantial value. Whether it would have been a ground for some objection before the registrar, I do not know; but, at any rate, I have found no substance in it.

I come to consider the questions of principle, the questions of law, which were raised. The first was that the claim of the plaintiffs in limitation to receive out of the fund the amount of payment which they had made outside the jurisdiction was in truth a claim by the plaintiffs to participate in the fund. Upon grounds of principle which seem to me clear—grounds of principle which were discussed and illustrated in the well-known case of Simpson v. Thompson (38 L. T. Rep. 1; 3 Asp. 567; 3 App. Cas. 279), which ultimately found its way to the House of Lords—there is no question that a plaintiff in limitation cannot come in as a claimant in respect of damage which he has done. Where there has been negligence, and there is the concession by the Legislature of a limited liability for the results of the negligence, it would seem to be impossible in principle that the author of the negligence—the person answerable for the negligence—should be entitled to displace those who had been injured by such negligence, and to put into his pocket either a larger or smaller part of the fund provided to limit his liability in respect of the negligence. The real question here is whether the plaintiffs are claimants in that respect—whether they come within the principle which was discussed in Simpson v. Thompson (sup.)—or whether in fact they are merely setting up their right, in the administration of the limitation fund, to retain part of the fund by reason of claims which they have already satisfied. That seems to me to be a different matter—which has been long recognised as a different matter—so far as claimants within the jurisdiction are concerned. So far as claimants within the scope of the Act are concerned, there is no question but that a claimant in limitation, who has paid to claimants a sum in satisfaction of a liability arising from the collision, might bring in that payment to found an application on his part to be credited in the administration of the fund in respect of the liability which he had satisfied.

I think that—apart from the question of law which really underlies the appeal, to which I will presently refer—an examination of the objection that the plaintiffs were making their claim contrary to Simpson v. Thompson (sup.) only discloses that there is no substance in that objection, that it is an objection in point of form, but not an objection which really touches the merits of the case as far as the plaintiffs are concerned.

The next objection which was made was that the plaintiffs' payment had been a payment not in respect of a claim arising out of the collision, but a payment under a portion of the judgment—a payment in satisfaction of the judgment debt—and that, therefore, the claim of the person satisfied was not a claim within the meaning of the term in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In my opinion that objection has no more substance than the objection to which I have previously referred. The question is not, as it seems to me, whether a foreign plaintiff had a claim here in respect of a judgment debt. It may be that, having a judgment debt, he would not have a claim here in respect of damage by the collision.

I express no opinion about that—certainly no opinion in the affirmative. But the question is not whether the foreign plaintiff had a claim, but the question is whether the plaintiff in limitation is entitled to have account taken of the sum which he has paid, and to be credited in the administration of the fund with the sum he has so paid. The objection which was mainly argued was this—that the plaintiffs could have no claim in respect of a payment made to the owners of the Dokka by reason that the owners of the Dokka were not entitled to the payment they received under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It was contended that a foreign claimant—that is, a claimant outside his Majesty's Dominions—is not within the purview of the provisions of the limitation sections in the Act of 1894. Mr. Dunlop pointed out that a foreign claimant founds himself either upon an absolute liability for damage done, or on a system of limitation which is different from the system of limitation under our Merchant Shipping Act. He contended that the possible claimants were those who consent to come in for the purposes of the distribution of a limitation fund to share in it rateably. He contended that the plaintiffs in the French action, the owners of the Dokka, were not within that definition. He argued that upon principle—and by reason in particular of a recent decision in the Court of Appeal—that sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act must be read as though the limitation of liability were a limitation to this effect, that the owners of the ship in fault shall not be liable in damages beyond the amount of the limitation in respect of claims from persons subject to the operation of the statute. That is the main question which has to be considered. There can be no doubt, I think, that the contention is directly contrary to the practice which has been pursued in the administration of the limitation sections, at any rate since the decision in The Crathie (sup.), and, as I believe, for a period long before the decision in that case. It has, however, to be considered. It was said on the part of the plaintiffs in the limitation suit that the decision in the case in the Court of Session of Rankin v. Raschen (4 Ct. of Sess. Cas. 4th Ser. 725) did not raise the question which is raised here, and it was said that in The Crathie (sup.), although there was a claim which raised the question, as to the right to claim for damage out of the jurisdiction, nevertheless that the amount there involved was so small that the matter was dealt with by counsel and by the court, upon the footing that the claimants might stand upon the common basis of being, all of them, persons who could make claims within the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. It was further said that all the judgments in The Kronprinz Olav (125 L. T. Rep. 684; (1921) P. 52, 15 Asp., Mar. Law Cas. 312) not merely reserved the question which is raised here, but expressed views with regard to it which ought to guide me to the conclusion first of all that the matter is open in point of authority; and, second, that it ought to be dealt with in the manner contended for by the owners of the Dokka. The practical result would be of the nature I have stated, that the plaintiffs here, although their limitation of liability is a limitation of a sum of just over 2000*l.*, would find themselves involved in the payment of a sum just under 7000*l.* So that the limitation of 8*l.* per ton of the ship which was in collision would become nugatory. It is said that such a case cannot arise because there is no international statute, no international scheme for dealing with these claims for limitation, and that limitation takes place within national areas, and upon a different footing within those several areas, and that where there is a statutory fund it should be distributed between the persons who are bound by the statutory limitation. It was admitted on the part of the owners of the Dokka that a foreign claimant may come in and claim upon the administration of the fund for limitation in our courts. This was said to go further than that, and, in so far as it went, further raised the question of principle to which I have referred. I have to deal with the matter upon principle, and with reference to the authorities, and having recognised in the course of the argument that I have strong predilection of my own part to the view which seemed to me a rational common-sense view—which has long been acted upon in the registry—I took time to read with care the judgments upon which the practice has been settled, and the judgments in The Kronprinz Olav (sup.). It has been recognised, from the time at any rate of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and I think authorities will be found under the earlier Acts (under the statute of 53 Geo. 3), that a limitation fund is to be equitably administered. Under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, where there was a section providing for limitation, with a section empowering Courts of Equity to proceed to administer a limitation fund, there is a decision of Lord Hatherley, when he was Page Wood, V.-C. which arose under circumstances which I think throw some light on this case. There had been a suit in the High Court of Admiralty with arrest of the vessel, and the suit had proceeded to judgment in favour of the plaintiff. The question was whether, under the provisions of the Act of 1854, the plaintiffs in the limitation were entitled to bring in that judgment as one of the claims in respect of which their liability was to be ascertained, and in respect of which the fund was to be administered. The authority is Leycester v. Logan (26 L. Jour., Ch. 306), and there questions were raised with regard to the meaning of the term "claim," and with regard to other questions, some of which are involved in this case. Lord Hatherley had no doubt that the plaintiffs there were entitled in equity to have credit in the administration of the limitation fund for the liability which had been brought home to them by the judgment in the Admiralty claim.

That goes some distance in favour of the contentions made by Mr. Raeburn. There was the well-known case of Rankin v. Raschen (sup.) in the Court of Session, where the decision was broadly given that the plaintiff in limitation is entitled to state a claim in respect of the party whose claim he has settled extra judicially. As was said here, if these plaintiffs had come in and made a claim within the jurisdiction, which had been settled extra judicially upon the footing of the Merchant Shipping Act the case of the plaintiffs in limitation would have been different.

Following those cases, there was before Lord Gorell in The Crathie (sup.) the question where the distribution of such a fund as this was considered by the authorities. There being claimants who had elected to sue in Holland, Lord Gorell held that in respect of those claims the claimants who had not been satisfied in full were entitled to claim in this jurisdiction, and that the plaintiffs in limitation were also entitled to take out of the fund a sum equal to the amounts already received by those claimants. That case in which a considered judgment was delivered has hitherto been treated as having settled the practice. In the case of The Kronprinz Olav (sup.) there was a claim in Norway which had proceeded to trial. There was a limitation suit, and in the limitation suit the plaintiffs in limitation sought an extension of time to bring a claim in respect of the claim which had been litigated and was in the course of being litigated in the Norwegian courts.

Hill, J. held, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his decision, that it was not a necessary exercise of the discretion as to the extension of the time, and would not be a proper exercise of the discretion in that case, to extend the time in order that the plaintiffs might learn what would be the ultimate fate of their litigation with the foreign claimant in Norway. That does not decide anything in the limitation in this present suit.

However, in the course of the judgments in the case Bankes, L.J. said this at p. 686 of 125 L. T. Rep.; p. 58 of (1921) P.; p. 314 of 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.: "Some question may arise as to whether there is any difference between the case in which the shipowner who has successfully established his right to limit his liability is called upon to meet a claim by a claimant resident in this country and a case in which the claimant is resident abroad and has either established, or is seeking to establish, his right abroad. I do not think it is necessary to decide that question on this particular appeal, but speaking for myself, I think that it is difficult to see why any distinction should be drawn between the two cases if the object of the court is to give to the applicant the relief which, as between himself and the claimants to the fund, the statute seems to me to contemplate that he should have. I do not think it is necessary to decide that point definitely on this particular appeal." Then the Lord Justice at the close of his judgment, says: "Under these circumstances it does not seem to me necessary to discuss either of the two decisions to which we have referred, The Crathie (sup.) and Rankin v. Raschen (sup.), because the facts in those cases were so different. In both cases a sum of money had in fact been paid to claimants, and they were, I think, bound by the provisions of the statute." Mr. Dunlop said there has been a claim here conceded to claimants, but they have not become bound by the provisions of the statute. In the course of Atkin, L.J.'s judgment he said this at p. 687 of 125 L. T. Rep; 62 of (1921) P.; 315 of 15 Asp. Mar. Law Cas.: "I know of no case where the registrar and merchants, or the court, in dealing with something which is not the subject matter of a claim brought in before the registrar and merchants, have dealt with it except upon the footing that payment has actually been made by the plaintiffs. The suggestion here is that the court has a further power to consider not only a claim in fact made within the jurisdiction and settled, but a contingent claim that is being made or may be made abroad, in respect of a party who is not subject to the restrictions of the particular section of the Merchant Shipping Act. I have been in very considerable doubt whether such a claim can be considered at all, because it seems to me that the benefit that is given under this statute is given to persons who come within the jurisdiction of the statute." Those words were words upon which Mr. Dunlop particularly relied. The judgment goes on: "It is a restriction upon the rights of persons who, on this hypothesis, have got a claim larger than, in fact, they are going to be paid, and that restriction does not apply at all in the case of foreigners who are in a position to make their claim outside the jurisdiction. I see nothing to compel them, at any rate, to come here and make their claims, and if there is nothing to compel them to make their claims here I find it very difficult to conceive that the court can order the fund to be adjusted upon the footing that such a claim was made." No doubt the passages to which I have referred and the parts of them upon which Mr. Dunlop relied do raise a question as to claimants without the jurisdiction as to whether, without accepting the limitation of the Act and coming in upon an even footing with other claimants on the fund, they are entitled to participate in the distribution of the fund. In this case the facts are not entirely without colour with regard to that particular contention. It has happened that the plaintiffs in limitation did not pay their money to the owners of the Dokka upon their own limited claim, or upon the award which was made by the French court of a sum based upon the French rule as to limitation with regard to that claim. They made accord and satisfaction with the French claimants, and they paid the French claimants an amount which was not the amount of the judgment, but which was in satisfaction of particular demands. The receipt was produced, it was not in any way challenged, and it has the effect I have mentioned.

Those are the circumstances in this case which distinguish it from a mere case of payment to a person outside the jurisdiction of the amount payable according to the limitations existing outside the jurisdiction. My own view is that it is not necessary in this case to rely upon that distinction.

I have come to the conclusion that, with regard to any payment made in satisfaction of a claim in respect of damage caused by collision, the general words of sect. 503 are to be so construed as to entitle the plaintiff in limitation to bring before the registrar proof of the payment he has in fact made in respect of a claim arising out of the collision. I think he may do so where there is a foreign system of limitation and where the claim of the foreign claimant is in respect of an amount, not limited according to the English rule of English limitation. That, however, it is not necessary that I should decide in this case. I merely express the view which, upon reflection on the matter, I have arrived at. But in the circumstances of this case I am satisfied that the fund is to be administered according to the equitable principles which were laid down by Lord Hatherley which were followed in the Court of Session and which were illustrated in the case of The Crathie (sup.), and that a payment which has been imposed upon the plaintiff in limitation in respect of damage arising out of a collision, is a payment which he is entitled to bring into consideration before the registrar when the administration of the limitation fund comes to be decided upon in this court. For the reasons I have stated, I disallow the objection and confirm the report.

THE LOREDANO. (a)

Collision — Action by the Crown — Writ issued after the expiration of period provided by statute of limitation—Crown not expressly included in the statute—Statute of limitation, whether binding on the Crown—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 8.

Sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 provides: "No action shall be maintainable to enforce any claim or lien against a vessel or her owners in respect of any damage or loss to another vessel, her cargo or freight . . . caused by the fault of the former vessel, whether such vessel be wholly or partly in fault, or in respect of any salvage services, unless proceedings are commenced within two years from the date when the damage or loss or injury was caused or the salvage services were rendered. . . . Provided always that any court having jurisdiction to deal with an action to which this section relates may, in accordance with the rules of court, extend any such period, to such extent and on such conditions as it thinks fit, and shall, if satisfied that there has not during such period been any reasonable opportunity of arresting the defendant vessel within the jurisdiction of the court, or within the territorial waters of the country to which the plaintiff's ship belongs . . . extend any such period. . . ."

Held, that this section is not binding on the Crown in an action in which the Crown is plaintiff.

(a) Reported by GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The facts and arguments of counsel appear from the judgment of the learned President.

Sir Ernest Pollock (A.-G.) and Balloch for the Crown.

Alfred Bucknill for the owners of the Loredano.

March 27.—Sir HENRY DUKE, P. said: I think it well to proceed to deliver judgment in this case, which is a matter of public importance, and I deliver it in court. The summons will be taken to be adjourned into court.

This is an action in the name of the commissioners for Executing the Office of the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom against the owners of the steamship or vessel Loredano. It is brought to recover damages in respect of a collision between His Majesty's ship Salome and the Loredano, which occurred in July 1917. An application has been made by the defendants that the plaintiffs should show cause why they should not either apply for leave to maintain their action, or, alternatively, submit to have their action dismissed on the ground that the pleadings in the action were not commenced within two years from the date of the collision. The Attorney-General has appeared to establish on behalf of the Crown the contention that the limitation contained in sect. 8 of the Maritime Conventions Act of 1911 is a limitation which does not bind the Crown. That contention is founded upon two grounds. It is founded, first of all, upon the general proposition that the statute is a statute of limitation, and that it is well settled law that no statute of limitation binds the Crown, unless the Crown be found to be expressly included within its terms. The Attorney-General cited a case in the Privy Council—the case of the Attorney-General for New South Wales v. The Curator of Intestate Estates (97 L. T. Rep. 614; (1907) A. C. 519)—which was not statute of limitation but raised the question whether the Crown was bound by provisions of an Act of the Parliament of New South Wales whereby certain assets of deceased persons were protected from payment of certain debts of those persons, and in that case Sir Arthur Wilson, who delivered the judgment of the Privy Council, made this statement of the law at p. 615 of 97 L. T. Rep. 523 of (1907) App. Cas.: "The question therefore arises whether the present Act binds the Crown. The Crown is not named in it, nor can their Lordships see any clear indication to bind the Crown. Primâ facie, therefore, the Crown is not affected by it." That is a statement in a carefully limited form of the prerogative of the Crown with regard to the exemption from the operation of statutes, in particular of statutes of limitation. The rule with regard to statutes of limitation has been more emphatically stated in other decisions, and it is summed up in a very express statement in the passage which the Attorney-General cited from Mr. Robertson's book in the 1903 edition. Taking the statute as it stands, it is not suggested that the Crown is expressly included in its provisions, and, after listening to the argument in which Mr. Bucknill has carefully protected the interests of the defendants, I am not able to find that by implication the statute extends to the Crown. Mr. Bucknill made reference to the comprehensive character of the Maritime Conventions Act, and to the proviso to sect. 8, and said that the term "vessel" must be taken to mean "any other vessel." That is no more comprehensive than is the legislation in an infinite variety of Acts of Parliament where such legislation in any way affects the prerogative of the Crown. He said that in order to give effect to the contention raised on behalf of the Crown, the words "a vessel" in sect. 8 must be read as "A vessel other than a vessel of His Majesty the King." By well established principles of law it seems to me that every statute must be construed, where the King is not named, as though it contained a limitation of some such words as those which Mr. Bucknill applies to this case. The prerogative of the Crown is saved by operation of law, and the statute is construed with reference to the principle. Mr. Bucknill pointed out too that personal claims are not limited—personal claims form no part of the prerogative of the Crown. An action against an individual is no infringement of either an immunity of the Crown or a right of the Crown. Reference was made to the decision in the case of His Majesty's ship Archer, where, with regard to a personal action, this statute was treated as having application. That decision does not seem to me to affect the question which is here under consideration. It seems that the question which is here raised was not raised there, and did not arise. Mr. Bucknill said further that it would be inequitable to limit the operation in the manner for which the Attorney-General contends—that, for instance, the defendants in the action would not be at liberty to plead any immunity by reason of the Act, and they would not be able to raise any claim by way of counter-claim as they might have done if these proceedings had been taken within the two years limited by the Act. That is true, but the same argument, of want of equity, might be raised in a hundred cases where the interests of the State are held to be superior to the interests of individual claimants. So far as the general principle is concerned, I am bound to say I feel no doubt that the general principle entitled the Crown to the dismissal of this summons.

The argument was put upon the further ground that by the express terms of the Maritime Conventions Act it must be taken that the Crown is not within these provisions. Sect. 10 of the Act provides that the Maritime Conventions Act shall be construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Acts 1894 to 1907. Sect. 741 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides this: "This Act shall not, except where specially provided, apply to ships belonging to His Majesty." Incorporating that section in the Act of 1911, there would be the very words for which Mr. Bucknill urged the necessity. It seems to me that on both grounds the application of the defendant fails and must be dismissed. I should say this, that some contentions were raised in this action that it would be perfectly proper to raise in the pleadings in the case. If there be a specific ground of equity which ought to be brought to the notice of the Crown, it can be alleged in the pleadings, and if there be any other specific ground on which the pleadings on behalf of the Crown ought to fail, that equally ought to be alleged.

On this preliminary ground I take the view that the summons is misconceived, and must be dismissed.

ATLANTIC SHIPPING AND TRADING COMPANY LIMITED v. LOUIS DREYFUS AND CO. (First Appeal). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Reference of disputes to arbitration — Unseaworthiness at commencement of voyage—Claim for damage to cargo—Time limit for appointing arbitrator—Effect of arbitration clause.

By a charter-party it was provided that "all disputes from time to time arising out of this contract shall, unless the parties agree forthwith on a single arbitrator, be referred to the final arbitrament of two arbitrators . . . one to be appointed by each of the parties, with power to such arbitrators to appoint an umpire. . . . Any claim must be made in writing and claimant's arbitrator appointed within three months of final discharge, and, where this provision is not complied with, the claim shall be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred."

Held, that that provision did not exclude the cargo owner from such recourse to the courts as was always open, by virtue of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, to a party who had agreed to arbitrate, but that it was unavailable to the shipowner as an answer to a claim for damage caused by unseaworthiness.

Tattersall v. National Steamship Company Limited (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 50 L. T. Rep. 299; 12 Q. B. Div. 297) approved and followed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed on other grounds.

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal reversing a decision of Rowlatt, J.

The appellants were the owners and the respondents the charterers of the steamship Quantock.

By a charter-party dated the 2nd May 1919 it was provided that the vessel should proceed to Rosario, and there load a full and complete cargo of linseed for carriage to Hull. Clause 39 was as follows: "All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract shall, unless the parties agree forthwith on a single arbitrator, be referred to the final arbitrament of two arbitrators carrying on business in London, who shall be members of the Baltic and engaged in the shipping and (or) grain trades, one to be appointed by each of the parties, with power to such arbitrators to appoint an umpire. Any claim must be made in writing and claimant's arbitrator appointed within three months of final discharge, and, where this provision is not complied with, the claim shall be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred." The Quantock duly proceeded with a cargo of linseed to Hull, where she arrived early in Sept. 1919. Shortly after her arrival the respondents gave notice to the appellants of their intention to put in a claim for damage alleged to have been caused to the linseed during the voyage, and in May 1920 they brought an action against them claiming 2233*l.* damages. The appellants by their defence referred to clause 39 of the charter-party and said that the charterers, having failed to appoint their arbitrator within three months of the final discharge of the ship, must be deemed to have waived their claim, and that no action could now be brought in respect thereof. The respondents, by their reply, pleaded that the ship was unseaworthy and unfit to receive the said goods on board at the date when the said goods were loaded, and at the date of the commencement of her voyage with the said goods on board and remained in the said condition throughout the said voyage, and that the effect in law of the unseaworthiness was to prevent the operation in favour of the appellants of any of the special clauses of the charter-party. An order having been made after the delivery of the reply that the question of law, whether the claim in the action was barred by clause 39 in the charter-party, should be tried as a preliminary question of law. Rowlatt, J. held (1) that the mode of procedure set out in the arbitration clause was a condition precedent to the bringing of any action at all; and (2) that clause 39 applied, and was binding upon the parties, even although the ship was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and that the seaworthiness of the vessel had nothing to do with the application of the arbitration clause. The Court of Appeal reversed that decision on the ground that the arbitration clause was contrary to public policy and void on the ground that its object and effect were to oust the jurisdiction of the court.

The shipowners appealed to the House of Lords.

Dunlop, K.C. and Jowitt for the appellants.—The intention of the parties as expressed in clause 39 of the charter-party was that in the event of a claim by either party against the other arising out of the charter-party, such claim was to be deemed to be waived and absolutely barred unless the claimant made his claim in writing and appointed an arbitrator within three months of final discharge of the cargo. Compliance with the provisions of the clause was a condition precedent to the claimant's having a cause of action, and it being admitted that the respondents have not complied with the provisions of the clause, they must be deemed to have waived their claim. It is further submitted that the clause is not against public policy as it does not oust the jurisdiction of the court.

Neilson, K.C. and Clement Davies for the respondents.—If the arbitration clause has the effect contended for by the appellants, it is designed to oust the jurisdiction of the court, and is thereby contrary to the general policy of law and unenforceable. Further, the vessel was unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage with the result that the appellants are are not entitled to claim the benefit of either the exceptions clause or the arbitration clause of the charter-party. The goods in respect of which this claim has been made were damaged by reason of the unseaworthiness of the vessel, so that the question as to arbitration does not arise at all.

At the conclusion of the arguments their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

Lord DUNEDIN.—Under the old law an agreement to refer disputes arising under a contract to arbitration was often asserted to be bad as an ousting of the jurisdiction of the courts, but that position was finally abandoned in Scott v. Avery (5 H. L. Cas. 811). As I read that case it can no longer be said that the jurisdiction of the court is ousted by such an agreement; on the contrary, the jurisdiction of the court is invoked in order to enforce it, and there is nothing wrong in persons agreeing that their disputes should be decided by arbitration. It follows that the clause here is not obnoxious in so far as it provides for arbitration. It goes on, however, to say that if the claim is not made and the arbitration started within a certain time the claim is to be held to be departed from. Now, if it were illegal to arrange that a claim should not be good unless made within a certain time I should understand the argument, but as it is admitted that it is perfectly legal to make such a stipulation—it is done, e.g., every day in insurance policies—then why should it be bad because it is tacked on to a provision for arbitration instead of to an action at law? All it comes to is this: I stipulate that you shall settle your differences with me by arbitration and not by action at law, and I stipulate that you shall state your differences and start your arbitration within a certain time or you shall be held to have waived your claim. For these reasons, I do not think the judgment of the Court of Appeal can be supported.

We have, however, had another argument which does not really arise on the preliminary question as put, but which, as it has been dealt with in the courts below, your Lordships think should be disposed of here. The respondents aver that the vessel when starting on the voyage was unseaworthy, and that the damage for which they sue was caused by such unseaworthiness, and they say that if they prove these two facts then the clause in question affords no protection. On this point we have no indication as to what the opinion of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal would have been. Rowlatt, J. rejected the contention upon the ground that the implied condition of seaworthiness had nothing to do with and was not in any way affected by a condition which was one of procedure only. There was, however, quoted to us a judgment of Bailhache, J. in the case of the Bank of Australasia v. Clan Line of Steamers (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 99; 113 L. T. Rep. 261; (1916) 1 K. B. 39), to the opposite effect. In that case there was a clause that no claim could be available which was not made at the port of delivery within seven days of the steamer's arrival there, and Bailhache, J. held that that clause was no bar to an action raised upon the averment that the ship was unseaworthy and that the damage which was sued for was caused by such unseaworthiness. His judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal, but on the ground, which had not been noticed by Bailhache, J., that there was in the charter-party an express exception of damage caused by unseaworthiness and that that being so the express clause must be read along with all other express clauses, of which the limitation of liability was one. It is pointed out by the respondents that in this case there is no express clause as to unseaworthiness, which is therefore left to be dealt with on the implied condition.

In these commercial cases it is, I think, of the highest importance that authority should not be disturbed, and if your Lordships find that a certain doctrine has been laid down in former cases and presumably acted on in the framing of other contracts you will not be disposed to alter that doctrine unless you think it is clearly wrong.

Before the decision of Bailhache, J., there was the earlier case of Tattersall v. National Steamship Company Limited (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 50 L. T. Rep. 299; 12 Q. B. Div. 297), a judgment of Day and A. L. Smith, JJ., where it was held that there being no express contract as to unseaworthiness a clause limiting liability to 5*l.* per animal (the goods shipped were cattle) did not apply to damage done by unseaworthiness. I think it clear that the learned judges of the Court of Appeal in the Bank of Australasia case (sup.) approved of that case in terms, and therefore inferentially, though they do not actually say so, approved of Bailhache, J.'s judgment if there had not been an express clause dealing with unseaworthiness.

Now, does the present case fall into line with Tattersall's case (sup.)? On the best consideration I can give to the matter, I think it does. It is quite true that the fact of unseaworthiness does not destroy the contact of affreightment in toto. Such a doctrine would lead to absurd consequences; the goods might be safely delivered and yet no freight be due under the contract, but only a quantum meruit for services rendered. The test seems to me to be whether the particular clause interferes with the liability which unseaworthiness creates. It is just here that I think Rowlatt, J. did not sufficiently distinguish between the two parts of the clause. So far as it dealt with the procedure, I agree with him, and if this clause had been a mere reference to arbitration and had stopped there, I do not think it would have been hit. But it goes on and, under certain conditions, destroys liability. If Tattersall's case (sup.) is right that you cannot in such cases appeal to a limitation of liability, surely it is a fortiori to say you cannot appeal to its destruction.

I think there is nothing in the waiver point. For these reasons I agree with the motion to be made by Lord Buckmaster.

Lord SUMNER.—This case turns upon clause 39 of the charter. The first question is, whether it means that, if the charterer does not make a claim or name an arbitrator within three months of the final discharge, he agrees that he is not in any way or in any circumstances to have any access to His Majesty's courts for the purpose of raising his claim. The Court of Appeal thought that it does. With great respect, I am unable to agree. The clause does not mean that under no circumstances shall a claimant be allowed to enter His Majesty's courts at all, but that the cause of action shall not be complete, and therefore cannot be made the subject of proceedings, unless the specified conditions have first been satisfied. The point, however, hardly admits of discussion; a view is formed of it, one way or the other, simply on the perusal of the words, for the question is purely one of interpretation. I think the words do not exclude the cargo-owner from such recourse to the courts as is always open, by virtue of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, to a party who has agreed to arbitrate. If so, as of course the Court of Appeal would have been the first to recognise, the jurisdiction of the courts is not ousted so as to make this arbitration clause bad altogether. Its terms can be enforced.

The second point is whether a term, that a claim is to be absolutely time-barred after three months, if certain conditions have not previously been satisfied, is available for a shipowner, where the claim is for damage to cargo arising because the ship was not reasonably fit to carry the goods, there being in the charter no express exception of unseaworthiness. Of course the clause means that the ship is liable for proved unseaworthiness under certain circumstances—namely, if the claim and the nomination are made in time—but not otherwise. Can it be said that this recognition of liability sub modo prevents the clause from operating as an exception at all, and reduces it to a mere "procedural" provision, fixing the conditions under which liability will be established? With great respect to the opinion of Rowlatt, J., I do not think that it can. The point of course is not dealt with in the judgments of the Lords Justices.

The question arose in this way. To save the great expense of going to trial upon an issue of fact, whether the cargo was damaged in consequence of the ship's unseaworthiness or or not, which might prove after all to be capable of a short answer under the charter, by reason of the charterers' non-compliance with the conditions of clause 39, it was agreed between counsel, that the construction of the charter should be decided as a preliminary question as if upon demurrer, it being assumed against the shipowner that the damage to the cargo arose in consequence of the ship's unseaworthiness; and against the charterers, that they were out of time in making their claim. It is a pity that the agreement was not embodied in an order specifying the preliminary question and directing it to be tried. This ought to have been done, and, but for the fact that there is no reasonable doubt about either the agreement or the terms of it, your Lordships would, I apprehend, have declined, as well you might, to entertain the question.

By the charter the shipowner undertakes to load and carry the cargo and to deliver it at the destination for a freight payable (except as to advances) on right and true delivery. The undertaking is, of course, subject to numerous exceptions of a usual character. Unseaworthiness itself is nowhere mentioned, nor is liability for the consequences of it excepted under any other term. The fact that the words in clause 39, which are relied on—namely, "any claim must be made in writing and claimants' arbitrator appointed within three months," are in quite general terms, does not avail, for such mere generality has long been held, in connection with specific excepted perils, not to be inconsistent with liability for the particular cause of loss, namely, unseaworthiness.

The shipowners' general liability in respect of damage due to the ship's unseaworthiness, accordingly, remains where the law places it. Underlying the whole contract of affreightment there is an implied condition upon the operation of the usual exception from liability, namely, that the shipowners shall have provided a seaworthy ship. If they have, the exceptions apply and relieve them; if they have not, and damage results in consequence of the unseaworthiness, the exceptions are construed as not being applicable for the shipowners' protection in such a case.

This principle of construction has not been confined to excepted causes of loss; it has been extended to provisions which limit the amount to be paid in satisfaction of the loss, for these equally, though in another way, limit pro tanto the shipowners' liability. There is no difference in principle between the words which save them from having to pay at all and words which save them from paying as much as they would otherwise have had to pay. In Tattersall v. National Steamship Company Limited (ubi sup.) the words "under no circumstances shall they be held liable for more than 5*l.* for each of the animals" were held inapplicable to protect the shipowners from liability for the full value of animals lost by the ship's unseaworthiness; in spite of the apparently unrestricted generality of the words "under no circumstances," and in spite of the fact that they recognised liability up to 5*l.* a head, and did not purport to exclude it altogether. That such words do not avail where loss is due to unseaworthiness, was virtually recognised in Baxter's Leather Company v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 98; 99 L. T. Rep. 286; (1908) 2 K. B., at p. 632), and held in Wiener and Co. v. Wilson's and Furness Leyland Line Limited (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 102 L. T. Rep. 716; 15 Com. Cas. 294). Bailhache, J. expressly so held in Bank of Australasia v. Clan Line of Steamers (ubi sup.), and the Court of Appeal in reversing his decision recognised that it would have been correct, but for a circumstance which he had overlooked—namely, that unseaworthiness was the subject of an express provision and therefore the underlying or implied provision with regard to it was ousted.

In principle I think that clause 39 in so far as the parties, as it was said, provided their own statute of limitations, is unavailable to the shipowners as an answer to a claim for damage caused by unscaworthiness. It does not make any difference that the time allowed is considerable or the formality to be complied with not unreasonable, or that the clause, being a mutual clause, might apply to protect the charterer in certain events, for example, against a claim for demurrage. The effect is not that the clause is deleted from the charter altogether. The shipowners gain no advantage against the charterer from their neglect to make the ship seaworthy; they merely cannot pray the clause in aid in that case. Nor are the words in question inapplicable because they occur in mutual arbitration clause and are partly procedural. Even if they are read as meaning "I will be liable for three months and no longer, and then only in an arbitration" —they still remain words, which except out of the shipowners' general liability certain losses, namely, losses the assertion of which is belated.

There is the further contention that a clause relieving a shipowner from damage to cargo caused by breach of the conditions as to seaworthiness, to be effectual must be clear. Now to say that a claim is to be waived is incorrect. If a right has accrued, it must be released or discharged by deed or upon consideration. Waiver applies to an election as to something in futuro; it is not a term by which to describe the answer to a right, which is complete in præsenti. It seems to me, however, that the words "shall be 'deemed to be absolutely barred'" are not obscure. Their meaning is plain; the only doubt is whether they are effective. Accordingly I should not for myself regard these words as falling within the rule in Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 24; 92 L. T. Rep. 274; (1905) A. C. 93).

For these reasons I think the appeal fails. There is nothing in the point about the solicitors' letter.

ATLANTIC SHIPPING AND TRADING COMPANY LIMITED v. LOUIS DREYFUS AND CO. (Second Appeal).

STATHATOS AND CO. v. LOUIS DREYFUS AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party—Construction—Rate of Exchange—Despatch money and commission—Payments at foreign port of loading—Law of Argentina.

A charter-party made between owners and charterers in England provided, inter alia, that despatch money and commission payable on loading a ship at Buenos Ayres or La Plata should be payable "at the rate of" so much sterling per diem.

Held, that such payments on behalf of the shipowners must be made at the commercial rate of exchange equivalent of the sterling at the date when the payment was made, and not at the rate fixed by the Argentine Monetary Law (art. 1 of the Decree of the Argentine Republic of the 2nd Dec. 1881.)

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEALS from the judgment of the Court of Appeal who had reversed two decisions of Rowlatt, J. upholding the awards of an arbitrator.

The two cases which raised the same point were heard together.

The appellants were the owners respectively of the steamships Eggesford and Istros, and the respondents, a London firm were the charterers. The contract in each case was an English contract to be construed according to English law and all payments under it made by the charterer, except such payments as were made to the ship's captain at the port of loading, were to be made in London. The cargo was loaded at Buenos Ayres, and payments in respect of despatch money and commission were to be made there, and the question raised was whether these payments were to be made at the rate of exchange current between Great Britain and the Argentine Republic at the time of payment, or at the rate at which the value of the pound sterling had been fixed by the Decree of the Republic of the 2nd Dec. 1881.

The arbitrators made an award in favour of the shipowners and that award was upheld by Rowlatt, J. The Court of Appeal (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) having reversed his decision, the owners appealed to the House of Lords.

The facts are fully set forth in the judgments of their Lordships.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and Sir Robert Aske for the Atlantic Shipping and Trading Company Limited.

Raeburn, K.C. and G. Langton for Stathatos and Co.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Leck, K.C., and C. T. le Quesne for the respondents.

Their Lordships took time to consider their judgments.

Lord BUCKMASTER.—These two appeals have been tried together. The respondents are the same in each case. The appellants are different. The point involved is identical. In each case the appellants are owners of steamships, and in each case one of such vessels was let to the respondents.

In the first appeal the name of the vessel was Eggesford, and in the second, the Istros. The charters were the same in form in each case and differed only as to the amount of freight, and one or two other minor matters.

The charter-party in the first appeal needs to be considered first. It was dated the 24th April 1919, and provided that the ship should load at the charterers' option in the Port of Buenos Ayres or La Plata; the freight should be at the rate of 220*s.* per ton for wheat, or maize, or rye, and that it should be loaded at a certain rate of tonnage per day which it is not necessary to consider.

Clause 16 provided for the payment of despatch money in these terms: "Despatch money (which is to be paid to charterers before steamer sails) shall be payable for all time saved in loading (including Sundays and holidays saved) at the rate of 10*l.* sterling per day for steamers up to 4000 tons bill of lading weight, and 15*l.* sterling per day for steamers of over 4000 tons bill of lading weight." Clause 20 provided for payment of the freight in these terms: "20. The freight shall be paid as follows, viz.: Sufficient cash for steamer's use, if required by the master (not exceeding one-third of the freight) to be advanced by charterers on signing bills of lading, in Buenos Ayres or La Plata (at the master's option) on account of freight at current rate of exchange for approved commercial bills on London, subject to 3 per cent. (three per cent.) to cover interest, insurance and other charges, and the balance of freight on the right and true delivery of the cargo, in cash, by Messrs. Louis Dreyfus and Co. freight to be paid in London as follows: One half on steamer's arrival before commencement of discharge and the remaining half when vessel is discharged less 1000*l.* to be subject to final adjustment on weight being ascertained."

Clause 35 provided that 4 per cent. commission is due by the steamer upon the gross amount of freight, dead freight, and demurrage on shipment of the cargo of coal; and 38 was a clause not found in the other case by which the steamer was to pay to a trade union a contribution of 3*l.* at the last port of loading. Disputes were to be referred to arbitration in London.

There can, I think, be no doubt that the contract was an English contract, to be construed according to English law, and that all payments under it made by the charterer, excepting such payments as were made to the ship's captain at the port of loading, were to be paid in London.

The cargo was loaded at Buenos Ayres. Despatch money was earned to the extent of 803*l.*, and Messrs. Dreyfus being the ship's agents at Buenos Ayres, a sum of Argentine dollars was remitted to them by the owners for the purpose of making payments required in the Argentine. These payments they made, and included in them the sum for despatch money, the freight commission of 4 per cent. and the 3*l.* for the trading society. These moneys they converted into dollars at the rate of 5.04 to the pound sterling, and added to the other payments, they exhausted the money received by all but 3433 dollars in paper, which they reconverted into gold at the rate of 3.66 dollars to the pound sterling and so paid the balance. This method of dealing was disputed by the appellants, and in the arbitration proceedings that ensued the arbitrator awarded in their favour, his award being supported by Rowlatt, J., but set aside by the Court of Appeal.

The explanation, and according to the respondents the justification, of what was done was this: By a decree of the Republic of Argentine dated the 2nd Dec. 1881, for the purpose of establishing the relative value of the old currencies as compared with their lawful units, it was decreed that the value of the currency and the units in circulation, being legal tender in the country as compared with the lawful unit as established by the Currency Law Act, should thenceforth be reckoned as follows:—

Among other currency there are found in the schedule English sovereigns weighing 7981 grains and of 916.2/3 standard and this is paid at 5.04 florins; the subsequent computation at 3.66 being due to the fact that this was the commercial rate of exchange.

The respondents contend that they were justified in so treating the money because the terms of the charter-party entitled them, being paid in Buenos Ayres, to be paid in English gold, and that English gold being converted into Argentine currency must be at the rate provided by the decree, but that when so converted for the purpose of making in Buenos Ayres the dollar equivalent of English sterling the amount should be reconverted at the commercial rate of exchange which by consent was $3.66 to the pound.

The subsequent case of the Istros well illustrates the extent to which the respondents maintained that this doctrine applies. In that case there was no money provided by the shipowners, and the respondents made certain payments themselves. These were included in an account which was treated as an advance against freight, and in this account there were two items, the one for despatch money and the other for the 4 per cent. commission which they originally fixed and liquidated in English sterling. This they converted into florins at 5.04 and then reconverted back in the account to English sterling at 3.66 thus increasing the account by the sum of 900*l.* odd, and this, they say, is the right which the charter-party conferred upon them.

I am unable to see that it creates such a position. There are three items referred to by the respondents in support of their contention which need separate consideration.

The item as to despatch is said to be a definite obligation to provide this money in English gold in Buenos Ayres. I do not so regard it, and although it is due before the vessels sail, its payment is not a condition precedent to sailing, and it could have been discharged by sterling in London. If not so paid the amount is fixed "at the rate of" so much sterling per diem, but the obligation of the shipowner under that clause would, in my opinion, be well discharged by providing that the shipowner's payments were made at Buenos Ayres with the commercial exchange equivalent of the sterling at the date when the payment was made. It is upon this point that I am unable to agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal, where all the learned judges regarded the obligation as one to provide English sovereigns in Buenos Ayres.

With regard to commission the matter is still stronger. I find myself unable to see how there is any obligation to pay the commission in Buenos Ayres at all. It is an amount due by the steamer which ought to be brought into account in the final settlement of the freight and is not even to be paid before the sailing of the steamer. It seems to have been regarded as on the same footing as the despatch money, but even though the Court of Appeal judgment with regard to the despatch money were sound, I cannot see how it embraces the money allowed for commission. The matter of the 3*l.* needs no separate consideration. It is not, in fact, dealt with in the special case except as part of the despatch money, and it was not regarded as a separate item. The contract is, in my opinion, one to provide for payment at the last port of loading (wherever it may be) of the commercial equivalent in the currency of that spot, of the 3*l.* sterling which the contract mentions. I cannot regard the contract as anything but one to pay the commercial equivalent of all the sums measured in sterling, and this is not affected by a law which is solely directed to providing equivalent for English sovereigns did occasion arise for conversion of these coins. In the present cases no such necessity arose and the rate thus fixed did not apply. I think both these appeals should succeed and the awards affirmed.

Lord ATKINSON concurred.

Lord SUMNER.—Of these two cases, that of the Istros is slightly the simpler, and may be taken first. As is often arranged, the charterers acted as the ship's agents at the loading port and, before the ship sailed, they made out their account in that capacity. They set out their disbursements, for which they had found the money, sometimes in the paper and sometimes in the gold currency of the Argentine Republic. They included in the account two sums, claimed to be due to themselves as charterers under clauses 16 and 35, and not in respect of advances made by them as agents to the use of their principals. The first is for despatch money at a rate expressed in pounds sterling, the second is for commission at 4 per cent. on the gross freight, dead freight, and demurrage. The first was to be paid before the steamer sailed; the second was expressed to be due on shipment, but the freight, which was a tonnage rate in shillings, being payable on right and true delivery of the cargo (except for any cash advance to the master on signing bills of lading), it follows that the amount ultimately payable and the obligation to pay it depended on the result and the duration of the discharge. The sums claimed under these two heads in the gold currency of the Republic represented respectively 229*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.* and 210*l.* converted at $5.04 to the pound, a rate in excess of the rate of exchange of the day for sterling on Buenos Ayres and fixed by a local currency law of 1881. The dispute arises as to the right of the respondents to effect this conversion at the higher rate.

In both cases the charterers are a London firm, though they have a house in Buenos Ayres, and I think that the charter, truly construed in reference to the circumstances of the parties, makes both the despatch money and the commission on freight payable in England. This is quite consistent with the established business practice to settle up accounts in the way adopted in this case, which has gone without challenge, apart from the question of the rate of exchange, and no custom of trade affecting the construction of the charter has been found. I am satisfied that the Argentine law referred to is merely a legal tender law, fixing the parity, at which certain gold coins then passing current in the republic should be made legal tender, concurrently with the national currency then recently established. For the soveriegn this was fixed at $5.04.

The charterers' claims involve three positions: (1) that despatch money and commission were due to them in sterling; (2) that these sums were payable or to be treated as payable to them in the circumstances in the Argentine Republic and in sterling; and (3) that, if not paid there in sovereigns, they were to be treated as if they had been so paid, so that the charterers might receive the English sums in Argentine currency at $5.04 to the pound. In effect, this is a claim paid in the particular form of legal tender available, which at the time in question suited them best, but their argument logically compels them to accept payment in the same form on other occasions, even though, owing to financial and commercial fluctuations, it may be of advantage to them no longer; nor is this disputed.

I have not been able to adopt the charterers' arguments, though they prevailed in the Court of Appeal. The Eggesford is a British ship, and though the Istros sails under the Greek flag, no suggestion has been made that any consequence affecting the place at which payments are to be made in accordance with the charter, arises out of that circumstance. The charter is made in London, between parties in London; it is expressed in English and governed by English law. In my opinion the place of payment for both despatch money and commission on freight is English, the payment is to be made in sterling, and the rate of exchange, at which the amount of despatch money and commission should be inserted in a ship's account, made out in Buenos Ayres, is the commercial rate of exchange of the day for converting English money into Argentine money. The charterers do not enlarge their rights by debiting these sums in an Argentine account or in Argentine currency and they can claim no more than the actual amount of English money due or the Argentine currency, into which it could be turned at the rate of the day. It is true that the debtor must seek out his creditors, but in this case he would have found them in London. Even if the creditors be taken to be for this purpose in Buenos Ayres, I do not see how the debtor, when he finds them, can be bound to produce to them English gold coins. It so happens that in Argentina an English sovereign is legal tender under the law of 1881, but there is no contract between the parties to pay in sovereigns, and, if the creditors do not wish to take English paper currency in payment and sell it, they cannot, in my opinion, claim more Argentine currency than will put them in a position as good as if they had been willing to take it.

The facts, which make a difference in the case of the Eggesford from that of the Istros, are that the owners of the Eggesford put their captain in funds to an amount more than sufficient to cover disbursements, despatch money and commission, and he handed to the charterers the amount in Argentine paper currency to be applied on behalf of the ship and accounted for to her owner. The charterers debited the disbursements and set off the amounts due to themselves for despatch money and commission, and they did so at $5.04 to the pound instead of $3.66, the rate of exchange of the day for British sterling. Their total claim, thus swollen, nearly exhausted the sum paid to them by the captain, and all they returned to him was $3,433.50 paper. As agents, they were clearly not entitled to adopt, against their principals, the parity most favourable to themselves, unless they had, as charterers, a right to be paid in Buenos Ayres in sovereigns. The only way that I can see, in which they can put their case in the Eggesford higher than in the case of the other ship is by saying that the shipowners cannot, by electing to pay in Buenos Ayres, relieve themselves from paying the full equivalent of sterling, to which I agree; and that paying sterling in Buenos Ayres means paying in sovereigns, since payment in Treasury notes is not legal tender outside the United Kingdom. To this, I think, it is a good answer to say that neither would payment in sovereigns be a good tender, but for the accident of the Argentine law of 1881, and that law regulates the parity of sovereigns with Argentine currency but does not affect international transactions or obligations under contracts to pay in England. Except by consent, and by a transaction in the nature of the delivery of a commodity of a value equivalent to the amount of the debt, sovereigns would not be receivable at all and that equivalence in the case of commodities is to be ascertained not by a permanent legal tender law relating to currency but by the current quotation for the exchange rate for sterling.

The reason for his opinion in the charterers' favour in the case of the Eggesford is thus stated by Bankes, L.J.: "The charterers' case is this: 'it is quite true that you have sent the money over to the Argentine for the purpose of discharging your obligation; it is true that you have handed the money to me; it is true you have discharged all your obligations, including those to myself; but when I consider the position, as between you and me, your obligation was to pay me in British currency. What you have done is to hand me dollars to enable me to do it;' " and he then adds, that, on the findings in the case, the charterers were entitled to do as they did. I cannot agree that, the obligation being to pay in British currency, dollars were handed to enable the charterers "to do it." I think the dollars handed to the charterers, were dollars with which the shipowners "did it" themselves. Scrutton, L.J. and Atkin, L.J., both thought that under the charter payment was to be in England or in Argentina at the shipowner's option. With great respect, I cannot agree, if this means that the shipowner was entitled to pay the charterers in Argentina in invitos. It was regularly done as a matter of convenience and by mutual consent, but not so as to constitute a new agreement to affect the obligations of the charter-party otherwise. Reliance was also placed in both judgments on clause 20 of the charter: "The freight shall be paid as follows, viz.: Sufficient cash for steamer's use, if required by the master (not exceeding one-third of the freight) to be advanced by charterers on signing bills of lading, in Buenos Ayres . . . on account of freight at current rate of exchange, for approved commercial bills on London, subject to 3 per cent. to cover interest, insurance, and other charges and the balance of freight on the right and true delivery of the cargo in cash. . . ." As the insertion of the items for this despatch money and commission in the account, was not an advance of "cash for steamer's use," I do not think this clause carries matters any further. Moreover, the charterers induced the master of the Istros to sign a draft on his owners for the total amount in sterling of their account (including these items) at the current rate of exchange plus 3 per cent. in accordance with clause 20, and deducted the amount of the draft from the freight payable in cash on delivery of the cargo. What authority the captain had for doing this, in fact, is not found by the umpire, but he could not, without a particular finding on the subject, have authority to sign a draft calculated contrary to the obligations of the charter.

Mr. Scrutton, the umpire in the case of the Istros, finds as follows: "the effect of the charterers' first converting the despatch money and the commission into Argentine currency at the rate of $5.04 per pound sterling (which is equivalent to 47.62 pence per dollar), and reconverting those dollars into sterling at the rate of 65½*d.* per dollar was to add to the amount payable by the owners in sterling in respect of these items the sum of 902*l.* 10*s.* 11*d.*," and he adds that "there was no occasion or justification for converting these amounts into Argentine currency at all. With this I agree. The attempt was ingenious; but the defence of it always comes back to the assumption that sterling, paid in Buenos Ayres (if it was so paid), had by law to be paid at $5.04 to the pound, the contract making no such provision. This is expressly the view of Atkin, L.J., but for the reasons I have given I cannot accept it. The Argentine law fixes a parity for those who must take a coin, if tendered; it does not deal with the performance of a foreign contract, where parties choose to take in Buenos Ayres discharge of a foreign debt, which they could, if so minded, require to be paid to them elsewhere.

It has been suggested that, unless the charterers, as ships' agents, treated these sums as paid before sailing, the steamer could not get her clearance. This is not proved; but I can only say that the charter contains nothing which increases their rights in the matter of the equivalent of sterling, whether or not they had this or any other power of detaining the ship, by local law or otherwise, which I am not to be understood to imply that they had.

I wish to make two additional observations. Bankes, L.J. treats the special case as finding as a fact that "if either of these obligations, which were obligations to pay in British currency, were discharged by a payment in Buenos Ayres, the person discharging the obligation must provide for every pound sterling 5.04 gold dollars." This is a mistake. The findings are: (4) "that both these amounts were payable in Buenos Ayres in sterling." which is a matter of law and is wrong; and "(5) that if the same had been paid to Messrs. Dreyfus and Co. in pounds sterling at Buenos Ayres, they would have received for the same in gold 5.04 dollars for each pound sterling." The case did not exhibit the text of the law of 1881, but, by consent, it has been produced in the Court of Appeal and at your Lordships' bar, and it shows the finding to mean that, if it had been paid in sovereigns, the charterers would have received $5.04 for each sovereign when they paid it away again, which is very different from saying, that the person discharging the obligation under the contract in Buenos Ayres "must provide for every pound sterling 5.04 dollars."

The other matter is the payment of 3*l.* to the Free Labour Union. Something was made of this in argument, but it came to nothing. The union had no right of action on the charter for this sum, even in the charterers' names, nor do we know how it was paid to them, except that it is charged as 3*l.* It is not on the same footing as a commission reserved to the brokers on a charter. It is only another stipulation by the shipowner with the charterers to pay them sterling, though for a particular purpose. The case stated does not make anything of the point, and I think it is of no real relevance.

In both cases I think the appeals should be allowed.

Lord DUNEDIN and Lord CARSON concurred.

(Before Lords BUCKMASTER, DUNEDIN, ATKINSON, SUMNER, and PARMOOR.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Requisition — Charter-party — Loss by enemy action—Compensation—Petition of right—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), ss. 1 and 2.

In March 1915 a ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty and taken under a charter-party which fixed the rate of hire, gave to the Admiralty the right of purchase at a certain price, and rendered them liable for all risks and expenses of the ship. In Feb. 1916 the ship while so requisitioned was sunk by enemy action. Accordingly the owners, by petition of right, claimed damages against the Admiralty. Before the petition was heard the Indemnity Act received the Royal Assent on the 16*th Aug.* 1920. The Crown having claimed that by virtue of the Act the petition was discharged, the point of law was set down for hearing.

The Indemnity Act 1920 provides by sect. 1 (1) that no action or legal proceeding (including a petition of right) shall be taken in respect of any act done during the war before the passing of the Act, if done in good faith or in the public interest by or under the authority of an official in the service of the Crown, and that if any such proceeding has been instituted before the passing of the Act, it shall be discharged and made void; "Provided that, except in cases where the claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of this Act, this section shall not prevent (b) the institution of proceedings in respect of any rights under, or alleged breaches of, contract," if the proceedings are brought within the specified time. Sect. 2 (1) provides that "Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing section restricting the right of taking legal proceedings, any person (a) being the owner of a ship or vessel which has been requisitioned shall be entitled to payment or compensation for the use of the same and for services rendered during the employment of the same in Government service, and compensation for loss or damage thereby occasioned.

Held (Lord Parmoor dissenting), that the case fell within sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a) of the Act, the general words of which included claims for breach of contract, and that as there was no agreement as to the amount to be paid for total loss, compensation must be assessed in the manner provided by that section. The petition of right was therefore discharged under the Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

THIS was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.), reversing the decision of Bailhache, J.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

upon a petition of right presented by the respondents.

The respondents who were a company incorporated by Royal Charter, carrying on business in the city of London, owned the steamship Alcantara, which was a triple-screw steamship of 15,831 tons.

On the 15th March 1915 this steamship was requisitioned by the Director of Transports for and on behalf of the commissioners for executing the office of the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and was taken under a charter-party of that date which was in a form officially known as form B.

By the said charter-party it was amongst other things provided as follows:

1. The owners have let and the Admiralty have hired and taken to freight the good ship undermentioned, viz., Alcantara, for service and employment on monthly hire from the 9th March 1915 for the space of three calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the Admiralty shall cause notice to be given to the owners that she is discharged from His Majesty's service, such notice to be given when the ship is in port in. . . .

2. The Admiralty may at any time while the ship is so on hire as aforesaid, upon giving notice to the owners of their intention so to do, purchase her at the price of five hundred and fifty thousand pounds (550,000*l.*), or, in the case of her being required for service as an armed cruiser, they may, upon giving the like notice, purchase her together with such quantities of plated ware, cutlery, earthenware, blankets, counterpanes, and linens, as may be necessary for the number of officers and warrant officers who shall form part of the ship's complement as an armed cruiser at the price of five hundred and fifty-eight thousand pounds (558,000*l.*).

4. The said ship shall, while she is so on hire as aforesaid, be at the absolute disposal of the Admiralty and under their complete control in every respect.

5. The Admiralty shall pay in manner following for the hire of the said ship at the rate of twelve shillings (12*s.*) per ton per calendar month for the number of tons above mentioned during such term as the said ship shall be continued in His Majesty's employ, reducing to eleven shillings (11*s.*) after two months, the rate of eleven shillings (11*s.*) being applicable to the whole period if vessel retained for six months.

On the 29th Feb. 1916 the Alcantara, whilst in the employment of the Admiralty under the said charter-party, was sunk in an engagement with the Greif, a heavily-armed German merchantman disguised as a Norwegian tramp.

On the 4th April 1916 the Admiralty gave notice by letter of that date, to the respondents of the loss of the steamship Alcantara, and by such letter declared that the hiring under the said charter-party was at an end as from the 29th Feb. 1916.

On the 6th April 1916 the respondents made a claim for compensation for the loss of the said steamship, and the amount of such claim was the sum of 805,500*l.*

The Admiralty made payments amounting in the aggregate to 550,000*l.*, but declined to make any further payments.

Accordingly on the 19th May 1920 the respondents presented a petition of right claiming that they were entitled to be paid the full value of the said steamship after deducting the said advances amounting to 550,000*l.*

The Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown, by his answer and plea delivered the 16th July 1920 admitted liability to the extent of 558,000*l.*, but denied any further liability and brought into court the sum of 8000*l.* which he said was, together with the 550,000*l.* already paid by the Admiralty, sufficient to satisfy the respondents' claim.

Subsequently, namely, on the 16th Aug. 1920, the Indemnity Act 1920 came into force.

Accordingly on the 18th Oct. 1920, by a further answer and plea the Attorney-General pleaded that after delivery of his former answer and plea the said Act had come into force, and that he relied on it, and would submit that by its operation the petition was discharged and made void.

On the 18th Dec. 1920 upon the application of the respondents, it was ordered that the point of law raised by the further answer and plea should be set down for hearing, and disposed of forthwith and before the trial of the issues of fact arising upon the petition.

The Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), so far as material provides:

Sect. 1 (1). No action or other legal proceeding whatsoever shall be instituted in any court of law for or on account of or in respect of any act, matter or thing done during the war before the passing of this Act, if done in good faith, and done or purported to be done in the execution of his duty or for the defence of the realm, or otherwise in the public interest, by a person holding office under or employed in the service of the Crown in any capacity, or by any other person acting under the authority of a person so holding office or so employed; and, if any such proceeding has been instituted whether before or after the passing of this Act, it shall be discharged and made void, Provided that, except in cases where a claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of this Act, this section shall not prevent . . . (b) the institution or prosecution of proceedings in respect of any rights under, or alleged breaches of, contract, if the proceedings are instituted within one year from the termination of the war or the date when the cause of action arose, whichever may be the later. . . . (2) For the purposes of this section, a petition of right shall be deemed to be a legal proceeding, and the proceeding shall be deemed to be instituted at the date on which the petition is presented.

Sect. 2. Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing section restricting the right of taking legal proceedings, any person not being a subject of a state which has been at war with His Majesty during the war and not having been a subject of such a state whilst that state was so at war with His Majesty—(a) being the owner of a ship or vessel which or any cargo space or passenger accommodation in which has been requisitioned at any time during the war in exercise or purported exercise of any prerogative right of His Majesty or of any power under any enactment relating to the defence of the realm, or any regulation or order made or purporting to be made thereunder, shall be entitled to payment or compensation for the use of the same and for services rendered during the employment of the same in Government service, and compensation for loss or damage thereby occasioned; . . . and such payment or compensation shall be assessed on the principles and by the tribunal hereinafter mentioned, and the decision of that tribunal shall be final. (2) The payment or compensation shall be assessed in accordance with the following principles . . . (ii.) Where the payment or compensation is claimed under par. (a) of sub-sect. (1) of this section, it shall be assessed in accordance with the principles upon which the Board of Arbitration has hitherto acted.

Part I. of the schedule provides: The payment or compensation to be awarded for the use of a ship, or vessel, or cargo space, or passenger accommodation therein, and for services rendered shall be based on the rates and conditions contained in the Blue Book reports.

Bailhache, J. decided the point of law in favour of the Crown, but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) upon the ground that the respondents' claim was in effect founded upon the charter-party referred to in the petition of right; that the case was not within the operation of sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a) of the Indemnity Act 1920, and that the terms of part I. of the schedule to the Act showed that sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a) was not applicable to cases where there was a contract.

The Crown appealed.

Sir Ernest Pollock (A.-G.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Crown.

MacKinnon, K.C. and E. F. Spence for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord BUCKMASTER.—This appeal arises out of proceedings in the nature of a demurrer to a petition of right. The facts, therefore, must be accepted as they are stated in the petition. From this it appears that on the 15th March 1915 a steamship belonging to the respondent company, and known as the Alcantara, was requisitioned by the Director of Transports and was taken under a charter-party which fixed the rate of hire, gave to the Admiralty the right of purchase at a certain price, and rendered them liable for all risks and expenses of the ship.

On the 29th Feb. 1916 the ship, whilst in the employment of the Admiralty, was sunk by a heavily-armed German vessel, and the respondents thereupon claimed against the Admiralty damage for her loss.

The first plea that was put in on behalf of the Crown admitted liability up to a certain extent, and this plea was dated the 16th July 1920.

Before the petition came on for trial, however—namely, on the 16th Aug. 1920—the Indemnity Act 1920 received the Royal Assent, and the Crown accordingly amended their plea and said that by virtue of the statute the petition of right was discharged, and this point was put down for argument preliminary to the trial.

That is the only issue that is now before this House. It was found in favour of the Crown by Bailhache, J., whose judgment was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

It follows from what I have said that the point involved is purely a question of construction of the statute. That Act, by sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, provided that no action or legal proceeding should be taken in respect of any act done during the war before the passage of the Act if done in good faith and in the public interest by or under the authority of an official in the service of the Crown, and that if any such proceeding had been instituted before the passing of the Act it should be discharged and made void. A petition of right was expressly included as a legal proceeding within the meaning of this section.

It is first argued on behalf of the respondents that the circumstances of this case do not bring it within the general provisions of sect. 1, but I am unable to accept that contention.

Although the act done in this matter that caused the loss was committed by the Germans, yet the loss was due to the use by the Admiralty of the vessel, and it was because of that use, exposing it to the risk which led to its destruction, that the respondents' claim arose. The general words therefore, in my opinion, cover this case. To these general words, however, there is an exception, which runs as follows:

Provided that, except in cases where a claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of this Act, this section shall not prevent (b) the institution of proceedings in respect of any rights under, or alleged breaches of, contract, if the proceedings are instituted within one year from the termination of the war or the date when the cause of action arose, whichever may be the later.

The time condition has been satisfied in this case. The first comment to be made upon this provision is that it shows clearly that the general words in the section include claims for breach of contract unless, indeed, the words are surplusage, and this I cannot accept. The respondents therefore would be outside the operation of the statute unless they could have brought a claim for compensation under sect. 2, in which case the exception removes them from the benefit of the proviso.

Sect. 2 is in these terms:

2. (1) Notwithstanding anything in the foregoing section restricting the right of taking legal proceedings, any person not being a subject of a state which has been at war with His Majesty during the war and not having been a subject of such a state whilst that state was so at war with His Majesty—(a) being the owner of a ship or vessel which or any cargo space or passenger accommodation in which has been requisitioned at any time during the war in exercise or purported exercise of any prerogative right of His Majesty or of any power under any enactment relating to the defence of the realm, or any regulation or order made or purporting to be made thereunder, shall be entitled to payment or compensation for the use of the same and for services rendered during the employment of the same in Government service, and compensation for loss or damage thereby occasioned.

Now this ship was requisitioned and the circumstance that the user was regulated by the terms of a charter-party does not alter this fact. The respondents, therefore, were entitled to payment for the use of the same under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, but it is said that this can only apply to cases where the requisitioning has not been associated with or regulated by a contract. The interlocking of sects. 1 and 2 defeat this argument, for the proviso at the end of sect. 1 contemplates that there may be cases under sect. 2 which, but for the exception, might come in among other things under sub-clause (b), and it therefore shows that the rights given under sect. 2 are general and are not affected by contract in a particular case.

Finally it is urged that the subsequent provisions of sect. 2, and notably sub-sect. 2 (1) and (2), which provide for the assessment of compensation, are inapplicable to cases where a contract has been made, and this shows that sect. 2 (1) must be in some way modified so that it can only apply to such classes of cases as those where, even if a contract had been made for the use of the vessel, the terms both as to freight and repayment for damage or loss had not been fixed. This is the argument that found favour with the Court of Appeal. There is no doubt that the terms of the schedule do not themselves suggest that they refer to cases where contractual rights exist between the parties. But it does not follow because the freights have been regulated by contract that these provisions should be incapable of application. They are not fixed amounts, but merely a basis upon which a calculation may be fixed, and the actual terms of the contract might well be regarded in relation to such a matter. In the present case there is no agreement as to the amount to be paid for total loss unless it be found in the provision giving the Government the right of pre-emption at a fixed price, and the provision of the schedule can therefore be made readily applicable to the existing circumstances.

The provisions of this Act of Parliament are very difficult to construe, and the difference of judicial opinion that has already emerged is not surprising.

I think that the view of Bailhache, J. was correct and that this appeal should be allowed.

Lord DUNEDIN.—I concur with your Lordships in thinking that the judgment of Bailhache, J. is right, but as the Court of Appeal has reversed his decision, I think it right to state my opinion.

The first question is, Does what was done fall within sect. 1 of the Act at all ? Here I am able to go along with the Court of Appeal ; they thought it did. It seems to me that it depends upon a question of fact : Was what was done something done by someone either himself acting on behalf of the Crown, or by anyone acting under such a person's orders, in the execution of duty and for the public safety ? The requisitioning of a ship falls, I think, within that description, nor does it matter that the requisitioning eventuates in a contract being made. The fact of the contract did not wipe out or change the nature of the original act. Further, obviously the terms of sub-clause (b) of the proviso show that there are cases of contract which fall within sect. 1 (1).

The next step is easy. There being a contract on which the suppliants could sue, they are protected under the said sub-clause (b) unless that sub-clause is made unavailing to them in respect of the exception therein expressed. Now the exception expressed is that the sub-clause is not to apply where a claim for payment or compensation can be made under sect. 2. I turn to sect. 2, and there I find that where a person is the owner of the ship which has been requisitioned he is to be entitled to payment or compensation, as the case may be, and that that payment or compensation must be awarded by a special tribunal. If these were all the words I think that the Court of Appeal would have agreed with Bailhache, J., but then there are added the words that payment or compensation are to be assessed on the principles hereinafter mentioned. The principles are set forth in sect. 2 (2), and the principles applicable to cases falling under 2 (1) a are to be those set forth in sched. 1. Sched. 1 says that payment for hire is to be in accordance with certain blue book rules, and that when there is damage to or loss of a ship, compensation shall be made for such damage or loss. Now the learned judges in the Court of Appeal say the mention of blue book rules gives a standard which clearly will not fit with the provisions of an actual contract and therefore they cannot think that the section applies at all.

I cannot agree with this argument. If the words are plain, and I think they are plain, they must be given effect to and the blue book rules must supersede the contract. No one ever escaped the bed of Procrustes because it did not fit. But in the present case I do not think that either the difficulty or the seeming hardship arises, for in this case the contract is silent as to a bargain as to what is to be paid if the ship is lost. The provision as to what was to be paid upon purchase may of course be evidence of value, but it has no further function ; and as such evidence it is equally cognisable by an ordinary court or by the special tribunal, which will find nothing in the blue book rules to trammel their judgment as to whether that evidence is or is not conclusive.

For these reasons I concur in the motion made by my noble friend on the Woolsack.

Lord ATKINSON.—I concur.

This appeal raises a preliminary point of law, namely whether the Indemnity Act of 1920 prevents the suppliant company, hereinafter referred to as the company, from having their petition of right heard in the court of King's Bench.

The facts stated in the petition must, it is admitted, be for the purpose of this case taken as true. The second paragraph of the petition opens with the statement that on the 15th March 1915 the steamship Alcantara, the property of the company, was requisitioned by the Director of Transports on behalf of the Admiralty, and was taken under a charter-party of that date which was officially known as form B. The charter-party took the form of a demise of the company's vessel to the Admiralty on behalf of His Majesty for service and employment on monthly hire from the 9th March 1915, for the space of three calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the Admiralty should cause notice to be given to the owners that the ship was discharged from His Majesty's service. The hire to be paid for the ship is fixed at 12*s.* per ton per month to be reduced to 11*s.* after two months, applicable to the whole period if the vessel was retained in the service for six months. As the registered tonnage of the ship was 15,831 tons this must have amounted to a very considerable sum. The charter-party contained a clause enabling the Admiralty to purchase the ship at any time while she was on hire for a sum of 550,000*l.*, or in case of her being required as an armed cruiser, as in fact she was, for a sum of 558,000*l.* No clause was contained in the charter-party providing expressly that the Admiralty should be liable to pay compensation to the owners if their vessel should, while in the service of the Admiralty, be lost, much less fixing the amount of such compensation if she were lost. This is, in my view, having regard to the provision of sect. 1, sub-sect. 1 of the Indemnity Act, a rather important matter.

There is a clause, however, in the charter-party which runs as follows :

> 3. The Admiralty may at any time alter or remove all or any of the fittings or arrangements on board the said ship, and may erect any new fittings which may be required to render the ship available for service as a mercantile fleet auxiliary, provided that the said ship, her outfit and machinery shall, at the cost of the Admiralty, be restored to and given up to the owners in the same condition in which they were when taken by the Admiralty, ordinary wear and tear alone excepted.

The ship was, on the 29th Feb. 1916, while in the service of the Admiralty under the charter-party, lost, not by the act or default of any officer or person in the employment of His Majesty or of any person under the authority of such officer, or by the act or default of any of the officers or members of her crew, but by the direct act of the German enemy. She was sunk in an engagement with a heavily armed German enemy merchantman, named the Greif, disguised as a Norwegian tramp.

The company claim by their petition of right to recover, in respect of the loss of their ship, the sum of 805,500*l.* less a sum of 550,000*l.* received by them.

The petition does not contain any statement as to the ground, breach of contract or other, upon which their demand is based. On the 18th Oct. 1920, the Attorney-General, on behalf of His Majesty, filed a second or further plea and answer to the company petition, giving the court to understand and be informed that after the delivery of his first answer and plea, on the 16th Aug. 1920, the Indemnity Act of 1920 came into force, that he relies upon it, and submits that by its operation the petition of the company is discharged and made void. By an order made upon summons by the master of the court, it was ordered that the point thus raised should be set down for hearing and disposed of before the trial of the issues of fact arising on the petition. Before dealing with the Indemnity Act 1920 it is necessary to refer to the provisions of the Proclamation dated the 3rd Aug. 1914. This proclamation empowered the Admiralty, by warrant under the hand of one of the officers of the Crown therein mentioned, to requisition and take up for the service of the Crown any British ship or British vessel, as defined by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, within the British Isles, or the waters adjacent thereto, for such period of time as might be necessary on condition that the owners of all ships and vessels so requisitioned shall receive payment for their use, and for services rendered during their employment in the Government service, and compensation for loss or damage thereby occasioned, according to terms to be arranged as soon as possible after the ships had been taken up, either by mutual agreement between the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the owners, or failing such agreement by the award of a board of arbitration to be constituted and appointed by the Crown for that purpose. Well, the Lords of the Admiralty did in the present case, by mutual agreement with the company (i.e., the charter-party), arrange the sums they should pay for the use and services of the Alcantara. They did not arrange by mutual agreement or at all what compensation the owners should receive in respect of the loss of their ship while performing the services she was taken up to perform. That being so, under this proclamation the board of arbitration, subsequently instituted by notification dated the 31st Aug. 1914, became the tribunal on whom the task of settling the amount of this compensation devolved.

It could not, in my view, be reasonably contended that, by the entering into such an agreement as is in this proclamation mentioned, the requisition of the ship was revoked, nullified, or put an end to. And I think it is equally clear that in the present case the requisition was not by entering into the charter-party revoked, nullified, or put an end to, so as to leave the respective rights, liabilities and remedies of the Crown and the company to be determined and enforced as if the charter-party was an agreement entered into between these parties irrespective of all requisitioning. I think on the contrary that this vessel was, when sunk by the act of the German enemy, a requisitioned ship in the service of the Admiralty. Sect. 1, sub-sect. 1 of the Indemnity Act 1920 has two limbs. The first limb prohibits the future institution of any action or other legal proceeding, civil or criminal (including a petition of right), in respect of the matters thereinafter mentioned. The second limb deals with similar proceedings which have been instituted either before or after the passing of the statute, and declares that these latter shall be discharged and be void; but the basis upon which each class of action or proceeding must rest is the same—namely, any act, matter or thing done during the war, before the passing of the Act in good faith, or done or purported to be done in execution of his duty or done for the defence of the realm or for the public safety, or for the enforcement of discipline or otherwise for the public interest by any person holding office under or employed in the service of the Crown in any capacity, or by any other person acting under the authority of a person so holding office or so employed; that is to say, it is the action of the officers and employees of the Crown and of those other persons acting under their authority which is the foundation upon which all the legal proceedings mentioned in this sub-section must be based. I am at a loss, therefore, to see how an action or proceedings based upon the act of an alien enemy in sinking a ship comes within sect. 1, sub-sect. 1 of this statute. One can well imagine a case in which an act of an officer of the Crown might involve a breach by the Crown of a contract entered into on its behalf with a subject, and be the ground of a petition of right. For instance, if ammunition or other goods sold during the war by a contractor to the Crown were loaded on a vessel in the service of the Crown and commanded by one of the officers of the Crown to be safely carried to a named destination, and this commander though acting in all good faith and doing what he considered to be best, steamed too fast through a fog, came into collision with another ship and lost or damaged his cargo, a suit instituted in respect of this loss or damage might reasonably fall within proviso (b) of sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Indemnity Act 1920, but the present case is wholly different from such a case as that.

In my opinion, therefore, the appellants cannot obtain relief under sect. 1, sub-sect. 1. The ship, being a requisitioned ship, when she was sunk, the owners would, primâ facie, be entitled to obtain compensation under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1, of the Indemnity Act 1920.

It is, however, provided by sub-sect. 2 (ii.) of that section that where compensation is claimed under sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a), it shall be assessed in accordance with the principles upon which the board of arbitration, constituted under the proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914, has hitherto acted, which principles are set forth in part I. of the schedule to the Act.

The Court of Appeal have, as I understand it, held that the effect of this provision is to exclude the claim of the suppliants for compensation from sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a). With the most genuine respect for the learned Lords Justices, I am entirely unable to take that view.

When one turns to part I. of the schedule, one finds that in the first eight and a half of its lines the sums to be awarded in respect of the use of a ship or vessel, or cargo space, or passenger accommodation therein, or services rendered, are alone dealt with.

These sums are to be based on the rates and conditions contained in the Blue Book reports, or in cases of a class where these rates or conditions have not been applied on some liberal estimate of the profits which the owner could have made of them had there been no war.

The schedule then goes on to provide that in addition to the compensation recoverable by the owner under the provision of these eight lines, they are to recover compensation for loss or damage of the ship or vessel directly due to her use. Here the loss of the vessel was, in my view, directly due to her use as an armed cruiser. The principles of the Blue Book do not apply, in my view, to the estimation of the compensation to be paid for her loss at all.

I see nothing, therefore, in the schedule which debars the owners of this vessel from obtaining just and adequate compensation from the arbitration board under the provisions of sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (a).

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment appealed from was erroneous and should be reversed—that the judgment of Bailhache, J. was right and should be restored, and this appeal be allowed with costs here and in the Court of Appeal.

Lord SUMNER.—Except out of respect for the Court of Appeal I should not trouble your Lordships with my reasons for concurring in the motion proposed. The critical question appears to be, whether the first paragraph of the first schedule to the Indemnity Act is so inappropriate to this case as to prevent it from falling within the words "except in cases where a claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of this Act." On this point, two views have been taken: the first, that the schedule is inapplicable to contracts generally and especially to contracts for the use of a ship, because it fixes the amounts to be paid otherwise than by reference to the terms of the contract itself; the second, that at any rate it is inapplicable to the present case, because, where a loss of the ship has occurred, which is directly due to the use of it, there is to be awarded under the schedule simply a sum by way of compensation in respect of such loss without mention of the contract. The first is the view of the Lords Justices.

Bankes, L.J. says "the suppliants' claim, based as it is upon a contractual obligation by the Admiralty, is or may be quite inconsistent with the principle upon which the tribunal is directed to assess their loss." Scrutton, L.J., speaking of the schedule, adds: "It appears to me to be quite inapplicable to claims for payments due under contract or to damages for breach of contract and to have been drawn without any reference to such claims." This view I am unable to accept. That some contracts may fall within sect, 1, sub-sect (1), is clear from the proviso, par. (b). The exception out of the proviso shows that, in some cases of contract, claims may be brought under sect. 2, and I see no sufficient ground for limiting the exception to the other paragraphs of the proviso, to the exclusion of (b). If so, no kind of contractual case falls more naturally under sect. 2 than one in which the owner of a ship which has been requisitioned, though, on terms subsequently expressed in a charter, is entitled to payment accordingly. I think further, that if any cases of that kind are to be excluded from the application of the first schedule, they cannot be the whole class of contractual obligations, as such, but must be those specific cases only to which, in the particular circumstances, the schedule is found to be inapplicable. The words in the exception of the proviso are "in cases"—that is individual cases—"where a claim for payment can be brought," and not "in such classes of case as can be brought" under sect. 2. If the particular case now in question is to be held to be one to which the schedule does not apply, it must be on grounds arising out of the particular claim made, and out of the particular stipulations agreed to.

The second and more restricted view appears therefore to be, that there is something in the terms of the actual demise charter entered into, which gives to the suppliants rights in respect of the loss of the Alcantara beyond what is covered by the words of the schedule, viz., "a sum by way of compensation in respect of such loss or damage." Of the contention that the price at which the Admiralty receives an option to purchase the ship in some way limits the compensation to be paid in the event of her loss, it would be premature to express any opinion. If it is so, however, the schedule is phrased more favourably to the suppliants than is the contract; but in other respects I do not see how the schedule affects, and certainly not how it limits, the measure of the compensation.

I will only add that I think the decision in Brooke v. The King (ante, p. 205; 125 L. T. Rep. 183; (1921) 2 K. B. 110) entirely distinguishable.

Lord PARMOOR.—I am unable to concur in the opinions which have been expressed by your Lordships, and I think that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

The petition of right presented by the respondents, states that on or about the 15th March 1915, the steamship Alcantara was requisitioned by the Director of Transports for, and on behalf of, the Admiralty, and was taken under a charter-party of that date, which was in the form officially known as form B. I agree in the view taken by the Court of Appeal that this allegation in the petition should be taken to allege that the Alcantara was requisitioned on the condition that the respondents should receive payment, or compensation, under the terms of the charter-party. The obligations of the Admiralty were made to depend not on the act of requisition, but on the terms of the charter-party. The charter-party placed on the Admiralty a liability to restore the ship in the same condition in which she was taken, ordinary wear and tear alone excepted, and to bear all risks during the continuance of the ship's service under the charter-party.

On the 4th April 1916, the Admiralty gave notice, by letter, of the loss of the ship, and by such letter declared that the hiring under the charter-party was at an end as from the 29th Feb. 1916. Apart from any disability imposed by the terms of the Indemnity Act 1920, the respondents would have been entitled to claim damages, either for the failure of the Admiralty to restore the ship, or on the covenant that all risk during the continuance of the ship's service under the charter-party should be borne by the Admiralty. After the passing of the Indemnity Act, the Attorney-General entered a further answer and plea to the petition, submitting that by the operation of that Act the petition was discharged and made void.

The question on appeal depends upon the construction of the Indemnity Act. Sect. 1 of the Act includes the case presented by the respondents in their petition. The Alcantara was requisitioned, and the terms of the contract were arranged in good faith by a person employed in the service of the Crown and acting in the execution of his duty. Hence apart from the subsequent provisions or limitations of the Act the contention of the Attorney-General would prevail, and the petition should be discharged and made void. It is provided, however, that except in cases where a claim for payment or compensation can be brought under sect. 2 of the Act, sect. 1 shall not prevent the institution or prosecution of proceedings in respect of any rights under or alleged breaches of contract, if the proceedings are instituted within the prescribed time. The respondents in their petition state a claim, made within the prescribed time, and founded on alleged breach of contract. They are therefore entitled to proceed on their petition unless the exception applies, and they can bring a claim for payment or compensation under sect. 2 of the Act.

The real difficulty in the case depends on the construction of sect. 2 of the Indemnity Act. The question to be determined is whether this section applies where legal proceedings are taken to enforce the payment of amounts due under contract, or as damages for alleged breach of contract, where after requisition a contract has been entered into by mutual consent, or is restricted to cases where no contract has been made, and the subsequent liability of the Admiralty arises from the act of requisition. The language used in the section is not inconsistent with either of these alternative contentions. The Court of Appeal has unanimously accepted the more restricted contention. I agree in their decision.

Sect. 2 gives a right to payment or compensation in the cases under (a) and (b), and in other cases directs that compensation should be assessed under the provisions of (2) (iii.). Under (a) and (b) there is no option, and payment, or compensation, can only be assessed on the principles and by the tribunal therein mentioned, whose decision shall be final, subject to a right of appeal, on any point of law, to the Court of Appeal, and by leave given, to this House. Where payment or compensation is claimed under (a) the tribunal is the board of arbitration constituted under the proclamation issued on the 3rd Aug. 1914, and the principles to be applied are set forth in part I. of the schedule to the Act. In the present appeal compensation for breach of contract is claimed, but the same considerations would apply if the claim had been one for payment for the use of the steamship Alcantara. The result of applying these terms, where a mutual agreement has been made, is that, for the purpose of claims or compensation, all charter-party contracts in form B. consequent on requisition, would be set aside and rendered void. There would be a clean sweep of contractual obligations affecing payment or compensation, and the substitution, therefore, of a statutory tribunal and statutory principles. If this intention is expressed in the language of the Legislature effect must be given to it; but the alternative and more restricted contention appears to me to be equally in accord with the language used. Adopting this construction, claims under (a) would have no reference to payments under contract, or for damages for breach of contract, and are not applicable to such claims. Atkin, L.J. says, that to anyone who knows the number of cases in which the terms of requisition were arranged as being on the terms of the form of charter-party set out in the Blue Book reports mentioned in the schedule, it is incredible that the Legislature meant either to avoid and discharge all mutual agreements arranging the terms of requisition. I have no knowledge of the number of cases in which the terms of requisition were agreed in a charter-party in form B, but I agree with the Lord Justice in adopting the alternative construction that sect. 2 (a) is limited to cases where terms have not been arranged by mutual agreement.

The argument in favour of this contention appears to me to be strengthened by reference to the other portions of sect. 2. The same difficulties arise in including contractual obligations under (b) and 2 (iii.) as arise in the case of (a). I think that sect. 2 is not intended in all these cases to set aside contracts entered into by the Government, and to introduce a statutory principle and scale, which may be wholly inconsistent with terms arranged by mutual agreement. The opinion expressed by Scrutton, L.J. that sect. 2 of the Indemnity Act has no reference to claims for payment under contract or for damages for breach of contract appears to me to be correct.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Tuesday, Dec. 20, 1921.

(Before Lord STERNDALE, M.R., ATKIN and YOUNGER, L.JJ.)

THE COUNTESS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Docks — Negligence — Collision with gates —Dockowner's rights of detention—Statutory powers of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board—Limitation of liability—Priorities—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), s. 94—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503, 504—Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32), ss. 1, 3—Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. xii.), s. 7.

The plaintiffs' steamship C., lying in a dock belonging to the defendants, the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, negligently crashed through the dock gates into the river, carrying with her a number of other craft. The C. herself had to be beached by tugs, and the defendants' assistant marine surveyor certified that she was "in a sinking condition" in the river, and, in his judgment, "an obstruction, impediment, or danger," or likely so to become, to the safe and convenient navigation of the port. The defendants then patched, docked, and repaired the C. at a cost of 1048*l. The damage negligently done to the defendants' docks and works amounted to* 10,014*l. The plaintiffs instituted proceedings for limitation of liability. The defendants claimed the right to detain the* C. under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 until the plaintiffs had paid the sum of 5000*l., the statutory amount of the plaintiffs' liability calculated in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Acts, and in addition the sum of* 1048*l. The plaintiffs issued a writ in detinue, alleging that the detention of the* C. was wrongful. The C. was released on payment of 5000*l. into court by the plaintiffs. By sect.* 94 of the above-named Act of 1858 a vessel negligently doing damage to any works belonging to the Dock Board may be detained until the amount of the damage, or a deposit for the estimated amount has been paid. By sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 a shipowner's right of limitation of liability under the

(a) Reported by W. C. SANDFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Merchant Shipping Act 1894 is extended to all cases where, without his actual fault or privity, any loss or damage is caused to property of any kind, whether on land or water, by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; and by sect. 3 the limitation under the Act applies "whether the liability arises at common law or under any general or private Act of Parliament and notwithstanding anything contained in such Act." By sect. 7 of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 the Dock Board may remove the wreck of any vessel or any vessel sunk or stranded within the port which, in the judgment (written and duly recorded) of the marine surveyor or his assistant, is an obstruction, impediment, or danger to the safe use of the port, or likely, in his judgment, so to become, and the Board may sell the wreck or vessel and out of the proceeds retain the expenses to which they have been put. Similar rights are given to harbour and conservancy authorities by sect. 530 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Duke, P. held (a) that until a limitation decree was made the detention of the C. under sect. 94 of the Act of 1858 was permissible; but (b) that afterwards the section did not give the defendants priority over other claimants to the limitation fund; that the fund must be distributed rateably; and that the liability of the plaintiffs to the defendants upon which the lien of the defendants depended was reduced in proportion as the total claims exceeded the plaintiffs' limited statutory liability; and he directed that the 5000*l. should be transferred to the credit of the limitation action;* (c) that the C. was a vessel "stranded" and "likely to become an obstruction, impediment, or danger to navigation," and that accordingly the defendants were entitled to recover the sum of 1048*l. under this head. Both parties appealed.*

Held, by Atkin and Younger, L.JJ. (Lord Sterndale, M.R. dissenting) that, after the limitation of liability decree, the defendants were entitled to hold the deposit only until they were paid their rateable proportion of the amount of the plaintiffs' limited liability; that under the Merchant Shipping Acts the defendants had a lien until they actually received such payment, and that the order of the president transferring this deposit to the credit of the limitation action was wrong.

Held, further, by the whole court, that the C. was a vessel "stranded" and "likely to become an obstruction, impediment or danger to navigation," that the judgment of the assistant marine surveyor was sufficiently certified so as to comply with sect. 7 of the defendants' Act of 1912*; and that, therefore, the defendants were entitled to recover the said* 1048*l.*

Judgment of Duke, P. (infrà; (1921) P. 279) affirmed subject to a variation.

APPEAL by the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board from a judgment of Duke, P. in an action of detinue, and an action of limitation of liability; and cross-appeal by the owners of the Countess in the detinue action.

On the 5th June 1920, at about 11.10 a.m., the Countess, owing to improper navigation, burst open and damaged the gates of the Alfred Dock, Birkenhead, belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (hereinafter referred to as the board). The amount of damage done to the dock gates was estimated by the board at about 10,000*l.* In consequence of the bursting open of the dock gates and the consequent outrush of water, damage was done to a number of barges and other craft, some of which were sunk. The Countess was holed and in danger of sinking. She drifted up the river, and about 11.50 was beached on Tranmere beach by a privately owned tug, the Egerton. The accident and the condition of the Countess had been reported to the senior assistant marine surveyor of the board, and by his orders she was taken higher up on to the beach by two of the board's tugs. The assistant marine surveyor, after giving these directions, made out a certificate or record with regard to the Countess, addressed to the general manager and secretary of the board, as follows:

> Sir,—Pursuant to sect. 7 of The Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912 I hereby certify that the steamship the Countess is in a sinking condition in the river off the Alfred Dock river entrances, within the port of Liverpool, and that such vessel is, in my judgment, an obstruction or impediment, or danger, or is likely, in my judgment, to become an obstruction, impediment or danger, to the safe and convenient navigation or use of that part of the said Port.

It was signed about 3.30 p.m. and lodged at the office of the board about 4.40 p.m. On the 7th June the board wrote to the owners that they were detaining the vessel in respect of the damage under sect. 94 of their Act of 1858. On the 9th June she was removed by the board to the Herculaneum Dock for repairs under an arrangement that this should not prejudice the board's claim under their statutory powers.

At this time the Board were claiming to detain the Countess: (1) Under sect. 7 of their Act of 1912 in respect of expenses estimated at about 1048*l.* in and about removing her from being an obstruction to navigation; (2) under sect. 94 of their Act of 1858 for the damage done to their dock gates estimated at about 10,000*l.* On the 5th June actions were commenced against the Countess by the various barges, &c., for damage caused by her improper navigation, and on the 9th June the solicitors for the owners, gave the usual undertaking to appear and put in bail. The Countess, therefore, was never in fact arrested and remained in constructive detention by the board until released under an order of the Court of Appeal, dated the 26th July 1920. On the 14th June 1920, the owners of the Countess commenced an action for limitation of liability in which the defendants were the board and all others claiming to have sustained damage by the collision with the Countess. The board duly appeared and the statement of claim was delivered on the 5th July claiming the usual relief. No defence was delivered, and in due course the president made his decree on the 23rd March 1921. Meantime the owners, being anxious to obtain release of the vessel, by writ dated the 12th July 1920, commenced an action of detinue in respect of the Countess against the board. On the 26th July 1920, the Court of Appeal, acting apparently under the powers given by Order L., r. 8, directed that the vessel be released upon the plaintiffs' paying into court the sum of 5500*l.* to be dealt with as provided in the order. The sum of 5500*l.* was made up of 1000*l.* the estimated expenses of removal of obstruction and 4500*l.* representing the total sum for which it was claimed the plaintiffs could limit their liability for damage (the actual sum was 4468*l.*) at 8*l.* a ton. The vessel was in due course released upon the sum mentioned being paid into court. On the 8th Nov. 1920, the plaintiffs delivered their statement of claim in the detinue action and on the 30th Nov. the defendants delivered a defence and counter-claim. On the 23rd March 1921, the president heard the detinue action together with the limitation suit and made the decree from part of which the appeal and cross-appeal were brought.

The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858, provides:

Sect. 94: In every case in which any damage shall be done to any . . . pier, landing stage, jetty, . . . work belonging to the Board, through the misconduct, negligence, or default of the master of any vessel, or any other person on board of any vessel, the amount of such damage may be recovered . . . in a summary way, . . . or, at the option of the Board, such vessel may be detained until such damage shall have been paid or a deposit shall have been made by the master or owner of such vessel equal in amount to the claim or demand made by the Board for the estimated amount of damage so done by such vessel; which deposit the Board are authorised to receive and to retain until the entire amount of such damage shall have been ascertained by the Board and paid to them by the master or owner of such vessel, when the said deposit shall be returned to him: . . .

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1912, provides:

Sect. 7, sub-sect. 1: The Board may . . . . remove the wreck of any vessel or any vessel . . . sunk or stranded . . . within the Port of Liverpool . . . and which shall be in the judgment of the marine surveyor . . . or . . . of the assistant marine surveyor for the time being of the Board, such judgment being recorded in writing signed by him and deposited with the secretary of the Board, an obstruction or impediment or danger or is likely in such judgment as aforesaid to become an obstruction, impediment or danger to the safe and convenient navigation or use thereof . . . and may . . . sell in such manner as they may think proper the said vessel or wreck . . . and out of the proceeds of such sale . . . may retain the expenses of . . . removing such vessel or wreck. . . .

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, provides:

Sect. 503, sub-sect. 1: The owners of a ship, British or foreign, shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity; (that is to say) . . . (d) Where any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel, or to any goods, . . . on board any other vessel, by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; be liable in damages beyond the following amounts; . . . (ii.) In respect of loss of, or damage to, vessels, goods, . . . an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

Sect. 504: Where any liability is alleged to have been incurred by the owner of a British or foreign ship in respect of . . . loss of or damage to vessels or goods, and several claims are made . . . in respect of that liability, then the owner may apply . . . to the High Court, . . . and that court may determine the amount of the owner's liability and may distribute that amount rateably among the several claimants. . . .

Sect. 530: Where any vessel is sunk, stranded, or abandoned in any harbour or tidal water under the control of a harbour or conservancy authority, . . . in such manner as in the opinion of the authority to be, or be likely to become, an obstruction or danger to navigation . . . that authority may—(a) take possession of, and raise, remove, or destroy any part of the vessel; and (b) light or buoy any such vessel . . . and (c) sell . . . any vessel . . . so raised . . . and out of the proceeds of the sale reimburse themselves. . . .

The Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900, provides:

Sect. 1: The limitation of the liability of the owners of any ship set by section five hundred and three of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, in respect of loss of or damage to vessels, goods, merchandise, or other things, shall extend and apply to all cases where (without their actual fault or privity) any loss or damage is caused to property or rights of any kind, whether on land or on water, or whether fixed or moveable, by reason of the improper navigation or management of the ship.

Sect. 2: (1) The owners of any dock or canal, or a harbour authority . . . shall not, where without their actual fault or privity any loss or damage is caused to any vessel or vessels . . . be liable to damages beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding eight pounds for each ton. . . . (3) Sect. five hundred and four of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, shall apply to this section as if the words "owner of a British or foreign ship" included a harbour authority. . . .

Sect. 3: The limitation of liability under this Act shall relate to the whole of any losses and damages which may arise upon any one distinct occasion, although such losses and damages may be sustained by more than one person, and shall apply whether the liability arises at common law or under any general or private Act of Parliament, and notwithstanding anything contained in such Act.

Sect. 5: This Act shall be construed as one with the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. . . .

Cur. adv. vult.

March 23, 1921.—Duke, P., read the following judgment: These are two actions brought by the plaintiffs, William Hay and others, owners of the steamship Countess, against the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board. The first in date was an action in common form for limitation of liability in respect of a collision of the plaintiffs' steamship with the dock gates of the Alfred Dock at Birkenhead, a dock of the defendants. By reason of the existence of demands of the defendants which did not arise out of the collision, and other circumstances which made it doubtful whether the questions at issue between the parties could be disposed of in an action for limitation of liability, the plaintiffs issued their writ in an action founded upon an alleged wrongful detention, and in this action the defendants set up, by way of defence and counterclaim, the several claims in respect of which they allege themselves to have been entitled at all material times to hold possession of the plaintiffs' steamship. These are claims of the defendants under their statutory powers. The plaintiffs' vessel was, on the morning of the 5th June 1920, in the eastern float of the Alfred Dock, waiting to proceed into the Mersey, when an order was given by her master to go full speed astern, but her engines were put full speed ahead and the ship crashed through the dock gates, with the result that a great body of water escaped from the dock and carried into the river not only the plaintiffs' vessel but a large number of barges and floats, some of which were sunk. The plaintiffs' steamship was holed in the engine room and suffered other damage. The liability thrown upon the plaintiffs by reason of the damage to the dock, and to the large number of vessels damaged and sunk, is the liability sought to be limited by the plaintiffs' original action. [His Lordship stated the facts.]

At the hearing before me there was no question on the defendants' part that the plaintiffs are entitled to the usual declarations in their action for limitation of liability, and it was agreed that the statutory amount of the plaintiffs' liability is 4468*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* in respect of the collision. The plaintiffs' counsel mentioned that the actual value of the Countess was estimated at 34,000*l.*, and it had been agreed in the course of the litigation that the damage done to the defendants' works on the 5th June amounted to 10,014*l.* The defendants justified the detention of the Countess under sect. 94 of their Act of 1858, and sect. 7 of their Act of 1912, and alleged a justification alternatively under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 530. They also claimed payment of such sums as may be found payable under the order of the 26th July 1920. [His Lordship then read the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858, s. 94, and the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1912, s. 7, and continued:] Counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs argued that the detention of the Countess for the two sums named in the counterclaim was wrongful, as being made and maintained for an amount in excess of anything due to the defendants and without statutory warrant. As to the 1858 Act, he submitted that the detention was unwarranted in point of time and mode and amount. As to the 1912 Act, he objected further that the vessel was not in fact a wreck, or sunk or stranded, and that the certificate made by the assistant marine surveyor when the Countess was on the beach was avoided by proof of the actual situation of the vessel when the certificate was made, and, since it did not certify the vessel to be stranded, was ineffectual to authorise detention of the Countess as a stranded ship. With regard to the above claim under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 530, counsel for the plaintiffs took the further point that the defendant board was not shown to have been of opinion that the Countess, as she lay at Tranmere Beach, was or was likely to become an obstruction or danger to the navigation of the Mersey, and that, until such an opinion is in fact formed by the authority under the statute, the power to take possession, remove, hold as security, or sell, does not arise. Counsel asserted, on behalf of the Docks and Harbour Board, a right, in the events that happened, to detain under this Act of 1858, for the damage caused by the collision, at all events until (if at all) the liability of the plaintiffs should be limited, and a further right under the Act of 1912, acting on the judgment of the surveyor, to remove the Countess from her original position at Tranmere Beach to her ultimate position there, and from the beach to the Herculaneum Dock, and to hold and sell the vessel in order to pay the expenses thereby incurred. The certificate of the surveyor, given on the afternoon of the 5th June, he defended as a sufficient evidence of the judgment formed and acted on in the morning. Any expenses, other than those of removal, which were included in the sum of 1048*l.*, he claimed for the defendants as salvors.

The main question involved in the case is that of the effect upon the defendants' powers under the Act of 1858, of the statutory provision for the limitation of liability which are embodied in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 503 and 504, and in the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900, ss. 1, 2, and 3, with regard more particularly to the enactment in the last-mentioned statute, whereby liability for damage, such as is in question here, is brought within the liabilities capable of limitation, and dock and harbour owners and authorities are enabled to limit their liability for damage caused to shipping by negligence of their servants.

The question raised under the defendants' Act of 1912 is of less general importance than that under their Act of 1858, but is no doubt of considerable consequence to the defendants by reason of the necessity of immediate action in a waterway like the Mersey when the security of convenience of navigation is threatened by a sudden occurrence like that of the 5th June 1920.

The argument with regard to the defendants' Act of 1858 was addressed to three topics, first, whether the defendants' right of detention is taken away by the Merchant Shipping Acts, secondly, whether the lien upon the vessel which is created by sect. 94 survives notwithstanding the right of the plaintiffs to obtain a declaration of limitation of liability; and, thirdly, whether, if it survives, it is a lien for the whole of the amount of the damage to the defendants' works, or only for the sum which may become payable to the defendants rateably with other losers by the collision, when the amount payable by the plaintiffs comes to be distributed. [His Lordship then read the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 503 and 504, and the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners) Act 1900, ss. 1, 2, 3, and 5, and continued.]

The extent to which the defendants' powers under sect. 94 of the Act of 1858 are modified by the Merchant Shipping Acts was much debated. Counsel for the plaintiffs did not contend that they were wholly revoked. Counsel for the defendants developed an argument which amounted in substance to a claim that the defendants have, by virtue of this section, a priority over other claimants in respect of damage caused by the collision. He presented the defendants in the light of secured creditors in a class by themselves, entitled to rank before the general body of the persons who suffered loss by the occurrence, and insisted that no express words to deprive them of the advantages of sect. 94 could be found in the general Acts, that the policy of the legislation until 1900 had been illustrated by the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 74, and by many local Acts, and that a construction adverse to their right would be contrary to the presumable intention of the Legislature. I do not find in the Act of 1900 language which supports this view. While the Legislature extended the shipowners' privilege of limited liability by including in it liability for damage to docks, it also extended to the owners of docks a like privilege of limitation for damage to shipping. Further, in sect. 3 of the Act express notice is taken of the enactments, public and general, local and private, which relate to liabilities in respect of damage to dock undertakings.

The true means of ascertaining whether and to what extent the provisions of the defendants' private Act of 1858 are modified by the general Acts is to read the respective enactments together and see how far, upon a reasonable construction of the language employed, the two sets of enactments can stand together. At the outset it is to be observed that, if no action to limit liability is instituted, the provisions of sect. 94 can operate absolutely. So also if the action is unsuccessful. Sect. 94 is therefore not repealed by implication. How far it is modified can perhaps be seen by applying the terms of the later legislation by way of proviso. Down to the time of decree in a limitation action the two sets of powers and rights can well co-exist. After decree the powers and rights conferred by the earlier legislation are diminished. The liability of the plaintiffs to the defendants, upon which the defendants' lien over the plaintiffs' vessel depends, is reduced in proportion as the total claims from all quarters exceed the limited statutory liability.

The first question of real difficulty arises when you come to consider whether by necessary implication the legislation has transferred the defendants' lien from the ship, or the deposit made in lieu of the ship, to the statutory fund which is to be provided by the owners and distributed rateably by the court. I do not find it more remarkable that the Legislature should modify the statutory security of the defendants in respect of damage of their docks than that it should have modified the rights in rem of the shipowners who had a maritime lien for damage done to their vessels. To hold the defendants to be entitled to recover their damages independently of the sum to be paid upon limitation of liability would be to disregard the express language of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, that the owners shall not be liable beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding so many pounds per ton. To hold the defendants entitled to a priority in the distribution of the limited amount would be to disobey the statutory direction that that amount shall be distributed rateably. I was referred to the decision in the Scotch case of Rankine v. Raschen (1877, 4 R. 725) as authority for a proposition that the distribution is not inevitably made upon a rateable basis. The case does not appear to me to conflict with the view I take. On the contrary, where a shipowner had paid one claimant in full, the Court of Session held that prejudice resulted to him only, and that the rights of other claimants for their rateable amounts were not affected. When limitation of liability is applied for, as in this case, before any payment on account of liability has been made, it seems to me impossible that the court should prefer any one of the claimants. I hold that the defendants have not the suggested priority, and that the plaintiffs' right to a limitation of liability covers their liability to the defendants in respect of the defendants' claim for the damages, amounting to 10,014*l.*, done to their dock in the collision.

It is true that the Legislature has not by the Merchant Shipping (Liability of Shipowners and Others) Act 1900 directed, with regard to the detention by the dock authority of a ship which has done damage to their works, what shall happen if and when the liability of the owner in respect of the negligence causing the damage comes to be limited. Sect. 504 of the Act of 1894 deals with the whole matter of procedure in very general terms. While there is nothing express or implied in the statute to take away the defendants' right to detain pending the decree of limitation of the plaintiffs' liability, the provisions in the defendants' Act of 1858 for detention of the ship until the entire amount of the damage to their works shall have been ascertained and paid are inconsistent with those parts of the limitation sections of the Merchant Shipping Acts which contemplate release of the ship against provision of, or security for, the limited amount, and to the extent to which they are inconsistent they are impliedly repealed. The substance of the matter is that the defendants' power of detention in the period between the decree for limitation of liability and satisfaction of their claim is left by the Legislature, together with many other incidents of limitation of liability, to be dealt with according to law. I see nothing surprising in this. Long before 1900 the rights of the holder of a possessory lien upon a ship had been reconciled by the court with the right of a plaintiff having a cause of action in rem and power to obtain arrest of the ship by virtue of that right. And in the present case any difficulty which existed was solved by the order of the Court of Appeal for the release of the Countess against a payment into court and upon terms.

The submission which was made on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the defendants did not in this case duly exercise their right of detention under their Act of 1858, requires a brief examination of what was in fact done. The direction as to the Countess originally given on the defendants' behalf was that given on the 5th June under the powers of the Act of 1912, with regard to removal of vessels wrecked or stranded, or likely to cause obstruction to navigation. The detention under the Act of 1858 was made in express terms on the 7th June, while the Countess was on Tranmere Beach under the control of the defendants' officials. This is said on the part of the plaintiffs to have been a detention otherwise than in the mode and form required by a strict construction of the Act of 1858. Such powers are to be exercised in strict conformity with the law, but I see no reasonable ground for saying that there was not such an exercise in this case. The vessel still lay on the beach where she was placed after the collision, within the defendants' jurisdiction, and without, so far as appears, any intervention of rights of third parties which affected the matter. I hold, therefore, that the detention was duly made in the exercise of the defendants' statutory right.

As to the beaching and removal of the Countess, and her temporary repair, the powers of the defendants' Act of 1912 are relied upon by them, and they also claim as salvors. What is challenged is the detention of the vessel for the expenses, amounting to 1048*l.*, which the defendants incurred. Counsel for the plaintiffs did not challenge the details of the outlay, or its propriety, but contended that, in order to make the sum a charge upon the ship, the requirements of sect. 7 of the Act must be strictly complied with. I think they must, and it is said for the defendants that they were. What has to be determined is whether the Countess was a wreck or a vessel stranded within the Port of Liverpool which, in the judgment of the assistant marine surveyor, duly recorded in writing signed by him and deposited with the secretary of the board, was, or was likely to become, an obstruction to the safe and convenient use of the port. The chief objection taken on behalf of the plaintiffs was that when the assistant surveyor certified the Countess to be in a sinking condition, and to be, or to be likely to become, an obstruction she was neither a wreck nor a stranded ship but was safely moored on Tranmere Beach. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that the Countess was, if not a wreck, a vessel stranded, and that the judgment of the assistant surveyor was sufficiently certified. On the question of fact, my finding is that the Countess was not a wreck. The judgment of the Court of Appeal in The Olympic (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318, 580; 112 L. T. Rep. 49; (1913) P. 92) under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 does not appear to me to be in point. The question there related to termination of wages contracts and the meaning of the word "wreck" in sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Here the question is one of fact under the defendants' Act of 1912, where "wreck" and "vessel" are distinguished one from another. De Mattos v. Saunders (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; 27 L. T. Rep. 120; L. Rep. 7, C. P. 579) was cited as an authority on the question whether the Countess was stranded, and is one of a numerous class of cases decided upon contested claims against underwriters, where the courts were required to decide whether a ship conveying goods the subject of insurance had been stranded within the meaning of a policy. The decisive consideration is such cases is said to be whether the vessel takes the ground in the ordinary and usual course of navigation and management, or whether the ground is taken under extraordinary circumstances of time and place by reason of some unusual or accidental occurrence. Such authorities are no doubt helpful, but I do not think they are decisive in the present case. The question of fact is to be determined with regard to the language and objects of the Act of 1912. The Countess was a vessel narrowly saved from sinking and put upon the beach to save her from sinking. She was not under control of her own power, could not be floated with safety to herself or other vessels, and needed to be repaired before she could prudently be put afloat at all. De Mattos v. Saunders (sup.) shows that it is immaterial whether the vessel drifted to the beach or was guided there. I find her as she lay on the beach to have been, within the meaning of the Act of 1912, a vessel stranded. I may add that, in my opinion, the question whether this vessel was a wreck or was stranded was a question for the judge; but, lest any element of fact should be involved, I consulted the Elder Brethren who have been sitting with me, and they agree in the view that, looking at the facts and without regard to the requirements of any Act of Parliament, this vessel was not in their judgment a wreck, and, on the other hand, was a vessel stranded.

As to the form and effect of the surveyor's certificate, sect. 7 of the Act does not require that the surveyor shall certify the particular condition of the vessel, which is a condition precedent to the power of removal. He is to form and certify his judgment as to obstruction or risk of obstruction. The certificate in question was alleged to be void by reason of error as to subject-matter and time. To what I have said as to the state of the Countess I have only to add that the words in the document which are descriptive of her condition are not necessary to the validity of the certificate and that, in my judgment, the fact that they had become erroneous when the certificate was made and delivered is immaterial. With regard to time, it was not denied that the Countess was, when the surveyor formed his judgment on the morning of the 5th June, and was likely to be, an obstruction, impediment, and danger to navigation. The objection which was taken was that she no longer remained so when she had been removed to the beach. The assistant surveyor did not take that view, and if it is material, I find upon this question of fact that the Countess as she lay at Tranmere Beach, was, and was likely to be, an obstruction, impediment, and danger to navigation, and fit to be removed by the defendants. It is true that the certificate did not in its terms relate to this time. I therefore add that, in my opinion, when on the 5th June 1920 the assistant surveyor had formed his judgment to the effect required by the statute, the defendants, by their officers, were entitled forthwith to act upon it in respect of the matter in question in the exercise of their powers under sect. 7, and that the judgment was sufficiently recorded. It was promptly recorded in the course of the transaction. I cannot see how the board could secure to shipping the advantages intended to be conferred by the section, where action must be prompt to be effective, if between decision and action you interpose delay for formal official procedure : (see on this subject Jones v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 335 ; 108 L. T. Rep. 722 ; 18 Com. Cas. 163). From the conclusions I have stated, it follows that I hold the removal of the Countess to have been a removal under sect. 7 of the Act of 1912, and the subsequent detention in respect of the defendants' expenses under this head to have been a justifiable detention.

The result of the whole matter is that there will be judgment for the plaintiffs in the action for limitation of liability, and judgment for the defendants on the plaintiffs' claim in detinue and on the counter-claim for payment out of the sum in court of 1048*l.* 6*s.* 11*d.*, and for the declaration prayed that the defendants were entitled to detain the vessel under the Acts of 1858 and 1912. The balance of the money in court will be transferred to the credit of the action for limitation of liability, which will proceed in the usual way.

The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board appealed.

The respondents to the appeal, the owners of the Countess, also by a cross-appeal claimed that the board were not entitled to recover the sum of 1048*l.* for repairing and removing the Countess.

The appeal was heard on the 11th and 12th July 1921.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 20, 1921.—The following written judgments were delivered :

Lord Sterndale, M.R., stated the facts, and continued.—Some question was raised before us as to the jurisdiction to make the order releasing the vessel on payment of 5500*l.* into court. I do not think we ought to entertain that question at all. The order was made, and no appeal against it was ever entered, and it must be taken as a right and proper order. It does not seem to me to affect the rights of the parties. If the board had the right to detain the ship, they had the same right over the sum of 5500*l.* which was substituted for her by the order, but I think a little confusion has been introduced into the proceedings by the fact of the ship being released and money substituted.

The important question is whether the board are entitled to detain the ship, or the money representing it, until they are paid the damage done to their works up to the statutory limit of 8*l.* per ton, irrespective and to the exclusion of other claims arising out of the accident, or whether they have to come in and take their share of 8*l.* per ton pari passu with the other claimants. This is, in my opinion, a matter in which the plaintiffs, the owners of the Countess, have only an indirect interest, because, for reasons I shall give hereafter, I do not think that a judgment in favour of the right of detainer obliges the plaintiffs to pay more than the statutory amount of 8*l.* per ton. The persons who are really interested are the other persons who have claims against the plaintiffs in respect of the accident. They are not parties to either of the actions, but appeared in the court below ; they were served with notice of the appeal, although not strictly speaking respondents, and counsel has argued the matter on their behalf before us.

The question depends upon the proper construction of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xvii.), s. 94 ; the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 503 and 504 ; and the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32), s. 1. The first-named section is as follows : [His Lordship read it.] There seems to be no question but that this section gives a right to detain a vessel doing damage, or a deposit in lieu thereof, until the whole of the damage is paid. It is a possessory lien given by statute, which it is not necessary to enforce by action, and is not, in my opinion, subject to the same considerations as a maritime lien. Although the section speaks of the amount of damage being ascertained, it does not specially provide any method of ascertainment, and I think it must have contemplated the usual method, that is, that the owner of the ship or the deposit should demand its release on payment of a certain amount, and that the question of whether that amount was sufficient, or whether the board were entitled to detain for a larger sum, should be determined either in an action of detinue or an arbitration to determine the amount. I do not think it was necessary for the board to bring an action against the shipowner, although they could have done so. It was enough for them to rely upon their lien and refuse to give up the ship until payment. It was suggested during the argument that the proper method was by a claim under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 504. But this certainly should not have been so under the corresponding sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), at the time of the passing of the Act of 1858, for sect. 514 only took effect in case of a limitation under sect. 103. Nor could it have been so under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, until 1900, for until then there was no limitation for damage like this done to dock works.

The learned president has held that, by virtue of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, s. 94, the board had a right to detain the ship until a decree had been made in a limitation action, and as no such decree had been made at the date of the writ in the detinue action that action must fail, and in that I agree with him, but he held that when a decree in a limitation action had been made, the board lost any right of detainer which they had, or only retained an absolutely useless right, that is to say, a right to detain a proportion of the 8*l.* per ton pari passu with the other claimants, for which no right of detainer is necessary, as, according to his contention, that sum is awarded to the board by the court out of the money in court. If the plaintiffs had not asked for the limitation, it is not disputed that the board would still have had a right of detainer for the larger sum. It seems odd that the right of detention, which, as I have said, affects the other claimants more than the plaintiffs, for if it exists, it gives the board possession of the ship and the right to be paid out of it in preference to any other claimants, should exist or not exist according to the decision of the plaintiffs to limit or not to limit their liability, but this may be the correct view.

The question really arises upon the defendants' counter-claim, by which they ask for a declaration that they are entitled to payment of the sum paid into court under the order of the Court of Appeal. They ask : " To be paid out of the sum paid or to be paid into court under the said order of the Court of Appeal the sum of 4468*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*, or such other sum as shall be decreed by the court to be the statutory limit of the liability of the said steamship under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1894-1906, or if there shall be no such decree the actual amount of the damage done to the works belonging to the defendants pursuant to the provisions of sect. 94 of their said Act of 1858 " ; and : " That the defendants are entitled to payment of the damage done to the works belonging to the defendants by the said steamship and to the expenses of raising and removing her and of detainer. . . ." I am not sure that the counter-claim is quite accurate, for the defendants are only entitled to detain the vessel or the money until the damage is paid to them, but as the sum of 4468*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.* is taken as the statutory limit and it is admitted that the damage to the defendants' property exceeds that amount, in substance they are entitled to receive that sum, if they are entitled by reason of this right of detainer to enforce payment of the amount legally due to them irrespective of other claimants. The learned president, however, has held that, although the defendants were entitled at the issue of the writ in the detinue action to detain the ship, they are not entitled to detain the amount in court representing the ship after the decree in the limitation action, and has ordered the sum paid into court in the detinue action to be transferred to the credit of the limitation action. The effect of this is to deprive the defendants of the right of detainer, which they admittedly had at the commencement of the detinue action, even for the statutory amount of liability, and to leave them to share equally with the other claimants, in other words, to deprive them of the preferential position as regards other creditors in which they were put by sect. 94 of the Act of 1858.

This result the learned president thinks is produced by the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, s. 1 in conjunction with the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 503 and 504. Up to the Act of 1900 no limitation of liability applied to damage such as to that suffered by the defendants, but as I have shown, and as the president has decided, they were entitled to detain the ship for the full amount of the damage, as they are still if there be no limitation of liability, which might well happen in the case of a foreign owner with no property in this country but the ship. Now that shipping has fallen to a lower value, the position of a ship, whose value at 8*l.* a ton is 4468*l.*, being worth 34,000*l.*, cannot exist. [His Lordship then read the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 32), ss. 1, 2, and 3, and continued :] I have read sects. 2 and 3 because the learned president attaches some weight to them, but I cannot myself see their bearing on the position at issue. Sect. 3 applies the limitation to all claims however arising, but it does not deal in any way with their remedies or methods of recovering the limited amount. To determine the question of the right of the board, it is necessary to look at their position when the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 was passed and the effect of that Act upon their position ; it existed at any rate as early as the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sects. 404 and 514 of which Act correspond to sects. 503 and 504 of the Act of 1894, and the position as to limitation was therefore the same when the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 was passed as after the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It is true that the measure of limitation was not the same in 1854, the measure of 8*l.* per ton being introduced by the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, but the principle is the same. That position was that limitation of liability did not apply to claims by a dock authority for damage done to their property, and that such an authority had a right of lien on or detainer of the wrong-doing vessel until the whole amount of the damage was paid. This right might of course entirely deprive other claimants in respect of damage by the same accident of any compensation for the damage suffered by them, for the lien might very well exist in respect of an amount far greater than the value of the ship at 8*l.* per ton.

This being the position, it is in the next place necessary to see what alteration in the rights of the board was made by the Merchant Shipping Act 1900. The relevant section of that Act is sect. 1, which I have already read. That is in terms nothing more than a limitation of the amount which a dock authority can recover under sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 ; it does not in any way mention the lien given by the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858 for the damage, and, in my opinion, it has no other effect than to limit the amount for which the lien can be exercised. It seems to me that to be quite clear that the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 affects only the amount to be recovered ; it includes in the statutory limitation damage done to dock property, but it does not expressly or impliedly affect in any way the method of recovering the amount which is legally recoverable. I think its only effect is to limit the amount for which the ship may be determined to the statutory limit of 8*l.* per ton. The object of sect. 1 is only to limit the amount for which the shipowner is liable ; it is not in any way concerned with the way in which a legal right given to one creditor for the recovery of that amount may affect the rights of other claimants. No enactment was mentioned to us which in express terms deprives the defendants of their lien, but it was argued, and the learned president has held, that they are deprived of it by implication from the terms of sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It cannot be suggested that that section was passed in any way in view of this lien, for, as I have said, it is merely a repetition of a section existing in 1854, before the lien was created, and at a time when no limitation in respect of damage of this nature existed. To deprive any person of a lien expressly given by implication from a section passed in respect of other matters altogether seems to me unusual and to require very clear and distinct words raising that implication. I cannot find such words here.

Sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, like sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, merely limited the amount of the liability, and without any other section would have given a right to plead that limitation in defence. It seems, however, to have occurred to the framers of the Act that, where there were conflicting claims to which the limitation applied, great confusion might result if actions in respect of all claims were allowed to proceed in the face of that defence, and therefore sects. 504 and 514 were passed giving power to the court to determine the amount of the owners' liability and distribute that amount rateably—whatever may be the meaning of that word—among the claimants, to stay proceedings in actions, and do other things on such terms as to security and otherwise as the court shall think fit. Of course when the earlier of those sections was passed there was no right of lien in favour of any claimant to whom the Act applied, and no difficulty could occur in the working of that section. This is so now in the vast majority of cases, and the ordinary businesslike way of proceeding is for the shipowner to pay 8*l.* per ton into court, and for the court to distribute that amount pari passu amongst the claimants who, in ordinary cases, stand on the same footing. The provisions of sects. 504 and 514 are not, however, compulsory; the owner need not apply under them, and the court is not compelled to act under them, if to do so would work injustice to one of the claimants, and this would be the case if one of the claimants were thereby deprived of a lien of which they had not otherwise been deprived. The very word "may" in sect. 504 seems to me to carry the meaning "may if the circumstances permit," and not "shall whatever may be the circumstances and whatever the rights of the claimants whould otherwise be." The words in sect. 514 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, are very similar: "It shall be lawful . . . for the court . . . to entertain proceedings at the suit of any owner for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability . . . and for the distribution of such amount rateably. . . ." The position would be an extraordinary one: the defendants are not deprived of their lien by sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, but by that section and sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, coupled with two acts of the shipowner which he may or may not do according to his will—(i.) to limit his liability, and (ii.) if he do limit his liability to make an application under sect. 504—and coupled also with an act of the court—that is, to make an order distributing the amount at which the shipowners' liability has been determined pari passu among the claimants. I cannot think it can have been intended that a right of lien, expressly given by statute, should be destroyed by such an indirect implication as this. I think that the learned president has overlooked the fact that the provisions of sect. 504 are not compulsory, and has assumed that, in every case of limitation of liability, the shipowner is obliged to pay 8*l.* per ton into court for distribution among the claimants, irrespective of whether there is a lien on the ship or not. I am under this impression, because he seems to assume that the necessary consequence of holding the defendants entitled to a lien on the ship, or the deposit representing it, would be to compel the plaintiffs to pay the amount twice over. I think here the substitution of a sum of money, 5500*l.*, for the ship, has led to confusion. In law the defendants' lien, if it exist, is on the ship, and if they were holding it under a lien and an application were made by the shipowner under sect. 504, the court, in circumstances like these, where the amount of the lien exceeded the value of the ship, would not order the shipowner to pay any more, and, if it thought fit to stay the other claims, ought not, in my opinion, to require as a condition any security. It seems to me that the defendants were under no necessity to bring any action against the plaintiffs, or to bring in any claim under sect. 504. If I am right that their right of lien extended to the amount of their damage up to the statutory limit, there was no question in this case as to the amount due to them.

I have assumed up to this that the word "rateably" in sect. 504 means pari passu or proportionately to their damage, and it is necessary to do so in order to give any foundation at all to the plaintiffs', or rather, the other claimants' arguments. I do not, however, think that this is the necessary meaning. I think "rateably" may well mean "among all the claimants, having regard to any special right or remedy that any claimant may have, and in the absence of any such special right, proportionately to their damage." If this be the proper meaning, sect. 504 presents no difficulty to the plaintiffs, and the result to the other claimants is that which always follows where another creditor has a lien on the property out of which all claimants have to be satisfied. I prefer, however, to base my judgment on the ground which I have endeavoured to set out, that is to say, that it could not have been and was not intended to take away a right expressly given by statute by such an implication arising so indirectly and subject to such conditions.

The result is that, in my opinion, there is nothing in any of the legislation to take away the right of lien or detainer given by the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, or to affect it, except to limit the amount recoverable to the statutory limit, and that, therefore, the defendants are entitled to hold the amount in court representing the ship until payment is made to them for their damage, which is, in effect, payment to them of that sum. It follows that the order for the payment of that sum to the credit of the limitation action is wrong. It is not for me to consider the policy of giving preferential rights to public bodies like the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, but when such rights are given expressly and distinctly by a special Act, I think they ought not to be and cannot be taken away by difficulties which it is said they cause in the permissive working of general statutes not directed to this special point and passed alio intuitu, as sect. 504 must have been, for this state of things did not exist for years after it was passed.

It remains to deal with the limitation action, and I do not know that matters are made easier by the two actions being tried together. The first paragraph of the decree is right. I have already said that I think the second paragraph, so far as it orders the money in court to be paid to the credit of the action, is wrong, and it remains to deal with the other paragraphs of the plaintiffs' claim. I do not think that it follows, from the conclusion at which I have arrived, that the plaintiffs are bound to pay the amount, which they ask to pay, into court, or that the court is bound to order them to do so and then proceed to distribute that amount. No doubt that prayer, which is the usual one in ordinary circumstances, was put in to enable the plaintiffs to argue that a judgment in the detinue action in favour of the defendants would oblige the plaintiffs to pay 16*l.* per ton, and not 8*l.*, and to be contrary to the law as to limitation. I do not think that is the case. I think the court will have to deal with the matter on the footing that the plaintiffs have already paid up to the statutory amount of their liability and cannot be called upon to pay any more. It seems to me that the court can adopt one of two courses. It may refuse to stay the actions mentioned, and leave the plaintiffs to set up their limitation of liability as a defence, which they can do; or it may stay them without requiring any security or any money in court, on the ground that no good result can be produced by proceeding with them. In some cases there are great difficulties in setting up the statutory limitation as a defence, but I do not think that would be so in this case. It would be enough to plead that the statutory amount had already, by force of law, been paid in respect of that liability. I think, however, that in the circumstances the proper course is for the court to stay the actions without requiring security or the payment of money into court. I think the court has power to take such a course, if it appear that to allow the actions to proceed would only produce useless expense and no good result.

There is another point raised in this case which is of great, although not of equal, importance to the defendants, that is, whether they are entitled to detain the ship in respect of the expenses of securing and repairing her. This, as I have said, was agreed to 1048*l.*, and was paid into court under the order of the Court of Appeal, when the ship was released. If the defendants cannot recover this sum as expenses, they can possibly recover it as salvage, and the importance of the point arises because the regularity of the proceedings of the assistant marine surveyor is questioned. The matter depends upon the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1912 (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. xii.), s. 7. [His Lordship read the section.] The facts and arguments on this point are very clearly set out in the judgment of the learned president, and as I agree with him, I do not think it necessary to set them out again. I think his judgment on this point is right.

In my opinion the appeal should be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed, but as the other members of the court are of a different opinion on the first point, both appeal and cross-appeal are dismissed with costs.

ATKIN, L.J.—The issues raised in this case are of importance to shipowners and dock companies, and present complications which make it very necessary carefully to consider the facts. [His Lordship stated them, and continued:] The rights of the respective parties appear to have been as follows: (i.) The defendants had a maritime lien against the Countess for damage done to their dock gates. This lien they might have enforced by proceedings against the Countess. They have taken no such proceedings; and in their counter-claim in the detinue action they seek for no relief in respect of their maritime lien, or any rights in personam. The defendant's sole rights now in respect of any such damage, except as expressed by statute, would be confined to sharing rateably in the distribution in the limitation suit. (ii.) The owners of the barges had a maritime lien against the Countess for damage done. This they have enforced by proceeding in rem in which bail has been given. The Countess was thereupon freed from their lien and from any liability to arrest in respect of the claims for which bail was given. All these actions have been properly stayed in the limitation suit, and the sole right of these claimants is to share rateably in whatever distribution is made in that suit. (iii.) Subject to their having complied with the formalities prescribed by sect. 7 of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1912, the defendants were entitled to detain the Countess in respect of wreck expenses, and to sell her in order to recoup themselves those expenses. The rights of the defendants over the ship are now transferred, under the order of the Court of Appeal, to the sum in court representing the estimated amount of those expenses. The limitation suit does not in any way affect the defendants' rights to these expenses, and the sole question for determination is whether the statutory conditions have been complied with. (iv.) Under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, s. 94, the defendants were entitled to detain the Countess until the damage done to the dock gates has been paid for. This they continued to do until the above-mentioned order of the Court of Appeal. Under the order the money paid into court was to be treated as though it represented the deposit which, under the section, it was the alternative right of the defendants to receive and retain until the entire amount of the damage was paid. The result of the order seems to be that the defendants no longer are deemed to retain the ship, but are deemed to retain the deposit on the terms of the section.

What, then, are the rights of the defendants under the section? (a) They have only a right to detain the ship, or, as now, to retain the deposit until payment. They have no right to realise the ship or pay themselves out of the deposit. In other words, they are given by a statute a possessory lien. (b) The statutory right appears to be a right paramount to previously attaching maritime liens. This was the decision of the court in The Emilie Millon (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 162; 93 L. T. Rep. 692; (1905) 2 K. B. 817) in respect of the dock company's powers under sect. 253 of their Act, to detain ships until dock tonnage rates are paid. I am unable to distinguish such power of detention from the power to detain for dock damage under sect. 94, and I must accept the decision as binding on us. (c) They have no power to determine for themselves what the amount of the damage is, on payment of which the right of detention ceases. This was expressly admitted before us by counsel for the board, and in any case seems clear. The amount of the damage when in dispute must, therefore, be determined by some appropriate legal tribunal and on legal principles. (d) I think it follows from the above that if the amount of damage recoverable is limited by statute, the limited amount is the amount for which the board may detain, and the right to detention ceases when that limited amount of damage is paid. I can see no difference in this respect between a maritime lien for collision damage and a statutory possessory lien for collision damage.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 503, provides that the owner of a ship shall not, where any loss or damage is caused to another ship by reason of improper navigation, be liable in damages in respect of damage to vessels beyond an aggregate amount not exceeding 8*l.* per ton. It is in fact common ground that the defendants cannot detain the Countess, and cannot detain the deposit for more damages than the aggregate amount of the limited liability of the owners. I think it also follows that the board are also bound by the provisions of sect. 504, and can only claim a rateable share of the total liability of the owners. Again, I see no distinction between the maritime lien and the statutory lien. It is to be noticed that the section as to rateable distribution applies, notwithstanding that one or more of the damage claimants have arrested the ship and are actively enforcing the maritime lien. But in truth the matter seems to be finally disposed of in the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, s. 3. The Act applies the limitation of liability to liability for damage to docks, and sect. 3 says that the limitations of liability under the Act is to apply "whether the liability arises at common law or under any general or private Act of Parliament and notwithstanding anything contained in such Act." It is in this respect that I differ reluctantly from the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. Once it is conceded that the limitation of liability applies to the lien so as to limit the amount of damage for which the ship can be held, I can see no logical ground for restricting the full operation of the statute. If 10,000*l.*, the full damage, is to be reduced at all, it appears to me that it must be reduced not merely to 4468*l.*, but to the board's rateable proportion of 4468*l.* I see nothing, however, in the limitation of liability Acts to deprive the board of the advantage of their possessory lien, whether exercised over the ship, or over a deposit made under sect. 94 of the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858. I think that they are entitled to exercise that lien until they are in fact paid the rateable amount of the total liability to which they are entitled under the limitation of liability Acts. The money paid into court in the detinue action should remain in court in that action. Except by consent, I see no power to transfer it to the credit of the limitation suit. I regret this part of my decision, for it is obvious that the board for all practical purposes will always be sufficiently secured by the sum paid into court in the limitation suit. Statutory rights, however, are not to be abrogated except by plain enactment, and it is sufficient to assume that in a great shipping port such a representative body as the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board are not likely to exercise their rights unconscionably or so as to embarrass shipowners unreasonably.

The point as to wreck expenses can be disposed of shortly. It is clear that the board acted with care and prudence in taking the steps they did to prevent the stranded Countess from being a danger to navigation. The objection that was pressed on us was the technical objection that the judgment of the assistant surveyor, that the vessel was a danger to navigation, was formed when the vessel was afloat and was at that time neither a wreck nor stranded. I reserve consideration of whether a vessel, holed by collision, in imminent peril of sinking, and out of control, is a wreck. It is plain from the evidence that the assistant surveyor of the board formed his judgment on the basis that the vessel, although then afloat, must, under the circumstances, inevitably be beached.

It seems to me impossible to give effect to the contention of the plaintiffs in this matter without putting such a narrow and unreasonable construction on the statute as would seriously limit its useful operation. I think, therefore, that the decree of the president should be amended in respect of the transfer of the sum in court from the detinue action to the limitation suit, but that, in substance, the appeal fails, and that the cross-appeal should be dismissed. The order of the court in the appeal in the detinue suit is that the decree of the president be varied by omitting the order for transfer of the sum of 4451*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, to the credit of the limitation suit, and by adding an order that such sum remain in court until further order, with liberty to either party to apply as to payment out, and subject to such variation, that the appeal of the board and the cross-appeal of the owners of the Countess be dismissed with costs.

In the appeal in the limitation suit the order of the court is that the decree of the president be varied by omitting the words from "upon the transfer to the credit of this action" down to "making together the sum of 4468*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*," and substituting "upon payment into court of the sum of 4468*l.* 4*s.* 9*d.*," and that, subject to such variation, the appeal of the board be dismissed with costs.

Younger, L.J.—There have been in this litigation very serious issues of detinue raised between the owners of the Countess on the one hand—I shall in this judgment refer to them as the "owners"—and the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board on the other. These issues were decided against the owners by the learned president. They were made the subject of a cross-appeal before us. I agree with my Lord and the Lord Justice that they were rightly decided against the owners, and that their cross-appeal with reference to them fails. I dispose of those issues at the very outset, although they were only the subject of a cross-appeal, in order at once to emphasise the fact that these have been throughout the only issues in this litigation in which the owners had any primary interest.

The issue which remains for consideration is one not merely of difficulty, but, to the board, of permanent interest and of great importance, and to the barge-owners of vital consequence ; but it is for the owners, as it has turned out, of little moment in any view of the case. It is, I think, now agreed that their maximum liability in respect of all claims arising from the negligence of those on board the Countess on the 5th June 1920, has been effectually limited to the sum of 8*l.* for each ton of her registered tonnage. That sum the owners have found, and as directed by the Court of Appeal, they have paid it into court, and they have had their vessel released. No one contends that they can be required to make any further final payment on that account ; while, as the admitted claims against the payment already made far exceed the whole fund, they have no further concern in its proper distribution.

That proper distribution is the remaining important issue to which I have referred, and on that it is the barge-owners who are in acute controversy with the board. These barge-owners, in consequence of the negligence of those on board the Countess on the day in question, have sustained damage amounting in the aggregate to a sum far exceeding any sustained by the board on the same occasion, and for the satisfaction of their claims they can only now look to their proper share of the compensation fund. But the board claim the whole of that fund for themselves. If, therefore, the contentions of the board be sustained, the barge-owners will, in respect of their loss, receive no compensation at all, and the whole of the only fund to which recourse for the purpose can be had will go to or be retained by the board. And yet by a series of fatalities in procedure, amounting almost to a record of invincible mischance, this issue of such vital concern to the barge-owners has throughout been staged and contested as if they had no concern in its result. It has been raised and fought in the detinue action between the owners and the board, an action to which the barge-owners were in no sense either parties or privies. It was to the credit of that action that the compensation fund stood. It was so paid into court by an order made without notice to the barge-owners. The limitation suit, in which an appearance on behalf of the barge-owners was entered, and in which alone, any claim is competent to them, was uncontested by the board either by pleadings or, so far as I can find, at the trail. The barge-owners were not made respondents to the notice of appeal of the board from the learned president's judgment in the detinue action in which the ultimate destination of the limitation fund was dealt with, and on which appeal the board claim payment of it to themselves. The barge-owners are not even made parties to the notice of appeal of the board from the order of the president in a limitation suit. How, in short, it has come about that all through the real position of the barge-owners with reference to this fund has been so completely lost sight of, I cannot even conjecture. It is true that, as a matter of courtesy I presume, their solicitors were informed by the solicitor of the board of the pendency of the appeals as raising, I suppose, a discussion sufficiently intimate to justify a watching, if not an active, interest on their part ; and it was doubtless in consequence of that informal intimation that counsel attended the court on the barge-owners' behalf, and, after the board and the owners had by their counsel contested the questions at issue, did they, at the invitation of my Lord, present to us the views of the barge-owners. Their counsel's presence, and the assistance he rendered upon the appeals, probably removes any technical difficulty in the way of our now dealing with a question in which throughout the barge-owners should have been protagonists. Nevertheless, I myself doubt very much whether the failure throughout the proceedings properly to recognise their position with reference to this part of the case, has not coloured all through, and to their prejudice, the course of the discussions. It has certainly, I think, tended to concentrate attention on the question whether the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, could be construed so as to deprive the board of their statutory rights against the owners under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act 1858, s. 94, and has diverted consideration from the same question framed as the barge-owners would frame it, namely, whether that same sect. 94 remains effective to enable the board, when included for the first time by the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, as claimants upon a limited compensation fund, to sweep away for themselves, as in this case, not a rateable proportion of the fund, but the whole of it, leaving for the barge-owners, the remaining claimants, nothing at all. It may well seem to some minds that this consequence of the Act of 1900 is as startling as the other would be. In any case, the true effect of the statute on the position of the board under their own Act cannot, as I think, be ascertained with any confidence unless the balance between these opposing considerations is throughout strictly maintained. This I shall attempt to do in what follows.

The question to be considered as the president has phrased it, is one as to the effect upon the powers of the board, under sect. 94 of their Act of 1858, of the statutory provisions for limitation of liability embodied in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, ss. 503 and 504, as extended by the Merchant Shipping Act 1900, ss. 1 and 3, by which last-mentioned statute liability for such damage as was here done to the docks of the board is brought within liabilities capable of limitation under sects. 503 and 504 of the earlier Act. Is the board's right of detention, given them by sect. 94 of their earlier Act of 1858, taken away by these sections of the Merchant Shipping Acts in a case like the present? Does the lien upon the vessel created by sect. 94 survive, notwithstanding the fact that the owners have obtained a declaration of limitation of liability? If it does, is it a lien for the whole amount of their damage, or for the whole of the limitation fund if that be less than their damage, or only for their due proportion of that fund rateably with the other claimants upon it? It will be convenient to deal with the sections in their inverse order. The Merchant Shipping Act 1900, s. 1, while clearly bringing the liability of the owners of the damage done to the dock gates of the board, within the class of liabilities capable of limitation, does not specifically refer to dock or canal owners or harbour authorities as being thereby affected. By sect. 2, however, these dock or canal owners and harbour authorities are expressly mentioned and are in terms enabled to limit their own liability for damage caused to vessels by the negligence of their servants, and it cannot be doubted, I think, that the two sections, so far as these owners and authorities are concerned, are complimentary, the one to the other, a circumstance lending point to sect. 3 which, referring to the limitation of liability "under this Act," that is, under both sects. 1 and 2, enacts that such limitation of liability "shall apply whether the liability arises at common law or under any general or private Act of Parliament, and notwithstanding anything contained in such Act." These last words, of course, directly and immediately apply to the board so as to reduce any statutory liability of the board, as limited by sect. 2, to the amount thereby defined. On the other hand, their presence makes it less difficult to conclude that the provisions of such Acts are not to stand in the way, so far as they give rights in respect of compensation against the owners out of accord with the position of the board as claimants against the limitation fund to which sect. 1, in a proper case, relegates them.

I come now to sects. 503 and 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Certain characteristic features of these sections have from time to time been observed upon in judgments dealing either with them or with similar sections in earlier statutes which these have now superseded. It may not be amiss to refer to some of these observations with reference to the sections. Lord Sumner, in Canadian Pacific Railway v. Storstad (owners), said (14 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 530; 122 L. T. Rep., at p. 442; (1920) A. C. at p. 401): "Limitation of liability is the creation of statute. It is a provision in favour of the shipowner, and operates to restrict the rights of those to whom he is liable. Incidentally, the sections furnish the rule by which to determine the rights of parties interested in the fund created by the operation of the sections themselves, but if the shipowner, for whatsoever reason, does not bring the sections into operation, no one else can do so, and they do not in such case have effect." Next, it is to be observed that the claimants against the fund are by sect. 504 to rank rateably, and I have not myself found any case in which this has not brought about a ranking pari passu. The language of that section is a description of the procedure adopted by the Court of Chancery in the administration and division of a deficient fund amongst claimants, ascertained by that court in accordance with its invariable procedure. It was the Court of Chancery by which, in England, the powers of sect. 514 of the Act of 1854, were to be exercised, and its former procedure, now open to adoption by any division of the High Court, is the procedure still pointed at in the present section. The earlier cases in the section are cases in the Court of Chancery, and one of the earliest in which this question of priority arose was Leycester v. Logan (1857, 3 K. & J. 446), before Lord Hatherley, then Sir Page Wood, V.-C. In that case the defendant Logan, by proceedings in Admiralty, had obtained the advantage of sentence against the ship doing the damage, he thereby obtaining, as the Vice-Chancellor put it, security for his costs with which the limitation sections did not enable the court to deal. But although he had also thereby obtained security for his whole claim, Lord Hatherley held that the sections did enable the court to deal with that security, and he held that the defendant's security was, by virtue of these sections and the limitation decree, limited to his rateable share of the amount to be paid, and he gave directions for the transfer into court of the proceeds of sale of the ship, there to be dealt with under the sections. Here we have an instance of a claimant with a security being deprived of any priority over other claimants against the fund "created," as Lord Sumner says, "by the operation of the sections themselves."

Speaking for myself, I cannot doubt that the language of sect. 504 points to rateable pari passu distribution amongst the claimants. This must, I think, be the normal case. Leycester v. Logan (3 K. & J. 446) shows that the principle obtains even as against a claimant with a pre-existing security. The Scotch case of Rankine v. Raschen (4 R. 725), where the purchaser of a claim was subrogated against the fund to the rights of the original claimant, irrespective of the sum he had paid for those rights, establishes the same, and not, as seems to have been contended, the opposite principle. And I find the same principle carried out by the Court of Appeal in Jenkins v. Great Central Railway, reported apparently only in the Shipping Gazette, and cited in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. 26, p. 614. I specially refer to that case because the procedure adopted there might not be inappropriate here on one view of the board's position. In that case a cargo-owner had succeeded in the court of first instance in a claim against a shipowner for loss of cargo consequent on collision. The whole amount due under the judgment was paid into court as a condition of stay pending appeal. Notice of appeal was given, but subsequently the shipowner, having, after the judgment, obtained a limitation decree and paid into court the full amount for which he was liable under the Merchant Shipping Acts, asked leave to withdraw his appeal, claimed to have the money he had paid in returned to him, and sought an order that the cargo-owner should be left to satisfy his claim out of the limitation fund. The Court of Appeal is stated to have held that the shipowner was entitled to the payment out and to the order he sought.

But the matter may be stated more broadly. It seems to me that the idea of priorities amongst the claimants against a limitation fund is inconsistent with the principle underlying sect. 504 itself. That is a section designed for the protection of the shipowner, who is himself free from personal fault. On the terms that in the limitation suit he puts up or provides a fund equal to the prescribed limit of his statutory liability, the shipowner and his property are, as a result of the court's decree, relieved of all claims in respect of the act of negligent navigation in question competent to anyone who can be reached by the court's order. All such claimants, if they would receive their share of the fund, must prove their claim in the suit. Independent actions against the shipowner by any claimants are stayed. Any security for his claim, obtained by a claimant as a result of any such action, ceases to be either valuable or appropriate, because security for every claimant to the full extent of the shipowner's limited liability is now provided in the limitation suit to which and to the fund there all claimants must now resort for satisfaction. They may resort to no other fund. If they were permitted to do so, the shipowner would not enjoy the protection aimed at and provided for him by the section. And as against that fund the only condition of ranking is that the claimant shall establish his claim. Thereupon he becomes entitled to his rateable share as soon as all other claims upon the fund have been ascertained. A security upon any other property of the shipowner can be of no advantage to a claimant against the fund, and priority of ranking against the fund itself is not contemplated by the section. Equality here is equity.

Remembering that it is to such a fund so administered, that the board are now by the Merchant Shipping Act 1900 relegated in respect of their present claim against the owners, we may proceed to consider the effect of that situation upon the rights of the board under sect. 94 of their Act of 1858, passed, of course, in view of no such state of things. How far are these rights necessarily modified by the fact that the claims of the board against a shipowner for injury done by his ship to their property are now a subject of limitation under the Merchant Shipping Acts? I apprehend that their rights under the section must, for the future, be exercised with full reference to that fact, and in due subordination to the privileges of the owner under these Acts, as so extended.

That being, as I conceive, the general principle to be applied, I will now proceed to consider the application of it more in detail. And first, for the reason that the sections in question of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, have no effect unless the shipowner chooses to bring them into operation, it follows that, except in that instance, and it will, I imagine, be of infrequent occurrence in cases of damage done by a vessel to dock property, sect. 94 of the Act of 1858 remains in full force. This again involves that the section remains in full force until these sections have effect; and in my judgment, that moment certainly does not arrive until a decree of limitation has been made. Until that moment it cannot be known whether the decree will be finally asked for, or whether, if asked for, the shipowner will be entitled to it, or whether it will be made.

It is, however, I understand now conceded by the board that when such a decree is made, the deposit capable of being retained by them can never exceed the amount of the limitation fund. They concede that the provision of sect. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, that the owners shall not be liable beyond that amount, must at least to that extent have full effect notwithstanding the provisions of sect. 94 of their Act of 1858, which fixes the deposit as being that of a sum equal in amount to the claim or demand made by the board for the estimated amount of the damage done by the vessel to their property. The board do not therefore now contend—they could not, I think, do so with success—that on a decree for limitation being made they retain any lien for the whole of their damage. The sole question, therefore, now is whether they have a lien to the extent of the whole of the limitation fund, if less than their damage, or only for their due proportion of that fund rateably with the other claimants upon it; and after decree made and fund provided in the limitation suit, whether they have any lien at all. In my opinion they certainly have not more than a lien for their due proportion. The operation of the sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which is effective to reduce the deposit, must be effective also, as I think, to reduce their share of it. I can see no true distinction between the position of the board and that of the defendant in Leycester v. Logan (sup.), or of other claimants with a pre-existing maritime lien. I am led to this conclusion on a consideration of the general principles underlying sect. 504, to which I have already referred. In my opinion these are quite inconsistent with the retention of a lien for any larger amount. It is said, I know, that this conclusion involves a serious interference with the board's statutory rights never, at least in terms, repealed. I feel greatly the force of that view held as it is by my Lord, but I cannot myself resist the conclusion that an alternative, which would preserve intact and paramount the board's lien over the deposit, even extinguishing, as in the present case, all interest in the fund of all other claimants, involves an interference with what I conceive to be the position of those claimants under the Merchant Shipping Acts, far more drastic and far-reaching. Indeed, if I followed my own view alone, I should in this case be ready to go as far as the learned president has gone, and would direct now the transfer of the limitation fund from the credit of the detinue action to that of the limitation action, on the ground that, so soon as the fund is constituted in the limitation action after decree made, all right on the part of the board to retain their deposit is at an end. On the view I am disposed to take the board's position, Jenkins v. Great Central Railway (sup.) would justify an application by the owners to have the deposit paid out to them so soon as an equivalent amount had been paid to the credit of the limitation action in accordance with their own submission to make it, and to require that payment to be made in the present case would be mere circuity of procedure. But I recognise that this course, convenient though it may be, and not without justification as I must think it is, does disregard the provisions of sect. 94 of the Act of 1858, further than is strictly necessary for the working of the limitation procedure, even although it deprives the board of no substantial benefit.

I acquiesce, therefore, although not without some reluctance, in the course proposed by the Lord Justice, who is of opinion that the board cannot be required to part with their deposit until they have actually received in the limitation action their proportionate part of the fund in satisfaction of their claim.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Construction—Vessel chartered by sellers—"Expected ready to load late September"—Grounds for expectation—Absence of reasonable grounds—Delay—Frustration of contract.

Sellers, who had chartered a steamship which had left Norfolk, Virginia, for Rio de Janeiro with coal, and was to go on to the river Plate in ballast, contracted on the 20th Sept. 1920 to sell to K. M. and Co. 1000 tons of clipped La Plata oats for shipment from the river Plate. The contract contained the following clause: "Shipment in good condition per first-class steamer I., expected ready to load late September." The steamer experienced engine trouble, and had not arrived at Rio at the date of the contract. She left Rio on the 29th Oct., and the sellers stated that she would arrive in the river Plate about the 12th Nov. The buyers claimed that the delay had frustrated the contract. The matter was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators found that the statement "expected ready to load late September" was not justified, and that the delay was so great as to frustrate the contract.

Held, that the finding of the arbitrators must be taken to mean that the sellers could not have had an honest expectation founded on reasonable grounds that the vessel would be ready to load by late September. The arbitrators were justified in that finding, and their award must be upheld.

Appeal from a decision of McCardie, J.

On the 20th Sept. 1920 Messrs. Sanday and Co. contracted to sell to Messrs. Keighley, Maxted, and Co. 1000 tons of clipped La Plata oats for shipment from the river Plate. The contract contained a clause as follows: "Shipment in good condition per first-class steamer Indianapolis, expected ready to load late September." The sellers, Sanday and Co., had chartered the Indianapolis, and she had left Norfolk, Virginia, for Rio de Janeiro with a cargo of coal on the 10th Aug., to go on to the river Plate in ballast. She experienced engine trouble, and at the date of the contract had not arrived at Rio. She left Rio on the 29th Oct., and on the 2nd Nov. the sellers informed the buyers that she was expected to arrive in the river Plate about the 12th Nov. The buyers replied that as the delay had been so great, the contract could not be performed according to the words, "expected ready to load late September."

The matter was referred to the Appeal Committee of the London Corn Trade Association, who found as a fact that at the date of the contract the steamer was already overdue at Rio, and that there was no prospect of her being ready to load in the river Plate in late September; that the statement, "expected ready to load late September," was not justified, and that the delay was in fact so great as to frustrate the contract.

McCardie, J. affirmed the award. He was of opinion that the statement amounted to a condition, and that though there was a certain latitude, yet if that latitude were exceeded, the condition became operative, and the contract ceased to bind the buyers. He found that at the date of the contract the position of the vessel was such that the sellers could not reasonably have expected her to be ready to load in the river Plate at the time indicated.

The sellers appealed.

Lord Sterndale, M.R.—It is not open to this court to interfere with the findings of the arbitrators on what were in effect findings of fact unless the arbitrators have adopted a wrong view, and have misdirected themselves on the findings. The real question is as to what is the meaning of the words "expected ready to load late September." Counsel for the respondents has suggested three possible meanings: (1) That the words have an objective meaning—that the vessel must in fact be at the time in such a position that any ordinary man who knew her position would expect her to be able to load at the end of September; (2) That "expected" meant expected by the sellers, and not necessarily by the shipping world generally; (3) That the sellers honestly, though without good grounds, expected that the vessel would be in the river Plate by the end of September. It is difficult to see how the third suggested meaning differs from the second, because if a man could honestly expect the vessel to be there, it could hardly be without some knowledge on which to base that expectation. The first meaning does not seem to be the correct one, for any ordinary man would certainly read the words as meaning the expectation of the party putting in the clause. In my view, the second suggested meaning is the right one, that is, that in view of the facts known to the seller at the time, the expectation was one which he could have held honestly and on reasonable grounds. That is very largely a question of degree. If the voyage had been one of, perhaps, a month, and the seller had no news of the chartered ship for two or three days after the time of her expected arrival, it would be difficult to say that he had no reasonable grounds for expecting that she would arrive at the proper time. On the other hand, if she were a very long time overdue, he would not be justified in the expectation, because it would have been brought home to him that something abnormal had happened. It, therefore, becomes really a question of fact, and the arbitrators have found that on the 20th Sept. the sellers had no grounds for expecting that the vessel could load by the date specified. The meaning of that finding seems to me to be that the sellers could not have an honest expectation founded on reasonable grounds. It is not enough that the expectation was honest. It must be founded upon some reasonable grounds in order to justify its being held. On the whole, it seems to me that the arbitrators were justified in their findings, and they were findings with which this Court cannot interfere.

Warrington, L.J.—It has been contended for the buyers that, upon the true construction of the contract, the phrase "expected ready to load" must have an objective meaning, that is to say, that the vessel could not be said to be "expected ready to load" by a given date unless, according to the actual facts of her position, whether known to the parties or not, she could be said to be in such a position that the expectation would probably be realised. That does not appear to be the true construction. The phrase resulted from the desire to give the buyers some idea of the period of the year when it was likely that they would receive delivery, and it was a case where the sellers took upon themselves to say what might reasonably be expected; and, in my view, words so inserted mean that it was in the mind of the sellers that the expectation existed. Assuming that to be so, what is the kind of expectation that the sellers must properly have? In my opinion it must, first of all, be an honest expectation, and, secondly, it must be based upon reasonably sufficient grounds. The sellers must expect, and must have reasonable grounds for expecting, that their representation will be realised. The arbitrators have based their decision upon that view of the contract, for they have found that the vessel had no chance of loading at the date specified, and that the sellers could not have expected her to be ready to load at that date. The arbitrators have not proceeded upon any wrong basis of law, and they have made findings of fact with which this court cannot interfere. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

*Charter-party—Exceptions clause—Construction—General followed by particular words—"Et cetera"—*Ejusdem generis rule.

Where general words in an exceptions clause in a charter-party are followed by particular words, the ejusdem generis rule should not be applied.

A charter-party contained the following exceptions clause: "Should the vessel be detained by causes over which the charterers have no control, viz., ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo has been taken over, &c., no demurrage is to be charged and lay-days not to count." The chartered vessel was detained for a number of days beyond the lay-days by a strike of dock labourers at the port of discharge. Upon a claim for demurrage,

Held, that the governing words of the clause were "causes over which the charterers have no control," the particular causes mentioned being merely instances to which, as they followed the general words, the ejusdem generis rule ought not to be applied, and that the words "et cetera" only meant "and so on," and had not the effect of getting rid of the preceding general words.

Decision of McCardie, J. reversed.

APPEAL by the charterers from a decision of McCardie, J. upon a case stated by an arbitrator.

The following statement of the facts is substantially taken from the judgment of the learned judge. The point arises under two charter-parties, one of a ship called the Ambatielos, the other of the Penagis. Both vessels were chartered from ports in the East to Amsterdam or Rotterdam. The charter of the first vessel provided that the cargo should be loaded and discharged in fourteen weather-working days, reversible, and in the case of the second in twenty weather-working days, reversible. Both charters contained the following clause: "Time at loading and (or) discharging port to count twenty-four hours after steamer's arrival at or off the port, whether in berth or not, or in harbour, or roads, or as near the port as the authorities will allow, notwithstanding any custom of the port or law of the country, or anything contrary in this charter. Should the vessel be detained by causes over which the charterers have no control, viz., quarantine, ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo is taken over, &c., no demurrage is to be charged and lay-days not to count." The charter-party of the Ambatielos gave twenty days' demurrage at 500*l.* a day, and that of the Penagis provided that she should be allowed twenty days' demurrage at 350*l.* a day. The Ambatielos arrived at Rotterdam early in 1920, and was there detained for forty and a half days beyond the lay-days allowed by the charter-party. The Penagis also arrived at Rotterdam and was there detained for forty-six days beyond the lay-days. The claims for demurrage were referred to Mr. Raeburn, K.C., who in his award said: "I find as a fact that the sole cause of the detention of each steamer as aforesaid was a general strike of dock labourers at Rotterdam which prevailed from the 14th Feb. to the 28th April 1920. I further find as a fact that the said strike was a cause over which the charterers had no control and that but for the said strike the said steamships could and would have been discharged within their lay-days." The charterers contended that they were protected by the clause above referred to, but the arbitrator found against them and awarded that they should pay the owners 43,450*l.* demurrage and damages for detention.

McCardie, J., upheld the award of the umpire.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord STERNDALE, M.R.—In this case a very large sum of money depends upon an unintelligible clause in a charter-party. When I say unintelligible, I do not think it would be very difficult to interpret it, if we were in a natural atmosphere and were at liberty to say what we thought it meant, but in matters of this kind we are not. We are in an artificial atmosphere composed of ejusdem generis and of vagueness and want of precision in the interpretation of exceptions. [His Lordship stated the facts and referred to the exceptions clause in the charter-party, and continued :] The steamer was delayed by a strike which prevented her from being discharged, and the question is whether the strike is covered by that clause which I have read. Now if I were reading that clause apart from other decisions I do not think I should have any doubt whatever as to what it meant, and that when the parties started by saying : " Should the vessel be detained by causes over which the charterers have no control," they meant by that to define the class of cases which would excuse the charterer, and that the other words which follow did not deprive them of the protection given by those words. But the learned judge has held, I think, two things. He has held that the large exception " by causes over which the charterers have no control " is controlled by the ejusdem generis doctrine which he applies to the following words : " videlicet, quarantine, ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo is taken over, etc." as constituting a genus. They strike one off-hand as being very dissimilar things, but the genus which he says comprehends them all is, I think, this, that they are all the effect of a regulated, and ordered action of a constituted authority, either human or divine : —quarantine, the authorities of the port ; ice and hurricanes, the forces of nature ; blockade, the action of an authority ; and clearing of the steamer, the action of the customs authorities. I confess that it seems very difficult indeed to find any genus which will include all these matters.

Then I think he has held that, that being so, the " etc." which follows them must mean " and other like causes." I am sorry to say I do not agree with either of those views. Then he has also, I think, held that in any event the clause is so vague that it does not protect the charterer, because it does not come within the very well-established doctrine, that if a man wishes to bring himself within an exception, he must show clearly that the exception applies to him.

The first difficulty which I feel in applying the doctrine of ejusdem generis to this case is that in this case, unlike any other which has been cited to us, and from answers given by counsel during the argument, I think, unlike any case which is known to any of them, the specific words follow the general words and do not precede them. In all the ejusdem generis cases, so far as I know, the clause consists of the enumeration of a number of particular things, and then a clause following— " and all other causes " or " all causes beyond the charterer's control," and in many of those cases it has been held that those general words, following a line of particular words, are to be read as being of the same kind as the particular words. In some cases it has been held that they must not be so read, and the difficulty of reconciling the decisions arises from the fact that the difference in the wording of the clauses where the doctrine has been applied, and where it has not, are so minute that it is very difficult indeed to trace a principle amongst them, but I have the fact that what was here intended by the parties to be the class or genus of the events which protect the charterers comes first, which makes a great deal of difference. I do not say that you cannot apply the ejusdem generis rule in any case where the general words come first. There is no case, however, that I know of, in which it has been so applied, and it is obviously very difficult to apply. Therefore, I think that in this case you start with this—that the primary thing which the parties were contemplating was " causes over which the charterers have no control." Is that cut down, or is that in fact done away with by the words which follow ? I doubt very much whether the parties considered the exact meaning of " videlicet " or the exact meaning of " etc." when they put those words in. I am not at all sure that they did not think that " videlicet " meant the same thing as exempli gratia. They have put it in, and we must interpret it as best we can. I do not think we get much assistance, if any, from considering what the meaning of the words in question might be in classical Latin. I do not know that charter-parties of this description existed in the days of classical Latin. I have never seen one, nor am I sure that we get very great help from the meaning given in dictionaries such as Murray's Dictionary, which was cited. They are used loosely—I will not say commercially, as meaning the same thing—but they are used loosely by commercial men without considering very accurately what their meaning is.

The argument in support of the learned judge's judgment was put before us, I think, in this way, in stages. It was said that if there were no exceptions the charterers would be liable. If the only exception were causes beyond the charterers' control then the charterers would be protected. If the words following "causes over which the charterers have no control," that is "quarantine, ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo is taken over" stood without the "etc." that would cut down the general words so as to take away the protection, or prevent the charterers from being protected. The last stage is that the word "etc." is too vague to do away with the cutting-down effect, if I may call it so, of these particular words. It was put before us, by the junior counsel for the respondents, very clearly and ably, but I do not think myself that that is quite the right way to look at the matter. I do not think that you can arrive at the interpretation of a clause like this by cutting it up into pieces, and considering each piece by itself, and the effect which each piece might have upon the other pieces, if the others stood by themselves at first, and then were joined together. I think we must look at the whole clause as it stands, and looking at it in that way, in my opinion, the governing words are "causes over which the charterers have no control." Then there follows, "namely, quarantine, ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo is taken over, etc." and "etc." in my opinion, simply means "and so on." I think that was suggested by one member of the court during the argument. Although they are introduced by "videlicet" and not by exempli gratia, I think all that is meant to be done, and all that is done by those words is to set out a number of instances finishing up with "etc." to include others that are not named—instances which come under the words with which they start—"causes over which the charterers have no control." If there be any question of genus here, I think that is the genus, but I do not think it is a question of genus. Those are the governing words, and the others are, in my opinion, however incorrectly the Latin words may have been used, only instances or examples of the matters that come under that general clause.

Then the last point that was taken was that in any case this was so ambiguous that the charterers could not say they were protected by it, because a charterer must protect himself by unambiguous language. That is a well-established doctrine, but it is so difficult to know what language is unambiguous.

Perhaps the difficulty is exemplified more clearly than anywhere else in Rosin and Turpentine Import Company v. Jacobs and Sons (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 231, 260, 363; 101 L. T. Rep. 56; 102 L. T. Rep. 81). In that case the learned judge in the court of first instance thought the matter was so ambiguous that the exception could not apply. One learned judge in the Court of Appeal agreed with him, and the two others disagreed, and thought it was quite plain. It then went to the House of Lords where one noble and learned Lord thought it was too ambiguous for the exception to apply, and the four other noble learned Lords thought it was quite plain, so that it is very difficult indeed to say what is ambiguous and what is not, and I do not think any test can be applied, except that of the person who is dealing with it. If it does not seem ambiguous to him, I am afraid that the only thing he can say is—"It may seem ambiguous to others, but it does not to me." That is the opinion I have formed upon this clause. I think that, properly looked at, the governing idea throughout is this: the charterer is to be protected from detention from causes which are beyond his control, and that governing idea is not got rid of, for the reasons I have given, by the subsequent words. Therefore I think that the appeal should be allowed, and it takes the form of answering a question in the learned arbitrator's award in a sense different from that in which he answers it. The appellants will have the costs of the appeal.

Warrington, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In the present case the two ships were detained by causes over which the charterers had no control. Under the charter-party in that event the charterers are excused from payment of demurrage, and the question raised is whether the words of the charter-party by which they claim exemption are sufficient to give them that exemption. There is no question that there has been applied to charter-parties and bills of lading an artificial rule of construction which, in Scrutton, L.J.'s book (Scrutton on Charter-parties and Bills of Lading (9th edit., p. 221), is stated in these terms: "Where specific words are followed and amplified by the addition of general words, the latter are to be confined in their application to things of the same kind as the preceding specific words," and, further than that, I think it has been established that where a clause in that form is found in such a document as we have to construe, the court ought not to depart from that which, under the artificial rule, is the accepted meaning of such a clause without clear and unambiguous words enabling them to give another meaning to it.

For the last principle I refer to the case of Herman v. Morris (35 Times L. Rep. 574) in this court—I shall have something to say upon that case presently. In my opinion however, such a construction gives an unnatural meaning to the words used. Ask any intelligent person, familiar with the English language, what is the meaning of such a clause as this which I am going to read: "except strikes, lock-outs, accidents to railway, and also other causes beyond the charterers' control." I think there is no doubt that the intelligent lay person, familiar with the English language, would say that that excepts all causes not within the charterers' control, but the artificial rule says: No, it does not. It only excepts such causes as are ejusdem generis with those which are expressly specified.

There is also another principle which has been expressed by Lord Esher, M.R., in Anderson v. Anderson (64 L. J. Q. B., at p. 459; (1895) 1 Q. B., at p. 753), which has sometimes been applied to such clauses as those to which I have just referred, and that is this. After citing a passage from a judgment of Knight Bruce, V.-C., in Parker v. Marchant (11 L. J. Ch. 223; 1 Y. & C. 290), he goes on to say this: "Nothing can well be plainer than that to show that, primâ facie, general words are to be taken in their larger sense, unless you can find that in the particular case the true construction of the instrument requires you to conclude that they are intended to be used in a sense limited to things ejusdem generis with those which have been specifically mentioned before."

Now I will try to apply those principles to the present case. [His Lordship read the exception clause and said:] That clause is not in the usual form. The usual form is an exception of specific cases, followed by general words. It is admitted that no similar case can be found in any of the reports. I think that we are therefore freed from the considerations which deter the court from departing from the well-known meaning familiar to the framers of such documents. That it was that consideration which influenced the Court of Appeal in Herman v. Morris (sup.), to which I have already referred, is perfectly plain. I need, I think, only refer to one passage in the judgment of Bankes, L.J., but there are similar passages in the judgments of both the other Lords Justices. The passage in the judgment of Bankes, L.J., is this: "His Lordship thought that where the phrase used in the present case (without the 'etc.') had, as was the fact, obtained a well-known meaning, it was necessary for the parties if they wished to depart from that meaning to indicate clearly the cause by reason of which the defendant was to escape liability," and then he goes on to say that the word "etc." was not, in that case, sufficient so to specify that cause.

Now in the present clause the position of the general words seems to me to be most significant. It indicates that the dominant idea was to excuse the charterers from expense for detention occasioned by any cause beyond his control. That is the first thing that strikes one at once in reading this clause. Those general words are followed by specific examples of such causes introduced by a "videlicet." It may well be, and I am not concerned to dispute, though I do not affirm, that if there had been nothing more than the specific examples, without the word "etc." the passage introduced by the "videlicet" might have had a limiting effect on the preceding words, but those words are followed by the symbol for "et cetera." The expression "et cetera," whatever may be its dictionary meaning, or whatever may be its meaning in classical Latin, unquestionably enlarges the list of causes to be included in the exception beyond the specified examples. But then it is said: True it may enlarge that list of specific causes, but it only enlarges it by bringing in causes falling under the same category, or the same genus as those specified. Supposing that it is so, what is the category to which all those causes belong? I confess that I can find none except that which would bring in the cause of detention in the present case, namely, a cause of detention resulting from the operation of some force external to the charterer, and over which he had no control. An attempt was made to bring the examples within a narrower category. With all respect to the learned counsel who argued the case extremely ably, I cannot myself see that these words can be brought under such narrower category. It is said they can be brought within this description, that they are all causes either arising from the operations of nature, or arising from the operation of constituted authorities; but what can be more different than a cause arising from regulations as to quarantine, which are imposed by the harbour authorities at the place where the ship is supposed to be, and detention arising from blockade, which is imposed by the military force of some hostile power over that port. Really, the only common feature of these things that are specified is the operation of some external force, either of nature or of man. A strike is as much the exercise of force external to the charterers as is, for example, quarantine.

In my opinion, therefore, the attempt to restrict the effect of the word "etc." as enlarging the specific examples fails, and I read the whole clause as meaning that if the ship is detained by causes over which the charterers have no control, followed by a specification of particular causes, itself followed by an expression which would bring in all the other causes over which the charterers have no control, all such other causes are brought in. Then it is said that in order to make the exception effectual it must be expressed in unambiguous language. All I can say about that is that it strikes me as being perfectly unambiguous language. I think, therefore, the appeal ought to be allowed, and the order made which my Lord has indicated.

YOUNGER, L.J.—The charterers here have, under these charter-parties, bound themselves to unload two vessels within a fixed period of time. Their obligation amounts to an absolute and unconditional agreement, for the non-performance of which they are answerable unless the impediment which prevented them from performing it was one covered by the exceptions in the charters. The impediment in the present case was a general strike of dock labourers at Rotterdam, which prevailed from the 14th Feb. till the 26th April 1920. It is found as a fact by the learned arbitrator that the strike was a cause over which the charterers had no control, and that but for it the two steamships in question could and would have been discharged within their lay-days. Each charter-party contains an exception. [His Lordship read the clause, and continued:] Is that exception, in the circumstances, found by the learned arbitrator, so phrased as to release the charterers from liability for the delay in unloading due to that general strike? If the words of the exception had been the words of a will or a conveyance, the answer to that question, on principles well ascertained in the construction of such instruments, would, I think, have been clear. A gift, for instance, of residue expressed in general terms, followed by an enumeration of various particulars concluding with "et cetera" is not so phrased as to restrict the meaning or effect of the general words. "The subsequent enumeration," says Sir John Romilly in Gover v. Davis (30 L. J. Ch., at p. 507; 29 Beav., at p. 225), "was merely intended to show, that the general statement was to extend to and include them, and then it goes on with the words, if properly speaking they can be called words, 'etc., etc.,' the proper interpretation of which is 'and all other things.'" "Such an enumeration," says Sir William Grant in Cambridge v. Rous (8 Ves. Jun., at p. 26), "under a 'videlicet,' a much more restrictive expression, has been held only a defective enumeration, not a restriction to the specific articles." "It is, however, incumbent on those who would contend for a limited construction," says Knight Bruce, V.-C., in Parker v. Marchant (11 L. Jour., Ch., at p. 226; 1 V. & C., at p. 300), "to show that a rational interpretation of the will requires a departure from that which ordinarily and primâ facie is the sense and meaning of the words." The effect attributed to the general words in these cases is explained in another way by Page Wood, V.-C., in Dean v. Gibson, where he observes (36 L. Jour. Ch., at p. 659; L. Rep. 3 Eq., at p. 717), that there is a strong presumption that a testatrix does not, by using general words followed by a specific enumeration, intend only to do that which she might have effectually done by the specific enumeration alone. And the same rule of construction as applied to the parcels in a conveyance is very clearly set forth in the following passage from Williams Saunders (at p. 680), to which counsel for the appellants called attention in his argument: "For the natural and proper use of a videlicet, says Lord Hobart, is to particularise that which is general before, and to explain that which is indifferent, doubtful, or obscure; but it must neither be contrary to the premises, nor increase nor diminish the precedent matter; and therefore if a man seised in fee of Blackacre, Whiteacre and Greenacre in D., should grant all his lands in D., that is to say, Blackacre and Whiteacre, yet Greenacre shall also pass by the grant; but if lands lying out of D. are added under the scilicet, they will not pass. So a videlicet may sometimes restrain the generality of the former words, where they are not express and special, but stand indifferent so as to be capable of being restrained without apparent injury to them; as if lands be granted to a man and his heirs, that is to say, the heirs of his body, it is an estate tail—Stukely v. Butler."

These authorities, and they might be indefinitely multiplied, demonstrate, I think, that if the form of expression with which we are now concerned had been used to make a gift in a will, or to describe parcels in a conveyance, there could be no doubt as to its proper interpretation. And it will be observed that, so far, I have in no way been concerned with the application of the ejusdem generis rule of construction. That rule is not, up to this point, under discussion. These authorities are directed to the significance which, as a matter of construction, should continue to be attributed to the introductory general expression, such as we have in these charter-parties notwithstanding the addition of subsequently enumerated particulars. One must, however, I agree, apply with caution such authorities to the construction of similar words in a clause of exception in a charter-party. I apprehend that the judicial attitude towards words of exception in a charter-party is somewhat different from such words in a will. The court requires clear words of exception to relieve the charterer from his primary liability. And although his words were only directly referable to the ejusdem generis rule, some such construction may have been present to Lord Macnaghten's mind when in Knutsford Steamship Company v. Tillmans and Co., he said (99 L. T. Rep. 399; (1908) A. C., at p. 409): "The rule of ejusdem generis applies as laid down in Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton (sup.), and I prefer to take the rule on a point of that sort from a case which did deal with bills of lading and shipping documents rather than from cases that dealt with real property and settlements."

It so happens, however, that in the present case the clauses of exception in these charter-parties are not in a common form, and no judicial interpretation of such clauses in such a connection is forthcoming for our guidance. Accordingly, as it seems to me, the authorities to which I have referred are most useful as guides to a sound result provided only that due attention is paid to the necessity of finding in the present case the requisite freedom from ambiguity.

Counsel for the respondents, feeling in these circumstances the force of the arguments against them, directed their arguments, and the junior counsel especially directed his energies to establishing a construction of this exception which would either weaken the effect of the general words "causes over which the charterers have no control" or would suffice to neutralise their effect altogether. The first result counsel sought to attain by seeking to apply to these words the ejusdem generis rule, transposing their position from the place which they occupy to the end of the clause so that the clause would read: "Should the vessel be detained by quarantine, ice, hurricanes, blockade, clearing of the steamer after the last cargo is taken over, etc., or causes over which the charterers have no control," and he was, in relation to a clause so framed, able to point to the decision of this court in Herman v. Morris (sup.), in which the court did apply the ejusdem generis rule to the general words. But in my opinion such a transposition of words is not permissible for the purpose of introducing that rule, when the rule has no application to the words in the place in which they stand. And to the words, placed as they are, the rule does not, I think, apply. It is necessary, as it seems to me, for its application, that the specific words must be followed and amplified by the addition of the general words. The rule does not apply to general words where they precede or introduce the specific enumeration. This view of the matter dispenses with the necessity of further considering the case of Herman v. Morris (sup.), on which so much reliance was placed. I would only observe with regard to it, that if reference be made to Richardson v. Samuel & Co. (sup.), on which it was avowedly rested, and the words there used are considered, and the importance attributed, at least by Collins, L.J., to the presence amongst them of the word "other" which is to be found neither in Herman v. Morris (sup.) nor in the present case, it will become doubtful whether the decision in Herman v. Morris (sup.) is of general application. I would observe also with regard to Re Allison and Richards (20 Times L. Rep. 584), in which the word "other" was also absent from the clause in question, that in effect was really considered by the court to be introduced by reference to another clause in the instrument where it was duly inserted. In my opinion, therefore, this point does not avail the respondents.

But next it was contended that these general words to which I have referred might here in construction be ignored; and the learned judge in his judgment has, in effect, ignored them and has found the entire ambit of the exception to be included in the events specifically enumerated. To the criticism of Page Wood, V.-C., on such a construction to which I have already alluded, I may again refer. It seems to me to be distinctly in point. The argument suggests that the draftsman of the exception has only succeeded in saying the same thing twice over. That is not an easy proposition to accept in any case of construction. It presents in this case the additional difficulty that the enumerated particulars are to be looked at. Although, as to all of them, they may be correctly, although not very aptly, included in "causes over which the charterers have no control," they would, as to four out of five of them, be much more naturally described otherwise as, for example, acts of God or of the King's enemies; and as they and not other events more immediately apposite are selected for illustration of the general words, the object suggested to my mind by their use is not that suggested by counsel for the respondents, but that it is intended by the selection of these items, somewhat remote from the general expression, to show that even they are included in the phrase. In my view the words are really words of exemplification, the words "et cetera" being equivalent to the words "and so on"—a fair meaning, I think, in this connection, of the words, and well justified as a permissible meaning to attribute to them.

The result, to my mind, is that with sufficient clearness "causes over which the charterers have no control" are in these charter-parties and without qualification causes which excuse the charterers from liability.

In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary for me to deal specifically with the words "et cetera" as words which may introduce the ejusdem generis rule. I will only say that the words have in many cases in Chancery been held to have that effect.

APPEAL FROM THE PRIZE COURT AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Practice—Interrogatories— Information sought on matters not alleged—Admissibility.

Interrogatories which aim at furnishing a plaintiff with proof of a cause of action not alleged in the pleadings, or with knowledge of the defendants' information on matters not required to be pleaded by them, are bad and will not be allowed.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship S. The defendants were two firms of ship repairers who were employed by the plaintiffs to repair the S. Whilst repairs were being carried out by the defendants a fire broke out on board, and the S. was damaged. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover for the damage to the S. it was alleged in the statement of claim that the fire was caused by unscreened candles used by the defendants' workmen. By their defence defendants admitted that the S. was in their hands and under their control for repairs. They also admitted that the fire took place and denied negligence, but put forward no explanation of the cause of the fire. The plaintiffs obtained leave to deliver interrogatories relating to the alleged use of the candles, but the registrar refused leave to deliver the following interrogatory: "What do you say was the cause of the fire?"

Held, that as the interrogatory appeared to be framed with the object of compelling the defendants to set up an affirmative case, or, alternatively, to disclose their defence to the plaintiffs' case, it was properly disallowed.

Decision of the President affirmed.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The plaintiffs were the Federal Steam Navigation Company, and the defendants were (a) Reported by FITZROY COWPER and GEOFFREY HUTCHINSON, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Messrs. G. and R. Green, and Silley Weir Limited, two firms of ship repairers. The plaintiffs' claim was for damage caused to their steamer Shropshire, which took place on board whilst the defendants were carrying out repairs upon her in the ship repairing yard of one of them at Falmouth. By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged that the fire was caused by unscreened candles used by the defendants' workmen. The defendants by their defence admitted that the fire took place whilst the Shropshire was being repaired by them. They denied negligence, but put forward no explanation of the cause of the fire.

The plaintiffs obtained leave to deliver eleven interrogatories relating to the alleged use of the candles, but the registrar refused leave to deliver the following interrogatory. "12. What do you say was the cause of the fire?" The plaintiffs appealed from the decision of the registrar by summons, which was adjourned into court.

G. St. C. Pilcher for the plaintiffs.

H. G. Robertson for the defendants.

May 8.—Sir Henry Duke, P.—The plaintiffs employed the defendants to execute repairs in a ship. The defendants were impliedly bound to use due care and skill in the employment. Fire broke out on board the ship during the execution of the repairs and caused damage and loss to the plaintiffs. They bring this action to recover damages and allege that the fire was due to the failure of the defendants to exercise due care and skill, and that the defendants their servants or agents, negligently caused or allowed the fire to break out. Particulars of the negligence are given in the statement of claim. The defendants deny the allegations and deny that the fire was caused or allowed by reason of the alleged, or any, negligence on the part of them or their servants or agents. The plaintiffs applied in the registry for leave to administer twelve interrogatories to the defendants, eleven of which are directed to establish the specific allegations contained in the statement of claim by requiring the defendants to make oath as to the truth of the matters alleged, and as to what they allege to be the truth in regard to the matters so alleged and in question. The twelfth of the proposed interrogatories is: "What do you say was the cause of the said fire?" It was disallowed by the registrar, and on appeal I thought that it was rightly disallowed. If the interrogatory is to be regarded as being directed to the plaintiffs' case it is a question by way of cross-examination. If it is directed to the defendants' case it is not framed to elicit the truth as to any particular allegation of either party.

The defendants do not set up any affirmative case, and the plaintiffs have covered by their specific questions the case on which they found their claim. On the whole, it seems to me to come within a principle which was applied by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Radnorshire (43 L. T. Rep. 319; 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 338; 5 Prob. Div. 172), and by the Court of Appeal in Hooton v. Dalby (96 L. T. Rep. 537; (1907) 2 K. B. 18), and to be an interrogatory of a vague kind intended by its general form to elicit information in the hope that it may furnish the plaintiffs with proof of a cause of action not at present alleged, or with information as to the defendants' information on matters not required by the rules to be pleaded by them, but probably capable of use at the trial.

Summons dismissed, with leave to appeal.

The plaintiffs appealed.

A. T. Miller, K.C. and Pilcher for the appellants.

R. A. Wright, K.C. and H. G. Robertson for the respondents.

Warrington, L.J.—This interrogatory was apparently framed with the object of compelling the defendants to set up an affirmative case, or, alternatively, to disclose their line of defence to the plaintiffs' attack. In either case, I do not think that it was a proper question to deliver. The observations of Cozens-Hardy, M.R. in Hooton v. Dalby (96 L. T. Rep. 537; (1907) 2 K. B. 18), to which the President referred, show the impropriety of allowing an interrogatory which is directed to no part of the plaintiffs' case, and which does not tend to disprove the case of the defendant. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Younger, L.J. concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

March 17 and 24, 1922.

Federated Coal and Shipping Company Limited v. The King. (a)

Charter-party — Defence of the Realm — Coal strike—Detention of ship loading coal—Admiralty orders—Claim by charterers for compensation—Claim against the Crown—Reg. 39BBB Defence of the Realm Regulations—Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48), s. 2.

In 1920 the suppliants were engaged in carrying coal from South Wales for the French railways. By a time charter-party they had hired the steamship N., the rate of hire being 279*l. a day. In Oct.* 1920 the steamship N. *was at Cardiff loading coal for Nantes. She had nearly finished loading when the coal strike broke out. vessel was detained in Barry Roads for eighteen days, and was then allowed to proceed on her voyage to France. The suppliants then applied to the shipping controller for compensation for the detention, for bunker coal burnt while waiting for orders, extra wages and other expenses arising by reason of the detention. The shipping controller replied that, as the vessel had not been actually under requisition, he could not pay any compensation. The suppliants thereupon brought a petition of right claiming from the Crown damages for the detention of their vessel. They alleged that they were requested by the Admiralty to let the N. lie in Barry Roads and that they assented, and that from such request and assent there arose an implied promise by the Admiralty to indemnify them against loss. On behalf of the Crown it was contended that there was no contract whatever between the Crown and the suppliants. Reg. 39BBB provides for the payment of compensation for a requisitioned ship but not for a ship under orders or detained as the N. was. The suppliants were not in possession of the vessel nor had they a lien on her. They had only a contractual right to order her master to perform voyages with her for their benefit and profit.

Held, (1) that there was no implied contract with regard to the payment of compensation for the loss due to the detention of the ship ; (2) that the suppliants had no right of compensation under reg. 39BBB or at common law, and (3) that if the suppliants were entitled to any compensation under the Indemnity Act 1920, their only tribunal was the one set up by that Act, namely, the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission.

PETITION of right.

The suppliants, who were time-charterers (not by demise) of the steamship Norburn, claimed, by petition of right against the Crown, 5000*l.* by way of compensation for the detention of the steamship Norburn.

In 1920, during a coal strike in this country, the steamship Norburn was at Cardiff loading coal for Nantes in France. She had nearly completed loading when the coal strike broke out in Oct. 1920. The vessel had been chartered by the suppliants on time charter at 279*l.* a day, and they employed her in carrying coal for the French state railways.

When the strike broke out the naval transport officer at Cardiff, acting under Admiralty orders under the Defence of the Realm Regulations, ordered the steamship to go out to Barry Roads to await orders. The steamship obeyed, and after being detained out in Barry Roads for eighteen days, she was allowed to proceed. The suppliants thereupon applied to the shipping controller for compensation for detention, for the bunker coal burnt while waiting for orders, for extra wages and for other outgoings. The shipping controller replied that as the steamship had not been actually under requisition, he could not pay anything. The suppliants thereupon brought this petition of right claiming over 5000*l.* from the Crown in respect of the eighteen days' detention in Barry Roads.

Le Quesne (R. A. Wright, K.C. with him) for the suppliants.—There is an implied promise to indemnify the suppliants against the loss sustained by them in complying with the request of the Admiralty. Where the subject has been deprived, even for a time, of his property there must be a right to compensation. See :

London and North-Western Railway Company v. Evans, 67 L. T. Rep. 630 ; (1893) 1 Ch. 16 ;

Central Control Board v. Cannon Brewery Company, 121 L. T. Rep. 361 ; (1919) A. C. 744.

Sir Ernest Pollock (A.-G.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Crown.—In this case the Admiralty were acting in the national interest in time of emergency. There is no contract express or implied to support the suppliants' claim for compensation. Their only remedy is to proceed before the War Compensation Court under the Indemnity Act 1920. See :

Elliott Steam Tug Company v. Shipping Controller, ante. p. 78 ; 126 L. T. Rep. 158 ; (1922) 1 K. B. 127.

R. A. Wright, K.C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 24.—BAILHACHE, J. read the following judgment.—The suppliants in this case claim compensation from the Crown in the following circumstances. In Oct. 1920, the steamship Norburn, which was on time charter to the suppliants (not by demise) was loading coal in Barry Dock for carriage to Nantes. The coal strike was in progress and the naval transport officer at Cardiff, acting for the Admiralty and within the scope of his authority, ordered the master to leave the docks and take his ship into the roads to await further orders. It was thought that the coal might be wanted for some ill-supplied British port.

The Norburn had not quite completed her cargo, and the master requested the transport officer to put his orders into writing, which he did in a letter dated the 18th Oct. The Norburn was kept waiting in the roads until the 4th Nov., and was then allowed to proceed on her voyage. The suppliants have been obliged to pay the chartered hire for the eighteen days' detention, amounting to some 5000*l.*, and they claim to recover either this sum, or at any rate some sum of money, by way of compensation for the loss suffered by them in consequence of the master obeying the Admiralty orders, as he was bound to do.

The suppliants say that they were requested by the Admiralty to let the Norburn lie in Barry Roads at its disposal, and that they assented, and that from such request and assent there arises an implied promise to indemnify them against the loss thereby sustained. If this was the correct view to take of the facts, I should consider the claim of the suppliants well founded, and this court competent to entertain it. Unfortunately for the suppliants, I see two objections to this view of the case, either of which is fatal to their claim. In the first place the instructions given to the master of the Norburn were not a request, but an order justified under reg. 39BBB. The so-called assent of the suppliants was obedience to an order which they were powerless to resist. From such facts no implied contract arises: (see the speech of Lord Dunedin in Attorney-General v. De Keyser's Royal Hotel Limited, 122 L. T. Rep. 691; (1920) A. C., at p. 523; and that of Lord Atkinson in the same case, 122 L. T. Rep. 691; (1920) A. C., at p. 533, and the authorities cited by him.)

Secondly, if the Admiralty instructions are to be treated as a request, and the obedience of the master as an assent, the request was to the master as having control of the ship for his owners, and not as being under the directions of the time-charterers as to her engagements. What was wanted was the ship, and the contract, if any, was between the Admiralty and the owners. Of the time-charterers the Admiralty knew nothing and cared less. Before leaving the first contention of the suppliants I ought perhaps to say why I should have entertained a claim based on contract if I thought that it could be sustained. Reg. 39BBB makes provision for compensation for a requisitioned ship, but none for a ship under orders or directions, as was the Norburn; and I take the law to be that where a case for compensation is made out, and no exclusive existing method of preferring the claim is prescribed, the courts are open.

The suppliants' alternative way of putting their claim is this: They say that they were deprived of the use of the Norburn for eighteen days by the exercise of the powers conferred on the Admiralty by the regulation, and they say that the principle of law, often laid down, that an intention to take away the property of a subject without giving him a legal right to compensation for the loss of it, is not to be imputed to the Legislature unless that intention is expressed in unequivocal terms, and that the principle applies whether the property is taken away altogether or only for a time, and they ask me to apply this principle to their case.

Here again there is a fatal obstacle in the suppliants' way. It is to be observed that the principle which I have stated in the words of Lord Atkinson in the case of Central Control Board v. Cannon Brewery Company (121 L. T. Rep. 361; (1919) A. C., at p. 752), is confined to property. The suppliants had no property in the Norburn. They were not in possession of her. Their charter-party was not by demise. They had not even a lien upon her. They merely had a contractual right to order her master to perform voyages with her for their benefit and profit. To such rights the principle of law on which the suppliants rely has no application. The use or abuse by a third party of a chattel over which such rights exist, and the consequent injury to those rights give rise to no claim at law by the persons possessing such rights. If authority were wanted for this well-settled proposition, it will be found in the judgment of Scrutton, L.J., in Elliott Steam Tug Company v. Shipping Controller (ante, p. 78; 126 L. T. Rep. 158; (1922) 1 K. B. 127), and the cases there cited by him, and particularly in the judgment of Blackburn, J., in Cattle v. Stockton Waterworks Company (30 L. T. Rep. 475; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 453).

The conclusions at which I have arrived are: (1) There was no implied contract; (2) there is no right to compensation under reg. 39BBB. or at common law. These conclusions dispose of the case in favour of the Crown, but as the Indemnity Act 1920 (10 & 11 Geo. 5, c. 48) was pleaded and referred to, I think it right to say that, as I read that Act, claims founded on contract are excepted from its operation and left to the courts. Further, notwithstanding my second conclusion, it may be that sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 (b) of the Act of 1920 gives the suppliants some right to compensation. If it does, their only tribunal is that provided by the Act, namely, the Defence of the Realm Losses Commission. There will be judgment for the Crown with costs.

Naval Prize Tribunal.

April 5 and 7, 1922.

(Before Lord PHILLIMORE, Sir GUY FLEETWOOD WILSON, and Admiral Sir DOVETON STURDEE.)

THE CANADIA. (a)

Naval Prize Fund—Neutral ship ordered into port for examination—Loss of ship and cargo—Ship and cargo not liable to condemnation—Negligence of the prize crew—Negligence of the ship's master—Claims by the owners—Admission of liability by the Admiralty—Money paid in settlement—Amount chargeable on the Naval Prize Fund—Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30), sched. part II., par. 5.

The C., a neutral vessel, was stopped by a British cruiser and sent into port under a prize crew for examination. By an error of the navigating officer she was lost before reaching the examination port. It subsequently appeared that the cargo on board the C. was not contraband, that the C. had not committed any un-neutral act, and that if she had reached port she would have been released after examination. Claims by the neutral owners for the loss of the C. and her cargo were eventually admitted by the Government, and certain sums were paid to them in compensation. The Treasury claimed to have these sums charged on the Naval Prize

Fund under part II. (5) of the schedule to the Naval Prize Act 1918 (8 & 9 Geo. 5, c. 30), which provides that there shall be charged on and payable out of the Naval Prize Fund "costs, charges, expenses and claims which the tribunal consider may reasonably be treated, having regard to the principles and practice heretofore observed by prize courts, as being costs, charges, and claims which, had there been a grant of prize to captors, captors would have been liable to pay."

At the hearing it appeared that the loss of the C. was due to her speed having been inaccurately given to the Prize officer by her master, and not to the negligence of the Prize officer.

Held, that an unconditional admission of liability by the Government did not constitute binding and un-rebuttable evidence that there was a liability, nor relieve the Naval Prize Tribunal of determining for themselves whether a claim was to be treated as one which the captors would have been liable to pay having regard to the principles and practice heretofore observed by prize courts. But in view of the difficulty of defending the case in the Prize Court, and of the fact that the admission of the Government had perhaps saved the fund from an adverse decision, such sum as might reasonably have been paid to effect a settlement ought to be charged on the Prize Fund. Half the sums paid ordered to be charged on the Prize Fund.

CLAIM by the Exchequer that certain sums paid to the owners of the Danish steamer Canadia and her cargo, which were lost in March 1915 whilst being taken into Kirkwall by a prize crew from H.M.S. Hilary, were chargeable on the Naval Prize Fund.

Wylie for the Exchequer.

Sir R. H. B. Acland, K.C. and Darby for the Fleet.

April 7.—Lord PHILLIMORE delivered the following written judgment of the Tribunal:

This case has given the Tribunal considerable difficulty. It is a claim on behalf of the Exchequer that the sum of 145,488*l.* being the sum total of payments made to the owners and underwriters of the Canadia, and her cargo, and to and for the crew, together with some further items not yet ascertained, be declared to be a charge on the Naval Prize Fund under par. 5, Part II., of the schedule to the Act.

The Canadia was a Danish vessel bound on a voyage from Galveston, Texas, with a cargo of cotton and flour, destined for Christiania and Gothenburg. She was stopped in the North Atlantic on Thursday the 11th March 1915, by the British cruiser Hilary. An officer and six men were sent on board her, with orders to take her into Kirkwall, and instructions to reach their destination by steering north of Fair Island, between the Orkneys and the Shetlands, and then turning to the southward. The first course steered was in a general way east magnetic. On the following day, the 12th, land was sighted about 4.30 p.m. and a bearing of Noup Head was taken, and after the ship had run a certain distance on her course a second bearing was taken, which, if the speed of the ship was accurately known, would give the distance from the land. The weather then became thick, and soundings were taken from time to time. These, however, owing to the configuration of the sea bottom, would be in fact of little use. At 7.10 the Prize officer reckoned that he had got abreast of or past Fair Isle and could haul away to the south-east. But, as it turned out, this could not have been the case, for about 8.45 land was seen close ahead, and notwithstanding every effort the vessel struck on Fair Isle and became with her cargo a total loss. The ship's and prize crews escaped with their lives largely owing to the skill and coolness of the Prize officer, Captain Herbert Spencer. As it turned out, the cargo on board the Canadia was not contraband and she had not committed any un-neutral act, and if she had reached Kirkwall she would have been released after examination.

Claims were put forward by the Danish Government for compensation to the owners of the ship and cargo. At first the Admiralty refused to admit liability, but on the 5th Feb. 1916, they agreed to pay any reasonable claim which should be put forward, and thereafter paid sums already mentioned.

The question which we propose first to consider is whether the loss was due to the negligent navigation of the Prize officer, so as to bring the case within the principles laid down by Sir William Scott in Der Mohr (3 C. Rob. 129; 4 C. Rob. 314) and in The William (6 C. Rob. 316) and, if the old law had to be applied, make the captor, and now, therefore, the Naval Prize Fund, liable for the loss. The loss was, no doubt, due to an error as to the position of the ship when her course was altered to the south-east at 7.10 p.m. The chart traced by Commander Sutcliffe and the other facts before us show that this must have been the case, and there were three factors in this error. The ship was probably nearer Noup Head, and she did not run on her course so far as was assumed, and the allowance for the strength and set of the tide was insufficient.

As regards this last point, counsel for the Fleet submitted that there was no negligence on the part of the prize officer, as he had no chart to guide him but the one which the master of the Canadia possessed, which was one taking in the seas round the whole of Great Britain, and on much too small a scale to be useful for this purpose, and, in fact, having no notes upon it as to the set of the tides. If this was the only defence for the navigation of the ship it is to be doubted whether the tribunal could accept it. To begin with, there was a proper chart in the Hilary, and the officer probably might have examined it and taken notes from it before he boarded the Canadia. And assuming the absence of sufficient charts on the Hilary so that the officer could not be supplied with one though that might exonerate the officer and the captain of the Hilary from blame, it would only throw the blame further back, and the neutral powers might rightly complain that their ships were sent into dangerous positions without the officers being provided with proper charts. As to the principle of law, reference might be made to our judgment in The Oregon (1921) P. 224) and to The Ostsee (Spinks, 170), and the cases there cited. But the conclusion to which we have ultimately come renders it unnecessary to consider this question of charts.

In our view, there would have been no misfortune if the speed of the ship had been correctly given by the master. It was upon him that for this purpose the prize officer had to rely, and he appears to have given the speed as nine and a half knots according to his patent log. First of all on this speed the distance off Noup Head was calculated, and, secondly, the spot at which it would be safe to turn to the south was determined. Now Commander Sutcliffe's marked chart and statement show that the vessel cannot have arrived at that spot, and that to bring about the stranding it is necessary to infer that the speed was not more than seven knots. The ship, therefore, was nearer the land on the starboard hand than she was judged to be, and she had not reached a position when it would be safe to turn to the south. Assuming that the officer did not make sufficient allowance for the set of the tide, still there would have been no loss if the ship's speed had been rightly given. Therefore we do not consider that there was negligence on the part of the prize officer. Some other suggestions were made against him, the Danish captain for instance complained that he stood on at night into dark and dangerous waters. In our view it was as between various dangers, including those from submarines, the safer course. In conclusion we may add that the charge of negilgence was but faintly made by the counsel for the Exchequer.

A second question then arises. Does the act of the Admiralty in admitting liability for the loss make the money paid a charge upon the Naval Prize Fund? At the time when the admission was made the legal position as to naval prize was the same as when the settlement was made, in The Oregon (sup.)—i.e., before the passing of the Naval Prize Act—and as we said in The Oregon (sup.) "At a time when no one had any interest in prize money except the Crown, and when, therefore, the officers of the Crown were able, and, indeed, bound on behalf of the Crown, to make such conditions and arrangements as they might think upon the whole reasonable." No doubt the Danish claim was a difficult one to meet. The ship was an innocent neutral, and was navigated under the charge of the British officer when she was lost. If any proceedings had been taken on behalf of the Danish claimants the burden of discharging the officer from negligence would have lain upon the Crown, and the case would be obviously one for compromise, if by such compromise a substantial portion, say, for example, 50 per cent., of the damages could have been saved. Such a compromise would have been reasonable, and we should have upheld it. But while upholding the power of the officers of the Crown to protect the Prize Fund by reasonable settlements, as we did in the case of The Oregon (sup.) we are not prepared to say that an unconditional admission or surrender without any quid pro quo would constitute binding and unrebuttable evidence that there was a liability, or relieve us from the duty of determining for ourselves whether it is in fact a claim which, having regard to the principles and practice heretofore observed by the Prize Courts, may reasonably be treated as one which the captors would have been liable to pay.

We therefore cannot allow this claim in full. On the other hand, if no settlement had been made the claimants might, as they were invited in the early stages of the proceedings to do, have prosecuted their claim in the Prize Court. Then, the case, being a difficult one, and the captors starting with so much legitimate prejudice against them, might have ended unfavourably. The act of the Government in admitting liability has saved the Prize Fund from such a decision.

On the whole, we have thought that we ought to treat this case as one in which we can allow as a claim the sum at which it would have been reasonable to purchase the release of a disputed claim, and that the claim may therefore stand for half the amount already paid and half any further sum which may have to be paid. As to this further sum, we should remark that it is not very easy to see how it can arise, and that at any rate by this time the items of it ought to be known, and should be put forward by the Exchequer for consideration by the advisers of the Fleet forthwith.

We declare, therefore, that the sum of 72,744*l.*, and such further sum as may be proved within three weeks' time, and no more, is a charge upon the Naval Prize Fund. The counsel for the Fleet will have, as usual, their costs out of the Prize Fund.
