REPORTS

All the Cases Argued and Determined by the Superior Courts

RELATING TO

MARITIME LAW.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY OF ENGLAND.

April 28 and 29, 1875.

(Present: The Right Hons. Sir J. W. COLVILE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE SMITH, Sir R. P. COLLIER, and Sir H. S. KEATING.)

THE ANGLO-INDIAN.

Collision—Lights—Duty to show light astern to following ship.

It is primâ facie the duty of an overtaking ship to keep out of the way of a ship ahead of her, but if the latter ship sees another approaching her from a direction where her lights are not visible, and which vessel she has reason to suppose does not, in fact, whether keeping a good look-out or not, see her and is likely to come into collision with her, it is her duty to give some warning to the overtaking ship, not necessarily by exhibiting a light, but by some signal, such as the firing of a gun, the showing a light, or otherwise, which will indicate her whereabouts to the overtaking ship, and call the attention of that ship to the danger of a collision.(a)

THIS was an appeal from the decree of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Phillimore, Knight, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a cause of damage promoted in that court by the respondents, the owners of the brigantine Excel and of the cargo laden on board her; and also by the personal representatives of her late master, and others of the crew of the Excel, against the barque Anglo-Indian, of which the appellants were owners, for the recovery of damages arising out of a collision between the said two vessels.

The Excel was a brigantine of 210 tons register, or thereabouts. The Anglo-Indian was a barque of 440 tons register.

The collision happened about 2.30 a.m. on the 14th April 1874, in the Bay of Biscay, about fifty miles south by west of Cape Finisterre.

The wind at the time was blowing a gale from the north-north-west, and the night was dark and cloudy, with passing showers.

The case set up in the court below on behalf of the respondents, as stated in their petition, was, that the Excel, whilst in the prosecution of a voyage from Swansea to Barcelona, was hove to on the starboard tack, under double-reefed mainsail and mainstay sail, heading about west, and forereaching at the rate of between one and two knots an hour, making considerable lee way. The regulation lights were said to be duly placed and burning brightly at the time. Shortly before 2.15 a.m. a green light—which afterwards proved to be that of the Anglo-Indian—was observed astern of the Excel, and distant about 300 yards. The Anglo-Indian, it was alleged instead of keeping out of the way of the Excel, approached her in a direction which involved risk of collision, and exhibited her red light to those on board the Excel; and, as it was further alleged, although the Anglo-Indian was loudly hailed from the Excel, and a light was exhibited over the stern of the Excel, the Anglo-Indian ran into and struck the Excel upon the stern, and did her so much damage that she shortly afterwards foundered and was lost, together with her cargo and everything then on board her. Upon this occasion the master was unfortunately drowned.

The case on the part of the appellants was, that on the occasion in question the Anglo-Indian, bound from London to Jamaica, was close-hauled on the starboard tack under reefed upper topsails, foresail, and foretopmast staysail, heading about west, and making about five knots an hour. Her proper regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept.

Under these circumstances, about 2.30 a.m., on the 14th April, the hull of the Excel was made out a very short distance ahead and a little on the starboard bow of the Anglo-Indian. The helm of the Anglo-Indian was thereupon immediately put hard astarboard, but it was impossible to avoid a collision, and the stem of the Anglo-Indian struck the Excel on the port side of her stern.

The respondents alleged that the collision was caused by the negligence of those on board the Anglo-Indian, and by reason of their neglect to keep a proper look-out and to keep the Anglo-Indian out of the way of the Excel.

The appellants denied the statements of the respondents that a light was exhibited over the stern of the Excel and that the Anglo-Indian was hailed, and attributed blame to those on board the Excel for improperly neglecting to keep a good look-out, for improperly neglecting to take any measures to show the position of the Excel to those on board the Anglo-Indian, and for improperly neglecting to observe the provisions of article 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The evidence was taken orally in open court before the learned judge of the court below, who was assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation. The learned judge found the Anglo-Indian alone to blame for the collision, giving his reasons as follows:

Sir R. Phillimore.—There is no question at all as to the duty of the Anglo-Indian, that is clearly prescribed by the 18th article: "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel;" and her defence for not keeping out of the way, as I understand it, is that the night was so dark that it was the duty of the Excel to have shown a light over her stern, and that if she had done so the collision would not have taken place. But on the evidence I am satisfied that the night was not of the character described by the Anglo-Indian witnesses. I am satisfied that the Excel ought to have been visible to those on board the Anglo-Indian at the distance that she says, viz., at the distance of at least 300 or 400 yards, and that if there had been a proper look-out on board the Anglo-Indian—and in my opinion and the opinion also of the Elder Brethren there was not—she would have seen the Excel in time to have got out of her way, and to have crossed her stern by starboarding at an earlier period. The question, therefore, does not arise, nor does the court intend to discuss it, whether in the present state of the sailing regulations it would or would not have been the duty of the Excel to have shown a light over her stern, because I am satisfied, as I have already said upon the evidence, that this vessel ought to have been visible to those on board the Anglo-Indian at a sufficient time to have avoided the collision. And, indeed, there is a dilemma out of which the Anglo-Indian, in my judgment, would find it difficult to escape, even if she had not been going at a speed of about six knots an hour, she being the overtaking vessel. She was going about six knots, and that rate of speed would only be justifiable if she could have seen a vessel in sufficient time to get out of her way. I am satisfied upon the evidence, as I have already said, that if there had been a proper look-out this vessel would have been seen in due time to have prevented the collision, and therefore I pronounce the Anglo-Indian alone to blame. The cross action must be dismissed.

From the decree made in accordance with the above judgment the owners of the AngloIndian appealed for the following among other reasons:

1. Because the evidence taken in the court below shows that the collision was attributable to the negligence of those on board the Excel.

2. Because those on board the Excel neglected to keep a good look-out.

3. Because those on board the Excel neglected to take any measures to show the position of the Excel to those on board the Anglo-Indian.

4. Because on the evidence adduced by the respondents themselves it is evident that those on board the Excel considered it necessary to show a light over the stern, and that no light was shown in time to give those on board the Anglo-Indian warning.

5. That the learned judge ought to have held the Excel to blame for neglecting to show a light to indicate her position to the Anglo-Indian.

6. Because the collision was not occasioned by any negligence of those on board the Anglo-Indian.

Butt, Q.C., and R. E. Webster, for the appellants.—It was the duty of those on board the Excel to have kept a better look-out. It was, further, their duty to have exhibited a light over the stern of the Excel in sufficient time to have given warning to the Anglo-Indian and to have enabled her to keep out of the way of the Excel. This duty arises out of the general maritime law, which requires a ship, being approached by another ship from such a direction that the former is not as visible as the latter, to exhibit a light or give a signal so as to warn the approaching vessel:

The Iron Duke, 4 Notes of Cases, 94, 585; 9 Jur. 476; The Osmanli, 7 Notes of Cases, 509.

And this duty is continued and enforced by the 20th article of the regulations for preventing collisions, which provides that "nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship or the owner or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." The duty to exhibit a light being under such circumstances an obligation of the general maritime law, was a precaution required by the ordinary practice of seamen." There is no obligation to carry a fixed light over the stern, but a light should be shown in a proper time as a signal.

Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents.—There is no duty to exhibit any light except those provided by the regulations. By article 2, it is expressly provided that the lights therein provided, and "no others," shall be carried, and to find that it was the duty of a sailing vessel to carry more than the side lights at night would be an overruling of the regulations. But even if there was such a duty, it can only arise when there is danger of collision, and in the present case there was no reason to apprehend danger until the ships were close together, and then the green light was actually shown. Those on board the Excel kept a bad look-out.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.

April 29, 1875.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir R. P. COLLIER.—This was a suit brought by the owners of the Excel, a brigantine of 210 tons, against the Anglo-Indian, a barque of 440 tons, in consequence of a collision, for which the Excel maintained that the Anglo-Indian alone was to blame. The collision took place in the Bay of Biscay, about fifty miles off Cape Finisterre, in the open sea, at between 2 and 3 a.m. in April 1874. The Excel was going in a westerly direction, at about 1½ or 2 knots an hour. The Anglo-Indian was proceeding at a rate of somewhere about 6 knots an hour in the same course, behind the Excel. The Anglo-Indian ran into the stern of the Excel, and the Excel was sunk. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court has found that the Anglo-Indian was alone to blame.

The question involved in this case is chiefly one of fact, and their Lordships repeat what, indeed, they have often said, that they are extremely loath to interfere with the finding of the court below on a question of fact, that court having had the advantage, which they have not, of seeing and hearing the witnesses, unless they come to a very clear conclusion that that finding was wrong.

Now, the findings of fact of the learned judge are these: First, with respect to the state of the night, in regard to which there was some conflicting evidence, those on board the Excel representing that the night, though dark, was clear, with passing clouds; those on board the Anglo-Indian representing that it was dark and very stormy, with rain, or, at all events, occasional rain. The learned judge says: "But on the evidence I am satisfied that the night was not of the character described by the Anglo-Indian witnesses. I am satisfied that the Excel ought to have been visible to those on board the Anglo-Indian at the distance that she says, viz., at the distance of at least 300 or 400 yards." Their Lordships accept that finding, and are of opinion that it is borne out by the evidence. Then the learned judge goes on and finds another most material fact, namely, "that if there had been a proper look-out on board the Anglo-Indian—and in my opinion," the learned judge says, "and the opinion also of the Elder Brethren, there was not—she would have seen the Excel in time to have got out of her way, and to have crossed her stern by starboarding at an earlier period." Their Lordships are of opinion that this finding also is entirely supported by the evidence. Indeed, in their Lordships' view, it might not be incorrectly said that upon the evidence there was no look-out at all on board the Anglo-Indian. The man upon the look-out says that when he first saw the vessel the Excel was "ahead, a little on the starboard bow;" that he first saw her masts; that when he saw the masts "she was at no distance at all," and "When I saw the masts," he says, "on the starboard bow, I wheeled round and sung out, 'There is a vessel on the starboard bow,' but I was too late; we were foul of her already." And he subsequently says, "I was foul of her the moment I saw her." He further adds that he saw no light whatever on board her, and also that he heard no hailing on board her, which other people on board the Anglo-Indian did hear. This certainly would point to the conclusion that the man Robinson, who was keeping the look-out, as it is supposed, on board the Anglo-Indian, was really keeping no look-out at all. That being so, and having reference to the 17th article, which provides that "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel," their Lordships have no doubt whatever that the finding of the learned judge was right, that the Anglo-Indian was to blame.

The question remains, whether there was negligence contributing to the accident on the part of those navigating the Excel. On this subject there has been a discussion before their Lordships as to the meaning of three articles in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; those articles being the 2nd, the 19th, and the 20th. The second is to the effect that "the lights mentioned in the following articles," numbering them, "and no others, shall be carried in all weathers, from sunset to sunrise." Article 19 is in these terms: "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation; and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Then the 20th is: "Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." It has been argued on the one side that Article 2 is absolutely prohibitory to a vessel under any circumstances showing any light except the lights prescribed. On the other hand it has been argued that, although undoubtedly it would not be proper for a vessel under the circumstances in which the Excel was to keep up a fixed light at her stern, nevertheless, that under the circumstances of a vessel approaching her which would not be able to see her as well as she would see that vessel, it was her duty to have exhibited a light in time to avoid the collision; that she might have done this, but neglected to do so. Their Lordships do not entirely accept either of the views which have been thus expressed. Undoubtedly it is primâ facie the duty of the overtaking vessel to keep out of the way of the vessel ahead of her, but their Lordships would be loath to lay it down that no duty whatever attaches under such circumstances as the present to the vessel ahead. If that vessel saw another approaching her, whether keeping a good look-out or not, which she had reason to suppose did not in fact see her, and was likely to come into collision with her, they would be loath to say that no duty was cast upon her. On the contrary, they are of opinion, under those circumstances, it would be her duty to give some warning to the approaching vessel, not necessarily by exhibiting a light, but by some signal, such as the firing of a gun, the showing a light, or otherwise, which would indicate her whereabouts to the approaching vessel, and call the attention of that vessel to the danger of a collision. The question, therefore, comes to this, whether in this case it has been established that the Excel, in the words of Article 20, did neglect any precaution which might be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, whereby she might have avoided the collision?

Now, the facts with reference to this subject may be taken to be these: The Excel saw the Anglo-Indian approaching at a distance of about 300 or 400 yards. That is found as a fact by the learned judge, and their Lordships think rightly. It appears that, simultaneously with her sighting this vessel she sighted the green light of the vessel, and that green light would then indicate that there was no danger of collision; that the Anglo-Indian would pass behind her stern. Very soon after both lights opened, the red and the green, and then undoubtedly there was imminent danger of a collision. The evidence on the part of the Excel is that, under those circumstances, after an ineffectual attempt to obtain the globe light, the green light was taken from the starboard side of the vessel and exhibited from the stern. That fact appears to be proved, and their Lordships are by no means satisfied upon the evidence that that green light was not shown in sufficient time to have enabled the overtaking vessel, if she had kept a good look-out, to have avoided the collision, which might have been in all probability prevented by a very trifling starboarding of the helm.

Under these circumstances, in their Lordships' view, it is not established that the Excel did neglect any precaution "which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen," and that no case of contributory negligence has been made out against her.

Under these circumstances, their Lordships will humbly advise her Majesty to affirm the decision of the Admiralty Court, and to dismiss this appeal with costs. Appeal dismissed.

THE EARL SPENCER.

Collision—Ship overtaken—Duty to show a light astern—Speed.

Although a ship is, under some circumstances, bound to keep a look-out astern, and to show a light or give a signal to another ship overtaking her and evidently unable to see her, nevertheless, where a steamer going at a high rate of speed in a fair-way overtakes a sailing ship showing no light or signal, and does not see her until too near to avoid a collision, although keeping a good look-out, the steamer will be held alone to blame, if a lower rate of speed would have given the steamer time to have avoided the collision upon sighting the sailing ship.(a)

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Right Hon. Sir Robert Phillimore, the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a case of damage lately pending in that court, promoted by the respondents, as the owners, master, and crew of the Merlin, and the owners of her cargo, against the steamship, the Earl Spencer, owned by the appellants, the London and North-Western Railway Company.

The cause arose out of a collision which took place between the two vessels about 4.30 a.m., on Saturday morning, the 17th Oct. 1874, within Holyhead Bay, North Wales, a little inside the breakwater. The Merlin was a schooner of 65 tons register, manned by a crew of four hands, all told, and whilst proceeding from Carmarthen to Liverpool with a cargo of tin plate, was in Holyhead Bay, inside the breakwater. The Earl Spencer, a paddle-wheel steamship of 431 tons register and 350 horse power, was proceeding from Greenore, Ireland, to Holyhead, with cargo and passengers.

The case for the appellants, as set up in their answer, was, that under the foregoing circumstances, the Earl Spencer proceeded on her said voyage in safety until about 4.25 a.m. on the 17th Oct. 1874, when the tide being ebb, the weather dark and rainy, and a gale blowing from the S.S.W., the Earl Spencer was rounding the breakwater of and entering Holyhead Outer Harbour, heading about S.$\frac{1}{2}$E., with her regulation lights burning brightly, and a good look-out being kept on board of her at such time; and after rounding the breakwater those on board the Earl Spencer suddenly sighted a vessel, which turned out to be the Merlin, with no lights visible, bearing about half a point on the starboard bow of the Earl Spencer, and close ahead of the latter vessel, and inside the breakwater. The captain of the Earl Spencer, thinking that the Merlin was a vessel at anchor, starboarded the helm of the Earl Spencer to go to the eastward, and outside of her and of the other shipping, there being several vessels at anchor to the westward of the Merlin; but, discovering immediately afterwards that the Merlin was under weigh, the captain of the Earl Spencer ordered the engines of that vessel to be stopped and reversed full speed, which order was immediately obeyed, but the time which had elapsed from the sighting of the Merlin was so short, and as the Merlin was steering a course which crossed the course of the Earl Spencer, that latter vessel was unable to avoid the Merlin, but her bow came into contact with the stern and port quarter of the Merlin. The captain of the Earl Spencer attempted to tow the Merlin into safety, but, after an unsuccessful attempt to do so, was compelled, through fear of risking the lives and property under his care, to abandon her, after taking on board her crew.

The appellants charged those on board the Merlin with improperly omitting, under the circumstances of the case to hail the Earl Spencer or to show a light, or to take any proper measures in due time to warn those on board the Earl Spencer of the proximity and position of the Merlin, although, from the relative position of the two ships, the regulation lights of the Merlin were not visible to those on board the Earl Spencer. The appellants further charged that those on board the Merlin neglected to comply with the provisions of articles 19 and 20 of the regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The appellants further charged that the said collision was occasioned or contributed to by the negligence of those on board the Merlin.

The case of the Merlin, as stated in her petition was, that she was on the starboard tack, heading about S.E. by S., with a moderate gale from the S.S.W., weather rainy, and tide about one and a half hour's ebb, and was making about 1$\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 knots per hour, with her proper regulation lights duly exhibited and burning brightly; that she was under double-reefed mainsail, reefed topsail, standing jib, and fore staysail, and her crew were engaged in setting her double-reefed foresail, the captain having charge of the helm. That the Earl Spencer, with her three lights open, was seen at the distance of about a cable's length astern of the Merlin, and coming towards her under steam. The Earl Spencer, though loudly hailed from the Merlin, ran against and with her stem, struck the Merlin a violent blow on her port quarter, doing her a great deal of damage. The crew of the Merlin got on board the Earl Spencer, to save their lives, and the Earl Spencer, after an unsuccessful attempt to take the Merlin in tow, proceeded into Holyhead Harbour, and the Merlin and her cargo, and everything on board her, were totally lost.

(a) This decision and the one preceding it, The Anglo-Indian (ante, p. 1), have the effect of overruling the decision of the Admiralty Court in The Earl Spencer (ante, vol. 2, p. 523), where it was decided that there was no duty upon any ship to exhibit lights other than the lights provided by the regulations, and that, in fact, such exhibition of lights would be contrary to law. Now, however, a vessel seeing another overtaking her will be bound to show a light or signal if there is danger of collision, and the headmost ship has reason to believe that the following ship cannot make her out; in effect, where the special circumstances or the ordinary practice of seamen require the exhibition of such a light. Whether the exhibition of the stern light is required will of course be a question for the court or the assessors in each case. —ED.

The respondents charged those on board the Earl Spencer with neglecting to keep a proper look-out; with improperly neglecting to keep out of the way of the Merlin; with going too fast, considering the state of the weather, and not duly complying with the provisions of article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; and that the said collision, and the consequent loss of the Merlin and her cargo, and everything on board her, were occasioned by the negligent and improper navigation of the Earl Spencer.

On the 11th Feb. 1875 the witnesses were examined orally in court before the learned judge of the court below, assisted by Trinity Masters. The respondents called only two witnesses, one of whom was the master of the Merlin, who admitted in cross-examination that if he had seen the Earl Spencer sooner than he did he would have shown a light over the stern of his vessel, but that, although he was steering, he had not looked round to see if any vessel was approaching astern of him till the Earl Spencer was only a cable's length off. The evidence of the appellants supported their case, as set up in their answer. The appellants also proved that the night was so dark that a vessel not showing lights could not be seen at a greater distance than from one to two cable lengths off, and that the Merlin was actually seen as soon as it was possible for anyone to make her out. It was contended by the appellants that, under the circumstances of the case, the speed of the Earl Spencer was justifiable and proper, and that it was the duty of those on board the Merlin to exhibit a light over the stern of that vessel in sufficient time to enable the Earl Spencer to keep out of the way of the Merlin, and that, even if the speed of the Earl Spencer had been less she could not, by reason of the neglect of duty on the part of the Merlin, have avoided the collision. The learned judge of the court below pronounced the Earl Spencer to blame, on the ground only that she entered the harbour at an improper speed, and, having reserved the question of the duty on the part of the Merlin to show a light, on the 18th Feb. 1875 delivered his judgment, finding that there was no duty on the part of the Merlin to exhibit a light, and that the Earl Spencer was alone to blame for the collision. The judgment of the learned judge will be found ante, vol. 2, p. 525; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 370.

From this decree the appellants appealed, for the following reasons:

1. Because the evidence showed that the Merlin neglected to keep a good look-out astern, as she was bound to do, under the circumstances of the case.

2. Because it was the duty of the Merlin, under the circumstances of the case, to exhibit a light over her stern, or make some signal in due time, to warn those on board the Earl Spencer of her proximity and position.

3. Because the neglect to exhibit a light or to make a signal was the neglect of a precaution required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case, within the meaning of article 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

4. Because it was admitted by the master of the Merlin that if he had seen the Earl Spencer sooner he would have shown a light.

5. Because the finding of the learned judge, founded upon the opinion of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that there was not time or opportunity for exhibiting a light over the stern, is not in accordance with the evidence given by the master of the Merlin.

6. Because the evidence showed that the Earl Spencer kept a good look-out, and that it was impossible to discover the Merlin sooner than she actually did.

7. Because the speed of the Earl Spencer was not excessive under the circumstances of the case.

8. Because the evidence established that it was necessary for the Earl Spencer to enter the harbour at full speed.

9. Because a reduced speed on the part of the Earl Spencer would not have enabled her to avoid the collision.

James P. Aspinall (Butt, Q.C. with him), for the appellants.—It is clearly established by the evidence of the master of the Merlin that he could have seen the Earl Spencer earlier if he had looked round; that he did not look round soon enough to enable him to give us any warning of his position; that if he had looked round he would and could have given us some signal, as it was his practice to do so. There was a good look-out kept on board the Earl Spencer, and the Merlin was seen as soon as it was possible to see her; it was impossible to see vessels on that night at a greater distance than the length of a cable or two; the master of the Earl Spencer acted reasonably, under the circumstances—it would have been dangerous to port, and to have stopped and reversed, as soon as he made out that there was a ship, was not a course he was bound to carry out, as he reasonably believed the schooner was at anchor. The speed of the Earl Spencer was not excessive. Every vessel is entitled to go at full speed when there is no fog, so long as that speed does not necessarily endanger other vessels, and there was nothing here to endanger the Merlin if she had used the due precautions which we say she was bound to do. To rule otherwise would be to say that all steamships are bound to go at such a speed that they cannot overtake and endanger a slow sailing vessel on a dark night; and this would apply equally to ships on the high seas in the usual track of vessels. If the Merlin had given a signal, the Earl Spencer would have recognised her position in sufficient time to have avoided her, and, whatever the speed of the Earl Spencer, there would have been no collision. It would have been dangerous for her to go at less speed at the mouth of the harbour on such a dangerous coast. But even if the speed of the Earl Spencer was too great under the circumstances, with such less speed as she could have kept up with safety to herself, she would not have avoided a collision. She was just at the entrance to the harbour, when the Merlin was sighted. The lowest speed at which she could have gone with safety would have been half speed, which would have been about 7 or 8 knots. She could not have stopped herself after sighting the schooner in time to have avoided the collision any more than if she had been going at full speed. The distance was too short. If the Merlin had displayed a light or signal the Earl Spencer would have been enabled to avoid collision altogether, whatever her speed, either by stopping or by some other means. There was special reason for showing a light in that place, because the land is high, and the Merlin was between the Earl Spencer and the land, and consequently obscured by it, and not so visible as in the open sea. The Merlin was bound under the circumstances to show a light. It is the duty of every vessel, navigating a fairway on a dark night such as this, to show a light to any other vessel approaching astern of the former in such a direction that the leading vessel's regulation lights are not visible to the following vessel, more especially if the following vessel is a steamship and the followed a sailing ship, because the steamship must overtake the other. This duty arises from the regulations and from the maritime law: First. The regulations for preventing collisions contain no provision which prohibits the exhibition of a stern light or signal, but, on the contrary, they expressly provide such a light or signal must be exhibited, if required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or, in other words, by the maritime law or common law of the sea. Secondly. By the practice of seamen, and by maritime law, the exhibition of a light or signal over the stern of a ship, in such circumstances as the present, is obligatory, and in default thereof a ship is precluded from recovering for damage received. First. By article 2 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, the lights mentioned, &c., "shall be caried in all weathers," and "no others." These lights are to be carried on board large vessels, and must be fixed and stationary, as distinguished from other temporary lights: (see Arts. 3, 4, 5.) Wherever lights cannot be fixed they are to be "exhibited" over the side in time to prevent collision (Arts. 6 and 9), thus showing that the rules contemplate a distinction between carrying and exhibiting. Where the rules say that "no other" lights are to be carried, it can only mean that, for the purposes intended by the rules, no other lights are to be carried—that is to say, there is to be no variation in the colour of the respective side lights or masthead light, as the red is intended to indicate port and green starboard; that there is to be no variation in the mode of fixing the lights, as the mode prescribed by the rules is the most effective for the purpose intended, viz., to prevent each light being seen across the bow. It is submitted that the rules indicate only the lights which are to be carried for the purpose of giving warning to vessels ahead, and the way of carrying such lights; they do not interfere with the occasional exhibition of other lights for particular purposes. Under article 9, a fishing boat would be bound to exhibit her red light to a vessel approaching abaft the beam. This contention is strongly corroborated by article 20, providing "nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." If nothing in the rules exonerates a ship from the neglect of a precaution required by the practice of seamen, or by the circumstances of the case, the observance of articles 2 and 5 will not exonerate the Merlin from neglect to show a light or signal astern if such signal was required by the ordinary practice of seamen in the special circumstances. In The Anglo-Indian (ante, p. 1; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233), this question was considered, and the duty to show a light or signal was laid down, and in that case the facts requiring a signal were not so strong as here. Secondly. By the ordinary practice of seamen and special circumstances the Merlin ought to have shown a light and given a signal. The master's own admission shows that it was his practice. The groundwork of all rules as to the exhibition of lights and giving of warnings at night, whether at sea or on land, is that the thing or vehicle carrying the lights is an obstruction in a highway, blocking up the free right of passage and endangering the safety of other vehicles, whether the vehicle exhibiting the lights or giving the warning be in motion or stationary. The duty to exhibit a signal or give a warning does not depend upon the direction in which the vehicle is proceeding. I submit that every vessel, seeing another approaching her which she has reason to believe, from the direction in which she is approaching, does not see her and is likely to come into collision with her, is bound to give some warning to the approaching vessel. The duty to exhibit a light when in motion to vessels ahead is prescribed by the rules. So also with respect to vessels at anchor. But I submit that there is no practical distinction between vessels at anchor and a slow sailing vessel, when approached by a steamer from astern. It is equally an obstruction to the highway, and on a dark night it is next to impossible for a steamer to make it out until too near to avoid a collision. The difference of pace between a sailing vessel beating and a steamer is usually so great that the beating ship is, comparatively speaking, stationary, and this is a thing of course well known to seamen, and one against which they ordinarily provide. The duty of showing a light was laid down first in the case of vessels at anchor, and the duty of vessels in motion did not arise till within recent times, for the obvious reason that it was not until more modern times that commerce increased so enormously and steam made such a difference in speed. But the principle is the same in both cases, namely, that they are bound to give warning of an obstruction, and the obligation arose long before any statutory rules, and out of the maritime custom.

The Louisiana v. Fisher, 21 Howard 1;
The Saxonia, Lush. 410;
The Olivia, Lush. 497.

These cases establish that it is the duty of a ship to exhibit to another approaching, a light. This duty exists wholly irrespective of the direction from which one vessel is approaching the other. The obligation would have existed even if the approach had been from the stern. In The Saxonia (ubi sup.), it is said: "No blame can attach to a vessel for running foul of another vessel if it has been impossible until the collision was inevitable." Hence, before the rules there was an obligation by maritime law to show a light or signal to vessels approaching from the stern when the night was so dark that vessels could only be seen at short distances; that this obligation is not taken away but rather enforced by the regulations; that the present case was most clearly one where a light or signal was necessary, the night being very dark, and the master admitting he would have shown it if he had seen the Earl Spencer; that he ought to have kept a look-out astern, so as to have seen the Earl Spencer sooner, and show a light in time; that the neglect to show the light or signal prevents the plaintiffs from recovering, as there would have been no collision if it had been shown.

Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents.—It is the duty of a following ship to keep out of the way of a ship ahead, and it is so prescribed by the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, article 15; but there is no duty imposed upon the leading ship save that of keeping her course. [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—Is there no duty on the part of the leading ship to keep a look-out astern.] There is a duty to look out ahead, but not astern. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—It must be the duty of some one on board a leading ship in a fairway and crowded place to look round now and then, although she may not be bound to have the same vigilant look-out astern as ahead.] If the steamer had been going at a moderate pace there would have been time to have signalled when she was seen, so as to have prevented a collision. In The Anglo-Indian (ante, p. 1), the duty to show a light astern under some circumstances is laid down, and that is binding, but in the present case, if the steamer had come up at a proper pace, the schooner would have had time to give, and might have given, some signal, but it was impossible to do so in consequence of her excessive speed and the shortness of the time. There is, however, no law requiring a leading ship to have on board a signal to be shown astern. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—But you must take all prudent measures, and would it not be a prudent thing to have some such light or signal?] We were clearly not bound to carry a riding light ready for exhibition. We had no opportunity of getting a light ready. We were entitled to assume that they would see us in due time, and that they would come at a pace which would enable them to take proper measures to avoid us. It was not our province to be supplied with extraordinary means of making our position known. If it had been required that sailing vessel should carry such signals or lights, the sailing rules would have so provided. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—It is said that lights or signals are to be used in special circumstances in article 20.] That does not contemplate that sailing ships are to carry another light ready to supplement the ordinary fixed lights. It is expressly provided by the sailing rules, article 2, that no lights other than those prescribed in the specific articles named therein shall be carried. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—Would you contend that if a vessel approaching you at a moderate rate of speed were unable to see you, and you knew it, and you were necessarily in a place of danger, you were not bound to take some precaution to make her aware of your position? There must be some duty to look astern.] We were bound to do that which any ordinary seamen taking ordinary care would do, but I submit that it was impossible to do anything under the circumstances; they came upon us too rapidly. [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—You could do nothing when you actually saw the steamer, but the master says if he had looked round he could have seen the steamer a long distance, and would have shown a light. Why did he not do so?] The real cause of the collision was, not the failure to give a signal on the part of the Merlin but the excessive speed of the Earl Spencer; but for that they would have had ample time to have avoided us; if they had been going slower when they sighted us, they could have ascertained which way we were going, and then would have had time to shift their helm so as to clear us. If extra signals or lights are encouraged, there will be great confusion and danger ensuing therefrom. The only duty as to look out astern is, that a leading ship must keep such a reasonable look-out as will enable her to give warning to ships approaching at a proper speed.

Aspinall, in reply.—Even supposing the speed of the Earl Spencer was excessive, that would only make her half to blame; if a signal of her position had been given by the Merlin at an earlier period, the Earl Spencer, in spite of her speed, could and would have avoided the collision. When entering a channel where they are likely to be followed, ships are bound to keep some look-out so as to prevent ships coming into them astern by giving a signal, and some one on board ought to look astern sufficiently often to enable him to take precaution in reasonable time.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.—The material circumstances of this case are as follows:

The Merlin, a small coasting schooner of 65 tons, with four hands on board, was bound on a voyage from Carmarthen to Liverpool with a cargo of tin plate, but owing to a strong gale setting in from the S.S.W. she beat up for and entered Holyhead Harbour, and at the time of the collision, which was in the night or towards the morning of the 17th Oct., there being a strong wind and also a drizzling rain, she was going about two and a half knots an hour. The Earl Spencer is a steamer, carrying passengers and cargo, plying between Greenore and Holyhead, and was coming into Holyhead at the same time, taking very much the same course as the Merlin. According to her own showing the steamer entered the harbour of Holyhead at a speed of eleven knots an hour, and at about a cable's length or somewhat more she saw the Merlin in front of her. It appears that the captain came to the conclusion that the Merlin was anchored, although the Merlin showed no light; acting upon that view he put the helm of the Earl Spencer to the starboard, and the result was that in a short time he ran into the port quarter of the Merlin, and the Merlin was subsequently sank. The court below has held that the Earl Spencer was alone to blame for this collision, owing to the excessive speed at which she entered the harbour. Their Lordships have no doubt that the finding of the court is right so far as the Earl Spencer is held to be to blame. Their Lordships entirely agree that she entered the harbour with a reprehensible and they may add a reckless speed, considering the time of the night, the state of the weather, and that a number of vessels were in the habit of anchoring very near to the path which she took.

It appears to their Lordships also that she is to blame for executing a wrong manœuvre. Seeing no light on board the Merlin, and seeing the Merlin in the usual route of the steamers, which would not be the usual anchoring ground, though not far from it, it appears to their Lordships that the captain was not justified in assuming that the Merlin was at anchor, and that he took a wrong manœuvre in starboarding his helm, whereas if he had attended to the advice of the mate in time, which was to port the helm, the collision would have been avoided.

The question remains whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the Merlin. The captain of the Merlin certainly says that he was at the helm, and that if he had looked round he probably could have seen the steamer some considerable distance off, and if so that he should have waived a light or adopted some mode of attracting her attention.

On the whole, however, their Lordships see no reason to dissent from the finding of the court below, that the Merlin was not guilty of contributory negligence such as would fix her with a portion of the blame of this collision. Their Lordships do not at all depart from the rule which they laid down in a recent case, The Anglo-Indian (ubi sup.). They are far from saying that it is never the duty of a vessel ahead to look behind. There may, undoubtedly, be circumstances of an exceptional character which may throw upon the vessel ahead the duty of looking behind, and, further, of giving some signal, by the way of a light or otherwise, to a vessel behind approaching her under circumstances under which there is reason to suppose that the after vessel does not see the vessel in front, and when there is danger of a collision. But in this case, although no doubt the night was a dark, and to a certain extent a stormy one, it appears to their Lordships that the Merlin could have been seen at a sufficient distance by the steamer for the collision to have been avoided if the steamer had gone at a proper speed (which, according to their Lordships' view, would be somewhere about one half or possibly less than half of the speed at which she was going). That being so, the captain of the Merlin might reasonably have supposed that steamers coming in his wake would (as their primâ facie duty at all events was) keep out of his way, and their Lordships are not able to say that he was guilty of negligence contributing to the accident, simply because a look-out behind was not kept, and no signal was given to the approaching vessel.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the court below is right, and they would humbly advise her Majesty that it be affirmed, and that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and CYRIL DODD, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 20 and Feb. 12, 1875.

LOCKHART v. FALK.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Demurrage—Lien and exemption clause—Detention at port of loading—Action for by shipowner—Construction of charter-party.

By a charter-party between the plaintiff and the defendant, a vessel of the plaintiff was to proceed to W. and there load a cargo "in the customary manner," and forthwith proceed to R. and deliver the same. . . . "The cargo to be discharged in ten working days (weather permitting), commencing from the day after the ship has got into her proper discharging berth. Demurrage at 2l. per 100 tons register per day. . . . The ship to have an absolute lien on cargo for freight and demurrage, the charterer's liability to any clauses in this charter ceasing when he has delivered the cargo alongside the ship." It was proved that at W. the customary rate of loading was twenty tons a day.

In an action by the shipowner against the charterer for damages for undue detention of the vessel at the port of loading, the judge of the County Court held that the claim was not for demurrage, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for 44l. 2s. 8d., being damages for detention for sixteen days at the rate of 2l. 15s. 2d. per day. And on appeal therefrom, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Cleasby, Pollock, and Amphlett, BB.), dismissing the appeal, that the decision of the County Court judge was right, and that the demurrage and lien and exemption clauses in the charter-party were applicable to the port of discharge only, and did not apply to the shipowner's claim for damages arising from delay on the part of the charterer at the port of loading.

Bannister v. Breslauer (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 36 L. J. 195, C. P.; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 497), and Francesco v. Massey (L. Rep. 8 Ex. 101; ante, vol. 2, p. 594, n.), discussed and distinguished. (a)

(a) Since the above decision the Exchequer Chamber, in Kish v. Cory (ante, vol. 2, p. 593), have decided somewhat differently. In that case a charter-party between a shipowner and a charterer provided that the cargo was to be loaded in thirteen working days, and was to be discharged at not less than thirty-five tons per working day from the time of the ship being ready; that there should be ten days on demurrage for all like days above the said days, to be paid at the rate, &c.; and that the charterer's liability should cease when the ship was loaded, the captain or owner having a lien on cargo for freight and demurrage. An action was brought by the shipowner against the charterers for four day's demurrage at the port of loading beyond the thirteen clear working days allowed by the charter party, and it was held that the demurrage days related to the port of loading as well as the port of discharge, and that the charterer's liability for all such demurrage ceased when the ship was loaded. The distinction between that case and the present is that in the present there were no definitely named number of days for loading, consequently no days to which the term demurrage, as strictly applied, could refer at the port of loading; whereas in Kish v. Cory there was a definite number of loading days, and therefore, in accordance with the decisions, the demurrage clause was held to apply to both port of loading and discharge. It is to be regretted, however, that the meaning of the word "demurrage" should be so restricted. In the ordinary commercial sense it means

The date given in the bill of lading is not conclusive evidence that the cargo was shipped before that date.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the County Court of Yorkshire, and the following are the material facts of the special case stated by the judge for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The plaintiff in the action entered a plaint for 50*l.* and the following were the particulars annexed to the summons: "The plaintiff sues the defendant for that on the 16th March 1874, it was mutually agreed between Jno. Corran, the master of the plaintiff's vessel, the Zoe, of 138 tons, as agent for the plaintiff and the defendant, that the plaintiff's said vessel should go with all convenient speed to Western Point, and there load, from the defendant or his factors, a full and complete cargo of rock salt, in the customary manner (certain damages and accidents excepted), and demurrage was to be 2*l.* per 100 tons register per day. And the plaintiff's vessel proceeded to Weston Point, and did all that was necessary to have the defendant's part of the charter fulfilled; but the defendant did not load the said vessel in the customary manner, but detained her twenty-nine days beyond the usual time, namely, from the 2nd to the 20th April last, both inclusive; and the claim for detention amounts to 52*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*, and the plaintiff abandons the excess over 50*l.*, and sues for 50*l.* only."

The cause was heard on the 21st July 1874, when the following appeared to be the facts: The plaintiff is the owner of a vessel called the Zoe, and the defendant is a salt merchant. On the 16th March 1874, Jno. Corran, the master of the Zoe as agent for the plaintiff, and the defendant, entered into a charterparty, of which the following is a copy:

It is this day mutually agreed between Jno. Corran, master of the good ship or vessel called the Zoe . . . now in Runcorn, and H. E. Falk, that the ship . . . shall with all convenient speed, proceed to Weston Point and load from the said H. E. Falk, or his factors, a full and complete cargo of rock salt, in the customary manner, say abont 250 tons . . . and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Riga Bridge and there deliver the same. Freight, at the rate of 10*s.* 3*d.* (say ten shillings and three pence) and five guineas gratuity, per delivered ton of 20cwt. being paid by the receivers of the cargo, on the delivery of the same, in cash, at the current rate of three months' London exchange. The cargo to be discharged in ten working days (weather permitting), commencing from the day after the ship has got into her proper discharging berth. Demurrage at £2 per 100 tons register per day. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, amount of freight. The ship to be addressed to the charterers' agents and brokers at the ports of discharge, paying the usual addressed commission of the port ("the act of God," &c., excepted). The ship to have an absolute lien on cargo for freight and demurrage; the charterer's liability to any clauses in this charter ceasing when he has delivered the cargo alongside the ship. Vessel to clear with charterer at Runcorn.

Liverpool, this 16th of March 1874.

(Signed) JOHN CORRAN,
Per proc H. E. FALK,
THOS. LANCASTER.

The vessel proceeded to Weston Point on the 20th March, and on the 21st March notice was given to the defendant that the vessel was ready to load cargo. The captain called repeatedly afterwards at the defendant's office, and from time to time was promised that the cargo should be sent alongside, but none was, in fact, sent until the 11th April, and between that date and the 20th April, the defendant loaded on board the Zoe part of the cargoes of several lighters, and sent the rest of such cargoes to other vessels which he was loading in the same dock. On the 18th April the balance to complete the cargo was alongside the ship, but it had to be lifted on shore and weighed before it was loaded on board the Zoe, and the loading was not completed until the 20th April.

The ship sailed on the 20th at 10 a.m. There was no evidence of any demand for demurrage or detention before such sailing, or until after all the cargo was delivered alongside. Bills of lading were signed by Jno. Corran the master, dated the 18th April; but, at the hearing, he deposed that he did not sign them until the 20th April. The bill of lading (a copy of which was here set out in the case), was made "unto order or to order of assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter party." It was proved by the plaintiff that the usual despatch of the port was twenty tons per working day for loading, and it was contended on his behalf that at that rate the loading should have been completed on the 4th April, and he claimed damages for sixteen days' detention of the ship from that day until the 20th April.

It was submitted on the part of the defendant that as no evidence had been given of a claim for demurrage or detention at the port of loading having been made until after all the cargo had been delivered alongside, and till after the vessel had sailed, the liability of the defendant under the charter-party had ceased, that the demurrage, for which the captain had an absolute lien on the cargo, included such detention or delay in loading as had occurred in the present case; that the plaintiff was bound by the date of the bill of lading; and that at all events the amount must be reduced to the sum of 5*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.* Judgment was given for the plaintiff for 44*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, the amount which the learned County Court judge thought the plaintiff was entitled to recover, viz., for sixteen days at 2*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* a day. The learned judge was of opinion that the word "demurrage" in the foregoing clause of the charter-party did not apply to detention prior to delivery of the cargo at the port of loading, and that the plaintiff's claim for such detention was not affected by the said clause.

The grounds of appeal were: first, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover against the defendant anything in respect of demurrage, or damages in the nature of demurrage, or on the particulars of his claim as filed in this action; secondly, that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover any sum, the damages awarded were excessive, the evidence proving that the whole cargo was delivered alongside the ship before or not later any detention of a ship in port of loading or discharge and whether any number of days have been named for loading or not; and a charter-party is essentially a commercial document, drawn by commercial men, who may be presumed to intend the meaning which a word ordinarily conveys to their minds. It is to be hoped that the decision in Kish v. Cory will lead to a more liberal interpretation of the word, and that it will be held that whenever a lien is given for freight and demurrage, and the charter-party exempts the charterer from liability when the cargo is loaded, the exemption extends to any detention at the port of loading. The charterer inserting these clauses is usually only an agent, and the master has ample security against the principal by means of his lien.—ED.

than the 18th April; thirdly, that the plaintiff did not, at any time before action make any demand for demurrage or for anything comprised within his particulars.

Gully for the defendant (appellant).—Substantially the plaintiff's claim is for "demurrage" at the port of loading, and the word applies to any damage arising from undue detention or delay, and must be so construed on the present occasion. Demurrage and detention differ in this, that in the one case there is a fixed number of days, and in the other the days are not fixed; but that is not material here because the days can be ascertained precisely by reference to the number of days in which the vessel could be loaded "in the customary" manner at the particular port. The plaintiff's claim is for the stipulated demurrage amount of 2*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* a day, and for that he had a lien on the cargo, and cannot maintain this action, all liability on the charterer's part having ceased upon the cargo being delivered alongside. In Francesco v. Massey (ante, vol. 2, p. 594, n.; L. Rep. 8 Ex. 101; 42 L. J. 75, Ex.) the last case in which the question of demurrage was discussed, it was decided that the protection to the charterer afforded by a clause similar to that in the present charter was coextensive with the lien given by the charter-party, and that it extended to demurrage at the port both of loading and discharge, and that the ship having been loaded, no action lay against the charterer for demurrage accruing during the loading. [CLEASBY, B. referred to Gray v. Carr (ante, vol. 1, p. 305; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522; 40 L. J. 257, Q. B.) to the same effect as Francesco v. Massey, and the cases of Christoffersen v. Hansen (ante, vol. 1, p. 305; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 509; and Bannister v. Breslauer (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418; 36 L. J. 195, C. P.; L. Rep. 2, C. P. 497)]. The result of all the cases would appear to be that where a lien is given and a certain number of days for demurrage fixed by the charter-party, the lien is applicable only to those fixed days, and not to any detention beyond the fixed period. Here the delay in loading gives rise to the lien; and as the loading was to be in the "customary manner," the custom of the port showed that a certain time was allowed for loading. Whether, therefore, the charter-party itself specifically fixed the precise time, or the time could be made certain by construing the words of the instrument with reference to the facts of the case, the result was precisely the same. The parties intended to make provision for demurrage at both ends, the loading and the discharge, and the clause applies to both accordingly. The words "lien for demurrage" in this charter mean the demurrage therein mentioned at 2*l.* 15*s.* 2*d.* a day, or they mean nothing. That is the plaintiff's claim, and for that the verdict was given. But if this claim is for "demurrage" it is barred by the last clause in the charter-party when the loading was completed. (He contended also that the bill of lading was an estoppel to the claim of damages for delay beyond the 18th April.)

R. G. Williams, Q. C. (with him was E. T. Wheeler) for the plaintiff (respondent).—If no time is fixed after which demurrage begins, then no claim for demurrage arises. It is not necessary, however, to make it strictly demurrage that the time should be fixed. The defendant here has contended that the clause providing for the loading being accomplished "in the customary way" is equivalent to a precise number of days being specifically fixed, but those words had no reference to time at all. They relate merely to the manner of loading, as, e.g., by lighters or from the wharf, &c. For that there is conclusive and express authority. Thus, in Lawson v. Burness, in this court (1 H. & C. 396), Pollock, C.B. said (at p. 400), "It appears to me that the words 'customary manner' mean the mode of loading, whether from a lighter or from a wharf." And in Tapscott and others v. Balfour and others, in the Common Pleas (ante, vol. 1, p. 501; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 710; 42 L. J. 16, C. P.; L. Rep. 8 C. P, 46), Bovill, C.J. approved of that construction of those words, and thought that the words directing the loading of a vessel in the "usual and customary manner" applied not to the time, but to the place or mode in which the loading was to be performed. The rate of "2*l.* per 100 tons per day," and the "ten days" limited by this charter, have relation to a demurrage claim, whereas the plaintiff's claim is for not loading within reasonable time, as to which the charter fixes no rate or number of days at all, and so the exemption from liability clause is not applicable. In Maude and Pollock on Shipping, 3rd edit. p. 305, "demurrage" is well defined as the "sum which is fixed by the contract of carriage as a remuneration to the shipowner for the detention of the ship beyond the number of days allowed for loading or unloading." Such a clause as the last clause in this charter-party relates primâ facie, to future and not to past liabilities: (See Pedersen v. Lotinqa, 28 L. T. Rep. 267; Christoffersen v. Hansen (ubi sup.) No doubt in Oglesby v. Yglesias (E. B. & E. 930; 27 L. J. 356, Q. B.), and Mildam v. Perry (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736; 3 E. & E. 495; 30 L. J. 90, Q. B.), it was held to apply to past and already accrued liabilities; but that was because the express words of the instrument rendered such a construction necessary; but that will not be in the absence of express words, or such as raise a clear inference to that effect. The case of Francesco v. Massey (ubi sup.) is clearly distinguishable. There was there a time fixed for both loading and discharging, and demurrage was given at both ports. [CLEASBY, B. —In Bannister v. Breslauer (ubi sup.) a provision for the ceasing of the charterer's liability on the shipment of the cargo was held no answer to an action for delay in loading.] No time was fixed in that case for loading or unloading, nor was there a demurrage clause, and if the clause did not apply to detention there was nothing to which "demurrage" could apply. And, moreover, that case had doubts thrown upon it in Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.) The present charter fixed the time for discharging, but is silent as to that for loading, and the lien and exemption clause must be limited to after claims at the port of discharge, and cannot be applied to the present claim for damages already incurred at the port of loading.

Gully, in reply, referred to and distinguished the cases cited on the other side.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 13.—The judgment of the court (Cleasby, Pollock and Amphlett, BB.) was now delivered, as follows, by CLEASBY, B. — The question in this case is whether the charterer is liable for detention at the port of loading by not loading in the customary manner? There is also a question of amount depending upon the number of days during which the vessel was detained.

We think that the detention must be taken up to the time when the cargo was loaded, and that the date of the bill of lading is not conclusive.

There is a clause in the charter-party giving the shipowner a lien for freight and demurrage, and providing that the charterer's liability shall cease upon the cargo being delivered alongside the ship. The question really becomes whether what may be called the "lien and exemption" clause which, no doubt, applies to demurrage, properly so called, applies also upon the language of this charter, to a clause for undue detention at the port of loading. A similar question has frequently arisen before, and we should not think of departing from what has been already decided; but it must always be borne in mind that if the language be not the same, the decision may not be applicable. There is no case exactly the same as the present case.

The word "demurrage," no doubt, properly signifies the agreed additional payment (generally per day) for an allowed detention beyond a period either specified in, or to be collected from the instrument; but it also has a popular and more general meaning of compensation for undue detention time; and from the whole of each charter-party containing the clause in question, we must collect what is the proper meaning to be assigned to it.

When the charter-party contains no clause allowing demurrage at a specified rate at all, it has been held that the word "demurrage," in the exemption clause, applies to detention, and that the charterer is discharged as soon as a cargo is on board. This was the case of Bannister v. Breslauer (ubi sup.). That decision is certainly not applicable to the present case, because we have in this charter-party a demurrage clause, though not a precise one. In the present case the charter provides that the ship shall be discharged in ten working days, and afterwards has these words: "Demurrage at 2*l.* per 100 tons register per day."

It has also been decided that where there is a time specified for loading, and also a time for unloading, fixed by its being at the rate of so many tons a day, and afterwards a demurrage clause for a fixed number of days, at one agreed price per day, then in that case the exemption clause applies to demurrage whether at the port of loading or of discharge; but it was thought clear that it did not apply to detention beyond the ten days and demurrage days at the port of loading. This was the case of Francesco v. Massey (ubi sup.). The effect of that decision is that, where there is a clause for demurrage at a specified rate for a certain number of days, and, a number of days being allowed for loading, there can be demurrage in the proper sense at the port of loading, the exemption clause applies to demurrage there. And if we could read the provisions for loading in the present case, as fixing a particular time for doing so, the decision would apply at all events, to the period, although not specified, to which the demurrage clause might be considered to apply. But we do not think that we can read the words, that the vessel shall load a cargo "in the customary manner," as equivalent to a provision that she shall load in a certain number of days, or at a certain rate per day, for the purpose of applying the word "demurrage" to a detention beyond that period; those words do not admit, in our opinion, of an addition that she may remain, if she does not load "in the customary manner," for a number of days on demurrage.

The conclusion at which we arrive is, that, in the present case, the word "demurrage" in the lien and exemption clause must be confined to demurrage days after the ten working days allowed for discharge, and must not be extended to improper detention at the port of loading. The decision of the court below was therefore right, and this appeal must be dismissed.

THE NILE.

Salvage—Apportionment—Government transport—Owners—Senior naval officer—Transport officer—Right to reward.

A ship chartered to Government as a transport under a charter-party in the ordinary form used by the Government for chartering ships in time of war, is not demised to the Government in a way which deprives her owners of the right to salvage reward for services rendered by her under the directions of the Queen's naval officers commanding at the place where she is stationed.

The senior naval officer on a station sending out of harbour a transport with her own crew and a number of men from one of her Majesty's ships, for the purpose of rendering assistance to and towing into harbour a ship in distress, is entitled to share in the sum awarded for the service, and the naval officer (being also a transport officer of the station) who commands the men from H.M.'s ship, is to be considered so far in charge of the whole expedition that he is entitled to reward in that capacity.

THIS was an application to the High Court of Admiralty to apportion between salvors a sum of 1000*l.* recovered in two consolidated causes instituted in that court by them for salvage services rendered to the steamship Nile. The two causes were instituted, the one on behalf of owners, master, and crew of the steamship Finisterre, and the other on behalf of the commander, officers, and crew of H.M.S. Simoom. The owners of the Nile appeared, and filed an answer to the plaintiffs' petition, by which they pleaded a tender of the sum of 1000*l.*, and this amount having been duly tendered, was accepted by the plaintiffs.

The facts, as stated by the plaintiffs in their petition in the consolidated causes, were as follows:—

1. The Finisterre is a screw steamer of 551 tons register, with engines of 90-horse power nominal, working up to about 400-horse power, and is of the value of about 18,000*l.* H.M.S. Simoom is an iron steamship of 1980 tons register, and carries a complement of 172 officers and men. The Nile is a screw steamer of about 725 tons register, and was, at the time of the occurrence hereinafter mentioned, bound for Demerara with a general cargo.

2. On the 27th Feb. 1874 the Finisterre (which was then engaged under charter in her Majesty's Transport Service) was lying at anchor at Porto Grande, in the Island of St. Vincent (one of the Cape de Verd Islands), with some stores on board. (Copies of the charter-party and sailing instructions from the Admiralty to the master of the Finisterre are hereto annexed, and may be referred to as part of this petition.) The Simoom also lay at anchor at Porto Grande, under the command of Capt. Peile, R.N. the senior officer of Her Majesty's navy in that locality.

3. In the forenoon of that day, whilst the Finisterre was coaling for her return voyage to the Gold Coast, a boat's crew from the Nile landed at St. Vincent with the intelligence that the Nile was then lying outside in a helpless state, fast drifting on to the rocks on the north-east side of the island. The boat's crew applied for immediate assistance to the vice-consul, who acquainted Capt. Peile with their request.

4. The master of the Finisterre, on receipt of a communication from Capt. Peile, at once got up steam and made preparations for towing, and by about 1 p.m. the Finisterre was able to weigh anchor and put out to sea under steam, having previously taken on board from the Simoom Navigating-Lieutenant Adlam, transport agent at St. Vincent, two petty officers, four seamen, and twenty-one Kroomen, together with a 9in. hawser, and other gear, sent by the order of Capt. Peile. The wind at this time was blowing a fresh gale from the north and east, with a heavy sea running, with a current setting in the same direction as the wind.

5. At about 2 p.m. Point Columna was rounded, and the Nile was sighted to the northward, and about five miles distant. She had all possible sail set, but she lay helpless and unmanageable in the trough of the sea, with the sails all aback, and was drifting directly on to a rocky lee shore, with no anchorage ground near. She had no steam, the main shaft of her screw having broken many days previously, since which time she had drifted helplessly.

6. The Finisterre, proceeding at full speed, came up with the Nile at about 3.30, and, heaving to, inquired by signal if the Nile wanted assistance, and received the answer, "Yes." The master of the Nile then asked what the Finisterre would charge for towing the Nile in? Those on board the Finisterre answered that they could make no agreement. The master of the Nile then told the Finisterre to take him in tow.

7. The Finisterre remained hove to while the Nile took in all sail, both vessels in the meantime rolling heavily. After all sail had been taken in, the Finisterre got into position off the Nile's starboard bow and lowered her port lifeboat, manned by the two petty officers and two of the seamen from the Simoom. A heavy line was taken by the boat to the Nile, and by this means a new 10in. hawser of the Finisterre, and the 9in. hawser of the Simoom, were passed on board the Nile and were with considerable difficulty made fast; the Finisterre's hawser was made fast to her chain cable, which had been ranged along her deck and carried over the stern, so as to give the full weight of the vessel in towing, and to prevent the hawser parting. The Simoom's hawser was made fast round the Finisterre's mainmast.

8. Whilst these operations were being carried on, in a heavy sea, the Finisterre maintained her position (though not without great difficulty) by alternately going ahead and backing her engines, and in so doing she ran great risk of fouling her propeller with the hawser, and of being completely disabled.

9. After the hawsers were made fast the Finisterre gradually got a strain upon them, and then went ahead in a south-westerly direction, endeavouring for about three-quarters of an hour to get the Nile before the wind and sea, and in a position for towing ahead. During this time both vessels rolled and pitched heavily, and it was a matter of great difficulty to prevent the hawsers from parting and keep the Finisterre in position. At length the Nile was got before the wind and was towed towards the harbour of St. Vincent, then about twelve miles distant.

10. Before the entrance of the harbour was reached it became dark. There were no harbour lights, and the Finisterre had no pilot on board; moreover, the Nile steered badly, and yawed about a good deal. Under these circumstances it was not prudent to attempt the usual entrance, but the Finisterre, taking a long sweep round, entered the harbour on the southward or leeward side of Bird Island, and brought the Nile safely to an anchor in 10 fathoms of water at about 9 p.m.

11. At the time the Finisterre made fast to the Nile the latter vessel was quite helpless, and was in such a position that nothing but steam power could have prevented her from drifting on to the rocks in the course of a very short time, and there becoming a total wreck; no steamer besides the Finisterre was at hand or could have been procured. It was the Harmatton season at the time when the services were rendered, during which season thick haze suddenly falls over the sea and island, and totally obscures the island. If such haze had set in, the danger to both vessels would have been greatly increased.

12. In rendering the above-mentioned services the Finisterre incurred considerable risk of damage by collision with the Nile, and also of being disabled by the fouling of her propeller. Had she been disabled her position would have been one of extreme peril.

13. The men from the Simoom took an active part in all the measures adopted for the preservation of the Nile, and materially contributed to her safety. The task of the boat's crew which took the heaving line to the Nile was one of considerable danger.

14. The damage done to the machinery of the said ship Nile was afterwards repaired at St. Vincent, in order to do which a considerable portion of her cargo was discharged and landed. A working party of six seamen and ten Kroomen was furnished from the Simoom to assist in such discharge, and were employed thereat, in conjunction with the crew of the Nile, on the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th days of March following.

The charter-party mentioned in the second paragraph of the petition, so far as material, was as follows:—

This charter-party of affreightment, made the 12th Nov. 1873, by and between the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland (for and on behalf of her Majesty) of the one part, and Charles Ellis (of the firm of H. Ellis and Sons, of 17, Gracechurch-street, shipbrokers, the owners of the steamship undermentioned) of the other part: Whereas a copy of the Regulations for Her Majesty's Transport Service has been delivered to the second-named party, and to the master of the ship hereinafter mentioned, before the execution hereof, as the second-named party doth hereby admit, and the said regulations are to be taken to be incorporated and to form part of this charter, in so far as they are applicable hereto: Now it is hereby witnessed that the second-named party has let, upon and subject to the conditions and rules specified in the said regulations, so far as they are applicable hereto, and the said Commissioners have hired and taken to freight the good ship undermentioned, viz.:

Ship's name.	Gross tons by register, new measurement.	Master's name.
Finisterre	... ... 551	George Hearsley

For service and employment as a transport on monthly hire for the space of five calendar months certain, and thenceforward until the Commissioners, for executing the office of Lord High Admiral aforesaid for the time being shall cause notice to be given to the said second-named party, his executors or administrators, or to the master or other person having charge of the said ship, that she is discharged from her Majesty's service, such notice to be given when the ship is in port in the United Kingdom. And the said second-named party does covenant and agree with the said Commissioners in manner following, that is to say, that the said ship shall, at all times during the continuance of this charter, be strong, firm, tight, staunch, and substantial, both above water and beneath, and in every respect seaworthy and properly manned, fitted, stored, furnished, equipped, and found, at the proper cost and charge of the said owners and that the said ship shall proceed to such ports or places (with or without convoy, at the option of the said Commissioners) as the said Commissioners, or any officer authorised by them, shall from time to time order and direct, and so from time to time during the continuance of the said ship in her Majesty's service, and that in the performance of all services required to be performed under the regulations aforesaid, the said master and his crew, with his boats, shall be aiding and assisting to the utmost of their power; that the said master, or other person having charge of the said ship, shall not nor will take or permit to be taken on board thereof during her employment under this charter-party, any passengers, goods, letters, or effects, without the licence and consent of the said Commissioners, or the officer in chief whose command he may be under, in writing, for that purpose first had and obtained; and that the master of the said ship (for and on behalf of the owners) shall obey all orders and instructions which he may receive from the said commissioners, or any officer authorised by them, and the master shall in all respects comply with the said Regulations for her Majesty's Transport Service, and with the Instructions for Masters of Transports, copies whereof have been delivered to him as aforesaid; and that the owners of the said ship shall be held responsible to her Majesty for any deficiency in quantity, or any loss or damage which shall arise to the public stores or provisions from the state of the ship's stowage, or from any incapacity, want of skill, insobriety, or negligence on the part of the master, officers, or crew of the said ship or any of them, according to such valuation as shall be set upon them by the proper officer of the department to which they shall belong. In consideration of which covenants, &c. [The charter-party here provided for the rate of freight to be paid to the owners, and the mode of payment, and proceeded:] And it is further agreed on the part of her Majesty, that if the said ship shall happen to be by the enemy burnt, sunk, or taken during the aforesaid service, and it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the said Commissioners that the same did not proceed through any fault, neglect, or otherwise in the master or the ship's company, and that they made the utmost defence they were able, the value of her shall be paid by her Majesty, according to the valuation made thereof on the declaration of officers of the said Commissioners (reasonable wear and tear first deducted); but that if the said ship shall be lost from the dangers of the seas or tempest, or be driven on shore by accident, stress of weather, or any other cause, and thereby lost, damaged, captured, or rendered incapable of service, either upon an enemy's or a friendly coast, such loss damage capture, or insufficiency, shall be considered as a sea risk, and her Majesty in such case shall not be liable to pay for or be in any manner prejudiced by any such loss, damage, capture, or insufficiency, &c.

The following paragraphs of the regulations for her Majesty's Transport Service (referred to in the petition) were used in the course of the case:

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDA.

The terms used in the following Regulations are to be understood as follows, unless there be something in the context or subject-matter repugnant to or inconsistent with such construction, viz.:—

. . . . . .

3. "Transport:" A ship wholly engaged for the Government service, on monthly hire, or a ship wholly engaged by Government to execute a special troop, or convict service, though not hired by the month.

Chapter 3.—Transports and troop freight ships; employment, pay, fittings, manning, and supplies.

35. A "transport" being a ship wholly engaged by the Government, either on monthly pay or for the execution of a special service, the rate of hire is to represent merely the charge for her use as a ship complete and ready for sea, as defined by Art. 36, and manned in accordance with Art. 42. The vessel will be employed in the conveyance of troops, horses or other animals, stores, or as a hospital ship, or in any other way that may be ordered, and the place of fitting will be decided on acceptance.

When necessary steam transports will be required to tow other vessels.

The "Instructions for Masters of Transports" referred to were as follows:—

Chapter 1.—General instructions.

Art. 1. The master is to obey all orders which he may receive from the Director of Transport Services, from any transport officer attached to the ship, or from officers in charge of divisions or resident at ports; also, from naval superintendents or senior naval officers. Should there be no naval officer, he is to obey the orders of the military or other Government authorities in the execution of the services which he may have been directed to perform.

When a transport officer is attached to the ship, the master will receive all orders through him; but should orders at any time be delivered direct to the master, he is immediately to communicate them to the transport officer, and he is at all times to afford him every facility in the execution of his duties.

Art. 2. The master is to make himself acquainted with the conditions of the charter-party, with the Regulations of Her Majesty's Transport Service, with these Instructions, and the Printed Instructions to Transport Officers, and he is to comply with the directions, stipulations, and conditions contained therein.

Art. 4. The master is to take especial care that all the boats are constantly ready for immediate service, &c.

The crew and boats are to be at all times available for the police service, either in loading or discharging cargo, embarking or disembarking troops, obtaining supplies of provisions, water, &c., or for any other purpose connected with the vessel's employment as a transport; and a suitable boat, with a proper crew and fully equipped, as required by the Regulations, is at all times to be held at the disposal of the transport officer.

Art 11. Should any improper conduct or incivility occur on the part of the master, the ship's officers or the crew, towards the transport officer, the military officers, troops, or passengers on board, it will be reported to the divisional officer, or in his absence to the resident transport officer, naval superintendent, or senior naval officer at the port at which the vessel may be lying, or at which she may first touch, by whom the complaint will be investigated, even to the suspension of the master from his duties, if it be considered imperatively necessary. The master, however, will not be removed from the ship, excepting under the authority of the flag officer in command at the port, or on the station.

Three sets of salvors claimed to have the sum recovered apportioned between them; the owners master, and crew of the Finisterre; the commander, officers, and crew of H.M.S. Simoom; and Lieut. Adlam, who was navigating lieutenant of the Simoom, and also chief transport officer at St. Vincent.

W. C. Gully, for the owners, master, and crew of the Finisterre.—The owners of the Finisterre are entitled to salvage as well as her master and crew. The service was mainly effected by means of steam power, and this is at the risk and expense of owners, who are thereby entitled to reward. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Is not the Finisterre to be considered as a Government ship, and, consequently, debarred from recovering salvage so far as the ship is concerned?] I submit not. By the charter-party the owners are to bear all risk, except that of capture by the enemy, and was only chartered to carry provisions from St. Vincent to Cape Coast. Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Was she not under the orders of the Simoom?] Only in so far as she was under the orders of the Admiralty, and bound to fulfil her agreement under the direction of the naval officers. There was no legal obligation, under the charter-party or otherwise, upon the master of the Finisterre to go out of Porto Grande to render assistance to the Nile, even when ordered to do so by the commanding officer, Capt. Peile; it might have been necessary to obtain that officer's permission before going, but there was no obligation to go. The mere setting in motion of the Finisterre and directing her to proceed to the assistance of the Nile, is not such a service which will entitle Capt. Peile to participate in the reward; nor can the part of the crew remaining on board the Simoom claim, as they had no extra duties thrown upon them. This is not like a case of prize, where the commanding officer shares with those acting under him. It must be shown in a salvage cause that something has actually been done by the person claiming. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE. —If the Finisterre had been a tender to the Simoom, Capt. Peile's order for her to go out would have entitled him to salvage reward.] The only thing which gives a right to salvage is the incurring of labour, trouble, or risk. If a tug owner sends out his tug, it is the risk, and not the order to go out, that entitles him to salvage. Capt. Peile gave an order, but ran no risk and took no trouble. If the Finisterre had perished the loss would have fallen entirely upon her owners, and not upon Capt. Peile. There was nothing in the charter-party entitling him to order her to run the risk. A ship under charter to the Government can only be employed in accordance with her charter-party, and although the Regulations for her Majesty's Transport Service (par. 35), provide that she will be employed in the conveyance of troops, &c., and "in any other way that may be ordered," those words must mean, "in some other ways in which a transport ship is usually employed," not in rendering service wholly unconnected with the transport service. And, again, the duty imposed by Instructions to Masters of Transports (art. 1), to obey all orders given by the transport officers and by senior naval officers, relates only to orders given in relation to transport service and not to the ordinary duties of the navigation and working of the ship, which is wholly in the control of the master. A transport officer on board would not take command; the master would direct the working of the ship. Hence, although the master may have received assistance from Lieut. Adlam and his men, the master was really at the head of the salving party.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for Capt. Peile and the officers and crew of H.M.S. Simoom.—If Capt. Peile had power to order the Finisterre to go to render assistance, he is clearly entitled to salvage. That is settled in The Thetis (3 Hagg. 14, 57), which was a claim by the king's officers and the admiral on the station to share in salvage reward, and in that case Sir C. Robinson says: "On these facts several propositions have been advanced, with statements of the respective parties which have been withdrawn or qualified in argument so as to diminish very considerably the points now in dispute. The owners first denied the right of king's officers to claim salvage, and maintained that they were bound to proceed on any service which might call for their skill and labour, without reference to any private emolument; that Capt. Dickinson was bound to obey the order of Admiral Baker, and that it was not competent to him to aver that he acted independently of the admiral, so as to entitle him to remuneration. But these topics have not been urged by their counsel, and the argument has been confined to the proper estimate of their quantum of reward. Again, Admiral Baker represented himself as principal salvor, as agent appointed by the underwriters, and also as having engaged in their service as a speculator on his own private account; but I do not understand that either of these propositions has been maintained by his counsel, and it is manifest that almost everything which he did was done by authority and in virtue of his command. . . . It is alleged on his behalf (Capt. Dickinson), 'that there is no principle of constructive assistance in civil salvage, and that no admiral or commanding officer of a station, not being an actual salvor, but merely by virtue of such command, has any right to claim to share in the salvage earned by, and awarded to, a ship belonging to such station.' There is no difficulty in acceding to this proposition, as expressed in these terms. What is earned by or awarded to a ship will not be disturbed by secret constructive claims, but that will not exclude a claim from being propounded on behalf of an admiral on special grounds of extensive contribution of assistance; and in regard to the description of the admiral's service in this case, as mere constructive assistance, I think it went far beyond that, and what is proposed as the test of that principle, the performance of mere official duties. . . . The services which Admiral Baker represents himself to have performed beyond the disputed merit of originating and directing the service, are, that he furnished men and stores from the ships at his own responsibility, and procured some things at his own cost and credit. . . . If, then, admirals can be entitled at all for anything but mere personal presence and exertion, it must be for such services as these, which are infinitely more conducive to the success than the admiral's own presence could in this instance have been. The case of The Aquila (1 C. Rob 37), which has been so much relied upon, seems to admit that some services might have entitled even a magistrate, though it is not said what they should have been. It would be saying nothing to require personal service: since, then, such persons would not be distinguished from any other. The exception supposed in that case is, in my judgment, very applicable to the present, as authority for what I am disposed, as the effect of general principle alone, to hold; and on these observations I shall pronounce that Admiral Baker is entitled to share as having contributed effective assistance; and deeming it expedient, in a case of novelty, to act as far as I am able on rules and principles established in analogous cases, and thinking that the proportion allowed in other civil cases will not be unfit to be applied to this, I shall adopt the rule of the prize proclamation." On appeal to the Privy Council (2 Knapp, 390) the amount awarded to the admiral was increased, on account of the "responsibility, which it is quite clear that in the first instance Admiral Baker took upon himself." That is a distinct authority that a naval officer not actually present, but putting in motion and directing a salvage service is entitled to share. To entitle to salvage reward, personal work and labour is not necessary; it is enough that the claimant does some act which furthers the salving of the property:

The Purissima Concepcion 3 W. Rob. 181;
The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. 37.

Capt. Peile was senior naval officer. He was applied to for assistance, and immediately ordered the Finisterre to go out and take off some men from the Simoom; he alone could have done this. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In The Aquila (ubi sup.), Lord Stowell says, speaking of a magistrate who claimed as a salvor, having protected derelict property from plunder: "This, however, is certain, that if a magistrate, acting in his public duty on such an occasion, should go beyond the limits of his official duty in giving extraordinary assistance, he would have an undeniable right to be considered as a salvor; it will therefore be necessary to inquire what has been the extent of this gentleman's services; if they amount to the ordinary discharge of his duty, I shall be disposed to leave him to the general reward of all good magistrates, the fair estimation of his countrymen and the consciousness of his own right conduct."] But there is a considerable distinction between the position of a naval officer and a magistrate; the latter is bound to protect property that is in danger and to prevent robbery; there is no duty on a naval officer to send out a ship to perform a salvage service. Capt. Peile having the power of sending out his own crew and stores, and of ordering out the Finisterre, took upon himself the responsibility and direction of the whole service. He took upon himself the risk of the loss of the crew and the transports, by which the Government would have been seriously inconvenienced during the war then going on in Ashantee, even if they would not have had to pay for her loss, as she was sent out under Capt. Peile's orders. Where, in the case of a derelict ship, the master of the salving ship puts on board the derelict some of his hands, and so becomes short handed, he always receives a considerable sum for his responsibility; here no salvage could have been effected, but for Capt. Peile, and he was alone responsible, and should be rewarded accordingly. The definition of a "transport" in the regulations shows that the Finisterre was not intended to any particular service, but was in the general service of the Government, and hence under the orders of the senior naval officer of the station and could be ordered where he chose. In The Scout (ante, vol. 1, p. 258; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 371; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 512), the salving ship was wholly demised to charterers, and they were held entitled to recover salvage to the exclusion of the owners; here there is no absolute demise, but still the owners did not contribute to the service in any way; they may have sustained a risk, but nothing further. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the Finisterre had been lost, could her owners have recovered from the Government?] That may be doubtful, and hence I cannot contend that they ran no risk; but I say there is no claim for the ship, because under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 484, "Where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to her Majesty, or by the commander or crew, thereof, no claim shall be made or allowed for any loss, damage or risk, thereby caused to such ship, or to the stores, tackle, or furniture thereof," and the Finisterre was for the time being at least a "ship belonging to her Majesty." Under the charter-party, the Government paid for the coaling of the Finisterre, and saving the stipulations as to the payment of the master and crew, she was entirely in the service of the Government. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The owners were responsible for repairs and for all loss by sea or tempest. Do not those words take her out of the category of a Government ship, that risk falling upon the owners? It is difficult to contend that the private character of the ship is destroyed by this charter-party, and if she is still a private ship, her owners may recover for all services outside their contract, as if there had been no charter-party.] At any rate, the fact of her being so chartered reduces the amount to which the owners are entitled, as they were put to less expense and risk. In The Collier (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 87), where the owners of the salving ship were the charterers of the salved ship, it was intimated that the fact that they were so interested in the property salved would affect the quantum: so here, I contend, that the Finisterre, partaking of the character of a Government vessel, her owners are only entitled to a diminished reward. Moreover, as the whole control of the ship had passed out of the hands of the master into those of the transport officer on board, and the owners were put to no expense, and as the service was rendered under orders, it might fairly be supposed that the Government would have paid any loss sustained, and, therefore, the owners' risk is very small, and the reward they would have received under ordinary circumstances ought to be diminished by the special circumstances of the case. There is a duty upon transports to tow other vessels imposed by the Regulations (par. 35), and by the Instructions (art 1), to obey the orders of the senior naval officer and of the transport officer. A transport officer was on board the Finisterre and in charge of her, and he was sent out by Capt. Peile. The services of the crew of the Simoom are set out in the petition.

E. C. Clarkson, for Lieut. Adlam, submitted that, as transport officer in command of the Finisterre, he had the whole control of the salvage service, and was in effect the principal salvor; the men from the Simoom were under his orders, and they actually made fast to the Nile. Although the owners cannot be altogether excluded, there is really very little distinction between the present case and The Scout (ubi sup.). In effect, the master and crew were in the service of the Government, as this was a time charter-party, and their whole time was to be devoted to the Government; it mattered not to the owners how they were employed. The only distinction between the present case and The Scout is, that in that case the charterers paid the wages, in the present the owners paid them; the risk of loss of ship fell upon the owners in both cases.

Gully, in reply.—As it is admitted that there was no demise of the Finisterre to the Government, the ordinary rule as to the reward to be paid to a steamship should prevail. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Your ownership was very much curtailed. Can you say that you can support your full claim when the order for the service emanated from Capt. Peile?] This being a service outside the charter-party, the master was not bound to obey the order, and might have refused; in consenting to go he was risking the property of his owners. Capt. Peile was only entitled to give such orders as were within the ordinary course of the transport service. By the Instructions (art. 4), a ship's crew and boats are to be available for the public service, either in loading or discharging cargo, &c., "or for any other purpose connected with a vessel's employment as a transport," clearly showing that her duties are confined to the duties of a transport. The mere giving of an order to render service is not enough to entitle to salvage. In The Thetis (ubi sup.), the admiral did more than give orders, he assisted in making plans for and effected the service. In The Purissima Concepcion (ubi sup.), the express ground on which the shipping agent was allowed to recover was, that he personally superintended the service. As to Lieut. Adlam, it does not anywhere appear that he took command of the Finisterre, and it should, therefore, be presumed that the master remained in command of his own ship.

May 11.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case a salvage service of considerable merit was rendered on the 27th Feb. 1874 to a large screw steamship called the Nile, lying on the north-east side of the Island of St. Vincent, in a state of the greatest danger. At the time when the service was rendered, the Finisterre, a screw steamship of 551 tons, with a master and twenty-one men, was lying at anchor at Porto Grande, in the Island of St. Vincent, and in the same port lay H.M.S. Simoom, under the command of Capt. Peile, the senior officer of her Majesty's navy in that place. A boat's crew from the Nile went to the vice-consul, asking for assistance. He referred them to Capt. Peile, who communicated with the Finisterre. The result was that a lieutenant, two petty officers, four sailors, and twenty-one Kroomen went to the Finisterre, and this vessel, with these officers, in addition to her own crew, proceeded to the Nile and brought her in safety into port. For this service 1000*l*. has been tendered and accepted. The court is now asked to apportion this sum among the salvors.

There is no doubt the principal salvor was the Finisterre; the steam power which she supplied was the agent in delivering the Nile from her perilous situation. But a question has arisen, who are entitled to receive her share of remuneration, and whether, in consequence of certain circumstances, that share is, notwithstanding her steam power, to be of a more limited character than, on general principles, it would otherwise be.

The peculiar circumstances are these. The Finisterre, at the time of the Ashantee War, had been chartered by the Government as a transport. By the terms of the charter-party she supplied her own crew and master, and if she was burnt, sunk, or taken by an enemy, her value was to be replaced by her Majesty to her owners; if she was lost from the dangers of the sea or tempest, or from being driven on shore by accident, such loss was to be considered as a sea risk, and not to be indemnified by her Majesty. The charter incorporated certain regulations for her Majesty's transport service, and instructions for masters of transports. According to the latter, "the vessel will be employed in the conveyance of troops, horses or other animals, or stores, or as a hospital ship, or in any other way that may be ordered." I must here observe that I am of opinion the words "in any other way" must be construed as applying to things ejusdem generis—things connected with transport service. It is also provided in the instructions that the master may receive orders from the senior naval officer.

Having reference to those documents, I am of opinion that the Finisterre was never demised—indeed it was not so contended—to her Majesty; that there was no temporary transfer of ownership to her Majesty, and that her owners are entitled (a point faintly, if at all contested) to her share of the salvage remuneration.

I think, however, that she was so far under the control of the senior naval officer, Capt. Peile, that on the one hand she could not have acted as salvor without his permission; though, on the other hand, she could not have been ordered by him to perform this service, which was not in my judgment within the terms of her charter. And I think that in awarding her remuneration, I ought to bear in mind that she was set in motion, so to speak, by Capt. Peile.

The same observation leads me to the conclusion that these officers are undoubtedly to be considered, having regard to the principle and decided cases on the subject, as the meritorious salvors.

I am also of opinion that Lieut. Adlam, who must be mentioned as having had, in a great measure at least, charge of the expedition, has a distinct persona standi as a salvor.

I award 400*l*. to the owners of the Finisterre; 200*l*. to Lieut. Adlam; and 400*l*. to Capt. Peile and the crew of the Simoom and the Kroomen on board the Finisterre.

THE ADRIATIC.

Collision—Failure to render assistance—Onus of proof—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 16.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 16, having imposed upon the master of every ship, in case of collision with another ship, a duty, "if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own vessel, crew, and passengers (if any), to stay by the other vessel until he has ascertained that she has no need of further assistance, and to render to the other vessel, her master, crew, and passengers (if any), such assistance as may be practicable and as may be necessary to save them from any danger caused by such collision;" this duty is not discharged by a steamship, where, it being practicable and safe to lower a boat to render assistance, although possibly dangerous to stay by the injured ship, she continues her voyage without lowering her boat, and merely hails and signals for other vessels to go to the assistance of the other ship.

A ship failing to render assistance to another with which she has been in collision, and showing no reasonable cause for such failure, will be held to blame for the collision, unless proof be given to the contrary on her behalf.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the three-masted schooner Columbus, against the steamship Adriatic, and her owners intervening.

On behalf of the Columbus it was alleged as follows:—

The Columbus was bound upon a voyage from Fowey to Runcorn, and had on board a crew of six hands, all told, and the master's wife and child.

On the 8th March 1875, at about 9 p.m., the Columbus was boarded by a licensed pilot, about two miles west of the North-west Lightship off the entrance to the Mersey; she was working up channel, and her lights were burning brightly and a good look-out was kept on board of her till after the collision. The wind was blowing a fresh breeze from the S.S.W., and at about 11 45, p.m., the Columbus was on the port tack heading west, and about mid-channel, and a mile S.E.E. of the Crosby Lightship, when the pilot, as the flood tide had made, gave orders to take in sail and to get the anchor ready for letting go. The crew of the Columbus obeyed the pilot's orders, and her helm was put down. The Columbus, however, did not come up into the wind more than a point or a point and a half, having but little or no way on her, and her crew were in the act of hauling down her jibs, when the Adriatic, whose mast head light had been previously seen three miles off, was observed coming up at great speed, with all three lights visible, about a quarter of a mile on the starboard beam of the Columbus. The crew of the Columbus loudly hailed the Adriatic to stop and reverse, but the Adriatic still kept on at great speed. Immediately before the Adriatic struck the Columbus, the Adriatic went off under a starboard helm, but immediately after struck the Columbus with great violence on the starboard quarter, just aft the mizen rigging, cutting right into the Columbus and taking her quarter clean off, carrying away the wheel, deck house, and bending the rudder. The blow caused the Columbus to fall alongside the Adriatic, starboard side to starboard side. The crew of the Columbus loudly hailed for assistance, saying that their stern was gone; but the Adriatic steamed ahead and left the Columbus, did not stay by her, and rendered her no assistance, and did not ascertain if assistance was required; no boat was lowered from the Adriatic, and except burning a blue light, she offered no help, but proceeded on towards Liverpool. The Columbus immediately began to sink, and her boat was put out, into which all got, but the Columbus sank so rapidly that the boat was capsized, and her crew were compelled to hang on to the topgallant yard, which remained above water. The master's wife was rescued by her husband, but his child was drowned. The survivors were picked up after an hour by the steamer Enterprise. The plaintiffs' petition further alleged:

17. A good look-out was not kept on board the Adriatic.
18. Those on board the Adriatic improperly neglected to starboard in due time.
19. Those on board the Adriatic were going at too great a speed.
20. Those on board the Adriatic improperly neglected to slacken her speed, or to stop and reverse in time.
21. Those on board the Adriatic improperly, and without reasonable cause, failed to stay by the Columbus, or to render her assistance, or to ascertain if the Columbus had need of assistance.

On behalf of the defendants it was alleged as follows:—The Adriatic was a steamship of about 3888 tons gross register, and at the time of the collision was on a voyage from New York to Liverpool, with about 400 passengers. At about 11.50, p.m., on the 8th March 1875, the Adriatic, in charge of a compulsory pilot, passed the Crosby Lightship, steaming dead slow, and so continued along the narrow channel between the lightship and the Rock Lighthouse. A good look-out was kept on board the Adriatic, and her lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly. The night was very dark, but clear, and a vessel, which proved to be the Columbus, having no light visible, was made out about a point and a half on the port bow of the Adriatic, apparently heading so as to cross the course of the Adriatic from port to starboard. The helm of the Adriatic was immediately put hard a starboard, and her engines stopped, but the starboard bow of the Adriatic came into contact with the starboard quarter of the Columbus. The blow appeared to those on board the Adriatic to be a slight one, and they had no reason to suppose that the Columbus had sustained any serious damage. The Columbus then dropped alongside the Adriatic, and drifted astern. Whilst the vessels were alongside, those on board the Adriatic hailed the Columbus and asked if she needed assistance, and no reply was made. When the Columbus drifted astern, the Adriatic was nearly athwart the channel, and those in charge of the Adriatic could not attempt to stay by the Columbus without exposing the Adriatic and the crew and passengers on board her to danger. But whilst the pilot was manœuvring to get the Adriatic into position in the channel, rockets and blue lights were burned on board the Adriatic, and three steam vessels, the Voltaic, the Enterprise, and the Kittiwake, came within hail of the Adriatic, and were directed by the master of the Adriatic to proceed to the Columbus and render any assistance that she might be in need of. The defendants' answer alleged that the Columbus neglected to have her regulation lights duly exhibited, and was in fault for such neglect; that they neglected to keep their vessel under command, suffered her to drift, and neglected to let go the anchor in proper time; the defendants also pleaded inevitable accident and compulsory pilotage.

The cause came on for hearing on the 25th and 26th May, 1875, before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters. Witnesses were called by both plaintiffs and defendants. The main questions of fact in the cause were, whether the lights of the Columbus were burning and visible, and whether the Adriatic sufficiently complied with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), sect. 16, in rendering assistance or causing assistance to be rendered to the Columbus, or whether there was any reasonable cause for the Adriatic not giving such assistance. It appeared that immediatly after the collision the Adriatic went ahead, and on getting straight in the channel kept on her course to Liverpool, and did not lower a boat. No evidence was given to show that she communicated with other steamers, as alleged by her, beyond the burning of the blue lights and hailing, &c. The finding of the court upon these and the other facts of the case will be found in the judgment.

Milward, Q.C. (J. T. Goldney with him), for the plaintiffs, contended that under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect 16, it was the duty of the Adriatic to stand by and render assistance. Her crew knew that the Columbus was injured; they did not know the extent; they hailed and got no answer; and yet they lowered no boat, but went away. The mere hailing another vessel, under no obligation whatever to render assistance, is not enough, even if there were such hailing. This neglect to give assistance throws upon the defendants, within the words of the section, the onus of proving that they are not to blame. The master of the Adriatic failed to render assistance, and, unless "reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision must, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default." No such reasonable cause exists, as he might have lowered a boat whilst straightening up the channel, and then have waited for his boat. He was in no such danger as would prevent this. The defendants, then, are to blame, in the absence of proof to the contrary, and of this proof they have given nothing. The lights of the Columbus were burning, and there was nothing to prevent the Adriatic from making her out in time to avoid a collision.

Butt, Q.C. (G. Bruce with him), for the defendants, contended that the lights of the Columbus were not alight, or they would have been seen from the Adriatic. The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 does not impose any positive obligation upon a ship damaging another to render assistance herself. It is sufficient if she procures assistance to be rendered. This the Adriatic did by signaling for other ships to give assistance. She could not render assistance herself without danger to herself and passengers in such narrow waters, and this was in itself a "reasonable cause for such failure," within the meaning of the Act. The defendants have given sufficient proof that the collision was not caused by their negligence in showing that all precautions were used and a good look-out kept, and yet the Columbus could not be discovered in sufficient time to avoid a collision.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of an unfortunate collision which happened between 12 and 1 o'clock at night, on the 8th March last, in the Crosby Channel, about a mile S.E. of the Crosby Lightship. One of the vessels, the Columbus, was a three-masted schooner of 167 tons register, coming from Fowey to Runcorn, with a crew of six hands, all told, and the captain's wife, and, unfortunately, his child, who perished in consequence of the collision. The other vessel was a ship of great size, 3883 tons gross register, and she was prosecuting a voyage from New York to Liverpool, having with the passengers and crew altogether about 400 persons aboard. The Adriatic struck the starboard quarter of the Columbus, under the circumstances which I am about to mention, and cut off her stern; the Columbus sank, the boat which she put out was capsized and also sank; the topgallant yard remained above water, which the crew managed to reach, and the captain saved his wife in an almost miraculous way, as she was floating about almost insensible, but the child which she had in her arms was lost.

Now, both the vessels were coming up the Reach, which lies about a mile S. to S.S.E. of the Crosby Lightship. The wind at the time was S.S.W. The schooner was ahead of the screw steamer two or three miles, and when she had come to a distance a little below the Crosby Light, she, under the advice of her pilot, went across the river in order to anchor. The pilot ordered the helm to be put down, and her canvas to be taken in. The canvas under which she was is thus described by the captain. He says, when he had got about midchannel, the mainsail and mizen were set full, and all square sails were out; he had the jib set, and the staysails were down.

This misfortune having happened in the way which I have described, the court is compelled to consider the bearing of the Act of Parliament, to which so much reference has been made, because there is no doubt as to this fact, that after the collision the captain of the Adriatic thought it his duty to proceed on his voyage. It is quite true that he starboarded to get out of the way of the schooner, and afterwards ported and stopped a time. What the exact time was is a matter of great dispute in this case. But he ported; and having got himself straightened down the river, went on to Liverpool without stopping, or in any way rendering assistance, by means of his vessel or his boats, to the vessel with which he had come in contact. What he did was—and he says it was best under the circumstances—that when he fell in with two or three steamers he told them that he had come into collision with another vessel, and desired them to go to assist her, but he himself rendered no assistance at all.

The 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 16, enacts that: "In every case of collision between two vessels, it shall be the duty of the master or person in charge of each vessel, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own vessel, crew, and passengers (if any), to stay by the other vessel until he has ascertained that she has no need of further assistance, and to render to the other vessel, master, crew, and passengers (if any), such assistance as may be practicable and as may be necessary in order to save them from any danger caused by the collision." There is a further portion of the enactment, which it is not necessary to state, but it goes on: "If he fails so to do, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default."

Now that he knew in this case that he came into collision with another vessel, and had done her some injury, is not contested. He himself says he hailed the other vessel and asked if she was much injured, and that he had received no answer to that inquiry, and having received no such answer, he conceived she was not much hurt, and took steps to get the other vessels to go and see what assistance they could render the vessel, and ascertain whether she had been much damaged or not. Now the evidence on the other side says, not only is it untrue that there was no answer to the hailing, but that there were screams and shouts for assistance, which were neglected by the Adriatic. The vessel that did come up and render assistance was the Enterprise; and it is possible, as has been suggested by Mr. Butt, that the captain of the Adriatic imagined that he had communication with the vessel, whereas it was with other steamers. But the evidence given by the master of the Enterprise is, that his attention was attracted, that he saw the Adriatic coming up, and she did not speak to him, but that he heard cries which caused him to stop his ship, and lower his boat and go to the assistance of those people clinging to the yard, and who were thus saved.

Now, the captain of the Adriatic says he was in command of a vessel of unusual length, 450ft.; that he was in great danger himself of going on the Crosby shore; that he could render no assistance to the other vessel as effective as that which could be given by the other steamers; and that it was untrue to say he went away immediately, and did not stop for a certain time. But there was one point not disputed, and which seems to me and the Elder Brethren to be decisive against the defence set up by the captain of the Adriatic, namely, that there was no reason why he should not have lowered his boat and sent it to the assistance of those who were struggling in the water; so that the defence he has made in the pleadings, and the explanations he makes through his counsel of what occurred after the collision, do not prevent me from saying he is to blame. If he stopped for a considerable period, as he says he did, what was there to prevent him from lowering a boat, and endeavouring to find out to what extent this vessel was damaged? I think it not improbable to suppose, in spite of what has been said, that if that course had been pursued, the life of the unfortunate child would have been saved.

But whatever may have been the result, I am of opinion, and I am supported in it by a conference with the Elder Brethren, that it was the clear duty of the captain of the Adriatic not to have proceeded on, but to have stayed by the vessel and lowered his boat, and not left her until he had ascertained what her condition was. While I say this, I acquit the captain of the Adriatic of any deliberate intention of inhumanity altogether; it would be very wrong to charge him with that. It is very likely that his great anxiety with regard to his ship, her unusual size, the number of passengers he had, and other circumstances, interfered with that presence of mind which he ought to have exercised on this occasion. I think, therefore, to use the words of the statute, he has shown "no reasonable cause for failing to stay by the vessel," or rendering such aid as was in his power.

The next question is, whether the collision should not "be deemed to have been caused by his neglect or fault," or whether there is "proof to the contrary."

Now this part of the case lies in the very narrowest compass, because it is admitted by the counsel for the defendants that if there was evidence to satisfy the court that the schooner carried her side lights, and especially her green light, they ought to have been visible and must have been visible to the Adriatic at a sufficient distance to enable her to get out of the way of the other vessel; therefore it comes to a question as to the credibility of one set of witnesses and the other, where there is a conflict between them, negative on the one side and positive on the other, as to the fact of the schooner having carried proper lights. Now, in this case I do not feel that amount of difficulty which sometimes presses in a case where the evidence on both sides is so closely balanced, because it is not denied that, up to the time that the schooner went about, she was carrying proper lights. I do not think that the contrary could have been contended for with much success, and I wish to say that I never heard better evidence than that given by the wife of the captain of the Columbus. She pointed out, as the reason why she saw the lights, that she took her child to see them, as she was in the habit of doing, and she saw that they were in their proper places. But the same witness speaks with equal positiveness to having seen the red light up to the time of the collision.

I have no hesitation in saying that the positive evidence greatly exceeds, in point of value and weight, the negative testimony on the part of the defendants. I have no doubt, and no hesitation in pronouncing as a matter of fact, that the Columbus did carry her side lights at the time of the collision; and, if so, it is admitted that the Adriatic was alone to blame for the collision. That being admitted, and that being the finding of the court, I so pronounce.

THE EASTERN BELLE.

Co-owners—Sale—Mortgage—Arrest of ship in co-ownership suit—Right of mortgage to release.

Where a part owner of a ship institutes a suit against the ship claiming as against his co-owner an account and a sale of the ship, a mortgagee holding a mortgage, which would not be satisfied by a sale of the ship, is entitled, on intervening in the suit, to a release of the ship and to his costs from the time of his claiming the release.

A shipowner sold certain shares in a ship and, the purchaser having neglected to register the sale, subsequently mortgaged the whole ship to a third person, who had no knowledge of the previous sale, to secure a balance exceeding the value of the ship. The purchaser subsequently registered his shares, and then finding the mortgage registered, instituted a suit against the ship claiming as against his co-owner an account and the sale of the ship. The mortgagee intervened and claimed the release of the ship and damages and costs for its detention:

Held that the mortgagee was entitled to the release of the ship and to costs from the time the plaintiff became aware of the mortgagee's claim.

THIS was a cause of co-ownership instituted in rem on behalf of George James Atkins, part owner of the Eastern Belle, against that ship. The cause was instituted on the 10th March 1875, and no appearance was entered on behalf of any other part owner, but on the 15th March an appearance was entered on behalf of John Grant Morris, a mortgagee of 64-64th shares of the ship.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the pleadings. The plaintiff's petition was so far as is material as follows:

1. The Eastern Belle is a ship of 1,130 tons gross register, belonging to the port of Liverpool. The plaintiff is the owner of 8-64th shares therein. The remaining 56-64th shares are nominally vested in James Baines, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, but the plaintiff is unable to say whether or no he is beneficially entitled to the same except as appears from the facts hereinafter stated.

2. The Eastern Belle was purchased in or about the month of May 1872, through one Henry Jonas Smith on behalf of himself and certain other persons who are unknown to the plaintiff. The plaintiff was requested by the said Henry Jonas Smith to purchase 8-64th shares, and consented to do so and paid for the same on the 15th June 1872, and the said shares were duly transferred to him by bill of sale, dated the 18th July 1872.

3. After the date of the said purchase the plaintiff was informed by the said Henry Jonas Smith that the Eastern Belle was engaged in making voyages from Liverpool to Valparaiso under charter, and to other places. The plaintiff from time to time made applications to the said Henry Jonas Smith and James Baines, for information respecting the freight earned by the said ship, and the amount of profits due to him as part-owner thereof, but the plaintiff was for a long time wholly unable to obtain any information respecting the same.

4. On or about the 19th Feb. 1874, after repeated applications the plaintiff received from the said James Baines a promissory note for 175*l*. This was represented to the plaintiff to be his share of the profits of the first voyage of the Eastern Belle, in respect of his 8-64 shares therein, but no accounts or vouchers of any kind were furnished to the plaintiff. The said promissory note was dishonoured at maturity, but renewed by the plaintiff at the request of the said James Baines for a further period of three months, when it was again dishonoured, but ultimately paid on proceedings being taken in respect thereof.

5. The plaintiff continued to apply for accounts respecting the earnings of the Eastern Belle, but was wholly unable to obtain the same until, in the month of October 1874, an account was rendered to him whereby it appeared that the profits due to the plaintiff in respect of his said shares arising out of the said first voyage of the Eastern Belle amounted to the sum of 314*l*.

6. The Eastern Belle has completed several other voyages, and has earned divers large quantities of freight, and there is due to the plaintiff, in respect of his shares thereof, a large sum of money; but the plaintiff, though he has repeatedly applied for the same to the said Henry Jonas Smith and James Baines, has been wholly unable to obtain any account in respect of the said freight.

7. The Eastern Belle is about to leave England in ballast, but the plaintiff has not been consulted with respect to the said voyage, and is unwilling that the said ship should be sent on the said voyage until the accounts between the co-owners is setttled.

8. There are accounts outstanding and unsettled between the said co-owners of the said vessel in respect of the matters above-mentioned.

The petition concluded by praying the judge "to refer the said accounts to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amounts due to the plaintiff and to direct the said vessel to be sold."

An answer was filed on behalf of the mortgagee which so far as material was as follows:

1. At the time of the request referred to in the second article of the petition filed in this cause, Henry Jonas Smith in the said article named, explained to the plaintiff that the sum of 500*l*. which it was proposed that the plaintiff should pay for eight sixty-fourth parts or shares in the said ship was to be the purchase-money not for eight unincumbered shares, but for eight shares subject to a mortgage on the ship, it being then proposed to raise about 4,500*l*. by mortgage on the said ship.

2. Accordingly, on the 11th July 1872, James Baines in the said petition named, who was then sole registered owner of the Eastern Belle by an instrument of mortgage of that date, mortgaged her to James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Ronaldson to secure to them the repayment of the sums for the time being due on that security, whether by way of principal or interest, and such mortgage was thereupon duly registered at the Custom House at Liverpool which was and is the said ship's port of registry.

3. The said James Baines, by bill of sale, dated the 5th July 1872, transferred to William Roberts eight sixty-fourths in the said ship. Such bill of sale was not registered until the 7th Aug. 1872, on which day it was registered at the said custom house as being subject to the said mortgage.

4. The bill of sale to the plaintiff referred to in the said second article of the said petition was and is a bill of sale, bearing date and executed on the 18th July 1872, whereby the said William Roberts, in consideration of the sum of 500*l*. transferred eight sixty-fourth parts or shares to the plaintiff. The plaintiff neglected to register such bill of sale until the 28th Feb. 1873, on which day he caused it to be registered as hereinafter stated.

5. In the month of Jan. 1873, the defendant John Grant Morris, who was then under advances to the said James Baines, on an account current between them, the repayment of which advances was secured to the said defendant by mortgages to him by the said James Baines of two ships called the Cavour and Belle Isle, of which the said James Baines was then the registered owner, was requested by the said James Baines to advance and lend him the sum of 5,000*l*., for the purpose of paying off the said mortgage to James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Ronaldson, and to make further advances which the said defendant agreed to do upon having a mortgage of the said ship Eastern Belle, of which the said James Baines represented himself as being sole owner, made to the said defendants to secure the repayment of the sums from time to time owing from the said James Baines to the said defendant on account current between them. The said James Baines is still the registered owner of the Cavour. The Belle Isle was totally lost in the month of May 1873.

6. The said defendant, however, caused search to be made by his solicitors, Messrs. Bateson and Company, of the register of the said ship on the first day of Feb. 1873, and they found that the said William Roberts appeared to be registered owner of eight sixty-fourth parts thereof, and the said defendant required the said James Baines to obtain from the said William Roberts a bill of sale of such shares. Accordingly, the said William Roberts, by bill of sale, dated the first day of Feb. 1873, transferred eight sixty-fourth parts or shares in the said ship James Baines, and such bill of sale was thereupon duly registered. The said James Baines thereby became, as the said defendant believed, sole owner of the said ship.

7. The said James Baines then by an instrument of mortgage in the form prescribed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, dated the said first day of Feb. 1873, by him duly executed, mortgaged sixty-four sixty-fourth parts or shares in the said ship to the said defendant, for the purpose of securing the repayment by the said James Baines to the said defendant of the amounts which should from time to time be owing, whether by way of principal or interest from the said James Baines to the said defendant, and the said defendant on the same day caused the said mortgage to be duly registered at the said custom house. The said defendant thereby became, and has ever since been and still is duly registered mortgagee of sixty-four sixty-fourth parts of the said ship. By a deed of even date with the said statutory mortgage and made between the said James Baines of the one part and the said defendant of the other part, and duly executed by the said James Baines, the terms of the said security intended to be granted by the said statutory mortgage were declared. The said defendant craves leave to refer to the said deed.

8. On the 4th Feb., the said defendant, at the request of the said James Baines, paid to the said James Wilkie Adamson and Thomas Ronaldson, the sum of 5000*l*., in discharge of the amount due to them or their said mortgage; and received from them their instrument of mortgage with a memorandum of discharge indorsed thereon, and such discharge was duly registered at the said custom house on the 7th day of the same month.

9. On the 28th Feb., the plaintiff's said bill of sale of the 18th July 1872, was registered at the said custom house, as subject to the defendant's said mortgage.

10. By reason of the negligence of the plaintiff in not registering his said bill of sale until the said 28th Feb., he enabled the said James Baines to represent himself and to appear to the said defendant as sole owner of the said ship, and the said defendant was induced to believe and did believe that the said James Baines was such sole owner, and the said defendant made the said advance of 5000*l*., and has from time to time made further advances to the said James Baines, on his, the said defendant's, mortgages of the Eastern Belle, of the Cavour, and Belle Isle, in the belief that the said James Baines was such sole owner; and the said defendant had not until after the institution of this suit any notice or knowledge that the plaintiff was entitled, or claimed to be entitled, to any share or interest in the Eastern Belle.

11. The plaintiff has always left the chartering and employment and management of the Eastern Belle to the said James Baines, who, on or about the 16th Sept. 1874, with the authority of the plaintiff, entered into a charter party of that date with Messrs. Dreyfus, Freres, and Cie., of Paris, whereby it was mutually agreed that the said ship then lying in Peru, loading or on passage to port of call for orders to discharge in the United Kingdom or Continent (and after discharging cargo of guano, having liberty of loading outwards from United Kingdom or Continent for a port or ports en route for owner's benefits), should, as soon as discharged, proceed to Callao, and be placed at the disposal of the said charterers' agents for orders to load a cargo of guano at any one of the guano deposits in Peru for carriage to the United Kingdom or the Continent, which cargo the charterers bound themselves to ship, the freight to be paid being seventy-two shillings and sixpence per ton if discharged in the United Kingdom, and two shillings and sixpence per ton extra if on the Continent. The said defendant craves leave to refer to the said charter-party, which is a beneficial one for the ship. The said defendant before the institution of this suit made considerable advances to the said James Baines on the security of the said mortgages for the purpose of meeting the outlay necessary to fit and enable the Eastern Belle to perform the said charter-party; and at the time of her arrest in this suit she was about to leave Falmouth in ballast for the purpose of proceeding in the performance of the said charter party.

12. At the time of the institution of this suit, there was owing to the said defendant, upon account current between himself and the said James Baines, upon the security of the said ships Cavour and Eastern Belle, the sum of 20,401*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, or thereabouts, and such sum and a further amount for interest since accrued, still remain owing to the said defendant from the said James Baines on the said mortgage securities. The said ships are not together of sufficient value to pay to the said defendant the amount due to him on his said securities. The plaintiff before the institution of this suit had notice that the said James Baines, being the sole registered owner of the Eastern Belle, had as aforesaid mortgaged her to the said defendant, and that such mortgage was still on foot, notwithstanding which the plaintiff has without any notice to the said defendant and without making any offer to redeem the said vessel or his 8·64th parts thereof, arrested the said vessel in this suit, and the plaintiff is keeping the said vessel under arrest and preventing her from performing the said charter-party, and earning her freight thereunder; and by reason of such arrest the said defendant, who is desirous of taking possession of the Eastern Belle as mortgagee thereof, and of enabling her to earn her freight, is prevented from so doing, and also from exercising the power of sale given to him by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, if and when he may think fit, and the powers conferred upon him by the recited deed of even date with the said statutory mortgage.

13. On the 24th March 1875, the said defendant caused notice in writing of his desire to have possession of the Eastern Belle for the purpose of enabling her to earn her said freight, to be given to the plaintiff, but the plaintiff still persists in keeping the said ship under arrest. The defendant craves leave to refer to the said notice.

The answer concluded by praying the judge "to declare that the defendant, John Grant Morris, as duly registered mortgagee of 64·64th parts or shares of the Eastern Belle, is entitled to the possession of the said vessel Eastern Belle, and to order the said vessel to the released from arrest, and to order that possession thereof be given to the said defendant, and to declare that the plaintiff was not, as against the said defendant entitled to arrest the said vessel, and that he is not entitled to keep her under arrest, and to reject the prayer of the plaintiff; that the said vessel be sold, and to condemn the plaintiff in all damages sustained, or to be sustained by the said defendant by reason of the said arrest, or of the said vessel being kept under arrest, and to refer it to the Registrar to report the amount of such damages, and to condemn the plaintiff in costs of this suit incurred by the said defendant, and that further and otherwise right and justice may be administered to the said defendant in the premises."

The reply filed on behalf of the plaintiff was so far as is material as follows:

1. The plaintiff admits the allegations contained in the first article of the said answer.

2. As to the second article of the said answer, the plaintiff admits the same except, so far as it refers to the terms of the mortgage therein mentioned, to which the plaintiff craves leave to refer.

3. The plaintiff admits the allegations contained in the third and fourth articles of the answer, and as to the third article he further says, that he was induced to delay the registration of the said bill of sale by and at the request of the said Henry Jonas Smith.

4. The plaintiff has no knowledge of the matters alleged in the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth articles of the said answer, and does not admit the same.

5. The plaintiff denies the allegations contained in the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth articles of the said answer, and further says, in reply to the twelfth article, that if the accounts between the defendant and the said James Baines, in respect of the said ships Cavour, Belle Isle, and Eastern Belle, are properly taken, the value of the said ships is sufficient to satisfy the claim of the defendant, and also the amount due to the plaintiff. The charter-party in the eleventh article mentioned is not a beneficial charter-party. It was made without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, and not on behalf of the defendant, and the plaintiff is unwilling that the said ship should sail on such voyage, unless the amount due to him is otherwise secured.

6. In reply to the thirteenth article of the said answer, the plaintiff says that the notice therein referred to was not given until after the institution of this suit, as will appear by reference to the minutes of the proceedings of this Honourable Court.

7. Before the time when the defendant made the advances to the said James Baines in the twelfth article of the answer alleged, the defendant had notice that the plaintiff was the beneficial owner of 8·64 shares in the said vessel Eastern Belle.

8. The plaintiff has always been ready and willing and has offered to transfer his shares to the defendant or any other person, and to give up possession of the vessel on having the amount due to him secured, as he is entitled to have.

9. At the time of the arrest of the Eastern Belle in the suit, the plaintiff had no notice or knowledge whatever of any mortgage to secure an account current either to the defendant or to any other person.

10. The plaintiff has been and is willing to concur in any sale that may be decreed by this Honourable Court, and that the proceeds thereof may be received by this Honourable Court for the purpose of being dealt with when as soon as the accounts have been properly taken between the said James Baines and the defendant, and between the plaintiff and his co-owners.

The reply concluded by praying the judge "to pronounce against the prayer of the defendant, and to direct that the accounts may be taken between the defendant and the said James Baines, and between the plaintiff and his co-owners, and to declare the plaintiff is entitled to have the ship kept under arrest, or bail given until such accounts have been duly taken, and to condemn the defendants in the costs of, and occasioned by his said appearance and answer, and to make such further and other order in the premises as right and justice may demand."

The rejoinder filed on behalf of the defendant was so far as material as follows:

1. They say that the several allegations contained in the reply filed in this cause are immaterial, and the said reply is bad in substance.

2. That the defendant, John Grant Morris, has not any knowledge as to the allegation contained in the third article of the said reply, and does not admit the truth thereof.

3. That they deny the truth of the allegations contained in the fifth article of the said reply save as to the unwillingness of the plaintiff that the ship should sail.

4. That they deny the truth of the allegations contained in the seventh article of the said reply.

5. As to the eighth article of the said reply, they say and submit that the plaintiff is not entitled as against the defendant John Grant Morris.

6. They deny the truth of the ninth article of the said reply, and say that the plaintiff had, at the time of the arrest of the Eastern Belle, notice of the said mortgage to the said defendant to secure an account current.

The conclusion filed on behalf of the plaintiff denied the several allegations contained in the rejoinder of the defendant, and averred that the reply filed on behalf of the plaintiff was good in substance, and that the plaintiff did not plead further, and prayed that the pleadings might be concluded.

May 31 and June 1.—The cause came on for hearing before the judge. The facts stated in the pleadings were substantially proved by the witnesses called in support thereof. It was shown by the defendant that at the time the mortgage advance was made he had no knowledge of the plaintiff's claim to be the beneficial owner of the 8·64th shares; and it was also shown by the plaintiff, that at the time of the arrest of the Eastern Belle he had no notice or knowledge of any mortgage to secure an account current to the defendant or any other person.

On a previous occasion before the pleadings had been filed the defendant (the mortgagee) had applied to the court upon motion for the release of the ship and had in support of his motion, filed affidavits setting out all the facts afterwards appearing by his answer. The motion was refused, the court declining to release the ship at that stage of the proceedings, as the plaintiff's affidavits alleged collusion between the mortgagor and the mortgagee.

Butt, Q.C. and R. E. Webster, for the plaintiffs.—The defendant here claims not only the release of the ship, but also damages for her detention and costs. Even if he is entitled to her release, he can only recover damages if he can show that the plaintiff has been guilty of mala fides or crassa negligentia in arresting the ship: (The Evangelismos, 12 Moore P. C. C. 352; Swab. 378.) But the defendant cannot show this, as even now there is an important question of law pending, viz., whether the defendant, as mortgagee, is entitled as against the plaintiff to possession. Can a mortgagee claim in a suit by a co-owner to take a ship out of the possession of the court without leaving something in the place of the res to satisfy the claim of the plaintiff against his co-owner? Suppose the plaintiff's shares had been sold to him after the mortgage to the defendant; there was nothing to prevent the mortgagor from making the plaintiff his co-owner. A mortgagee must know that shares may be transferred after mortgage, and that the position of co-ownership may be so created, and that questions relating thereto may arise. Consequently, we submit that, although a ship may be mortgaged as a whole, co-owners may arrest for the purpose of utilizing what may remain after the mortgage is paid off and may insist on a sale for their contingent benefit after the mortgagees' claim is settled. In such case it cannot be said that the mortgagee is in any way injured by the plaintiff's shares not having been registered sooner, because the plaintiff cannot be in a different position than if he had bought the shares after the mortgage. The mortgage in the present case was registered in 1873, and that would give a year and a half in which to deal with the shares, and the mortgagee ought to presume that they would be dealt with. The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sects. 7 and 11, clearly contemplates a sale by co-owners, even though the ship be mortgaged, so that they may secure the benefit of the surplus. Till the hearing of the case the plaintiff had no opportunity of judging how far there was or was not a surplus and consequently was clearly entitled to arrest, and in arresting was acting bonâ fide. Even in case of the defendant being entitled to damages, the defendant has suffered nothing substantial as the charter-party the loss of which he fears need not be completed till the end of the present year. The plaintiff had good reason to believe that there was collusion between the mortgagor and mortgagee.

Cohen, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendant.—We admit that the original arrest was not unlawful and that if the plaintiff, after ascertaining the facts from our answer and affidavits, had good reason to believe that there would be a surplus upon the sale of the ship he might ask for a sale, that the mortgage might be paid off and accounts taken. But where a co-owner having no title as against a mortgagee asks for an account and sale merely in the hope that something may turn up he is not entitled to it either in this court or in the Court of Chancery. If the plaintiff and the mortgagor had both united in the mortgage they might have undoubtedly had a suit for an account so long as the mortgagee did not intervene; but if the mortgagee does intervene the co-owner proceeding against the ship must either redeem or release the ship, because the mortgagee has a right to possession, and has a statutory power of sale, which gives him an absolute right to the ship. The court cannot order a sale of the ship against the wish of the mortgagee, as such an order would have the effect of depriving the mortgagee of property to which he is not entitled, and to the use of the ship by which he may earn freight, and recoup himself for the money advanced. To order a sale where the amount produced thereby would be less than the money secured would be contrary to the doctrines of equity and the practice of the Court of Chancery. The plaintiff should redeem if he wants a sale. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE. It may be out of the power of a small co-owner to redeem, and yet it seems hard to deprive him of rights against his co-owner, which he would possess if there were no mortgagee.] The plaintiff can have his accounts taken before the registrar, but he cannot have the sale, as that would injure the mortgagee. The mortgagee took his mortgage without notice of the plaintiff's ownership and his right can no more be interfered with than if he had purchased the whole ship from Baines without notice of the plaintiff's claim. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 71, a mortgagee acquires an absolute power to dispose of the ship, and the court is now asked to take away that power. If then the plaintiff has no right against the mortgagee, the keeping the ship under arrest, after the plaintiff became acquainted with the facts of the case as stated in the defendant's affidavits, was a wrongful detention. The Evangelismos (ubi sup.) was no doubt a strong decision, but we submit that it has been modified by subsequent cases, and if a ship is kept under arrest without any semblance of a right the person keeping her must pay the damages. It is not enough that a plaintiff should think he has good ground in law; there must be good ground. The court was induced to continue the arrest by a now abandoned statement as to the existence of fraud. If the court is induced by false representations to keep a ship under arrest this is enough to give a title to damages. The charge of collusion was not withdrawn till the hearing, and without that collusion the plaintiffs had no case at all. They had before them all the knowledge they now have when our affidavits on the motion were filed, and yet they kept the ship under arrest.

Butt, Q.C. in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

June 2.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The circumstances of this case are peculiar, but I think I shall do justice by making the following order, viz.: that the suit be dismissed, and the vessel released from arrest; that the defendant recover no damages, but that he has his costs paid from the date of his filing the affidavit stating the circumstances under which he became mortgagee.

STANTON v. RICHARDSON.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER IN ENGLAND.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Warranty of seaworthiness—Ship unfit for particular cargo—Obligation of owner.

A charter-party containing the words, "the ship to load the following cargo of lawful merchandise . . . . ; a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ measurement goods not exceeding what the vessel can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackles," gives the charterer the option in what form he will tender the cargo, provided he tenders some or all of the goods named and no other, and does not present a cargo of any kind or of all kinds together, which is unreasonable, as regards the nature of the goods he presents.

A shipowner, entering into a charter-party to carry such a cargo, is bound to provide a ship which is reasonably suited to carry that particular cargo, and is staunch and seaworthy for the purposes of that cargo, and should be kept so.

A charter-party provided that the ship should load "a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in bales, $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ measurement goods; specifying different rates of freight for "dry" and "wet" sugar. A cargo of "wet" sugar was provided by the charterer at the port of loading. A great deal of moisture drains from wet sugar, and, owing to the nature of the material, the ships pumps were unable to clear the ship of the drainage. The ship was perfectly seaworthy except for this particular cargo, and the pumps were sufficient for ordinary purposes, but she would not have been seaworthy for the voyage in her then condition.

The sugar had to be unloaded, and the charterer refused to reload it, or to provide another cargo.

Cross actions were brought by the owner against the charterer for not providing a cargo, and by the charterer against the owner to recover damages by reason of the ship not being fit to carry the cargo provided.

The jury found that the cargo offered was a reasonable cargo, and that the ship was not reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of wet sugar.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below) that the shipowner undertook by the charter-party that the ship should be reasonably fit for the carriage of a reasonable cargo of any of the goods specified in the charter-party, including wet sugar, and that the charterer was entitled to a verdict.

THE appellant, Stanton, was the owner of a vessel called the Isle of Wight, and agreed to charter her for a voyage from Manilla to Yloilo to England. The ship was to load a "full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ measurement goods, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackles." The rate of freight was specified to be 4*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton for "dry" sugar, 4*l.* 5*s.* for "wet" sugar, and 4*l.* 15*s.* for hemp and measurement goods. The owner engaged that the ship "before and when receiving cargo shall be a good risk for insurance," and he engaged to take all proper means to keep her tight, staunch, and strong during the voyage. The ship proceeded to Yloilo, and on survey was reported to be a first class risk, fit to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any part of the world.

A cargo of "wet" sugar in bags was provided by the charterer, Richardson. Much moisture drains from this sort of sugar, and when the greater part of the cargo had been loaded it was found that there was such an accumulation of molasses in the hold, that the ship would not be seaworthy if she proceeded in her then condition. The pumps were quite sufficient for ordinary purposes, but, owing to the depth of the hold and the nature of the material, they were unable to get rid of the drainage from the sugar, and no pumps adapted for such a cargo could be procured at Yloilo. The cargo had to be unloaded and warehoused at Yloilo, and was afterwards sent to England in another vessel, the Milton; and the charterer refused to furnish another cargo for the Isle of Wight.

Stanton therefore brought an action against him for not supplying a cargo; and Richardson brought a cross action for the damages he had sustained from the Isle of Wight not being fit for the cargo provided.

The cases were tried before Brett, J. at the sittings in London after Hilary Term, 1872, and he directed the jury that there was an implied warranty that the ship was fit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar, and the verdict was taken in favour of the charterer in both actions.

A rule was obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, but was discharged by the Court of Common Pleas (Bovill, C.J., Byles and Brett, JJ.), as reported (ante, vol. 1, p. 449; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 421; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S 513); and their decision was affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber (Cockburn, C.J, Mellor, J., Bramwell, Cleasby, Pollock, and Amphlett, BB.), as reported (ante, vol. 2, p. 228; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 390; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 643).

From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

Manisty, Q.C. and A. L. Smith, who appeared for the appellant, urged the same arguments, and relied on the authorites cited in the courts below.

Butt, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew were not called upon to argue for the respondent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns). — My Lords, there cannot, I think, be the slightest doubt that in this case it would not have been correct to have left to the jury at the trial any question upon the construction of the charter-party, and indeed I do not understand that the contrary of that proposition was argued by the learned counsel for the appellant. There are no terms in the charter-party which require explanation by evidence, and by the opinion of a jury. The question of construction, therefore, being for the Court, the counsel for the appellant naturally felt themselves constrained to contend that the misdirection to be complained of on the part of Brett, J. was that he did not place upon the charter-party the construction for which the appellant contends, and then leave to the jury the question whether a reasonable cargo had been tendered, having regard to that construction of the charter-party on which the appellant insists.

I will ask your Lordships to turn to the charter-party, for the purpose of ascertaining, in the first place, what is the true construction to be put upon it. It provides that the ship, after arriving at Hongkong and discharging there, shall "sail for Manilla for orders to load either there or at Yloilo or at Zebu, the following cargo of lawful merchandise to be put within reach of the vessel's tackles by the freighters, or their agents." The freighters are bound to provide that "following cargo," whatever it may be, and they are to be allowed fifty working days for loading the cargo, and customary dispatch at the port of discharge, and if they detain the vessel longer they are to be liable to pay demurrage in the usual way.

Now the cargo which, on the one hand, the charterers had the right to have carried, and which, on the other hand, they were bound to provide, is thus described: "A full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ measurement goods." These words "and" and "or" are not without some significance, because they appear rather to show that this specification of different kinds of cargo was to be read either disjunctively or conjunctively, it might be all of one kind or it might be a mixture of the two kinds mentioned, "not exceeding what the vessel can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackles." And then it provides for the passage which is to be performed; and then, in consideration of that, the freighters agree that freight on said cargo shall be paid "at the following rates if loaded at Manilla for the United Kingdom, 4*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* sterling for dry sugar; 4*l.* 5*s.* for wet sugar; 4*l.* 15*s.* for hemp and measurement goods." Having regard to the specification of two prices for the two kinds of sugar mentioned, we are entitled in construing the contract to go back to the sentence where sugar was first mentioned, and to read the word there as if it were "wet or dry" sugar; then the contract becomes a contract to carry "a full and complete cargo of wet or dry sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, and measurement goods, not exceeding what the vessel can reasonably stow."

Now as regards the cargo which might be tendered, and which the shipowner was bound to carry; I feel no difficulty in advising your Lordships as a matter of ordinary construction, about which, unless there is something to be found in other parts of the document qualifying the ordinary meaning of the words, there can be no doubt, that the meaning of this stipulation is that it gives to the charterer the option in what form he will tender the cargo; he may tender it all of wet sugar, or of dry sugar, or of hemp, or of measurement goods, or he may admix the different items of cargo as he thinks fit, always provided that he does not present a cargo of any kind, or of all kinds together, which is unreasonable as regards the nature of the goods which he presents. The only limit as regards quantity is that which is laid down, namely, what the vessel can reasonably stow. Provided he keeps within that limit, and presents goods which are of the ordinary kind at the place which is mentioned, he may take his choice in what form he will present the goods; that is to say, which of the various items mentioned he will choose as the cargo to be carried.

The consequence of any other construction would be, as regards the freighter or charterer, of the most serious kind. The ship is to come to Manilla in a limited number of days, the cargo must be put on board there: he must, according to the ordinary usage of merchants, if he is a prudent man, have his cargo prepared beforehand; he must have entered into his contracts, or have the goods in his store ready to be put on board. But, according to the view of the learned counsel for the appellant, his right to select the cargo to be put on board will have to be subject to considerations as to which he can form no proper opinion himself beforehand. He must consider what the pumps of the vessel, if they be the ordinary pumps, will be able to effect in the way of discharging the moisture arising from the wet sugar; he would have to consider whether the evaporation consequent upon the state of the weather will be greater or less at the actual time when the goods are put on board; and he will, therefore, not be in a position to provide a complete cargo of one of the specified articles, wet sugar, unless he will take the risk of the pumps being adequate to discharge the moisture, and of the state of the weather being such as not to throw any unusually severe strain upon those pumps. It appears to me that these are conditions which it never could have been intended that the freighter or charterer would undertake. And, on the other hand, when your Lordships turn to the position of the shipowner, any inconvenience which may arise is one from which he can guard and protect himself in the simplest way possible. He it is who knows exactly what the pumps of his ship will do; he must be taken to know the nature of the cargo he engages to carry; he must be taken to know what wet sugar requires in the way of pumping power: and it is for him if he wishes to guard against any inconvenience upon the subject, to stipulate that as regards one item, which is onerous and irksome, namely, wet sugar, he will not, under any circumstances, carry beyond a certain amount. Therefore, when you compare the inconvenience of the burden as against the charterer, and the ease with which it may be borne by the shipowner, every consideration would lead to the conclusion that it is the shipowner who must protect himself by an express stipulation. But I am content to rest upon the ordinary meaning of the words, which appear to me to give to the charterer the option of how he will load the ship.

Now if that be so, the charter-party must be read in the events which have happened, as if it were a charter for a full and complete cargo of wet sugar, not exceeding what the vessel can reasonably carry over and above the tackles. If that be so, what is the obligation, as regards the ship, upon the shipowner? Clearly to provide a ship which is reasonably suited to carry that particular cargo; a ship which is staunch and seaworthy.

It was, indeed, attempted to be contended that that general obligation which would be implied by law, was in some way qualified by two actual provisions of the charter-party, especially the express provision as to insurance. That provision appears to me to be entirely consistent with, and not in any way antagonistic to, the implied undertaking that the ship shall be staunch and seaworthy. It is a separate and a higher engagement that the "vessel before and when receiving cargo shall be good risk for insurance," that is to say, that she may be insured at the most favourable rate at which an insurance can be effected for the particular cargo. It was admitted, and could not be denied, that she might be staunch and seaworthy, and yet that it might not be possible to predicate of her that she was a good risk for insurance. Then the other express provision is that "in and during the voyage the master shall take all proper means to keep the vessel tight, staunch, and strong, well manned and found, and in every way fitted and provided for the voyage." That appears to me to take up the case at the commencement of the voyage, and in place of being inconsistent with an implied warranty that this ship should be staunch and seaworthy up to that time, to assume that the meaning of the contract was that up to that time she should be provided as a staunch and seaworthy ship, and that then there should commence this further obligation, that during the whole of the voyage the master should be bound to keep her in that state up to the time of her arrival.

Now if that is the construction, as I submit that it is, of the charter-party, was there any misdirection on the part of the learned judge? As I understand his charge he adopted this construction of the charter-party; he directed the jury, as he ought to have directed them, as a matter of law: This is the construction of the charter-party—those are the rights of the charterer—that is the obligation of the shipowner. And then he told the jury, taking that direction from him, to find whether the cargo of wet sugar presented to the shipowner at Yloilo was a reasonable cargo within the meaning of a charter-party having that construction. And the jury found with that direction, that the sugar offered to the captain was a reasonable cargo, that the ship was not reasonably fitted to carry a reasonable cargo of wet sugar, that the damage suffered by the sugar was not "the result of its own defective condition, without any defect in the ship, or any fault of the captain," and they found that the damage caused to the sugar was "caused by the unfitness of the ship to carry the cargo offered to her, or by the ship being unreasonably unfit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar, or by want of reasonable care or skill of the captain in treating the cargo delivered to him." I think the direction of the learned judge was perfectly correct, and with these findings following upon that direction, of course the case was entirely exhausted.

I submit that there is no ground for differing from the unanimous opinion of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber, and I move that the judgment of those courts be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed with costs.

Lord HATHERLEY.—My Lords, the unanimity of the judges before whom this case has been argued in its successive stages, is not at all surprising, regard being had to the circumstances of the case.

In the first place with regard to the construction of the contract, it appears to me that the learned judge at nisi prius was perfectly right in taking upon himself to construe that contract as a matter of law, and to state the result of such construction to the jury, provided, of course, that his construction be found to be correct.

It appears to me that there can be no doubt that this engagement was that the ship in question should call at the specified ports, amongst others Yloilo, that she should there take a complete cargo of sugar in bags, nothing being said in that part of the contract as to whether the sugar was to be wet or dry. She was to take "a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hemp in compressed bales, and measurement goods." Therefore the cargo might either be a cargo of sugar in bags, or of hemp in compressed bales, or of measurement goods. Wet sugar might, we understand, be packed in bags; and to show that it was in contemplation, we have not only the fact stated in evidence that it is an article constantly shipped from Yloilo, but we have also an express provision in the charter-party as to what the price shall be, and the price is put at 4*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* per ton for dry sugar and at 4*l.* 5*s.* a ton for the wet sugar. Therefore it appears to me as plain as anything can well be, that the shipper had the choice of the cargo, whether it was to be of sugar at all in bags, or whether he should prefer to have it composed partly of sugar, and partly of other articles; and he had the choice as to the sugar itself whether it was to be wet or dry. The only misdirection complained of is with reference to this point as to the construction of the contract. The rest of the case seems to have been placed before the jury very clearly and distinctly. The judge asks, "Was the ship reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar?" Then again he says, "If you think the sugar was the ordinary Yloilo cargo, then the damage is suffered by some defect in the ship, or some treatment of the captain." As regards the question of the pumps, what he says is, "The pumps were certified it is true, but they were not brought up and examined, it was assumed that they were sufficient. You have it in evidence that in ordinary sugar ships ordinary pumps are used. The only way you have to consider the matter here is this, whether though in an ordinary sugar ship ordinary pumps will do, whether this was an ordinary sugar ship, whether she was not too large for what she had undertaken to do unless she had extra appliances." Nothing could be more clear than that way of putting the case before the jury. The learned judge tells the jury that the shipper was entitled if he pleased to put on board a cargo wholly of wet sugar, in which I think he is quite correct; but he says that that wet sugar must be a reasonable cargo to be carried, and he leaves it entirely to the jury to say whether a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar was supplied; they have found that it was. And with regard to the pumps, he puts the case in the exact way in which the difficulty has been encountered by the parties to the contract. The shipowner does not appear to have bethought himself what he was about to do when he stipulated that he would take this commodity, having this particular and special character, with the common pumps that he had used hitherto in his ship with ordinary cargoes of a different description. It is not because he has not thought fit to protect himself, or to furnish himself, as he would have done if he had thought of it in sufficient time, with sufficient pumps for the cargo that he has undertaken to carry, that he is entitled to be relieved from his contract.

I apprehend the learned judge was quite right in telling the jury, as a matter of law, that he had contracted to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar. As regards all the other parts of the case there is hardly a dispute between the parties.

Therefore, my Lords, I come to the same conclusion as that at which the courts below have arrived.

Lord O'Hagan.—My Lords, I am quite of the same opinion.

I think there is no misdirection in this case. In my opinion the Court of Common Pleas was perfectly right in saying that the charge of the learned judge was entirely correct in point of law, as it certainly was very clear and careful in its statement of facts. The learned judge did what appears to me to have been his plain duty. He first construed the contract, in the next place he applied his construction of it to the facts of the case, and then left those facts to the jury to be determined by the light of the law, as he had expounded it to them. His construction appears to me to have been perfectly correct. The words of the passage which has been read from the charter-party seem in themselves to require no comment, and no elucidation. Plainly it was within the option of the charterer here to have one of the three sorts of cargoes indicated in the charter-party, just as he chose. If he selected sugar it was for him to say whether the cargo of sugar to be put into the vessel should be wet or dry, and that is my opinion quite irrespective of the subsequent clause in the charter-party which distinguishes between the price to be paid for the wet and the dry sugar. The words of the provision in the charter-party seem to be perfectly clear. They give an option to the charterer, and he exercised that option. Now, considering not merely the words of the charter-party, but the reason of the thing, it seems to be quite a monstrous supposition that the construction contended for by the appellant could have been in the minds of these parties at the time when they entered into the charter-party. The nature of the arrangements of the vessel, the character of the pumps, and all the other matters which would have to be considered in order to determine whether the vessel was suited to carry a cargo of this description, all that knowledge was with the shipowner, and with the captain of the ship. The charterer had no such knowledge at all, and to cast upon him the necessity, or the duty of acquiring that knowledge would seem to me an extremely unreasonable thing, not to be done unless we were coerced by the words of the contract, which appear to coerce us the other way. That having been the construction of the learned judge, he seems to me in the most emphatic way to have put to the jury the question which it was their special duty to answer.

One passage towards the end of the charge seems to me to show that more clearly than the rest of it: "Your real point to consider will be this—was this misfortune the result of the sugar put on board being different from the ordinary Yloilo sugar put on board ships; or was it the result of a large ship undertaking to do this with pumps sufficient for herself, but not sufficient to lift the ordinary drainage of an ordinary Yloilo cargo? Was it the result of one thing or the other?" That was the jury's question. That question was put to them in the clearest and most lucid way by the learned judge, and he got a very emphatic answer from the jury, who determined that the cargo was reasonable, but that the arrangements of the ship were unreasonable, that the captain's conduct was unreasonable, and that the whole of the mischief arose from the conduct of the shipowner, and not from the conduct of the charterer.

My Lords, under all the circumstances of the case, I think the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was right.

Lord Selborne.—My Lords, I agree.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW SOUTH WALES.

Reported by C. E. Malden, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 29, 1875.

The Australasian Insurance Company (apps.) v. William Townley Jackson (resp.)

Marine insurance—Barratry—Wilful act—Knowledge that act is illegal—Kidnapping Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 19).

The Kidnapping Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 19), having prohibited the carrying of Polynesian native labourers in ships without a licence, under penalty of forfeiture of the ship, a master who, without the authority of his owners, but with a knowledge of the prohibition, ships and carries native labourers, and so brings about the seizure and condemnation of his ship, commits an act of barratry in respect of which his owners may recover against their underwriters.

Where a master ships and carries Polynesian native labourers without a licence, against the provisions of the Kidnapping Act 1872, proof that the master, although he may never have seen the Act itself or the proclamation thereof in the Australasian Colonies, was informed before shipping the labourers that such an Act existed, and that it was illegal to carry them, is sufficient evidence to justify a jury in finding that he shipped and carried the labourers wilfully and with knowledge of the prohibition, so as to make his act barratrous.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, discharging a rule nisi for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, obtained by the appellants in an action in the said court, in which the respondent was plaintiff and the appellants were defendants.

The action, which was commenced on the 9th Feb. 1874, was brought to recover as for a total loss, under four policies of insurance made by the respondent with the appellants' company, upon hull and furniture, cargo, outfit, and boats of the respondent's barque Crishna, which was engaged in the beche-de-mer trade. The perils insured against were, amongst others, those of "barratry of the masters and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the" respective subject-matters of insurance above-mentioned.

The appellants paid into court, as to one of the ship's boats, a sum which was accepted by the respondent, but as to the residue, they pleaded that there was no loss by the perils insured against. On that plea issue was joined.

The cause was tried on the 6th May 1874, before Sir James Martin, C.J., and a jury. On the trial, the following, amongst other facts, appeared: The Crishna sailed from Sydney on the 5th April 1872, on a beche-de-mer voyage, under the command of Capt. Walton, who had no authority from the owners to get or engage in carrying native labourers, nor any general authority or discretion to use the vessel in any way he might consider necessary. After the Crishna sailed, and whilst she was on her voyage, on the 31st Aug. 1872, the Kidnapping Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 19), was proclaimed in the Australian Colonies. [The sections of the Act applicable will be found in the judgment.] After the said Act had been proclaimed and before Capt. Walton had taken any natives on board, he was warned by the captain of the Royal Duke, whom he fell in with in Shelburn Bay, Torres Straits, that there was a Kidnapping Act out which prohibited vessels from carrying Polynesian labourers, and rendered them liable to seizure for so doing unless they had first obtained a licence and given a bond for 500*l*. Afterwards he was again warned by a black named Peter, who told him all the fishing vessels had left the Straits for Sydney on account of the Act. Finally, in Jan. 1873, Capt. McCourt, or McCaint, of the Enchantress, warned him of the prohibition, and that all the vessels had left the Straits for licences. Upon the advice of McCaint, and Hoare the chief mate of the Crishna, Capt. Walton went to Cape York, where Mr. Jardine, the police magistrate there, had the Act, for the purpose of himself seeing it. After Capt. Walton's return from Cape York he took on board about thirty natives, and on the 11th Jan. 1873, he sailed with them on board for Sydney. On the passage the Crishna was seized by her Majesty's ship Basilisk, taken into Brisbane, and there condemned by the Vice-Admiralty Court in Queensland, and sold by the order of that court, which was the total loss in respect of which this action was brought. The evidence will be found more fully stated in the judgment.

At the trial the defendants called no witnesses and adduced no evidence.

The Chief Justice summed up in accordance with Earl v. Rowcroft (8 East. 126), reading to the jury and commenting upon Lord Ellenborough's judgment in that case.

After the jury had retired, the counsel for the defendants asked the Chief Justice to reserve two points for the court:

First, as to the reception of a printed copy of the Queensland Gazette without proof of it.

Secondly, as to the captain not having any knowledge that the Act had passed making what he did an offence, contending that his act in order to be barratrous ought to be a wilful act.

These points were accordingly reserved.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff on all the issues.

On the 8th June 1874, the defendants obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds:

First, that the verdict was against the evidence.

Secondly, that his Honour admitted in evidence a paper purporting to be the Queensland Gazette, without further proof thereof.

Thirdly, that his Honour should have directed the jury that the master was not guilty of barratry unless he wilfully violated the provisions of the Kidnapping Act 1872, or at least with knowledge of the same and of the proclamation thereunder having been published.

On the 26th Sept. 1874, the rule came on for hearing. The two first mentioned points were abandoned without argument, the sole point argued being as to the alleged misdirection. The rule was discharged by a majority of the court (Hargrave and Faucett, JJ.), Sir James Martin, C.J., dissenting. The following judgments were delivered:—

Sir James Martin, C.J.—In this case the verdict was for the plaintiff, with 3720*l*. damages. The amount, therefore, involved in the question before us is large, and the loss which the insurance company will sustain if the verdict stands is heavy. The controversy has arisen from the passing of a very peculiar statute, under which the doing of an act innocent in itself involves liabilities to serious penalties; penalties which may be incurred, too, without the possibility of the persons incurring them even knowing of the existence of the law. It has been twice held in the Vice-Admiralty Court of this colony—in the case of The Melanie (12 Sup. Ct. R. 97), and in that of The Challenge (12 S. C. R. 127)—that in a suit of condemnation under this statute, knowledge by the master of the provisions of the Act is immaterial, and it appears that a like interpretation has been adopted in Queensland. In this case the condemnation seems to have been founded on much the same grounds as in the cases I have just mentioned. The captain was carrying Polynesian natives in an innocent (perhaps even in a meritorious) way, and because there was a literal violation of the Act, his vessel was seized by a ship of war, and condemned as forfeited by the Vice-Admiralty Court of Queensland. It certainly appears, on the whole, to be a case of extreme hardship. The law is clear that in a case of barratry, where the loss has been brought about by condemnation in a Vice-Admiralty Court, the mere proof of the decree of such court, unless it be impeached for fraud, is sufficient evidence of the violation of the law upon which the condemnation was founded, and it is not competent for the defendant, in the absence of fraud, to show that the condemnation was improper. I think, therefore, that I rightly held that the decision of the Vice-Admiralty Court was conclusive between the parties here. But then the question arises, what is to be proved in addition to make out the case of barratry? As to that it appears to me to be clear, that misconduct on the part of the master must be proved to establish barratry. The innocent violation, for instance, of a blockade or of any law, does not amount to such misconduct; there must be some wrong act done. Time after time has the difficulty arisen of properly defining barratry. After looking through a large number of cases in which the matter has been discussed, I have come to the conclusion that the best definition is that to be found at page 820 of Arnould on Marine Insurance (1st edit.), which I accordingly adopt as correct for the purpose of this case, "Barratry then in English law may be said to comprehend not only every species of fraud and knavery covin-ously committed by the master with the intention of benefiting himself at the expense of his owners, but every wilful act on his part of known illegality, gross malversation, or criminal negligence, by whatever motive induced, whereby the owners or charterers of the ship (in cases where the latter are considered as owners pro tempore) are in fact damnified." It seems to me that every word of that definition is material. In a note at page 821, there is a definition by Lord Hardwicke, which is said to be the tersest and the best. He defines it, "An act of wrong done by the master against the ship and goods." But this, I think, is not sufficiently extended to amount to a complete definition. There are various cases to show that an act to constitute barratry must be knowingly done. At page 839 of Arnould, it is said, I think correctly, that a foreign sentence stating the ship to have been seized for breach of blockade, is not conclusive evidence of barratry, for the breach of blockade might have been committed by the captain in ignorance and without intention, in which case it would be no barratry." Looking at these passages in Arnould, and at the cases generally by which they are borne out, I am of opinion that to establish barratry here, it was necessary to show not only that the master carried the Polynesians under such circumstances as amounted to a breach of the law, but also that he knew that he was acting contrary to law. If there was no evidence that before he took the islanders on board he became aware of the passing of the Kidnapping Act, no wrong was done by him. It is impossible to hold that a wrong is committed by a person who does an act innocent in itself without knowing that it is contrary to positive law. It is certainly true that the jury were not told by me that it was necessary in support of the plaintiff's case to find that the captain had knowledge of the passing of the Act. All that I did was to read to them the evidence as to the passing of the Act being communicated to the captain. There was evidence that he was told that an Act of the kind had been passed, and that he went to Cape York for the purpose of seeing Mr. Jardine, and inquiring about the matter. As to whether he ever actually met Mr. Jardine, or saw a copy of the Act, there was no evidence, but there was evidence that he was told something about the Act, and that evidence was mentioned by me to the jury. The question now is, whether there ought to be a new trial, because I did not pointedly tell the jury that it was their duty to decide whether they believed the evidence or not; and that if they thought that the captain had no knowledge of the passing of the Act, they ought to find for the defendants. It is true that I was not asked by the defendant's counsel to do this. If I had been so asked, and had refused, there is no doubt a new trial ought to be granted, and it is now to be determined whether the fact that my attention was not called to the omission, makes any difference. I am of opinion that there ought to be a new trial for this omission. I think that the jury were very likely, because I said nothing pointedly to them about the materiality of knowledge by the captain of the passing of the Act, to think that matter immaterial, it being in fact most material, as it was necessary for them to say in effect (if they found for the plaintiff) that there had been wrong conduct on the part of the master, inasmuch as he knew the thing which ultimately caused the condemnation to be prohibited. It is very probable that if the case goes down again to trial, the jury may think that the master did know this, but that is not a matter with which we have anything to do now. It is entirely a question for the jury. I may say in conclusion, that under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I think it would have been well for the parties to have saved the expense of this litigation, and to have done what was recommended by the court in the cases of The Melanie and The Challenge, namely, apply to the Home Government for a remission of the forfeiture, which application there can be no doubt would be complied with.

Hargrave, J.—As to the first two of the three grounds upon which this rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, viz.: First, that the verdict was against evidence; and, secondly, that the Queensland Gazette, containing the proclamation of the imperial statute against kidnapping was improperly admitted as evidence, nothing has been urged to this court in support of either of these two grounds; and I assume, therefore, that the evidence before the jury was quite sufficient to support the verdict, and that the Gazette and proclamation were properly before the jury in evidence. The third ground of the rule is, therefore, the only ground for me to consider, viz.: that "the Chief Justice ought to have expressly directed the jury that the master was not guilty of barratry unless he wilfully violated the provision of the Kidnapping Act, or, at least, with knowledge of the same and its provisions and of the proclamation thereunder." From the Chief Justice's own report to this court of his directions to the jury, and comments on the evidence, it is perfectly clear to my mind that his Honour placed the whole law bearing upon the issue of "barratry" quite properly before the jury, more especially by reading to the jury and commenting upon Lord Ellenborough's well-known judgment in Earl v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126); and the jury must, therefore, have been well aware that "known illegality" was the essence of "barratry," and was the only issue for them to try. His Honour also read to the jury the express evidence of the mate as to the proclamation having been communicated to the captain, and his having express knowledge of the passing of the Act and of its provisions; and especially read to the jury the evidence as to the captain's going to Cape York in order to inquire into the matter from Mr. Jardine, the then Government superintendent there. Moreover, even assuming the word "wilfully" to be essential to the definition of barratry (which I by no means admit), still it is clear that the omission of this word from his Honour's direction to the jury ought to have been distinctly pointed out at the time to the judge by the defendant's counsel, which was not done, but the reservation of the point only asked for. No "omission" ever forms any ground for the new trial, unless the omission has been distinctly refused to be rectified, as well as essential in law to the direction. But in this case, as I have said, I think the direction to the jury was in all respects perfectly sound in law, as put by the Chief Justice to the jury. The evidence also seems to me to be amply sufficient to prove in law the "wilful" breach of the Act as well as the "known illegality," if there be any distinction in the terms; and the evidence is quite as conclusive as to wilful breach of the law as is usual in any other breach of our criminal or quasi-criminal statutes. I am also inclined to think that the verdict is perfectly good under the general words contained in this insurance now sued on, viz.: "All other perils, losses, and misfortunes;" and the declarations seem to be so framed by the pleader. See the case of Butler v. Wildman (3 Barn. & Ald. 398); Jones v. Nicholson (10 Exch. 28); and Davidson v. Burnand (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 117; 3 Mar Law Cas. O. S. 207.) But now the only point for consideration by this court is the third ground mentioned in the rule, which really amounts to this, that a new trial may be granted whenever another judge, or even the same judge, should think that upon a second trial he should direct the jury in different or stronger language, or use particular expressions in law not used at the first trial, or think that he would read and explain to the jury at Nisi Prius some other of the law authorities or text writers which may be cited to this court in banco, although admittedly, as in the present case, only confirmatory, and to the same effect as the case or text writer properly read and explained to the jury at the first trial. No new trial has ever yet been granted, and I hope never will be granted, upon any such ground. I desire also to add, as I have often said in this court, that this full court sitting in banco ought to discourage these speculative new trial motions, and compel both parties to put forth all their strength at the first trial of every action; and after a fair trial, every successful party should be left in possession of his verdict and judgment, unless upon clear legal grounds for a new trial, which assuredly do not exist in the present case. For these reasons I think the plaintiff's judgment against this insurance ought not to be disturbed, but this rule should be discharged with costs.

Faucett, J.—I should have had no difficulty in this case were it not that his Honour the Chief Justice, who tried the case, is of opinion that there ought to be a new trial, because I think the verdict was right upon the evidence. The only question to be now determined is, whether this was such a misdirection as would entitle the defendants to a new trial. I do not now consider the effect of the decisions in the case of The Melanie and in the case of The Challenge. But I assume, in the present instance, that to establish a case of barratry it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the captain had actual knowledge of the existence of the statute for the violation of which the vessel was condemned. At the trial the plaintiff's counsel opened his case by stating that he would not contest that point, but would admit that it was incumbent on him to prove that the captain at the time he violated the statute had actual knowledge of its existence, and he undertook to prove such knowledge as a necessary part of his case. Accordingly, evidence was given which went to show such knowledge. It was proved that the captain was told of the passing of the Act, and that he said he was all right, as he had his men on the articles. It was also proved that he went to Cape York to see Mr. Jardine in reference to the Act. On the other hand, it was contended for the defendants that such knowledge was not proved. It was said that it was not shown that the captain had ever seen Mr. Jardine or had ever seen a copy of the Act. Now, considering that the defendants gave no evidence, I do not think this latter argument of much weight. But, however this may be, the fact appears to be that the question whether or not the captain had actual knowledge was fully contested, and was, as I further collect, the substantial and only question contested at the trial. The want of proof of such knowledge was in fact the defence, and as now admitted the only defence relied on. This being so, his Honour, we are told, in summing up, read a definition of barratry, and read and commented on Lord Ellenborough's judgment in Earl v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126). He is also under the impression—although this is denied—that he read the definition of barratry in page 820 of Arnould on Marine Insurance, which contains the words "known illegality." He then read and drew the attention of the jury to the evidence of captain's knowledge. Under these circumstances, I cannot doubt that the law was correctly read to the jury, and that their attention was drawn not only by the counsel on both sides, but by his Honour to the real and, as it appears to me, the only question of fact that was contested between the parties. If, indeed, his Honour had been asked to tell the jury in express terms that barratry could not exist without knowledge of the existence of the statute, and had refused to do so, there might be some ground for the present motion. But he was merely asked—after the jury had retired—to reserve the question whether he ought not to have directed them in the terms set out in the third ground for this motion? If I could see that the direction had been wrong, I might think this course sufficient. But as I cannot see that the jury was misdirected or misled, and as I think the evidence quite justified the verdict, I cannot see sufficient reason for sending the case down for a new trial, for the mere purpose of enabling the judge to give a fuller and more pointed direction on a point that was before fully contested, and, moreover, without any probability of a different result.

On the 8th Oct. 1874, the appellants prayed leave to appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court above-mentioned to her Majesty in Council, and leave was granted to them by an order dated the 9th Oct. 1874, made by a judge in chambers, which was afterwards, on the 30th Nov. 1874, made a rule of court.

This appeal was brought into pursuance of the leave obtained, and the appellants submitted that the judgment of the Supreme Court of the 26th Sept. 1874, was erroneous, and ought to be set aside or varied, for the following among other reasons:

1. Because the verdict given in the action was against the evidence.

2. Because the learned judge misdirected the jury, in not telling them that in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff they must be satisfied that the master knew of the provisions of the Kidnapping Act 1872, and that it was in force when he took the natives on board.

3. Because the learned judge misdirected the jury, in that he did not direct them, as he should have directed them, that under the circumstances the master was not guilty of barratry, unless he violated the provisions of the Kidnapping Act 1872, with knowledge of the same, and of its provisions, and of the proclamation thereunder having been published.

4. Because the learned judge who tried the case was of opinion that he had not directed the jury correctly, and that a new trial ought to have been granted.

Manisty, Q.C. and F. W. Gibbs, for the appellants, contended there was a misdirection.

Cohen, Q.C. and Macleod Fullarton, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir Barnes Peacock.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of New South Wales discharging a rule nisi for a new trial. The action in which the rule was obtained was brought by the respondent, William Townley Jackson, as one of the co-owners of the ship Crishna, of which Walton was master, upon several policies of insurance upon that vessel for several amounts, the total being 3750*l*. The loss was occasioned by the condemnation and sale of the vessel under the provisions of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 19, entitled An Act for the Prevention and Punishment of Criminal Outrages upon Natives of the Islands in the Pacific Ocean. That Act received the royal assent on the 27th June 1872. By sect. 21 it was enacted that the Act should be proclaimed in the several Australian Colonies by the respective governors thereof within six weeks after a copy thereof should have been received by such governors respectively; and should take effect in the several colonies from the day of such proclamation.

The 9th section of the Act enacts: "If any British subject commits any of the following offences"—namely, decoys a native of any of the aforesaid islands, and so on, defining the offences —"he shall, for each offence, be guilty of felony, and shall be liable to be tried and punished for such felony in any Supreme Court of Justice in any of the Australian Colonies, and shall, upon conviction, be liable, at the discretion of the court, to the highest punishment other than capital punishment." The 16th section enacts that "Any British vessel which shall upon reasonable grounds be suspected (1) of being employed in the commission of any of the offences enumerated in the 9th section of this Act, or (2) of having been fitted out for such employment, or (3) of having, during the voyage on which such vessel is met, been employed in the commission of any such offence, may be detained, seized, and brought in for adjudication, upon the charge of being so employed or fitted out as aforesaid, before any Vice-Admiralty Court in any of her Majesty's dominions by any of the following officers;" and then it describes the officers who are entitled to bring her in for condemnation Sect. 18 says: "The Vice-Admiralty Court before which any vessel is so brought for adjudication shall have full power and authority to take cognisance of and try the charge upon which such vessel is brought in, and may, on proof thereof, condemn the vessel and cargo, or either, as the case may be, as forfeited to her Majesty, or may order such vessel and cargo, or either of them, to be restored, with or without costs and damages, as to the court shall seem fit."

By sect. 6 it is enacted that "All the provisions with reference to the detention, seizure, bringing in for adjudication before any Vice-Admiralty Court, trial, condemnation, or restoration of vessels suspected of being employed in the commission of any of the offences enumerated in the 9th section of the Act shall mutatis mutandis apply to any British vessels which shall be found carrying such native labourers without licence, or in contravention of the terms of any licence which may have been granted to the master thereof;" and by the seventh section a penalty is imposed on the master for carrying such natives.

One of the risks insured against by the policies of insurance was barratry by the master or crew of the vessel.

It appears that the master in the month of Jan. 1873, took on board thirty Polynesian labourers, and that the ship was seized by one of her Majesty's vessels, and carried into Brisbane, in Queensland, for the purpose of being condemned for a breach of the 6th section of the Act of Parliament, on account of the master's carrying Polynesian labourers on board. The ship was condemned, and was afterwards sold by order of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Brisbane for that offence.

It was contended that the case was not one of barratry unless the master knew that the Act of Parliament had been passed, and also that the Act had rendered it illegal to carry Polynesian labourers on board his ship.

It was proved that the vessel left Sydney on her voyage before the Act had received the royal assent, or had been proclaimed in Queensland; but evidence was given to show that the master was aware of the Act, and that he knew, from information which he had received, that the Act rendered it illegal for him to carry Polynesian labourers on board. William Hoare, who was the first mate of the Crishna, said that they left suddenly, on the 5th Apil 1872, that was before the Act was passed. Then he says, "there were thirty Polynesian natives taken on board this vessel. Capt. Walton I understood was to get 3*l*. a head for carrying them to Sydney. He told me so. There was a vessel called the Royal Duke, which I saw in Shelburn Bay, in Torres Straits; that was about two and a half months to three months before the seizure of the Crishna. We were lying in Shelburn Bay, about ninety miles to southward of Cape York. I remember the captain of the Royal Duke telling Walton and myself that there was a Kidnapping Act out which prohibited vessels carrying Polynesian labourers unless they were part of the ship's crew; that the vessels were liable to seizure; and Walton made the remark that he was all right, as he had all his men in the articles. That was before we had Delargy's natives on board." Then he goes on later: "I remember in Jan. 1873 meeting a cutter called the Enchantress at Cocoa Nut Island. She was twenty-five tons; John McCaint was the captain's name. I remember his telling Walton that the Act was out which prohibited vessels carrying these natives, and that all these vessels had left the Straits for licences. McCaint and I advised Walton to go to Cape York and see the Act himself. Walton went with McCaint to Cape York, where Mr. Jardine, the police magistrate, had the Act. We were then 58 miles from Cape York. The two captains in the cutter Enchantress, and a boat with some natives in it, followed to bring Walton back. I am sure Walton went on no other business than to see the Act." Then he says, "Walton returned in three or four days. A day or two after Walton returned, Delargy's natives"—those were the thirty Polynesian natives —"came on board. We started for Sydney on the 11th Jan. 1873." Then it appears that the ship was seized by one of her Majesty's vessels, and carried into Brisbane for condemnation; that she was there condemned and sold on account of the offence which this master had committed in carrying the natives on board.

Now, even assuming that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, the master having left on his voyage before the Act was proclaimed, it was necessary to prove that he was aware of the existence of the Act, and that it was thereby rendered unlawful for him to carry Polynesian labourers, their Lordships are of opinion that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, that the master was acquainted with the Act so far as to know that an Act had passed which rendered it unlawful for him to carry Polynesian labourers on board. The Chief Justice says (in his notes): "Stephen"—that is the counsel for the defendant—"addressed the jury. I sum up in accordance with Earl v. Rowcroft (8 East, 126). The jury retired, and after they had so retired Stephen asks me to reserve two points; first, as to the reception of the printed copy of the Queensland Gazette without proof of it;"—that is not a matter which is now raised—"and, secondly, as to the captain not having any knowledge that the Act had passed making what he did an offence." He could not have had liberty reserved to enter a nonsuit upon the ground of the captain's not having any knowledge that the Act had passed, making what he did an offence, except upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury as to that knowledge. Their Lordships have already pointed out that the evidence was sufficient, if the jury believed it, to prove that the captain had knowledge that the Act had passed, and that it rendered it unlawful for him to carry Polynesian labourers. The Chief Justice goes on, "He contends that the act ought to be a wilful act. I reserve these points. No evidence was called for the defence, but counsel for the defendants, in his address to the jury, contended that the evidence was not sufficient to show that the master had become aware of the passing of the Kidnapping Act, or at least of the nature of its provisions; and that his taking the Polynesians on board was not a breach of a law that he must be taken to have known, and was an innocent act, and therefore not barratry; and that defendants consequently were entitled to a verdict." Now the learned counsel for the defendants, when he addressed the jury and contended that the evidence was not sufficient to show that the master did in fact know of the Act, must have been fully alive to the fact that that question ought to be submitted to the jury.

The principal ground upon which the rule was moved for was that the Chief Justice ought, under the circumstances, to have directed the jury that the master was not guilty of barratry unless he wilfully violated the provisions of the Act, or at least acted with knowledge of the same and of its provisions.

The learned Chief Justice stated that he read the evidence to the jury as to the passing of the Act having been communicated to the captain, but it is said that he did not in a sufficiently pointed manner call their attention to the question whether the master did or did not know that the Act had rendered it unlawful for him to carry the Polynesian labourers on board. He says, in his judgment upon the rule: "I am of opinion that there ought to be a new trial for this omission. I think that the jury were very likely, because, I said nothing pointedly to them about the materiality of knowledge by the captain of the passing of the Act, to think that matter immaterial, it being, in fact, most material, as it was necessary for them to say in effect (if they found for the plaintiff) that there had been wrong conduct on the part of the master, inasmuch as he knew the thing which ultimately caused the condemnation to be prohibited. It is very probable that if the case goes down again for trial the jury may think the master did know this, but that is not a matter with which we have anything to do now."

Now, their Lordships are of opinion that the question whether the master did or did not know of the Act was sufficiently left to the jury, and that they must have understood that that was, in fact, the only question which they had to try. Mr. Justice Faucett says: "It was contended for the defendants that such knowledge was not proved. It was said that it was not shown that the captain had ever seen Mr. Jardine, or had ever seen a copy of the Act. Now, considering that the defendants gave no evidence, I do not think this latter argument of much weight. But, however this may be, the fact appears to be that the question, whether or not the captain had actual knowledge, was fully contested, and was, as I further collect, the substantial and only question contended at the trial. The want of proof of such knowledge was, in fact, the defence, and, as now admitted, the only defence relied on."

It appears to their Lordships that that view of the case was correct; they think that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and that the question was substantially left by the Chief Justice to the jury, and that they must have understood that that was the principal if not the only question which they had to try; and, under these circumstances, their Lordships are of opinion that the majority of the court did right in discharging the rule nisi for a new trial. Under these circumstances they will humbly recommend her Majesty that the decree of the court below be affirmed, with the costs of this appeal.

ANDERSON v. MORICE.

Marine insurance—Seaworthiness—Peril of the seas—Insurable interest—Burden of proof.

A ship whose cargo was insured, and which had previously been to all appearance staunch and sound, and had recently been thoroughly repaired and had a few days before been examined without any defects being discoverable, sank suddenly at her moorings, when she had taken in five-sixths of her cargo. No direct evidence could be given why she foundered, nor could any certain cause be assigned for her doing so:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas), that the questions of seaworthiness and loss by a peril of the sea, were properly left to the jury, and that the evidence upon them was such as to enable the jury to find as they did in favour of the plaintiff on those issues.

The plaintiff had made a contract with B. S. and Co. for the purchase of rice, in these terms: "Bought the cargo of new crop rice, per Sunbeam, at 9s. 1½d. per cwt., cost and freight. . . . Payment to be by seller's draft on purchaser, at six months' sight, with documents attached.

He chartered the Sunbeam to proceed to Rangoon to ship rice for any port in the United Kingdom or Continent, and effected an insurance with the defendant, "At and from Rangoon to any port or place of discharge in the United Kingdom or Continent, by the Sunbeam, warranted to sail from Rangoon on or before the 1st April, on rice as interest may appear, amount of invoice to be deemed the value; average payable on every 500 bags; the said merchandise, &c., are and shall be valued at 5500l., part of 6000l."

When the Sunbeam sank in the Rangoon river she had nearly finished loading; the rest of the rice necessary to complete the cargo was alongside in lighters. After she sank, bills of lading for the rice on board were signed by the captain, and the sellers drew bills of exchange, which were accepted and paid by the purchaser (the plaintiff) to whom the bills of lading had been indorsed.

The Court of Common Pleas held that the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the rice shipped on board the Sunbeam at the time of the loss, and was entitled to recover in an action on the policy.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber (Bramwell, B., Blackburn and Lush, J.J, Pollock and Amphlett, BB.) (Quain, J. dissentiente) held, reversing the judgment of the court below, that the plaintiff had no insurable interest, because,

First, no part of the rice was ever at the plaintiff's risk, the cargo being incomplete, and he could not have been called upon to pay for it, notwithstanding its loss;

Secondly, the plaintiff, not having sustained any loss, had no option by the exercise of which he could elect to bear the loss, and pay at the cost of the underwriters. Sparkes v. Marshall (2 Bing. N. C. 761), explained;

Thirdly, the policy was upon rice, and not upon an expectancy of profit, and therefore did not cover an interest in profits that might arise collaterally from a contract relating to the rice; following Lucena v. Crawford (2 B. & P., N. R., 315).

Per Quain, J., dissentientem: That it was the intention of the parties that the rice should be at the vendee's risk from the loading, and that, as he had notice to insure before the loading began it was intended that he should insure by an ordinary policy, and that the goods should be at his risk from that time. He was, therefore, bound to pay for the rice lost, and had an insurable interest at the time of the loss, for which he was entitled to recover in the action.

ERROR from the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, in favour of the plaintiff.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the report of the case in the court below (ante, vol. 2, p. 424), and the argument on the appeal was based on the cases cited in the argument, and in the judgment there reported.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26.—The following judgments were delivered:

QUAIN, J.—As to the first point argued before us, namely, whether there was any evidence of a loss by perils of the seas, I agree with the other members of the court that there was evidence from which the jury were fairly at liberty to infer a loss by sea perils.

But I am unable to concur with the other members of the court, in holding that the plaintiff had no insurable interest in the rice at the time of the loss, and that on that ground the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

It seems to me to have been the manifest intention of the parties to the contract of the 2nd Feb. 1871, that the rice should be at the risk of the plaintiff from the time it was loaded on board the ship, and that, therefore, he had an interest in it from that time. By the contract, the plaintiff "bought the cargo of rice, per Sunbeam, at 9*s.* 1½*d.* per cwt., cost and freight. Payment by seller's draft on purchasers, with documents attached." As the price included cost and freight only, and not insurance, it seems plain that the insurance, if any, was to be effected by the purchaser; and, in a letter dated the 7th March, from the seller's agents to the plaintiff, which was put in evidence, a telegram from the sellers at Calcutta dated 6th March, is set out these words: "Sunbeam. Rangoon: advise Anderson; insurance." Before the receipt of this telegram, namely, on the 3rd Feb. 1871, the day after the making of the contract, the plaintiff effected the present policy on rice by the Sunbeam, as interest may appear. The policy is in the usual form, beginning, "The adventure on the said goods, from the loading thereof on board the said ship;" but it is said that though the language of the policy is sufficient to cover a loss during the loading, the interest of the plaintiff in the goods did not attach till the loading was complete, and the shippers in a position to obtain bills of lading; and this on the ground that the plaintiff was only bound to pay by acceptance of a draft with documents attached. But I think it fairly to be inferred from the fact that the plaintiff was to insure the goods, and had notice from the sellers to insure on the 6th March, which was before the loading began, that the plaintiff was to insure the goods in the ordinary way, by an ordinary policy from the loading, and therefore that it was intended that the goods should be at his risk from that time. It could scarcely have been within the contemplation of the parties, especially in a case like the present, where the ship was being loaded, not in dock, but from lighters at the mouth of a river, that the cargo should remain uncovered by insurance during the loading, or that it would require two policies, one effected by the vendor to cover the goods during the loading, and another by the vendee to attach from the time that the loading was complete. The fact that the goods were to be paid for by an acceptance with documents attached, is not inconsistent with the goods being at the risk of the vendee before the time arrives for presenting the draft for acceptance, if it can be inferred from the facts of the case that such was the intention of the parties.

In Fregano v. Long (4 B. & C. 219) the goods were to be paid for three months after their arrival at Naples. By the terms of the order the goods were to be despatched on insurance being effected. Insurance on behalf of the vendee was effected accordingly, and the court held that it was to be inferred from the order to insure that the goods were to be at the risk of the vendee, and that he was bound to pay for them, though they were lost, and never arrived at Naples. "It was next contended," says Holroyd, J. in that case, "that Fregano was not liable to the vendor unless the goods arrived; but the order for insurance is decisive as to that." In Castle v. Playford (ante, vol. 1, p. 255; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 99) the goods were to be paid for in cash on delivery; but the purchaser, by the terms of the contract, took upon himself "all risks and dangers of the seas," and from this it was inferred that, though the goods were lost by perils of the seas before delivery, the purchaser was still bound to pay for them. So, in the present case, I infer from the fact that it was intended that the plaintiff should insure, that the goods were intended to be at his risk, in order to enable him to effect a valid insurance; and as nothing was said as to the time from which he was to effect the insurance, I infer that it was intended that he should insure by an ordinary policy, beginning the risk from the loading, and that the goods were considered by the parties to be at his risk from that time. The plaintiff, therefore, according to the authorities above cited, was bound to pay for the goods lost, and in this case has done so accordingly.

For these reasons, I think that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

The judgment of Bramwell, B., in which Pollock and Amphlett, BB. concurred, was delivered by BRAMWELL, B.—Many questions were disposed of in the argument. As to what remained, we are of opinion that the defendant below is entitled to judgment, on the ground that the plaintiffs below have shown no interest in the subject-matter of the insurance at the time of the loss.

By the contract between the plaintiffs and the sellers of the rice, the plaintiffs were to have the cargo of the Sunbeam, and to pay for it by acceptances at six months, with the bills of lading attached. It is manifest, therefore, that until the cargo was completed and the bills of lading could be given, the plaintiffs by the mere bare words of the contract were not liable for its price, and had no property in any part of it that might be on board except contingently on the cargo being completed. The cargo never was completed; but it was suggested that as the completion of the cargo became impossible, through no default of the sellers, there arose by implication a right on their part, not expressed in the mere bare words of the contract, to be paid by the buyers for so much as had been loaded. For this contention we see no ground in reason or principle. The plaintiffs also were in no default, and there is no reason why the loss of goods, in which, certainly, they had no property but for the loss, should fall on them. It would be to make them liable for the loss because there was a loss.

Further, we consider this concluded by authority. Appleby v. Myers (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651) is in point. It was, indeed, said that here there was a reason why the plaintiff should bear the loss, viz., the inconvenience which would follow if it should be held that the plaintiffs should insure after the cargo was complete, and that the sellers must insure for their protection during its completion. But this received its answer at the bar, viz., that the same inconvenience would result as to the insurance of the rice on its passage from Rangoon to the ship, damage or loss during which certainly would not fall on the plaintiffs; a line must be drawn somewhere, and may well be at the time when the cargo is complete.

Then, it is said that the contract of purchase shows that the plaintiffs are to insure, and that, consequently, the rice was at the plaintiffs' risk, which involved that they were to pay for it, and Castle v. Playford (ante, vol. 1, p. 225); was cited. We entirely agree with that case, but the argument assumes that the rice was to be at the plaintiffs' risk before the cargo was completed and begs the question. The rice was to be at the plaintiffs' risk when the cargo was completed—and perhaps, as we shall next mention, to some extent during its completion—but it was not to be their property nor at their risk till completion, save possibly as was suggested, viz., that if any of the rice during the loading, and after it was on board, had been damaged, the sellers might complete the cargo, and insist that they had fulfilled their contract by shipping merchantable rice, and that the plaintiffs must take the damaged rice, if damaged after it was put on board, and so that the plaintiffs had an interest in respect of which they might insure. But assuming that they would have been bound to take a cargo damaged as supposed, they would only be so bound when the cargo was completed. The interest supposed, therefore, and the possibility of loss, are contingent; contingent on the completion of the cargo, therefore, they had no interest arising from this at the time of the loss.

As to the argument that the plaintiffs had an option to take this rice, which they might exercise after it was lost, we cannot, with great respect, agree to it. It seems strange that it should rest with the plaintiffs to make the underwriters liable or not at their pleasure. But the plaintiffs had no such option. No doubt it exists in some cases, and one party to a contract may have a right to insist on performance or to refuse to perform at his opition. But that is where there has been some default in the other party. Here there has been none. If the sellers had loaded a short cargo, and the plaintiffs had not been bound to take it, no doubt they would; they might have claimed it, and the sellers could not have been heard to say that they (the sellers) had broken their contract by loading a less quantity than agreed, and so the buyers were not entitled to it. But that is not the case here. The sellers might have refused to give bills of lading to the plaintiffs, and to draw on them for the price of what was shipped, and, probably, would have done so had they been well insured. It is manifest that what occurred was a new bargain between the plaintiffs and the sellers. It might as well have been made between the sellers and a stranger.

Sparkes v. Marshall (2 Bing. N. C. 761) does not apply. There the property had vested in the buyer. The seller may have been in default for sending the oats to Southampton instead of Portsmouth, but that did not take away the right of the buyer to insist as he did on having them.

Then it is said that the plaintiffs had an insurable interest in the profits they would have made. They had, but they have not insured profits, and, therefore, cannot recover on that ground. This was settled by the unanimous opinion of the judges and by the House of Lords in Lucena v. Crawford (5 B. & P. 269; 2 B. & P. N. R. 315), and has been well known and acted on ever since.

The plaintiffs had no interest in the subject-matter of insurance at the time of the loss, and so are not entitled to recover. The judgment must be reversed.

The judgment of Blackburn, J., in which Lush, J., concurred, was read by

LUSH, J.—In this case the defendant is an underwriter for 100*l.*, on a policy in the ordinary form of a Lombard-street policy, "At and from Rangoon to any port or place of discharge in the United Kingdom or Continent" on the ship Sunbeam. The subject matter of the insurance is described as "5500*l.* (part of 6000*l*) on rice, as interest may appear. Amount of invoice and 15 per cent. to be deemed the average value, payable on every 500 bags." The policy contained the usual printed words: "Beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof on board the said ship." The Sunbeam at Rangoon foundered at anchor with 8878 bags of rice on board, and this rice was totally lost.

The question in the cause was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover in respect of the loss of this rice from the underwriters, and, if so, for what per centage. The decision of the court below was that they were entitled to recover 100*l.* per cent. from each underwriter. There was a minor point made, that even if the underwriters were liable, it was not for so great a per centage; for, if in calculating the amount at risk the invoice value is taken to mean the invoice as between the shipper and the purchaser, that with the 15 per cent. added would not amount to 6000*l.*, and the underwriters would be liable to make good something less than 100 per cent. If the phrase invoice value is to be taken as another expression for the ordinary shipping value, which includes not only the costs but the premiums of insurance, the value exceeded 6000*l.* It becomes unnecessary, in the view which we take of this case, to decide anything on this point. We only mention it lest it should be said we overlooked it.

The important issues were on the third plea, denying the plaintiff's interest; the fourth plea, alleging unseaworthiness; and the fifth plea, denying the loss by perils of the sea. On all these the plaintiff had a verdict, subject to leave to enter a verdict for the defendant on the ground that there was no evidence of loss by perils insured against, or that the evidence showed that the ship was not seaworthy, and on the ground that there was no insurable interest, or to reduce the damages on such principle as the court should lay down. A rule nisi was accordingly obtained on those grounds, and also for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. After a long argument, and much consideration, the Court of Common Pleas discharged the rule, giving their reasons in an elaborate judgment, reported in L. Rep. 10 C. P. 58; ante, vol. 2, p. 424. Against this judgment the appeal was brought, and argued on the 19th, 21st, and 22nd June, before my brothers Bramwell, Lush, Quain, Pollock, and Amphlett and myself.

During the argument we gave our judgment that the evidence was such as to make it a fair question for the jury whether the ship was or was not unseaworthy, and was or was not lost by perils of the seas, and therefore that the rule to enter the verdicts for the defendants on those issues was properly discharged. The question whether the verdict was against the weight of evidence was not before us. But, on the question whether there was an insurable interest, we took time to consider, and the majority have come to the conclusion that the judgment below was wrong on this point, and ought to be reversed, for the following reasons:

As the rice in question had been actually laden on board the Sunbeam at Rangoon, there can be no question that the adventure described in the policy had begun. But as the policy of insurance is a contract of indemnity, the plaintiffs cannot recover unless they suffered a loss from the perishing of that rice, and that loss was such as to be included in the subject-matter of the insurance, as described in the policy.

The first question, then, to be determined is, whether the plaintiffs were so situated with respect to the rice in question, at the time of its loss, that they would, if uninsured, have suffered any loss from the destruction of the rice; and, if any loss, whether that loss was of such a nature as to be included in this policy. The facts which are material as to this are not in dispute. The plaintiffs, Messrs. Anderson, had made a contract with Messrs. Borrodaile, contained in a bought note, set out in the sixth paragragh of the case. The material parts are these: "Bought.—The cargo of rice per Sunbeam, at 9*s.* 1½*d.* per cwt., cost and freight. Payment by seller's draft on purchasers at six months' sight. with documents attached." The Sunbeam, which had been taken up by Guben, Christian, and Co., the sellers of the cargo to Borrodaile and Co., arrived at Rangoon within the time mentioned in the contract, and Guben, Christian, and Co. proceeded to put the rice on board; they had by the 31st March, when the ship was lost, put 8878 bags on board, but this was only a portion of what they intended to ship. The remainder—it does not distinctly appear whether 400 bags or 1600 bags, but at all events, a substantial portion of what they intended to be the lading of the Sunbeam—was in lighters or on the shore, intended for the Sunbeam, but not yet on board of her. The time for preparing the shipping documents had not yet arrived, and by the terms of the bought note, Anderson and Co. were to pay by accepting drafts with documents attached. The question, therefore, arises, what loss, if any, did Anderson and Co. sustain by the perishing of this rice at this time. It was admitted by Mr. Williams in the argument, and, as we think, could not be disputed, that if the rice intended for the Sunbeam, and put on board the lighters, had perished before it was put on board, Anderson and Co. would have sustained no loss, his vendors being still bound as before to supply him with rice, though that which they had intended to give him had perished, to their loss and not his, because it was then at their risk, not his. It was not admitted by Mr. Butt, but was very faintly denied, that as soon as the intended lading was completed, and the shipping documents were either prepared or things in such a position that they could be prepared, Anderson and Co. would have been bound to pay for the cargo, though, from subsequent disaster, it perished either at Rangoon or on its way home. We all think it is the plain intention of the parties to this contract that, from the time the lading was complete, at least, the rice was to be at the risk of Anderson and Co., and that it is not material to consider whether they would have had the full property before the drafts were accepted.

But there remains the disputed question whether each separate bag was at the risk of Anderson and Co. from the time it was put on board the Sunbeam, or whether it remained at the risk of the sellers until the whole intended loading was complete, and the shipping documents were ready, or at least everything was done to enable them to make out the shipping documents. This, we think, depends entirely on the intention of the parties to the contract as appearing from it. There is nothing to prevent the parties from agreeing that as the goods are shipped bag by bag, each bag shall be at the risk of Anderson and Co., although the payment is postponed till all is on board; and if they have sufficiently expressed such an intention, then Castle v. Playford (ante, vol. 1, p. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 98), is an express authority in this court, that Anderson and Co. must bear the loss, though it occurred before the stipulated time for payment had arrived. In that case the words of the contract were express, and left no doubt that the intention was that the buyer was to bear the risk, but we think the same result follows if the intention sufficiently appears, though it is not in express terms. On the other hand, Appleby v. Myers (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651) is an express authority that if from the contract it appears that the intention of the parties is that the payment is to be only on the completion, nothing can be recovered, though that completion is prevented by an accident for which neither party is to blame. Both decisions are binding on us, even if we disapproved of them, but we agree with both. In the present case, there is nothing in the terms of the contract to indicate that the parties had present to their minds the possibility of a loss happening at the same time when this did, and, consequently, there are no words used expressly providing for it. We must collect the intention from the words used, applying to them the general rules which the courts have from time to time adopted as rules to enable them to ascertain the intention.

The cases bearing on this subject are collected in Mr. Benjamin's Book on Sales, B. 2, chaps. 2 to 6. In Gilmour v. Supple (11 Moore P. C. 566), Sir C. Cresswell, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, says, we think very truly: "It is impossible to examine the decisions on this subject without being struck by the ingenuity with which sellers have contended that the property in goods contracted for had, or had not, become vested in the buyers, according as it suited their interest; and buyers or their representatives have with equal ingenuity endeavoured to show that they had or had not acquired the property in that for which they had contracted; and judges have not unnaturally appeared anxious to find reasons for giving a judgment which seemed to them most consistent with natural justice. Under such circumstances, it cannot occasion much surprise if some of the numerous reported decisions have been made to depend upon very nice and subtle distinctions, and if some of them should not appear altogether reconcileable with each other. Nevertheless, we think, that in all of them certain rules and principles have been recognised, by the application of which to this case we may be enabled to arrive at a correct judgment upon it." One of these rules is thus stated by Blackburn on Sales, p. 151 (See Benjamin on Sales, p. 235): "The first is, that where by the agreement the vendor is to do anything to the goods for the purpose of putting them into that state in which the purchaser is bound to accept them, or, as it is sometimes worded, into a deliverable state, the performance of these things shall (in the absence of circumstances indicating a contrary intention) be taken to be a condition precedent to the vesting of the property." This is in effect repeated in the judgment in Gilmour v. Supple (ubi sup.), and is, we think, consistent with all the cases.

Now, completing the lading so that shipping documents could be made out, seems to us a thing to be done by the vendor for the purpose of putting the goods into a deliverable state, or, to substitute the language of Sir C. Creswell, an act to be done by the seller for the benefit of the buyer, to place the goods sold in a state to be delivered, and, therefore, "until he has done it the property does not pass." But we agree that this is only a primâ facie indication of the intention, and that it must yield to anything sufficiently indicating a contrary intention. We must, therefore, look to the contract to see if there are any indications of a contrary intention in this case. It may be observed, that risk and property generally go together, and, consequently, in many of the cases, though the important point was, at whose risk is the thing; it is treated as if the sole question was, whose property is it? In the present case, however, the real question is, at whose risk was it? and we do not, therefore, attach any weight to the stipulation that the seller was to attach the shipping documents to the drafts, thereby certainly preserving to the sellers a lien on the goods till the drafts were accepted, and the bill of lading handed over; and, perhaps, preserving in them till then the property, so as to enable them to confer a title on a purchaser for value without notice, as good in equity as, and preferable at law to, that of Anderson and Co. This would not prevent the risk from being on the purchaser from the time the loading was complete. Nor do we proceed on the ground that the word "cargo" has any technical sense requiring that the whole ship should be filled up. But we do proceed on the ground that the primâ facie rule of construction is, that the parties intended that the risk should become that of the buyers, Anderson and Co., when and not till the whole lading was complete, so as to enable the shippers, by getting the shipping documents, to call on the buyers to accept and pay for the cargo; and that there is nothing in this contract to rebut the presumption that such was the intention.

We do not think that the fact that the vessel was designated, and that unless under exceptional circumstances the seller could not, without the consent of the shipowner, take any goods once on board out of her affects the question as between the vendor and purchaser. The court below says, that putting any on board the Sunbeam "was such an appropriation of the rice on board as to prevent the sellers from withdrawing that rice without the consent of the buyer." If we could see anything in the contract to give the buyer a right to object, we should think it indicated an intention that the property so put on board should be at the buyer's risk; but we cannot find anything to that effect. If we could see anything to indicate an intention that as each bag was shipped, it should be at the buyer's risk, we should think it indicated an intention that it should not be taken out without his consent. But we cannot reason in a circle.

We have, therefore, come to the conclusion that no part of this rice ever was at the plaintiff's risk, and that he never could have been called upon to pay for it, notwithstanding its loss.

The court below, after coming by a somewhat different process of reasoning to the same result, say that the plaintiff would, if the rice had not perished, have had an option to pay for it, and, therefore, had, after the loss, an option to pay for it, and charge the underwriters with the loss. No one can dispute that the plaintiff might pay the sellers for the rice that perished, though not bound to do so, just as he might have paid them for any bags of rice that had been lost on board the lighters or in their warehouses on land, after they had been brought there, in order to put them on board the ship. It might be a liberal thing to do so at his own expense. But the decision below seems to affirm that after the loss the insured, though he had not sustained any loss, may elect to bear it, and pay at the cost of the underwriters.

To this we cannot agree. The authority on which they acted (Sparkes v. Marshall, 2 Bing. N. C. 761) seems to us to be misapplied. In that case Bamford had written to Sparkes, the plaintiff, that John and Son, of Youghal, had engaged room in the Gibraltar Packet to take about 600 barrels of oats on his account. The plaintiff at once adopted this by directing insurance to be made on his account on oats per the Gibraltar Packet, from Youghal to Southampton and Portsmouth. The judgment proceeds on the ground that this was an appropriation by Bamford, assented to by Sparkes, vesting the oats in Sparkes. It appears from the correspondence in the case that Bamford knew that the Gibraltar Packet was bound for Southampton only, whilst Sparkes thought she was bound for Southampton and Portsmouth, and also that John and Son shipped only 486 barrels of oats on account of Sparkes instead of about 600. It may be, though it is not quite clear, and the court did not determine it, that these facts gave Sparkes a right to undo the appropriation to him, and so divest the interest already vested in him, but he never did so. The decision, we think, involves the position, that the underwriters had no right to call upon Sparkes to exercise for their benefit, after the loss, his right, if he had it, to undo and divest an interest vested in him before the loss. But this is a very different proposition from saying that the assured had a right after the loss to vest in himself a right not vested in him before the loss, and so incur a liability to pay at the underwriter's expense. We do not think they could do so.

There is only one further point, briefly stated in the judgment below thus: "We are further of opinion that even if the property in the rice did not legally pass to the plaintiff, yet he had an insurable interest in it, because he had an existing contract with regard to it from the time of its being loaded on board, by virtue of which he had an expectancy of benefit and advantage arising out of or depending on the safe arrival of the rice." This was more fully discussed on the argument before us. If the market was a rising market, the plaintiff would have derived benefit from the completion of the contract, if a falling one he would have sustained loss, and the loss of the Sunbeam put an end to this chance. We need not discuss whether under a properly framed policy the plaintiff could have insured this expectancy of profit. For the subject-matter of this insurance is on "rice," and though that is to be construed liberally as covering any interest in the rice, it cannot be construed as covering an interest in profits that might arise collaterally from a contract relating to the rice. For this it is enough to refer to Lucena v. Crawford (2 Bos. & P. N. R. 315). The action was on a policy on ships and goods; eight questions were asked of the judges. The eighth, set out at p. 278 of the report, was as to whether the commissioners had profits in respect of which they had an insurable interest, and then asks, "Can the policy of assurance in the first count of the declaration mentioned (i.e., a policy on ships and goods), be considered as a policy effected on such interest of the commissioners, if such they had, and the same is an insurable interest?" The answer of the judges is stated at p. 315: "The learned judges were unanimously of opinion that the policy in question could not be considered as a policy on profits, having been expressly declared upon as a policy upon the plaintiffs' interest in the ships and goods themselves, and that if it had been intended as a policy on profits, it should have been so stated." This, we think, decisive of the question; but we may refer to Royal Exchange Assurance Co. v. McSwinney (14 Q. B. 647), as showing how important it is not only to have an insurable interest, but to have the subject-matter of insurance so described in the policy as to embrace that interest.

For these reasons we think that this rule should have been absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants on the third plea, denying the insurable interest, and that the judgment should so far be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and CYRIL DODD, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, July 7, 1875.

GABARRON AND ANOTHER v. KREEFT; KREEFT v. THOMPSON.

Unascertained goods—Property passing—Sale of goods—Charter-party providing that bills of lading should be signed, as presented.

Kreeft bought from M. all the ore of certain mines, to be shipped by M. on ships chartered either by

K. or by M. The ore was to be paid for by bills drawn against bills of lading, or by longer bills on execution of charter-parties, and on a certificate that there was enough ore in stock to load the chartered ships. On being so paid for the ore was to be considered the property of K. When the Macedonia arrived at the port of loading K. had already accepted drafts which more than covered the value of its future cargo, and when the Trowbridge arrived the payments made exceeded anything that could be due for its cargo.

The charter-party of the Macedonia did not authorise the signing of bills of lading as presented, that of the Trowbridge did.

No certificate was sent that there was enough ore in stock to load the Trowbridge.

The Macedonia was loaded with ore, which ought to have been applied to fulfil the contract with K. by M., without any statement by M. that it was not being shipped under the contract; but when the shipment was complete M. procured the bills of lading to be made out to his own order, and by indorsement for value they passed to G., to whom the ore so shipped was delivered by T., the owner of the Macedonia.

When the Trowbridge arrived, though there was ore which ought to have been shipped under the contract, M. telegraphed to K. that he would not load the ship on his account, and then loaded it, taking bills of lading made out to S. (S. being a fictitious person), which bills of lading passed by indorsement for value to G.

Held by the Court (Kelly, C.B., Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.), that G. was entitled to the ore shipped on board the Trowbridge. By Kelly, C.B.—On the ground solely that the charter-party justified the signing of the bills of lading as presented, and that the bills of lading, as signed, gave a title to G. By Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.—On the ground that the ore was not specifically appropriated to the contract, and that, upon the facts, no property in the ore passed to K.

Held, by the majority of the Court (Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.), that T., the owner of the Macedonia, was not liable to K. for having delivered the ore shipped thereon to N., on the ground that the property in the ore had not passed to K., and that T. had performed his duty under the charter-party.

Held by Kelly, C.B. (dissenting), that T., the owner of the Macedonia, was liable to K. for the value of the ore, because the property in the ore had passed to K.

GABARRON v. KREEFT was a feigned issue to try the title to 400 tons of ore shipped at Cartagena, in Spain, by one Munoz on board the ship Trowbridge.

Kreeft v. Thompson was an action by the charterers of the ship Macedonia against the shipowner, for refusing to deliver to them ore shipped to the Tyne Dock on board that ship.

Both cases were tried together, before Bramwell, B., at the London Sittings after Trinity Term 1874.

In Gabarron v. Kreeft a verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being given to the plaintiffs to move to enter a verdict for them for an agreed sum.

In Kreeft v. Thompson a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 92*l.*, with leave to the defendant to move.

The ore in question, in both actions, was part of the produce of mines in Spain in the hands of Munoz. Munoz had, before the shipment of either parcel of ore, entered into a contract with Kreeft, which was set out in the following letter:

124, Fenchurch-street, London, 25th Oct. 1871.

Senor Don Francisco Munoz, of Cartagena.

We hereby confirm the verbal arrangement made with you this morning respecting the produce of such of the Porman iron mines as may be in your hands, viz.:—

We agree to buy from you the whole of the iron ores which you may obtain from these mines within twelve months from this date, at the price of 7*s.* 6*d.* per English ton, delivered f. o. b. on ships at Porman, upon the conditions that you can obtain freight for all the ore so purchased by us. . . . You binding yourself to load the said vessels chartered by you when they arrive on your side, and also such vessels as we may charter. Payment for the ores to be made by your drafts upon us at fourteen day's date, if drawn against bills of lading, at three months' date if drawn against charter; if the latter mode of payment is adopted, you are bound to send us with advice of each draft an attested certificate that the quantity of ore drawn for is actually in stock, and that this ore is to be considered our property. . . .

KREEFT AND Co.

The bills of lading for the ore shipped on board the Trowbridge were made out to one Sabadie, and were after indorsement pledged for value to Gabarron. Sabadie was a fictitious person.

By the charter-party of the Trowbridge, the captain was to sign bills of lading, "as presented."

The charter-party of the Macedonia did not authorise the signing of bills of lading, as presented; by it the owner agreed to proceed to Cartagena, and load from the factor to the freighter (Kreeft) the quantity of ore in question, and therewith to proceed to the Tyne to discharge at Tyne Dock, and to deliver the same afloat to the said freighter Kreeft, or assigns, on being paid the agreed freight. The bills of lading of the Macedonia were, through the fraud of Munoz, made out to order, and were by indorsement for value passed to Gabarron.

Various vessels were loaded, and various payments were from time to time made, so that when the Macedonia arrived at Cartagena, Kreeft had already accepted drafts drawn by Munoz, which more than covered the value of the cargo which was afterwards put on board that ship; and when the Trowbridge arrived in March 1872, that ship's arrival being later than that of the Macedonia, the payments made exceeded the value of the ore shipped to such an extent that no payment could be due for the ore to be shipped on board that ship. When the Macedonia arrived at Cartagena Munoz began to ship ore, and kept on shipping it on board that vessel for several days, without giving any intimation that he was shipping it otherwise than for Kreeft, in accordance with the contract. But when the ore was all shipped on board the Macedonia, Munoz fraudulently induced the master to sign bills of lading to this order, which as before stated, passed by indorsement for value to Gabarron.

After the arrival of the Trowbridge, and before any ore was put on board, Munoz telegraphed to Kreeft that he would not ship on their account, and after loading her took bills of lading to Sabadie's order, which, as before stated, also passed by indorsement for value to Gabarron. No certificate was given, as required by the contract, with regard to this ore.

The facts and inferences of fact are set out in the judgment, so that it is unnecessary to enter more fully into detail here.

The court granted rules in both cases, in accordance with the leave reserved at the trial.

The arguments of counsel are indicated and dealt with fully in the following judgments:

Cur. adv. vult.

GABARRON AND ANOTHER v. KREEFT.

BRAMWELL, B.—It will be convenient in this case briefly to state the facts as I appreciate them. The defendants bought from one Munoz all the ore of a certain mine in Spain, to be shipped by Munoz free on board at Cartagena, on ships to be chartered by the defendants, or by him. The ore was to be paid for by bills against bills of lading; or on the execution of a charter and on a certificate that there was enough ore in stock to load the vessel chartered. On being so paid for, the ore was to be the property of the defendants. Various vessels had been loaded and others chartered, and various payments made up to March 1872, when the Trowbridge, one of the chartered ships, arrived at Cartagena. The payments that had been made at that time exceeded in amount the price of all the ore shipped and to be shipped in all the vessels chartered and not loaded; so that had Munoz shipped ore on the Trowbridge, he would have been entitled to no payment from the defendants in respect of it. He had ore which he could and ought to have so shipped, taking bills of lading to the order of the defendants. Instead of doing this, he on the 8th April, and before any ore was put on board the Trowbridge, picked a quarrel with the defendants, telegraphed to them that he would not load the Trowbridge on their account, and though they telegraphed to him threatening him if he did not, he loaded the Trowbridge, took bills of lading making the shipment to be by one Sabadie, and the cargo deliverable to Sabadie's order. It is agreed he had at the time of shipment no intention to ship for the defendants. In giving these bills of lading the captain was clearly justified, as the charter said he was to sign bills of lading as presented. Sabadie was a sham; the ore was the ore of Munoz. Munoz indorsed Sabadie's name on the bills of lading, and then his own, and then pledged it to the plaintiffs.

The question is, whether the plaintiffs or defendants are entitled to the cargo. If the cargo ever belonged to the defendants, it is certain that Munoz could confer no title unless by estoppel or otherwise, as hereafter mentioned. This is clear on principle, as shown by Ogle v. Atkinson (5 Taunt. 759).

Did, then, the ore ever belong to the defendants? Certainly not, till it was paid for. For the agreement was not a sale of specific property, but an agreement to sell all the ore to be produced. Did it become the property of the defendants on being paid for? The contract says it shall, but it seems to me impossible that it can be so. There is nothing to distinguish the ore paid for from that not paid for; certainly there is no evidence that the ore put in the Trowbridge was specially carmarked, as the subject of the cargo for it or any other ship. No certificate in relation to it was given, as provided by the contract. It is impossible to suppose that if this ore had been stolen while in the possession of Munoz, though after it was paid for, the loss would have been the defendants', or that the defendants would not have had a right to reject this ore and object to its being loaded, or that Munoz might not have loaded other ore.

These considerations seem to show that no property passed in this ore before it was put on board the ship. Did that cause the property to pass? Now it is clear that Munoz had no right to put any part of that ore on the ship, except for the purpose of its being delivered to the defendants. On the other hand, it is equally clear to me that, had he said to the captain when loading, "I load this on my own account, and not on the defendants'," and the captain had taken it on board, the loading, together with the other facts, could not have passed the property. But it does not appear that he said anything till he presented the bill of lading, and then he showed that he had not loaded for the defendants, but for his own purposes. If the property had passed on taking a bill of lading made out as it is, the loading was in my opinion nugatory. The captain knew no better, and was justified in giving the bill of lading as he did, but his doing so did not take the property out of the defendants, if in them, any more than it would if the ore had been bought and paid for by the defendants, stored in their yards, and shipped by Munoz as a mere agent: (Ogle v. Atkinson, 5 Taunt. 759.)

The question, then, is reduced to this, did the property pass on actual shipment, the shipper having no right to ship except to pass the property, and having no right to retain possession for any lien for the price or otherwise, but taking when he does take it, a bill of lading deliverable otherwise than to the defendants, to whom it ought to have been made deliverable? If this matter were res integra, there would be strong grounds for contending it did. It would be impossible to suppose that Munoz could be heard to say, "I was doing what was right if shipping as your property, wrong if shipping as mine, but it is the latter I did." If Munoz could not say this, neither it is argued could anyone claiming title under him. It is true that Munoz had told the defendants that he would not ship on their account, but they had equally told him he should, and should ship on no other, and he shipped. Suppose goods not specific were sold to be delivered by the seller into the buyer's cart when sent for, and the seller, said I shall not put those goods in your cart unless you pay more than the agreed price, and the buyer said, you shall, and I shall send my cart, and did, and the goods were put in it by the seller, it is clear that the seller could get no more than the agreed price.

I know that different considerations may arise as to a cargo, but the question between Munoz and the defendants is the same (8 Ex., 570).

But the matter is not res integra, though there is no case precisely in point; Ellershaw v. Magniac certainly is not. There the shipper had shipped a different cargo to what he had agreed to ship; the captain taking it on board knew that. He was bound to tell the shipper to take it out or to give him bills of lading deliverable to him. I am aware that a cargo of linseed was to be shipped, and that some linseed was shipped. But the plaintiff had a right to reject a part cargo. The case may be tested thus: If a bill of lading of the linseed had been given deliverable to the plaintiff, he might have refused to receive it; still that case shows that a shipper rightfully shipping for a buyer, can nevertheless, get a bill of lading deliverable to himself. Neither is Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. 543; 20 L. J. 393, Ex.) in point. For there the shippers had a right of lien on the goods till they were paid for in the agreed manner. But that case also shows that goods may be put by the seller on the buyer's ship with nothing said at the time, and that, nevertheless, the seller may get a bill of lading deliverable to himself. It does not appear in that case that the shippers at the time of shipment said anything about the form of the bill of lading to be given, or reserved to themselves any right as to it. Then there is the case of Falke v. Fletcher (18 C. B., N. S., 400), in which Willes, J. (p. 409), uses expressions which go to show that a shipper may ship, saying nothing, and then demand a bill of lading in exchange for the mate's receipt, in such form as he pleases. Wait v. Baker (2 Ex. 1) is also not in point, because there the vendor had a right of lien. But Parke, B., said: "The delivery of the goods on board the ship was not a delivery of them to the defendant but a delivery to the captain, to be carried under a bill of lading, and that bill of lading indicated the person for whom they were to be carried." He said the same thing in Van Casteel v. Booker (2 Ex. 691). In Moakes v. Nicholson (19 C. B., N. S., 290), it was held that retaining the bill of lading, though made out in the buyer's name, prevented the passing of the property. There, however, the vendors had a lien. Mr. Benjamin on Sales, p. 306, thus sums up the result: "Where goods are delivered on board of a vessel to be carried, and a bill of lading is taken, the delivery by the vendor is not a delivery to the buyer but to the captain as bailee for delivery to the person indicated by the bill of lading, as the one for whom they are to be carried." The cases seem to me to show that the act of shipment is not completed till the bill of lading is given, that if what is shipped is the shipper's property till shipped on account of the shipowner or charterer, it remains uncertain on whose account it is shipped, and is not shipped on the latter's account till the bill of lading is given deliverable to him.

It seems to me, therefore, that in this case the property never passed to the defendants, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. I feel bound by the authorities, which, perhaps, establish a more convenient state of law than would exist if bills of lading might be got deliverable to one person, while the property was in another.

As to the question of estoppel, viz., that the defendants having authorised the signing of bills of lading as presented, have authorised an act by which Munoz has been able to deceive the plaintiffs, I am of opinion that would not avail the plaintiffs if the property in the ore had passed to the defendants. The defendants no more enabled the commission of a fraud than they would have done if the ore had been their property, never that of Munoz, in their stores, and Munoz only an agent for shipment, and the charter in the present form. What the defendants have done is, supposing the property is theirs, to put it in the possession of Munoz, and so make him appear the owner. But if I hand my watch to a man to keep for me, though I in a sense enable him to appear to be the owner, yet if he sells or pledges it, I do not loose my property.

I think judgment should be for the plaintiffs.

CLEASBY, B.—The question upon this interpleader is, whether the plaintiffs or the defendants are entitled to a cargo of ore put on board a vessel called the Trowbridge, at Cartagena.

The defendants had agreed to purchase of one Munoz all iron ore the produce of a certain mine; and it was to be paid for either by bills at fourteen days, if drawn against bills of lading, or by bills at three months from date of charter-party. In this latter case it was provided by the contract of sale that certificates of the quantity being in store should accompany the bills, and that the ore so drawn for was to be considered as the property of the defendants. It is obvious that the bills of exchange in this latter case would not refer to the exact burden of the vessel designated, but to an estimate only of the quantity to be taken on board. Munoz loaded the Trowbridge with ore in the name of one Sabadie, and procured bills of lading making the ore deliverable to the order of Sabadie, which Sabadie indorsed to Munoz, and Munoz then indorsed them for a valuable consideration to the plaintiffs. It must be taken that Munoz was not justified in doing this, and that he made the refusal of the defendants to accept two more bills an occasion for breaking his contract; and the question is, whether, under the circumstances of the case the cargo of the Trowbridge had ceased to be the property of Munoz when he obtained the bills of lading afterwards indorsed to the plaintiffs. I say, had ceased to be the property of Munoz, because it is, I think, clear that although the defendants agreed to buy the whole produce of the mine, the ore did not become the property of the defendants when it was taken for the time to the store, but was at that time the property of Munoz. It must be taken, I think, that by virtue of the payment the defendants had become entitled to a quantity of the ore in store corresponding with the amount of the bills drawn against the charterer of the Trowbridge, but it cannot de doubted that this alone would not transfer the property in any particular part, and upon this no authorities need be referred to. And the question becomes whether by any subsequent act of appreciation the property in a particular part has passed.

The question, what is a sufficient appropriation, has formed the subject of many decisions. In my opinion, as soon as there was an appropriation, by which I mean an unconditional appropriation of a part of the stock, that part would become the property of the defendants. Now it is said in the present case that by the finding of the jury up to a certain time, Munoz was loading under the contract, and afterwards was not doing so. The effect of this would be as to so much as was loaded up to that time the property would pass; and a question would then arise as to how far Munoz would affect the title of the defendants to what had been appropriated, by delivering on board the vessel a quantity of other ore which could not be distinguished. But in reality, upon all the facts found in this case, and dealing with them subject to the powers conferred upon us to draw inferences, there is nothing to show that any quantity was delivered on board before the 8th April, when it is clear that Munoz was not appropriating any as the property of the defendants, but only selecting what he should send by the vessel. There is no proof that part was loaded. The utmost evidence is that of the letter of the 11th April, the contents of which, having been argued upon on both sides, may be taken as some evidence of the statements contained in it, and thus showing that the Trowbridge and several other vessels were loading on that day. But coupling this with the date of the bill of lading, the 26th April, I cannot regard this as proof that any quantity was loaded on the 8th April. And if none was on board before that time, then it appears to me that the mere act of selection from the bulk of a particular part to be placed on board the vessel is not such an appropriation as to make the contract of purchase operate on it—because the selection was in the mind of the person selecting not a selection of a portion of what had been paid for, but of what he alleged was not paid for.

It was further argued that, independent of the intention of Munoz to appropriate the ore loaded to the contract and particular drafts, the fact of loading the ore on board the vessel chartered by the defendants was of itself such an act as vested the property in them. But upon the effect of delivering a cargo contracted for on board the vessel of the vendee, the authorities are too numerous to refer to. I may mention Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. 543), as an early one, with Ellershaw v. Magniac, in the note in that case (6 Ex. 570), and Shepherd v. Harrison, in L. Rep. 5 H. of L. 116, as the last. The effect of these is, that the delivering of goods contracted for on board a ship when a bill of lading is taken, is not a delivery to the buyer but to the captain as bailee to deliver to the person indicated by the bill of lading, and that this may equally apply when the ship is the ship of the vendee. Such would, I think, be the proper conclusion, independent of the clause of the charter-party, that the captain is to sign bills of lading "as presented." This does not mean merely as regards price or any particulars of that sort, because it is plain that when the charter was effected it was uncertain whether Munoz would not choose to draw at fourteen days against bills of lading, in which case he might, no doubt, have made the cargo by the terms of the bills of lading deliverable to himself. The captain knows nothing about the arrangements between Munoz and the defendants, he only knows that Munoz is the person who is to fulfil the charter-party on behalf of the defendants. Thus the defendants make it obligatory upon the captain to give to Sabadie or Munoz this document of title to property transferable by indorsement, and this, if not an estoppel against the defendants, as between them and the bonâ fide holder of this document of title, very much strengthens the conclusion that Munoz having this power expressly reserved to him, acted throughout with reference to it as he did in fact exercise it to the last.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed upon this issue.

KELLY, C.B.—This case differs from Kreeft v. Thompson in one point only, but that one is all-important. Here, the facts in all other respects being substantially the same, the charter-party of the ship (in this case called the Trowbridge) contained these words: "The captain to sign bills of lading, as presented." Now these words appear to me, not only to convey an authority to the master, but to impose an obligation upon him to grant and sign bills of lading, in whatever form and to whatever effect he might be required by Munoz to sign them. I think, therefore, that the bills of lading, though a fraud upon Kreeft, were granted and signed under and in strict pursuance of his authority, and having been indorsed for value to the plaintiffs, entitled them to the ore in question, and therefore to the judgment of the court.

KREEFT v. THOMPSON.

BRAMWELL, B.—This case differs from Gabarron v. Kreeft in the following particulars. It is an action on a charter-party by the charterers against the shipowner for not delivering a cargo to the plaintiffs according to the charter-party. The charter-party did not authorise the captain to sign bills of lading as presented. By it the shipowner agreed to deliver the cargo to the plaintiffs. The loading had partly taken place while Munoz was intending to fulfil his contract, but was finished after. The cargo had been specifically drawn against.

If I am right in my opinion in Gabarron v. Kreeft, the property in this cargo never passed to the plaintiffs, for I think it makes no difference that at the beginning of the loading Munoz intended to ship for the plaintiffs. As I have said, the act is not complete till the bill of lading is given.

Was the shipowner, nevertheless, bound by the charter to deliver the cargo to the plaintiffs? I think not; I think the charter only means that the cargo shall be delivered to the charterer if he has a right to receive it, and that he had no right to receive this. Then it will be said that the shipowner had no right to take it on board. I think he not only had such right but was bound to do so. I think that if Munoz had said to him, I will not ship for the plaintiffs, but will ship for myself, and the captain had said, I will not take the cargo but sail away in ballast, he would have done wrong. A captain, when he cannot get the agreed cargo, is bound to take some other cargo if he can get it, so as to lessen the loss. Suppose Munoz had wholly refused all shipment, and some other owner of ore had offered a shipment, the captain would have been bound to take it, and had he done so would not have been bound to deliver it to the plaintiffs. I think, on the authorities referred to in Gabarron v. Kreeft, that the captain could not refuse to sign the bill of lading which Munoz required, unless he let Munoz take out the cargo, and that he would have done wrong had he required him to do so. There is no suggestion in any of the cases cited in Gabarron v. Kreeft that any action would be maintainable against a captain or owner for giving bills of lading to the order of the shipper. Besides, Munoz was the agent of the plaintiffs, and the captain was justified in signing bills of lading as he required.

I think our judgment should be for the defendants.

CLEASBY, B.—This is not like Gabarron v. Kreeft, in which the question of property only was involved. It is an action on a charter-party by the freighters against the shipowners. By the charter-party the defendant was to receive from the factor of the freighters at Cartagena, a cargo of ore, and deliver it in the Tyne Docks to the freighters or assignees. No question arises in the present case upon the pleadings, and the case is to be dealt with entirely on the facts, but as it is a question of contract, it is essential to see what the exact contract is, and it is to deliver to the freighters or assignees. The word "assignees" cannot mean, I think, assignees of the charter-party, but it may mean either assignees of the cargo or assignees of the bill of lading, which is the title to property in the cargo.

I must say I have very great difficulty in dealing with this case from the scantiness of the materials for any decision. The question relates to the cargo of a vessel called the Macedonia, which it appears was chartered as early as the 9th Nov. 1871, and drawn against on the 29th Nov. It has been noticed that by the arrangement between Munoz and the plaintiffs, the cargo might be drawn against either by bills at three months from the date of the charter-party, or at fourteen days from the bills of lading. It might appear from this that bills of lading were not to be taken except when they were drawn against. But that is not the case; the correspondence shows throughout that in cases where the bills had been drawn against the charter-party, bills of lading were still to be taken by Munoz and forwarded to the plaintiffs. See, for example, the letter of the 29th Nov. 1871, in which Munoz says, "We have drawn on you this day a bill for 123*l.* at ninety days, which we place to your credit on account of cargoes per Macedonia, Nautilus, and Messenger, invoices of which will follow with their respective bills of lading." And as regards the cargo by the Macedonia, which we are now considering, and which had been drawn against so early as the 29th Nov., we have the following in the letter of the plaintiffs themselves, dated the 24th of Jan., "We are expecting bills of lading of Macedonia, and Retriever," &c. It is true there is nothing to show that these bills of lading did not make the cargo deliverable to the plaintiffs. But this is not material, because the shipowner or captain knew nothing of the arrangement between Munoz and the plaintiffs, and if there were to be bills of lading Munoz must be the person to determine in what form they should be, because it is admitted that he might draw in each case against bills of lading, in which case, no doubt, the bills of lading would be deliverable to himself, or he would have no security, and the captain would not ask him why he took the bills of lading deliverable to himself.

The effect of this seems to me to be that the captain must look to Munoz to determine how the bills of lading are to make the cargo deliverable, and that he performs his contract by delivering the cargo according to the bills of lading, though by the charter-party the cargo is deliverable to freighters or assignees. If he is addressed to Munoz as the factor of the shipper, and Munoz is to determine whether he will take bills of lading deliverable to himself, the shipper is bound by his act in having the goods made deliverable to himself, and it cannot make any real difference in substance whether, by the bills of lading, the cargo is made deliverable to Sabadie or to Munoz. This seems to be a more satisfactory mode of deciding the case than by deciding it on the ground that the plaintiffs did not perform their part of the contract, because their factor did not send a cargo deliverable to the freighters or their assigns, although it really comes to the same thing.

KELLY, C.B.—The question in this case is, whether a quantity of iron ore, shipped on board the Macedonia by one Munoz, is the property of the plaintiffs Kreeft and others, and whether the master was bound to deliver it to them upon its arrival in England, or whether it had passed under the bills of lading to order, signed by the master, at the instance of Munoz in favour of one Sabadie, and from whom it passed by indorsement to Gabarron, the plaintiff in the other action.

I am of opinion that the ore had become the property of the plaintiffs, if not before, at the time when it was shipped on board the Macedonia; that the master was bound by the terms of the charter-party to deliver it to the plaintiffs upon the arrival of the ship in the Tyne; and that not having done so, his owner, whom the defendant represents, is liable to this action.

The ore was shipped by Munoz at Cartagena, under a contract between him and Kreeft, by which Kreeft had contracted to buy from him the whole of the iron ores which he might obtain from the mines within twelve months from the 25th Oct. 1871. And it was expressly agreed that Munoz should load such vessels as should be chartered by Kreeft; payment to be made at fourteen days' date, if drawn for against bills of lading, and at three months' date, if drawn against charter; and Munoz to send with advice of each draft, an attested certificate that the quantity of ore drawn for was actually in stock, and that that ore was to be considered the property of Kreeft. The Macedonia was chartered by Kreeft, and by the charter-party the owner expressly agreed "to proceed to Cartagena, and load from the factor to the freighter (Kreeft) the quantity of iron ore in question, and therewith to proceed to the Tyne, to discharge at Tyne Dock, and to deliver the same afloat to the said freighter Kreeft, or assigns, on being paid the agreed freight." The Macedonia proceeded to Cartagena, and Munoz having already drawn, and Kreeft having accepted drafts exceeding in amount the price of the ore in question, and having taken it out of stock, and so separated it from the bulk of the stock, shipped the quantity of ore in question on board the Macedonia, the shipment continuing for several days, and no intimation having been given by Munoz to the master that the ore was otherwise than destined to and shipped for the account of Kreeft, the charterer of the ship. But when the shipment was complete, Munoz fraudulently prevailed on the master to sign bills of lading for the ore to order, which afterwards passed by indorsement for value to Gabarron.

Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the whole case depends upon the contracts between the parties, that is to say, between Kreeft and Munoz, and Kreeft and the owner of the Macedonia respectively; and that Munoz having contracted that the ore, when drawn for and the drafts accepted, should become the property of Kreeft, it became his property as soon as he had accepted beyond the amount of its price, and it had been separated from the bulk of the stock.

But if this were doubtful, I am clearly of opinion that it became his property the moment it was put on board the Macedonia. The case was contended in argument to be the same as if the plaintiff had purchased and paid for a quantity of merchandise which the seller contracted to deliver into the purchaser's waggon when he should send for it, and that he had hired the waggon of the defendant, who had contracted to carry it to the plaintiff's warehouse and there deliver it to the plaintiff, but whose servant, the waggoner, having received it into the waggon, had signed a contract to deliver it, and had afterwards in fact delivered it, to another person. It has been argued that the shipment was made with a view to the bill of lading, and with the intent to take a bill of lading to order, and that the shipment was not complete till the bill of lading was signed. No doubt the shipment and the bill of lading in general constitute but one transaction. But in this case it is to disregard altogether the contracts between the parties to apply to it this general rule or practice. Here Munoz had received a copy of the charter, and knew that the vessel had been chartered by the plaintiff and that the owner had contracted to receive the ore from him, and to deliver it to the plaintiff upon the ship's arrival in the Tyne. And I hold that it was not competent to Munoz, or to the master, or to both together, to change the property by the wrongful act of Munoz, or the unauthorised acquiescence of the master, the one in demanding, the other in granting, the bills of lading.

Upon the simple and plain ground, therefore, that under the contract between Kreeft and the shipowner, the master, as the agent of the owner, was bound to deliver the ore on its arrival in the Tyne to Kreeft, and that he could not exonerate himself from that obligation by the unauthorised signature of the bills of lading; it appears to me that Kreeft was entitled, upon the arrival of the ship in the Tyne, to the delivery of the ore, and consequently that the defendant is liable to this action for the non-delivery.

Many cases were cited on the one side and on the other, but it appears to me that none of them has any application to the case before the court, except indeed the case of Ellershaw v. Magniac, in a note in 6 Ex. 570, where the facts were very similar to the present, but with this marked distinction, that there was no such express contract as here, that the property of the goods should vest in the purchaser upon their having been drawn for, and the drafts accepted; and further, that a part of the goods only was shipped, and the vessel filled up with other goods, for which the purchaser had not contracted, and so that as he was not bound to accept the one and had never contracted for the other, the property in neither had vested in him by the shipment. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the plaintiff Kreeft is entitled to the judgment of the court.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, July 14, 1875.

THE JENNIE S. BARKER; THE SPINDRIFT.

Collision—Steamtug lying to—Duty to avoid sailing ship.

A steam tug hove to during fine weather in a fairway and waiting for employment, is bound to keep out of the way of sailing ships using the fairway.

THESE were cross causes of collision instituted, the one on behalf of the Liverpool Steam Tug Company (Limited), the owners of the tug Spindrift, against the barque Jennie S. Barker, and her owners intervening; the others by the owners of the Jennie S. Barker, against the Spindrift, and her owners intervening.

The causes were by agreement heard upon the petitions filed in each cause, without answers being put in. The petition filed by the owners of the Spindrift, was, so far as is material, as follows:—

1. Between noon and 0.30 p.m., on the 14th June 1875 the steam tug Spindrift, of 175 tons gross register, manned by a crew of nine hands, all told, was about one mile from the land, between Point Lynas and Middle Mouse.

2. The wind at such time was about south-west, blowing a moderate gale, with squalls, and the tide was about half ebb, and of the force of about one and a half knots per hour. The Spindrift was lying to, with her engines stopped and her helm lashed to port, and was heading about south-east.

3. At such time a barque, which proved to be the above-named barque Jennie S. Barker, was seen at the distance of about one mile and a half from the Spindrift, coming up astern of her, a little on her port quarter.

4. The Jennie S. Barker approached and caused danger of collision with the Spindrift. The engines of the Spindrift were ordered ahead, but before she could go ahead the Jennie S Barker ran against, and with her stem and port bow struck the Spindrift on her starboard paddle-box, and did her a great deal of damage, in consequence of which she took the assistance of a steam tug, by which she was towed to Liverpool.

5. Those on board the Jennie S. Barker improperly neglected to keep a good look-out.

6. The Jennie S. Barker improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the Spindrift.

7. The helm of the Jennie S. Barker was improperly starboarded before the said collision.

8. The said collision was occasioned by all or some or one of the matters stated in the three last preceding articles of this petition, or otherwise, by the negligent and improper navigation of the Jennie S. Barker.

9. The said collision was not in any way occasioned by any negligence on the part of those on board the Spindrift.

The petition filed on behalf of the owners of the Jennie S. Barker was as follows:—

1. The Jennie S. Barker is a barque of 1059 tons register, and at the time of the occurrence hereinafter mentioned was on a voyage from St. John, New Brunswick, to Liverpool, with a cargo of deals. The Spindrift is a steam tug of the Port of Liverpool.

2. Shortly before noon, on the 14th June 1875, the Jennie S. Barker was off the coast of Anglesea, near to Point Lynas, heading about S.E. by E., to E.S.E., and intending to pick up a pilot at the Point Lynas Station to take her into Liverpool. The wind was unsteady, blowing hard from S.S.W. to S.W., with occasional heavy squalls which were accompanied by thick, heavy rain. The Jennie S. Barker was under lower fore and maintopsails, foresail, fore and maintopmast staysails, and mizen staysail, and was going about five knots an hour.

3. At this time and under these circumstances the look-out of the Jennie S. Barker saw and reported a pilot boat and a steam tug, which latter vessel afterwards proved to be the Spindrift. She was right ahead, heading somewhat in the same direction as the barque, but more to the south. She appeared to be about a mile distant. At this time the weather became thick with rain, and the pilot boat was lost to view.

4. The Jennie S. Barker kept her course until she was about three ship's lengths from the Spindrift, when it was found that, although steam and smoke were coming from the steam pipe and funnel of the latter, she had apparently stopped, and was not moving ahead. The helm of the Jennie S. Barker was thereupon, in order to avoid a collision, at once put hard up, but she did not answer her helm.

5. Immediately before the collision the helm of the Jennie S. Barker was put hard down, with the view of easing the blow, but before the port helm had taken effect the martingale of the barque and the starboard paddle-box of the Spindrift came into contact, the jib boom of the barque at the same time catching the mast of the tug and bringing it down, and considerable other damage was done.

6. At the time when the helm of the Jennie S. Barker was put up, no one was visible on the deck of the Spindrift. Her crew were seen running up from below just at the time of the collision.

7. The Spindrift improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the Jennie S. Barker.

8. A proper look-out was not kept on board the Spindrift.

9. Those on board the Spindrift improperly neglected to hail or otherwise warn the Jennie S. Barker that the Spindrift was stopped.

10. The said collision was caused by the negligence and improper navigation of the Spindrift, and was not caused by any negligence of those on board the Jennie S. Barker.

The causes came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters, and witnesses were called by both parties.

By the witnesses called on behalf of the Spindrift, it was proved that she was lying-to waiting to be engaged to tow vessels into Liverpool; that the place where she was hove to was the fairway channel for ships entering the port of Liverpool; that she lay in the same position till the barque was close to, expecting the barque to go clear, but then seeing that the barque was not going clear, an order was given to her engines to go ahead, but that nobody being at the starting gear when the order was given, the order was not instantly executed, and before the tug could move ahead she was struck by the barque.

The witnesses called on behalf of the barque proved that they observed the tug some distance away, and the barque was kept on her course in the expectation that the tug, as a steam vessel, would keep out of the barque's way; that they had engaged no steam tug, and expected that the Spindrift would, as other tugs had done previously, get under way and come alongside the barque, with a view of getting engaged by the barque to tow her into Liverpool. Another tug was following and had spoken the barque, but was not engaged. The master of the barque held on till close to the tug, and then seeing that the tug was not moving, and that he was nearing her so as to strike her on the starboard side, put his helm a starboard, so as to pass astern of her and along her port side. The barque, however, would not answer her helm quickly enough, being very deeply laden, and her helm was thereupon put hard aport to lessen the effect of the blow.

The remaining facts of the case are set out in the petitions.

The main question was, whether the Spindrift, being hove to, was to be considered as a steamer within the meaning of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Milward, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the Spindrift.—A tug boat lying to is not to be treated as a steamship, so as to come within article 15 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, to be under any obligation to get out of the way of a sailing ship under way. The sailing ship ought to have seen that the tug was lying to, and should have given way. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The ship says that she had good reason to believe you were lying to waiting for her, and the question is, why were you not sufficiently under command to enable you to have kept out of her way?] To make it the duty of the tug to keep out of the way of the ship she must have been "proceeding in such a direction as to involve risk of collision;" but the tug was not "proceeding" at all, and is, consequently, not within the rule. This was distinctly held in The Helvetia, which was affirmed on appeal to the Privy Council (a). [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—That was the

THE HELVETIA.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England in a cause of damage instituted by the owners of the late steam tug Prince Arthur and her master and crew against the steamship Helvetia and the National Steamship Company (Limited), her owners intervening. The case on behalf of the plaintiffs in the Court of Admiralty was that the steam tug was, on the morning of the 16th Aug. 1867, hove to off the South Stack Lighthouse on the starboard tack, under her foresail and jib, and with her engines stopped, waiting for employment in the usual way. The weather was fine and clear, the wind a moderate breeze from the N.W. In the circumstances the Helvetia was at about 10 a.m. observed on the starboard side of the tug a long way off inward bound. The Prince Arthur continued hove to, and the Helvetia under canvas and steam continued to approach her. When the Helvetia got very near the steam whistle of the Prince Arthur was sounded, and her engines were turned astern full speed; but the Helvetia, without slackening speed, came on and ran into the Prince Arthur on her starboard side and sank her. It was alleged that if a proper look out had been kept on board the Helvetia those on board of her must have seen that the Prince Arthur was lying to, and that the Helvetia ought to have kept out of the way of the Prince Arthur. On behalf of the defendants it was alleged that the Helvetia was bound upon a voyage from New York to Liverpool, and when off Holyhead, on 16th Aug., about 10 a.m., her look out reported a steam tug on the port bow. This steam tug, which was the Prince Arthur, was about six miles from the Helvetia, bearing two points on her port bow, and pursuing a south-easterly course. The Helvetia continued her course until just before the collision when, in order to ease the blow, her helm was ported, her engines were stopped, and her topsail halyards let go. It was submitted that as the Helvetia and the Prince Arthur were crossing so as to involve risk of collision, and the Prince Arthur had the Helvetia on her starboard side, it was the duty of the steam tug to keep out of the way, and that the negligence of the steam tug caused the collision, or, at any rate, contributed to it.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the judgment of the learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty, which was as follows:

Jan. 30.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE: If the court entertained any doubt whatever as to the judgment which it ought case of two steamers, and distinguishable from the present, on the ground that the steamer could not possibly suppose the tug to be waiting for her, and must have known that she was lying to without the intention of moving.] But if, as there held, a tug lying to is not to be considered a steamship under way, the decision applies equally to the present case.

to give in this case, it would have adopted the usual course of retiring with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and having a deliberate consultation with them before it pronounced its decision. I have, during the course of the arguments, and during the course of the discussion, put before the Trinity Masters such questions as I thought necessary to elucidate any difficulties incident to nautical experience and nautical science arising out of this case, and I have obtained from them answers which to me are perfectly satisfactory. I, therefore, proceed to give my judgment immediately. This was a collision which took place about twenty-two miles, I think, off Holyhead, somewhere between Holyhead and Bardsey Island, about half-past ten on the morning of the 16th of Aug. 1867; the weather was perfectly fair, and the day was, as I think one of the witnesses said, a beautiful fine day. The vessels which came into collision were a paddle steam tug of the ordinary size, called the Prince Arthur, belonging to the port of Liverpool, and which carried a crew of twelve hands, all told, and the screw steamer, the Helvetia, manned by a crew of ninety-eight men, and bound for Liverpool from New York, she is, according to the evidence, 371ft. in length, and no less than 2769 tons register. The case set up on behalf of the Prince Arthur is that she was lying to, waiting for a job, and that while she was so lying to, she was run into by the steamer Helvetia, and sunk. Now, the first fact of importance to ascertain, and for the ascertaining of which the court is responsible, is the condition in which this steam tug actually was at the time when she was run into, and at the time when she was seen. The evidence on this point is that she was lying to with her jib and foresail set, and with her engines in this condition: the fires had been pulled forward so as to keep the steam down, and there was just enough steam—and only enough steam—kept on her to enable her to work her engines a little astern; she was lying, I think, within eight or nine points of the wind, and according to the opinion of the gentlemen by whom I am assisted, there is nothing in that circumstance which would prevent her being what is called "lying to." Such being the facts, as they appear to me, irresistibly proved by the evidence in this case, the first question I put to the Trinity Masters was, whether a vessel in such a state as that I have described (I should have added to that that she had her helm lashed hard-a-port) whether a vessel in that condition was, or was not, according to the proper nautical understanding of the term "lying to," and they have no doubt whatever that with her helm lashed hard-a-port, and the fires as I have described, lying as near to the wind as possible, that she was lying to. I may say that this evidence with regard to her condition so given on behalf of the plaintiffs is entirely uncontradicted by the evidence produced by the defendants; indeed, in my opinion, it is confirmed, because, with regard to the speed of the steamship, it was admitted by the witness Bentley, the mate of the Helvetia (and who, as has been truly said, is responsible for this collision, and who had every motive therefore to exempt himself from that responsibility), that the steam tug did not move more than a vessel would do with her helm lashed and lying to; and although it is true that he maintained that she was in motion at the time of the collision, he admitted that that was an inference which could not be drawn from the speed at which he alleged that she was approaching. Now, the next question of importance is at what distance these two vessels were seen. The witness Evans, who is the mate of the Prince Arthur says he saw the Helvetia, when she was reported to him the second time, about three-quarters of a mile to a mile distant. The witness Bentley, produced by the defendants, said, I think, it was from six to seven miles off that he saw this vessel, and the last witness who was produced, James McEvoy, and to whom the court is certainly not inclined to give much credence, says that he saw the tug three-quarters of an hour, and that she was twelve or thirteen miles off when he first saw her. It is admitted by the defendants that the steamer Helvetia never altered her course till the moment of collision; that she did port her helm just before the collision is true, but it had no effect whatever on the course of the vessel. Therefore, that must be taken, whatever the inference may be from it, as a fact proved in this case. On the part of the steam tug it is maintained also, that, with the exception of keeping her occasionally a little to the westward, and occasionally a little to the eastward, as she was lying to, her helm was unaltered during the time. The evidence of a witness of the name of Higman is of importance at this part of the case. That witness is a shipwright, and he was a passenger on board the Helvetia, and he gave evidence to this effect: That he saw the tug four or five miles off, two or three points on the port bow, as they approached; that he made an observation to a Mr. Watson; that he saw the officer in charge of the Helvetia walking up and down and talking to a pilot; that the Helvetia continued her course; that when he saw them approaching the tug, he took notice of the officer to see if he was looking towards the tug, he then called to the officer when they were two or three lengths off, and asked him if he saw the tug under his bows; that the officer then looked over the rails and saw the tug, and called out, "Hard-a-port, stop the engines." That was very serious evidence, considering the character of the person who gave it, and the opportunity he had of forming his opinion. On the other side, Bentley, who was the officer who had the watch, is produced, and he admits that he was walking up and down with the pilot in the way that is described. He denies that he did not see this vessel at an earlier period, because he says that she was reported to him by the look-out; that he saw the tug two points on his port bow when she was six or seven miles off. He is asked as to this conversation, and he denies it, but at the same time he admits that he did look over the rail just before the collision, and that he did at that time give the order to port. The question arises immediately to anybody conversant with the rules of evidence and the mode by which the truth is ascertained in cases of conflicting testimony—where is the pilot, who could have given the court the means of ascertaining whether Higman or Bentley was speaking the truth? The pilot is not produced, and no reason is given at all to account for his absence; therefore I come to the conclusion, and I think rightly, that the court ought to rely upon the evidence of Higman, and if it does do so there is no doubt that there was very gross negligence and carelessness on the part of those on board the Helvetia; and, though that is an opinion for which the court is alone responsible, it is satisfactory to say that in that opinion the Trinity Masters entirely agree. The question then comes to be considered—whether the Helvetia being (according to the opinion of the court, corroborated by that of the Trinity Masters) to blame for this collision, to use the words of the 20th rule "from the consequences of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen"—whether the steam tug can be said in any way to have contributed to this collision, so as to render her equally to blame, or at all to blame for it. It has been contended that the evidence shows that the steam tug falls under the 14th article of the Regulations, which is in these words:—"If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." And it is said that this is a point which has not yet been decided, with reference to such circumstances as exist in the present case, namely, that of a steam tug lying to, and having some steam power on her, sufficient to enable her to lay to. That is the evidence as to the condition of the steam tug in this case; and it is said that a steam tug in that condition, and in this case shown to be a little on the port side, heading S.W. by S., and the other vessel being shown to be heading N.E. half E., it is said that, given these circumstances, there is a case to which the rule applies, for the two ships are both under steam, and are "crossing so as to involve risk of collision." The court laments that the duty should be cast upon it of construing for the first time this article; but I must say that I do not feel at present any difficulty whatever in putting what appears to me the true construction upon

The ship had no right to keep on her course till the collision was inevitable; she ought to have taken steps sooner. The real cause of collision was the starboarding of the ship.

it. I do not think that this rule ever was intended to apply to a steam tug lying to, though not motionless, in such a condition as the steam tug was in this case. I think it applies to two ships under steam, and crossing in the usual sense of the term—namely, both approaching one another, both pursuing their own courses, and crossing each other in so doing; and again, it is a consolation to know, though the court must be responsible for the construction of this rule, that the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, by whom I am assisted, are not able to conceive, consistently with usage and the ordinary practice of vessels of this description, that any other construction could be reasonably put upon that article. I should also mention, and I particularly drew the attention of the Trinity Masters to it, the sail carried by the tug at the time she was lying to, and their opinion is that so far from that sail preventing her from being what is technically and properly called "lying to," it would rather assist her than otherwise; that the sail that she carried was necessary for her, that she might be lying to. I am not aware that any advantage would be derived from a further discussion of the evidence in this case. I am of opinion, upon the evidence, that this steam tug was lying to, and that the collision was caused by the Helvetia, and in both those opinions the Elder Brethren by whom I am assisted entirely concur. They are of opinion that the steamer saw the tug, or ought to have seen the tug, in full time to have got out of her way, and that there was nothing in the action of the tug that was wrong, that there was nothing that could indicate to the tug the probability of this enormous vessel running over her, with twenty miles of sea on either side of her, where the steamer could easily pass; and upon the other hand, if there had been a good look-out on board the Helvetia, they must have known, or at least ought to have known from the position in which the steam tug was, and the manner in which she was lying, that she was lying to, and that it was the duty of the Helvetia therefore to get out of her way. These are the circumstances which induce the court to come to the conclusion which it has stated, and I pronounce the Helvetia to be alone to blame.

From this judgment the owners of the Helvetia appealed to Her Majesty in Council upon the grounds—First, because the evidence showed that the Prince Arthur was under steam within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea; secondly, because the evidence showed that the Prince Arthur was crossing the Helvetia, having the latter on her own starboard side, within the meaning of the said Art.; thirdly, because it was, therefore, the duty of the Prince Arthur to keep out of the way of the Helvetia; fourthly, because it was the duty of the Helvetia to keep her course; fifthly, because the Helvetia was justified in assuming, until the collision became inevitable, that the Prince Arthur would keep out of the way of the Helvetia; sixthly, because there was nothing in the state of the tug or her engines to prevent her from keeping out of the way; and, seventhly, because the tug at any rate contributed to the collision, because it might have been avoided by reasonable care on the part of those on board the tug, by going astern or otherwise moving away from the Helvetia.

Butt, Q.C. (W. C. Gully with him).—There is a great distinction between this case and The Helvetia (ubi sup.); in the latter case the tug was lying to under sail. Here the ship knew that the tug was lying to waiting for employment, and that it was customary for tugs so lying-to to get out of the way of vessels coming up; they get under way and come alongside to speak the vessel. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Had the ship any right to go on ahead until the collision was inevitable?] She expected the tug to get out of the way; but, of course, could not tell whether the tug would go ahead or astern, so that either starboarding or porting would be equally dangerous; she could only go on.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I will begin the few observations I have to make by saying that, in my judgment, the case of The Helvetia (ubi sup.) has not any clear application to this case, as the circumstances are so different, and it was agreed that there was very little brought forward in this court and in the Privy Council to enable it to be understood.

Now, in this case, the steam tug Spindrift was hove to in a fairway channel, and it is no doubt a question of considerable importance, what is the duty of a steam tug when it is in this position? I have consulted with the Elder Brethren of Trinity House on this point, and have looked at the case, and especially at the consequences which would ensue from laying down the law, that a steam tug in such a position is to be considered in the same category as a sailing vessel, or a vessel at anchor, and having no obligation cast upon her of getting out of the way of another, a sailing vessel. I think I am bound to come to the conclusion that a steam tug that places herself, as I have said, in the fairway of a channel, hove to, waiting for employment, is bound to keep herself in readiness to move out of the way of sailing vessels, especially in such weather as is proved to have existed at the time.

The evidence, however, shows that there was not due vigilance displayed by the steam tug on this occasion. There was no man at the starting gear when the order was given to go ahead, and I think it was one of the witnesses produced on behalf of the Spindrift, the mate, who very fairly and properly stated that when the vessel was hove to in this way, there was no one to execute the order to go ahead at the time. The Elder Brethren think that the master of the barque was well founded in the observation that one stroke or two would carry the steam tug ahead if the order had been complied with, and the steam tug had started forwards with that object.

It has been said that the barque was to blame, at all events for starboarding her helm, as the evidence established that she did so when nearly abeam of the tug. In the first place, there is the greatest improbability that this should have been the case, and I am bound to say that the evidence has not removed the inference of that improbability from my mind. I do not believe that she did starboard when she was abeam of the tug. On the other hand, it has been urged that it is very improbable she could not have answered her helm more readily than she did, because the case made on behalf of the Jennie S. Barker is, that the helm had no action under the circumstances. Well, it is to be remembered—and upon this point I have had the advantage of conferring with the Elder Brethren—the evidence establishes that she was deep in the water, that her tonnage was great, that there was a strong wind on her beam, and that she had but very little canvas. Taking all these circumstances together, the Elder Brethren think—and I agree with them—that the statement of the Jennie S. Barker is one that they have no reason to disbelieve. The statement of her captain is, that she did not answer her starboard helm before the collision.

Therefore, looking to all the circumstances of the case, I can come to no other conclusion than that the Spindrift must be held alone to blame for the collision.

THE JAMES ARMSTRONG.

Salvage—Apportionment — Agreement — Values— Varying decree.

Where salvors have entered into an agreement as to the apportionment of salvage, which in the opinion of the Court of Admiralty is equitable, and not obtained by coercion, the court will uphold the agreement, and apportion the salvage awarded in accordance therewith.

Where the High Court of Admiralty has made a decree awarding salvage upon values furnished by the respective owners of the ship, freight, and cargo, and accepted by the salvors, and afterwards it is discovered by the owner of cargo that he has been ordered to pay upon the value of the cargo without deducting the freight due upon delivery, the court has power to and will, if it sees fit, reduce the amount of salvage, and vary the proportions payable by the respective owners.

THESE were causes of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Queen of the Bay, and of the owners, masters, and crews of thirteen pilot cutters and luggers belonging to the Scilly Islands, and of the owners and crews of nine gigs belonging to the same place, and of William Williams, gentleman, of St. Mary's, Scilly, against the barque James Armstrong and the cargo lately laden therein, and the freight due for the transportation thereof. The James Armstrong was a barque of 382 tons register, and was on a voyage from Truxillo to Waterford for orders, with a cargo of mahogany, dyewood, and broken stowage; she put into Waterford, and getting orders there left for London on Jan. 23rd, 1874. On March 3rd, 1874, about 1.30 p.m., the James Armstrong was discovered by some of the salvors derelict, bottom upwards, and with a large hole in her stern, about three miles E.N.E. of St. Mary's Head, Scilly; she was then driving seaward. The whole of the pilot cutters made fast, and tried to tow her towards the land; they towed her till midnight, when her tackle fouled the bottom and held fast; she was then to the N.E. of the Island of Menewhethan, about three miles off.

The other facts are sufficiently stated in the petition filed on behalf of the Queen of the Bay, the gigs, and William Williams, which so far as material alleged:

1. That on Tuesday, 3rd March 1874, at about 11.30 a.m., William Williams, of Borough St. Mary's, in the Scilly Isles, observed something floating very low in the water in a south easterly direction, and two miles outside the eastern island of Menewhethan, got a spy-glass and then discerned the said object to be a vessel, floating apparently bottom upwards, and which afterwards proved to be the James Armstrong, the vessel proceeded against in this cause, and that he thereupon hurried off to Hugh Town two miles distant and gave information of the said wreck, and that, in consequence of such information, a telegram was dispatched by Lloyd's agent at Scilly to the manager of the West Cornwall Steamship Company, Limited, at Penzance, which was received by him at 2.40 p.m. of the same day at Penzance, and that he thereupon dispatched from Penzance the Queen of the Bay, of 80-horse power nominal, owned by the said company, and which plies regularly between Scilly and Penzance, carrying the mails with a crew of eight hands on board, including Captain Gibson, her master, to a spot three miles N.E. of Menewethan in the Isles of Scilly, and that the said steamer arrived at the spot designated at about 6.30 p.m. on the same day, and there found the pilot cutter Rapid with a rope fast on a derelict vessel, which proved to be the barque James Armstrong, the vessel proceeded against in this cause, laden with a cargo of mahogany, rosewood, and cocoanuts of great value. That there were five or six gigs and seven other pilot cutters standing near the said derelict. That the master of the steamer immediately tendered the services of the steamer to the cutter Rapid, and afterwards to the men in the cutters and boats, but some dispute having arisen between the boatmen as to the terms upon which her services should be accepted her offer was refused. That he still kept the steamer on the spot in the anticipation that the boatmen would be unable to save the derelict.

2. That at about midnight all the boats except the Rapid had left the derelict, and that the Rapid then hailed the steamer to make fast to the derelict, which was done immediately, and then towed her for three-quarters of an hour without effect. That the steamer still attached thereto, and that at 4 a.m. of the 4th March she re-commenced towing, and towed the derelict for three hours without effect. That at 7 a.m. of the same day the said pilot cutters returned and tried to clear the wreck by sweeping the chain, but failed. That the said steamer remained attached to the derelict, and at 4 p.m., it being high water again, attempted to tow the said derelict off but failed, and that at 6.30 p.m. the said steamer and the said boats left the said derelict.

3. That on Thursday the 5th March 1874, the said steamer, at 5 a.m., again proceeded to the said wreck and found her still fast. That the said steamer then recommenced and kept on towing her until 7 p.m., but failing to move her off left her for the night.

4. That at 5.30 a.m., on Friday the 6th March 1874, the said steamer again proceeded to the said derelict and tried to sweep the chain cables, but failed to do so, that the said steamer continued towing at the said derelict in various directions, but failing to free her a diver was sent down but could do nothing. That the said steamer remained attached to the said derelict from 5.30 a.m. until 2.30 p.m. of that day, and then proceeded to St. Mary's Pier in the Isles of Scilly, when the captain of the steamer requested the agent of the steamer to telegraph to Penzance for the assistance of a practical diver. That the said steamer then returned to the said derelict, and remained by her until 6.30 p.m. of that day.

5. That at 6 p.m. on Saturday the 7th March 1874, the said steamer again proceeded to the said derelict, when an attempt was again made by a diver to clear the said derelict, but without effect, and that the said steamer remained there until 4.40 p.m., when the master, having received information that a practical diver had been obtained, and was on board the pilot cutter Presto, which had left Penzance that morning with mails and passengers, and the weather being calm, and it being urgently necessary that no delay should take place in the arrival of the diver, the steamer left the said derelict at 4.40 p.m. and proceeded to meet the said pilot cutter, and fell in with her about 7.30 p.m. off the Logan Rock, and there took off the diver, mails, and other passengers, and arrived at Scilly with them at 11.50 p.m., but that the said pilot cutter did not reach Scilly until 6.30 p.m. on the next day.

6. That 8 a.m. on Sunday the 8th March, the said steamer proceeded to the said wreck with the said diver, and with the Friar Tuck fitted as a diving boat, and with the cutters, Gem and Atlantic in tow, and that at 9.30 a.m. the said diver went down and worked until 3.40 p.m., when the tide made, and he could work no longer. That at 4.30 p.m. the said steamer returned to St. Mary's Pier.

7. That on Monday morning the 9th March, the said steamer having coaled, took extra ropes on board, and proceeded to the said derelict. That at 9 a.m, the said diver went to work, unshackled one chain and cut sundry wire ropes from under the derelict. That at 2 p.m. he left work as the wind was blowing strong. That the said steamer returned at 3 p.m. to St. Mary's Pier.

8. That at 8 a.m. on Tuesday the 10th March, the said steamer having coaled, proceeded to the said derelict with the diver's boat in tow, but that as the wind was still blowing strong, the diver could not work. That the said steamer returned to St. Mary's Pool, and there remained at anchor in case the derelict should get adrift.

9. That on Wednesday the 11th March, the said steamer kept up steam at St. Mary's Pool, but no work could be done, as it was still blowing strong.

10. That at 8 a.m. on Thursday the 12th March, the said steamer again proceeded to the said derelict with the diver's boat in tow, and that the said diver worked for three hours, but had to give up as it was still blowing strong, and that the said steamer returned at 5 p.m. to St. Mary's Pier.

11. That at 8 a.m. on Friday the 13th March, the said steamer again proceeded to the said wreck with the said diver's boat in tow, that the said diver worked from 9 a.m. until 2 p.m., and succeeded in cutting chain and other gear, and reported that the wreck was clear. The said steamer then towed the derelict between Inisidgen Point and Bar Point, when she grounded, it being low water. That the anchor of the said steamer held the said wreck to wait high water, and that at midnight weighed anchor, and towed the said wreck nearer to Crow Bar, when she grounded, the said steamer holding fast until 7 a.m. on Saturday. That the said diver then went down and cleared the wreck's anchors and 15 fathoms of chain, which was placed on board the Atlantic pilot cutter. That the said diver cut the wreck's fore rigging and put a rope fast to the mast, which said rope broke when the said steamer attempted to pull it out. That at 1 p.m. the said steamer weighed anchor, the said diver having stated that all was clear. That the said master finding it impossible to tow the derelict over Crow Bar for want of sufficient water, decided upon taking the said wreck to sea and towing it round and through St. Mary's Sound. That in doing so the said derelict again caught fast in Crow Sound on a ledge of rocks. That the said steamer then left the said wreck, it being then 3 p.m., to coal and get carpenter's tools to cut away the mast if possible. That at 5 p.m. the said steamer proceeded to the said wreck, and found she had partially righted; the crew of the said steamer then commenced to cut away the mast, assisted by some of the men of the pilot cutters, and that having succeeded in doing so, the steamer held to the wreck all night.

12. That at 7 a.m. on Sunday the 15th of March, 1874, the said steamer went to the said wreck with 15 fathoms of the said steamer's chain to make fast to the bows of the said derelict, to which another tow rope was attached, there then being two ropes fast. That the said diver went down at 9 a.m. and found her starboard rigging fast to the bottom, which he cut, and finished his work at 12.15 p.m., two hours before high water. That the said steamer kept fast to the wreck until 3.40 p.m. with her anchor down. She then weighed and proceeded to sea for St. Mary's Sound, and arrived at St. Mary's Roads at 7.15 p.m. with the wreck safely in tow. That the said steamer anchored with the wreck fast until Monday afternoon at 2 p.m., when she weighed anchor and towed the said derelict to St. Mary's Pier Head, the said tow rope being then attached to the capstan on the pier, when she was taken possession of by the receiver of wrecks.

13. That the said steamer is of the value of 7000*l.*, and was then the only steamer plying for passengers and goods between Penzance and the Isles of Scilly, and also carries the mails between the mainland and the said islands, and that the master and crew are acquainted with the intricacies of the navigation of the Scilly Isles. That in the said month of March she was advertised to make two voyages in each week each way, and that by her salvage services performed to the said derelict between the said 3rd March and the said 15th March, the cost of coaling the said steamer during the said days averaged 10 tons per diem, making in all 130 tons at 32s., and that the gross earning lost by the said steamer by her aforesaid services were considerable.

14. That the said derelict could not have been brought into a place of safety without the assistance of a steamer commanded and manned by persons acquainted with the intricate navigation of the Isle of Scilly, and that by rendering the services aforesaid the said steamer not only incurred the aforesaid pecuniary loss, but also incurred considerable risk of damage to her machinery and hull by reason of the dangers and risks attending navigation in and about the Isles of Scilly.

15. That on the 3rd March 1874, six row gigs, namely, the Franklin, John Bastion, master, the White Gig, Joseph Legg, master, the Lively, Joshua Woodcock, master, the Chance, John Williams, master, the Hound, Richard Nicholas, master, Lloyd's Gig, Alfred Hicks, master, with their crews, proceeded to the said vessel early in the afternoon of the same day, and having got fast to her, towed at her for five or six hours until the steamer came up at about 7 p.m., when they left her to the steamer. That by so towing the wreck the said row gigs and other boats rendered important and material salvage service to the wreck by preventing her from being drifted away from Scilly by the northern current, and by materially aiding in keeping her in a good position against the tide, and that but for such services, the said wreck might have drifted away and not been found by the steamer.

16. That amongst the sailing boats engaged in rendering, or endeavouring to render, salvage services to the said derelict, were the following gigs, namely, the Franklyn, with nine men, which came up with and made fast to the derelict at 1.20 p.m., the Dart, with eight men, which came up with and made fast to the derelict at 2 p.m., and the Lark, with men, which came up with and made fast to the derelict at 2.30 p.m., but all the said gigs towed at the said derelict from the time of their arrival until 7 p.m. of that day, and that at 7 p.m. the Dart joined the steamer, and that subsequently during the following day her crew assisted the steamer in her aforesaid services.

A similar petition was filed on behalf of the pilot cutters and luggers. The luggers named were chiefly engaged in carrying chains and ropes between the cutters and derelict. Considerable loss was suffered by the salvors in the way of damage to tackle, &c. The defendants admitted the service, and submitted to the judgment of the court.

At the hearing on July 8th, 1874, it appeared upon an affidavit of the shipowner, that the value of the ship at the time of the salvage service was 500*l.*, and that the value of the freight was not more than 512*l.*, and it was taken that ship and freight together were of the value of 1000*l.*; and from an affidavit of the owner of cargo it appeared that the value of the cargo as salved was 3000*l.* At that time the cargo had not arrived in London, and no freight was really earned, and the values were estimates.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), and Dr. Tristram for the steamship Queen of the Bay, and gigs.

R. E. Webster, and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the pilot cutters and luggers.

E. C. Clarkson for the defendant the owner of the ship.

Hollams for the defendants the owners of cargo.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I consider the salvage as one of great merit, and as derelict to be dealt with most liberally. Unfortunately the property is very small, and it is agreed that 4000*l.* will represent it. The first thing I shall do is to take the sum of 400*l* out of it for damages that have been done to the steamer and sailing vessels, and something for the gigs. That leaves 3600*l.*, out of which I have to award salvage, and considering all the circumstances of this case I shall give 2000*l.* salvage.

R. E. Webster.—Before the court apportions the salvage I wish to call attention to an agreement which was entered into between the master of the steamer and the pilot cutters as to the way in which they were to share. It was as follows:

At Sea, 3rd March, 1874.

It is this day mutually agreed between Capt. Stephen Gibson, of the one part, and Walter Hicks, licensed pilot, of the other part, that the Queen of the Bay steamer shall tow a certain derelict vessel now off St. Martin's Head into the port of Scilly, and if required within the piers at St. Mary's, on the following terms, that is to say, that whatsoever amounts may hereafter be awarded to the eight pilot cutters and their crews for services already rendered in towing said derelict, or for any subsequent work in getting said derelict into Scilly, and then safely mooring her, and also whatever sums may be awarded to the Queen of the Bay for towing said derelict into Scilly shall be thrown into one common fund, and that the same shall be divided into ten and a half equal shares, and that each of the eight pilot cutters shall have one share, and the Queen of the Bay two and a half.

Approved—Robert Ashford, Abraham Hicks, William C. Mortimer. STEPHEN GIBSON, WALTER HICKS.

That agreement was signed on behalf of all parties and approved by them, and I submit that it ought to be considered binding. We pay the luggers—the four signatures after that of the master of the steamer (Gibson) are signatures of the pilot cutter masters.

The Admiralty Advocate.—That agreement no doubt was entered into when the steamer first came up, but not by the whole of the pilot cutters, and those who did not sign it repudiated the agreement, and refused to have anything to do with the steamer, and the steamer was never employed on the basis of that agreement at all. If she had then taken hold of the derelict she would have been able to keep her in deep water, and tow her straight into safety in about six hours. The cutters were unable to manage her, and let her get into shallow water, and so kept the steamer at work for sixteen days. The agreement was made upon the supposition that the steamer could get hold at once.

R. E. Webster in reply.—There was no repudiation, only delay in employing the steamer, the master of which kept the agreement in his own possession.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court finds itself placed in a position which it would not have solicited for itself, but as both parties in this case have agreed that I should decide what appears to me to be the true result of the statements made by each of them I must not shrink from the task. I have this great fact before me, that here is a very deliberate agreement, duly signed and made, and which, as far as I am able to understand it, does not appear to me at all inequitable in its terms. Such an agreement made, as this was, not under any coercion or under the operation of any disturbing force of any sort or kind, ought to be upheld by the court unless the cancelling of it be shown to be necessary. Some reasons have been mentioned by the Admiralty Advocate why this agreement should not be acted upon. Forming the best judgment I can on these very scanty details, I cannot conscientiously arrive at any other conclusion than the following: I have no evidence that this agreement which was produced out of the custody of the owners of the steamer has been cancelled, and I must therefore pronounce for it and order the money to be apportioned in accordance with it.

Notice of appeal was given against the decree on behalf of the shipowner, but the appeal was afterwards abandoned, and the shipowner paid his proportion of the salvage on the basis of the above award. The cargo, which had been salved, was subsequently sold in London with the consent of the salvors, who expected there to find a better market. The cargo then realised the sum of 2797*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*, out of which sum the freight due for the carriage of cargo under the charter-party had to be paid. The owner of cargo alleged the sum due for freight to be the whole amount payable under the charter-partys, viz., 1513*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*; while the shipowner alleged the freight due at London in the amount delivered to be about 1000*l.*, and no more, and that from this sum he was entitled to deduct the expenses of carrying the cargo from Scilly to London before the freight paying salvage could be ascertained. The owner of cargo, on the sale being effected, discovered that he had made a mistake in his estimate of the value of the cargo, in so far as he had not deducted from that value the freight payable on delivery, and that consequently by the decree he had become liable to pay salvage on the freight as well as his cargo, although the salvage on the freight was payable by the shipowner; deducting the whole freight due from the price of the cargo, there remained 1283*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*

The following notice of motion was accordingly filed on behalf of the owners of cargo:

We Parker, Watney, and Clarke, solicitors for the defendant, owner of cargo, give notice that we shall by counsel on the first day of December, move the judge in court to allow the defendant, C. W. Dieseldorff (the owner of the cargo which was on board the said ship when the salvage services were rendered), to reduce the value of the said cargo from 3000*l.* to 1283*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, the net proceeds of the sale of the said cargo, and to reduce the salvage accordingly.

This motion came on for hearing on 1st Dec. 1874, and was opposed both on behalf of the salvors and of the shipowner, and it then appeared that there was the above mentioned dispute as to the amount of freight which was due in London, and which the owner of cargo claimed to deduct from the value of his cargo before paying salvage; the shipowner also alleging that he was only bound to pay for the amount of freight actually due after deducting the expenses of carriage from Scilly to London, and that this amount was only 512*l.*, to which the salvors objected, alleging the amount due to be considerably greater. Under these circumstances the judge referred the case to the registrar to report the amount of freight payable to the shipowner, and in respect of which the shipowner was liable to contribute to the salvage awarded. On 8th Jan. 1875, the registrar's report was filed, and thence it appeared that the freight payable to the shipowner was due as follows:

Whole freight payable under the charter-party	£1768	17	3
Advanced at Honduras	255	9	10
Freight payable on delivery of cargo in London	1513	7	5
Expenses attending transshipment of cargo and conveyance from Scilly to London	700	7	0
Leaving net freight earned by shipowner in London	813	0	5

The report concluded as follows: "But inasmuch as the salvage services were concluded in March 1874, and great delay then ensued in arranging for the transshipment and conveyance of the cargo to London, I am of opinion that the amount of freight in respect of which the owner of the vessel is liable to contribute to the salvage awarded in this case may be fairly estimated at 1000*l.*

Jan. 19, 1875.—The motion again came on for hearing.

Butt, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the owners of cargo.—The cargo owners have become liable to pay upon too large a sum whilst the shipowner is liable to pay upon too small a sum for freight. The contributory value of the cargo is the amount at which the cargo sold less the freight payable in London; the freight payable in London was 1513*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.*, and consequently the cargo should contribute upon a value of 1283*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, and not upon 3000*l.* as taken at the hearing. At the same time the value of ship and freight must be taken at a larger sum, the freight alone being greater than the value at which ship and cargo were taken at the hearing. In all such cases in this court the whole freight is deducted from the value of the cargo. The only point they can raise is as to the power of the court to alter the contributory value after the hearing and award. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think I have the power if I chose to exercise it, so on that point you need not argue.] Then the cargo having been properly sold, the price realised, less the freight, must be taken as the true contributory value. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The value of the cargo as given by you at the hearing, including freight, was 3000*l.* I can on principle allow that figure to be altered. The freight you are entitled to deduct, as that should have been allowed for at the hearing. The only practicable way out of the difficulty in this peculiar case will be to ascertain exactly where the mistake lies, and then remodel the whole award and make a decree pronouncing the exact sum payable by each party.]

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the salvors. If the court determines to take that course, I ask that the amount upon which the shipower must contribute should be increased The values which he gave at the hearing were too small. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If I have power to remodel the case at all I must have power to make the shipowner pay upon a larger sum.] It is not fair to the salvors that the values given by the defendants should be altered now. The defendants should be bound by them.

E. C. Clarkson for the shipowner. I submit that the court has no power to remodel the decree as against the shipowner. At the time of the hearing the cargo was not in London, and had not been sold, consequently no freight had been earned, and the value of the freight was estimated and that estimate was accepted by all parties. The shipowner appealed against the decree, and then abandoned his appeal; if the decree is altered now he cannot have his right of appeal restored as it was before, and cannot be placed in the same position as he was at the time of the pronouncing of the decree. If any alteration is made in the contributory value at all, the full freight should be deducted from the cargo and the full expenses from the freight, and the sum of the two remainders and the value of the ship will give the contributory value of the whole.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question raised on this motion is embarassing and peculiar. Several suits of salvage against ship freight and cargo proceeded to hearing, and an award was made upon values agreed, and that award was appealed against, but the appeal was abandoned. Since the hearing new evidence of value has been produced, from which it appears that the owner of cargo has been decreed to pay a greater proportion of salvage than he would have done if the real value of the cargo had been brought to the notice of the court at the hearing; in fact the award was made against the cargo inclusive of the value of the freight instead of less the freight.

When this motion first came before the court the affidavits were vague and inconsistent, and I referred the matter to the registrar to report as to the amount of freight due on delivery of the cargo, and he has given an estimate of what is the fair contributory value of the freight, and with this estimate I agree, as I have no doubt extra expense was occasioned by the delay.

It has been contended that the whole of the freight received on the delivery of the cargo in London should be deducted from the proceeds of the cargo in order to ascertain the value of the cargo for the purpose of the salvage suit. But I am not satisfied that that is so; and I think the registrar has arrived at a proper conclusion. The salvage service was completed at Scilly, and for the purpose of this case it is necessary to consider what was the value of the freight and cargo at Scilly. In estimating the value of the freight the registrar no doubt had in his mind the principle laid down by Dr. Lushington in The Norma; (Lush, 124). I am also of opinion that the cargo must have deteriorated by the delay. and that consequently the salvors are entitled to have the value of the cargo as given at the hearing, and that it would be unfair to take its value at the sale six months later. I shall hold that the respective parties are bound by their values; 500*l.* for the ship, and 300*l.* including cargo and freight.

On consideration of all the circumstances of the case, I think I shall do justice by holding that the total value of the property liable to pay salvage is less by 500*l.* than the values on which the court based its award. I arrive at this result by adopting the registrar's report and taking the value of the freight on which I have to award as 1000*l.* Taking this as the value of the freight it becomes necessary to reduce the value of the cargo, as given at the hearing by this sum of 1000*l.*, for I think it has been clearly proved that the freight was erroneously included in this value; the value of the cargo will therefore be 2000*l.* The value of the ship, according to the amended value taken at the hearing, was 500*l.*, and the freight on which I awarded was 512*l*. It follows that, as I intend to remodel the whole case, the owners of the ship, having been ordered to pay salvage on an amount of freight too small by 500*l*., will have to contribute on a value of 1000*l*., and the owners of cargo upon the value of the cargo less the amount of freight due, viz., upon 2000*l*. The amount of the sum already awarded as a reward for the services must in consequence be reduced by one-eighth, that, is, from 2000*l*. to 1750. The defendants will have to pay 1750*l*. as salvage, and 400*l*. as compensation for the damage done to the salvors, making together 2150*l*. This sum will have to be paid by the defendants as follows: By the owners of the vessel, James Armstrong, upon a value of 1500*l*., the sum of 922*l*.; by the owners of the cargo, upon a value of 2000*l*, the sum of 1228*l*.

The question remains as to the costs of this application. The salvors must be borne harmless, and therefore the question is whether the owner of cargo, or the shipowner, or both, are to pay their costs. The mistake was that of the owner of cargo, and he therefore must pay the costs of the salvors, but as it was a matter within the knowledge of the shipowner, he and the owner of cargo must each bear their own costs.

CARGO ex WOOSUNG.

Salvage—Government ship as salvor—Agreement—Validity of—Exorbitancy of demand—Consent of Lords of the Admiralty—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, sects. 484, 485)—Life salvage.

Where a Government ship is sent to protect from plunder a ship and cargo wrecked upon a barbarous coast, and the officer in command of the Government ship enters into an agreement to salve ship and cargo at a fixed rate of reward, that agreement will be upheld by the High Court of Admiralty even though the sum agreed upon be greater than would be awarded by the Court, if the agreement is honest, has been entered into by competent parties, and the amount agreed upon is not so exorbitant as to be inequitable and to induce the court to believe that it was obtained by force or collusion. An agreement to pay the salvors half the value of the property salved upheld.

Semble, that a despatch boat, the officers and crew of which are uncovenanted civil servants of the Bombay Government, and which is employed solely for political purposes, is one of Her Majesty's ships within the meaning of the Merchant's Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, sects. 484 and 485), so as to render it necessary for her officers and crew to obtain the consent in writing of the Lords of the Admiralty before proceeding to recover for salvage services.

There is no salvage of life entitling a ship to recover reward in the High Court of Admiralty where the ship takes off from an island on a barbarous, but inhabited coast, a ship's crew and passengers who have been wrecked there, but have been previously got ashore in safety, and who, although suffering privations from scarcity of water and exposure, are not in any immediate danger.

THESE were two causes of salvage instituted, the one on behalf of Edward Elton, the commander, and others the officer and crew of the steamer Kwangtung, and the other on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Corinna, against the cargo lately laden on board the steamship Woosung and the ship's fittings belonging thereto and lately on board thereof, and against the owners thereof intervening.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear in the pleadings and judgment. Pleadings were filed in both causes. The petition on behalf of the commander and officers and crew of the Kwangtung was, so far as is material, as follows:—

1. The Kwangtung is an iron paddle-wheel steamer belonging to the Bombay Government. She is of 523 tons Government measurement, and 150-horse power, and has two engines. Her crew consist of a commander, clerk and gunner, three officers, four engineers, the quartermasters, and about seventy men. She also carries seven soldiers as marines. The Kwangtung was originally a gun vessel, but a few years since was fitted up as a dispatch boat, and has since been and is now employed solely on political duty.

2. The commander and officers of the Kwangtung are uncovenanted civil servants of the Bombay Government, and the plaintiffs are prosecuting this suit with the permission and approval of the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Admiralty.

3 The Woosung was an iron screw steamer belonging to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, of 1,622 tons register, and at the time when she became a wreck, as hereinafter mentioned, she had on board a general Indian cargo of about 3,000 tons, consisting of silk, indigo, raw hides, tea, coffee, shellac, wheat, rice, linseed, and other goods of the value of half a million sterling.

4. About midnight on the 20th Feb. 1874, the Woosung, laden as in the last preceding paragraph is mentioned, and in the course of her voyage from Calcutta to London, struck on a coral reef off the Island of Kotama, in the Red Sea, in latitude 15°40'30 N., longitude 42° 14 E., and in a few hours filled with water. At daylight the following morning the passengers and crew, consisting of between fifty and sixty persons, were with much difficulty and risk conveyed to the island, which was found to be uninhabited and without water.

5. The master of the Woosung, within twenty-four hours of this disaster, dispatched his second officer in one of the lifeboats with a letter for assistance to the authorities at Lolicea, a small Turkish town about twenty six miles off, on the coast of Arabia; and upon receipt of that letter the governor came down to the wreck with some men, and among them a certain Greek trader. The captain of the Woosung afterwards entered into an agreement with the Greek, under which the latter undertook to engage some Arabs and boats, and to save and land on the island as much of the cargo as he could for one-third its net value realised on sale, after all expenses paid. Before concluding the agreement with the Greek, the master of the Woosung again dispatched his second officer in a lifeboat to cruise off Jebbel Leer, a distance of between twenty-five and thirty miles off, to intercept any vessel that might be passing; and this officer, on the 28th Feb., succeeded in speaking to the steamship Corinna, bound for London, which received on board the passengers and crew, leaving only the master, first and third officers, chief engineer, and three servants, remaining by the wreck.

6, The Greek and the Arabs whom he had engaged proceeded to the wreck. The Arabs, however, having almost as soon as they had reached the place begun to plunder the ship and to destroy her furniture, the British Political Resident at Aden was, by telegram received on the 5th March, 1874, from the Secretary of State for India, ordered to send a gunboat to prevent the plunder. The Kwangtung was despatched forthwith, leaving Aden at half-past two, p.m. the same day, arriving off the wreck at eleven, p.m. on the evening of the next day, the 6th March.

7. The Kwangtung found the Woosung lying in a most exposed position, about 290 miles from Aden, and about thirty miles out of the track of vessels, so that no vessel passing up or down the Red Sea would sight the wreck. There was no place nearer than Aden from which any assistance, except that of the Arabs already mentioned, could be obtained, and at Aden there was no assistance available at the time, except the Kwangtung.

8. The approaches to the wreck were very dangerous; there were numerous coral reefs which were not to be found marked on any chart, and there were some spots close to the wreck with only twelve feet of water on them. The bottom was composed mostly of immense boulders of coral rock, and there was a wash at low water between the island and the wreck, a distance of about two miles. There was, therefore, the greatest difficulty and danger in bringing a ship near the wreck, so much so that when the Corinna came to the rescue of the passengers and crew, she was obliged to anchor some miles off, her commander being afraid to bring her closer; and on a subsequent occasion, when Her Majesty's ship Salamis, from Aden, homeward bound, called at Kotama to land Captain Wilson, the representative of the Salvage Association, she suddenly ran into three fathoms of water, and narrowly escaped striking; and those on board her finding the ground too dangerous to approach closer, anchored that vessel also several miles off.

9. At the time when the Kwangtung arrived, it was evident that the Woosung had been very badly strained. . . . She could not hold long together, and gave every indication that she would break up on the first breeze, as she shortly afterwards did, having gone all to pieces in a gale which blew for several days during the second week of the following month of April.

10. The greater part of the cargo of the Woosung having been, by the time the Kwangtung had arrived, fifteen days under water, the raw hides which formed part of it were in an advanced state of putrefaction. The vessel was full of noxious gases, and when on the evening of the arrival of the Kwangtung the commander, first officer, and a cutter's crew from the latter vessel, with lanterns, boarded the wreck, and went below to examine it, the lights they carried in many places were extinguished by the foul air.

11. The position of the most valuable portion of the cargo was found to be such as to give very little hope that any efforts to save it would be successful. . . . The Arabs had refused, in consequence of the noxious gases, to go down into the lazarette where part of the silk was.

12. By the time that the Kwangtung had arrived at the wreck, the Greek and his Arabs had begun to discharge a part of the cargo, with the exception, however, of about eight or ten chests of indigo they had salved, and were occupied in salving only a portion of the hides, cotton, shellac, jute, tea, and light goods that had been stowed at the top. At that time, there was no prospect of their being able to save a single bale of silk, or at most more than 90 or 100 chests of indigo. They possessed no tackle of their own, and that belonging to the ship some of them had stolen and carried away, and even if they had had any tackle or appliances, they were without the skill to make use of them. They were without any system or concerted plan, and but a small number of them were really at work, and then only a few hours each day, beginning about eleven a.m,, and leaving off before four p.m.; such work as they were doing therefore proceeded very slowly.

13. Captain Carlin, the captain of the Woosung, having informed the commander of the Kwangtung of the position of the indigo and silk, as already described, and that the Arabs were not able to save them, requested the commander of the Kwangtung to undertake the salvage of these portions of the cargo, upon the same terms as those he had entered into with the Greek. The captain of the Kwangtung consulted with his officers, and after taking into consideration the labour, fatigue, and great risk to life and health, which the salvage must inevitably involve, and the doubtful value of the goods when salved, it was considered that less than one half of the net proceeds of what the plaintiffs could recover would not sufficiently remunerate them, and the plaintiffs consequently refused to undertake the salvage at the same rate as the Greek. After a discussion of about three hours between Captain Carlin and the commander of the Kwangtung, it was ultimately arranged that the plaintiffs were to receive one half; and the terms set out in the following agreement having been agreed upon, the agreement itself was drawn up and signed by the parties:—

"Kotama. March 9th, 1874.

"It is this day mutually agreed between Capt. Carlin, of the Woosung, and Capt. Elton, of the Kwangtung, i.e.: The latter agrees to save as much as possible of the cargo, gear, tackling and fittings belonging to the above named vessel, including everything on deck or below that he possibly can, and consign the same to Messrs. Luke, Thomas and Co., at Aden, to be retained in their custody until further advices. After the sale of which, and after all expenses have been paid thereon, Captain Carlin on his part agrees to pay to Captain Elton or his agents one half of the proceeds of the same. In this agreement, Captain Elton finds all necessary men, gear, and appurtenances for the discharging, unrigging, shipping and unshipping. Also for landing at Aden; and Captain Carlin holds himself irresponsible for any accident or damage that may accrue to the Kwangtung, either alongside of the Woosung or otherwise.

"H. ELCOCK. "D. CARLIN,
"C. L. EDWARDS." "Master.

14. The plaintiffs began by stripping the wreck; and after they had succeeded in saving a large portion of the fittings and gear, the captain of the Woosung, seeing the imminent danger there was of the vessel breaking up, decided that the salvage of the indigo and silk should proceed with all speed. The plaintiffs were obliged to make openings to the interior of the wreck, where, from the foul air, putrid water, and intense heat, it was then impossible to work. To let in air and fresh water, the plaintiffs had to get up wind sails, and to open (and, in many instances, to break open) all the between deck ports and scuttles, which was accomplished with very great danger and difficulty, the ports and scuttles on the starboard side being some depth under putrid water. In order to get at the indigo (and all the indigo salved by the plaintiffs was, with the exception of fifteen or twenty chests, under the between deck hatches and under water), the plaintiffs had to throw overboard a large quantity of the lighter cargo, which was rotten and useless; and then, so as to reach the main hold where the indigo lay, they had to break open a great portion of the decks. . . .

15. The lazarette of the Woosung, under which about nineteen bales of the silk had been stowed, was approached from the main deck inside the saloon by an opening of about three feet square, and it was full of putrid water, which lay to a depth of about four feet on the between decks. . . .

16. None of these nineteen bales of silk could be reached without the utmost endurance and suffering on the part of the plaintiffs. . . . It was impossible for a man to remain down in the place for more than a very short time. The men came up fainting, and their eyes running with water, and the medical officer had to be in constant attendance to see that their eyes were bathed as soon as they came up, in order to alleviate the inflammation from which some of them were suffering. The first officer still continues to suffer from an acute inflammation of the eye occasioned by the salvage operations; and he has been obliged, after having been some time in hospital, to return to this country on sick leave, for the purpose of obtaining medical treatment. Two of the plaintiffs were nearly drowned in the course of the service. Many others of the plaintiffs fainted when they came on deck.

17. The plaintiffs, by reason of the dangerous condition of the vessel, and the consequent peril in which the cargo was placed, laboured, at the urgent desire of the captain of the Woosung, at the salvage each day as long as they could endure the strain, and during all the time were constantly at work from five o'clock in the morning until half-past six o'clock in the evening, with only short intervals between for meals. The men had, at the private expense of the commander, to be plentifully supplied with stimulants to keep them up to the exhausting work.

18. The indigo and silk, as soon as they were salved by the plaintiffs, were put on board the Kwangtung, which had been brought close up to the wreck, and between it and the land.

20. The plaintiffs having, after nine days of severe and exhausting labour, by the means and in the manner described, saved, in addition to the gear and fittings of the Woosung, 547 chests of indigo, and nineteen bales of raw silk (which was found to be as much as the Kwangtung could carry), they then conveyed the salved property to Aden, where they arrived on the 18th March 1874. The plaintiffs were engaged in the voyage from Kotama to Aden, and in the discharge of the salved property at Aden about six days; and as soon as the unloading was finished, the property was delivered to Messrs. Luke, Thomas and Co., who subsequently handed it over to Captain Wilson, the representative of the Salvage Association. It was afterwards transshipped to England, where it was sold, and realised, after payment of all expenses of sale, transshipment and warehousing, the sum of l. net.

21. The Arabs continued at the salvage during all the time that the plaintiffs were engaged upon it, and learnt, from the plaintiff's example, to work with greater effect and more skill and system than before. The plaintiffs left with them, when the Kwangtung departed for Aden, such of their hauling gear and appliances as they could spare, and thereby enabled them to continue the salvage of the indigo and silk, which the plaintiffs had commenced.

22. On the 31st March, the Kwangtung again left Aden to return to the wreck, taking with her, by the desire of the Lloyd's Salvage Association, a quantity of diving gear and four Englishmen engaged by the association, who were to be employed in diving for the cargo still remaining in the wreck. She arrived at Kotama on the 2nd April, after a voyage of three days, and the plaintiffs then found that Capt. Wilson, the representative of the Salvage Association, and who had been landed at Kotama from Her Majesty's ship Salamis, on the 27th March, was in charge of the wreck, and had assumed the control of affairs there. Capt. Wilson, however, refused to permit the plaintiffs to continue the salvage upon the terms of the agreement of the 9th March, and offered to engage them by the day and at the rate of 100*l.* a day. The plaintiffs, however, refused to depart from the terms of their agreement, and thereupon, having in the meantime salved about twenty-seven cases of indigo, they, at the orders of Capt. Wilson, discontinued the salvage. Having stayed near the wreck for about seven or eight days, the Kwangtung again departed for Aden, taking on board the twenty-seven cases of indigo and a cargo of the goods which the Arabs had raised and landed on the island. These, on the ship's arrival at Aden, after nine days occupied in the voyage, and in the unloading of the vessel, were duly delivered in accordance with Capt. Wilson's directions.

23. About the same time that the plaintiffs had been discharged by Capt. Wilson, or within two or three days afterwards, the services of the Arabs were also discontinued, and after the plaintiffs' discharge, the only further portion of the cargo saved consisted of about 100 cases of indigo. On the 12th April, when the Kwangtung departed for Aden, it had begun to blow a fresh gale, which lasted for several days. The butts of the Woosung's decks were then opening two or three inches, and two or three days afterwards she went to pieces, and (excepting a small portion of the cargo which had been recovered by Capt. Wilson after the wreck broke up) all that then remained of the vessel and cargo were sold on the spot, for comparatively a very small sum, by Capt. Wilson.

24. A period of about nine or ten days elapsed from the time when the plaintiffs were obliged to discontinue their services until the breaking up of the Woosung, and during that time the plaintiffs, if they had been permitted to do so, would have been able to salve, if not the whole, the greater and most valuable part of the cargo still remaining in the wreck, and which, as already described, was afterwards lost.

25. On the day of the ship's fittings and furniture of the Woosung, so salved by the plaintiffs as aforesaid, were sold at Aden, and realised the sum of about 460*l.* net, one-half of which was, in accordance with the said agreement of the 9th March, 1874, paid to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs do not further prosecute their suit as against the said fittings and furniture, or as against the owners thereof.

26. The indigo and silk so salved by the plaintiffs could not have been recovered without their exertions, and but for their services, already described, would have been lost.

The answer on behalf of the defendants was as follows:

1. The tonnage, horse power and crew of the Kwangtung, are correctly set forth in the 1st Article of the Petition filed herein. She is one of Her Majesty's ships, belonging to the Bombay Marine, and was, at the time of the happening of the matters next hereinafter stated or admitted, stationed off Aden, and subject to the orders of Her Majesty's political resident there. The consent of the Admiralty to an adjudication upon the plaintiffs' claim has been granted, but the Admiralty have not signified any approval or in fact approved thereof.

2. The Woosung and her cargo are correctly described in the 3rd Article of the Petition. She was, through the gross carelessness of her master, wrecked at the time and place described in the 4th Article of the Petition. The passengers and crew were conveyed to the Island of Kotama the morning after the collision, with a plentiful supply of stores from the ship.

3. The master of the Woosung took the steps and made the agreement stated in the 5th Article of the Petition. He also communicated with the Turkish town of Hodeida; and the governor of this town sent a force of police to protect the property, and a gun boat to assist in the salvage, but as the assistance of the Greek trader, mentioned in the said article, having under him from two hundred to four hundred Arabs, most of them skilled pearl divers, and thirty to forty boats of large tonnage had been already procured, the services of the Turkish gunboat were thought unnecessary, and she shortly afterwards returned to Hodeida. The agreement with the Greek trader was, as the defendants submit, made at a very high rate, and solely on account of the absence of any other available assistance at that time. It is true, as stated in the said article, that the passengers and most of the crew were sent off. In addition to those of the crew mentioned in the said article as remaining, the stewardess remained behind and acted as an interpreter.

4. It is not true, as stated in the 6th Article of the petition, that the Arabs, engaged to salve the cargo, began to plunder the ship or destroy her furniture. Some petty articles only of insignificant value were, as the defendants believe, pilfered by Arabs unconnected with the Arab salvors.

5. The circumstances in which the Kwangtung was despatched to the Woosung are as follows:—On the 3rd of March a telegram reached London, which was in the words and figures following:

"Aden, 3rd March.

"The Emelia (s.) reports that the Woosung (s.) or (?) of Newcastle, is wrecked on the Kolamelee (or Rolamee) reef, twenty-five miles from Jibbell Teer, master, chief engineer, and three men on board, remainder gone to Suez. No further particulars. The Woosung (s.), Carlin from Calcutta to London, left Aden 19th Feb."

On receipt of this telegram the defendants empowered the "Association for the Protection of Commercial Interests in Wrecked and Damaged Property," hereinafter called the "Salvage Association," to act as their agents in this matter. Thereupon Captain J. A. Heathcote, on behalf of the Salvage Association, had an interview with the Under Secretary of State for India, representing for this purpose the Secretary of State in Council, and representing to him that the Salvage Association, who had at that time no other information than that contained in the said telegram, were afraid that the natives might plunder the cargo of the Woosung, and requested that he would send one of her Majesty's ships to the Woosung to protect, and also to take such steps as might be found possible for saving the cargo. The said Capt. Heathcote further offered, on behalf of the Salvage Association, to reimburse the expenditure for coal consumed on board the ship to be sent, and further to make such present to her officers and crew, should their assistance result in the salvage of property, as the Secretary of State should think fit. These terms were the same on which similar assistance had been several times recently afforded by the Secretary of State in Council. The said Captain Heathcote further wrote a letter to the said Under Secretary of State containing the substance of his representation. The said Under Secretary of State, on behalf of the Secretary of State in Council, agreed to send upon these terms one of Her Majesty's ships as requested, and despatched a telegram to the political resident at Aden, in the words and figures following:—

"Steamer Woosung, Calcutta to England, stranded near Jubeel Teer, and crew obliged to leave vessel. Cargo, valued 200,000*l*., is being plundered by Arabs, send gunboat to protect property immediately, if you think necessary."

6. In obedience to these instructions the political resident ordered the Kwangtung to proceed to the Woosung, which she did on the 5th of March.

7. With the exception of the actual reef on which the Woosung was lying, there was no spot near the wreck with so small a depth of water as twelve feet only. There was no difficulty or danger whatever in bringing a ship, coming from Aden, near the wreck. . . . . .

8. At the time of the arival of the Kwangtung, the Woosung was a total wreck, but it is not true that she could not hold long together, or that she gave an indication that she would break up in the first breeze, or that she shortly afterwards did so. She in fact remained unbroken for a long period, including many days of heavy weather, and only broke up when she did through a hurricane of unusual violence.

9. It is true that, by the time of the arrival of the Kwangtung at the wreck, the hides which were stowed on the top of the rest of the cargo were beginning to get rotten, and that in the closed in spaces of the wreck, at night time, or when undisturbed for some hours, some foul air accumulated, but this all dispersed when the work began by day, although the smell continued very offensive.

10. At the time of the arrival of the Kwangtung much valuable work had been and was being done by the Greek trader and the Arabs employed under him. The Greek trader, however, and those engaged under him, had fitted up tackle from the ship's materials, and were working very well. They had, at the time when the Kwangtung arrived, made a way down to the indigo, by removing most of the cargo of small value, and they had already saved from eighty to one hundred chests of indigo, and would have saved the whole of the indigo in that hold, as well as the greater part of the other indigo in the vessel; and they did, in fact, afterwards save a very considerable quantity, notwithstanding the interruption and obstructions caused by Captain Elton, as hereinafter mentioned. The Arabs being divers by profession, were able to work in water with more effect than the plaintiffs, and could save, and did, in fact, save, cargo which the plaintiffs were entirely unable to save. The first engineer of the Woosung, who was working with the Greek trader, was well able to break open the decks as required.

11. Soon after the Kwangtung arrived on the 6th of March, an agreement was entered into between the master of the Woosung and Captain Edward Elton, the commander of the Kwangtung, for the saving of the ship's fittings and furniture which were of small value, and realised the sum stated in the 25th Article of the Petition, on the terms that the plaintiffs should receive one-half of the net value of the articles salved.

12. On the 9th March, the agreement stated in the 13th Article of the Petition was entered into. This agreement was entered into upon the importunity of Captain Elton and by collusion between the master of the Woosung and him. The defendants submit that it is an agreement which the master of the Woosung had not power to make, and an inequitable agreement, and one not binding upon them. They further submit that Captain Elton and the Kwangtung had been sent to the Woosung in pursuance of the agreement entered into between the Salvage Association and the Secretary of State in Council, whose servant Captain Elton was; and that this last mentioned agreement over-rode any agreement between Captain Elton and the master of the Woosung. And the defendants lastly submit that Captain Elton is an officer in Her Majesty's service, in command of one of Her Majesty's ships, and sent on a special service, had no right to undertake, except upon his own terms, any work of salvage to a British ship, on which he and his men never could be properly employed, or to dictate an agreement fixing his remuneration before he proceeded to work.

13. The greater part of the saving of the fittings and gear had been accomplished before the agreement of the 9th March was entered into. After the 9th March Captain Elton set his men at work in saving the cargo from the hold, into which the Arabs had cleared a way, and by the 17th March the plaintiffs had salved the cargo stated in the 20th Article of the Petition. This cargo was then conveyed to Aden, and discharged and delivered as stated in the said 20th Article. The net value of the cargo so saved and carried to Aden by the Kwangtung was 25,929*l*.

14. The work of saving this portion of the cargo was difficult work and hard labour, with some disagreeable or unpleasant adjuncts, and performed in hot weather. With the exception, however, of that portion of the cargo to which the 15th and 16th Articles of the Petition relate, there was no great difficulty and no danger in the salvage of it. As to that portion of the cargo which is referred to in the 15th and 16th Articles of the Petition, which was of comparatively small value, only being worth 700*l*., and no more, it was difficult of access, and more hardship was incurred by those who worked inside the lazarette. It is true also that accidents happened to two of the men employed as stated in the 16th Article. The other statements in the 15th and 16th Articles are greatly exaggerated.

15. The statements in the 19th Article are greatly exaggerated. Any inconvenience which was suffered by those on board the Kwangtung might have been avoided by hauling the Kwangtung at night a short distance from the wreck.

16. When Captain Elton first set his men to work at the salvage, he drove away from the wreck the salvors who were then working under the agreement with the Greek trader, and kept them away for some days, whilst his men worked at the indigo in the hold, which had been opened by those salvors, and used the tackle erected by them; he afterwards offered to allow those salvors to resume operations at some parts of the wreck which had not been cleared, and where the indigo was not accessible, and where there was not much opportunity for any lucrative salvage. Most of those salvors refused to return to work on such terms, and their services were lost to the defendants during the whole time that the plaintiffs remained at the wreck.

17. When the Kwangtung left for Aden, the whole of those salvors returned to work under the command of the Greek trader and of the first engineer of the Woosung. They found, however, that the Kwangtung had taken away with her the whole of the derricks and gear belonging to the Woosung, which had been before used for the salvage operations by the Arab salvors, and afterwards by the plaintiffs; and also all materials from on board the Woosung out of which fresh gear could have been erected. . . .

18. The Kwangtung returned to the wreck in the circumstances stated in the 22nd Article of the Petition. At that time, as stated in the same article, Captain Wilson, as agent for the Salvage Association, was in charge of the wreck. It is true that Captain Elton was ready to resume his salvage operations on the terms of the agreement of the 9th March, and that Captain Wilson refused to permit him to continue them upon these terms. He, in fact, considered them exorbitant, and had before this, when at Aden, upon being first informed by Captain Elton of the said agreement, repudiated it and refused to allow Captain Elton to work under it. When the Kwangtung had returned to the wreck, Captain Wilson offered to engage the services of Captain Elton and his men at the rate of 100*l*. per day, or for such remuneration as the Secretary for State should fix. Captain Elton accepted the proposal of working for such remuneration as the Secretary for State should fix. The crew of the Kwangtung were thereupon set to work on the 4th April. At the part of the ship they were then set to work there were a quantity of hides at the top, which had to be removed before the indigo below could be got up; and the crew of the Kwangtung began to remove them, while the salvors engaged by the Greek continued the diving operations in the main hold. The crew of the Kwangtung were, however, after about two hours' work, stopped by Captain Elton, who thereupon informed Captain Wilson that if the crew were employed in this way, he would take the alternative proposal of 100*l*. a day. Captain Wilson thereupon asked if Captain Elton wished to have the arrangement for arbitration cancelled. Captain Elton replied that he would have arbitration when his crew worked at indigo, and 100*l.* a day when they worked at hides. Captain Wilson refused these terms. But no expostulation could induce Captain Elton to modify these terms, and he informed Captain Wilson that, as they were objected to, he should start for Aden that night.

19. Twenty-seven cases of indigo were saved on the 3rd April by the divers sent out by the Salvage Association. The only work done by the plaintiffs towards saving them was some assistance in hauling in ropes.

20. It is true that, after staying near the wreck for seven or eight days, the Kwangtung again departed for Aden, taking on board the twenty-seven cases of indigo, and a cargo of the goods which the Arabs had raised and landed on the Island. . . .

21. When the Kwangtung departed for Aden the second time, Capt. Elton claimed, and took away with him as being made out of the ship's fittings, which he had an agreement with the master of the Woosung to save, the single remaining tackle which had been rigged up as before mentioned, and was being used in getting the cargo out of the wreck, and Capt. Wilson had to buy of Capt. Elton the necessary materials for constructing fresh tackle.

22. Further work was done at the wreck, and further cargo was saved after the Kwangtung had started for Aden; but the weather was very bad and prevented continuous operations, and on or about the 11th April, a gale sprung up which prevented further work, and developed into a hurricane of very unusual violence, through which the wreck broke up and the rest of the cargo was lost.

23. Save as hereinbefore appears the several allegations contained in the petition are untrue.

24. The defendants have offered to pay the plaintiffs, such a remuneration as the Secretary of State in council should fix, and the plaintiff have refused to accept this offer.

25. The defendants submit that Capt. Elton, the officers, and the crew of the Kwangtung are entitled to reasonable salvage only for the services rendered by them to the cargo of the Woosung, and they further submit that that part of the remuneration which would have been otherwise awarded to Capt. Elton, should be largely reduced on account of his conduct and the obstacles which he threw in the way of a salvage of the cargo, as hereinbefore stated.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded in this cause.

The petition filed on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the Corinna was, so far as material, as follows:—

1. On the 28th Feb. 1874, the steamship Corinna, of 696 tons register and 190 horse power, manned by a crew of twenty-six hands including her master, whilst on a voyage from Bombay to Havre, with cargo, was in the Red Sea in latitude 15.41 north, and longitude 41.40 east, with the Island of Jibbel Teer bearing south-east distant twelve miles. There was at such time a strong southerly wind and a heavy sea.

2. At such time the Corinna fell in with a lifeboat belonging to the British steamship Woosung, and having on board her the second officer and eight of the crew of that vessel.

3. The Woosung, whilst proceeding from Calcutta to London with a valuable cargo and a number of passengers, had, on the night of the 25th of the said month of Feb., struck upon a reef off the south-west end of Kotama Island, and had there remained fast. Her passengers and crew had succeeded in saving themselves by getting on to Kotama Island, where they had encamped under tents and awnings. They were, however, short of water and exposed to other hardships and deprivations, and in danger therefrom, and also in danger of being molested, plundered and ill-treated by the inhabitants of the adjacent coasts. The passengers were eight in number, four of them being ladies, two of them children. The lifeboat had been sent out by the master of the Woosung for the purpose of procuring assistance, and had been two days at sea without meeting with any vessel.

4. The second officer of the Woosung delivered to the master of the Corinna a letter from the master of the Woosung, informing him of the condition of affairs, and requesting assistance. The plaintiffs crave leave to refer to such letter.

5. The Corinna at once steamed towards Kotama Island, and at about 2.30 p.m. arrived within about three miles of it, in twenty-four fathoms of water. A boat was immediately sent from the Corinna to the shore for the purpose of bringing the Woosung's people off. At dusk the master of the Corinna, finding that there was a strong current setting to the E.N.E., anchored the Corinna and burned lights and rockets at intervals, and at about 11.30 p.m. three boats from the Woosung came alongside, but not that containing the Woosung's passengers, it having got among the reefs and lost its way. The master of the Corinna sent a boat in search, and at 0.30 a.m. the boat with the passengers arrived alongside.

6. Forty-four of the crew of the Woosung and her eight passengers and their clothes were taken on board the Corinna, which at 2.30 a.m. proceeded with them for Suez, leaving, at their own request, the master, first officer, and five more of the crew of the Woosung with the wreck, as they were then practically safe from the natives, communication having been had with the Corinna.

7. At 2 p.m. on the 1st March, the Corinna, whilst proceeding to Suez, fell in with the Spanish steamer Emeliano, bound for Aden, and in accordance with the request of the master of the Woosung, the master of the Corinna boarded the Emeliano, and asked her master to send assistance from Aden to save the Woosung and her cargo.

8. The Corinna arrived in safety at Suez at about 6 p.m. on the 8th March, and the crew and passengers of the Woosung were then landed.

9. The Emeliano arrived at Aden in about thirty-six hours after she was boarded by the Corinna as aforesaid, and caused a steamship called the Kwangtung to be at once despatched to the assistance of the Woosung. The Kwangtung worked for eight days at the Woosung, and succeeded in saving a large quantity of her cargo and some of her fittings. After such eight days of work, a heavy storm came on and put an end to the operation, the Woosung broke up, and with the rest of her cargo was lost.

10. By the services of the plaintiffs, the passengers and crew of the Woosung were rescued from danger.

11. The plaintiffs also by speaking the Emeliano and obtaining the prompt assistance of the Kwangtung, contributed greatly to the saving of the cargo and fittings of the Woosung.

12. In deviating from her voyage and going to Kotama Island, the Corinna incurred some risk, and her master took upon himself considerable responsibility.

13. The Corinna, at the time in question, was of the value of 19,500*l.*, and her cargo and freight were together of the value of 74,166*l.*

The answer filed on behalf of the defendants this cause was as follows:—

1. It is not true, as stated in the 1st Article of the Petition filed herein, that there was at the time mentioned a strong southerly wind or a heavy sea.

2. It is not true, as stated in the 3rd Article, that the passengers and crew of the Woosung were short of water, or exposed to other hardships or privations, or in danger therefrom, or in danger of being molested, plundered, or illtreated by the inhabitants of the adjacent coasts, or as suggested in the 6th Article, that the master, first officer, and five men of the crew were rendered safe from the natives by communication having been had with the Corinna.

3. Before the Corinna came up to the Woosung, communications had been made by the master of the Woosung with the mainland and with the village of Loheia and the Turkish town of Hodeida, and with the Turkish governor of Hodeida, and the Turkish governor had offered the services of a gunboat and police, which afterwards arrived, and an agreement had been made with a certain Greek trader for the salvage of the cargo. Under this agreement from 300 to 400 Arabs were employed with the permission of the Arab chief of Loheia, and it had become well known on the mainland that the wreck was under the protection of the Turkish and Arab authorities. On the first happening of the wreck there had been some deficiency of water for the passengers and crew, who placed themselves on a small allowance of water as a measure of precaution, but there was abundance of Champagne and beer, and other liquors, and before the Corinna arrived arrangements for a constant and sufficient supply of water had been made.

4. Save as hereinbefore appears the several allegations contained in articles 1 to 8 both inclusive, and in Article 13 of the Petition, are true.

5. An account of the provisions consumed by the passengers and crew of the Woosung when on board the Corinna was sent in to the owners of the Woosung, and has been paid by them.

6. The Emeliano arrived at Aden, as stated in the 9th Article of the Petition, and there gave information which caused a telegram to be sent to England. In consequence of which telegram, a second telegram was sent to Aden at the instance of the defendants, ordering one of Her Majesty's ships to go to the wreck, and the Kwangtung did go to the wreck. When this telegram was so sent, no other communication had reached England, and the defendants did not know of the communications made by the master of the Woosung with Loheia and Hodeida, or of the agreement with the Greek trader mentioned in the 2nd Article hereof. Those on board the Kwangtung worked for eight days at the Woosung, and saved some property; but the commander of the Kwangtung at first insisted and afterwards impeded the Greek trader and the Arabs working with him under the agreement hereinbefore pleaded, and induced the master of the Woosung to enter into a most onerous agreement for the remuneration of the services which his crew were to perform, and has put and is now putting the defendant to large costs and expenses in and about the resisting of his improper demands, and has in divers other ways so obstructed and diminished the operation of salving the defendants' cargo, that the arrival of the Kwangtung instead of contributing to the saving of the cargo of the Woosung, in fact impeded it.

7. Save, as hereinbefore appears, the several allegations contained in Articles 9 to 12, both inclusive, of the Petition, are untrue.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded in this cause.

The value of the cargo salved by the officers and crew of the Kwangtung was 27,608*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, the total value salved being 69,391*l.*, most of which was carried to Aden by the Kwangtung.

The cause was heard June 25, July 16 and 20 before Sir R. Phillimore and Trinity Masters.

Butt, Q.C., Herschell, Q.C., and E. Jones, for the commander, officers, and crew of the Kwangtung.

Butt, Q.C., E. C. Clarkson for the owners, masters, and crew of the Corinna.

Sir H. James, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants.

Butt, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—As to the claim of the Kwangtung, I submit that the agreement ought to be upheld. It was entered into between perfectly competent parties after due deliberation, and under no undue pressure; consequently, according to the practice of the court, it ought to be held binding. The amount agreed upon is not extraordinary considering the arduous nature of the services performed. There is nothing to prevent the officers and crew of a Queen's ship, which I must admit this was, from entering into an agreement as to the way in which their services are to be rewarded. As to the claim of the Corinna, I submit she is entitled to substantial reward; first for the carrying of the first intelligence to Aden (The Sebastian Cabot, Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, 865); secondly, because she rescued the passengers from a position of great danger to life.

Sir H. James, Q.C., and Cohen, for the defendants.—The agreement is bad. It was obtained by undue pressure, and by the threat to abandon the salvage if not accepted on those terms. The sum enforced was exorbitant. This court never gives one half out of such a considerable sum. Where a salvor is in such a position that he can say to the persons in distress "You must consent to my terms or I will leave you to certain destruction." this amounts to duress afloat, although it might not ashore. In the present case it was only the threat to leave that produced consent to the enormous demand. No doubt if persons agree to an amount for salvage with a full knowledge of all the circumstances and chances, it is binding, whether the work turns out more or less (The Waverly, ante, vol. 1, p. 47; 24 L. T. Rep. N.S. 231), but it is very different where parties enter into an agreement, one party refusing all terms except his own; in the latter case the master must accept or lose his salvor. If it be once admitted that these agreements are not, under all circumstances, binding, even in the case of a merchant ship, and if that such a demand, not on the ground of fairness, but on account of the danger of the damaged ship, is a sum which is exorbitant, it is contrary to all equity that such an agreement should be upheld. It has been decided over and over again that an agreement obtained by compulsion is bad, and if a person takes advantage of the distress of a ship to force from her master a sum of money, which is greater than the circumstances warrant, under the threat of abandonment that amounts to compulsion:

The Emulous, 1 Summer's C. C. Rep. 207, 210;
The Schutz v. The Nancy, Bee's Adm. Rep. 139;
The British Empire, 6 Jurist, 608;
The Helen and George, Swab., 368.

The system of imposing terms without reference to the fairness of remuneration is against public policy. The demand here was grossly exorbitant and wholly out of proportion to the services rendered. Again, this was a Queen's ship, and consequently her officers and crew are entitled to even less than those on board a merchant ship. It is the duty of officers and men in the public service to render assistance to vessels in distress, and although entitled to reward, their reward should be small in comparison to that given to merchant ships having no such duty (The Clifton 3 Hagg. 117, 121). Moreover it is indicated by the Legislature in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sect. 487, that in no case shall officers and crews of Her Majesty's ships be entitled, on any occasion, to more than one half of the property salved, because it there provides that the bond to be taken as security for the salvage shall never exceed half the value. This would show that the very highest claim allowable is one half. If the master of the Woosung had known that orders had been given to the Kwangtung from the India office as to salving the property, and giving assistance, he never would have entered into the agreement. He was entitled to know all the circumstances of the case before making his terms (The True Blue, 2 W. Rob. 43). It was not fair that the master of the Woosung should not know what he was paying for; the plaintiffs knew they could claim for nothing but personal services, and yet they let the master suppose they could claim in respect of the ship. The Queen's ship was proceeding under orders, and not voluntarily. In a merchant ship the owners engage the crew to perform a particular service, and not to perform salvage. In a Queen's ship the captain is bound to take her wherever he is ordered, whether it be to fight, convoy, or salve. Hence their services are given by Government, and they can only be paid for the extra labour they perform. They have no claim for the tackle used in salving as that was Government property (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 484), and nevertheless the agreement stipulates that the captain of the Queen's ship is to provide tackle. This clearly shows that part of the consideration for the sum agreed upon was the finding of tackle. In this respect alone the agreement is bad, inasmuch as it stipulates for a money payment for that to which the defendants were already entitled for nothing. I submit that the contract ought to be set aside, because the amount agreed upon was exorbitant, because those terms were obtained by force or compulsion, and because it was wrong in a Queen's officer to impose any terms at all after he had been ordered to render assistance.

As to the claim on behalf of the Corinna we submit that there was no life salvage. The claim for life salvage arises under statute (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sects. 458, 459), and before such a claim can be enforced there must have been an actual saving of life from the dangers of the sea; there must be a removing of the lives from a position of immediate danger, and that danger, must arise from the sea or a perilous position of the ship on which the lives are. Here, however, the passengers were ashore, in an island which was not deserted and was inhabitable. There may have been inconvenience but no danger. The owners of cargo can only be made liable upon grounds of public policy, and therefore, only by showing that there was such danger of the sea as rendered it a duty to save life. There was no such danger, as the passengers might have stayed on the island some time longer without risk. Again there was no salvage service in carrying intelligence to Aden. There was no deviation from her ordinary course, and no risk or peril: (The Ocean, 2 W. Rob. 91.)

Butt, Q C. in reply.—In the claim of the Corinna I submit that the deviation to pick up the passengers and the taking the letter were all one act tending towards the salvage of the Woosung's cargo, and should be rewarded. There was danger to the passengers on the island; there was great privation, and want of water.

In the claim of the Kwangtung, I submit that there was no duress; the parties met upon equal terms, and had every opportunity for discussion, and the terms were reduced into writing. The ignorance of the law of salvage by Queen's ships will not avail here, because not only ought the master to have known of this provision, but he himself admitted that had he known it he would have signed the agreement. There was not any obligation in the plaintiffs to render assistance in salving, their only duty was to protect the property from the Arabs. The claim is not exorbitant compared with the sums paid to other persons.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 30.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case in which the circumstances are peculiar, and the salvage claim large.

The Woosung was an iron screw steamer of 1622 tons register, with a general Indian cargo of 3000 tons, consisting of silk, indigo, raw hides, coffee, tea, shellac, wheat, rice, linseed, and other goods, of value of half a million sterling. About midnight in the month of Feb. 1874, in the course of her voyage from Calcutta to London, she struck on a coral reef off the Island of Kotama, in the Red Sea, and the next morning her passengers and crew, consisting of between fifty and sixty persons were conveyed to an island which the evidence proved to be a desert island uninhabited, and with no water in it. The master of the Woosung dispatched in a short time one of his officers in a lifeboat with a letter to the authorities of the Turkish town of Loheia, about twenty-six miles off. The governor came down to the wreck with some men and a Greek trader, who undertook to engage some Arabs, when the captain of the Woosung entered into an agreement by which the Greek undertook to provide men and boat, and he was to take one-third of the nett value realised on the sale, after all expenses were paid. It appears that the Greek and the Arabs whom he engaged reached the place soon afterwards, and here I must observe there has been a conflict of evidence with respect to the conduct of the Arabs, which is only relevant to the question I have to decide before me in an indirect way. I am satisfied upon the evidence, particularly upon a letter written by the agent for the Salvage Association, who gave evidence as far as it was in his power to give in favour of the owner in this case, that the Arabs did plunder, and that their work did proceed from time to time very carelessly. In a letter written upon the 12th April the agent thus expresses himself: "Some boxes have been so completely smashed, and the Arabs were stealing the indigo so fast, that I was obliged to sacrifice the linseed, much of which has been partially damaged. Up to the present time 220 bags have been started and filled with indigo. And with respect to this agreement to the Greek he says, "I have made this arrangement under the firm conviction that a large quantity of valuable property already salved, against which the Greek has a claim of one-third of its nett value will be benefited to a very considerable extent by the arrangement I have made with him for 16,000*l.*, and that the abandonment of his claim against the property still remaining to be salved will enable me to recover it at a very considerable less cost than one-third of its nett value. The Greek has been most reluctantly obliged to make this arrangement, and nothing but a want of money has prevented his following the property to England under the terms of his agreement with Capt. Carlin." In another letter he says, "I am fully alive to the serious nature of the step I have taken, and trust you will give me credit for acting for the best. At the same time I trust you will take into consideration the difficulties of my position, the extent to which the property is being pillaged, the complete stoppage of further salvaged operation, and the difficulty of getting the cargo off the island." By a telegram upon the 5th March 1874, from the Secretary of State for India, the British Political Resident at Aden, was ordered to send a gunboat, which was the Kwangtung. And here I may observe that, in my opinion, the Kwangtung was sent to protect the property, but without any orders to act as salvor. The Kwangtung found the Woosung in the place mentioned, which was a most exposed position, 299 miles from Aden and 30 miles out of the track of vessels. When she arrived, the Woosung was examined, and I think it is not denied that she had been badly strained. She was on a slanting ledge of a rock, her shear had quite gone, she was very much hogged, and had a heavy list to starboard. There were about 31ft. of water on the starboard side, and only about 16ft. on the port side. The vessel having been holed in several places, and her stern had settled down until the starboard waterways abreast the mizenmast were under the water. She was not in a state, as the further history of the case shows, to stand any bad weather. The greater part of the cargo of the Woosung had been fifteen days under water when the Kwangtung arrived. Part of the cargo (the raw hides and linseed) were immersed in the water, and the hides were in an advanced state of putrefaction. There were noxious gases in the vessel, and considerable danger was experienced from the foul air that existed. The indigo was in the main hold, beneath the between decks, which were in some places under water about four feet, and was jammed so tight between the beams by the swelling of the grain in the bottom of the vessel that it could only be got at by breaking up the decks; and there was a considerable quantity of silk in the lower lazarette, stowed away at the bottom of the vessel, underneath a number of boxes of various goods, and from 10ft. to 20ft. in some places, and in others under putrid water. Under the circumstances they found it necessary to break up the decks to get at the indigo, and, as the Greek had no means or appliances for doing this, the commander of the Woosung and his men undertook to do it. The name of the captain of the Woosung was Carlin, and he had a conference with the commander of Kwangtung with respect to the position of the indigo and silk, and a long discussion ensued between them, and ultimately they came to an agreement at Kotama on the 9th March. [His Lordship read the agreement above set out.]

Now the question debated for several days was, as to the validity of the agreement. It was contended that it was void by reason of its exorbitancy, and it had also been pleaded that it was void by reason of collusions between Captains Carlin and Elton, and the misconduct of Captain Elton and those under his control. The latter charge has been completely withdrawn, and the court has to regret that, under the circumstances, it was ever made.

Now with regard to agreements of this kind, what is the probable amount which the court would award in the absence of an agreement? for salvage does not furnish a satisfactory test of the validity or invalidity of an agreement. The rule of the court was laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of the Theodore (Swab. 352), and in many other cases; but in the Theodore it is concisely stated as follows: "The court is very much indisposed to set aside an honest agreement, but it must be satisfied that the agreement is honest. Where there is any doubt, its rule is to adhere to the agreement, and the court will be just as ready in favour of the salvors to set aside an agreement if it is satisfied that it was wholly inequitable." In the very useful work published on the practice of this court by Mr. Bruce and Mr. Williams, the cases referring to this point of law are very carefully examined, and the result in my judgment is very accurately stated: "It is submitted that the true principle is that the agreement of the parties must bind unless the court is led to the conclusion that it was entered into in ignorance of material facts or induced by fraud. Whether the amount is inadequate or exorbitant, that fact can only be regarded by the court as pointing to the probability that there was some unfair dealing at the time of the making of the agreement. This applies with especial force to cases where persons in extremity in order to obtain assistance have entered into an agreement to pay an exorbitant sum to the salvors."

Now the first thing the court has to consider is, who are the parties to this agreement? Are they ignorant persons, or is one ignorant and the other cunning, and trying to overreach the ignorant one? Or is it made between persons perfectly able to understand what they are about, and the conditions that they enter into? It cannot be doubted that they belong to the latter category. I think that Captain Carlin and Captain Elton were really as competent persons as can be conceived.

The next thing the court has to consider is whether the agreement was hastily or deliberately entered into. Now, the Captains have been examined, and I saw no reason whatever to doubt the credibility of the evidence given by Captain Carlin. He says, fairly enough, he did not know what the law was with regard to salvage, and did not know anything about the law as to Her Majesty's ships, or ships in the public service; but, he said, he bargained for a long time for him to take a third, and it was only when the bargaining failed that he agreed to give half. He says it was therefore entered into very deliberately, and it was entered into by competent persons. Now, the sum was very large, but I think it was stated, and not contradicted, that the salvage went to the Indian office, and that Captain Elton was to receive one-tenth. It is true that Captain Carlin says he was not aware of the law of salvage relating to ships in the public service—there is not much distinction to be drawn between a ship belonging to the Bombay Government and a ship belonging to Her Majesty—and he says that he was not aware, according to the law, that a ship belonging to the Crown could not claim salvage—that is to say, on the ground of service rendered by a ship. He said if he had been aware of it, it would have made no difference whatever in his arrangements with Captain Elton. I must observe in this case, without entering into the consideration of how far ignorance of the law could possibly affect this agreement, but it appears from the evidence that the ship relied upon the men on board of her, and the service was essentially rendered by the men on board the ship, and not, as in many cases, the agency of the steam power of the other vessel. Now, I am of opinion, as I have already expressed, that there was no disability fixed by the law upon Captain Elton to obtain salvage employment, and to obtain it at a reasonable and proper remuneration, whatever that may be, for the services. It is not necessary to go into these documents to which the court has referred. The result is that the court has, by the permission of the Lords of the Admiralty, to consider the case, as if it were the case of any ordinary merchantman.

Now, the agreement having been entered into deliberately by competent persons, and the charge of collusion and misconduct having been withdrawn, does the amount itself warrant the court in coming to the conclusion that this sum is so grossly inequitable and exorbitant, as to render it proper, that the court should set the agreement aside, having regard to the principles of law which I have stated already? Now, we must consider a little of the facts of the salvage in this case. It was rendered, it is true, in one sense without much personal danger to the salvors. But there is one thing the evidence shows—that of those who rendered this salvage service, many of them were sufferers from the worst of dangers, perhaps, and the chance of disease, by the mischief which was generated by this putrid stench, and by the noxious gases that were evolved. The evidence of Mr. Edwards is very remarkable on this point. He was a lieutenant on board the Kwangtung, and went to the Woosung in his capacity of first officer, and he gives us an account of the affair. He says, "I never worked so hard in my life, and I did not know when the ship might break up. We had to replace the men and wash our eyes." And then follows an account of the suffering of his eyes: "The most intense madness I ever suffered in my life; I would not suffer it again for 100,000*l.*; I was nearly a month in the hospital, under great suffering." Now, I take this opportunity of saying that I hope those in whose hands the distribution of the salvage reward is placed will not fail to recognise the eminent services of this officer, and it was stated by counsel that if I entertained that opinion I should express it. I do entertain it, and I hope that those who hear me to-day will carry that opinion to the proper quarter, where my opinion may be acted upon. The next circumstance that I have to observe upon is that the work of the Europeans was good, not to repeat more of the evidence than is necessary to establish the fact; and the manner in which the Arabs worked was not to be compared in its efficacy and usefulness to the manner in which the Europeans worked.

It is said—and this is the main argument addressed to us by Sir H. James and Mr. Cohen—that this compact is void by reason of duress and compulsion. In one sense, the services of every salvor are unwittingly under duress, they accept the lesser evil of losing a portion of the property rather than submit to the greater evil of losing all the property and all the benefit. In this sense all services are rendered under compulsion. But there is no compulsion and no duress unless direct evidence is given that all reasonable limits are transgressed, and there has been a use of false representation, or excitement from ungrounded fears, in order to procure acceptance by the salvors of their services. There does not appear any evidence of that kind in the present case, and if I compare it with the salvage reward paid to the Greek and others—take the stewardess, who received 1900*l.*, and the first engineer, who received 3500*l.*—when I compare this with the admitted and uncomplained of salvage service afterwards by these persons, I must say the charge of compulsion on this account utterly fails.

The services lasted, I think, six days, and were perfectly effectual. Now, I think it unnecessary to travel further into this question, because I have not to consider—and I wish this to be perfectly understood—whether half the proceeds would be the amount which I should have to award were it a question now of an ordinary salvage service; but the question is whether the amount, having regard to the circumstances which I have stated, and the principles of law to which I have adverted, of itself presents such features of exorbitancy as to be inequitable and to induce the court to do that which it sometimes does, viz., very reluctantly interfere with an agreement made between competent persons.

I must decline to do so upon the present occasion, and I must pronounce for the validity of the agreement. I must repeat that I hope what the court has said as to Mr. Edwards will not be forgotten, but that it will be mentioned in the proper quarter. I will add that if the charge of misconduct is not withdrawn, I have no hesitation in saying it was not founded upon the evidence before me.

I have considered the case of the Corinna, and I am of opinion that there was no life salvage. I shall award 200*l.* for the services she performed in forwarding the intelligence to Aden.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 18, and 19, 1875.

(Present: the Right Hons. Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE SMITH, Sir R. P. COLLIER, and Sir H. S. KEATING.)

H.M.S. BELLEROPHON.

Collision—H.M.'s ship carrying ram—As to duty of officer in charge to give warning of danger.

Where a ship carries a latent instrument dangerous to others, those who have control of it are bound to take all reasonable precautions that it shall not cause damage to others.

Where one of H.M.'s ships carries under her bows below water a ram, not ordinarily dangerous to vessels navigating the seas, but dangerous to vessels coming in contact with it, and the officer in charge of H.M.'s ship has under the circumstances reasonable ground for supposing that the ram will occasion damage to another (friendly) ship, and has reasonable means and opportunity of warning the other ship of the danger so as to enable her to avoid it, although the other ship has in the first instance been guilty of negligence whereby she has occasioned the necessity for giving notice, it is the duty of the officer in charge of H.M.'s ship to give notice to the other ship; but if there is no reasonable ground for apprehending danger, and no reasonable opportunity for giving the notice, there is no obligation to give the notice.

THESE were appeals from decrees of the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, on behalf of the Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steam Navigation Company (Limited), owners of the steamship Flamsteed and on behalf of the owners of her cargo, the appellants, against the Hon. George Wellesley, C. B., Vice-Admiral in Her Majesty's Navy, commanding the fleet on the North American station, and Richard Wells, Esq., captain of H.M.S. Bellerophon, the respondents, in two cases of damage promoted in that court by the appellants against the respondents.

The cause was instituted on behalf of the present appellants, the owners of the late steamship Flamsteed, and of her cargo, in consequence of the loss of that vessel, which was sunk through being struck by the spur or ram of H.M.S. Bellerophon on the 24th Nov. 1873, in the North Atlantic Ocean, to the north-east of Cape de Verde Islands.

The Flamsteed was a screw steamship of 935 tons net register, and engines of 80 horse power, and at the time in question was on a voyage from Liverpool to Lisbon, Rio de Janeiro, and other places, laden with a cargo of general merchandize of great value.

H.M.S. Bellerophon is an armour plated iron ship of 4270 tons register, and engines of 1000 nominal horse-power. She was manned by a crew of 630 men, including several officers and some divers. At the time in question she was bound for Bermuda.

The Bellerophon is of peculiar construction, and carries some feet under water at her stem a large sharp pointed spur or ram projecting some distance from her bows, and expressly designed for striking vessels under water and sinking them in time of war.

The Flamsteed, on the day in question, being in latitude 25 deg. 35 sec. north, and longitude 20 deg. 51 sec. west, sighted the Bellerophon on the port bow some miles distant. The Bellerophon was then under sail on the port tack with royals set. She had her funnel up with smoke issuing from it, but was not actually under steam. Her fires were alight in four boilers. In one they were condensing water, but in the other three the fires were banked low. She made signals to the Flamsteed for newspapers. The Flamsteed acceded to this request by signal, and the master of that vessel having starboarded his helm, came round the Bellerophon, at the distance of about half a mile on her port side, and passing round her stern brought up off the starboard quarter of the Bellerophon, at a distance of from a quarter to half a mile. The Bellerophon at this time was hove-to with her mainyard aback, and she sent off from her starboard quarter a boat to the port side of the Flamsteed. A newspaper was then handed to the officer of the boat, and the master of the Flamsteed made an offer to the officer to tow him towards the Bellerophon. This offer was accepted, and the boat was made fast to the Flamsteed on her port side, the master and crew of the Flamsteed being then in ignorance of the existence of the ram at the bow of the Bellerophon. The Flamsteed accordingly steered towards the starboard side of the Bellerophon. Owing, however, as contended by the appellants, to the Bellerophon having drifted to a great extent, and to her head having paid off to leeward, or, as contended by the respondents, to a miscalculation of his distance on the part of the master of the Flamsteed, that vessel approached so close to the starboard side of the Bellerophon that the spritsail-yard or starboard whisker of the Bellerophon caught the forerigging and afterwards the bridge of the Flamsteed. The Bellerophon's anchor on her port bow then caught the foremost davit of the Flamsteed, tore it off (it fell in to the engine room), and the anchor then caught the aftermost davit and held the Flamsteed for some short appreciable time until the anchor fell to the ring. While the two vessels were so held the master of the Flamsteed ordered his engines to be reversed with a view of going astern of the Bellerophon, and they were accordingly reversed, but the master shortly afterwards decided to go ahead and ordered the engines ahead accordingly, and the Flamsteed passed along the starboard side and ahead of the Bellerophon at a slight angle with the Bellerophon. Neither the Bellerophon's jibboom nor bowsprit were carried away, and it was admitted in the evidence on both sides that the hulls of the two vessels never came in contact. However, when the Flamsteed was passing ahead of the Bellerophon, and when the two vessels were apparently clear of each other the sharp spur point of the Bellerophon's ram struck the Flamsteed 14ft. below the water line under her port quarter, about abreast of the mainmast, making a hole which caused the Flamsteed and the cargo on board her to sink in a few hours afterwards. The remaining facts are stated in the judgment.

It was admitted that those on board the Flamsteed did not know, and had not any reasonable means of knowing that the Bellerophon was armed with such a spur or ram, or with any spur or ram, and it was contended by the appellants that those on board the Bellerophon could and ought to have given notice or warning to those on board the Flamsteed that the Bellerophon was armed with a ram or spur. No such notice, however, was given.

Had such notice or warning been given, those in charge of the Flamsteed might have kept the engines going astern instead of giving the order that they should go ahead, in which case the damage done by the ram or spur would have been avoided.

The causes were respectively instituted in the Court of Admiralty in the sum of 40,000*l.* to recover for the loss of the Flamsteed, and in the sum of 12,000*l.* to recover for the loss of the cargo.

The causes were heard together before the learned judge of the court below, assisted by Trinity Masters, on 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st Nov. 1874, and on the latter date judgment was given as follows:

Sir R. PHILLIMORE (after stating the facts).—Now it is quite clear that the damage was caused in this case by one of two causes, either by the Flamsteed coming too near under a starboard helm, or by the Bellerophon drifting and paying off, and coming down upon the Flamsteed. I have already stated that the evidence establishes that the Bellerophon did not drift to any appreciable amount, or pay off, or come down in the way that has been described from the Flamsteed, and, in my judgment, as well as that of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, this collision was caused by the Flamsteed not porting in due time, but waiting to port until she had come too near to the starboard side of the Bellerophon. It has been urged upon the court that even if this were so with regard to the first contact, there was contributory negligence on the part of the Bellerophon, inasmuch as she ought then to have warned her not to go ahead because she carried a ram, whereas she omitted to do so, and backed her headyards, which was a sort of invitation to her to go forward, and was the cause of her suffering the injury of the thrust below her water line. Now, one answer appears to the court to be quite sufficient upon this point, and that is—the whole time between the first contact and the second contact was little, if at all, more than one minute, and I cannot at all assent to the proposition of law that it was the duty of the Bellerophon to intimate, either (if the fact were so) that she was a leewardly vessel, or that she carried a ram. It does not appear to me that the law imposes any such obligation upon a vessel in the condition in which she then was. I think it is an extremely unfortunate circumstance that the Flamsteed should, in consequence of an act of courtesy and kindness on her part, have suffered this tremendous loss, to the extent of, it is said, nearly 160,000*l.*; but the court must be on its guard against allowing any consideration of that kind to make it find that there has been contributory negligence on the part of the Bellerophon, unless that is made out by the evidence before it, and I have no such evidence before me. I am, therefore, constrained to say that the Flamsteed has failed in establishing the averments in her petition, and that the Bellerophon is not to blame for the collision in this case.

From these decrees the appellants appealed for the following amongst other reasons:

1. Because the respondents were guilty of negligence and did not use due care to avoid the collision.

2. Because the fact that the Bellerophon was armed with such a dangerous engine of destruction as the spur or ram, which was covered by water and concealed from view, cast upon those in charge of the Bellerophon the duty of using every possible precaution and taking the utmost care by giving notice or otherwise, to prevent damage occurring from the ram or spur with which the Bellerophon was armed.

Sir Henry James, Q.C. and Arthur Cohen (W. B. Trevelyan with them) for the appellants.—We submit the captain of the Bellerophon was to blame for not putting the master of the Flamsteed in possession of the facts which would have enabled the latter to keep clear without injury. The loss was occasioned by the ram coming in contact with the Flamsteed; that did not occur at the first moment of collision, and at the first contact, but was occasioned by the negligence of the Bellerophon in not giving warning so as to send the steamer astern. Even granting that the first collision was occasioned by the plaintiff's negligence it was still the duty of the defendants to take all reasonable precautions to avoid accident, and in this case the reasonable precaution would have been to give due notice of the danger ahead. If the owner of property leaves it in such a condition that it is dangerous to other persons, he is bound to give reasonable notice to every person whom it is likely to injure. The obligation to give this notice arises the moment the possibility of danger occurs, and in the present instance as soon as it was seen that the Flamsteed was approaching the hidden danger: (Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 B. & Ald. 304) [Sir J. W. COLVILLE.—Can it be said that the captain of the Bellerophon was bound to suppose that the Flamsteed would come into collision before the collision occurred, or that she would go anywhere near the ram?] There was the same duty as there is in the case of a sunken vessel or an obstruction in a highway; the person causing the obstruction is bound to give notice.

Broom v. Mallet, 5 C.B. 599;
White v. Crisp, 10 Ex. 312.

Any person giving a carrier dangerous goods to carry without giving notice of their character is liable for any injury done; and so anyone who for his own purposes brings upon his land, and collects and keeps there anything likely to do mischief if it escapes, is primâ facie answerable for all the damage which is the natural consequence of its escape.

Farrant v. Barnes, 31 L.J. 37, C.P.;
Fletcher v. Rylands, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 121; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 523; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 265.

No one has a right to expose a person using a highway to danger. Notice must be given, or liability attaches upon injury received. In the present case there was a dangerous instrument of a novel and unusual construction used upon a highway in such a manner as to be dangerous to other persons, and it could not be seen; it was the duty of those using it to warn other people upon the highway of its existence and dangerous character. We contend that the first contact was occasioned by the negligence of the Bellerophon in paying off too soon, but even supposing that it was caused by the plaintiffs' negligence, that is not an answer to this claim, the only result of such a finding would be that both ships are to blame. There was ample time after the first contact to have given warning of the danger. The obligation not to do injury is absolute.

Bonomi v. Backhouse, 9 H. of L. 503; E. B. & E. 622;
Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, 29 L. J. 247, Ex.
Bagnall v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 7 H. & N. 423; 31 L. J. 121, 480, Ex.;
Jones v. The Festiniog Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 902; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 733

Again, there was no such negligence on the part of the Flamsteed as would have occasioned her loss by itself, and the captain of the Bellerophon must have seen that she was running into danger, hence he is alone liable for his negligence in not giving warning: (Radley v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 44 L. J. 73, Ex.) But if there was a breach of any obligation on the part of the Bellerophon, the fact of negligence on the part of the Flamsteed having led to the committing of that breach, though it prevents the Flamsteed from saying that she did not contribute to the result, does not allow the Bellerophon to escape entirely from liability. The Bellerophon was exposing persons using a public highway to unforeseen danger, and she cannot excuse her own negligence by saying that those other persons were also negligent.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), Staveley Hill, Q.C. and H. Stokes, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir HENRY S. KEATING.—In this appeal the appellants were the owners of a steamship called the Flamsteed, and brought their suit in the Admiralty Court in consequence of the loss of that vessel from injuries received by a collision with H.M.S. Bellerophon. The Flamsteed was a screw steamship of 935 tons register, with engines of 80 horse power, and on the 24th Nov. 1873, the time when this collision took place, was on a voyage from Liverpool to Lisbon and other places. When at sea, about 500 miles from the Cape de Verde Islands, at six or seven a.m., she sighted H.M.S. Bellerophon. The Bellerophon is an armour-plated iron ship of 4220 tons register, with engines of 1000 horse power. She had the usual crew of such a ship—indeed, one rather in excess of the usual number, for she had as many as 630 hands on board. She was commanded by Captain Wells, one of the respondents in this case, and was flying the flag of Vice-Admiral Wellesley, who is another respondent, her destination being Bermuda. It appears that the Bellerophon, whose course was lying to the north-west, that of the Flamsteed being south-west-by-south, signalled to the Flamsteed to ask if she could lend a newspaper. The Flamsteed gave an affirmative answer, and accordingly the Bellerophon lowered a boat manned by twelve able seamen, to send for the newspapers. Before the boat pulled off to the Flamsteed, that steamship held on her course; then starboarding her helm as she passed the stern of the Bellerophon, and, still under a starboard helm, came off the starboard quarter of the ship of war, at a distance of about three-quarters of a mile. Being in that position the boat pulled up to her, the officer who was with the boat received the newspapers, and then the captain of the Flamsteed appears to have offered to take the boat in tow, and to bring her nearer to the Bellerophon. There was no request upon the part of the officer that this should be done, nor any necessity for doing so. The weather was fine; there was at the time a moderate breeze, with no sea on, but only the usual swell of the Atlantic—indeed, it is said less than the usual swell. There was nothing whatever to prevent the boat from getting back from the Flamsteed to the Bellerophon in the same way that it had reached the Flamsteed. The officer, however, accepted the offer of the captain of the Flamsteed, and the Flamsteed accordingly, with the boat in tow upon her port side, starboarded her helm and proceeded towards the Bellerophon. The evidence here certainly discloses a most remarkable and ill-judged course adopted by the Flamsteed in approaching a ship of war such as the Bellerophon. The Bellerophon, a ship of great size, was hove to under sail; and, it appears from the evidence, that although iron vessels of that class have masting and rigging, this is not for the purpose of rendering them sailing vessels properly so called, because they are made primarily for the purpose of being moved by steam; and that thus the masting of the Bellerophon, as in similar cases, is of a lighter description than that put in sailing vessels which do not move by steam; indeed, Capt. Wells in a portion of his evidence describes the masting as being rather in the nature of jury-masting than ordinary masting. At the time in question the fires of the Bellerophon were banked up; she had no assistance from steam-power, as her screw was disconnected; she was under sail, but close to the wind, hove to; and yet the Flamsteed, having full sea room before her, instead of taking the course which their Lordships are advised would have been proper and natural to have been adopted under such circumstances, namely, to have gone under the stern of the Bellerophon, to have dropped the boat, and proceeded on her course, seems to have steered directly for the Bellerophon amidships, and to have continued on to within 100 yards of that enormous vessel, floating in what was described by the captain to be "a helpless state" upon the water, and unable to make any active exertion whatever, to escape a collision. The Flamsteed, steering in that way, when thus close to the Bellerophon ported her helm, apparently with the idea of performing what at that distance would have been the very nice and perilous manœuvre of passing along her starboard side, and running ahead of her. That manœuvre, it would appear by the evidence, might perhaps have been successfully performed, assuming the Flamsteed to have answered her helm quickly, for having full steam-power upon her she could of course, if she could have kept clear of the Bellerophon, easily run ahead of her. But having adopted the perilous course of coming so close to the ironclad, although she ported her helm, and it is said put it hard-a-port, which it is probable, yet she was unable to keep herself at a sufficient distance, and her rigging became entangled with the whisker, as it is termed, of the ship-of-war—that is, one end of the spritsail yard running out from the bowsprit. Having become thus entangled, she was caught by the anchor of the Bellerophon, and her first motion appears to have been to have backed astern, whilst the captain of the Bellerophon threw his sails aback, which he says was the proper course to pursue, not that it produced a great effect upon his ship, for that it could not have done, but that it was the proper and ordinary course. A suggestion was made that his doing so acted as an invitation to the Flamsteed to go ahead and so approach the danger; but that having been suggested originally was disposed of in the course of the argument, because it was admitted by counsel, and was quite clear upon the evidence, that all the operations on the part of the Flamsteed were wholly independent of anything done by the Bellerophon which would appear, as stated by the captain, to have lain like "a log upon the water." In the entanglement occasioned by the fouling of the rigging, the painter which upheld the anchor of the Bellerophon gave way, and, the anchor having fallen, the Flamsteed then appears to have forged ahead, and endeavoured to pass in some way in front of the Bellerophon, and in a manner not very intelligible got under her bowsprit, and so close to her stem that, probably from the effect of the swell of the sea, she came in contact with the ram of the Bellerophon, and received the injury in question, which took place 14ft. below the water-line, just abaft the mainmast. It was not made any question in the court below, nor could it have been here, that the injury inflicted upon the Flamsteed proceeded from contact with the ram of the Bellerophon.

Their Lordships do not entertain any doubt, nor, indeed, has it been seriously questioned by the counsel for the appellants, that the collision in the first instance arose from the rash and unseamanlike mode of proceeding on the part of the Flamsteed in approaching the ship of war. So much too close did she bring herself to the Bellerophon, that the men were obliged to jump out of the boat towed at her port side, under the apprehension that she should be swamped. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the collision was caused in the first instance wholly by the fault of the Flamsteed.

But whilst that is not seriously denied upon the part of the Flamsteed, it is yet sought to establish a case of contributory negligence on the part of the Bellerophon, and it is said that this contributory negligence consisted in the omission of an alleged duty on the part of the Bellerophon to give at some period or another of this transaction distinct notice to the Flamsteed that her stem was constructed in a peculiar manner, forming a ram which protruded under the water. It was contended in the court below that there were other points of contributory negligence on the part of the Bellerophon, that the Bellerophon was a ship that drifted to leeward in some unusual way, and that notice of this tendency ought to have been given to the Flamsteed. It was also suggested that she had hoisted her jib and that her head paid off, and that the paying off to leeward partly induced the collision that took place, and brought the Flamsteed more immediately under the bows of the Bellerophon. However, those two points were ultimately abandoned upon the argument before their Lordships, and the only point for their consideration is whether the Bellerophon was guilty of contributory negligence, in omitting to give notice to the Flamsteed that her stem was so constructed that a vessel going close under her bowsprit might sustain damage by reason of this ram. On the part of the appellants, it was said the law requires that wherever persons control and are in possession of a dangerous instrument, which is latent, and which may produce damage to others, they are bound to give notice of the existence of that latent instrument of danger, and therefore that the circumstances in the present case imposed upon the Bellerophon the obligation to give notice of the existence of the ram in her bow. It appears to their Lordships important to consider exactly what the nature of this latent instrument of danger in the bow of the Bellerophon was. It was insisted by the learned counsel, and truly said, that it was intended for the purpose of causing damage to others, and no doubt the ram upon the Bellerophon was for the purpose of being used as an instrument of offence in naval warfare, and would be or might be efficacious for that purpose. But it was not an instrument in itself necessarily dangerous to persons navigating the high seas; on the contrary, except under certain extraordinary and exceptional circumstances, it could produce no danger whatever to any of Her Majesty's subjects or others so navigating. Still, if, being such as it was, and under the circumstances which took place, the captain of the Bellerophon (speaking of him for convenience sake as the person responsible), had under the circumstances reasonable ground for supposing that this ram would occasion danger to the Flamsteed, and had reasonable means and opportunity of warning the Flamsteed of that danger so as to enable her to avoid it, then, although the Flamsteed had in the first instance been guilty of negligence, and even although by her negligence she had occasioned the necessity for giving notice, still their Lordships are of opinion it would have been the duty of the captain of the Bellerophon, or of those in charge of her, to have given that notice to the captain of the Flamsteed. Their Lordships entirely concur in the view that if there be a latent instrument of danger, those who have the control and the possession of it are bound to take all reasonable precautions that it shall not cause damage to others. But they are of opinion that there was no obligation upon the captain of the Bellerophon to give notice of this ram unless there was a reasonable probability of danger to the Flamsteed from the want of notice; and further unless he had a reasonable opportunity of giving such a notice as might have enabled the Flamsteed to avoid the ram.

Many cases have been referred to in support of the proposition as stated by the appellants from which their Lordships do not in any way dissent; but they are unaware of any case which establishes a rule of law which would conflict with that to which reference has been made, namely, that the obligation to give a notice or a warning of danger must arise from the existence of some reasonable probability of danger to the party to whom that notice is to be given, and an opportunity of giving it so as to enable such party to avoid the danger; and applying that rule in the present case, their Lordships, upon the facts, think that there is no ground whatever for saying that at any period of this collision, the captain of the Bellerophon, or those in charge of the Bellerophon, had any reasonable ground to suppose that anyone navigating the Flamsteed would have placed that vessel in a position which would have rendered notice of the existence of the ram necessary to preserve them from danger. When the captain of the Flamsteed was asked in the court below what ought to have been done by the Bellerophon, and when ought the notice to have been given, it was said by the captain at first that it ought to have been given when he was approaching the ironclad, the Flamsteed being then directed amidships; but is it reasonable that their Lordships should suppose upon these facts that the captain of the Bellerophon was to assume that the Flamsteed had any such wild intention as that of almost scraping the starboard side of his ship, so as to become entangled, and thrown across his bows, under his bowsprit and close to his stem? The captain of the Flamsteed himself seems to have thought that at that time there was no danger of his getting so close. After he had said that the notice might have been given to him when he was off the quarter, because "he (the captain of Bellerophon) saw we were going to try to pass to leeward of him," it was observed to him, "He did not think you were coming close to him?" his answer was "No, nor I did not think so either." Therefore it appears perfectly clear that at that period there could have been no obligation arising from any reasonable anticipation of any contact between the Flamsteed and the ram for any notice to be given to the Flamsteed of the existence of that ram.

But it is suggested that at some subsequent time that notice ought to have been given. With reference to that suggestion, it is to be observed that the whole of the transaction described occupied but a very short time. The learned counsel for the appellants observed that Capt. Wells, in putting the time at something over a minute, had understated it. That is possible. The captain of the Flamsteed himself states it at two or three minutes. People do not look at their watches on these occasions so as to estimate accurately the time, but their Lordships think it safe to assume upon the evidence that the whole of this took place in a very short space of time, that it was a continuous act occupying it may be a minute, it may be a minute and a half, or two, or even three minutes, and yet it is suggested that it was to be expected from the captain of the Bellerophon, and that he ought, in the midst of the confusion occasioned by the mismanagement of the Flamsteed, to have anticipated that the Flamsteed would go close across his bows, and that he could and ought then to have given notice.

This seems to their Lordships to be a proposition that cannot possibly be maintained. Admitting fully the obligation to give the notice, if there were reasonable ground for apprehending danger, and if a notice could be given so as to be productive of the effect of averting that danger, yet on the facts of this case their Lordships come to the conclusion that there was no reasonable ground for anticipating any danger to the Flamsteed from the rain, and they are further advised that in a nautical point of view there was no period after the first collision when any notice to the Flamsteed would or could have averted the unfortunate accident, and therefore that there was no omission upon the part of the captain of the Bellerophon which would constitute the contributory negligence sought to be established in this case.

In one of the cases cited of Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company (29 L. J. 247, Ex.), the late Mr. Justice Willes seems, to have laid it down very clearly, "Negligence is the absence of care more or less according to the circumstances." It is the circumstances that must regulate the obligation to give notice, or to do any other act which would have the effect of averting danger from those who might otherwise be exposed to it. Their Lordships, therefore, come to the conclusion that this collision in the first place was produced wholly and entirely by the fault of the Flamsteed, and that there was no negligence on the part of those in charge of the Bellerophon, at any period of that collision.

Under these circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, and also that this appeal be dismissed with costs to be paid by the appellant.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by Etherington Smith Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, June 19, 1875.

(Before Bramwell, B., Blackburn, Lush, and Quain, JJ., Pollock, and Amphlett, BB.)

The Australian Agricultural Company v. Saunders.

Marine insurance—Fire insurance—Double insurance—"Insured elsewhere"—Construction of policy.

The plaintiffs insured wool against fire with the defendants, "in any shed, or store, or station, or in transit to S. by land only, or in any shed or store, or on any wharf in S., until placed on board ship." They afterwards entered into another policy with another insurance company in these terms: "Lost or not lost at and from the river H. to S. per ship or steamers, and thence per ship or steamers to L., including the risk of craft, from the time that the wools are first waterborne, and of transshipment and landing and reshipment at S." It was a condition in the defendants' policy that if the wool was "insured elsewhere," notice of such insurance was to be given to them, otherwise the policy was to be void. No notice of this second policy was given to the defendants by the plaintiffs. The wool was burned while in warehouse at S. where it had been placed for the purpose of storage, and was waiting for reshipment.

The plaintiffs sued on the first policy for the loss of the wool.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas), that they were entitled to recover. That the second policy did not apply to keeping goods on land, but only to marine risks, that these goods were not within the meaning of the words, "transshipment, landing, and reshipment at S." while stored in warehouses there, and that there was therefore no double insurance, and consequently the goods were not "insured elsewhere" so as to make notice of the second policy necessary.

Held also, that by "insured elsewhere" was meant a specific insurance of the same risks, and that the words were not satisfied in the case of different policies upon different policies upon different risks, by the mere possibility of one overlapping the other under some possible circumstances.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Willes and Keating, JJ., sitting as a division of the Court of Common Pleas in favour of the plaintiffs, in an action brought by them on a policy of insurance against the loss by fire of some wool, which was burned while in store at Sydney, in Feb. 1870.

The plaintiffs are large shippers of wool from Australia to London, and most of it is grown up the country and brought down to Sydney for shipment. The wool comes sometimes by land to Sydney, and is thence shipped to England. It sometimes comes down the river Hunter in steamers to Sydney, and is reshipped without being landed; or it is landed from the steamers and placed in warehouses for the purpose of being pressed, and it is frequently stored whilst waiting for shipment. Wool which is to be pressed is taken to the stores of the stevedores of the ship in which it is to be loaded, and is by them pressed and warehoused. Wool received by the stevedores is considered as between the ship and shippers as being in the custody of the ship, and the stevedores charge the pressing and warehousing against the ship. The stevedores give receipts for wool received by them, which are treated by ship and shippers as equal to mates' receipts, and in exchange for them bills of lading are given on demand whether the wool is in store or on board the ship. Wool brought by steamers to Sydney by the river Hunter for shipment to England is usually removed by drays from the wharves, where it is landed from the steamers, to the store of the stevedore appointed to store and press for the ship for which the cargo is intended. At these stores all descriptions of goods are kept for shipment and other purposes, but they are principally used for storing and pressing wool for shipment.

The wool in question came in several steamers by the river Hunter to Sydney, and on being landed was taken possession of by one Moore, as agent for the plaintiffs, and conveyed to his stores to be weighed. Moore engaged a ship to carry the wool to England, and afterwards sent the wool to the stores of the stevedores of the ship, who had received authority from the master to receive wool for shipment by that ship; they received the wool, and gave the usual stevedore's receipts on behalf of the ship. Whilst the wool was in the stevedores' stores waiting for shipment the plaintiffs effected a policy of fire insurance with the defendants in these terms: "On wool in fleeces or bales in any shed or store or station, or in transit to Sydney by land only, or in any shed or store, or on any wharf in Sydney, until placed on board ship." And there was also a provision in clause 5 of the policy that "No claim shall be recoverable if the property insured be previously or subsequently insured elsewhere, unless the particulars of such insurance be notified to the company in writing, provided that upon such notice being given after the issue of the policy, it shall be optional with the company to cancel the same, returning the rateable premium for the unexpired term thereof." In Jan. 1870, the plaintiffs effected a policy of marine insurance in the Indemnity Mutual Insurance Company, as follows: "Lost or not lost at and from the river Hunter to Sydney, per ship or steamers, and thence per ship or steamers to London, including the risk of craft, from the time that the wools are first waterborne, and of transshipment and landing and reshipment at Newcastle and Sydney." No notice of this insurance was given to the defendants' company. After both these insurances had been effected, and while both the policies were in force, viz., on Feb. 9th 1870, a fire took place at the stevedores' stores, and 182 of the plaintiffs' bales were burned. Other bales of the plaintiffs which had been at other stores were afterwards shipped on board the said ship, and bills of lading were given in respect thereof in return for the stevedores' receipts. The carriage of the wool in question down the river Hunter to Sydney was under a distinct contract from the contract for carriage from Sydney to London. The plaintiffs sued the defendants on their fire policy for the loss and obtained judgment in their favour, against which judgment this appeal was brought.

The question raised was whether the first or the second policy applied, and, if the latter, whether the defendants were not relieved from all liability by the operation of clause 5. The court below held that the second policy did not insure the goods on land, but was a marine policy, simply covering, in addition to the perils of the seas, only such risks as arose upon the loading and discharge of the vessels and the necessary transshipment incidental to the voyage.

Manisty, Q.C. (Edwards, Q.C. with him) for the defendants.—The question arises here from the plaintiffs having effected two policies, first, the fire policy with the defendants, and secondly, what may be called the marine policy with the Indemnity Mutual Insurance Company. There being a proviso against double insurance without notice, the first question is, whether the marine policy covered the same risk as the fire policy, because, if it did, then, notice not having been given to the defendants of the second insurance, they are not liable under the provisions of their own policy. It is therefore admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants on the Liverpool policy, unless the marine policy covered the same risk. Looking at the words of the latter policy, it is an insurance which attached when the goods were loaded on craft in the river Hunter, and continued while they were at Sydney, and during transshipment, and during the voyage to London (Pelly v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 Burr. 341). [BLACKBURN, J.—The marine policy cannot attach until it is destined for a particular ship.] We contend that the policy attached when the goods were put on the ship in the river, and continued while they were being transshipped at Sydney; and that by the custom and practice, they were then to be considered just as if on board ship. The practice necessitated the temporary warehousing of the wool before loading it again on the ships for England, and the risk when so warehoused is covered by the words of the policy "transshipment, and landing, and reshipment."

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the plaintiffs.—The Liverpool policy, it is admitted covers the loss, unless it is taken out of it by the operation of clause 5, which is that if the assured "insured elsewhere," the policy was not to hold good unless notice was given. The plaintiffs' contentions are: First, they were not insured elsewhere; that is, the loss was not covered by the marine policy; secondly, if it were possibly covered, that does not constitute an insurance elsewhere within the meaning of the policy:

Harrison v. Ellis, 7 E. & B., 465;
Pearson v. The Commercial Union Assurance Company, ante, vol. 2, p. 100; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 279; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 548.

As to Pelly v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (ubi sup.), if there had been an affreightment from the river to London, then, perhaps, transshipment being necessary, this warehousing might have been held to be incidental to the transshipment. But the case is different here. They were warehoused for the convenience of the owners, and if the goods were taken to a warehouse for any purpose, not being part of the actual transshipment, then it is contended the marine policy would not apply; secondly, the provision in clause 5 does not apply to cases where the goods are only possibly, but where they are specifically insured. Here even if possibly the policies might overlap, there is no specific insurance, and so the plaintiffs need not have given notice, and when could notice as a question of fact have been given? The clause manifestly points to a similar description of policy to the fire policy, and does not mean a marine policy.

Manisty, Q.C. in reply.—The plaintiffs were bound to give notice, whatever the effect might be; they were, in the words of the clause, "insured elsewhere," and they must give it after the fire if they could not give it before. The real question is, did the marine policy, in fact, cover the risk, and if it did, it matters not whether it did so accidentally or not. Crompton, J., in his judgment in Harrison v. Ellis (ubi sup.), shows that the ground of the judgment is that there would have been in fact a double insurance. So in Pearson v. The Commercial Union Assurance Company (ubi sup.), the deviation was held not within the scope of the policy, because the jury had expressly found that the ship was moored in the river for an unreasonable time, and for a particular purpose unconnected with the transit.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. To begin with, I am very clearly of opinion that no action could be maintained against the underwriters for indemnity on the marine policy in respect of this loss. The words in it are very clear, "Lost or not lost, at and from the river Hunter to Sydney, per ship or steamers, and thence per ship or steamers to London, including the risk of craft, from the time that the wools are first waterborne and of transshipment and landing and reshipment at Sydney," that is, including the case where the wools are taken from one ship to another, and where it is necessary to land them for that purpose, and afterwards the risk of reshipping. This, it is quite clear to me, does not include a loss by fire of the goods when warehoused on land, which is no part of landing or transshipment, and it is so clear that one need only read the words themselves to perceive it to be so. But it is said nevertheless, that the wools were virtually on board the ship at the time of loss, and so within the policy. In point of fact, however, they were not on board ship, nor were they in course of the act of reshipment. I am therefore very clearly of opinion that this particular loss could not be recovered against the underwriters on the marine policy. But then, the assured was not to recover if any other insurance were effected and not notified to the Liverpool company. Now, as far as mere words go, there might here be said to be an isurance elsewhere, but was there in fact? Mr. Manisty says that the words "insure elsewhere" must be an insurance as to the whole or a portion of the risks in the policy sued on. If so, in my opinion, this is not a case of such double insurance, because no action could have been maintained on the Marine Insurance policy in respect of this loss, but the action could be maintained on the policy in question. Then it was said here that there was a possibility of the goods being within the risk covered by both policies. For my part I doubt whether such a possibility would be sufficient; for to come within the provision, there must be such a double insurance as that the underwriters in the one case would have the benefit of the other. But in my opinion there is no evidence here that the risk in the two policies did overlap one another. It is suggested as the policy on wool to Sydney was in these terms, "on wool in fleeces or bales, in any shed, or store, or station, or in transit to Sydney by land only, or in any shed or store, or on any wharf in Sydney until placed on board ship," that landing and reshipment might involve putting the goods on a wharf, so that while there if a fire occurred, there would be a loss within the scope of the policy. The answer is first, that there is no evidence that there could be such a mode of landing and reshipment as one process, going on as a continuous process in the manner supposed, nor do I believe that it exists; and that being so, the possible case which has been put is therefore a possible case as to which we have no evidence of its possibility in point of fact. Another answer is, that if it were so, the marine policy would cover the loss, and the fire policy would not. It seems, therefore, that the loss by fire is not within the marine policy for the reasons given; and next, although it is possible a case might occur in which the loss might be in both policies, yet first there was no evidence that such could take place at Sydney; and secondly, if it were possible there, it would show that the case was not in the fire policy at all, but in the marine policy, and so in neither case would there be a double insurance.

Blackburn, J.—I also think that the judgment below should be affirmed. The fire policy is on "wool in fleeces or bales, in any shed, or store, or station, or in transit to Sydney by land only, or in any shed, or store, or on any wharf in Sydney until placed on board ship." The wool was, in fact brought to Sydney and stored there, and before it was put on board ship was burnt, and so it is, I think, quite clearly a loss for which the insurers were liable unless they are saved by the 5th clause of the policy, which is to the effect that the policy was to be void if the wool were insured elsewhere without notice given to the insurance company. Now, I think, taking that and the average clause together, that it is clear what is meant and if the marine policy did insure the goods on shore then the plaintiffs ought to have given notice of the insurance to the defendants, but such a construction of the clause would be too much strained if we were to say this notice was equally necessary if the second insurance was of a different character to the first. It must I think, have been a second insurance against fire, and I do not think that if there were only an accidental and possible overflapping of the policies, this was contemplated in the words "insured elsewhere." Then arises the question does the marine policy, in fact, cover the goods in the warehouse at Sydney? The facts are that the goods came down the river Hunter to Sydney, and were put in Moore's warehouse there until it was convenient to secure a ship in which to forward them to England. Thence they were sent to the stevedore's warehouse, and there they were burned. They would not primâ facie be covered by the marine policy when they were on land, but the words of the policy go on to say "including the risk of transshipment and landing and reshipment at Sydney," Now I do not think that it was a deviation, landing the goods at Sydney, so as to vitiate the insurance on that account, but it is very difficult to say that the underwriters in a marine policy are liable for a fire on shore. It would require evidence of a very strong custom to induce me to think that the goods were just in the same position as if on board ship, and there is none here to establish this contention. I think, therefore, that "insured elsewhere" means specifically insured, and against the same risks and under the same conditions, and at the same time, and not a mere possibility of a wholly different insurance overlapping. For this reason and upon the facts stated, I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

Lush, J.—I also think that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed upon the ground that the goods were not insured elsewhere in any other office against fire "in any shed, or store, or station, or on any wharf in Sydney." I do not think any of those events were ever covered by the marine policy. It says: [The learned judge then read the principal clauses.] Now I think this means landing in the course of the voyage as incidental to it merely, and as a means of transshipment which would be necessary from the river craft to the ship. Here, as I understand the facts, the goods came down to Sydney in several instalments, and were stored in warehouses until it was convenient to send them on to London. If so, it was not a landing and reshipment within the meaning of the policy at all, and so this disposes of the contention that the goods were just in the same position as regards the policy as if on board ship. As to the second question it does not arise in my opinion, for the marine policy ceased to be in force from the moment of the goods being landed as described. But I will go further than this, and say that I do not think that a policy which in certain events may possibly overlap the former one is such a one as that the assured would have under the provision in the defendants' policy to give notice of it to the underwriters.

Quain, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the first question is what the risk undertaken by the Indemnity Company was, and I find it to be in the words of the policy of transshipment, landing, and reshipment. Now first, I think that the goods lost were not being transshipped, landed, or reshipped within the meaning of these words; nor secondly, do the facts found extend it in the present case by reason of any custom. There may perhaps be some customs so notorious as to qualify the plain meaning of words as simple and intelligible as these, but here there is no such notorious custom found to exist in the case. In Lord Mansfield's words, I should define the risk as being that which the insurers knew would arise from the ordinary and known course of trade, and the custom must be one so notorious and universal that it always made it necessary for the particular course to be adopted, which was in fact adopted. Now so far from this being so here, I find in paragraph 7 of the case it is stated that sometimes this is done and sometimes that, and they are not therefore invariable and necessary practices, and consequently do not come within the words of the policy. On the second point I agree with the rest of the court, because I think that what was intended by the 5th clause is a certain definite policy, and not a mere contingent risk. It was not clear that the goods would be landed and warehoused at Sydney, and so this was not in my opinion an insurance elsewhere within the meaning of the condition so as to require notice of it to be given.

Pollock, B.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is whether by the marine policy having been effected it can be said that the goods previously covered by the Liverpool policy were then insured elsewhere. I refer to the marine policy itself to see, and I quite agree with what was said by Willes, J., in the court below that it was meant to cover marine risks in a marine transit. It is reasonable to assume that when that was entered into the intention was that the goods should go to England. Then what did actually occur was not something incidental to the marine transit, but something which made a break in the course of the water transit, and put it into the power of the agent at Sydney to send the goods elsewhere. It is true that the goods when burned were in the hands of a stevedore, but then there had been a distinct break in the voyage when they came to be put into his warehouse. Having disposed of that, there is therefore one other point only. If the second policy did chance to overlap the former one, could it be said that the goods were thereby insured elsewhere so as to absolve the defendants altogether? On this point I agree with my brother Bramwell. These conditions had been of late inserted into fire policies with the object of enabling the insurers to know the character of the risk, and that the parties had the real value of the goods insured. But it would manifestly be quite immaterial to the underwriters of a fire policy whether they knew or not that the assured had a wide marine policy also, even if the two policies might possibly in some event overlap. On both grounds I think the judgment ought to be affirmed.

Amphlett, B.—I am of the same opinion. On the main point I quite agree with the rest of the court, and will not repeat what they have said. On the second question, if we think that the marine policy did not attach, the second point of the defendants is no longer open because paragraph 21 of the case admitting that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover unless they are deprived of this remedy by means of having effected the marine policy excludes it. That clause could have no operation if they had not insured the risk under the marine policy. But I agree that the plaintiffs had no double remedy, and say further that, in my opinion, in no event could there be one under these policies, or could the policies overlap, because the only event within the marine policy would be a fire happening while the goods were on shore for the express purpose of being reshipped. But if so the words in the fire policy "on any wharf in Sydney" would not mean this, because the goods would be considered in law as on the ship while they were being shipped.

Judgment affirmed.

Booty of war—Reference to Admiralty Court—Non-payment of part of booty—Distribution—Jurisdiction.

When the Crown grants to captors booty of war and

(a) This case cannot be called a "maritime law case," but it deals with a subject which is intimately connected with prize law, and turns to some extent upon jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty as a prize court, and it was hence thought desirable to insert it here.

The origin of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty as a prize court is very doubtful. From the reign of Charles II. it has derived its jurisdiction as a prize court entirely from a commission from the Crown issued at the commencement of each war to the Lords of the Admiralty. Whether prior to that reign the court exercised jurisdiction as a right incident to the office of Lord High Admiral and his deputy, there appear to be no documents in existence to show. It seems, however, probable that prize jurisdiction was originally inherent in the office of the Admiral, and that special commissions calling forth the jurisdiction are of comparatively modern institution. Prior to the reign of Elizabeth England was seldom at peace with her neighbours, and, although the wars may not have been of any importance, it appears by the State papers that there were perpetual captures of ships by British vessels; in fact, before there was a regularly established fleet belonging to the Crown, the captains of ships do not seem to have waited for a declaration of war; they seized any foreign vessel where there was a pretext for quarrel. In this state of things the services of the Admiralty Court, or some other tribunal, were constantly called into requisition to decide the question of prize or no prize, The Admiralty Court was not the only tribunal which formerly investigated questions of prize, In A.D. 1343 a British ship having seized and brought in another ship as prize, an order was issued by Edward III. to his Chancellor and council to call the parties before them, inform themselves of the facts, and render complete and speedy justice to the by order in council made under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 2 refers the claims of all parties whomsoever to the property captured to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, who is to take into consideration any capture that may have been made of any property during the operations by any of the claimants and is to make such order as to him shall seem right both in regard to the persons who parties (see Rymer's Fœdera, vol. v., p. 376). Again, in the reign of Henry VI., in the year 1426, a proclamation was issued to all sheriffs of counties, by which it was declared that nothing taken upon the seas in whatever manner was to be distributed, separated, or sold on the sea, or in any port or harbour into which they were brought, but were to be kept entire until the Council of the King, the Chancellor of England, the Admiral of England, or his deputy-general for the time being, should be certified of the above prize, and duly informed if the goods there taken belonged to friends or enemies; and that they (the council, &c.) being certified, should give good and quick attention thereto; that it was a good test whether goods belong to friends or enemies if the persons from whom they are taken were brought to shore and put to ransom or not; and it was directed that persons capturing goods and bringing them ashore without the persons from whom they were captured should be imprisoned until it was known to whom the goods belonged: (Rymer's Fœdera, vol. x., p. 368). These two instances show clearly that at that date the Admiralty Court was not the sole court, and hence it is not probable that a distinct prize commission then existed. This view is again corroborated by the Instructions issued by Henry VIII. to the Admiral on the occasion of the invasion of France in 1512 (see Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xiii., p. 329; Robinson's Collectanea Marittima, p. 1). These instructions greatly consist of extracts from the Black Book of the Admiralty, and would seem to show that the Admiral himself dealt with prizes taken by the fleet, and dealt with them of his inherent right: (see paragraphs 19, 20, 21; the latter two being translations from the Black Book; see Twiss's Black Book of the Admiralty, vol. i., p. 23, sects. 8, 9.) The Black Book itself very clearly indicates the position and powers of the Admiral, and yet no mention there occurs of distinct prize powers. It is pretty clear that in the reign of Elizabeth the Admiralty jurisdiction, both instance and prize, had become pretty well defined, for we find that a commission was issued on Jan. 30, 1585, to two civilians) Dr. Valentine Dale and Dr. Julius Cæsar) to execute the Admiralty jurisdiction during the vacancy of the office of Lord High Admiral (see State Papers, Domest. Eliz., vol. ccxxxvii., fol. 66; vol. clxxvi.), This commission was not a special prize commission, and in fact, makes no mention of prize as distinct from any other part of the Admiralty jurisdiction. The war with Spain commenced in 1586, and in 1587 and 1588 the Spanish Armada was prepared and sailed for England; Lord Howard of Effingham was then Lord High Admiral, but there is no trace to be found of any separate prize, commission being issued to hear and adjudge prize causes. Between this period and the reign of Charles II., although there are many commissions existing giving power to the High Admiral to will and require the judge of the Admiralty Court to issue letters of marque and others appointing divers persons to hear appeals from the Admiralty Court in prize causes, there is no trace of a separate prize commission, and the ordinary commission of the Lord High Admiral and of the judge makes no mention of prize (see Rymer's Fœdera, vol. xx., pp. 115, 1628; vol. xviii., p. 1052; vol. xix., p. 300). The first trace of any special authority in prize matters is to be found during the Commonwealth, when an Act or ordinance was passed by the Parliament (April 17, 1649, cap. 21) directing that the Admiralty Court should proceed against all captures, taken from persons supporting the King and from foreigners his friends, as lawful prize; and in pursuance of this Act an order was issued in 1850 which is recorded in the Admiralty Registry as "an order of the pretended Parliament in 1650 for the judges of the Admiralty to proceed to the adjudication of the French ships and goods taken by the fleet." Then came the Restoration, and at the commencement of the first war in the reign of Charles II. (with the Dutch in 1664), the office of Lord High Admiral of England and Ireland was in commission, and so far as can now be ascertained no special prize commission was issued. Shortly afterwards James, Duke of York, was created Lord High Admiral of England, Ireland, and Scotland; this is the first instance on record of the appointment of one Lord High Admiral for all three Kingdoms; and in 1672, when the second war in that reign with the Dutch commenced, we find for the first time a special commission issued to the Lord High Admiral authorising him to require the Admiralty Court of England to proceed to the adjudication of prize causes, and this has continued until recent times. The cause of this change, if change there was, was probably to enable the Crown to keep the prize jurisdiction in the hands of the English Admiralty Court, and stop the exercise of that jurisdiction by the Irish and Scotch courts. As the judges of the Admiralty Courts were considered as lieutenants of the admirals, the directing of one only to exercise the prize jurisdiction would have the effect of excluding the others. The Irish and Scotch courts have nevertheless continued to claim to exercise prize jurisdiction, but with little success, as the practical result of these commissions has been to bring all prize causes before the English court. Since 1672 prize commissions have always been issued at the commencement of each year, and the Admiralty Court has not exercised prize jurisdiction until such a commission has been issued. Hence it has come to be generally supposed that the prize jurisdiction is not inherent, but is called forth by the prize commission, and this opinion is expressed by Lord Mansfield in Lindo v. Rodney (Dougl. 572): but it must be remembered that that learned judge searched the records whilst they were all in confusion, without indexes, and before the calendars of State papers had come into existence. The opinion that prize jurisdiction was inherent was clearly entertained by the judges of the Vice-Admiralty Courts first created in our West Indian and American colonies, for they claimed to and did exercise this jurisdiction without any special prize commission, and by virtue of the general commission only, which makes no mention of prize. The commissions of these courts were (in A.D. 1801) revoked by order of the King, and new commissions issued without holding the prize jurisdiction, and all Vice-Admiralty Court commissions are now issued in this form. Prize jurisdiction was only given to certain courts, and then only by virtue of a special prize commission issued to the Lords of the Admiralty, and this continues to the present time.

The mode of giving prize jurisdiction has hitherto been as follows:—The Crown first declares war, and an order in council is issued commanding general reprisals, and the seizure of all ships, vessels, and goods belonging to the hostile state or its subjects, or others inhabiting its countries, territories, and the bringing of "the same to judgment in such Court of Admiralty within Her Majesty's dominions, possessions, or colonies, as shall be duly commissionated to take cognisance thereof." And the order continues: "And to that end Her Majesty's Advocate-General, with the Advocate of Her Majesty in her Office of Admiralty, are forthwith to prepare the draft of a commission, and present the same to Her Majesty at this board, authorising the Commissioners for executing the Office of Lord High Admiral to will and require the High Court of Admiralty of England, and the Lieutenant and Judge of the said court, his surrogate and surrogates, as also the several Courts of Admiralty within Her Majesty's dominions, which shall be duly commissionated, to take cognisance of, and judicially proceed upon, all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships, vessels, and goods that are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same, and according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods as shall belong to the" hostile state, &c.; "and they are likewise to prepare and lay before Her Majesty a draft of such instructions as may be proper to be sent to the said several Courts of Admiralty in Her Majesty's dominions, possessions, and colonies for their guidance herein." Such a commission is thereupon prepared thus:—

"V. R.

"VICTORIA, by the grace of God, &c.—

"To our right trusty, &c. (naming the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty) our Commissioners for executing the Office of Lord High Admiral of our United Kingdom are, and the proportions in which such persons are, entitled to share them . . . reserving, however, to H. M. the right to direct the rates or scale of distribution according to which the property or the proceeds thereof is to be repaid to the several ranks of the force or forces to which such property may be adjudged, and the court proceeds to adjudge certain claimants entitled to share, and in pursuance thereof sums of money on account of the booty are distributed among the successful claimants; the High Court has no jurisdiction, on the application of the successful claimants, complaining that the Government have refused to pay over and distribute the remainder of the booty, to order that such remainder be brought into the registry of the High Court, and abide the event of the suit; under such an order of reference the High Court has no power of distribution.

THIS was a motion, made to the Court of Admiralty on behalf of Major-General Colin Mackenzie, C.B., president of "The Select Prize Committee of the Saugor and Nerbudda Field Force," duly appointed for the protection of the interests of parties entitled to the Banda and Kirwee Booty, and on behalf of others, captors or their representatives, upon the facts stated in the petition set out below, "for an order that the petitioners should have leave to enter appearances as interveners or plaintiffs in the cause or in either character, and further to order that a citation issue from the court calling upon the Most Honourable Robert Arthur Talbot, Marquis of Salisbury, Her Majesty's then present Secretary of State for India in Council to appear and show cause why a monition should not issue against him as Her Majesty's Secretary of State in Council for India from the court monishing him to bring into the registry of this court, the said principal sums claimed by the petitioners (see petition below) and also to account for and to bring into the registry all interest due upon the said principal sums in order that the same might abide the event of this suit."

The petition above-mentioned was, so far as is material, as follows:

1. That in the year 1857 a rebellion broke out in several parts of the territories belonging to the East India Company in India, and amongst others in those parts of their territories known as Central India and Bandelkund for the suppression of which a military force was organised by the Madras Government, and placed by it under the command of the original plaintiff in this cause Lieutenant-General Sir George Cornish Whitlock then brigadier-general.

2. That the said force known as the Saugor and Nerbudda Field Force was composed partly of troops in Her Majesty's service, and partly of troops in the service of the Honourable the East India Company, and was during the year 1858 employed in operations against the Mahratta chiefs of Kirwee which resulted in the capture in that year of their persons at Kirwee and of the town of Kirwee on the 5th and 6th June respectively with moveable property of very great value.

3. That the said Mahratta chiefs, Narrain Rao, and Madho Rao were representatives of the dynasty of the of Great Britain and Ireland, and dominions thereunto belonging, and to the commissioners for executing that office for the time being, greeting—Whereas, we having taken into consideration the injurious and hostile proceedings of (name of sovereign or state) as set forth in the declaration of this date, issued by our command; and we, therefore, having determined to take such measures as are necessary for vindicating the honour of our crown and for procuring reparation and satisfaction, do, by and with the advice of our Privy Council, order that general reprisals be granted against the ships, vessels, and goods of (name of sovereign or state) and of his subjects or others inhabiting within any of his countries, territories, or dominions, so that our fleets and ships shall and may lawfully seize all ships, vessels, and goods belonging to (name of sovereign or state), or to his subjects or others inhabiting within his countries, territories, or dominions, and bring the same to judgment in any of the Courts of Admiralty within our dominions, which shall be duly commissionated. These are therefore to authorise, and we do hereby authorise and enjoin you our said commissioners now and for the time being, and any three or more of you, to will and require our High Court of Admiralty of England and the Lieutenant and Judge of the said court, and his surrogates, and also the several Courts of Admiralty within our dominions which shall be duly commissionated; and they are hereby authorised and required to take cognisance of, and judicially to proceed upon, all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships, vessels, and goods already seized and taken, and which hereafter shall be seized and taken, and hear and determine the same, according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations, and to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods as shall belong to (name of sovereign or state), or to any of his subjects or others inhabiting within any of his countries, territories, or dominions. In witness whereof we have caused our Great Seal of our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to be put and affixed to these presents.

"Given at our Court at , the day of , in the year of our Lord 187 , and in the year of our reign."

Thereupon the Lords Commissioners issue their warrant to the High Court of Admiralty in a form similar to the following:—

"By the Commissioners for executing the Office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

"Her Majesty having been pleased, under the Great Seal of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, bearing date the day of , 187 , to authorise us to the effect following, as by the commission itself herewith sent you to remain of record in the registry of the High Court of Admiralty of England doth more at large appear:—These are in Her Majesty's name and ours to will and require the High Court of Admiralty of England and you, the Lieutenant and Judge of the said court, and your surrogate and surrogates, and you are hereby authorised and required to take cognisance of and to judicially proceed upon all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships, vessels, and goods that are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same and according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods as shall belong to the (name of sovereign or state), or his subjects or to any others inhabiting within any of his countries, territories, or dominions which shall be brought before you for trial and condemnation. And for doing so this shall be your warrant.

To the Vice-Admiralty Courts selected for prize jurisdiction, a similar warrant is issued, the main difference being that a copy only of the commission accompanies it. Upon these warrants the prize jurisdiction has hitherto been, and in the case of Vice-Admiralty Courts still will be, based. In the case of the High Court of Admiralty of England the necessity for the special commission and warrants have been done away with by the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), by the 4th section of which it is enacted that "The High Court of Admiralty of England shall have jurisdiction throughout Her Majesty's dominions as a prize court." The jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court is now vested in the High Court of Justice, and prize causes having been within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, the Admiralty Division will have exclusive cognisance of all prize causes: (See The Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, ss. 16 & 34.)—ED.

Peishwas being the adopted sons of Maharajah Benaik Rao of Poona, who for a time reigned as Peishwa of the Mahrattas, and who was subsequently settled at Kirwee by the East India Company with the title of Maharajah, and a grant of the surrounding territory. That the said Narrain Rao and Madho Rao after the death of their adopted father continued to reside in the palace at Kirwee, with a retinue of 200 Sepoys, 25 cavalry, and 4 guns, and were residing there at the time of their capture as aforesaid. That shortly after the breaking out of the Indian rebellion the said Narrain Rao and Madho Rao joined in the said rebellion, and caused themselves to be proclaimed Peishwas of the Mahrattas in India, levied troops, issued proclamations for the collection of revenue and actually collected such revenue in Kirwee, and the surrounding districts, and established themselves, and acted in all respects as independent sovereigns for the space of more than six months previous to their capture.

3. That the said Narrain Rao and Madho Rao were shortly after their capture tried before Frank Otway Mayne, Esquire, C.B., under a Special Act No. 11 of 1857 of the Legislative Council of India, and were by him convicted and sentenced under the said Act as having waged war against the Queen and the Government of India.

4. That at the time of the capture of the said Narrain Rao and Madho Rao, and of Kirwee the said Narrain Rao and Madho Rao were possessed of very considerable moveable property, and that the greater portion of the property captured as hereinbefore mentioned belonged to them, and consisted in part of the following choses in action which form the principal subject of the present application namely:

(1.) A debt due from the East India Company to the said chiefs amounting to 2,560,000 rupees, which sum had been advanced by the said chiefs to the East India Company in 1854 and 1855 on the Public Works Loan, and for which the said East India Company had given the said chiefs by way of acknowledgment and security forty-two promissory notes promising to repay the same, with interest at the rate of £5 per centum per annum, and which notes were in the Calcutta Gazette of the 9th Jan. 1858 notified to have been stopped in the books of the Accountant-General's office on the 7th of that month, as the property of chiefs in open rebellion against the State, and were not dealt with up to the time of the capture of the said chiefs, and are believed to have been destroyed in Kirwee at the time of the capture thereof, there being no trace of their existence from the time of such capture up to the present time.

(2.) A debt due to the said chiefs from the said East India of 2,000,000 rupees being the amount of a further subscription of the said chiefs to the said Public Works Loan in May 1857 for which no notes had been furnished to the said chiefs.

(3.) Certain debts due to the said chiefs from private individuals which were collected after their surrender by the civil officers of the East India Company, and which realised R's.119,149 13a. 1p.

(4.) And also of certain jewels belonging to the said chiefs which were sold by the civil officers of the said company, and realised R's.12,782 5a.

6. That at the time of the capture of Kirwee and of the said chiefs all prize or booty of war captured in India in operations, in which the forces of Her Majesty took part was the property of the Sovereign, and not of the East India Company, and that the above public debts due to said chiefs are prize or booty of war, and were, in fact, specifically included in a return of all the Banda and Kirwee captured property transmitted by the Secretary to the North-Western Provinces to the Secretary to the India Government on the 11th Nov. 1859.

7. That previously to the said capture the Right Honourable Viscount Canning, as Governor-General of India, published in the Calcutta Gazette, two general orders in relation to booty of war, namely, (1) a general order dated 27th Nov. 1857 sanctioning the appointment of prize agents, and giving instructions as to the interest of the troops in booty captured, of which said general order the court of directors, in a military despatch dated the 31st March 1858, wrote in the following terms which were approved of by the President of the Board of Control. "We concur in the views announced in your general order of the 27th Nov. 1857 on the question of claim on the part of the troops to have granted them as prize the property belonging to the State, and that belonging to private individuals recovered from the mutineers. We also fully approve of your recommendation that property taken by the troops, which is neither claimed on behalf of the State nor claimed, and identified by individuals, who may establish their loyalty should be considered as prize. We shall accordingly as soon as we are informed by you of the necessary particulars, make application to the Crown in the usual form praying a Royal Grant of the same as prize." (2) A general order dated the 29th Jan. 1858, declaring "that all moveable property of the description ordinarily distributable belonging or which might reasonably be presumed to belong, to rebels, or mutineers, and which has been or should be captured by the troops engaged in suppressing the rebellion, might be fairly treated as prize, and that he had recommended the honourable court of the East India Company to adopt the necessary measures for obtaining Her Majesty's sanction to the distribution of the said property accordingly."

8. That after the termination of the said military operations Lieutenant-General Sir George Cornish Whitlock and the other officers and troops forming the Saugor and Nerbudda Force, and Lord Clyde, as Commander-in-Chief in India, with his personal staff in the field at the time of the said captures, applied to have the proceeds of the said booty distributed amongst them, but the officers and troops belonging to other divisions of the army or armies employed in suppressing the mutiny in that part of India, having preferred claims to shares in such prize or booty of war the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury after having given several decisions adverse to the original plaintiff, and those whom he represented on the 8th June, 1864, made a minute wherein it is stated that they, the said Lords, had "caused a draft of an order in Council to be prepared, which was read at their Board signifying the pleasure of Her Majesty, that the booty of war captured during the operations for the suppression of the rebellion in Central India and which had devolved to Her Majesty in virtue of Her prerogative, should be granted to the forces engaged in those operations, and referring the claims of all parties thereto to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty under the authority of 3 and 4 Vict. c. 65, with directions that he should make such order as to him should seem right."

9. That by an order in Council dated the 10th June 1864, which is the order referred to in the said minute Her Majesty was pleased by the advice of Her Privy Council to refer to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, all claims to the property captured during the aforesaid operations in the terms following—

"Whereas it has been represented to Her Majesty that in the year 1857, a rebellion took place within that part of Her Majesty's East India dominions known as Central India. That land forces consisting of Her Majesty's troops and of troops of the East India Company were for the suppression of the same organised in three columns termed respectively the Central India Field Force, the Saugor and Nerbudda Field Force, and the Rajpootana Field Force under the command respectively of Major-General now General Sir Hugh Rose, G.C.B., Major-General Whitlock, now Lieutenant-General Sir G. C. Whitlock, K.C.B., and Major-General Sir Henry Roberts, since deceased, and that in course of the operations which followed certain property was captured at the places undermentioned, namely, Ihansi, Kalpee, and Gwalior, by the force under the command of the said Sir Hugh Rose, of the estimated value of 490,000 rupees, at Kirwee and Banda, by the force under the command of the said Sir George Whitlock, of the estimated value of 7,000,000 rupees, and at Ahwah Kotah and Buneos, by the force under the command af the said Major-General Sir Henry Roberts of the estimated value of 1,82.000 rupees. And whereas the said property belongs to Her Majesty in right of Her royal prerogative. And whereas Her Majesty has signified her gracious pleasure that the said property, and the proceeds thereof shall be granted to and distributed amongst the forces concerned in the operations above referred to in such manner as may be hereinafter determined. And whereas it has been proposed for the consideration of Her Majesty that the said proceeds of such property should be thrown into a common fund, and be distributed equally among the forces under the command of the said Sir Hugh Rose, Sir George Whitlock, and Sir Henry Roberts respectively. And whereas the prize agents of the force under the command of the said Sir George Whitlock have preferred a claim that the said property captured at Kirwee and Banda, should be granted exclusively to the force under the command of the said Sir George Whitlock. And whereas the late General Lord Clyde preferred a claim on behalf of himself and his personal staff, that he and they should participate in the same on the ground that he, as Commander-in-Chief in India, directed the operations which led to the capture thereof. And whereas the said Sir Hugh Rose had preferred a claim that he and the force under his command should also participate in the same on the ground that such force co-operated in the actions or movements of the troops which led to the capture of the said property. And whereas Major-General Smith has preferred a claim for participation in the same on behalf of himself, and a brigade under his command in the event of the claim of the force under the command of the said Sir Hugh Rose being allowed, the said Major-General Smith stating that the brigade under his command was detached from the before mentioned force under the command of the said Major-General Sir Henry Roberts, and co-operated in the actions or movements of the force under the command of Major-General Sir Hugh Rose. And whereas a claim has also been preferred by Colonel William Middleton, on behalf of himself and a force under his command known as the Futteypore moveable column for a participation in the same property. And whereas other claims may be preferred by or on behalf of the same or other persons to the property or some part thereof captured during the aforesaid operations. And whereas by an Act passed in the 4th year of the reign of Her Majesty entitled 'An Act to improve the practice, and extend the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty of England,' it was enacted that the said High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all matters and questions concerning booty of war or the distribution thereof, which it shall please Her Majesty by the advice of Her Privy Council to refer to the said court, and in all matters so referred the court shall proceed as in cases of war, and the judgment of the court therein shall be binding upon all parties concerned. And whereas it is Her Majesty's pleasure to refer under the authority of the said recited Act all claims to share in the property captured during the aforesaid operations, and in the proceeds thereof to the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty of England. Now, therefore, Her Majesty is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, that the claims of all parties whomsoever to the property captured during the aforesaid operations, and the proceeds thereof be referred to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, who shall take into consideration if it shall appear to him necessary for the purposes of justice any capture that may have been made of any property during the said operations by any of the claimants, and shall make such order as to him shall seem right both in regard to the persons who are and the proportions, in which such persons are entitled to share therein and to the costs and expenses incurred in relation thereto by the respective claimants, whether before or subsequently to this order, reserving, however, to Her Majesty the right to direct the rates and scales of distribution according to which the said property or the proceeds thereof shall be paid to the several ranks of the force or forces to which such shall be adjudged."

10. That in obedience to and for carrying out the purposes of the reference made by the said order in Council, this suit was instituted, and after a lengthened hearing of the claims therein preferred to share in the said booty, judgment was on the 30th June 1866, delivered by the then judge of this court, whereby he pronounced the personal representatives of the late General Lord Clyde and the officers of his staff personal as well as general, who were in the field at the time were entitled to share in the booty captured at Banda and Kirwee in April and June 1858, and subject to this right he awarded the whole of the said booty to Lieutenant-General Sir George Cornish Whitlock and the force under his command called the Saugor and Nerbudda Field Force, including among the latter the officers and troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Keating and any other troops left by General Whitlock on his march, who, at the time of the capture formed a portion of his division, and were still under his command, and he disallowed all other claims to the said booty.

11. That in conformity with orders issued by the East India Company, all the said prize or booty of war including the sums payable or received on the said public and private debts due to the said chiefs was handed over to or taken possession of or retained by the said East India Company until such time as the same should become distributable as prize amongst the captors, and remained under the custody of or were retained by the said East India Company, until the transfer under 21 and 22 Vict. c. 106 of the Government of India from the East India Company to Her Majesty the Queen.

12. That upon the said transfer of the Government of India to Her Majesty the Queen the said prize or booty of war, and all the liabilities in respect of the same including the obligation to pay the said public debts, came under the custody and control of or were transferred to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council, who is liable to account for the same to your petitioners, and those whom they represent as the sole grantees of Her Majesty the Queen of the same.

13. That since the said order of this court of the 30th June 1866, part only of the proceeds of the said prize or booty of war has been paid to the parties entitled thereto or reserved on account of unclaimed shares according to the said judgment of this court, namely, two principal sums with interest due thereon that is to say:—

First, a sum of 5,550,000 rupees specifically named in a Royal Warrant of Distribution (Rs.4,854,664 15a. 1p. thereof being for principal and the residue for interest due on such principal) which said Warrant of Distribution is dated the 22nd Nov. 1866, reciting amongst other things the captures of the said towns of Banda and Kirwee, and that on the occupation thereof property was captured which had been since duly sold, and the sale proceeds have been realised by the prize agents employed for collecting, selling, and realising the said booty, or have been otherwise realised or are about to be realised amounting, or computed to amount with interest after deducting costs to the sum of 55 lacs 50,000 rupees or thereabouts and reciting the said Order in Council of the 10th June 1864, and the said judgment delivered in this cause on the 30th June 1866, Her Majesty was pleased to grant to Her Secretary of State for India in Council for the time being all the aforesaid booty mentioned to have been captured at or in the said towns of Banda and Kirwee, and the proceeds thereof as aforesaid in trust for the use of the personal representative or representatives of the late Lord Clyde, formerly, Sir Colin Campbell, the Commander-in-Chief, and his staff personal as well as general, who were in the field at the time, and the said Major-General Sir George Cornish Whitlock, and the officers and men belonging to the forces engaged in the said captures as aforesaid including the troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Keating and any other troops left by General Whitlock on his march, and who, at the time of the captures, formed a portion of his division, and were still under his command such booty and proceeds to be distributed by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India in Council, for the time being or by any other person or persons he might appoint in the manner in the said warrant after directed.

Secondly, a sum of Rs.743,829 1a. 2p., namely, Rs.523,253 4a. 6p. for principal and Rs.220,565 12a. 8p. for interest thereon which is not specifically named in the said warrant of distribution, and was not previous to the date thereof comprised in the amended returns made by the India Government of the prize or booty of war to the captors.

14. That in addition to the four several sums claimed and referred to in the 5th paragraph of this petition the following further sums for or in respect of prize or booty of war so granted to the captors as aforesaid by Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen are still due to your petitioners, and those whose interests they represent namely—

(1) Rs.110,000 in respect of interest on a principal sum of Rs.532,190 6a. 11p. part of certain moneys by the Indian authorities erroneously severed from and afterwards restored to the prize fund from the 29th July 1858 to the 28th Nov. 1862, which said principal sum was erroneously severed from the prize fund, and appropriated to the purposes of the Indian Government.

(2) A sum estimated at 600,000 rupees in respect of on interest Sonwat rupees 1,465,335 and other prize or booty of war the conversion of which was delayed by the Government of India.

(3) 45,000 rupees erroneously deducted by the Government of India from the proceeds of the said prize or booty of war on account of auction commission together with interest for the same from the date of such deduction.

15. That since the payments of the said portions of the said booty mentioned in the 12th paragraph of this petition claims have been preferred on behalf of your petitioners, and those whose interests they represent, to Her Majesty's late and present Secretary of State for India in Council for payment of the said remaining sums due in respect of the said booty, and that the justice of such claims has been by the Secretary of State for India in Council at one time admitted in respect of claim No. 2 in the 13th paragraph of this petition mentioned, and partially in respect of claim of No. 1 in the same paragraph mentioned, but that your petitioners and those whose interests they represent have been unable to obtain payment of either of the said sums from the late or from the present Secretary of State for India, although repeated applications have been made to them for the same.

16. That as to the other sum mentioned in the 13th paragraph, and the sums mentioned in the 5th paragraph of the petition, notwithstanding that the said public and private debts due to the said chiefs were prize or booty of war, and belonged to Her Majesty the Queen by Her Royal prerogative, and not to the East India Company, and notwithstanding that your petitioners, and those whose interests they represent are the sole grantees of the Crown of the said prize or booty of war including the said public and private debts and notwithstanding the said order in Council of the 10th June 1864, and the said judgment of this Court, Her Majesty's late and present Secretary of State for India in Council have, without title or lawful authority, refused to pay the said sums to the parties entitled thereto and still retain the same.

The petition concluded with a prayer in the terms of the motion, and the facts thereof were substantiated by an affidavit. The section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 governing the question was as follows:

Sect. 22.—And be it enacted that the said High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all matters and questions concerning booty of war, or the distribution thereof, which it shall please Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, by the advice of her and their Privy Council, to refer to the judgment of the said court; and in all matters so referred the court shall proceed as in cases of prize of war and the judgment of the court therein shall be binding upon all parties concerned.

Dr. Tristram, Haughton, and Willis Bund, for the petitioners.—By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 22 all questions concerning booty of war referred to this court are to be proceeded with as in cases of prize of war, that is to say maritime prize; and it has always been the practice of this court sitting as a Court of Maritime prize to order the prize money in the possession of any person to be brought into the registry. By the order in council set out in the 9th article of the petition the court is empowered to proceed with the claims there set out, and has accordingly pronounced that certain persons, including the petitioners, are entitled to share in the booty. We now ask the court to enforce that judgment. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Did not the judge by giving that judgment discharge the authority given him by the order in council? Is not the court functus officio? I do not see how I can do anything to enforce the judgment. In maritime prize the money is paid into court no doubt, but in that case the jurisdiction is original and does not arise by statute.] That is true, but the Act giving the jurisdiction over land captures expressly says that the practice shall be that of prize. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In the original judgment (Banda and Kirwee Booty, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 109, 268) it is expressly said that the court has nothing to do with the distribution of the prize.] Nothing to do with the rates or scales in which the amount granted is to be distributed among the several ranks held entitled, but the court has something to do with enforcing the payment to the claimants, irrespective of distribution, of the amounts due to them under the royal grant. The order in council expressly reserves rights as to the scale of distribution, but this is all that is reserved and consequently the court has jurisdiction in all other matters, and although it is nowhere expressly said that the money may be ordered into the registry, still as the court has full control over the case, it follows that it must have power over the proceeds of the booty, and can take the necessary steps to enforce the payment. In the Capture of Chinsurah (1 Acton's Rep. 179), where there was a capture of a town by sea and land forces, an order was made to bring the money into the registry and it was brought in. The court might in the first instance have ordered all the money, the proceeds of this booty, to have been brought into court if in the hands of persons where it was not safe. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In the present case the order in council gives no power over the question of quantum, but you contend that my jurisdiction arises out of the statute. Do you say that any person has been refused his share, or only that enough has not been distributed?] We submit that the award has only been partially carried out; certain persons have not had enough; as soon as Her Majesty signified that the amount captured was to go to the troops, and directed that it should be distributed, the petitioners became entitled to their proportion of the whole, but the whole has not been distributed. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The order in council refers the question to this court to pronounce, not the amount but who were the rightful claimants. You do not come here to enforce your judgment on the latter point, but upon the ground that the admittedly rightful claimants have not received a certain sum of money. The court could enforce its judgment if anyone disputed your right to share, but has it any jurisdiction to compel payment of any specific sum?] The jurisdiction springs from the statutes, and is to be exercised as in cases of prize. If the court refuses the motion it is laying down that it has no power to enforce the judgment. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—No, I can enforce the judgment in respect to the matters referred to the court, but not outside them.] By 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 53, s. 2, booty of war, which formerly, even after gift by the Sovereign, could be recalled (Alexander v. Duke of Wellington, 2 Russ. & M. 35), now becomes irrevocably the property of the grantees after grant by the Crown. The grantees acquire a legal right to the booty, and this is the tribunal in which their rights are enforced. If we have a right and have suffered a wrong in respect thereof, we have a remedy. The court has seisin of the cause, and therefore jurisdiction over the subject matter, and can give the remedy. The only reservation in the order in council is as to the distribution. The grant was of the booty of war captured and we say we have only had part of it; we do not ask the court to distribute it, but to take measures to enforce its payment to the parties entitled; the rate of distribution and the mode of it we do not ask the court to interfere with. It is well settled that once the prize court has decided prize or no prize it has power to enforce its judgment;

(Lord Camden v. Home, 4 T. Rep. 382) and that is all we ask. If there had been no payment at all after the original decree, the court could clearly have ordered payment; and refusal to pay would have been a contempt of this court which had held certain persons entitled to payment. If then the court could have ordered payment of the whole, it can order payment of part; that is to say of the balance in the hands of the Secretary of State. In maritime prize cases this court proceeds by virtue of a commission issued to the Lords of the Admiralty authorising them to will and require this court, and the judge thereof, to take cognisance of, and judicially proceed upon all manner of captures, &c., and to hear and determine the same, and according to the course of Admiralty, and the law of nations, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, &c. This court has been given jurisdiction over booty, and it is to proceed as in cases of maritime prize. By the course of Admiralty in maritime prize the court has power to order into the registry the proceeds of the captures, &c. Hence in a case of booty it must have a similar power.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1, 1875.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application to the court on behalf of Major-General Mackenzie and other persons interested in the distribution of the Banda and Kirwee Booty, to be at liberty to enter an appearance as plaintiffs or interveners in this matter in this court, and further to order a citation to issue to the Marquis of Salisbury Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India, requiring him to enter an appearance, and to show cause why a monition should not issue against him to bring into court certain sums of money, and also the interest due upon these sums.

This application is founded upon a petition supported by an affidavit of the Rev. Alfred Kinloch, late chaplain in the Madras Army, which captured the booty, who appears to have taken an active part in the assertion and maintenance of the claims of the captors of whom he has been the agent. Various documents are appended to this affidavit. The petition sets forth the breaking out of the rebellion in India in 1857. The capture of the Mahratta chiefs and of the town of Kirwee in 1858, and that at the time these chiefs "were possessed of"—I cite the words of the petition—"very considerable moveable property, and that the greater portion of the property captured as hereinbefore mentioned belonged to them, and consisted in part of the following choses in actions which form the principal subject of the present application, namely:" [His Lordship here read the description of the property in question as set out in the 5th paragraph of the petition.] The petition further sets forth the following order in council. [His Lordship here read the order in council as set out in the 9th article of the petition.] The petition then states the institution of the suit, and the judgment of the court on the 30th June, 1866, whereby the judge "pronounced the personal representatives of the late General Lord Clyde and the officers of his staff personal as well as general, who were in the field at the time, were entitled to share in the booty captured at Banda and Kirwee in April and June 1858, and subject to this right he awarded the whole of the said booty to Lieutenant-General Sir George Cornish Whitlock and the force under his command called the Saugor and Nerbudda field force including among the latter the officers and troops under Lieutenant-Colonel Keating, and any other troops left by General Whitlock on his march, who at the time of the capture formed a portion of his division, and were still under command, and he disallowed all other claims to the said booty:" (See L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 109). The petition then proceeds to complain that since the order of the court a part only of the proceeds of the booty have been paid, and sets forth what that part is. The part alleged to be unpaid consists of the property of the Mahratta chiefs already referred to and in addition the following sums of rupees. [His Lordship then read the description of the further sums claimed as given in the 14th paragraph of the petition.] The petition further states that applications have been made to Her Majesty's late and present Secretary of State for India in Council, in whom, since the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106 transferring the Government of India from the East India Company to Her Majesty, the property has become vested, and that such applications have been refused.

I have thought it necessary to state the petition at some length as the question of law which it raises is very important, and I believe quite novel. The petitioners contend that insomuch as the Crown referred the question of booty under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 to the High Court of Admiralty by the order in council, which, I have stated, the court has, therefore, jurisdiction to enforce its decree of the 30th June 1866, and for this object to order the portion of the booty which it is alleged has not been paid in conformity with the decree, to be brought into court, and direct its proper distribution according to that decree. It has been argued that this is the course which the court would pursue in the case of maritime prize, and that the court has the same jurisdiction by the statute in question of military booty. It has been further argued that the refusal of the Secretary of State to pay these sums of money to the claimants, amounts to an annulment pro tanto of the decree of the court, and that the court once legally seised of the case must have full power to enforce its decree. There is much that is plausible in this argument, and I have taken some time to consider it.

The first thing to bear in mind is that this court has no original jurisdiction in matters of booty of war, and that its jurisdiction is derived exclusively from the joint operation of the statute and the order in council. The words of the statute (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 22) are, "And be it enacted that the said High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all matters and questions concerning booty of war or the distribution thereof which it shall please her Majesty, her heirs, and successors by the advice of her, and their Privy Council to refer to the judgment of the said court. And in all matters so referred the court shall proceed as in cases of prize of war, and the judgment of the court therein shall be binding upon all parties concerned." I must, therefore, consider what is the matter and question which it pleased Her Majesty to refer to the court.

The order in council, already stated at length, empowers the judge to determine, first, who are the persons entitled to share in the booty; secondly, the proportions in which they are to share, and, thirdly, the questions of costs and expenses. These then are the only subjects over which the court had jurisdiction, and it is not complained that the decision of the court upon any of these points has been disregarded by those in whom the custody of the booty is vested. It might have pleased Her Majesty, or it may please Her Majesty, to refer to the court the further questions as to the amount of the booty, and what are the constituent parts of it, but until the court has this jurisdiction given it, it cannot, I think, by any legitimate construction of the existing order in council, exercise such jurisdiction.

I have not failed to notice the argument arising from the reservation to Her Majesty in the order to direct the rates or scales of distribution. But I think it would be stretching the doctrine of inferring admission of one thing from exclusion of another far beyond its proper limits, if I were to construe the order as having given the jurisdiction which is contended for.

Being, therefore, not satisfied by the argument on this ex parte application that I have jurisdiction, I think it would be wrong to call upon the Secretary of State to enter an appearance, and show cause against this monition and I decline to do so.

THE ZETA.

Salvage—Barge adrift in the Thames—Derelict—Surrender to receiver of wreck—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 450.

A laden barge accidentally breaking loose from her moorings in the river Thames, and drifting about with no one on board, is not derelict, and consequently not "wreck" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), and persons finding her and mooring her in safety are not precluded from recovering salvage for so doing by reason of their neglecting to comply with the provisions of the 450*th section of the above Act, and to deliver the barge to the receiver of wreck.*

THIS was an appeal from the City of London Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction). The parties stated the following case on appeal:

1. This a cause of salvage instituted in the City of London Court, on the 3rd April 1875, on behalf of Alfred Waller and Joseph Chapman, of Blackwall, in the county of Middlesex, against Richard Cory, Henry James Cory, Francis Wright, and John Cory Havers, of Commercial-road, Lambeth, in the county of Surrey, owners of the barge Zeta, and the cargo laden on board her, in the sum of 50*l.*

2. The plaintiffs are both licensed watermen, and the defendants are the members of the firm of William Cory and Son, coal merchants and barge owners.

3. The plaintiffs' case, as stated by counsel on the hearing of the cause, was that between twelve and one o'clock on the 18th March 1875, the plaintiffs, who were in their boat, near the West India Dock, in the river Thames, observed a barge (which proved to be the Zeta) adrift near the north shore. The plaintiffs rowed towards her, and boarded her between West India Dock and Blackwall Stairs. On getting on board they found that the Zeta was laden with about fifty tons of coal, drifting with no person on board, the head fast rope appearing to have parted.

4. That the plaintiffs succeeded in bringing the Zeta up at a causeway about 6ft. wide, and subsequently moored at the Northumberland Coal Wharf, and subsequently the defendants' servants took charge of her there. For the above services the suit was instituted. The value of the said barge is estimated at 150*l.*, and her cargo at about 46*l.*

11. The plaintiffs sent in a claim to the defendants for salvage, but the defendants denied any liability in respect of any claim in the nature of salvage.

12. On the 22nd April 1875 the case came on for hearing in the said court, before Mr. Commissioner Kerr, and on hearing counsel for the plaintiffs (who stated the facts as above set out, and without hearing any witnesses for either side, or counsel for the defendants), the learned commissioner was of opinion that, even assuming that the plaintiffs had earned or become entitled to any salvage reward (which was not admitted by the defendants), they had forfeited any claim thereto, by not taking and delivering the Zeta to the receiver of wreck (according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 450).

13. The plaintiffs contended that the section of the said Act did not apply.

14. The learned commissioner ruled that the section of the said Act applied, and that the plaintiffs had forfeited their claim to salvage by not complying with the provisions of the said section, and therefore dismissed the suit.

15. The question for the opinion of the High Court of Admiralty is whether (on the above facts) the learned commissioner was right in ruling that sect. 450 of the Merchant Shipping Act applied, and that the plaintiffs had forfeited their claim to salvage by not complying with the provisions of the said section.

If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative the appeal is to be dismissed with costs.

If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then this case is to be remitted to the City of London court for hearing, and the costs of this appeal are to abide the event.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the appellants (plaintiffs).—The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) enacts that "The following rules shall be observed by any person finding or taking possession of wreck within the United Kingdom (that is to say) . . . . (2) If any person not being the owner finds or takes possession of any wreck, he shall as soon as possible deliver the same to such receiver as aforesaid; and any person making default in obeying the provisions of this section shall incur the following penalties (that is to say) . . . . (4) If he is not the owner, and makes default in performing the several things, the performance of which is hereby imposed on any person not being an owner, he shall forfeit all claim to salvage; he shall pay to the owner of such wreck if the same is claimed, but if the same is unclaimed, then to the person entitled to such unclaimed wreck, double the value of such wreck, &c." Now, even supposing that this barge and her cargo are to be treated as wreck, I submit that the section does not apply to a case where the owner comes in and claims the property. A delivery up to the owner is enough, and the object of the statute is merely to secure the return of the property to the owner, and to provide against fraud on the part of the salvors. An owner even is bound to give notice of the recovery of wreck; this is part of the public policy which protects the rights of the Crown and owners against all chance of fraud. The restoring of property to its lawful owners has frequently been commended in this court, and masters have not unfrequently suffered for their neglect to do so: (The Champion, Bro. and Lush, 69.) It is, no doubt, the duty of a salvor to keep a derelict whose owners do not appear, and deliver her up to the receiver of wreck, but delivery to her owners answers the same purpose. But, secondly, I contend that this is not "wreck" at all. The word "wreck" implies something damaged and abandoned, such as a derelict, but this vessel had never been abandoned, sine spe recuperandi. In fact, she had, evidently broken loose from her moorings, and she was wholly uninjured. There was no intention of abandoning her at all.

The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. 37;
The Clarisse, Swab. 129, 130.

There is here no element of wreck or derelict. [He was then stopped by the court.]

R. E. Webster, for the respondents (defendants). —By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 2, "Wreck shall include jetsam, flotsam, lagan, and derelict found in or on the shores of the sea or any tidal water." The object of this sect. 450 is to prevent goods which are floating about not in anyone's charge, from getting into wrong hands; it is intended to protect salved property. No case that has been cited touches the question, because this point has not been raised. The section must apply to such a case as this, or it has no meaning. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—How is this wreck; it is not jetsam, flotsam, or lagan; can you call it derelict?] "Derelict" under the Merchant Shipping Act must be taken to have a larger meaning than that usually applied to it in this court; it includes every vessel floating about in tidal waters not in charge of her crew or other persons.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that the 450th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 154) does not apply to a case of this kind. Here is a barge near the West India Dock, in the river Thames; she gets adrift near the shore, and I think it is clear that though she was at one time moored, the rope must have parted. She was laden with coal. It appears to me that it would be quite wrong and improper to put upon this clause such a construction as is contended for, and to hold that this barge was "wreck" within the sense of the interpretation clause and of the statute, namely, that it was either jetsam, flotsam, lagan, or derelict. The term derelict means that a vessel has been left sine spe recuperanda and sine animo revertendi, and I adhere to what I said in The Clarisse (Swab. 129, 130); and I entirely agree in that which was said by that great master of maritime law, Lord Stowell, in regard to derelicts, in the case of The Aquila (1 C. Rob. 37). But I think it would be right that I should express my opinion on the other point, which is the real point in the case, on the construction of the statute. I do not consider that the section was intended to apply to salvors who have found a derelict, and have restored it to its owners. I cannot conceive that such a construction can be put upon the Act as this; namely, that though they have restored the derelict vessel to her owners, which, according to the principles of maritime law, it was their duty to do, they are liable to pay, nevertheless, double the value to the owners, and perhaps a penalty of 100*l.*, for what is called an improper detention. This is a penal clause in the statute, and is intended to apply to a criminal and improper detention, whereby it is sought to practise a fraud upon the Crown or the owner, but not to apply to cases of this description. I think it unnecessary to make any further remarks upon that point, and I send this case back again to the learned judge of the court below for trial.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Reported by A. A. DORIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Monday, Nov. 8, 1875.

Re WHITWORTH AND CO.; Ex parte BLACKBURN; Ex parte GIBBES AND CO.

Vendor and purchaser—Bill of lading—Bill of exchange—Handing over shipping documents—Ultimate destination—Bankruptcy of purchaser—Stoppage in transitu—Constructive delivery—Carriers' lien.

G. and Co., merchants in America, shipped a number of bales of cotton to Liverpool "consigned to order, for account and risk of W. and Co. of Luddenden Foot." At the same time G. and Co. sent to B. and Co., their agents at Liverpool, the shipping documents and a bill drawn by G. and Co. for W. and Co.'s acceptance. On W. and Co. accepting the bill, B. and Co. handed to them the shipping documents, and by their direction delivered the cotton to the L. Railway Company to be forwarded to Luddenden Foot, but, before the whole of the cotton was delivered there, W. and Co. filed a petition for liquidation. G. and Co. thereupon claimed the right of stoppage in transitu over the remainder of the cotton.

Held, that by the terms of the contract between the parties, Liverpool was the place of destination for the cotton, and that the transaction between them was completed when W and Co. accepted the bill drawn against the consignment, and the shipping documents were handed over to him.

At Luddenden Foot there was a railway siding constructed on the property of the company, but kept in repair at the expense of W. and Co., for whose sole use and convenience it was made. When trucks containing bales of cotton reached Luddenden Foot, they were generally placed on the siding, and thence conveyed across the main line of the railway to the mill of W. and Co. on the other side. Such of the above mentioned bales of cotton as reached Luddenden Foot prior to the filing of the liquidation petition were, with the exception of one truck load, which remained on the general siding of the company, placed on the railway siding. Others were immediately taken across to the mill and manufactured, the rest remaining upon the siding. Other portions of the cotton reached Luddenden Foot after the date of the liquidation petition.

Held, assuming that Liverpool was not the destination of the cotton, that the cotton which was placed upon the railway siding at Luddenden Foot, had reached its ultimate destination; and further, that, under the circumstances, the delivery of part of the cotton was a constructive delivery of the whole.

THESE were two appeals from an order made on the 8th June 1875, by the judge of the County Court at Halifax.

For many years prior to the 17th of April 1875, Gibbes and Co., of Charleston, U.S.A., cotton growers, were in the habit of consigning to Whitworth and Co., cotton spinners, of Boy Mill, at Luddenden Foot, near Halifax, large quantities of cotton to be used by them for the purposes of their trade. The course of dealing between the parties was that Gibbes and Co., from time to time forwarded the cotton purchased of them to Liverpool, consigned to the order of Whitworth and Co. Simultaneously with the shipment of the cotton Gibbes and Co. drew upon Whitworth and Co. for the amount of the consignment, bills payable sixty days after sight, and forwarded the same for acceptance, together with the bill of lading, to Brown, Shipley, and Co., the agents at Liverpool of Gibbes and Co. Brown, Shipley, and Co., transmitted the draft to Whitworth and Co. for their acceptance, which being done and returned, Brown, Shipley, and Co. forwarded the bill of lading to Whitworth and Co., and they, having indorsed it, sent it to a Mr. Wintle, the manager of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company at the North Docks Station, Liverpool, where the cotton lay, with cash sufficient to defray the charges for the sea freight. The railway company thereupon paid the charges, took possession of the cotton, and forwarded it by their own line from the North Docks station to Luddenden Foot, for which service the railway company became entitled to a further payment from Whitworth and Co. Sometimes, however, the railway company advanced the charges for the sea freight without waiting for a remittance from Whitworth and Co., and forwarded the cotton so obtained to Luddenden Foot, and delivered it to Whitworth and Co., debiting them with the charges and further costs of carriage. Whitworth and Co. were large customers of the railway company, and in the case of cotton consigned to the firm the trucks containing the same were, on arrival at Luddenden Foot, placed by the servants of the railway company sometimes on one or other of the general sidings of the company in the station yard, and sometimes on a siding called the "Whitworth Siding," of which the following is a description: "Boy Mill is situated at the south end of the railway station at Luddenden Foot, and adjoining to the main line of railway, and on the other side of the railway opposite to Boy Mill, and, connected with the main line by points in the ordinary way, is the Whitworth Siding which is connected by a turn-table and cross lines of rails with the interior of Boy Mill. This latter siding contains standing room for about twenty goods' trucks of ordinary construction. The soil upon which it stands is the property of the railway company, but was originally formed and afterwards kept in repair by the railway company, at the expense and for the sole and exclusive use of Whitworth and Co. Upon this siding a notice board was placed by the railway company, and bearing in large letters the words "Whitworth Siding." The siding is protected at each end by blocks in the ordinary way, and except when trucks are being shunted on to, or taken off the siding, from, or on to the main line, the blocks are invariably kept closed and secured by padlocks." But, wherever the trucks of cotton were placed, no advice notes were ever issued to Whitworth and Co., but down to the 18th April 1875, the firm was allowed to take and remove the goods, subject only to the necessary precautions for crossing the main line at their absolute discretion, without freight being required, on, or before delivery, as they kept a ledger account of freight with the railway company."

In March 1874, Gibbes and Co. under their general contract dispatched by the Republic steamer from New York seventy-two bales of cotton, "to be shipped to Liverpool, consigned to order, for account and risk of Whitworth and Co., Luddenden Foot." In due course the invoice, together with a bill of exchange, drawn by Gibbes and Co., for 1047*l.* 19*s.*, was on the 6th April received by Whitworth and Co. for acceptance. This being done, the bill was returned to Brown, Shipley, and Co., who thereupon forwarded the bill of lading to Gibbes and Co. Gibbes and Co. then endorsed the bill of lading to Mr. Wintle, with instructions to send the cotton to Luddenden Foot.

On the 11th and 15th April, the bales, ex Republic, reached Luddenden Foot, and upon their arrival thirty-three of them were immediately taken into the mill and manufactured. Of the remaining thirty-nine, twenty, which were in one of the company's trucks, No. 3166, were placed on the Whitworth Siding, and the other nineteen, in truck No. 1260, remained on the railway company's general siding.

On the 13th April Whitworth and Co. in like manner received a similar invoice and a bill for 1079*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*, in respect of seventy-two bales of cotton shipped per Celtic, which were in due course forwarded to Luddenden Foot. This cotton was similarly disposed of, thirty-three bales being on the 19th April taken into the mill and manufactured, twenty being left in truck No. 11,695, on the company's sidings, and the remaining nineteen, in truck No. 7524, reached Luddenden Foot Station on the 21st.

On the 17th April 1874, Whitworth and Co. filed a petition for liquidation. At the general meeting held on the 8th May the creditors resolved upon a liquidation by arrangement, and appointed H. Blackburn trustee.

On the 18th April the railway company, having notice of the petition, removed the truck No. 3166 on to their lines, and claimed a general carriers' lien for unpaid freight on the four trucks of cotton in their possession.

On the 21st April Ernest Schott, the Manchester agent of Gibbes and Co., gave notice to the railway company that he claimed on behalf of his principles the thirty-nine bales ex Celtic and the thirty-nine ex Republic, which were in the four trucks at Luddenden Foot station.

On the 27th April 1874, Gibbes and Co. applied for an order that, by their notice of the 21st, they had well and effectually exercised their right as unpaid vendors to stop in transitu the bales of cotton which remained in the possession of the railway company. By an arrangement between the parties the bales in dispute were sold, and the proceeds, amounting to 1220*l.*, paid into the bank to abide the result of the application.

On the 8th June 1875, the County Court Judge being of opinion that the ultimate destination of the cotton was Luddenden Foot station, and that the right to stoppage in transitu had been rightly exercised as to the thirty-nine bales ex Celtic, ordered and declared that Gibbes and Co. were entitled to so much of the sum paid into the Bradford Bank as represented the bales ex Celtic, and that the trustee under the liquidation was entitled to the residue of the said sum, being the amount which represented the thirty-nine bales ex Republic.

Against so much of this order as related to the bales shipped ex Republic Gibbes and Co. appealed, and the trustee appealed against so much thereof as related to those shipped ex Celtic. The two appeals now came on for hearing together.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Jordan, for the trustee, contended: (1) That the cotton upon its arrival at Liverpool had reached the destination contemplated by the vendors, where it would await the further orders of the purchaser, and consequently that the transitus then ceased, the rule being that when goods arrived at the place where they are to remain, to the order and disposition of the purchaser, then, although they have not reached their ultimate destination, the transitus is ended: (Wentworth v. Outhwaite, 10 M. & W. 449.) (2) That, assuming the right of stoppage in transitu to continue until the cotton reached Luddenden Foot, then such of the bales as had been placed on the "Whitworth Siding" had reached their ultimate destination, and that thereby there had been such a delivery of part as was equivalent to a constructive delivery of the whole. Bolton v. Lancashire Railway Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 431; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769.

(3) That the lien for freight claimed by the railway company had nothing whatever to do with the question. That the company could not put an end to the contract existing between them and Whitworth at their own volition without notice to Whitworth or his trustee, and that, even if they could, it would not affect the pre-existing rights of other persons.

Allan v. Grippes, 2 C. & J. 218.

De Gex, Q.C. and Finlay Knight, for Gibbes and Co., argued contra, that the real transitus never commenced until the goods reached Liverpool, because the real consignees of the cotton were Brown, Shipley, and Co., who received it as the agents there of Gibbes and Co., and did not part with it until the bills of exchange had been duly accepted; consequently, the cotton was in the possession of the vendors, or their agents until delivered to the railway company to be conveyed to Luddenden Foot, and that, therefore, the right to stop it arose and continued until the cotton reached its ultimate destination, which was not "Whitworth's Siding," but Boy Mill, on the other side of the line; and that the railway company were carriers, not warehousemen, and that their course of dealing with Whitworth precluded them from setting up the lien which they claimed. They cited

The CHIEF JUDGE.—In my opinion, the case is reasonably clear, although the several arguments urged before me appear to have had considerable weight with the learned County Court Judge.

The question is one of most ordinary occurence. Merchants, the owners of the cotton, at Charleston, agree to send shipments to Liverpool, and nowhere else. They send them from Charleston by two vessels for transshipment, and they are to be paid for by an acceptance of Whitworth and Co. The vendors send their bills of exchange to Brown, Shipley, and Co., in order that they may present the bills for acceptance, and at the same time they accompany the bills with shipping documents, and upon the acceptance of the bills the shipping documents are given up. The title to the delivery and possession of the goods is transferred by means of the bills of lading. The destination of the goods was Liverpool. If anything had happened upon the voyage there would have been a right to stop them in transitu. At the place which the vendors prescribe as the destination of the goods the goods arrive, and the transitus is at an end. The vendees, the persons at whose risk and upon whose account the goods were to be so shipped, had no right to claim them unless they were, as they became by the act of the agent of the vendors, fully authorised to act for them on his own part, the absolute owners of the goods, which were thus sold and delivered. They were paid for by means of bills, which I am quite aware were not good bills by reason of the subsequent failure, but which was the very manner stipulated for between the vendors and the purchaser, and when the goods arrived at Liverpool the purchaser acquired a right, by the fact of his having accepted the bills and performed the condition, to demand from the ship's master the delivery to him of those goods, and he exercised that right.

To what use, then, is the whole of the argument that there remained a transitus after that? How is it possible to say that the transitus then commenced? If the place of destination had not been reached, then all that Mr. De Gex has said to me about a special or general carrier might have applied, but that is not the present case at all. When Mr. Wintle, the agent for Whitworth and Co., paid the sea charges, which he did on Whitworth and Co.'s account, he became holder of the bills of lading for Whitworth, and the goods were delivered to him in that character, and there was an end of the transitus. The transitus that takes place after that is only prescribed by the purchaser, the vendors had nothing to do with it. The vendors' transitus was at an end, and it is in vain to read cases, in which a ship, being chartered for London, the goods are not delivered from the ship until the vendor exercises his right, or, being chartered for London the ship is stopped at Copenhagen. All these are familiar instances of stoppage in transitu. What can that have to do with the case when it is a case of bargain and sale of goods to be delivered on the wharf at Liverpool upon certain conditions being complied with? The conditions are complied with, the delivery takes place, and the transitus is at an end, and the right at law to stop the goods after that never existed. If the facts were otherwise there would apparently be a great deal to be said; but I will not go into that.

Upon the history, however, which has been given to me of the way in which "Whitworth's Siding" was a part of the railway, and the use which was from time to time made by Whitworth of that siding, I think the goods had come home when they were upon the siding. I think, moreover, that there was a constructive delivery of the whole by delivery of part of the goods, if it were necessary, as in my judgment it is not necessary, to resort to any such doctrine. I think, also, the taking out at his own will from several of the trucks, containing different parcels not distinguishable, and working up in his own manufactory the goods so brought from Liverpool, was as clear a constructive possession of the entirety as the law requires.

The only other thing to be noticed is the act of the railway company, who having gone on in an amicable manner, not demanding payment on the instant of delivery but keeping an account of the transactions between themselves and Whitworth, bethink themselves all of a sudden that they will keep such of the goods as had not been carried across the railway. I do not use the word "delivered," but "carried across"—until they were paid their charges. But what has their claim of lien to do with the question which I have to consider? They may be right or wrong. Upon that I will not express any sort of opinion, but of this I am clear, that it could not have altered any rights which existed before. Lien upon what? Upon Whitworth's goods, and it is because they are his goods that they claim the lien. It is not necessary, however, to dwell upon that part of the case at all.

I am of opinion that the order made, and which has given to the trustee only half of the goods which he contends belonged to Whitworth at the time of his failure, cannot be sustained. The proper order is to declare that the trustee is entitled to the whole of the goods, which were in the possession of the railway as the agents, carriers, or anything else you like to call them, of Whitworth, at the time of the failure.

The cases, which have been referred to, really help the matter and do not affect the principle upon which I have endeavoured to decide it. In Wentworth v. Outhwaite (10 M. & W. 449), which is very plainly in point, although there were certain goods, which were to be delivered to a man at a place thirty miles from Leeds, yet, as they were delivered at Leeds to a workman, the delivery was complete. Lord Abinger there says: "It seems to me that a great part of the very learned argument which we have heard, turns upon a question of fact, whether Leeds was the place of destination to which the goods were to be sent. It may be the place of destination at which the goods are to be at the consignee's risk, and I think that in this case it was the place where they were to be at his risk until he sent for them." In the very terms of the invoice that applies to this case. Mr. Baron Parke's judgment is to the same effect: "The goods had arrived at their place of destination, for that, as I understand, means the place, to which they were to be conveyed by the carriers, and where they would remain unless fresh orders should be given for their subsequent disposition." Then he quotes the decision in Dixon v. Baldwen, where Lord Ellenborough, after referring to the several cases upon this subject, says, "In those cases the goods had so far gotten to the end of their journey that they waited for new orders from the purchaser to put them again in motion, to communicate to them another substantive destination, and without such order they would continue stationary." Then, in Whitehead v. Anderson, p. 534 (ubi sup.), it is stated, "The law is clearly settled that the unpaid vendor has a right to retake the goods before they have arrived at the destination originally contemplated by the purchaser, unless in the meantime they have come into the actual or constructive possession of the vendee. If the vendee takes them out of the possession of the carrier into his own before their arrival, with or without the consent of the carrier, there seems to be no doubt that the transitus would be at an end, though, in the case of the absence of the carrier's consent, it may be a wrong to him, for which he would have a right of action."

But, without going further into the authorities, which, although numerous, are not by any means obscure or doubtful, it appears to me that the right to stoppage in transitu ended when the goods were delivered by virtue of the bills of lading to the purchaser's agent, and that after that there could be no right, for there was no transitus to which the right of stoppage could apply. I shall make no order as to the costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by GILBERT G. KENNEDY, Esq., Barrister-at-law.

Nov. 20, 22, and 23, 1875.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), KELLY, C.B., BRAMWELL, B., and BLACKBURN, J.)

OGG AND ANOTHER v. SHUTER.

Sale of goods—Cash against bill of lading—Refusal by purchaser to pay—Vendor's right to retain possession—Jus disponendi.

Where by the terms of a contract the bill of lading is deliverable upon the vendee's fulfilling certain conditions, the shipper is entitled not only to retain possession of the goods under such bill of lading until those conditions are fulfilled, but also in case of the vendee's default to dispose of the goods.

L., a potato merchant in France, contracted to sell to plaintiffs, potato merchants in England, twenty tons of potatoes, to be delivered "free on board," and "cash against bill of lading." The plaintiffs paid 30l. on account. The potatoes were put by L. into sacks of the plaintiffs', sent by them for that purpose, and L. drew on the plaintiffs "at sight" for the balance of the agreed price, and despatched the potatoes in England. The shipment on arrival was supposed by the plaintiffs, erroneously, to be sixteen sacks short, and the plaintiffs, therefore, refused to accept the full draft drawn on them by L. but offered to accept a draft for the amount less a deduction proportioned to the supposed short shipment. L.'s agent in England thereupon endorsed the bill of lading to the defendant with instructions to sell, which the defendant did.

Held (reversing the decision of the Common Pleas), that the plaintiffs were in default, and that the defendant was entitled to the verdict. For that the terms of the contract entitled the vendor to retain possession of the goods until the plaintiffs complied with the conditions of payment, and that as the plaintiffs, made default in complying with those conditions, the vendor or his agent had power to dispose of the goods.

This was an appeal by the defendant under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, against the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in discharging a rule of that court, obtained by the defendant to enter a verdict for the defendant instead of the verdict nominally entered for the plaintiff.

The declaration was in trover for 251 sacks of potatoes and 251 sacks. The pleas were not guilty, and not possessed. Issue thereon.

1. The following is a statement of the case.

2. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant, for the conversion by the defendant of certain potatoes alleged to be the property of the plaintiffs, and the cause came on for trial before Keating, J., on the 1st May 1874, at Westminster Hall, when the following facts and correspondence were given in evidence; and the learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant, the court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

3. The plaintiffs are potato salesmen.

4. The defendant is a partner in the firm of Comfort and Shuter, who are potato salesmen.

5. In the month of Jan. 1874, a contract was entered into by the plaintiffs with Monsieur Paresys Loutre of Merville in France for the purchase of a quantity of potatoes on the terms contained in the following letters and telegrams.

Merville, 5th Jan. 1874.

Messrs. Ogg and Co., London.

In answer to your letter of the 3rd inst. I can let you have 200 tons of potatoes (lesquins) of this country, good sound goods, at the price of 82 francs for 1000 kilogrammes, put on board at Dunkirk, to be delivered in the course of the present month, payable in cash, that is to say, against bill of lading signed by the captain, and the statement of weight of the sworn weighers of the city of Dunkirk. If you accept my offer please reply by return of post, and do not fail to send at the same time a cheque for 25*l.* as an earnest of the bargain.

Letter from Plaintiffs to Paresys Loutre.

Jan. 16.

We have duly received your telegram of 14th inst., and confirm ours of the 15th inst., enclosed please find the cheque for 30*l.* on account, also delivery order for 300 sacks shipped to Messrs. Berthelot Derode, to whom you will be good enough to apply. We recommend you to ship as promptly as possible, as this small order is simply to judge of the quality of goods you can supply us with, and if we are satisfied it will lead to more important business.

Letter from Paresys Loutre to Plaintiffs.

I have received your telegram dated the 14th Jan. at three in the afternoon, and I have replied immediately by telling you that I could not give you lesquins at less than 84 francs free on board, and asked you to reply immediately by telegram. I have likewise received your telegram dated 15th Jan., 5.47 p.m., received the 16th at 10 a.m.; and I have besides received your letter dated the 16th Jan., received on morning of 17th, inclosing a cheque for 30*l.*; also a delivery order for fifteen bundles of sacks, sent by steamer, and asking me to send you 20,000 kilogrammes as a sample. To please you I will send the quantity of lesquins you ask me for, notwithstanding your telegram reached me too late, but I hope that in future we shall have more important sales.

6. In pursuance of this arrangement, Paresys Loutre, by his agent, F. Camys Van Rycke, of Dunkirk, put potatoes of the weight of 18,878 kilogrammes into 251 of the plaintiffs' sacks sent by them to Paresys Loutre, and shipped the same on board the steamship Blonde at Dunkirk under the following bill of lading:—

I, Fowler, master, after God, of the ship named Blonde now at Dunkirk, intending at a proper time to pursue my voyage under the protection of God until I arrive at the city of London, there to unload, acknowledge to have received into my said ship, to be carried on deck, from here, of you Mr. F. Camys Van Rycke, 251 sacks of potatoes (lesquins), weighing in the whole 18,878 kilogrammes, all the sacks in good condition, marked as in the margin [in the margin of the bill of lading was put "Mark of said sacks, Ogg and Co."], which I promise to deliver in the same form, except perils and accidents of the sea, at London, to order, on payment to me for freight of the sum of 8s. per 1000 kilogrammes, besides advances according to the usual custom of the sea; and for performance of the above I have bound and do bind by this my person my goods and my said ship with the tackle. In faith of which I have signed four bills of lading of the same tenor, the one of which being accomplished the others to be void. Done at Dunkirk, the 24th Jan. 1874. On deck at shipper's risk.

For the Master,
£7 11s. 1d., indorsed F. Camys Van Rycke, Comfort and Shuter.

7. On the 25th Jan. 1874, the said Camys Van Rycke advised the plaintiffs in the following letter:—

I have the pleasure of advising that according to the order of Mr. Paresys-Loutre of Merville, I have sent you by steamer Blonde, Captain Fowler, Ogg and Co., 251 sacks of potatoes (lesquins), weighing net 18,878 kilogrammes. Inclosed is the invoice that Mr. Paresys has given me directions to address to you, and the balance of 34*l.*, which I have drawn on you at sight. Will you give it your good attention? The bill of lading will be sent you with my draft. There remain 49 empty sacks at your disposal.

The invoice was inclosed.

8. Paresys Loutre to plaintiff:—

26th Jan.

In answer to your letter of 24th inst., you must by this time have had the advice from my representative at Dunkirk, Mr. Camys, of the departure of the 20,000 kilogrammes; he must have drawn on you for the payment of the balance for the goods. Lesquins have risen the last ten days 15 francs the 1000 kilogrammes. This kind of potato is becoming very rare here. If the demand for them continues there will remain none in a month.

9. On the 26th Jan. 1874, the potatoes arrived on board the steamship Blonde in the Thames, and were landed at Cotton's wharf on that or the next day.

10. Mons. Camys Van Rycke drew a bill of exchange on the plaintiffs pursuant to the terms of the letter of the 25th Jan., and annexed thereto the said bill of lading endorsed by him, of which bill of exchange the following is a copy:

Dunkirk, 25th Jan.

At sight, please pay to my order, and against bill of lading hereto annexed, the sum of 34*l.* sterling, value in goods, and according to advice of yours devoted.

F. Camys Van Rycke.

Good for 34*l.* sterling.
To Messrs. Ogg & Co.

[Here followed several indorsements.]

11. The said draft for 34*l*., dated 25th Jan. 1874, was enclosed with the said bill of lading annexed thereto, on 26th Jan. 1874, to Messrs. A. Petyt and Co. (Mr. Camys Van Rycke's bankers), and was presented by Messrs. Devaux & Co. with the bill of lading annexed, to the plaintiffs for payment on the 27th Jan. 1874, who refused to pay the said bill or to honour the same, on the ground stated in the following letter written by them to Mr. Paresys Loutre :—

We have just seen the goods shipped on board the steamer Blonde, and we find that there are 16 sacks short shipped, and that there are only 235 sacks of lesquins loaded, which is stated on the bill of lading, of which the captain is the bearer.

We have asked Mr. Devaux, the holder of your draft to keep it until the discharge of the vessel, to see what there is on board. To this he has refused his consent, and we have necessarily refused to pay the amount, viz,, 34*l*. We request you then to write to your agent here, to present to us the invoice receipted, and the bill of lading of what there is on board, and we will pay what is due. On your sending us the invoice and bill of lading we will send you a cheque by return. Pray then to direct your agent at Dunkirk to ascertain if any have been left on the quay, and to take care of our empty sacks.

The statement of the short shipment in the above letter proved to be erroneous, the quantities specified in the invoice, bill of lading, and correspondence being, in fact, on board.

12. On 27th Jan. 1874, Messrs, Scorer and Harris, notaries of the Royal Exchange, London, presented the same bill, with bill of lading attached for payment, and payment was again refused by the plaintiffs, and they noted it, and it was returned to Messrs. C. Devaux and Co.

13. On the 30th Jan., the defendant to whom the said bill of lading and bill of exchange had then been respectively given, and endorsed by Camys Van Rycke presented to the plaintiffs the said draft, and the bill of lading endorsed by the firm of Comfort and Shuter annexed thereto, and requested the plaintiffs to honour and pay the said draft, which they for the reasons aforesaid again declined to do.

14. On the 30th Jan. the plaintiffs wrote the following letter to the defendant :

We hereby give you notice that the 251 sacks potatoes arrived per steamer Blonde, were consigned to us and are our property, and if you part with them to anybody else you will be held responsible for sale, &c.

And on the 2nd Feb. 1874, the plaintiffs wrote the following letter to Paresys Loutre :—

Our Mr. Ogg having left London for Antwerp on Saturday last, at that time we were not able to ascertain the correct quantity of potatoes shipped to us per steamer Blonde. We wish you to understand that we only want what is right, and we regret that we do not know each other better, and as we have been treated unfairly in business transactions of this nature before, we think it well to see quantity of goods before we pay on bill of lading, especially as the officials inform us of short shipment. Since Mr. Ogg's departure the potatoes have been discharged from vessel to wharf, and find on examination the goods are correct in quantity. I have telegraphed the particulars to Mr. Ogg in Antwerp, and on his return on Thursday, he will then take delivery of the goods. We have not to thank the broker st Dunkirk for all this unnecessary trouble.

15. On the 2nd Feb. the defendant in consequence of instructions he had received from Mr. Camys Van Rycke. sold the goods.

16. At the trial before Mr. Justice Keating, after the foregoing facts and correspondence had been proved, it was found as a fact by the jury that the goods were not of such a perishable nature as to render the sale of the potatoes necessary, and thereupon the learned judge directed that a verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him. The court to draw inferences of fact.

17. It was admitted by the counsel for the plaintiffs that the vendor, Paresys Loutre, had, on the 30th Jan., at the time of the plaintiffs' refusal to honour the draft, a lien upon the potatoes for the unpaid purchase money of 34*l*.

The Court of Common Pleas discharged the rule obtained by the defendant, after taking time to consider (a).

(a) The judgments in the court below were as follows :

Jan. 22.—Lord Coleridge, C.J.—The facts in this case are shortly these. There is a contract for the sale of potatoes by the person whom the defendant represents to the plaintiffs, to be delivered free on board within a month, and payment is to be by cash against bill of lading. The goods are shipped in the plaintiff's sacks, under a bill of lading, which is indorsed to the defendant. A part payment of 30*l*. is made. The action being for a conversion of the potatoes by the defendant, it was objected by his counsel that the property in the potatoes had never passed to the plaintiffs. It was contended on the other side that the property had passed, and that the vendor had merely reserved a lien on the goods for the price. My brother Keating directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, reserving leave to the defendant to move. I am of opinion that his ruling was correct. The result of the decisions which were cited is, that the question whether the property in goods has passed under a contract of sale is a question of intention to be gathered from all the circumstances, the expressions made use of in the contract, and also the surrounding circumstances. In the case of a specific chattel, the rule is that the sale passes the property. So also the general rule, as laid down in several cases, is that, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, the specific appropriation of goods to the contract, viz., their being placed in vessels or receptacles provided by the purchasers, would pass the property. Here the potatoes were separated from a larger bulk, and placed in the plaintiffs' sacks, which had been sent over for the purpose. In addition to this very strong fact there is also the expression "free on board" in the contract, which has in previous cases been relied on, not as absolutely conclusive to show that the property passed, but as a strong element to be considered in favour of that conclusion. There is also the further fact that there was a part payment of 30*l*. All these are very strong circumstances to show that the property passed; but it is contended, on the other hand, that the expression, "cash against bill of lading," in the contract is of itself conclusive to ascertain the intention of the vendor; that, the bill of lading being the indicium of property, the fact that the purchaser was not to receive it until he paid the price, unmistakably indicated the intention that till then the property should not pass. In support of this view a great many cases and dicta of judges were cited. These authorities appear to me to go no further than the conclusion that, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, the stipulation for cash against bill of lading would have been conclusive. In like manner many of the circumstances existing in this case have been held, in the absence of countervailing circumstances, to be conclusive evidence of an intention to pass the property. There is also another strong fact against the plaintiff's contention, viz., that the bill of lading was indorsed to the order of the defendant; but that again is only evidence of the intention, and may be rebutted by contrary evidence. The rule as deducible from all the cases, and as it is laid down in the learned works of Blackburn, J., and Mr. Benjamin on Sale, is, that the question whether the property has passed being one of intention to be collected from all the circumstances, no single circumstance is necessarily conclusive in all cases, but the conclusion to be drawn must depend on a balance of the various circumstances on one side and the other. The question is, therefore, one of fact for a jury; and we have here, being placed in the position of a jury, to determine it as a question of fact. I am

Milward, Q.C. and Willis for the defendants.—First, the property in these goods did not pass to the plaintiffs. By the first letter, namely that of 5th Jan., the goods are to be put on board at Dunkirk, "cash against bill of lading signed by captain," which shows that the property was not to pass until the purchaser should have paid the cash and received the bill of lading. "free on board" was held by the Court of Common Pleas to mean that when put on board they would become the property of the purchaser, but this expression alludes to the payment, to indicate the party who is to pay for the bill of lading. [Bramwell, B.—Suppose the ship had gone to the bottom, who would have to bear the loss?] The vendor. Brown v. Hare, 4 H. & N. 822; 29 L. J. 6, Ex. is the case relied on in the court below to show the property had passed, but there was this difference in that case that the bill of lading was forwarded and the object of forwarding the bill of lading was to make the goods deliverable to the consignee. [Bramwell, B.—Where a bill of lading is to order, and cash against bill of lading, I have always understood that if payment is not made the vendor may resume possession of the goods.] The bill of lading being deliverable on payment is conclusive to show the property did not pass. There is not an intention on the part of the vendor to pass the property: (Sheppard v. Harrison, L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 116; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 857.) Where goods are to be delivered against goods or money, or anything, the events must be contemporaneous, and until the conditions are fulfilled, although put into vendee's ships, the property does not pass:

Bussey v. Barnett, 9 M. & W. 312;
Bishop v. Shilleto, 2 B. & Ald. 329;
Brandt v. Bowlby, 2 B. & Ad. 932.

[The Lord Chancellor.—This is a contract in mercantile language, but if we paraphrase it thus:

of opinion that, taken altogether, the evidence in this case shows that it was intended by the parties that the property should pass at Dunkirk. There was another point raised as to the form of the action to which it is necessary to avert. It was contended that the plaintiffs could not maintain trover because there was at least a lien on the part of the vendor. This question appears to me to depend on the question whether there was an absolute refusal by the plaintiffs to accept the bill of exchange in compliance with the terms of the contract. If there was, our decision on this point must be for the defendant. The facts, however, do not appear to me to show that there was such a refusal on the part of the plaintiffs to accept the bill. When the potatoes arrived it was supposed by both parties that there were sixteen sacks short. The plaintiffs said that they could not accept the bill for the price of the full number when there were sixteen short; that they were quite ready immediately to pay the amount less the deficiency, or if the defendant liked to wait till the vessel was unloaded, they would accept for what was actually on board. The defendant would be satisfied with nothing else than the immediate and absolute acceptance of the bill for the full amount. The plaintiffs never refused to comply with the contract, and when it turned out that the parties were mistaken, and the full quantity was on board, they were perfectly willing to have taken the whole. Under these circumstances it appears to me that the right of lien did not exist, and the right of possession as well as of property had passed to the plaintiffs. This rule must therefore be discharged.

Grove, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Willis appeared at first disposed to contend that the term, "cash against bill of lading," was absolutely conclusive evidence of the intention not to pass the property; but finding that he could not sustain this view he argued that it was primâ facie conclusive, and that there was no circumstance in the present case sufficient to rebut it. Standing by itself it might be conclusive, but there are additional facts in this case. There is first the fact that the bill of lading was indorsed to the consignor's agent, which is strongly in the defendant's favour. But then there are the other circumstances, which appear to me of still greater weight in the plaintiff's favour, viz., that the delivery was to be free on board, that there was a part payment, and that the sacks in which the potatoes were shipped were the plaintiff's. All these are extremely strong facts pointing to the conclusion that the property passed, and one of these was considered so very strong in the case of Brown v. Hare (ubi inf.) as to make that almost a decision in point to the present case. It is true that the cases run very fine, but none of them, I think, depart from the proposition that the question is one of intention for the jury, where there are circumstances pointing both ways. The case of Brown v. Hare (ubi inf.) is very plainly to that effect. In that case the oil, which was the subject of contract, was to be shipped "free on board," and was to be paid for by bill of exchange on delivery to the defendants of the bill of lading. It was so shipped free on board, and the bill of lading taken deliverable to shipper's order. So far the case was very similar to the present, but the bill of lading was there indorsed to the purchasers, whereas here it was indorsed to the vendor's agent. It was held that the property passed to the purchasers when the goods were placed "free on board," in performance of the contract, and that it was a question for the jury whether the plaintiffs so shipped the oil in performance of their contract to place it free on board, or for the purpose of retaining a control over it and continuing to be owners contrary to the contract. The expression "free on board" appears to have been the main point relied upon in that case. Here, not only were the potatoes to be delivered "free on board," but there was part payment and delivery into plaintiffs sacks, which alone would be the strongest evidence, according to one class of decisions, that the property passed. The terms "cash against bill of lading" may very well be satisfied by construing them as meant to preserve the vendor's lien and so as not at all inconsistent with the other facts pointing to an intention that the property should pass.

Denman, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was desirable that we should be referred to the cases on this subject; but in the result I have no doubt the true principle is, that the question whether the property has passed is one of fact for the jury on consideration of the facts on both sides of the question. The rule on the subject is put very clearly in the case of Van Casteel v. Booker (2 Ex. 691). We have here to act as jurymen; and it appears to me that the facts very strongly preponderate in favour of the conclusion that the intention was that the property should pass, and that the terms which were relied on as pointing to a contrary conclusion should be construed as merely intended to preserve the vendor's lien. With regard to the question whether trover will lie, I agree entirely with the view taken by my Lord.

Keating, J.—I also agree in the conclusion that the intention was that the property should pass, the lien for the balance of the purchase-money, after payment of 30*l.* being reserved to the vendor. With regard to the question whether the action of trover was maintainable, it is the law, that if one party absolutely refuses to perform the contract, the other party may rescind. If the defendant was entitled to rescind he was entitled to sell the potatoes, and his so doing was no conversion; but if he was not so entitled there was a conversion. The question, therefore, is whether there was an absolute refusal on the part of the plaintiffs to perform the contract. It appears to me that there was no such refusal. It being supposed that some of the sacks were missing, they said, "If they are found we will at once accept the bill for the full amount; if they cannot be found we are not bound to accept in respect of cargo that is not delivered." The defendant, the market having in the mean time risen considerably, proceeded immediately to sell the potatoes. I think that a reasonable time had not elapsed, and that there was no evidence of such a refusal to perform the contract as would justify the defendant in rescinding the contract and selling the potatoes. There was, consequently a conversion of the potatoes, and the action is maintainable.

Rule discharged.

"the goods are put on your ships, they are your property, but unless you comply with the condition of payment against the bill of lading, we reserve a jus disponendi to sell them."] That would be unarguable, but we contend now that putting them on board was not with the intention of vesting the property in the vendee, but to deliver them subject to the condition: (Moakes v. Nicholson, 19 C. B., N. S., 290; 34 L. J. 273, C. P.; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 573). Secondly: If the property did pass, we contend that the possession might be retained until the fulfilment of conditions, and consequently the vendee cannot bring trover. [Kelly, C. B.—Is not the principle in all these cases that trover will not lie without possession?] Certainly, a vendor who has a right to maintain possession is in the position of a person who has a right to retain goods in pawn. (Halliday v. Holgate, L. Rep. 3 Ex. (Ex. Ch.), 299; 37 L. J. 174, Ex.; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 656, which is confirmed in Donald v. Suckling, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 585; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 772.) It is here admitted that the vendor had a lien, the conversion is on 2nd Feb., the letter offering to take delivery is on 2nd Feb., showing that the vendee was in default by his refusals, and that there was no manifestation or disposition to pay until that date, and, therefore, the case of Milgate v. Kebble (3 M. & G. 100), is in point, that case was followed by

Wilmhurst v. Bowker, 7 M. & G. 882; and Bloxam v. Saunders, 4 B. & C. 941.

Prentice, Q.C. and Holl for the plaintiffs.—First: The property passed immediately the goods were put into the sacks, or rather the moment they were put free on board: (Aldridge v. Johnson 7 E. & B. 885; 26 L. J. 296, Q. B.). [The Lord Chancellor.—Do you say the property passed absolutely and indefeasibly.] It passed subject to a lien. The potatoes had risen in price, and, therefore, the plaintiffs did not refuse these potatoes in any factious manner, but because they bonâ fide believed there was a short delivery, there was a clear intimation they were ready to pay for the goods, and there was nothing to justify the selling.

Valpy v. Oakley, 16 Q. B. 941.

Secondly: Trover will lie. Lord Campbell, in Aldridge v. Johnson, at p. 299, says, "as soon as each of the plaintiff's (vendee's) sacks were filled with barley, eo instanti the property in the barley in the sacks became vested in the plaintiff (vendee). The vendor had only a lien on these goods for the purchase money, he had no property in them, only a mere personal right to retain them, and not a right of sale.

Chinery v. Viall, 5 H. & N. 288;
Martindale v. Smith, 1 Q. B. 389;
Simmons v. Swift, 5 B. & C. 857, per Bailey, J., p. 862.

[The Lord Chancellor.—Is not the payment the essence of the contract?] All we submit is that the refusal of the vendee to pay does not entitle the vendor to rescind the contract and sell the goods. Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23.—The Lord Chancellor (Cairns) delivered the judgment of the court.—In this case it appears from the judgments below, that the Court of Common Pleas drew the inference of fact that the plaintiff was not in default in refusing to accept the draft for 34*l*., which was tendered to him for acceptance along with the bill of lading. We have been unable to reconcile this finding with the statements in the case, more particularly with the statement in paragraph 13, which seems to us to show that the plaintiff was in default. Taking this fact as we understand it, we think that the judgment in favour of the plaintiff is erroneous, and should be reversed.

The transactions in which merchants, shipping goods on the orders of others, protect themselves by taking a bill of lading, making the goods deliverable to the shipper's order, involve property of immense value, and we are unwilling to decide more than is required by the particular case; but we think this much is clear that, where the shipper takes and keeps in his own or his agent's hands, a bill of lading in this form to protect himself, this is effectual, so far as to preserve to him a hold over the goods, until the bill of lading is handed over on the conditions being fulfilled, or, at least, until the consignee is ready and willing, and offers to fulfil these conditions, and demands the bill of lading, and we think that such a hold retained under the bill of lading is not merely a right to retain possession till those conditions are fulfilled, but involves in it a power to dispose of the goods on the vendee's default, so long, at least, as the vendee continues in default.

It is not necessary in this case to consider what would be the effect of an offer by the plaintiff to accept the draft and pay the money before the sale, for no such offer in this case was ever made.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Marine insurance—Re-insurance—Insurable interest — Concealment — 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4—27 & 28 Vict. c. 56, s. 1—30 & 31 Vict. c. 59.

A policy of insurance "on goods" will cover a re-insurance.

The plaintiff, an underwriter, effected with another underwriter an ordinary policy "on cotton" on board a named vessel, for a specific voyage. The policy did not state, as the fact was, that it was a re-insurance of a risk already insured against by the plaintiff; and the jury, in an action by him on the policy, having found that the fact of its being a re-insurance was immaterial, and that there had been no concealment, the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, on the ground that the plaintiff, being only interested as a re-insurer, was not entitled to recover on the policy sued on; and it was Held, by the Court of Appeal (affirming the decision of the Court of Exchequer), that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, for that the nature of the interest insured did not alter the risk, and the description in the policy was sufficient to cover such interest.

Glover v. Black (3 Burr. 1395), and Lucena v. Crawford (2 Bos. & P., H. of L. 350), discussed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer, discharging a rule obtained by the defendant to enter the verdict for him: (see the case reported in the court below, ante, vol. II., p. 490; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 163; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 142; 44 L. J. 81, Ex.)

The rule came on to be argued on the 9th and 10th Feb., before Bramwell, Pollock, and Amphlett, BB., in the Exchequer, when the rule was discharged, the court holding that an insurance of goods would cover a re-insurance.

Herschell, Q.C. and Baylis, Q.C.—The question is, whether an insurance on cotton for 5000*l.* will cover a re-insurance. The evidence at the trial was, that in all cases of re-insurance it was customary among merchants to disclose the fact. It was held in Glover v. Black (3 Bur. 1394) that an insurance on goods, as goods, does not cover respondentia. [Brett, J.—The general rule is, that you need not describe the nature of the interest; is not respondentia and bottomry an exception to the general rule?] Lord Mansfield, in Glover v. Black, grounds his decision on mercantile custom, as in the case here, and if custom is not given effect to, the court will be inverting the course of business. It is true the underwriter can protect himself by demanding, on every contract of insurance, whether it is a re-insurance; but this would be tantamount to requiring a warranty, and it is better to adapt the law to the practice of business than to give a decision which would cause the whole course of business to be altered. [Blackburn, J., referred to McSweeney v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (14 Q. B. 634).] In Lucena v. Crawford (2 B. & P., H. of L. 350), it was held that "profits and commission" are not covered by insurance on "ship and goods." [The Lord Chancellor.—There the person insuring has no interest in the goods themselves; all that he is interested in is something dependent upon the arrival of the goods, and that cannot be covered by an insurance of goods.] The case relied on in the court below was Crawley v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478), where Lord Tenterden says that a carrier may insure, and as he is an insurer himself such insurance is a re-insurance. But the carrier has a special property in the goods, an insurance by a carrier has never been treated as a re-insurance, or he would have come within the statute 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4, prohibiting all re-assurance, with a certain exception, namely, "unless the insurer shall be insolvent, become a bankrupt, or die, in either of which cases his executors, administrators, or assigns, may make re-insurance to the amount of the sum before by him assured, provided it shall be expressed in the policy to be a re-insurance," which is now repealed. [Blackburn, J.—The carrier has an interest similar to a mortgagee.] In Massachusets a re-insurance must be so stated, in New York it need not. (See 1 Phillips on Insurance, s. 498, c. 5, s. 8.) [The Lord Chancellor.—Up to what time was the statute, ordering re-insurance to be stated on the policy, in force?] Up to 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, sched. B., when it was repealed. [The Lord Chancellor.—Then I don't think the custom is of any avail here, as there is no time for a custom to have sprung up.] There would be time since 27 & 28 Vict. c. 65, s. 1, when the prohibition was removed; the very time for a custom to spring up would be at the termination of a regulation which had been in force for 160 years. Supposing there to be a real practical difference between an insurance of goods and a re-insurance, a man is brought a slip in the present form, he would then be bound by a contract he did not intend to enter into. There is a practical difference between insurance and re-insurance which disposes underwriters not to take a re-insurance.

Benjamin, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence with him).—There is an authority directly in point to contradict the contention that it requires an interest in order to insure: (Reed v. Cole, 3 Bur. 1512.) Though this case was decided only one year after Glover v. Black, yet Glover v. Black was not referred to, showing Glover v. Black to be an exceptional case. It has always been held that the nature of the interest may be left at large, though the subject of the interest must be described, and it is only in the one case of Glover v. Black that it has been held that the nature of the interest must be described, owing to some custom. There is no distinction between goods themselves and their value for the purpose of insurance, there is nothing insured beyond their value, but profits on goods are distinct things, because profits are beyond the value of the goods, and so is freight. For 160 years Parliament enacted that no one should re-insure without putting in the policy that it was a re-insurance, and seven years ago Parliament repealed this, which showed that Parliament formerly thought it necessary and now thinks it unnecessary; therefore, is it surprising that people come forward to say that there is the practice among underwriters to disclose the fact of re-insurance?

Herschell, Q.C., in reply.—Reed v. Cole was not an action on a policy, it was an action on articles of agreement, and the question turned on those articles. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10.—Blackburn, J., delivered the judgment of the Court.—This is an appeal against the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, discharging a rule obtained to enter a verdict for the defendant.

The action is on a policy of marine insurance, which is set out in full in the declaration. It is the ordinary form of a Lombard-street policy, and the blank in the printed form where it is usual to insert the description of the subject-matter of the insurance, is thus filled up "5000*l.* on cotton." The plaintiff made the policy as agent for, and to protect the interest of American underwriters who had insured cotton for Fatman and Company of New Orleans, to the amount of 80,000*l.*, and was in fact a re-insurance to the amount of 5000*l.* At the trial a question was raised as to whether there was an undue concealment. On that issue the verdict passed for the plaintiff, without any point being reserved, and consequently the Court of Appeal has nothing to do with that issue. The only question before this court is that stated in the rule which has been discharged, viz., whether the verdict should be entered for the defendant, "on the ground that the plaintiff (or rather the parties for whom the plaintiff made the insurance, and on whose behalf he sues) being only interested as a reinsurer, was not entitled to recover on the policy sued on."

It is stated in the case that the defendant gave in evidence, by the testimony of witnesses whose evidence was not contradicted, that in all cases of re-insurance policies the invariable practice has been to disclose the fact of the insurance being a re-insurance. Mr. Herschell argued on this as if it was a statement that it was the usage and custom of trade always to describe the interest in the policy as being a re-insurance, but we think the statement does not bear that meaning. Re-insurance was in this country prohibited by stat. 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4, unless the assurer should be insolvent, become a bankrupt, or die, "in either of which cases the assurer, his executors, administrators, or assigns might make re-assurance to the amount before by him assured, provided it was expressed in the policy to be a re-assurance," and this prohibition continued in force till as late as 1864, so that there has not been sufficient time for a custom to spring up in this country; and there is no such custom in America where re-insurance was always lawful: (see Phillips on Insurance, c. 5, s. 8, s. 498, p. 270, 3rd edit.) However, the evidence seems to have been directed to the issue found by the jury for the plaintiff, and has reference, not to the description in the policy, but the practice of making a disclosure to the assurer. The question, therefore, seems to us to be confined to this, whether, applying the ordinary principles of interpretation of written documents, and the established rules of insurance law to this kind of insurance, the description in this policy is sufficient to cover it. The court below decided that it was; and we are of opinion that their decision was right, and must be affirmed.

A description of the subject-matter of the insurance is required, both from the nature of the contract and from the universal practice of insurers. It is generally described very concisely, as being so much "on ship," "on goods," "on freight," "on profits on goods," "on advances on coolies," "on emigrant money," and many other examples might be given. And if no property which answers the description in the policy be at risk, the policy will not attach, though the assured may have other property at risk of equal or greater value; the reason being that the assurers have not entered into a contract to indemnify the assured for any loss on that other property. Thus, a policy on "piece goods" will not make the insurer liable for a loss on hats: (Hunter v. Princes, Marshall on Insurance, 4th edit., 255). In Phillips on Insurance (vol. 1, chap. 5, s. 415, 3rd edit., p. 231) it is said: "It is necessary that the thing insured, and in some cases also the kind of interest intended to be protected, should be sufficiently set forth in the policy, or that the policy should at least prescribe the way of ascertaining to what the contract is to be applied." And this seems a fair statement of what is required, and is in strict accordance with what is stated by Lord Tenterden in Crowley v. Cohen (3 B. & A. 478): "Although the subject-matter of the insurance must be properly described the nature of the interest may in general be left at large. In some cases the nature of the interest in the thing insured is such as to vary the nature of the risk, and then it should be stated." In McSweeny v. Royal Exchange (14 Q. B. 634), the policy was "profit on rice." The Court of Queen's Bench held the plaintiffs entitled to recover—but that judgment was reversed. The Court of Exchequer Chamber, in delivering judgment say (14 Q. B. 659), "The first question discussed was, whether the plaintiff had an insurable interest in profits on the rice. Under the circumstances stated in the special verdict we feel no doubt that he had. He had entered into a binding contract with Drouhet and Company, by virtue of which he would have had a right to 6000 bags of rice, delivered to him in England on the safe termination of the voyage of the Edward Bilton to England, with the whole of that quantity of rice on board, before the end of May; and he had made another contract to sell the rice in these events, by which contract he had secured a profit of 1*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. We have no doubt that the plaintiff might have recovered, in the events which have happened, a total loss if he had been insured by a policy properly adapted to the case, and so drawn so as to cover his special interest, from the time that the rice was appropriated by the vendors and ready to be shipped at Madras, and also to assure him against losses of the expected profits—not merely by loss of all the rice by the perils of the sea, but by the loss of any part of it, or the loss of the ship or delay of the voyage beyond the month of May; in any of which contingencies this special interest in profits would have been entirely defeated. If such an insurance had been made on this peculiar interest, against all these events, it is obvious that the underwriters would have required a much larger premium for insuring so complicated a risk than for an ordinary insurance by an owner on goods, or profit on goods, which would be liable to loss only by perils of the seas or other accidents happening to the goods themselves.

In all cases where the peculiar nature of the interest alters the risk, it may be properly said that such interest is the subject-matter of the insurance, and at all events there is great force in the argument, that the nature of that interest should be stated. But in the case now before us, the nature of the interest of the parties assured in the cotton does not in the slightest degree vary the nature of the risk. Had the policy in this case been made by the plaintiff in the very same terms but on behalf of and to cover the interest of Fatman and Co., the owners of the cotton, the underwriters would have had to pay to the plaintiffs the sum which would indemnify Fatman and Co. for any damage to the cotton from the perils insured against, and the plaintiffs would have received that sum for the benefit of Fatman and Co. As the facts are, the person on whose behalf the insurance is made, have bound themselves to pay this sum to Fatman and Co., and the defendants are required to pay the same amount, and under precisely the same circumstances, to the plaintiff, but for the benefit, not of Fatman and Co., but of the parties on behalf of whom the plaintiff made the assurance. The subject-matter of the assurance, viz., the cotton, is fully described, and there is no apparent reason which would make it just to require the nature of the interest to be described.

Still, if there were a series of decisions determining that in such a case, or in cases analogous to it, a description was required beyond what would seem to us reasonable, we should be unwilling to disturb the established practice. But we do not find any such decisions. In Glover v. Black (3 Burr. 1395), the plaintiff had lent a sum of money on a bottomry bond, which is set out in the case at p. 1395. By the condition, if the ship arrived at the Thames he was to be paid his loan with maritime interest, or, if the ship should be utterly lost on the voyage, he was to be paid a just and proportionate average on all goods belonging to the obligor shipped at any time on the vessel and not unavoidably lost. The plaintiff meant to insure his interest in the bond, and told the underwriters so; but by a blunder drew up the policy in the ordinary form of a policy on goods and merchandise. The underwriters were unconscientious enough to contest the policy, and Lord Mansfield very reluctantly decided in their favour. But it seems enough to state the nature of the plaintiffs' interest to show that the real risk intended to be, but not described, was a very different one from that on goods, which is all that that case decided. Lucena v. Crawford (2 Bos. & B. N. R. 269) has always been treated as deciding that though profits may be insured they must be described as such and we took time in this case, principally with a view to see what were the reasons for this decision and whether they were applicable to such a case as the present. We cannot find the reasons stated in the report of Lucena v. Crawford, but in the case of Routh v. Thomson (11 East, 428), in which similar points arose soon after, Lord Ellenborough states them thus at p. 433: "Independently, however, of the difficulty of fixing the value, and supposing such a chance insurable, must it not be insured specifically as such chance? Must not the interest be so described in the policy? Can a man who has no right, legal or equitable, either in ship or freight, effect an insurance on either merely because he has a chance that some collateral benefit may arise to him if the ship and cargo should arrive in safety? The declaration must aver an interest in the subject insured, and that interest must be proved; and how can it be said that these captors have any interest either in the ship or the freight, when the ship is altogether the king's, and the captors have no interest in either? nor other concern in respect to the same beyond a mere chance that the king may be induced to give them something out of the produce of such ship and freight." This reasoning, whether binding as an authority or not, is clear and intelligible, but it seems to us to have no application to such a case as the present. The assured here had a direct interest in the safe arrival of the cotton; not in any way a collateral interest in something else after the cotton arrived. It was, though not a property in the cotton, an interest in the cotton created and evidenced by a binding legal contract between them and the owners of that cotton; and if the mode in which they acquired that interest had been stated in the policy, it would have in no way altered the effect of the defendant's contract, which would still have remained to be, to indemnify against all damage sustained by the cotton in consequence of any of the perils insured against.

We think, therefore, that the judgment below should be affirmed.

Atwood (app.) v. Case (resp.)

Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 237, construction of—Going on board newly arriving ship, "before actual arrival."

By sect. 237 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, every person (except as therein accepted) who "goes on board any ship about to arrive at the place of her destination before her actual arrival in dock, or at the place of her discharge, without the permission of the master," incurs a penalty as therein mentioned.

C., without leave of the master, went on board a ship bound from a foreign port to Bristol, as she lay in the Cumberland basin of Bristol Harbour. The ship (which the crew soon afterwards left) remained in the basin all night, but did not, nor was it intended that she should, discharge her cargo there. The next morning she was moored further into the harbour, and discharged her cargo at another quay in the port of Bristol.

An information having been preferred before justices against C. for contravening sect. 237 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the justices dismissed the same. The informant having appealed under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

Held, that the ship had actually arrived in dock, and that judgment ought to be for the respondent.

This was a case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, by two justices of the peace for the town and county of Bristol.

1. Upon the hearing of a certain information preferred by the appellant, a police officer and a person employed in the service of Her Majesty's Board of Trade, against the respondent, a sailor's boarding-house keeper, for that he, not being in Her Majesty's service, and not being duly authorised by law for the purpose, unlawfully did go on board a certain British ship, to wit, the Lord Duncan, about to arrive at her place of destination before her actual arrival in dock or at the place of her discharge, without the permission of the master of the said ship, contrary to the 237th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, we dismissed the case.

2. The section referred to is as follows:

Every person who, not being in Her Majesty's service, and not being duly authorised by law for the purpose, goes on board any ship about to arrive at the place of her destination, before her actual arrival in dock or at the place of her discharge, without the permission of the master, shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £20; and the master or person in charge of such ship may take any such person so going on board as aforesaid into custody, and deliver him up forthwith to any constable or peace officer to be by him taken before a justice or justices, and to be dealt with according to the provisions of this Act.

3. The said ship arrived from a foreign port on Sunday, the 4th July, 1875, and passed through the gate of the Cumberland Basin in the port of Bristol, in the city and county of Bristol, about seven o'clock in the evening.

4. Immediately after the ship had entered the basin the appellant, who is specially employed by the Board of Trade for the purpose, went on boards introduced himself to the master, and remained on board with his permission. Very shortly afterwards, and while the ship was being moored, the respondent went on board her, his alleged object being to see one of the crew. He spoke to the master, but did not obtain permission to remain on board, the master telling him that he was not wanted. The respondent went away from the ship and returned on board again shortly afterwards, and he then refused to leave when requested by the appellant so to do.

5. The crew left the ship on arriving in the basin, which is usual, and the ship remained there all night.

6. The next morning she was moored further into the floating harbour, and afterwards discharged her cargo at another quay in the port of Bristol.

7. Cumberland Basin is divided from the river Avon by dock gates, and is a complete dock forming part of, but divided by other dock gates from the rest of the docks formed under and governed by the Bristol Dock Act 1868, and other local Acts. There are quays on each side of the basin at which ships frequently discharge cargoes, but the Lord Duncan did not discharge, and it was not intended that she should discharge any of her cargo there.

8. On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the section, being penal, must be read strictly, and that the words were alternative, so that it was enough to take his actions out of the provisions of the statute if the vessel could be said to have arrived: (1) "At her place of destination," or (2) "In Dock," or (3) "At the place of her discharge."

But in this case, as to all three phrases, it was agreed, as a fact, that she had arrived at her place of destination, that she was in dock, and that she had also arrived at the place of her discharge.

9. On behalf of the appellant, it was contended that it was not sufficient that the vessel had arrived in port to exempt a person acting as the respondent had acted, from being amenable to the statute that so long as she had not arrived "at the place of her discharge," he could not board without permission from the master, and that it was not until Monday the 5th July last that the Lord Duncan arrived at the place of her discharge.

The justices decided as follows:—(1) That the ship was not "about to arrive at the place of her destination" (which, having regard to the section, they considered a condition precedent to bringing the respondent within its words) as she had actually arrived there, that is to say, she had arrived at Bristol; (2) That she was in dock, that is to say, in the Cumberland Basin; and (3) That she had arrived at the place of her discharge, which was Bristol, although she was not then actually at the quay at which she was afterwards unloaded, inasmuch as that precise locality as to all ships depends more or less upon the Bristol Quay warden's arrangements, and upon various circumstances over which owners and masters of ships have no control or foreknowledge.

A plan accompanied the case.

Bowen for the appellant argued that great stress was to be laid upon the word "actual" in the section. The arrival in the present case was only a constructive arrival. [QUAIN, J.—This is a penal statute and must, as such, be construed strictly.]

Cole, Q.C., for the respondent, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the respondent, and that upon the second of the grounds mentioned by the justices. Neither the first or third grounds are supportable. It is idle to say that the port of Bristol was the place of destination of this ship. She was in dock when she was in Cumberland, Basin, and that is enough. There was an actual arrival of the ship within the meaning of the section.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion and for the same reason.

QUAIN, J.—A strict construction should be put upon the statute. The ship had arrived in dock. The words "other place of her discharge" were, I think, put in to embrace the cases which might arise of a ship discharging elsewhere than in dock.

On the other two grounds the justices were wrong. Judgment for the respondent.

HUTCHINSON v. GLOVER.

Discovery—Compromise of cross cases of collision between defendant and third party—Plaintiff's right to inspect terms of compromise.

In an action by owner of cargo against shipowner the plaintiff alleged damage in consequence of a collision with another ship caused by defendant's negligent navigation. A compromise of cross suits in the Admiralty Court in respect of the collision had been entered into by the respective owners of the two ships.

Held that the plaintiff had a right to inspect the terms of this compromise.

THIS was a motion on the defendants' behalf to discharge an order made by Quain, J. at chambers, so far as it related to an allowance of inspection by the plaintiffs of certain documents in the defendants' possession.

It appeared from the statement of claim that the plaintiffs were consignees in London of certain bales of hemp, shipped at Konigsberg on board the defendants' steamship Burlington for carriage to London upon the terms of a bill of lading containing the usual exceptions from liability.

On the 30th Nov. 1873, while the Burlington was coming up the River Thames in the course of her voyage from Konigsberg to London, with the bales on board, and before they were delivered, she came into collision with another vessel called the Hakon Adelsteen. In this collision the Burlington was struck with violence on her port side and sank under water, and thereby the bales were damaged. The collision and subsequent damage were occasioned, the plaintiffs alleged, by the negligence and unskilful navigation of the master and crew of the Burlington or of other servants of the defendants on board that ship. In consequence the plaintiffs suffered a loss upon the bales of 770*l.*—749*l.* by reason of damage to the goods and 21*l.* which they were compelled to pay on account of the said goods by way of general average contribution.

The defendants, in their statement, denied this allegation of negligence, stated that the Hakon Adelsteen was not at the time of the said collision being navigated by them or their servants, and alleged that if and so far the said collision and subsequent damage were occasioned by the negligent or unskilful navigation of either of the said ships, they were occasioned by the negligence and unskilful navigation of those on board, and navigating the Hakon Adelsteen.

The managing owner of the steamship Burlington, one of the defendants, enumerated in his affidavit of discovery the documents relating to this action which were in his possession or power, and objected to produce all those which related wholly to a suit and cross suit in the High Court of Admiralty to which the owner of the said steamship Hakon Adelsteen and the owners of the said steamship Burlington, the defendants in the present action, were parties suing at the request and for the benefit of their respective underwriters; such suits were instituted in the said court by the said parties to recover each from the other damages in respect of the same collision as is alleged in the statement of claim. The question, which of the said two steamships was to blame for the said collision was the main issue in the said suits, and he contended that all such documents, papers, letters and other writings were immaterial and irrelevant in this action as being res inter alios actæ, that none of them could be admissible as evidence in the present action, and that they could only be used by way of prejudice against the defendants herein.

Amongst these documents was one described as "The agreement for carrying out a private arrangement to put an end to litigation in the said suits entered into between David Brown on behalf of the said owners of the Hakon Adelsteen and William Lamplough on behalf of the said owners of the Burlington, the defendants in this action, and an average statement made upon the basis of this agreement."

At chambers Quain, J., notwithstanding the defendants' objection, made an order that the plaintiff should be at liberty to inspect this agreement as well as the other documents enumerated.

Witt, now moved on the defendants' behalf by way of appeal from this order. A party to a suit cannot be required to produce documents relating to the compromise of a dispute between himself and a person not a party to the suit. This was so held in Warrick v. Queen's College Oxford (L. Rep. 4 Eq. 254) where Lord Romilly, M.R. thus described the question before him "A plaintiff files a bill against the lord of a manor, claiming certain rights over certain commons within the manor. Previously to the bill being filed the lord of the manor entered into an agreement with certain other persons who claimed a right upon the land for the compromise of that claim; and the documents relating to that compromise are sought to be seen in this suit without the other persons who were parties to the compromise being parties to the suit. I am of opinion that that cannot be obtained. I express no opinion as to what might be the case if the War Office were parties to this suit; but I do not think the doctrines relating to privilege affect the question on this summons in the slightest degree. The question is, whether a person who claims property in the hands of the defendant is entitled to require the terms of, and the documents relating to, a compromise made between the defendant and a third person relating to the same property at an anterior period, to be produced without that other party to the compromise being before the court. I am of opinion that this court will not compel such production." [BLACKBURN, J.—That seems to go upon technical ground that the party to the compromise should be made a party to the suit.] A compromise between two parties cannot be said to be in the exclusive possession of one of them, and Lord Cottenham decided in Reid v. Langlois (1 M. & G. 627, at p. 636) that the authorities "show that where a document is not in the exclusive possession of a party, but is shared by somebody else jointly with him, the production cannot be ordered. This is a well established rule, and cannot be considered as now open to dispute." [BLACKBURN, J.—It does not appear that the other party to this compromise objects to its production; his right to do so under any circumstances may also be disputed.] My next point is that this compromise and the documents relating to it are not relevant to the issues in this action. If the admiralty suits had proceeded to judgment, the judgment, even if against the defendants here, could not have been received as evidence against them in this action. [FIELD, J.—The compromise may contain, what the judgment would not, an admission of liability.]

Cohen, Q.C. appeared for the plaintiff to support the judge's order.

BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think it is necessary to call upon Mr. Cohen. If we were to decide this on the question of the exclusive possession of this document, it would devolve upon the applicant to show that the other party to the compromise objected to its production; so it is not necessary to consider that matter here. The next objection to the inspection of this document was that it is not relevant to the action now to be tried; but if it should turn out to contain, as is probably the case, an admission by the defendants that they were negligent in the navigation of their ship, then it would be evidence to be used by anybody against them. In a case in this court, Richards v. Morgan (4 B. & S. 641) I expressed an opinion, which was overruled by the majority of the judges, that a statement made under the old Chancery system would not be taken as an admission against the person who made it. This is a far stronger case than that, and upon the decision of the court in that case there can be no doubt, to my mind, that the terms of this compromise may be adduced as evidence of any admission by the defendants relative to the issue in this action, which it may contain. We do not require to hear the plaintiffs, but as they have been brought here to answer this application, the motion must be refused with costs.

QUAIN and FIELD, JJ. concurred.

Motion refused.

NUGENT v. SMITH.

Carrier by water—Whether liable as insurer for loss out of realm—Damage to horse by plunging from fright caused by storm—Whether storm "act of God"—How far all shipowners liable as common carriers.

The common law liability of a carrier attaches to a contract for carriage to a place without the realm.

A loss occasioned by the act of God is a loss caused exclusively by a violent act of nature such as a carrier could not possibly foresee or resist the effect of.

It lies upon a carrier to show that a loss for which he would otherwise be liable was occasioned by the act of God.

The plaintiff delivered to the defendant in London a mare to be carried by the defendant by steamer from London to Aberdeen, between which places the defendant advertised and habitually ran steamers. A storm arising during the voyage, the mare was so injured that she died. The jury found that the injury was cause partly by excessive bad weather, and partly by the fright and struggling of the mare, and they negatived all negligence on the part of the defendant.

Held that the defendant was liable, and a verdict having been entered for the defendant at the trial, a rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff made absolute.

Semble, that all shipowners carrying goods for hire are liable as common carriers in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the written judgment of the court. The following is an outline of the arguments:

Holl and Douglass Walker, for the defendant, showed cause.

1. The defendant on his passage from a place within to a place without the realm is not a common carrier, so as to render him liable as an insurer for loss to goods which happens without the realm.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2.—The following written judgment of the court (Brett and Denman, JJ.) was read by BRETT, J.—In this case, which was tried in London before Brett, J., the plaintiff delivered to the defendant's company in London a mare to be carried by steamer to Aberdeen. The defendant company advertised and habitually ran a line of steamers from London to Aberdeen. The mare was shipped without any bill of lading. At a part of the voyage, which was not determined by the evidence, the mare, during rough weather, was injured, and to such an extent that she died. There was a conflict of evidence as to the amount of care and skill exercised by the defendant's servants, and as to the conduct of the mare. The jury were asked: First, was the injury to the mare caused by negligence of the defendant's servants either in preparing for bad weather, or in attempting to save the mare from the consequences of bad weather? Answer, "No." Secondly, or was the injury caused solely by the conduct of the mare herself by reason of fright and consequent struggling without any negligence of the defendant's servants? Answer, "No." Thirdly, or was the injury caused solely by perils of the sea, that is to say, by more than ordinary rough weather, without any negligence of the defendant's servants, or any fright and consequent struggling of the mare? Answer, "No." Fourthly, or was it caused partly by more than ordinary bad weather, and partly by the conduct of the mare herself by reason of fright and consequent struggling, without any negligence of the defendant's servants? Answer, "Yes." Fifthly, were there any known means, though not ordinarily used in the carriage of horses by people of ordinary care and skill, by which the defendant could have prevented the injury to the mare? This question the jury did not answer. Upon the answers of the jury a verdict for the purpose of the day was directed to be entered for the defendant, the plaintiff having leave to enter a verdict for him on the findings of the jury, if upon such findings the court should be of opinion that he was entitled to judgment. Upon a rule granted to show cause it was admitted on behalf of the defendant that if the whole voyage had been within the realm of England the defendant's company would have been deemed to be common carriers according to the custom of the realm, because they advertised to carry any person's goods from place to place; but it was argued that under the circumstances of the case they could not be so deemed, because they undertook to carry to a port without the realm, and therefore a part of the voyage was beyond the realm and could not be subject to the custom of the realm. It was then argued that it was consistent with the evidence that the injury was caused outside the realm, and, therefore, that in respect of such injury could not be regulated by the custom of the realm. It was also contended that the peril of the sea, which caused the injury, being the result of more than ordinary bad weather, that is to say, of weather not to be expected in an ordinary voyage, was, if the case was to be decided upon a carrier's liability according to the custom of the realm, the act of God within the meaning of that exception to a carrier's liability; and further that the injury having happened partly through the conduct, from its inherent nature, of the mare, the defendant could not be held responsible. It was argued for the plaintiff that the defendant's company by advertising that they would carry the goods for any person from place to place undertook the responsibilities of and became common carriers according to the custom of the realm of England; that this would be the case of any persons so advertising in England, and would be so in the case of any British shipowner so advertising anywhere; that the circumstance of one of the termini of the proposed voyage being outside the realm did not alter the liabilities; that even if the defendant's company were not common carriers, yet they were shipowners carrying goods on board ship as matter of trade for hire, and shipowners so carrying goods are by the custom of the realm responsible as insurers for the safety of the goods to the same extent as common carriers are responsible; that the peril of the sea, which caused the injury in this case, was not the act of God within the meaning of the exception to the complete liability of a common carrier of goods for hire, for that an injury can only be said within the meaning of that exception to have been occasioned by the act of God when it has been occasioned directly and not indirectly by the extraordinary action of some physical force, the consequences of which could not be averted, or by some unexpected and extraordinary natural occurrence which human foresight could not foresee, nor human power resist or prevent; whereas there was in the present case a sea more rough indeed than on an ordinary voyage, that is to say, a peril of the sea, but nothing more; that the natural fright of the mare, caused by the more than ordinary rough weather, was not an inherent vice of the mare which could absolve the defendant from liability for the injury to the mare.

The case was elaborately argued before my brother Denman and myself. The main question treated was the principle on which the liability of the defendant, if any, ought to rest. It was argued on behalf of the defendant that the liability cannot be made to rest on an allegation that the defendant's company were common carriers, because it was said that that liability is imposed by a custom of the realm, and such a custom cannot have force beyond the realm, and the defendant has a right to assume in the present case that the injury to the mare happened beyond the realm. But the phrase "by the custom of the realm" is in truth only a paraphrase for "by the common law." Thus in Selwyn's Nisi Prius title "Carriers," chap. 10, it is said: "And by the custom of the realm, that is by the common law, &c." And in Story on Bailment, s. 469: "The general principles of the Roman and foreign law upon this subject have been stated somewhat more at large, because they form a proper introduction to the doctrine of the common law on this subject, and in which the responsibility of innkeepers is said to be founded on the custom of the realm," because, "in point of fact the origin of the latter may be clearly traced up to the Roman law, from which the common law, without any adequate acknowledgment, has from time to time borrowed many of the important principles which regulate the subject of contracts." And in Forward v. Pittard (1 T. Rep. 27) Lord Mansfield says: "But there is a farther degree of responsibility by the custom of the realm, that is by the common law." In Crouch v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (sup.), Jervis, C.J. says: "When a party who holds himself out as a common carrier accepts goods, the common law, that is, the law founded on the custom of the realm, ingrafts upon such acceptance a contract to carry safely and to insure, subject only to the exceptions, namely, the act of God and the Queen's enemies." The question, therefore, is one of contract, and depending upon the nature of the undertaking to be implied by the common law of England. The contract is obviously made at the time of the receipt of the goods for carriage. If that receipt be in England, on board an English ship, the whole contract must be construed according to English law. If it be abroad by an English master, on board an English ship, it is still an English contract, because it is a contract made under the English flag (Lloyd v. Guibert, 35 L. J. 74, Q. B.; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115); and therefore in that last case also the question is, what is the undertaking to be implied on the part of the shipowner by the common law of England. The question being one of contract, there is no principle of law which forbids the implication of a promise to carry safely beyond as well as within the realm. The reason of the implied promise given by Lord Holt in Coggs v. Bernard (2 Lord Raym. 909; s. c. 1 Smith's Leading Cases 177, 6th edit.), and by Best, C.J. in Riley v. Horne (5 Bing. 212; s. c. 7 L. J., O. S., 32), founded on the reason on which the Prætor allowed the exceptional liability of shipmasters, innkeepers, &c., applies at least quite as strongly to the part of the carriage by sea beyond the realm as to the part within it. There is no ground on which to imply a different extent of undertaking in the same contract for the carriage which is beyond the realm from that which is within it. On principle, therefore, the same promise should be implied for the whole carriage, whether the whole be within the realm or part be within and part without. Mors v. Slue (1 Vent. 190; s. c. 2 Keb. 866) has always been treated as a decision that the same promise is implied when the ship is to go beyond sea as when she is always within the realm. And so has Goff v. Clinkard quoted in Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281); Crouch v. The London and North-Western Railway (14 Com. B. Rep. 255; s. c. 23 L. J. 73, C. P.) is precisely to the same effect. And Kent, C.J. in Elliott v. Rossell (6 Johns. 170) lays it down in the strongest terms: "Masters and owners of vessels are liable as common carriers on the high seas as well as in port, and the argument of the ingenious counsel for the defendant is not well supported in the position that the doctrine of common carriers is by the common law of England to be confined to cases of transportation by water within the jurisdiction of the realm, and that it does not apply to losses arising out of the state. All the books and all the cases which touch this subject lay down the rule generally and apply it as well to shipments to or from a foreign port as to internal commerce. If the master be chargeable as a common carrier for goods received to be transported beyond sea, it would seem to be very extraordinary and idle for the law to regard him in that character only from the time that the goods were received on board until he had put to sea, and to regard him when coming from abroad as a common carrier only from the time that he entered within the jurisdiction of the port. There is no colour of such a limitation of the rule." It seems to us there is no answer to this reasoning. In all these cases the undertaking or promise is treated as one and indivisible. And we are of opinion that whether the promise is to be implied only in ships which are held out as common carriers, or in all ships which carry goods for hire, the promise or undertaking to be implied is, both on principle and authority, one and indivisible, and applies precisely to the same extent to a loss occurring in the part of the voyage beyond the realm as to one occurring in the part within the realm. If, therefore, it is right to say that the liability of insurance attaches to a shipowner, because he holds himself out to be a common carrier, the defendant's company, who did so hold themselves out, were subject to the ordinary liability of common carriers, and could not, in the absence of any other defence, absolve themselves on the ground that they may asume that the mare was injured beyond the realm. That some shipowners so treat their business as to be within the definition of "common carriers," and to be properly so treated in every respect, is clear. This was stated in Mors v. Slue (1 Vent. 190; s. c. 2 Keb. 866), in Coggs v. Bernard (2 Lord Raym. 909; s. c. Smith's Leading Cases, 177, 6th edit.), and has been in a multitude of other cases. A general ship is, by the mere fact of being so put up, made in all respects a common carrier, though she is going to a foreigh port: (Barclay v. Gona, 3 Dougl. 389 and Lavaroni v. Drury, 8 Ex. Rep. 166; s. c. 22 L. J. 2, Ex.). It would be sufficient, therefore, in the present case to say that the defendants were common carriers, and therefore, at all events, subject to the liabilities of common carriers according to the common law.

But it was strongly argued that this is not the real ground of their liability in the case of shipowners: that some shipowners who carry goods for hire are not common carriers, and yet are, in the absence of express contract, liable to the same extent as common carriers; that, in fact, all shipowners who carry goods for hire, whether they be common carriers or not, are, in the absence of express contract, made liable by implication by the common law to ensure the safe carriage and delivery of the goods entrusted to them, except against the act of God and the Queen's enemies; that the true ground of such liability in the case of the shipowner is not that they are common carriers, but that they are shipowners carrying goods for hire. It is not absolutely necessary, as we have pointed out, to determine this question in this case. But it is obviously one of great importance, and, as it was made a main point of argument, and was most ably argued, we think it right to give our judgment on it.

In order to determine whether there may not be some shipowners who carry goods for hire, and who, nevertheless, are not common carriers, we should determine exactly what it is that makes a man a common carrier.—"It is not every person who undertakes to carry goods for hire that is deemed a common carrier. A private person may contract with another for the carriage of his goods, and incur no responsibility beyond that of an ordinary bailee for hire, that is to say, the responsibility of ordinary diligence. To bring a person within the description of a common carrier he must exercise it as a public employment: he must undertake to carry goods for persons generally; and he must hold himself out as ready to engage in the transportation of goods for hire, as a business, not as a casual occupation pro hac vice. A common carrier has, therefore, been defined to be one who undertakes for hire or reward to transport the goods of those as chose to employ him from place to place." Story on Bailments (sect. 495). In Fish v. Chapman (2 Kelly's (Georgia) Rep. 353) it was held in what we venture to call a powerful and business-like judgment, that is, well applying the principles of the law to the business of the country, that "to constitute a man a common carrier, the business of carrying must be habitual and not casual. The undertaking must be general, and for all people indifferently. He must thus assume to be the servant of the public; he must undertake for all people." When it is said that the owners and masters of ships are deemed common carriers it is to be understood of such ships as are employed as general ships or for the transportation of merchandise for persons in general, such as vessels employed in the coasting trade, or in general freighting business for all persons offering goods on freight or for the port of destination (See Story on Bailments, sect. 501). The real test of whether a man is a common carrier, whether by land or water, therefore, really is, whether he has held out that he will, so long as he has room, carry for hire the goods of every person who will bring goods to him to be carried. The test is not whether he is carrying on a public employment, or whether he carries to a fixed place; but whether he holds out, either expressly or by a course of conduct, that he will carry for hire so long as he has room the goods of all persons indifferently who send him goods to be carried. If he does this, his first responsibility naturally is that he is bound by a promise implied by law to receive and carry for a reasonable price the goods sent to him upon such an invitation. This responsibility is not one adopted from the Roman law on grounds of policy: it arises according to the general principles which govern all implied promises. And his second responsibility, which arises upon reasons of policy, is that he carries the goods upon a contract of insurance. The policy has fixed this latter liability upon common carriers by land or water, not because they hold themselves out to carry for all persons indifferently; if that were all, there would be no ground for the policy, it would be without reason; many other persons hold themselves out to act in their trade and business for all persons indifferently who will employ them, and the policy in question is not applied to such trades; the policy is applied to the trade of common carriers, because, when the common law adopted that policy the business of common carriers in England was exercised in a particular manner and subject to particular conditions which called for the adoption of that policy. The question is, whether the policy has not been applied, not only to shipowners who are by their own act common carriers, but also to shipowners who are not common carriers. Whether a shipowner is or is not a common carrier must surely, upon principle, as from the cases and writings just quoted it appears to be on authority, depend on whether the shipowner holds himself out to carry for hire for all persons who may offer. But certainly many shipowners do not, in fact, do so. A shipowner who puts his ships into brokers' hands to procure a charter does not hold himself out to carry for the first person who offers; neither does a master who, in a foreign port, advertises that he is ready to enter into charters. The shipowner or master has a right to consider the credit and responsibility of the proposed charterer, and to reject his proposal if it be thought expedient. One who puts up his ship as a general ship does, by so doing, by the ordinary understanding of shipowners and merchants, hold himself out as ready to carry all reasonable goods brought to him, and so does a shipowner who runs a line of ships from ports to ports, habitually carrying all goods brought to him. It is admitted, therefore, that such are common carriers and liable to all the implied undertakings of common carriers. The question is whether other shipowners carrying goods for hire without express stipulation, though they are not liable to all the implied undertakings of common carriers, are not by the common law, for reasons of policy, made also liable to one of those implied undertakings.

The solution of this question will, we think, depend upon a consideration of the time at which and the reason for which the liability in question was introduced into the common law. No one who has read the treatise of Mr. Justice Story on Bailments, the essay of Sir William Jones, and the judgment of Lord Holt on Coggs v. Bernard (2 Lord Raym, 909; s. c. 1 Smith's Leading Cases 177, 6th edition) can doubt that the common law of England as to bailments is founded upon, though it has not exactly adopted, the Roman law. It is true that Lord Holt rests, as for authority, solely on Bracton, but the treatise of Bracton adopts all the divisions of the Roman law in the very words of the Roman text, and further adopts the exception of the Roman law and the Roman reasons for it. The divisions may be the logical divisions of the subject, and so be naturally adopted by all in every country who treat the subject logically; but the exception both in the Roman empire and in England was no natural exception, but one depending entirely on public policy arising from the manner in which some particular kinds of business were carried on in both places. It is obvious, therefore, that Bracton, or English judges before him, adopted into the English the Roman law. By the primary divisions of the law of bailment in the Roman law and as enumerated by Lord Holt, those who carry goods for hire are, unless they are within the exception alluded to, liable only as other bailees for hire, that is to say, they are bound to ordinary diligence and to a reasonable exercise of skill, and of course are not responsible for any losses not occasioned by the ordinary negligence of themselves or their servants (Story on Bailments, sect. 437), but those that are within the exception are liable to insurers, &c. The question, therefore, is, what shipowners are brought within the exception? That exception was in the Roman law contained in the well-known edict of the Prætor, and the reason for its promulgation was contained in the commentary of Ulpian: "Ait Prætor, nautæ, caupones, stabularii(a), &c.," that is to say, shipmasters and the class of persons who carried on the business of innkeepers. If the proposition contained in the exceptional edict is to be considered as adopted straight and in terms into the common law, it is not some shipmasters, but all shipmasters, who are by the terms of it made liable to the greater liability. Carriers, it will be observed, are not mentioned, and certainly not a limited class of carriers called afterwards common carriers. The "Roman edict," says Story, "it will be at once perceived, does not extend in terms to carriers by land. But, in most, if not in all, modern countries the rule which it prescribes has been practically expounded so as to include them." (sect. 458). It required, of course, authority customary, and thence judicial or parliamentary, to introduce into the common law the original rules and the exception as applicable to any case. But, if the exception was to be introduced at all, to what would it naturally be first applied? It would seem that naturally it would first be applied to the trades or businesses which were carried on in England under the same names and conditions as formerly in the Roman Empire. Modern innkeegers probably carry on the same business as both the stabularii and caupones did in the olden time. The two trades, therefore, carried on in England under the same conditions as the three enumerated in the edict were the shipmasters and innkeepers. The conditions which had induced the Prætor as matter of policy to hold them to strict liability in Rome, where the same conditions as existed in the mode of carrying on the same business in England. The conditions on which the Prætor had acted with regard to shipmasters were not conditions confined to a certain limited portion of shipmasters, those conditions existed in the case of all. When then the

English judges, acting at first no doubt on the general understanding of all merchants and shipowners, adopted into the common law the exceptions of the Roman law, there is no reason which can be suggested why they should not and did not adopt it in its terms as applicable, not to a limited portion of, but to all shipmasters carrying goods for hire. Afterwards, according to the ordinary course of English law, the judges would have to consider whether some other trade or business was not to be in England introduced into the exception. They found a trade established in England, namely, "the trade of common carriers," which was so carried on, by reason of the state of the country as to be within the principle or conditions of the exception, and therefore they added that trade to those already within the exception. Common carriers would not be introduced because they carried the goods of all persons indifferently, but, because those who so carried goods at that time were within the mischief dealt with by the Prætor. If this be a true view, shipmasters and shipowners were not introduced because they were common carriers, but because they were shipmasters and shipowners, and therefore all shipmasters and shipowners were comprised in the exception when it was recognised and introduced by judicial decisions. Common carriers by land were added afterwards, because their business was subject to the same conditions as was the business of all carrying shipmasters and shipowners. Many attempts have been made to introduce into the exception other trades, as wharfingers, forwarding agents, carters, &c.; but all such attempts have failed, because those trades, although in respect of their being public or common trades they are similar to the trade of common carriers, are not similar to it in those respects in which it was similar to the trades of shipmasters and innkeepers. Unless there is something in the authority which binds us to determine that only such shipowners as made themselves common carriers were brought within the exception, reason, and consideration seem to us to show that all shipmasters and owners carrying goods for hire were from the beginning brought within it. Innkeepers were probably judicially declared to be within it first in Calye's Case (1 Smith's Leading Cases, 105, 6th edit.) Shipowners were first judicially declared to be within it in Morse v. Slue (1 Vent. 190; s. c. 2 Keb. 866). The facts of that case as stated in the special verdict in Ventris, p. 190, lead, one would think, strongly to the conclusion that she was a general ship; but, as has been observed by Blackburn, J. in the Liver Alkali Company v. Johnson (43 L. J. 216, Ex.; s. c. L. Rep. 9 Ex. 338), the count is general, and states that "according to the law and custom of England masters and governors of ships which go from London beyond sea, and take upon them to carry goods beyond sea, are bound to keep safely," &c. This statement is certainly in terms applicable to all ships, and not only to ships acting as common carriers, and therefore the case has generally been considered as a decision upon the liability of all ships. So in Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281) the declaration was not against the defendant as a common carrier, but upon a promise to be implied from the fact of his being a shipmaster receiving goods to be carried for hire. So in Goff v. Clinkard, quoted in Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281), there is no statement whatever that the ship was a general ship. We think it worthy of notice that Lord Holt in the careful judgment in Coggs v. Bernard (2 Lord Raym. 909; s. c. 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 177, 6th edit.) in which his words would be well weighed, speaks thus: "And this is the case of the common carrier"—common hoyman, master of a ship, &c. He does not include the shipmaster in the class of common carriers; he treats him as a separate and independent class. And speaking of him he uses a phrase which includes all shipmasters and does not confine the class to those shipmasters only who trade as common carriers. Blackburn, J. treats the case of Lyon v. Mells (4 East, 428) as a strong authority in favour of the enlarged liability of a barge owner without determining whether such bargeowner was a common carrier or not. And the judgment of the majority of the judges in the Liver Alkali Company v. Johnson (23 L. J. 216, Ex.; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 338) seems to be a strong authority in favour of the liability being attached to all shipmasters or owners carrying goods for hire, by reason of their decision that the defendant in that case was liable without determining whether he was a common carrier or not. In Barclay v. Y'gana (1 Doug. 389) it is true that the ship was a general ship, but Lord Mansfield does not decide the case on the ground that the defendant was a common carrier. He says: "It is impossible to distinguish this from the case of a common carrier. In Bell's Commentaries, c. 4, par. 14, p. 157, it is said: 'As to particular ships freighted specially, unless there be a specific agreement the edict applies,'" In Schiefflein v. Harvey (6 Johns. 170) in seems impossible to say whether the ship was a general ship. There was a bill of lading, but that does not determine the point. The judgment is, however, general. The masters and owners are responsible for every injury that might have been prevented by human foresight or energy. The judgment of Kent, C.J. in Elliott v. Rossel (10 Johns. 1) is also as strong and general as can be. "In short," he says, "it must be regarded as a settled point in the English law that masters and owners of vessels are liable in port and at sea and abroad to the whole extent of inland carriers, except so far as they are exempted by the exceptions in the contract of charter-party or bill of lading or by statute." Certainly these are terms which seem to show that in the mind of the Chief Justice all masters of all sea-going ships were so liable, and not only those who had made themselves common carriers, and thereby liable to carry the goods of all persons. And it seems impossible to account for the almost universal use of bills of lading by all sea-going ships, if a great number of them, namely, all who were not common carriers, would only be answerable for negligence, for which they are answerable notwithstanding the bill of lading. The exceptions in a bill of lading are exceptions out of a generally recognised absolute liability which it is generally considered would exist if those exceptions were not inserted.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the true rule is that every shipowner or master who carries goods on board his vessel for hire is, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, liable by implication by the common law of England, adopting the law of Rome, by reason of his acceptance of the goods to be carried, to the liability of an insurer, except as against the act of God or the Queen's enemies. It is not only such shipowners as have made themselves in all senses common carriers who are so liable; but all shipowners who carry goods for hire, whether inland, coastways, or abroad, outward or inward. They are all within the exception to the general law of bailments which was adopted into the common law from the Roman law. The liability of the defendant's company, therefore, was that of insurers except against the act of God and the Queen's enemies, not because they were common carriers, but because they carried the plaintiff's mare in their ship for hire. We should take notice that our view differs from some few passages in Story, as in sect. 501 and in sect, 504. But the note to sect. 501 seems to intimate a doubt after all whether the section is correct, and the cases quoted in support of sect. 504 do not affect the case before us.

We have next to determine whether the loss in this case can be said to have occurred "by the act of God." Many definitions of this phrase have been attempted. Many cases have decided the occurrences which cannot in law be considered to come within it. The matter is fully treated in Story on Bailments, sect. 511, and the notes to it in Angell on Carriers, sect. 154, and subsequent sections. The definition to be extracted from all the cases is said to be best given in a note to Coggs v. Bernard (2 Lord Raym. 909) s. c. 1 Smith's Leading Cases, 177, 6th edition in the American edition by Mr. Wallace of Smith's Leading Cases. The best form of the definition seems to us to be that the damage or loss in question must have been caused directly and exclusively by such a direct and violent and sudden and irresistible act of nature as the defendant could not, by any amount of ability foresee would happen, or if he could forsee that it would happen, could not by any amount of care and skill resist so as to prevent its effect. It lies upon the defendant to show that a damage or loss for which he would otherwise be liable is brought within this exception. We cannot say notwithstanding the inability of the jury to agree to an answer to the fifth question left to them, that the defendant has in this case satisfied the evidence of proof cast upon him, so as to bring himself clearly within the definition. It seems to us impossible to say that no human ability could foresee the reasonable probability of the happening of rough weather on the voyage, and that a horse at sea might be frightened by it, or that no human ability could prevent injury to a frightened horse in such weather as occurred. We think also that the fright of the mare was a natural and probable result of the rough sea, a fright likely to happen in the case of an ordinary horse, and cannot be considered such a vice in the inherent nature of this particular mare as to absolve the defendant. We are, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed and that the rule must be made absolute to enter the verdict for the plaintiff.

EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Reported by H. Leigh and A. Pawson, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Nov. 17 and 26, 1875.

Gambles and others v. The Ocean Marine Insurance Company of Bombay.

Marine insurance—"At and from P. to N., and for fifteen days there after arrival"—Loss in port during the fifteen days and after discharge of cargo—Ship having begun to take in cargo for another voyage—Deviation.

Under a policy of insurance on ship "at and from P. to N. and for fifteen days there after arrival," the ship sailed from P. and arrived on the 4th Dec. at N., where she completed the discharge of her inward cargo at a certain part of the port on the 13th Dec. Being under charter to load a cargo of coals she took on board two keels of that cargo as a stiffening, and moved to another part of the port to complete her loading. Before the expiration of the fifteen days she was damaged by a hurricane.

Held by the majority of the Court (Kelly, C.B., and Amphlett, B.), on the authority of Shee v. Williams (3 Campb. 469), and Hammond v. Reid (4 B. & Ald. 72), that the insurance was for a voyage from P. to N., which was completed when the cargo was discharged; and though the ship might, under the policy, have remained for the fifteen days within the port of N., yet the proceeding to another part of the port and taking on board, during the fifteen days, a portion of a cargo for a new voyage, was in effect the beginning of a new voyage and a deviation, being foreign to the purposes for which the port of N. might be used for the voyage insured, and that, therefore, the assured could not recover.

Held contra (by Cleasby, B.), that this was a voyage policy from P. to N., with a time policy superadded for the fifteen days after arrival whilst in the port; that the loss in question was clearly within the words of the policy; and there being nothing to prevent these words from having their natural and ordinary meaning, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants upon a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants for the insurance of the sum of 600*l.* on a certain ship of the plaintiff's called the Mosquito, valued at 1500*l.*; and by consent of parties, and order of Pigott, B., dated the 1st Aug. 1874, according to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, there was stated for the opinion of the court, without any pleadings, the following

Special Case.

1. The said ship, of which the plaintiffs were and are the owners, was by the said policy of insurance, bearing date the 22nd Nov. 1873, insured to the amount of 600*l.* This policy is hereunto annexed, and is to be taken as part of this case.

The policy was in the usual form, for 600*l.* on ship as above mentioned, and the only part of it that is material to be here stated is, that it was expressed to be an insurance on the said ship, "at and from the port of Pomaron to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and for fifteen days whilst there, after arrival." The policy bore a 3*s.* stamp.

2. The said ship, under a charter-party dated the 30th July 1873, left the port of Pomaron in the said policy mentioned, on her said voyage therein mentioned, and arrived on the 4th Dec. 1873 in safety at Newcastle. On the 13th Dec., at 8 p.m., she completed the discharge of her inward cargo at a certain place in the port of Newcastle.

3. The said vessel having been on the 8th Dec. 1873, chartered to load in the River Tyne a cargo of coals for delivery at Gibraltar, and having received on board two keels of the same as a stiffening, was, on the 15th of the said month of Dec., shifted to the Killingnorth Colliery loading place on the River Tyne, there to complete her loading, and was there well and properly moored head and stern in a tier, to wait her turn to go under the loading spout.

The said loading place is at Wallsend, which is about four miles from the town of Newcastle, in the parish of St. Nicholas, Newcastle, and is within the said port of Newcastle, and within the district popularly known by and amongst mercantile men as Newcastle.

5. On the evening of the last-mentioned day it blew heavily from the westward; and for better security, at about 11 p.m., a bower anchor was let go under foot, and the chain ranged upon deck clear for running; and on the morning of the 16th of the said month of December 1873, the wind increased to hurricane force, and at about 4 a.m., owing to its irresistible violence the mooring post on the quay, to which the vessel's head moorings were secured, broke, causing her to become adrift forward and likely to capsize. Thereupon the stern mooring was instantly cut to facilitate the said vessel swinging to her anchor; but notwithstanding this she quickly capsised, filled and sunk on the same day and alongside the said quay.

6. The said ship was subsequently raised, but was found to be very seriously damaged. In raising her all needful craft, including steam tugs, slings, and lifting chains, and all necessary materials and appliances, including powerful pumping apparatus, were provided, together with a large number of suitable hands; and, under the circumstances, many of the stores and materials of the said vessel, including a bower anchor, were washed off the deck and lost, and the cabin and forecastle gutted, and furniture and fittings destroyed and washed away, as also provisions and stores, and various loss and damage sustained in relation to the apparel and other effects of the crew; and, during the service of raising and righting the said vessel, sundry of her materials, including canvas, spars, masts, and rigging, were unavoidably seriously cut, destroyed, and lost; also two holes were discovered in her port bow, and the vessel was much encumbered with mud and other material, and it became necessary to place her in a dry dock for the purposes of survey and repair.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiffs are, under the above stated circumstances, entitled to recover against the defendants upon the said policy of insurance in respect of the said loss. If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs for 424*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.* and costs of suit. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nol. pros., with costs of defence, shall be entered up for the defendants.

Points for argument on the part of the plaintiffs:—

1. That in the case of a policy of insurance upon a ship at and from one port to another, and for a certain specified period of time there after arrival, the risk continues during the whole period of time so specified.

2. That a policy of insurance is not vacated by the ship changing her moorings within the same harbour during such period.

3. That the policy being stamped as a "time policy" covers the risk during the fifteen days after the ship's arrival in Newcastle, irrespective of how she may be employed during those fifteen days.

4. That as the fifteen days had not expired when the vessel was lost, the loss was covered by the policy.

The defendants' points for argument:—

1. That the clause in the policy, "and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival," only covers the vessel whilst lying at Newcastle-on-Tyne for the purposes of the voyage insured and for discharging her inward cargo, and does not cover her if, after having discharged her inward cargo, she is engaged in a fresh adventure entirely unconnected with the voyage insured.

2. That the loading on board the said vessel, after she had discharged her inward cargo at Newcastle-on-Tyne, of two keels of coals, and moving her from her berth (at which she had discharged her inward cargo) to the Killingnorth Colliery, for the purpose of completing the loading of her outward cargo, was in fact the beginning of a fresh adventure, entirely unconnected with the voyage insured, and that therefore the risk under the policy was at an end before the happening of the loss.

Nov. 17.—Gully, for the plaintiffs: The point here is a very short and simple one, turning simply on the meaning of the words in the policy, "at and from the port of Pomaron to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival." The defendants contend that the words "fifteen days" do not mean "fifteen days" if the cargo happened to be discharged, as it was in this case, before the expiration of that period. The vessel arrived in port on the 4th Dec., and on the 13th had completed the discharge of her cargo, and then had six days remaining of the time, namely, until the 19th Dec., during which she was covered by the express words of the policy, the loss occurring on the 16th, three days before the expiration of the limited period. He was stopped, and Cohen, Q.C. (with him was Crawford) was called upon contra for the defendants.—No doubt, if the words of the policy are literally interpreted, the plaintiffs might in one point of view be entitled to recover. But the old cargo having been discharged on the 13th Dec. and a new voyage and risk having been commenced on the 15th Dec., the question is, whether or not there was an alteration of risk, and what in insurance law is called a "deviation." The voyage contemplated by the parties to this policy was completed, and the cargo discharged. The policy, so to speak, was then exhausted, and a new risk, which it was never intended that the policy should cover, was undertaken. The policy should be construed fairly and liberally in accordance with the intention of the parties: (The Teutonia, L. Rep. 4 P.C. 171; ante, vol. 1, p. 214) [Kelly, C.B.—The words are "for fifteen days whilst there."] That means the spot in the port where she is discharging her cargo. What the policy means is "fifteen days" after the ship is moored and anchored, and if so, that is moored and anchored for the purpose of discharging her cargo. This is not a time policy, but a voyage policy. If, during the fifteen days the ship goes out of her way, and does that which was not contemplated by the parties, then there is a deviation. Suppose, for instance, that after discharging her original cargo she had gone to another part of the port and loaded a cargo for Africa, and had started to sail on her voyage, and been lost in her course down the river, but still in the port within the fifteen days, could it for a moment be said that she would then have been covered by this policy? But that is no more than has been done here. She was proceeding on a new adventure and taking a new risk. [Kelly, C.B.—What more risk is incurred in one part of the port than in another? Cleasby, B.—The increase of risk is not material in a case of deviation. Amphlett, B.—It has been held that where a policy is on a voyage from A. to B., with liberty to deviate to C., the deviation to C. must be for a purpose connected with the original adventure.] That is so, and here the proceeding to another part of the port was not connected in any way with the original voyage or adventure. It was an entirely new adventure and risk, not covered by the terms of the policy.

Gully, in reply.—The court is asked by the defendants, as a matter of law, to insert in this policy, after the words in question, the words "or until she has discharged her cargo, whichever shall first happen." The meaning of the words is a matter of mercantile custom, and, as Cleasby, B., observed, it is for a jury. There is nothing said about a voyage, but that the insurance shall continue for fifteen days after arrival in port, whilst there. All that can be said is that the parties have so agreed. The policy was stamped as a time policy (30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 11), thereby clearly showing what was intended. [Kelly, C.B.—Have you considered the question of deviation, and its effect on the risk? (Williams v. Shee, 3 Campb. 469.)] This was not a deviation. If the parties have agreed that the risk shall attach for fifteen days after arrival in port, then it is no matter what the ship may be doing, and deviation is not in that case a material consideration. No shipowner on reading this policy would think it necessary to take out a fresh policy until after the 19th Dec., the expiration of the fifteen days. If it is put as a matter of law, there are the express words of the policy. If not, then it was for the defendants to raise the question as a matter of fact for the jury what those words mean.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 26.—The following judgments were now pronounced:

Kelly, C.B.—The policy of insurance in this case was upon a voyage from a foreign port to Newcastle, with liberty to stay there fifteen days after arrival in that port.

The loss in question is certainly within the literal terms of the condition in the policy, having occurred within fifteen days after the arrival of the ship at Newcastle. But the insurance, even if the policy be deemed a time policy, is "at and from the port of Pomaron to Newcastle, and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival." It is, therefore, an insurance for that voyage; and it appears to me that, when the cargo was discharged, the voyage was completed and at an end; and although the ship might, within the policy, have remained for the whole of the fifteen days within the port of Newcastle, the proceeding to another part of the port and there taking on board a portion of a cargo for a new voyage, was in effect the beginning of a new voyage and a deviation, being foreign to the purposes for which the port of Newcastle might be used for the voyage insured.

The cases of Williams v. Shee (3 Campb. 469) and Hammond v. Reid (4 B. & Ald. 72), appear to me to establish the principle that it is a deviation to resort to, or to use the ship within a port covered by the policy for purposes unconnected with the voyage insured: (see also 1 Arnould on Insurance, 4th edit., p. 443.) (a) I think, therefore, that the taking the coals on board at the part of the port in question was as much a deviation as if the ship, after the taking goods on board for a new voyage, had sailed upon such voyage several miles down the river, and been lost within a few yards of its mouth, but within the limits of the port of Newcastle.

It was contended at the bar in argument that this was a time policy, and it may in one sense be taken to be so—and it appeared, indeed, that it bore the stamp required for a time policy. But if that were so it was still a time policy, not for any voyage or voyages which the ship might undertake, but, upon a voyage from Pomaron to Newcastle, and then for fifteen days in the port of Newcastle.

I see no reason why the principle of the cases to which I have adverted should be departed from. Those cases show that, where the insurance is upon a voyage or voyages, with liberty to go to or touch at other ports or places, yet if the ship should touch at those ports for purposes foreign to the voyage or voyages enumerated and specified in the policy, it would be held to be a deviation, and consequently that the assured could not recover. I think these principles applicable to the case before the court, and that the taking of a cargo or part of a cargo on board for another and a different voyage was as much a deviation as if, upon a time policy for a year, upon a voyage between Dover and Newcastle, the ship had gone to Calais and taken a cargo on board there.

I think, therefore, that our judgment must be for the defendants. My brother Amphlett concurs in this opinion, and in the reasons assigned for it.

Cleasby, B.—I cannot agree with the conclusion arrived at by my Lord and my brother Amphlett in this case, because I think the language of this policy is quite clear, and I do not see any reason why the court should depart from it.

The insurance, as expressed in the policy, was on the ship "at and from the port of Pomaron to Newcastle-upon-Tyne." So far that would be an ordinary voyage policy; but then it goes on, "and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival." In my opinion the policy covered the fifteen days within the port of Newcastle after arrival there, although the vessel had completed the discharge of her original cargo, and had begun to prepare to take in another cargo, and indeed had, as appears, taken in part of another cargo for the purpose of stiffening in crossing the port. The policy was a voyage policy, with its usual incidents as to deviation and other matters, so far as regards the voyage from Pomaron to Newcastle; but, after that voyage was ended, the parties added a time policy, for "fifteen days whilst in the port of Newcastle after arrival. "That, I think, is plainly nothing more or less than a time policy for fifteen days, and those words are not, in my opinion, affected by the fact that there is, in the same document, an insurance on a voyage. I cannot agree that this policy was intended to cover only the time occupied in discharging the cargo; if that had been intended, it should, and no doubt would, have been plainly provided for; on the contrary, I think that it was intended to give the assured the benefit of the policy, so far as any lawful engagement was concerned, for the period of fifteen days in the port of Newcastle, however the ship might be employed; whether in doing nothing or preparing for another cargo, or in removing to another part of the port, or in taking in another cargo for another voyage.

(a) The passage in Arnould, referred to by the learned Chief Baron is as follows: Speaking of time policies, the learned writer says:—The purpose for which a port is visited must be within the scope of the adventure contemplated by the policy, otherwise the visit will be a deviation, notwithstanding the port visited is within the terms of the policy. However extensive may be the language of the clause, "the permission to stay 'for any purpose whatever' must be for some purpose within the scope of the adventure:" (per Gibbs, C.J., in Langhorn v. Allnutt, 4 Taunt. 510, 519.) "The liberty in the policy must always be construed with reference to the main scope of the voyage insured:" (per Lord Ellenborough in Williams v. Shee, 3 Camp. 469.)

It appears that what took place was that the captain when he had cleared his previous cargo had to get another cargo as quickly as possible; and in order to do that he had to cross the port to a place where the vessels remain in tiers, and take their turn at the staiths or loading spouts. He had discharged his previous cargo; it was necessary, before he could cross the port, that his vessel should be stiffened, and so, instead of ballast, he took on board two keels' load of coal for that purpose, which would, of course, form part of his future cargo. It appears to me to be immaterial whether he went in ballast or had a stiffening of coals; the act remains the same; the ship was thus lawfully engaged in the ordinary work in which a ship would be engaged in the port under the circumstances. Whilst waiting for her turn at the coaling staith, and during the limited fifteen days, the storm occurred which caused the loss which gave rise to the present action.

Our attention was called during the argument to the fact that the policy bore on the face of it a double stamp, and that it was properly stamped, therefore, both as a voyage policy and as a time policy. I cannot myself understand why this case should be regarded differently from time policies generally; and if I am right in reading this as a time policy, then the objection raised by the defendants, that this was a "deviation," does not apply. In treating of time policies, in his work on Marine Insurances, Mr. Arnould says (vol. 1, 4th edit., p. 349): "In such policies the risk insured is entirely independent of the voyage of the ship (iter navis); and the policy covers any voyage whatever which the ship may make, and any loss or damage which she may sustain by the perils insured against within the space of time limited in the policy."

My Lord and my brother Amphlett think this is not a time policy, in which case the argument as to the fifteen days is simple and complete, but I cannot agree with them. I think it is clearly a time policy, and therefore the nature of the risk is immaterial, and that being so, it appears to me that this loss is clearly within the words of the policy, and occurred during the time covered by it, and by reason of the perils insured against, and that there is nothing to prevent the words from having their natural and ordinary meaning, and that, consequently, the assured (the plaintiffs) are entitled to recover. I say nothing as to the question which might have arisen if the vessel had not regularly prosecuted the voyage from Pomaron to Newcastle.

(Before Sir Robert Phillimore.)

The M. Moxham.

Damage done by a ship to realty abroad—Pleading—Governing law—Jurisdiction.

The question of liability of a shipowner proceeded against in the English Admiralty Court for an injury done by his ship to a pier projecting into the sea, but attached to the soil of a foreign country is governed by English law and not by the lex loci; hence a plea that by the lex loci a shipowner is not liable for the negligent acts of the master and mariners in charge of his ship is no defence to an action in rem for the recovery of damages in respect of injuries done by the ship to a pier in a foreign country.

Semble, that the English Admiralty Court has jurisdiction over an action for damage or trespass to realty situate upon the soil of a foreign country, such damage being done by a British ship upon the sea within the ebb and flow of the tide.

This was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the Marbella Iron Company (Limited) against the steamship M. Moxham and her owners intervening. The case now came before the court on motion made on behalf of the plaintiffs to strike out certain portions of the defendants' answer to the petition. The plaintiffs' petition as it originally stood was so far as material as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are the Marbella Iron Ore Company (Limited), an English Joint Stock Company established under the Companies' Act 1862, and the Acts incorporated therewith for the purpose among other things of exporting ore from Marbella, in the country of Spain, to England and other places. The offices of the company are at No. 1, Crown Buildings, Queen Victoria-street, in the City of London. The plaintiffs were, at the time of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, possessed of a pier situate at Marbella aforesaid for the purpose of shipping iron ore on board ships.

2. About 8.30 a.m. on the 5th Oct. 1874, the steamship M. Moxham came to Marbella for the purpose of loading iron ore from the said pier of the plaintiffs. There was scarcely any wind at the time, and the sea was perfectly smooth and there was no current.

3. Those on board the M. Moxham instead of keeping clear of the pier as they could and might easily have done so negligently navigated the said steamship that she approached and came into violent collision with the said pier, and carried away the whole head of the pier, causing enormous damage to it, and throwing several trucks laden with iron ore into the sea.

(a) The plaintiffs have given notice of appeal from this decision.

4. The aforesaid collision and the damages consequent thereon were occasioned by the negligence and improper navigation of those on board the M. Moxham.

5. The plaintiffs, in addition to the expense of repairing the pier, have sustained and will sustain considerable damages by reason of being called upon to pay demurrage to divers ships at the time of the said collision under charter to load iron ore at the said pier, and by reason of extra expense incurred in the shipment of iron during the repair of the said pier, and extra freight in consequence of the delay in loading vessels.

The answer filed on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the M. Moxham, was so far as material as follows:

Parker and Clarke, solicitors, for Ebenezer Carry, &c., the owners of the steamship or vessel M. Moxham, the defendants in this cause say as follows:

1. They deny so much of the first article of the petition as alleges that the plaintiffs were possessed of the Marbella pier in the said petition mentioned, [and they say that the said pier was at the time of the said collision annexed to, and that it formed part of the land of Spain, and that this Honourable Court has not jurisdiction to entertained this suit].

2. They say that the said alleged collision was not a violent one, and that it took place owing to the current, and the shallowness of the water near the said pier preventing the M. Moxham from answering her helm, as but for such matters she would have done, and that the said alleged collision was not occasioned by any negligent navigation of the M. Moxham, but was the result of inevitable accident.

3. They further say that the said pier was so weakly and insufficient and improperly constructed and fastened as not to be capable of sustaining contacts from such ships as the M. Moxham necessary incidental to their going alongside the said pier for the purposes in the said petition stated, and that the said alleged collision was a usual and ordinary contact necessarily incidental to the M. Moxham going alongside the said pier for the said purposes, and one which the said pier ought, if properly and sufficiently constructed and fastened, to have sustained without being damaged, and no more, and that the said alleged damage was wholly occasioned by the said pier having been so weakly, and insufficiently, and improperly constructed and fastened, and not otherwise.

4. They further say that the said alleged collision happened within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain, [and that the said pier at the time of the collision was annexed to and formed part of the land of Spain] and that if the said collision was occasianed by any negligence or improper navigation of those on board the M. Moxham, it was solely occasioned by the negligence of the master or mariners of the M. Moxham, and not by the defendants or any of them, and that by the law of Spain in force at the time and place of the said collision, the master and mariners of the ship, and not the ship or her owners are liable in damages in respect of a collision occasioned as in the petition alleged, and by such law neither the M. Moxham nor the defendants nor any of them are or is liable in respect of the damages proceeded for in this cause.

5. They deny the truth of the fifth article of the said petition, and further say that the said article is irrelevant as being matter only for the registrar in the event of a reference.

6. The defendants further say that by the law of Spain in force at the time and place of the said collision, wherever the owner of a ship has become liable in damages by reason of the act or default of the master of such ship, such owner is not liable in damages beyond the value of such ship, and her freight being earned at the time of the commission of such act or default, and can fully discharge such liability by abandoning such ship and freight to the person claiming such damages, or by paying to such person the full value of such ship and freight, and the defendants say that if they are liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the collision in the said petition mentioned, they have so become liable by the act or default of the master of the M. Moxham and not otherwise, and that by the said law of Spain in force as aforesaid, they are not liable to the plaintiff in respect of the said collision beyond the value of the M. Moxham and her freight being carried at the time of the said collision, and are entitled to fully discharge such liability by abandoning the M. Moxham and her said freight to the plaintiffs or by paying to the plaintiffs the full value of the M. Moxham and her freight being carried as aforesaid.

And the said Parker and Clarke pray the Right Honourable the judge to pronounce against the damage proceeded for, and to dismiss the defendants and their bail from all further observance of justice in this suit, and to condemn the plaintiffs in costs, or to pronounce that the defendants are not liable to the plaintiffs in respect of such damage beyond the value of the M. Moxham and her freight being carried at the time of the said collision, and that they are entitled to discharge such liability by abandoning the M. Moxham and her freight, or by paying the full value thereof to the plaintiffs, and that further and otherwise right and justice may be administered to the defendants in the premises.

July 27, 1875.—The plaintiffs now moved the court (as stated in their notice of motion) "to strike out so much of Article 1 of the answer filed herein as alleges that this honourable court has no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and also article 4 of the said answer on the ground that the same are improper and irrelevant, and bad in substance and also on the ground stated in the affidavit of Charles Cydwelyn Ellis to be read on the hearing of this motion." The affidavit referred to in the notice of motion stated that the collision having occurred on the 5th Oct. 1874, the M. Moxham was arrested a few days after by process issuing out of the proper tribunal in Spain; that at the time of the collision the M. Moxham was under charter, and upon the vessel being arrested the defendants communicated with the plaintiffs, with a view of procuring the release of the ship, and thereupon in order to obtain the said release an agreement was made between the plaintiffs and defendants, and also between the plaintiff and the captain of the M. Moxham at his request, and with the authority of the defendants, that the said vessel should be released, and that the liability of the defendants for the alleged negligence of the ship should be determined by proceedings in the English Courts; that upon the faith of this agreement the M. Moxham was released, and was allowed to be loaded and sailed for England for the benefit of the owners and charterers; that it was contrary to good faith and the true intent and meaning of the said agreement that the defendants should attempt to set up as a defence that the court had no jurisdiction. The words of the answer between brackets thus [ ] were added or struck out by agreement between the parties at the hearing as shown in the course of the argument.

Butt, Q.C. and Benjamin, Q.C. (Johnstone with them) for the plaintiff in support of the motion.—An action will not lie in this country for a trespass to realty committed abroad (Doulson v. Matthews, 4 R. 503), and consequently if this were a common law action it might be said that there is no jurisdiction; but the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7) gives "jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship," and this wholly apart from any question of the action being local or transitory. In The Uhla (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. p. 29, n.; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 89; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 148) a ship was condemned for the damage done to Falmouth Pier; if the action had been at common law and the venue had been laid in Middlesex, and it had appeared that the locale was in Cornwall, the plaintiff would have been nonsuited; but in admiralty no such course could be taken: the court held that it had jurisdiction under the Act, and no question was raised as to the local venue. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Foreign courts do not try local actions arising in countries outside their own jurisdiction.] But this court does not follow Foreign courts, but English courts which do try such actions.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. for the defendants.—We do not wish to contest the question of jurisdiction, having agreed to submit to it as stated in the affidavit of Ellis. I propose to strike out the last words of the first article of the answer.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am inclined to consider that there is jurisdiction, subject to any argument I may hear to the contrary, and therefore I shall not raise any objection to taking jurisdiction; but of course my not objecting will not give the court jurisdiction.

Butt, B.C.—I claim that all the words in art. 1 of the answer relating to jurisdiction should be struck out, that is to say, all words after the word "mentioned."

Williams, Q.C.—Then I ask that the words alleging the pier was annexed to the land of Spain be inserted in the 4th article of the answer.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then let the answer stand amended in these respects.

Butt, Q.C.—Then the only question is as to the local law, although as this is a cause over which the court has primâ facie jurisdiction, that jurisdiction in the absence of the plea struck out, exists by law and not by consent. Then upon the 4th article of the answer the question is whether a tort committed by a British subject against a British subject in a foreign country is triable in an English Court. There can be no doubt that a wrong committed by one Englishman upon another in foreign territory is triable by the courts of this country, and that a defendant may be made responsible for such a wrong (Scott v. Lord Seymour, 31 L. J. 457, Ex.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 607; in error, 1 H. & C. 219; 32 L. J. 61, Exch.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 511); that case turned no doubt very much upon a question of procedure, and was, therefore, within the lex fori, but the opinion of Wightman, J. (in error) is that a British subject has a remedy for a tort committed abroad by another British subject even though the foreign law gives him no remedy. And this doctrine is concluded by the Halley (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879: 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131), which is exactly in point, deciding that in a case of tort in foreign territory English courts do not apply the foreign law in order to determine the legal consequences of the act done, but the English law. A British subject is triable in England for the murder of a British subject abroad: (R. v. Helsham 4 C. & P. 394). By the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 6, this court has jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by a ship. This tribunal in dealing with a case within its competence will apply the law of England. The law of Spain cannot apply to a case between British subjects concerning an act done by a British ship; such a question must be governed by British law, that is by law administered in this court.

Messina v. Petrococchino, L. Rep. 4 P. C. 144; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 551: 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 299; The Halley, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 879; 5 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 131.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In the United States it has been distinctly ruled that although pilotage may be made compulsory by statute, yet shipowners are not thereby exempt from liability for the negligence of the pilot: (The China, 7 Wallace Sup. Court Rep. 54.) This decision in its effect very much resembles The Halley.] Even supposing Spanish law would govern if the present case had arisen upon land, it cannot be applied here because the cause of action arose upon navigable waters with ebb anp flow of tide. The ship was afloat, and the negligence of her master occasioned the injury; the thing and the persons occasioning the injury were subject to British law; the master on board his ship was practically upon British territory and within British jurisdiction in respect of all torts or wrongful acts committed by him. By foreign law at least, the conduct of a foreign master on board his own ship is governed entirely by the law of his own country; he is liable to no other jurisdiction in criminal matters. In Lloyd v. Guibert (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115), it is distinctly laid down by the Exchequer Chamber that the responsibility of owners for the acts of their master is governed by the law of the flag, and that whoever deals with a master in a foreign port acts upon that supposition unless the contrary appears. In R. v. Anderson (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 161) it is held that the admiralty jurisdiction of England extends over British vessels not only when they are sailing over the high seas, but also when they are in the rivers of a foreign territory at a place below bridges, where the tide ebbs and flows, and where great ships go, and that all seamen, whatever their nationality, serving on British ships are amenable to the provisions of British law. If, therefore, in both civil contract and criminal acts the law of the flag governs and the tribunals of the flag have jurisdiction, why does not the same rule apply in cases of tort not criminal where the injury has been done by the master of a British ship on board a British ship to a British subject resident abroad?

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and J. C. Matthew (E. C. Clarkson with them) for the defendants, in support of the answer.—The cause of action is the negligent destruction of a pier forming part of the soil of Spain by servants of the shipowners; by the law of Spain no liability attaches to the shipowners in respect of such negligence. Starting with the assumption that the court has jurisdiction there has been no tort committed, cognizable in this country. Before a tort committed abroad can be tried in an English court it must be a tort within the law of the country where it was committed. By The Halley (ubi sup.) it was decided that according to the law of England if a person sues on an alleged cause of action committed in a foreign country, it is not enough to make out that there was a liability by foreign law, but there must also be liability by the law of England. To give a right of action for a tort committed abroad there must be such a right both by the foreign and by English law. This is not a mere matter of procedure.

Phillips v. Eyre, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 1, 28; Smith's Leading Cases, Vol. 1, 7th edit. pp. 700, 701; Le Roux v. Brown, 12 C. B. 801.

We are bound, of course, to use the English procedure, but we cannot be precluded from giving evidence of the foreign law, nor does The Halley (ubi sup.) show that the defendant is to be deprived of this right; on the contrary a defendant may avail himself of that law so far as it is in his favour; that case only establishes that a defendant cannot avail himself of foreign law to escape the result of an obligation imposed by that law; it cannot be used to establish the converse of that proposition. The rule as to marriages made abroad is in point; they are valid only here when valid both by English and foreign law. The court should adopt the law of Spain, and if by that law no wrong has been done between the parties, the law of England cannot give a remedy where no wrong exists; the civil liability for an act done derives its existence from the law of the place where the act was done, and when the law of that place does away with that liability. the act cannot be called in question elsewhere: (Phillips v. Eyre, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 225; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 1.) It cannot be that a man is to be held liable in this country for doing an act abroad which is perfectly lawful in the place in which it was done. In Debree v. Napier (2 Bing. N. C. 781) it was held that the defendant, who was a British subject, was not liable for seizing a ship under the authority of a foreign power, his act being lawful by the law of the country for which he acted although contrary to English statute law. In Reg. v. Lesley, (Bell's C. C. 220; 29 L. J. 97, M. C.) it was held that an imprisonment on board a British ship in a foreign port under the authority of the foreign government was justifiable on the part of the master of the ship, but not upon the high seas. In Westlake's International Law it is said (p. 240) that "the legal character and consequences of an act must depend upon the jurisprudence of the country where it is done, and not on that of any spot to which its consequences may extend. The damage is not an injury unless it results from an act prohibited by the law which governs the agent." In The General Steam Navigation Company v. Guillou, (11 M. & W. 877) it was held in an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant as owner of a steamer for damage by collision, that a plea alleging that the ship was French and that she was owned by a French company of which the defendant was a member, and that by the law of France the company, being in the nature of a corporation, and not the defendant, was liable for the negligence of the master and crew, was a good plea.

Benjamin, Q.C. in reply.—The negligence complained of was not upon land, but it was in navigating a British steamship on tidal waters, and consequently the act must be taken in the eye of the law to have been done upon British territory. The act was a tort by the law of Spain, and the only question is one of responsibility for the acts of the person who did it, and that question must be governed by the maritime law as administered in this court, as the person doing the act, the master of the ship, was a British subject then upon a British vessel navigating tidal waters.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have consulted all the authorities mentioned to the court, and have arrived at the conclusion that the fourth article must be struck out, and I decide that the law of England and not the law of Spain must govern this question. I give this decision now as I understand there is a desire for a commission to examine witnesses in Spain before the trial comes on, and I will give a reasoned judgment at a future time.

Nov. 2.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE now delivered his reasoned judgment.—In this case a suit has been instituted on behalf of an English Joint Stock Company, who are possessed of a pier at Marbella in Spain, against the steamship M. Moxham.

The petition alleges that the negligent navigation of the steamship brought her into collision with the pier, and caused great damage to it. The answer denies the negligent navigation and says the damage was the result of inevitable accident or of the insufficient state of the pier, and further pleads in the 4th article according to the amendment proposed and accepted at the hearing as follows: "They further say that the said alleged collision happened within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain, and that the said pier at the said time was annexed to and formed part of the land of Spain, and that if the said collision was occasioned by any negligence or improper navigation of those on board the M. Moxham, it was solely occasioned by the negligence of the master and mariners of the M. Moxham, and not by the defendants or any of them, and that by the law of Spain in force at the time and place of the said collision, the master and owners of the ship, and not the ship or her mariners are liable in damages in respect of a collision as in the petition elleged, and by such law neither the M. Moxham nor the defendants nor any of them are or is liable in respect of the damages proceeded for in this cause." This article has been objected to on the ground that the law of Spain does not govern the question, which is to be decided according to the law of England, and the objection to the jurisdiction pleaded in a former article of the answer having been withdrawn, the only question which I have now to determine is whether the law of Spain or the law of England is to be applied to the circumstances of the case.

The damage of which complaint is made must be taken to have been inflicted by a British merchant vessel while in waters subject to the admiralty jurisdiction within the ebb and flow of the tide upon a pier in the territory of Spain. The act of injury, therefore, was done from the merchant vessel at sea, though the object injured was situate on the land. The defendants contend that in these circumstances this court must apply the local law, which, as they allege, exempts the ship from liability, and neither the lex fori nor law of the flag, under which the ship, if improperly navigated, would be liable for the damage.

Various cases were cited in support of this proposition, among them Dobree v. Napier (2 Bing. N. C. 781) and Phillips v. Eyre, as decided in the Queen's Bench and in the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 225; 6 Q. B. 1). But the latter of these cases was in great measure dependent upon peculiar circumstances, and upon the powers of a colonial legislature as recognised by the law of the Empire, And in the former case the alleged tort arose out of an act of an officer of a foreign state, acting, as the court held, lawfully in the seizure on the high seas of a vessel breaking the blockade, and therefore committing no trespass Both cases, moreover, turning upon acts of state, afford no safe analogy upon which the court could rely. Upon behalf of the plaintiffs these cases were more especially relied upon: Reg. v. Anderson (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 161); Lloyd v. Guibert

(L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 6 Best & Sm. 100); and The Halley (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193). In the first case, which related to a charge of manslaughter committed on board an English vessel within a French river where the tide ebbed and flowed, Bovill, C.J. said: "There is no doubt that the place where the offence was committed was within the territory of France, and that the prisoner was, therefore, subject to the law of France, which that nation might enforce if they thought fit; but at the same time he was also within a British merchant vessel, on board that vessel as a part of the crew, and as such he must be taken to have been under the protection of the British law, and also amenable to its provisions." And in this view the other judges seem to have concurred. It seems hardly necessary to refer to other cases, but I would observe that the case of Lloyd v. Guibert establishes that in a case of contract the responsibility of the owner of a vessel for the acts of his servants is governed by the law of the flag. With regard to The Halley, I think it unnecessary to enter into an examination of that case, the decision in which is of more indirect application; but I agree with the counsel for the plaintiffs that it points in the same direction.

Upon the whole I am satisfied, both upon principle and upon the authority of precedents, that the Spanish law is not applicable to the present case, and that the 4th article must be reformed by striking out all that part which pleads the Spanish law, that is all the words after the words "the land of Spain."

THE GENERAL BIRCH.

Action commenced in district registry—Defendants out of jurisdiction of registry—Appearance in London Registry—Practice.

Where an action in rem is instituted against a ship in a district registry and the shipowners, residing out of the jurisdiction of that registry, enter an appearance in the London Registry, the appearance must show where the action was commenced, the title of the cause in the district registry, and that the defendants are resident out of the jurisdiction of that registry.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted in rem on the 30th Oct. 1875 against the Swedish vessel General Birch in the Liverpool District Registry. The owners were resident out of the jurisdiction of that registry, being the Shipowners' Association of Christiania, and wished to avail themselves of the right given by the Supreme Court Rules 1875, Order XII., rule 3, to enter an appearance in the London Registry.

W. G. F. Phillimore, on behalf of the owners, now applied ex parte to the court under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 22, for directions as to the mode of procedure. He pointed out that under the Liverpool Admiralty District Registrar's Act 1870, s. 13, the court has power to transfer the cause to the London Registry, but in that case it would then be necessary to appear in the Liverpool Registry and then give notice to the other side of the motion, and the shipowners preferred to have the proceedings continued in London at once. Order XII., rule 3 of the Supreme Court rules would apply if the cause was directed to proceed under the new procedure, but not otherwise. Without directions the shipowners did not know how an appearance ought to be entered in such a case in the London Registry.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE ordered that the cause should proceed under the new procedure, that the appearance should be entered in the London Registry, and that, as the cause had been commenced in the Liverpool Registry, the appearance should recite that the cause had been commenced in the Liverpool Registry, should show what the title of the cause was in the Liverpool Registry, and should state that the defendants resided out of the jurisdiction of that registry.

THE TWO BROTHERS.

County Court appeal—Appellate court—Divisional court—Admiralty Division—Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, ss. 34, 42, 45.

Although the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, s. 45, provides that County Court appeals may be heard before a divisional court consisting of two or three judges (sect. 40), the Admiralty Division, having all the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty before the passing of the Act, still retains the jurisdiction to hear and determine County Court Admiralty appeals.

THIS was a motion for directions as to an appeal from a County Court.

The cause was instituted in the Hull County Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and on the 28th Oct. 1875 judgment was delivered in that court against the defendant for 53*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* Against this judgment the defendant was desirous of appealing, and had given the usual notice of appeal, and had filed the usual præcipe instituting a cause on appeal in the registry of the Admiralty Court. The defendant had tendered to the registrar, in accordance with the provisions of sect. 26 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, security for the costs of the appeal, but the registrar had refused to accept the security on the ground that the appeal to the Admiralty Court or Division had been taken away by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 45. The time within which the security had to be given had in consequence of this action on the part of the registrar of the County Court expired, and the defendant was consequently unable to appeal without special leave. The case now came before the court upon motion on behalf of the defendant to the judge "to allow and direct in what manner an appeal from a judgment of the County Court of Yorkshire, holden at Hull, Admiralty Jurisdiction, shall be proceeded with."

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendant.—I ask the court for leave to appeal, upon depositing the required security in the County Court, and to give directions to the County Court Registrar to take the security when offered. Secondly, I ask for directions as to the manner in which the appeal is to be proceeded with. Formerly County

Court Admiralty appeals lay to the High Court of Admiralty. Now, by the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s. 34 there are assigned to this division "all causes and matters which would have been within the exclusive cognisance of the Court of Probate or the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, or of the High Court of Admiralty if this Act had not passed." This appeal would have been within the exclusive cognisance of the High Court of Admiralty if the Act had not passed, by reason of the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 26, and by sect. 42, "all causes and matters which would have been within the exclusive cognisance of the High Court of Admiralty shall be assigned to the present judge of this said Admiralty Court during his continuance in office as a judge of the High Court." These two sections would seem to keep the jurisdiction to hear County Court Admiralty Appeals in this division, but by sect. 45 it is provided that "all appeals from . . . a County Court . . . which might, before the passing of this Act, have been brought to any court or judge whose jurisdiction is by this Act transferred to the High Court of Justice, may be heard and determined by divisional courts of the said High Court of Justice, consisting respectively of such judges thereof as may from time to time be assigned for that purpose, pursuant to rules of court, or (subject to rules of court) as may be so assigned according to arrangements made for the purpose by the judges of the said High Court." This would seem to show that an appeal such as this should be heard by a divisional court, but no such court as yet exists, and consequently, unless we can appeal to the Admiralty Division there is no appeal at all. The only way out of the difficulty is to hold that the 45th section is permissive, and that the appeal may be to a divisional court, but also lies to the Admiralty Division. This is not a divisional court, which, by sect. 40, consists of two or three Judges of the High Court of Justice. And yet the Legislature seemed to have contemplated the continuance of these appeals to the judges of the Admiralty Division, because, by the County Courts Act 1875, which came into operation the day after the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, there is an express provision (sect. 10) as to the necessity for obtaining leave to appeal in County Court Appeals from decisions of the Admiralty Court in County Court Appeals. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I see that sect. 34 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, in assigning business to the Chancery Division gives that division jurisdiction over all matters within the exclusive cognisance of the Court of Chancery "except appeals from County Courts." This is not the case with any other division. May it not, therefore, be inferred in all other cases, County Court Appeals may be heard in the same manner as heretofore?]

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff, contra.—I submit that the only court which has jurisdiction is a divisional court appointed under sect. 45 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, and that this court has no power to interfere with the appeal.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 16.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application for leave to appeal from a decision of the County Court of Yorkshire, the time prescribed by the statute having elapsed. Two questions are raised—one as to whether the application be such as the court ought, in the exercise of its discretion, under the County Court Act, to grant; the other as to whether the application be rightly made to this court having regard to the provisions of the Judicature Acts.

First, I am of opinion that if I have the power I ought, in accordance with the spirit of former decisions on the subject, to grant the application.

The second question is more difficult to determine. The 34th section of the first Judicature Act (1873) relates to the assignment of certain business to the decisions of the High Court. Paragraph (2.) (dealing with Chancery business) provides, that there shall be assigned to the Chancery Division of the High Court, "all causes and matters to be commenced after the commencement of this Act, under any Act of Parliament by which exclusive jurisdiction, in respect to such causes or matters, has been given to the Court of Chancery, or to any judges or judge thereof respectively, except appeals from County Courts." These words of exception as to appeals seem to intimate that where they are not used, appeals from County Courts are included in the category of causes and matters to be assigned. The second paragraph as to assignments to the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division provides that there shall be assigned to that division "all causes and matters which would have been within the exclusive cognisance of the Court of Probate or the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, or of the High Court of Admiralty, if this Act had not passed." At the end of sect. 42 it is provided that subject to certain exceptions "all causes and matters which, if this Act had not passed, would have been within the exclusive cognisance of the High Court of Admiralty, shall be assigned to the present judge of the said Admiralty Court during his continuance in office as a judge of the High Court." I am of opinion that the present application relates to a cause or matter which has hitherto been within the exclusive cognisance of the present judge of the High Court of Admiralty. The Acts which gave, within certain limits, jurisdiction in admiralty matters to the County Courts confined the appeal from their decisions to this court. There can be no reasonable doubt, I think, that, if there was no other enactment in this statute as to County Courts, the present application would have been rightly made. But reliance is placed by the counsel who oppose the application on the 45th section, which is as follows: "all appeals from petty or quarter sessions, from a County Court, or from any Inferior Court, which might, before the passing of this Act have been brought to any court or judge, whose jurisdiction is by this Act, transferred to the High Court of Justice, may be heard and determined by divisional courts of the said High Court of Justice, consisting respectively of such of the judges thereof as may from time to time be assigned for that purpose, pursuant to rules of court, or (subject to rules of court) as may be so assigned, according to arrangements made for the purpose by the judges of the said High Court. The determination of such appeals respectively by such divisional courts shall be final, unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the divisional court by which any such appeal from an inferior court shall have been heard."

After much consideration I have arrived at the conclusion that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to limit the powers already granted by the previous section to the present judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and that the 45th section must be construed so as to be in harmony with the 42nd section. I should mention also that the last County Court Act (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50), which was passed in the same session, though a little earlier than the last Judicature Act, but which comes into operation a day later, viz., on the 2nd Nov., contemplates the High Court of Admiralty as the only Court of Appeal from the Admiralty Jurisdiction of the County Courts.

Having arrived at this conclusion I thought it nevertheless my duty to confer with Sir James Hannen upon the construction of the Act. He has given careful attention to the subject, and while he thinks the question is not free from doubt, expresses his opinion to me in language that I am allowed to cite:—

"My impression is that the effect of the 34th and 42nd sections of the Judicature Act 1873 is that you bring with you into the High Court all the jurisdiction and powers, including, that of hearing appeals from the County Courts, which you formerly possessed as judge of the Court of Admiralty, and that the effect of the 46th section is not to take away or limit any of those powers, but that it is merely permissive and prospective, and that until rules of court or arrangements be made by the judges of the High Court of Justice for the purpose of holding divisional courts for the hearing of appeals from County Courts, &c., your jurisdiction remains unaffected."

Fortified by this agreement with my opinion I decide that this application is rightly made, and I grant it and I direct the registrar of the County Court to receive the security for costs offered by the plaintiff.

DUDGEON v. PEMBROKE.

Marine insurance—Time policy—Seaworthiness—Perils insured against.

Upon a time policy, the risk attaching while the ship is in the hands of the assured, if the ship be lost (although by perils insured against) in consequence of her unseaworthiness starting upon her first voyage, the assured cannot recover.

Plaintiffs insured their steamer, which being just repaired was then in their dock, on a time policy for a year, underwriteen by the defendant. She crossed the North Sea in fine weather, but made water; and on her return, being waterlogged in bad weather, she stranded and became a total loss.

At the trial the jury could not agree whether she was seaworthy at the beginning of the first voyage, nor whether unseaworthness was the cause of her loss. They found, however, that the plaintiffs did not know she was unseaworthy, and it was admitted that the loss was due immediately to perils of the sea. The verdict was entered for the plaintiffs.

Held, by the majority of the Exchequer Chamber (reversing the Queen's Bench), that if the unseaworthiness at the beginning of the voyage be assumed to have caused the loss, the consequences, under the circumstances, were imputable to the plaintiffs, and should be borne by them rather than by the defendant; and that there must be a new trial.

Per Lord Coleridge, C.J. (besides agreeing with the majority) that upon the assumption mentioned, the ship was not lost by perils insured against; and that a time policy implies a condition of seaworthiness.

Per Brett, J. and Amphlett, B., dissentientibus, that the verdict was rightly entered for the plaintiffs.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant against a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in discharging a rule to set aside a verdict found for the plaintiffs, and to enter verdict for the defendant or for a new trial.

The following is a statement of the case:

The action was brought to recover a total loss upon a time policy of insurance for twelve months, effected by the plaintiffs on the steamship Frances, in the sum of 5800*l.*, on ship values at 8000*l.*, and machinery at 4000*l.*

The declaration contained a count on the policy for a total loss, and also the common money count. To the first count the defendant pleaded: first, denial of the insurance; secondly, denial of the plaintiff's interest; thirdly, denial of the loss by perils insured against; fourthly, misrepresentation; fifthly, concealment; sixthly, that after the making of the policy, the plaintiffs, well knowing that the ship was unseaworthy, without any justifiable cause, sent her to sea in such unseaworthy condition, and that the loss was occasioned thereby; seventhly, that the voyage was illegal, by reason of the ship having sailed with passengers without a passenger certificate, and that the policy declared on was effected by the plaintiffs for the express purpose of covering the ship on the said illegal voyage. And to the money count, never Indebted.

Upon all these pleas issue was joined, and the plaintiffs demurred to the sixth and seventh pleas.

The cause was tried at the London Sittings after Trinity Term 1873, before Mr. Justice Blackburn and a special jury, and the following facts were given in evidence or admitted on both sides.

The plaintiffs are iron shipbuilders and marine engineers, carrying on business under the firm of J. and W. Dudgeon, at Millwall, on the banks of the Thames, an at No. 10, London-street, in the City of London, and are proprietors of a line of steamers trading between London and Gothenburg, and the defendant is an underwriter at Lloyds.

The Frances was an iron screw steamer of 705 tons register, built at Amsterdam in the year 1858, and launched in 1859 for Spanish owners under the name of the Paris. Evidence was given at the trial on behalf of the plaintiffs that she had originally been constructed of good iron.

The defendant gave evidence that, in or about the year 1868, the said vessel was lying at anchor in the harbour in Cadiz, and continued there unemployed for about 18 months. She was then the property of Messrs. A. Lopes and Co., shipowners, of Cadiz and Barcelona.

In the month of Sept. 1871 the Paris was at Birkenhead, and was offered for sale there. Two persons who inspected the Paris while at Birkenhead in Sept. 1871 were called by the defendant at the trial. Neither made a regular survey of the vessel, but both came to the conclusion that she was very dirty, and had been much neglected, and that her iron was probably corroded, and they did not purchaser her.

In the said month of Sept. 1871 the plaintiffs contracted with the Spanish owners of the Paris to build them a new ship, and to take the Paris, which was then at Birkenhead, in part payment, at about 4000*l*. She was then brought round to Millwall from Birkenhead with the original boilers on board, which were not fit for use, and she was consequently towed round. During the passage she made water, and her pumps were constantly attended to.

After the arrival of the Paris at Millwall, the plaintiffs caused the boilers to be taken out of the ship, and she was offered for sale to the agent of a firm at Hull, who after examining her afloat, but not making a regular survey, advised his principals not to buy her, because in his judgment, as he stated at the trial, the sides and frames in the bunker and boiler space were in a bad condition from corrosion, and the screw tunnel was in a defective atate.

At the time the plaintiffs became owners of the Paris, they were the owners of two steamers named respectively the Mary and Louisa Ann Fanny, running for the conveyance of cargo and passengers between London and Gothenburg; one of them, viz., the Louisa Ann Fanny, met with a collision, and the plaintiffs resolved to repair the Paris and run her on the line, and change her name to Frances. It was stated by the plaintiffs that the vessel's name was so changed in compliment to the daughter of one of their partners, their ships on that line being always called after female names connected with the firm's family.

For this purpose the vessel was placed in a dry dock at Millwall and scraped perfectly clean; and the plaintiffs deposed that they believed the ship to be quite capable of being made fit for the service, and that orders were given to Mr. Harrington, the marine surveyor and engineer, to superintend the repairing of the vessel, and to see that she was properly repaired, and that the plaintiffs' workmen at Millwall were told to execute whatever repairs were required, and that there was no stint whatever as to the amount of the repairs, and that they fully believed that the ship was made seaworthy. Mr. Harrington, who was called on their behalf, confirmed this, and gave positive testimony that everything was done that was required, and in his opinion she was made a thoroughly good strong ship; the old boilers were taken out, the boiler space was all open to view, but the ceiling was only partly removed, and the cement was not removed at all; so that the whole of the inside was not visible. There was contradictory evidence among the skilled witnesses as to whether the removal of the ceiling and the cement was necessary or not. Mr. Harrington deposed that it was not at all required. Strong evidence was given on the part of the plaintiffs' shipwrights and dock people that everything was done that was requisite.

On the defendant's behalf witnesses were called to prove that in their opinion sufficient repairs had not been done, and that in their opinion the ship was not seaworthy by means of corroded iron having been left in the ship, and sufficient new plates not having been put in. A witness called by the plaintiffs on cross-examination stated that the screw tunnel was in a defective condition. Similar evidence as to this was given on behalf of defendant, and it was proved that no repairs were done to the screw tunnel.

After the repairs had been executed, and before the Frances left London, a surveyor to the Board of Trade surveyed the outside of the ship, but by reason of want of time the inside was not surveyed, and, consequently, the ship did not obtain a passengers' certificate, and ultimately sailed for Gothenberg on the 3rd Feb. 1872, without one.

On or about the 31st Jan. 1872, the plaintiffs caused the policy now sued on to be effected for a period of twelve calendar months commencing on the 24th Jan. 1872, and ending on the 23rd Jan. 1873, and the policy was subscribed by the defendant for 100*l*.

At the time of the effecting of the said policy of insurance, it was stated to the representatives of the defendant (who then knew nothing of or about the vessel), by the clerk to the brokers on behalf of the assured, that the Frances was a vessel the plaintiffs had taken in exchange, that she had been thoroughly repaired or practically rebuilt, and that they were going to put her into their Gothenburg trade, similar to that of the Louisa Ann Fanny and Mary.

On the morning of Saturday, the 3rd Feb. 1872, the Frances sailed from London for Gothenburg with some machinery on deck, but no other cargo, so that she was somewhat crank. Towards noon on Sunday, the day after the vessel left London, some water was observed in the stokehole and engine room, and the quantity of water she made, whatever such was, was more than could be accounted for by any weather the ship met with. The ship arrived safely at Gothenberg on the 7th Feb.

On her arrival in smooth water at Gothenburg, the Frances ceased to leak. She was examined there by two carpenters, but the cause of her making water was not discovered.

On the 11th Feb., at 8 a.m., the Frances having taken on board a cargo, consisting of oats and about 180 tons of iron, together with a deck cargo of deals, left Gothenburg for London.

On the morning of the 12th Feb., when the Frances reached the open sea, the wind began to blow, and a heavy rolling sea was running, and it became necessary to put a sail over the stokehole to prevent the sea from getting in. It was stated by the plaintiffs' witnesses that it blew a gale, but the weather was not such as to make a good ship behave as the Frances did.

The Frances laboured heavily, and began to make water to such an extent that in sixteen hours the fires were extinguished. A portion of the deals which formed the deck cargo was used for relighting the fires, the rest was thrown or washed overboard. After about twelve hours pumping, the pumps got choked with the oats, and all hands had to be employed in bailing the ship. There was evidence given by the defendant that had the screw tunnel been in proper order the pumps would not have got choked as they did.

On the night of the 14th Feb., those on board the Frances having sighted the Spurn Lights, endeavoured to get her into Hull, the ship at the time being waterlogged did not readily answer her helm. Partly from this and partly from the thickness of the weather, which at the time was very dense, on the following morning, at about 5 a.m., the ship, having been in a state of distress since the morning of the 12th Feb.,went ashore under Didlington Heights, upon the coast of Yorkshire. One of the boats was swamped, but the crew were all saved by a smack. Part of the cargo was afterwards saved, but the vessel could not be got off, and subsequently broke in two, and finally after some months went completely to pieces.

At the time of the effecting of the aforesaid insurance the vessel was unclassed.

At the conclusion of the evidence the learned judge, having reduced into writing the questions he proposed asking the jury, read them to the counsel on each side. Neither side suggested any further question should be put to the jury.

Counsel on each side having addressed the jury, the learned judge thereupon summed up, and left the seven following questions to them, which, together with the answers of the jury, were as follows:

1. Was the representation made by the broker at the time of making the insurance, as to the condition of the vessel, and as to the extent of the examination substantially correct? Answer.—Yes.

2. Did that representation involve in it a statement that the vessel was to carry passengers, and, consequently, had been surveyed by the Board of Trade? Answer.—No.

3. Was there a concealment from the underwriters of anything materially affecting the insurance which the plaintiffs knew and the underwriters did not? Answer.—No.

4. Was the fact that the ship had not been surveyed and certified for passengers under the circumstances one which was material? Answer.—No.

5. Was the vessel seaworthy when she started? Answer.—The jury cannot agree.

6. If not, was that known to the plaintiffs? Answer.—No.

7. Was that unseaworthiness the cause of the loss? Answer.—The jury cannot agree.

Upon these findings the learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs; and in Michaelmas Term 1873 the defendant obtained a rule calling upon them to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, as regards the verdict entered for the plaintiffs on the sixth plea, on the ground that the findings of the jury did not warrant the entry of the verdict; and as regards the verdict entered upon the third plea, on the ground that there was no finding to warrant the entry of such verdict; and why a verdict should not be entered for the defendant instead of the verdict for the plaintiffs; or why a new trial should not be had between the parties, on the ground that the findings of the jury on the questions submitted to them were against the weight of evidence, and that their findings were inconsistent and incomplete, and insufficient to warrant the entry of the verdict or otherwise. And it was further ordered in the rule that the demurrers herein should come on for argument with this rule, when evidence as to the finding as to passengers was to be considered, and why the damages should not be reduced by proportion of salvage to be ascertained as might be arranged.

The rule and demurrers on the record also raised questions affecting the seventh plea, but that plea is found for the plaintiffs, and no questions now arise in regard thereto.

The said rule came on for argument in Trinity Term 1874, when the court took time to consider their judgment.

On the 6th July 1874 the court gave judgment, discharging the said rule.

The case is reported ante, vol. 2, p. 323; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31; and L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 581.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the said rule ought to have been discharged or made absolute.

June 16, 17, and 18, 1875.—The appeal was on these days argued at length before Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett, J., Cleasby, B., Grove, J. Pollock and Amphlett, B.B.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Cohen, Q.C.) for defendant, the appellant.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (with him A. L. Smith) for plaintiffs, the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgments of the court. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—CLEASBY, B., delivered the judgment of himself and Pollock, B.—It does not appear to be necessary in this case to consider the general question of there being an implied warranty of seaworthiness in such a case as the present, because such a warranty is in general a condition precedent, and the breach of it avoids the policy altogether; but in the present case the policy attached on the 23rd Jan., or when the vessel was in dock, having just undergone some repairs, or still undergoing them, and there was no breach of any warranty or condition then; and what took place afterwards would not entirely avoid the policy. We have to deal in the present case with matter subsequent to the commencement of the risk, and to consider not so much the validity of the policy as the right to recover upon it under the circumstances stated in the case. It is of little consequence whether the matter subsequent is regarded as avoiding the policy from the time of its occurrence or as disentitling the plaintiffs to recover under the policy; but it seems more correct to consider it as affecting the right to recover, and not the policy itself, because, notwithstanding the matter subsequent, the assured might no doubt recover upon the policy in respect of a partial loss or damage which had occurred before, as by fire or otherwise. The real question in the present case is whether upon a time policy, where the risk attaches while the ship is in the hands of the assured, and the vessel afterwards starts upon a voyage in an unseaworthy condition, and is lost in consequence of such unseaworthiness, the assured can recover.

In considering the propriety of entering a verdict for the plaintiffs upon the imperfect finding of the issues, the case was properly argued on both sides as if the jury had found the sixth issue, except the averment of plaintiffs' knowledge of the unseaworthiness, in favour of the defendants. And it does not appear to me necessary, so far as regards the sixth plea, to enter into the question of the causa proxima of the loss, and whether it was eventually caused by fog or sea perils, because the meaning of the sixth plea is clearly not that the vessel did not go down from sea perils, but that this was the consequence of the unseaworthiness of the ship which caused her to get into difficulty and become unmanageable, which would not have otherwise occured. Upon the question so raised, there is no authority in this country which can be considered as clear and decisive. If in the present case the vessel had gone down in a storm along with the other vessels in the North Sea, it may be that after the case of Gibson v. Small (4 H. L. Cas. 353) and Thompson v. Hopper (6 E. & B. 172, 937) and Michael v. Tredwin (17 C. B. 551), it would have been difficult to maintain that by reason of the vessel being unseaworthy at the commencement of the voyage the defendants would be entitled to succeed. I by no means say that this is the clear effect of those decisions. The decision in Thompson v. Hopper in the Exchequer Chamber proceeded only upon the propep meaning of the language of the plea, and it only shows that if a plea alleges unseaworthiness, and then that by reason thereof the vessel was lost, the meaning is that the unseaworthiness was the immediate and proximate cause of the loss, and that such a plea would not be proved by showing that the proximate cause of the loss was the sea peril and dangers of navigation, though the vessel was exposed to them by the shipowner in an unseaworthy state. The decision in the Queen's Bench had been the other way.

The particular question which I have considered as raised in the present case was brought before the Court of Queen's Bench and adverted to in the case of Hollingsworth v. Brodrick (4 A. & E. 646). The question was not properly raised and could not be decided, but most of the judges advert to the absence of the loss being the consequence of the unseaworthiness as preventing the unseaworthiness from being an answer. And as the matter is thus left undecided, it is useless to refer to the cases more particulary. It cannot be questioned, I think it was not questioned on the argument, that the sixth plea is an answer to the action; but the sixth plea avers, in addition to the other facts raising the defence, that when the vessel was sent to sea the plaintiffs knew that she was in an unseaworthy state, and this averment is negatived by the jury. The judgments in Thompson v. Hopper, both in the Queen's Bench, and in the Exchequer Chamber, show that with this averment the defence would be complete (see particularly the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., in Exchequer Chamber, and of Lord Campbell, C.J. in Queen's Bench.) Now if the answer would have been sufficient without the averment, the averment need not be proved, and therefore we have to consider the effect in such a policy as this of the assured sending the vessel to sea in a condition which makes her unseaworthy for the voyage on which she is sent, though not so as to the knowledge of the assured, and particularly when such unseaworthiness causes her loss. In the absence of any decision upon the matter in our courts, the case must be considered upon principle.

Now we are considering a contract of a peculiar nature. The contract of insurance is (in the language of Mr. Arnould, p. 1 of his work) "in its essential nature and in all its incidents a contract of indemnity." That is a contract of indemnity from certain losses. And it follows that in such a contract a man cannot recover for losses which are the consequence of his own default. And it can make no difference that the proximate cause of loss was a particular event, if that particular event was in the ordinary course of things brought about by that default. There is no question that knowingly sending a vessel to sea in an unseaworthy state is such a default; but would it not be equally a default, if a vessel had been many voyages, and then lying in dock for some time, to send her to sea without having been surveyed and examined, the consequence being that she is lost, when, if she had been surveyed and repaired, she would not have been lost? And are not in such a case the means snd opportunities of knowledge equivalent to actual knowledge?

The question in the present case, as the pleadings stand, no doubt is whether the fact of unseaworthiness at the beginning of the voyage which causes the loss is itself an answer. The importance or the rule that the assured shall have his vessel in good repair at the commencement of the voyage (which though technically the commencement of the risk in voyage policies only, is substantially and mainly the commencement of the risk in all cases where it is the first voyage undertaken) is laid down in the strongest terms by the most eminent judges: (See Lord Eldon, in Douglas v. Scougall, 4 Dow's App. Cas. 276.) His language is, "I have often had occasion to observe here that there is nothing in matters of insurance of more importance than the implied warranty that a ship is seaworthy when she sails on the voyage insured, and I have endeavoured both with a view to the benefit of commerce and the preservation of human life to enforce that doctrine as far as, in the exercise of a sound discretion, I have been enabled to do so." He is speaking in that particular case of a voyage policy, but the ground is equally applicable to a voyage undertaken under the protection of a time policy. Lord Redesdale, in Wilkie v. Geddes (3 Dow's App. Cas. 60), uses the following language, the reasoning of which is equally applicable to voyages undertaken under time policies and under voyage policies: "Unless the assured were bound to take care that the vessel was in every respect seaworthy, the consequences would be most mischievous; for the effect of insurance would be to render those chiefly interested much more careless about the condition of the ship, and the lives of those engaged in navigating her." And Lord St. Leonards, in the case of Gibson v. Small (4 H. of L. C. p. 417), expressed an opinion that under such circumstances as those of the present case it was a condition that the ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage. Having regard to these opinions it appears to me most undesirable to relax the obligations which such considerations have attached to the owner of a vessel to have a vessel which he sends on a voyage seaworthy for that voyage. If he knows that he is under that obligation, and that by not complying with it he may lose the benefit of his insurance, he will take care to make the matter sure. But if it is to depend upon the uncertain conclusion of his knowledge, or of his doing his best, he may do as little as he can do to satisfy an apparent compliance, and take his chance in a matter involving vital consequences. The authorities and reasons are sufficient to satisfy me that in this contract of indemnity the unseaworthiness of the vessel at the commencement of the voyage, which unseaworthiness really causes the loss, is a fact the consequences of which are imputable to the assured, and to be borne by him, and not by the underwriters; and it follows that in the present case sufficient was proved to entitle the defendant to a verdict on the sixth plea, supposing the facts upon which the jury could not agree to have been found in favour of the defendants. It is made an objection to this as a correct legal conclusion, however just it may appear to be, that it really introduces into a written contract a term not found in it, which the parties might at any time have introduced into it, to the effect that there is an obligation or duty on the assured to have the vessel seaworthy for the voyage for which she is destined. The answer is that the contract is an exceptional one, and the courts have already departed from the ordinary rule by introducing into ordinary voyage policies a condition not found in them, which the parties might insert or not, viz., that the vessel was seaworthy at the commencement of the risk, and have made it a condition avoiding the policy as much as if words to that effect had been inserted at the end. It may be considered that in such a contract of indemnity the real subject of insurance on a voyage policy is a vessel fit for the voyage, and that without this the foundation fails which is treated as a condition. As a general rule upon time policies this condition is said to be inapplicable, because the vessel at the commencement of the risk may be in the middle of a voyage, upon which it may have started in a seaworthy condition, but may have suffered so much as at the time to be quite unseaworthy. But it is acting in the spirit of the decisions to hold that if the vessel be in the possession of the owner destined for a voyage, there is some obligation on the assured to make the vessel fit for the voyage. And the breach of this obligation, though not a condition avoiding the policy altogether, as in the case of a voyage policy, is available as a defence where the loss arises from the improper condition of the vessel.

Unless something is introduced into the policy, not included in its terms, how could a defence be founded on the fact of the assured sending the vessel to sea, knowing it to be unseaworthy, or having the means of knowledge, or sending it to sea without survey and examination when it is obvious such survey and examination ought to be had, and in consequence the vessel was lost? In those cases it would not be a part of the case that there had been any fraud on the part of the assured, but the defence must be founded on some obligation arising out of the subject of insurance, and not contained in the policy. And the result would be that the assured could not recover in respect of a loss attributable to his neglect to have a ship made seaworthy on starting for the voyage.

It is not intended here to decide that in the case of a time policy there is an obligation to have the vessel seaworthy at the commencement of every voyage, wherever it may commence, undertaken during the currency of the policy. In the case of voyage policies there is no warranty of seaworthiness on starting from intermediate ports or upon the return voyage, but only at the commencement of the risk. What is decided here is that when a vessel in the hands of the owner is intended for a voyage and a time policy is made, the assured is under an obligation to have the vessel seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage on which she starts, which is the commencement of the sea risks insured against. And it is considered better to deal with the circumstances of the particular case, such circumstances being of real importance in such a contract, rather than disregard those circumstances, and act upon an inflexible rule of recent invention on account of its simplicity, as has been suggested.

The case of Fawcus v. Sarsfield (6 El. & Bl. 192) was much relied on in favour of this view. In that case, the defence which is set up in this case was complicated with other matters which makes it not a satisfactory guide, but if it cannot be treated as a decision in favour of the defendant, it affords an argument in his favour; for it certainly appears from that case that if the vessel is in want of repairs, and so unseaworthy, and a partial loss occurs, the underwriters are not liable to make good the damage resulting from the bad condition of the ship, and if not liable for a partial loss caused by unseaworthiness, why liable for a total loss resulting from the same cause? In either case the assured, and not the underwriter should be responsible for the improper condition of the vessel when exposed to the perils. In America the decisions seem to agree with this conclusion. (See Phillips on Insurance, ss. 727 to 731.)

As regards the issue upon the third plea, we were much pressed to hold that as that issue was whether the ship was lost by the perils insured against, and the perils by which the vessel was lost resulted from the unseaworthiness of the ship, and those perils were not insured against, therefore that issue ought to be found for the defendants. In order to determine correctly how the issue ought to be entered, we must consider what is the meaning of the plea. Does it mean that the vessel was not lost by perils mentioned in the policy as perils insured against; or does it mean, as contended by the defendant, that the ship was not lost by perils for which the defendant as a legal consequence insured against, and for which he was responsible? Now the plea is a traverse of an allegation in the declaration; and when the plaintiffs allege that the vessel was lost by the perils insured against, I should say they really make an allegation of fact and not of legal liability, and as the sea perils were the immediate cause of loss, I think that issue was correctly entered for the plaintiffs. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs when the case was before us, was very decided in his opinion, and made it part of his argument that if the plaintiffs had knowingly sent the vessel to sea in an unseaworthy state, the issue would properly be found for the defendants. Notwithstanding this admission, upon a correct view of the language of the issue, I think it is properly entered for the plaintiffs.

The statute 34 & 35 Vict. c. 110, has no direct bearing upon the present question, but so great is the obligation of a shipowner who sends a vessel to sea to send it in a seaworthy condition, that it is, under ordinary circumstances by sect. 11 made a misdemeanor to send it in an unseaworthy condition so as to endanger life, and the owner has to show, to escape from a criminal charge, that he used all reasonable means to make the vessel seaworthy, and was ignorant of the real condition of the vessel.

For the above reasons it appears to me that sufficient would have been proved and found, to make the sixth plea an answer, if the questions on which the jury could not agree had been found for the defendant, and therefore that the issue upon that plea was improperly entered for the plaintiffs, and the judgment entered accordingly should be set aside and a new trial had. This is the judgment of my brother Pollock and myself.

BRETT, J. delivered the judgment of himself and Amphlett, B.—The arguments in this case were almost exclusively confined to questions arising on the third and sixth issues. Objection was taken, but not much if at all pressed, to the judgment on the fourth issue. It seems sufficient to say that we never entertained any doubt that it was correct, and so stated during the argument.

With respect to the third and sixth issues, the material facts to be considered seem to me to be that the plaintiffs, being owners of the Frances, insured her whilst she was in the port of London, and under their control, by a policy dated 31st Jan. 1872 for a year from the 24th Jan. 1872 to the 23rd Jan. 1873. The ship sailed from London for Gothenburg on the 3rd Feb. 1872, and arrived on the 7th Feb. 1872. She sailed again for London on the 11th Feb., met with bad weather, leaked, became water-logged, and, on the 14th Feb. became unmanageable, was stranded on the coast of Yorkshire, and was a total loss. Considering, as a whole, the written questions, and the explanation of them to the jury, and the ruling of the learned judge at the trial, as reported by him in his judgment in the Queen's Bench, I think it must be gathered that he directed the jury as to the third issue that the evidence, being uncontradicted, was conclusive that the ship was lost by perils of the sea. And having regard to what the jury did and did not answer we must treat the case as if the jury had found that the ship was, in fact, unseaworthy when she left London, that such unseaworthiness continued until she was lost, that such unseaworthiness was unknown to the assured, that it was a cause of the loss in the sense that she became water-logged and unmanageable by reason of it and the weather, and went ashore in consequence; so that the loss would not have happened, notwithstanding the weather, but for the unseaworthiness. The question is whether upon such facts and assumed findings, the verdict was properly entered for the plaintiffs on the third and sixth issue. If it ought not to have been so entered on both, there should be a new trial, if otherwise, the judgment below is right.

The case was elaborately argued. It was contended for the defendant that the moving and efficient cause of the loss of the ship was her unseaworthiness which existed when she first left port after the effecting of the policy, and continued till she was lost; that consequently it could not properly be said that the ship was lost by a peril insured against. A loss occasioned by unseaworthiness not arising after the attaching of the policy must be treated, it was said, as a loss resulting from the inherent vice of the ship, and in either case the verdict ought to have been entered for the defendants on the third issue. If the loss could be treated primâ facie as a loss by a peril insured against, yet a loss, caused by such unseaworthiness as alleged must be treated as arising from a wrongful act of the assured, and a loss so arising cannot be covered by a contract of indemnity, and therefore the verdict ought to have been entered for the defendants on the third and sixth issues, the averment of knowledge in the sixth plea being immaterial. For the plaintiffs it was argued that in a time policy there is no warranty of seaworthiness such as exists in a voyage policy, viz., with the effect that if the ship is unseaworthy at the commencement of the risk the contract of indemnity does not attach, and the premium must be returned; that as you cannot imply any such warranty or condition as to seaworthiness at the commencement of the risk so as to destroy the contract, you cannot introduce any such condition at all; there is no contract about seaworthiness at all, none expressed, none to be implied; that the subject matter of a voyage policy is a ship seaworthy for the voyage at the commencement, but the subject matter of a time policy is only a ship.

If a loss is caused solely by unseaworthiness existing before or at the time the policy attaches, it is no doubt a loss from the inherent vice of the ship, and is not covered under either form of policy; but if it is a loss caused by a peril of the sea, although so caused by the unseaworthiness of the ship existing at the commencement and continuing, it is a loss proximately caused by a peril of the sea. In such a state of things the assured under a voyage policy cannot recover, because the policy by reason of the warranty and the existence, at the commencement, of unseaworthiness, never attaches; but as there is no warranty in a time policy, there is no reason why the causa proxima should not solely be regarded. If the ship be intentionally cast away by direction of the assured, her loss is caused by a wrongful act of the assured, and so, if the ship be sent to sea to his knowledge unseaworthy, and is lost in consequence. And it is an admitted principle, that for a loss efficiently caused by a wrongful act of the assured he cannot recover compensation under a contract of indemnity. But the mere fact of the ship being unseaworthy when she goes to sea, if her condition be unknown to the assured, is not a wrongful act, and therefore the principle above enunciated does not apply. And, as there is no bargain that the ship shall be seaworthy at any period of the risk, a loss caused proximately by a peril of the sea is covered by a time policy, although the ship was unseaworthy at the attaching of the risk, and so continued till the time of loss, and would have surmounted the peril if she had not been unseaworthy. It makes no difference whether the policy is effected whilst the ship is in port or at sea, at home or abroad. There cannot be a warranty implied from the same words depending upon the locality of the ship at the time those words are agreed upon.

The questions raised seem to be: First, is there any such warranty of seaworthiness in a time policy as there is in every voyage policy in ordinary form, i.e., a warranty that the ship was or shall be seaworthy at the commencement of the risk?

Secondly, Is there any warranty that the ship shall be seaworthy at any other time than at the commencement of the risk, as for instance at the commencement of any or every voyage sailed during the period insured?

Thirdly, Is there any condition or stipulation, by way of contract, that the underwriter shall not be liable for any loss which would not have happened if the ship had not been unseaworthy at the commencement of the risk, and so continued until the loss?

Fourthly, Was the uncontradicted evidence in this case conclusive that the ship was lost proximately by perils of the sea?

And, fifthly, Did the facts which are to be assumed, that she was unseaworthy when she left London, and so continued until she was lost, and that she would not have been lost if she had not been and continued so unseaworthy, absolve the defendant so as to entitle him to a verdict either on the third or the sixth plea?

As to the first, in Gibson v. Small (4 H. of L. 353), the House of Lords decided that there is no such warranty in a time policy, at all events if the policy be made whilst the ship is at sea. In Thompson v. Hopper (6 E. & B. 172), it was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that there is no such warranty, though the policy be made whilst the ship is in the port of the place of the owner's residence. The only question is, whether this ruling in Thompson v. Hopper can be and is to be overruled. If it is not, the two cases exhaust the point, and determine that there is no such warranty in any time policy in ordinary form as there is in every voyage policy in ordinary form. It seems impossible to add anything to the arguments which have been used on both sides as to this point. All that can be said seems to be contained on one side in the judgments of Erle, J., and on the other side in those of Lord Campbell and others. The reasoning of those who hold that there is no such warranty in any time policy is, as I understand it, substantially as follows:—The warranty and its effect are admitted to exist in voyage policies, that is to say, in policies in which an insured voyage is, or insured voyages, are named. It is introduced by implication, either on the ground that it was originally proved to be by custom understood in such policies, and has thereupon been adopted by the courts as law; or on the ground that it has been introduced and adopted by the courts alone as a necessary implication from reason. It cannot be implied in time policies, that is to say, in policies in which no voyage is specified as a voyage insured by the first process, because no such custom has ever been proved. It cannot be implied by the second process, because the reasoning which may have been used to introduce it into voyage policies cannot be applied to time policies. It is true that the warranty in different voyage policies, though enunciated by the same term, seaworthy can be fulfilled by a different condition of the ship according to the different voyages named in the different policies; and so far a different degree of condition of the ship might be applied in time policies; still, in voyage policies the condition into which the ship must be or must have been put at the commencement of the voyage insured can be measured or estimated at the time of making the contract of insurance by reference to that named voyage; the ship must be or have been in such a condition at the commencement of the voyage insured as to be reasonably able to encounter the ordinary vicissitudes of an ordinary voyage of that kind. But in a time policy there is no voyage insured, there is no voyage named in the policy. The ship will have to sail a voyage or voyages which are, therefore, the voyage or voyages sailed, not the voyage or voyages insured. But there is nothing in the contract of insurance to fix that voyage or those voyages. The assured may not have determined on any voyage, or if he has, may consistently with the contract of insurance, change the destination of the ship. The ship may, during the time of insurance, sail a summer voyage along the coast or a winter voyage round Cape Horn, or one or many voyages beginning at any time. It would be impossible at the time of making the contract to anticipate what the condition of the ship must be when the risk is to attach or did attach. Neither the assured nor the underwriter can make any calculation about it. It cannot be therefore properly laid down by the courts that all men of ordinary reason must have contracted upon the assumption of there being a warranty of seaworthiness, the burden of fulfilling which neither of them could estimate. In my judgment this reasoning cannot be successfully answered. I am of opinion that there is no such warranty in any time policy in ordinary form.

As to the second proposition with regard to every voyage, it was pointed out by Lord Campbell in Fawcus v. Sarsfield (6 E. & B. 201), that Mr. Wilde, with all his great experience and knowledge did not contend for it, but asked for a warranty only as to the first voyage sailed under the policy. Lord Campbell gives his reasons for holding that there is no such warranty as to any of the voyages sailed under an ordinary time policy. I agree with those reasons. And certainly it would be strange to imply so futile a warranty as one confined to the first voyage, which might be to Cardiff in ballast, whilst the next should be to Calcutta or Hong Kong with coal, or railway iron, or machinery. I cannot think there is any such warranty as is suggested in the second proposition with regard to any of the voyages.

And if there be no warranty as is suggested in either the first or second propositions, it follows, as it seems to me, that no undertaking of any kind by the assured can be implied with regard to the seaworthiness of the ship at any period of the time of insurance. There is nothing on which to found such an implication. In plain language the underwriter, in a time policy, in his contract, insures against a loss by any of the perils described in the policy whether the ship was or was not seaworthy, when the risk attached or when the loss occurred. If therefore the underwriter can be absolved from a loss caused in any sense by unseaworthiness, it is not by virtue of anything within the contract. If the loss be solely and immediately caused by unseaworthiness, which existed at the commencement of the risk and continued till the loss, without the happening of any peril described in the policy, then the underwriter is not liable because the ship has perished by her own inherent vice. There is, in such case, but the one cause. There is, therefore, no opportunity for the application of the doctrine of causa proxima which implies the existence of two causes. But if the ship is proximately lost by a peril described in the policy, though the unseaworthiness existing from the beginning is also a cause, then arises the question whether the underwriter is liable. He is not absolved, if at all, by reason of a breach of contract. There is no contract about seaworthiness. And if there were, in considering an alleged breach of contract it is recognised law that the causa proxima can alone be regarded. Even a particular and novel stipulation in a contract of insurance, it has been held, is to be construed or applied with reference to this maxim. There is a case, as the law at present stands, in which the underwriter is absolved from the consequences of a loss caused by unseaworthiness, though the loss may also be said to have been immediately caused by a peril described in the policy. That is where the ship is immediately lost by a peril described, but where the original and continuing unseaworthiness was also a cause, and the efficient cause of loss, in the sense that it substantially caused the described peril to destroy the ship. That is a state of things consistent with what is set forth in the sixth plea in this case, and in the third plea in Thompson v. Hopper. If such unseaworthiness was known to the assured before the ship went to sea, it was held in Thompson v. Hopper that the underwriter is absolved. If it was not so known, it was held in Thompson v. Hopper, and in Fawcus v. Sarsfield, that he is not absolved. If it was known, it is said that the assured was guilty of a wrongful act, and that no man can recover an indemnity for a loss occasioned by his own wrongful act, and it was held in Thompson v. Hopper, that "this is a fundamental principle of insurance law which is applicable if the wrongful act causes a peril described in the policy to be the immediate and proximate cause of the loss of the ship." The headnote to Thompson v. Hopper, in error, in E.B.&E. 1038, states that the latter part of the judgment of the Queen's Bench was overruled, and that even where there is a wrongful act of the assured, the causa proxima alone of the loss is to be regarded, and if the wrongful act of the assured be not the immediate and proximate cause of the loss, the underwriter is liable, if the immediate and proximate cause be a peril described in the policy. Without determining whether this is the real effect of the judgment in error, which I more than doubt, I think it is clear, from the judgment in the Queen's Bench, that all depends on whether the act of the assured which is relied on is more than a breach of contract—whether it amounts to an act wrong of itself in the minds of all right thinking people. It is suggested by Willes, J., whose opinion is to me always of the greatest consequence, that the mere fact of knowingly sending a ship to sea unseaworthy is not a wrongful act. I cannot agree; I will not argue about it. It seems to me self-apparent. It is a wrongful thing to do in the judgment of all right thinking people. But if the unseaworthiness is not known to the assured. I cannot see how it can in reason be said he has been quilty of a wrongful act. He may have taken all the pains, and have gone to all the expense possible, and yet a secret defect may in the end be proved to have existed. How can he be said in reason to have been guilty of anything wrongful, it being assumed he is not guilty of a breach of contract. Here the jury have negatived knowledge. There was, therefore, in my opinion, nothing wrongful in the conduct of the assured, and the underwriters have no defence.

The loss was not the immediate consequence solely of the unseaworthiness. The ship was not lost through her own inherent vice. She crossed the North Sea twice after the policy attached. She was lost by stranding. That was the causa proxima. There was nothing to prevent the application of that maxim. The evidence of the loss by stranding as a causa proxima was conclusive. Therefore the verdict was rightly entered on the third issue.

That which must be taken to be a material allegation in the sixth plea, unless Thompson v. Hopper and Fawcus v. Sarsfield are to be overruled, was not proved. I think the demurrers in Thompson v. Hopper and Fawcus v. Sarsfield were rightly decided. Therefore the verdict was rightly entered on the sixth issue.

The judgment in the Queen's Bench was right, and should be affirmed.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This is my own judgment, (a) as to some part of which my brother Grove agrees, and my brothers Cleasby and Pollock agree.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench discharging a rule to enter a verdict for the defendant and for a new trial. The case is reported L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 581. The judgment of the court discharging the rule delivered by my brother Blackburn enters so fully and clearly into the facts of the case that the special case before us is little more than a repetition of his statement, and it seems unnecessary for the purpose of this judgment again to repeat them. Portions of the pleadings and the questions put to and answered by the jury on the trial it is, however, essential carefully to consider. The declaration was on a policy which no doubt is properly described as a time policy. But it is a policy in very different terms from the policies sued on, and which were the subjects of decision, in Gibson v. Small (16 Q. B. 128 and 141; 4 H. L. Cas. 353) and Thompson v. Hopper (6 E. & B. 172). The risk is thus described, "lost or not lost at and from for and during the space of twelve calendar months commencing on the 24th Jan. 1872 and ending on the 23rd Jan. 1873 . . . in port and at sea . . . of and in the good ship Frances whereof is master under God for this present voyage . . . beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship as above, . . . and further until the said ship shall be arrived at as above; upon the said ship until she had been moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety." The perils are described so far as is necessary to set out the description, thus: —"Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contented to bear, and do take upon us in this voyage, they are of the seas . . . and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises and ship, &c., or any part thereof." The pleas which are material are the third and sixth, which are in substance as follows: the third "that the ship, &c. was not by the perils insured against or any of them, lost as alleged;" the sixth "that after the making of the policy, the plaintiffs, well knowing that the ship was unseaworthy, without any justifiable cause sent her to sea in such unseaworthy condition, that the ship, &c. was lost as alleged by reason of such unseaworthiness of the said ship and not otherwise."

At the end of the trial before my brother Blackburn, he summed up the case to the jury and left seven questions to them, which, with the answers, were as stated in the case. In asking the last question my brother Blackburn explained to the jury that he did not mean to ask them whether the unseaworthiness was the sole or immediate cause of the loss, but whether the making water was occasioned by unseaworthiness, and the loss arose from her being water-logged in consequence of that unseaworthiness, so that, but for that, it could not have happened.

Upon these findings of the jury my brother Blackburn directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs. A rule to set aside this verdict and to enter it for defendants or for a new trial was obtained, and was, after argument, discharged; and the question for us is whether it should have been discharged or made absolute. It was contended before the Court of Queen's Bench, and for the purpose of the argument the contention was admitted, and the judgment proceeded on the admission, that the two unanswered questions must be taken as answered in favour of the defendants and that the jury must be taken to have found the ship unseaworthy; and further that the unseaworthiness contributed to the loss within the meaning of my brother Blackburn's direction. But this being assumed, the judgment of the Queen's Bench proceeded on the ground that knowledge of unseaworthiness being negatived, the sixth plea was not proved; that there being no implied condition of seaworthiness in a time policy, the unseaworthiness was no defence when the causa proxima of the loss was a peril of the sea.

It is manifest that two questions at once arise. First, is there in such a policy as this no implied warranty of seaworthiness? and secondly, if there is not, still have the answers to the questions, interpreted by the direction of the learned judge, fairly disposed of the third and the sixth pleas?

As to the first point, it appears that though there are dicta, and dicta of great weight, which assume that in such a policy as this there is no implied warranty of seaworthiness, yet it has never been necessary to decide the point, and the point has not in fact been decided. Before the decision of Gibson v. Small, it had been assumed by text writers, and had been laid down by some English judges, e.g. Paterson, J., in Hollingsworth v. Brodrick (4 A. & E. p. 646); Tindal, C.J., in Dixon v. Sadler (8 M. & W. 898), that in a time policy, as in a voyage policy, there was this implied warranty. The view was that by the mere fact of effecting the insurance, the assured warranted that there was a ship fit to be insured, and it was laid down in particular that if the time policy was effected on a ship about to sail from a home port, there was an implied warranty: (Park on Insurance, edit. of 1842, p. 489.) Then came the well known case of Gibson v. Small (16 Q.B. 128), in which the time policy had been effected on a vessel then at sea. The Queen's Bench held that there was an implied warranty. The Exchequer Chamber reversed the decision, confining themselves however pointedly to the question of a time policy on a ship then at sea. The case went to the House of Lords, and the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was affirmed by the House of Lords, with the assent of the majority of the judges. In delivering judgment, the judges who attended the House of Lords, and the peers expressed opinions on the question of the implied warranty in time policies in general, but they did not agree. Lord Campbell, Pollock, C.B. and Parke, B., laid it down distinctly that there was no implied warranty in any time policy whatever. Lord St. Leonards agreed that in the case before the House, a time policy upon a ship then at sea, there was no implied warranty. But he said, "If a ship was about to sail upon a particular voyage, and a time policy instead of a voyage policy was effected on her, as then advised, he should think that a condition could be implied that the ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage." Martin, B. was of the same opinion, and Maule, J., confidently agreed with him. Three other judges, Alderson and Platt, BB., and Talfourd, J. confined themselves to the case before the House, Erle and V. Williams, JJ. agreed with the original decision in the Queen's Bench. It is clear, therefore, that Gibson v. Small did not decide the point which the case before us raises. Neither, if it be carefully examined, did the later case of Thompson v. Hopper (6 E. & B. 172), at least as decided on demurrer. The policy there described the risk "at and from the meridian of the 21st Oct. 1855, to and with the meridian of the of March 1855, upon the ship," &c. and made no mention of a voyage. There were three pleas which all averred that the ship at the time of the insurance being effected was "an outward bound ship lying in British port, to wit, the port of Sunderland." But the third plea contained an averment which the court construed as charging personal misconduct on the plaintiffs, which misconduct produced the loss. And on this the court unanimously held that plea to be a bar to the action. On the question of the implied warranty the court was divided, and as there was agreement as to the third plea upon the reasons given, it was hardly necessary to decide upon the others. The majority of the court no doubt held that there was no implied warranty in any time policy, although the policy before them was the only one on which they were deciding. But even if it were necessary to decide the point, the decision is one which does not bind this court. The authority indeed of Lord Campbell and of the judges who agreed with him is entitled to the highest respect, and so is that of the judges comprising the Judicial Committee in Jenkins v. Heycock (8 Moore P. C. 351), who intimated that they were inclined to concur with Lord Campbell, and those who thought that in no time policies is there any implied warranty, though they were not called upon to determine and did not determine the point. The later arguments and decisions in the case of Thompson v. Hopper, reported in the Queen's Bench (6 E. & B. 937), and in the Exchequer Chamber (E. B. & E. 1038), took place after the case had been tried at Nisi Prius, and turn rather on the effect of my brother Bramwell's direction and the finding of the jury upon the facts than on the specific point, though there is no doubt that several of the judges imply, if they do not say so, that they agree upon the point with the majority in the court below, and treat it as a settled one. The point, therefore, seems upon examination to be, in this court, open; and if it be, there is considerable authority for holding that in such a policy as this there is an implied warranty of seaworthiness. Without exception, so far as I am aware, the American text writers, and the American authorities as cited in those text writers, as well since as before the cases of Gibson v. Small and Thompson v. Hopper, hold that there is no difference on this point between a time policy on a ship then in port and to be employed on a voyage, and a voyage policy; but that the difference is between a time policy as last described and a time policy on a ship then at sea. The English authorities to the same effect have already been mentioned, and it is plain that the policy in the case before us is altogether different from that in Gibson v. Small, and is very distinguishable from that in Thompson v. Hopper. In the present case the policy is in fact a voyage policy limited to a particular time. The reasons given for implying a warranty of seaworthiness in voyage policies apply with equal strength to the policy before us; the main reason given for not implying a warranty, viz., that the shipowner could not know the state of the ship at the time of the insurance certainly does not apply: the reason given by Lord Campbell in Thompson v. Hopper (6 E. & B. 188-9) for not implying it is not a reason of principle but one of inconvenience, and would be equally cogent to establish any rule which excluded all dispute of fact. If the matter be, as I think it is, open, I confess to a strong feeling in favour of the older view of the law, except so far as it has been varied by authority. It seems to me wiser and better, to tend more towards honesty of dealing as against gambling and every fraud in insurance transactions, to extend as far as may be, rather than to contract within the narrowest point or limits, the doctrine of implied warranty of seaworthiness. I am, therefore, prepared to hold that in this policy there is an implied warranty of seaworthiness, and on this ground.

As the fifth question put by my brother Blackburn is to be taken as answered by the defendants, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below was wrong, and that the rule should have been made absolute to enter a verdict for the defendant on the third and sixth pleas. Inasmuch, however, as this case may go further, and inasmuch as the opinion I have expressed is at variance with dicta of great weight, as it is distinctly dissented from by some, and is not distinctly assented to by any of my learned brothers in this court, it is proper to examine the second question, and arrive at a decision with respect to it. The question is, Do the findings of the jury, as explained by my brother Blackburn (including the two which are to be taken as found in favour of the defendants) dispose of the questions arising on the third and sixth pleas? And in discussing this question it is to be assumed that in a time policy, where the loss is found to be by one of the perils insured against, even though the ship was unseaworthy when she started, the underwriters are liable. Now it will be observed that the jury found that the unseaworthiness was one of the concurrent enacting perils at the time of the loss. It will be further observed that they were not asked to find, and did not find, what was the efficient predominating peril at that same point of time. Yet it seems that in a case such as this the verdict would depend upon what the jury found as to this matter. If they had found that the unseaworthiness of the ship was the efficient predominating peril, then the verdict must have been entered for the defendant on the third plea as well as on the sixth plea; if on the other hand they had found that the efficient predominating peril was the bad weather, then the verdict, as now entered for the plaintiff, must have stood. This follows from the fair construction of the language of these pleas. They must mean (the third) the ship was lost through unseaworthiness; (the sixth) the ship was lost through unseaworthiness alone. The same question is involved in both, because the proper question upon the third, as upon the sixth, would be: What was the efficient predominating cause of the disaster—was it the perils of the sea, or was it the inherent vice of the ship herself? A little consideration will make this reasonably clear. Seaworthiness and powers to encounter ordinary perils are convertible terms. But the underwriter does not insure against ordinary perils; he indemnifies only against the extraordinary and unforeseen perils of the sea. "To make the underwriters liable," in the words of Lord Chief Justice Jervis (Magnus v. Buttemer, 11 C. B. 881), "the injury must be the result of something fortuitous or accidental occurring in the course of the voyage." He does not insure against inherent vice, or, what is the same thing in other words, against ordinary perils. In a voyage policy, it is true, the assured warrant power to encounter ordinary perils. Such perils therefore, are not perils which, if they cause loss, give a right of recovery under such a policy, not merely because they are not within the words of the policy, but because a condition has not been complied with, viz., that the ship shall be fit to meet them. In this case there was no power to encounter ordinary perils, and by this want of power the loss was caused. It is none the less a cause of loss—the loss was no more caused by perils insured against—because in such a policy as this the assured have not to warrant the non-existence of the cause of loss at the beginning of the risk. It may be said with truth that in this case there was evidence of two concurrent perils to which the ship was subject in her voyage, one a peril insured against, the extraordinary and unforeseen action of the sea; the other a peril not insured against, the inherent vice of the ship herself. The evidence of both these perils seems to have been stated to the jury, and they should have been asked which was the efficient predominating peril when the loss happened. According to their answer to that question, the verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs or defendant on the third plea and on the sixth, the issues involved in both these pleas being substantially the same. The averment of knowledge in the sixth plea may be disregarded as being immaterial, and when that is done the issues involved in the sixth plea are the same as the issues involved in the third; and the answers given by the jury to the questions of the learned judge do not dispose of them.

On this second ground, therefore, and for these reasons, I am of opinion that the rule should be absolute for a new trial, and as four of the judges concur in that result, the rule will be absolute for a new trial.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by J. SHORTT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 16, 1875.

COMMERCIAL STEAMSHIP COMPANY v. BOULTON AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Demurrage—Lying days—Working days.

A charter-party contained the following clause: "The loading and discharging the said ship to be as fast as the said steamer can work, but a minimum of seven days to be allowed the charterers, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at 25l. per day."

Eight days, including one Sunday, were consumed at the port of loading. The ship arrived at the port of discharge on a Tuesday, but could not get to her berth till 8 a.m. on Wednesday. She then began discharging, and continued till 8 p.m., began again at 4 a.m. on Thursday and finished at 8 a.m.

Held, that "lying days" meant working days, and Sunday was excluded.

Held, also, that the charterers were liable to pay two days' demurrage for the Wednesday and Thursday.

A ship arrived at the port of loading on Sunday, and was cleared about noon on Monday. The charterers then floated part of the cargo (timber) down the river, and some was put on board that afternoon.

The jury found that Monday was a working day.

Held, that they were justified in so finding.

THIS case was tried before Pollock, B., at the Spring Assizes at Newcastle, in 1875. The action was brought to recover freight and demurrage in respect of two ships belonging to the plaintiffs, the Brighton and the Boston, which had been chartered by the defendants to carry timber from Muhlgraben or Bolderaa (the port of Riga) to England. The charter-party of the Brighton contained the following stipulations:—

The said ship shall, with all convenient speed, having liberty to take an outward cargo direct or on the way for the owners' benefit, sail and proceed to Bolderaa and Mulhgraben, or so near thereunto as she can safely get, and there load from the charterers a full and complete cargo . . . . . the cargo to be brought to and taken alongside at the charterers' risk and expense, and also, if it should be necessary, off into the roads . . . . . and being reloaded, shall proceed to London, or as near thereunto as she can safely get, and deliver the same afloat . . . . . the loading and discharging the said ship to be as fast as the steamer can work, but a minimum of seven days to be allowed the charterers, and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said lying days, at 25*l.* per day.

The Brighton arrived at Muhlgraben on Sunday, 26th April 1873, and her master at once gave notice that he was ready to load, and she began to load on Monday, 27th April, at 2.30 p.m. as soon as cargo was sent to her. She finished loading on Monday, 4th May, and commenced the homeward voyage. From the time when she was ready to load on Monday, 27th April, until she was loaded and ready to sail on Monday evening 4th May, eight days, including one Sunday were consumed. On her arrival in the Thames she was directed to proceed to the Victoria Docks. She got into the docks on Tuesday, 12th May, at 5 p.m., but some timber belonging to the defendants was in the way, which prevented her getting to her berth until 8 a.m. on the following morning, Wednesday, 13th May, when she commenced discharging her cargo, and continued to discharge until 8 p.m., when the labourers left off work. She began to discharge again at 4 a.m. on Thursday, 14th May, and had discharged the whole of her cargo by 8 a.m. She was consequently engaged one day and part of another in discharging. The plaintiffs claimed demurrage for all days beyond the minimum of seven days named in the charter-party; their claim included the Sunday, 3rd May, on the ground that they were entitled to treat every "running day" as a "lying day" within the charter-party, and also included two days at the Victoria Docks, on the ground that, as the discharging had gone into a second day, they must be paid as for a whole day. The defendants disputed the claim on the grounds that Monday, 27th April, was not a full working day, and that "lying days" in the charter-party meant "working days'" and Sunday is not a working day; and that the plaintiffs ought to set off the four hours' work on 14th May against the time lost on the 12th May, or at any rate were only entitled to be paid in proportion to the time actually occupied in discharging on 14th May.

By the charter-party of the Boston it was stipulated that "eight running days are to be allowed to the said merchants, if the ship is not sooner discharged, for loading and discharging the said ship, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at 25*l.* per day."

The Boston arrived at Muhlgraban on Sunday, 19th April, but was not cleared until about noon on Monday, 20th April, and was not ready to load till about 4 p.m. The cargo, which was timber, was floated down from Riga in rafts, and some of it came alongside on Monday, 20th April, and was taken on board, part on that day after 4 p.m. and the rest the next morning before any more came down. The loading was finished on Tuesday, 28th April, and the ship at once commenced the homeward voyage, and arrived in dock on 7th May; she immediately commenced discharging her cargo and finished at 7 a.m. on 12th May. The Boston was thus at Riga for the purpose of loading seven whole days, including one Sunday, and part of two other days, and was at Southampton for the purpose of discharging four whole days and part of two other days. The plaintiff claimed demurrage for seven days over and above the eight running days.

The defendants paid into court enough to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim for demurrage for all the days for which they claimed in respect of the Boston except 28th April; they refused to pay demurrage for that day and their liability depended whether Monday, 20th April, was to be included in the loading days or not.

It was left to the jury to say whether Monday, 20th April was a working day, and they found that it was.

A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 25*l.* in respect of the Boston, being the demurrage payable for 28th April, and for 50*l.* in respect of the Brighton, being the demurrage payable in respect of the two days consumed in discharging in London, the lying days having been consumed at Riga; leave was reserved to move to enter the verdict for the defendants, or reduce the damages if the court should be of opinion that it ought to be done, having regard to the findings of the jury, the court to draw inferences of fact. A rule was obtained accordingly.

Herschell, Q.C. and Crompton showed cause.—

The lying days mentioned in the charter-party relating to the Brighton must be taken as running days; (Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331.) [LUSH, J.—The whole clause must be read together and the words "loading and discharging as fast as the steamer can work, but a minimum of seven days to be allowed to the merchants," clearly point to working days being intended to be the meaning.] Then demurrage begins to run from the time the ship gets into dock, not to a berth, and as the lay days had then expired, the demurrage days commence from the day on which she got into dock and include all the days she was occupied in discharging. Each part of a day so occupied must be considered as a whole day.

Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 331;
Tapscott v. Balfour, 27 L. T. Rep. N.S. 710; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 46: 42 L. J., 16 C. P.

Aspinall, Q C. and Gainsford Bruce supported the rule.

MELLOR, J.—I am of opinion that the rule fails on both grounds.

As to the Brighton, the stipulation is, "the loading and discharging the said ship to be as fast as the steamer can work, but a minimum of seven days to be allowed the charterers, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at 25*l.* per day. The contention on behalf of the defendants must amount to this, that, though a minimum of seven days is specified, yet if they go beyond the seven days, and take a portion of an eighth, they are not to pay for that as for an eighth day. This interpretation of the charter-party would be so inconvenient that I am of opinion that we must consider that they must load in time or else pay for a day, if any part of a day is occupied beyond the time specified. There is no authority on the question, but any other construction would be attended with the greatest inconvenience.

As to the Boston, it is not a question of construction, but whether on the circumstances of the case the jury were warranted in finding that 20th April was a working day. The circumstances are these: The vessel is ready to receive cargo; a portion of the cargo arrives, and in the presence of persons interested in the matter the loading is commenced; the loading of that portion is finished before any other timber arrives. The question then is, was there any reasonable ground for the jury finding that the day on which the first part of the timber arrived was by the assent of the parties treated as a loading day? I will not say that if they had found otherwise I should have thought their finding ought to be disturbed, but I think there was evidence to entitle them to find as they have found.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion.

The question with regard to the Brighton turns on the construction of this clause—"the loading and discharging the said ship to be as fast as the steamer can work, but a minimum of seven days to be allowed the charterers," and is, first, whether the seven days allowed as the minimum are exclusive or inclusive of Sundays, or are running or working days? I think, considering the words of the clause, they are working days, and Sunday is excluded and no demurrage was incurred at the port of loading; all the lay days were however, expended there.

Then as to the unloading. The ship got into dock on Tuesday, 12th May, and got to her berth and began discharging on Wednesday morning at 8; the work went on till 8 p.m., and began again on Thursday at 4 a.m., and was finished at 8 a.m., and demurrage is claimed for Thursday. I am of opinion that that day must be counted in favour of the shipowners. The words are "ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at 25*l.* per day." There is no word used to show that there is to be any division of a day, or any apportionment of the 25*l.* Such a construction would be exceedingly inconvenient, and I cannot think that it was in the contemplation of the parties. It may be that in consequence of detention for part of a day the ship may lose a tide, or may not get to the next loading place in time. I, therefore, think it is consistent with the language used, and with convenience to hold that for every day or fraction of a day that the ship is detained over the specified time demurrage must be paid.

With regard to the Boston the case does not turn on the construction of the charter-party, but whether the first day of loading was to be included in the loading days under the circumstances. We find here that the charterers sent down a portion of the cargo an hour after receiving notice, to a place where it would be dangerous to allow it to remain. They must have meant that it was to be put on board as soon as possible, and accordingly the jury have found that Monday, 20th April, was a working day. If the charterers had the benefit of the timber being put on board or agreed that it should be, they would be liable. I cannot suppose that they intended it to remain in the river.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

The question as to the Brighton seems perfectly clear. She got into dock on the 12th, and was ready to discharge when she could get to her berth. She discharged from eight a.m. on Wednesday, the 13th, till eight p.m., and there is no evidence to show that that is not a fair good working day. If the charterers get into the second day, they are liable to pay demurrage. I think on this charter-party that they cannot divide a day. The contention is that they are not liable at all for the day, or at any rate only for a proportionate part, but there is no authority for that view. The defendants want to set-off the four hours occupied in discharging on the Thursday, against four hours said to have been lost on the Wednesday; but there is no evidence to show that they are entitled to this. The shipowners were not in fault if there was a loss of four hours.

As to the Boston, a more difficult question arises, whether a working day can be counted where only part of a day has been used. I agree that the charterers are entitled to a fair working day, but if for the convenience of all parties a portion of a day is used, it may be counted. It was a question for the jury, and if there was any evidence the jury were entitled to find as they did. The evidence is that notice was given at eleven a.m., and a portion of the timber was then sent down, and was loaded on the same day, the charterers or their agents being present and consenting. I think on this evidence the jury were justified in finding that this was to be counted as a working day.

Rule discharged.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF NEW ZEALAND.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 7 and 8, 1875.

(Present: The Right Hon. Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE, Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH, and Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.)

THE STRATHNAVER.

Salvage—Towage—Danger—No tender—Award—Detention—Demurrage—Damages.

Towage services (as distinguished from salvage services) are work done by one vessel in towing another to expedite her voyage, where nothing more is required than the accelerating her progress.

Where a vessel is in neither actual nor imminent probable danger, a vessel engaged to tow her renders towage and not salvage services.

In a salvage suit, in which there has been no tender made by the defendants, a Court of Admiralty cannot, on finding that no salvage service has been performed by the plaintiffs, and their service was mere towage, make a decree for the amount of towage due to the plaintiffs.

Defendants in a salvage suit have no right to recover damages for demurrage against plaintiffs, who, having bonâ fide and through mere error of judgment arrested the defendants' vessel, and carried on the suit to recover reward for their alleged salvage services, are held to have performed no salvage, but mere towage, services.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of Alexander James Johnson, Esq., the deputy judge of Her Majesty's Vice-Admiralty Court of New Zealand, in a cause of salvage lately pending in that court, instituted and promoted by the appellants as the owner, master and crew of the steam ship Storm Bird, against the ship or vessel Strathnaver, her cargo and freight, for the recovery of salvage in respect of certain services rendered to the Strathnaver, her cargo and freight.

In their libel the plaintiffs (the appellants) among other things averred:

1. That at a quarter past eight p.m on Monday, the 31st Aug. 1874, the steamship Storm Bird, of sixty-eight tons register, and manned by a crew of twelve hands, while proceeding out of the harbour of Port Nicholson, New Zealand, in the execution of a voyage from Wellington to Wanganui, with cargo and seventy passengers, observed the Strathnaver, a wooden ship of 1071 tons, with cargo and 391 emigrants in a position of danger, close to and running towards a reef of rocks, known as the West Ledge, at the entrance of Port Nicholson harbour.

2. That blue lights were burnt by those on board the Storm Bird to indicate to the Strathnaver the proper channel for her to enter the harbour, and that the Storm Bird, putting on all steam, passed round under the stern of the Strathnaver and hailed those on board to port their helm, as they were running on to a reef.

3. That the Strathnaver's course, a continuance of which, for a few minutes longer, would have caused her destruction, was altered in accordance with the directions of those on board the Storm Bird, but, the wind then dropping, and the Strathnaver drifting with the set of the sea on to Barrett's Reef, was taken in tow by the Storm Bird and towed safely to the Port of Wellington.

4. That by the services of the plaintiffs the Strathnaver was rescued from total loss, and her cargo and the lives of those on board were saved.

Separate responsive allegations were filed by the owners of the Strathnaver and her cargo similar in substance, and averring among other things:—

1. That the Strathnaver when seen from the Storm Bird was three-quarters of a mile to the southward of the outer rock of Nicholsons' harbour, and steering by the harbour light on Somes Island.

2. That the Strathnaver was never in danger, or in any unsafe or improper proximity to the West Ledge, and before she had been hailed by those on board the Storm Bird a pilot had taken her in charge, by whose directions her helm had been ported, additional canvas set, and her course shaped towards the eastern side of the harbour.

3. That there was no sea which would have set the Strathnaver in the direction stated in the libel against an ebb tide.

4. That the service rendered by the Storm Bird was ordinary towage service, and was not necessary by reason of any danger to the Strathnaver.

No tender was made by the respondents.

Three witnesses were examined by the appellants before the Judge in Chambers, and other evidence on both sides was taken orally in open court before the learned Judge.

The learned Judge of the court below, by an interlocutory decree on Dec. 3, 1874, dismissed the suit and condemned the plaintiffs in costs.

The learned Judge in his judgment, went minutely into the facts, and ultimately came to the conclusion that, although the plaintiffs had acted bonâ fide in making their claim, there had been no salvage, but a mere towage service. The judgment concluded as follows: "In concluding my observations on the evidence, I desire to express my sincere hope that the result of this case, in which the claim of salvage has been based on what may originally have been a mere mistake (though, unfortunately, a mistake entailing most serious consequences) will not discourage the owners and masters of steam vessels engaged in the ordinary trade of the colony from being ever ready to lend assistance to vessels really or apparently in danger, but will only induce them to restrain their claims for remuneration beyond the value of towage service to cases where they can establish the existence of actual danger to the vessels assisted, and in which, therefore, they have a right to expect a liberal salvage remuneration. In the absence of any precedent showing that the court may make a decree for ordinary towage in what is substantially a suit for salvage, and in which no tender has been made, and considering that, as far as authorities have been brought before me, the cases in which decrees have been made for sums in addition to sums tendered on the footing of ordinary towage, have proceeded on the ground that the services were of salvage character, and not mere towage services, I do not see my way to make a decree for the amount of towage earned by the steamer, and therefore, feel it my duty to dismiss the suit; and, as there is no foundation laid for making the case an exception to the general rule, the costs must follow the judgment."

Upon this decree being given, the respondents claimed demurrage for the detention of the Strathnaver whilst under arrest in the suit, from 12th Sept. to Dec. 3rd, 1874; and on 11th Dec., moved the court below to make a decree for demurrage as claimed. In support of their claim witnesses were called to show the amount of demurrage payable in respect of ships of that class, and the master of the Strathnaver said that he had never attempted to get bail because he had not been accredited to any one for that purpose. For the appellants, evidence was given that the master might, if he had made application, have obtained bail at comparatively small cost. The appellants contended that they were not liable under these circumstances for any demurrage, but the court below nevertheless made a decree dismissing the suit with taxed costs, and pronouncing a sum of 600*l.* to be due to the defendants as demurrage or damages in respect of the detention of the Strathnaver under arrest.

From this decree the appellants (plaintiffs below) appealed for the following amongst other reasons:

First, because the evidence proved that the Strathnaver and her cargo were in a position of considerable danger, from which they were rescued by the services of the appellants; secondly, because the Storm Bird went out of her course to render assistance to a vessel in a position of danger, and her services being accepted must be regarded in the nature of salvage services; seventhly, because under the admitted facts of the case, the services of the Storm Bird were in the nature of salvage services, and entitled to be remunerated as such; eighthly, because the court below had no jurisdiction to decree demurrage to be due from the appellants; ninthly, because the learned judge of the court below was wrong in awarding demurrage to be due for the detention of the ship under warrant of court; tenthly, because it appears upon the evidence that bail could have been obtained for the Strathnaver and her release effected.

Dec. 7 and 8, 1875.—The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and R. E. Webster for the appellants.—First, we submit, that upon the facts, there was a salvage service; secondly, even if the court should be of opinion that the service amounted only to towage, the appellants are entitled to a decree. There is no reported case where a salvage suit has been instituted and no tender made, and an award of towage only has been made; but there are several cases where a tender having been made in a salvage suit and the proved facts having shown the service to be mere towage there has still been a decree for the plaintiffs. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE referred to The Harbinger (16 Jur. 279.] There have been unreported cases in which the Court of Admiralty has found that plaintiffs, although not entitled to salvage reward, were entitled to payment for towage, and that the cases were so little distinct that an award has been given for towage in a salvage suit. Thirdly, there was no foundation for the respondent's claim for demurrage. It is expressly found in the judgment below that the suit was commenced in the bonâ fide belief that salvage services had been rendered, and this in itself negatives anything like mala fides or crassa negligentia, which are necessaries before damages can be recovered:

The Evangelismos, Swab. 378; 12 Moore P.C.C. 352;
Mitchell v. Jenkins, 5 B. & A. 594;
Davies v. Jenkins, 11 M. & W. 755.

Cohen, Q.C. and Clarkson (Butt, Q.C. with them) for the respondents.—There was no salvage service, there being no actual damage to the Strathnaver. In a salvage suit such as this there can be no award for mere towage, because it is a suit against ship and cargo, and the owner of cargo is not liable for towage, and because towage is recoverable only by the owners of the towing vessel, not by her master and crew; the suit is instituted expressly for salvage services by owner, master, and crew. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There have, no doubt, been cases where salvage suits have been instituted and a mere towage reward has been tendered; but, although it has been the practice to pronounce for the plaintiffs for the amount of towage rendered in such cases, it has never been the practice to decree salvage in a towing suit where no tender has been made, and the court would have no power to make such a decree. Hence their Lordships will not trouble you on that point.] Then the defendants are entitled to demurrage. The Evangelismos (Swab. 378) proceeded upon the ground that the plaintiffs there bonâ fide believed that the defendant's vessel was the wrongdoer; but here the plaintiffs could have had no bonâ fide belief that they had a claim for salvage; hence the decree for demurrage is right.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a decree of the deputy-judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of New Zealand, in a case of salvage promoted by the appellants, the owner, master, and crew of the steamship Storm Bird, against the ship Strathnaver, her cargo and freight, for recovery of salvage in respect of certain services rendered to the ship, her cargo and freight.

It is hardly necessary that their Lordships should repeat what they have often had occasion to say with regard to cases of this description, namely, that where facts have been established by oral testimony before the court below, and the court has maturely deliberated, and formed its opinion as to the credence due to the witnesses on the one side and the other, this court rarely interferes with such a finding on the part of the judge, and never unless there has been a manifest miscarriage of justice.

It appears that at about a quarter past eight p.m. on Monday, the 31st Aug. last year, the steamship Storm Bird, of sixty-eight tons register, manned by a crew of twelve hands, was coming out of the harbour of Port Nicholson, New Zealand, on a voyage from Wellington to a place called Wanganni, with a cargo and seventy passengers. The Strathnaver was a wooden ship of 1017 tons, a sailing vessel, with a cargo and 391 emigrants. She was entering the harbour at the time the other vessel was going out. The captain of the Storm Bird says: "When abreast of the Steeple Rock"—the exact position has been much considered in the course of this debate, and is some way up the entrance of the harbour—"my attention was drawn by the chief officer to signals, blue lights, and rockets, bearing from us S.S.W., coming as from the direction of Chaffer's passage, and to the S. and W. of Barrett's Reef. I took my glasses and went on the bridge and saw the loom of a large vessel; I likewise saw a green light. Nearing the heads opposite Barrett's Reef, I made it out to be a ship. I was then about 100 yards N. of the Outer Rock. We were on a straight course. The green light of the ship was almost south, about two and a half points before our starboard beam to the S.W. of the Outer Rock. I considered the vessel was running into danger by going into Chaffer's Passage. I burned a blue light; my object was to indicate the position of the safe channel. At the same time I steamed with all haste towards the ship, about eight miles an hour. It was just as we were abreast the Outer Rock, about 150 feet off, that I put on steam and altered course to S. and W. I could not see the green light except when she rolled. I steamed towards her bows." Then he says: "She was inside a line drawn from Pencarron Head to end of the West Ledge Reef, heading towards the old pilot station about two cables' length from the part of the West Ledge nearest to the Outer Rock of Barrett's Reef." He goes on to say, what is admitted, that the wind was very light from the south-east. He then says, when he came up to the bows of the vessel, he thought it unsafe to go round her bows; that he steamed under her stern, and came up again a second time, and then, when he got astern of the ship, he stopped his engine and called out, "port your helm;" that he was barely fifty yards from her stern, and he repeated the words three or four times, "port your helm; steer for the light; you are running on a reef." There is no doubt that when the Storm Bird came up the pilot was on board. Now it will be proper to refer to the evidence of the pilot of the Strathnaver, and to show what his account of the position of the vessel at this time is. The pilot first gives an account of where he was. He says:—"When I first got alongside, she was from half to three-quarters of a mile from the Outer Rock of Barrett's Reef, nearly due south. The red light of Somes Island was open all the time." A little lower down he says:—"I said from the boat, 'port your helm,' after that I had been a minute or two alongside. I did not see any reason at that time for being extremely expeditious. The proper course was to get the vessel into the white light. The steamer gained on us, but not much. We pulled our boat four and a half to five knots. We arrived at the ship before the steamer." That is an undoubted fact in the case. "After I got on deck, I braced the yards up, and set the upper mizen topsail, and loosed the main top-gallant sail. It was sheeted home, but I am not positive whether it was hoisted up. When the steamer came the first time she came from the direction of the lighthouse at right angles to us, and as she passed I heard Captain Doile singing out 'port.' I recognised his voice. I said 'all right.'"

Now their Lordships are of opinion, upon an examination of the evidence with regard to the situation of the Strathnaver, that at this time it is clear that she was not heading up channel as she ought to have been, but, owing to the ignorance of the captain as to the chart, she was crossing the mouths of both the channels, so to speak, and she was to the south of the Outer Rock about three-quarters of a mile to the southward. There is no dispute as to the fact that the pilot gave these orders, or that he was on board the vessel before the steamer came up. It appears to their Lordships that the evidence upon which the learned judge of the court below relied was perfectly credible, that these orders were those which enabled the ship to be rescued from a situation of danger,—or perhaps, to speak more accurately, of running into great danger,—because had she continued her course with the wind as it then was blowing lightly from the south-east, there is no doubt that she would have run upon the West Ledge; and the first question which is really to be determined in this case, when we are considering whether salvage remuneration is due, or whether the service was simply one of towage, is, whose advice or whose order it was that prevented this large ship from running upon the West Ledge Rock? There is no reason to doubt that the captain of the Storm Bird did what he says he did, namely, that he shouted out "port," and that he burned a light by way of a signal. At the same time there is equally no doubt that the pilot, when he came up—the exact time is difficult to ascertain, the learned judge thinks it was a short time, but it was an appreciable time before the arrival of the Storm Bird—he gave the order from his boat, being anxious no doubt that no time should be lost in order to port the helm, and to brace the yards on the starboard tack. It was the execution of that order which in the opinion of the court below,—and their Lordships on the whole see no reason to differ from it, and it is also the opinion of the nautical assessors by whom their Lordships are assisted to-day—it was the execution of that order which rescued the ship from running into the danger which she otherwise would have incurred. Their Lordships, therefore, cannot ascribe the character of a salvor to the steamer, on the ground that he also gave the advice which has been mentioned.

Now there is no doubt of this fact, that when the steamer did come up again, having crossed the stern of the other ship, and come up again on her port bows, she was engaged to take the vessel in tow, and the question then arises, which has been so much contested in the court below, and before their Lordships to-day, whether he may be considered, in a construction of law, to have been engaged as salvor, or to have been engaged merely to tow. Upon this point it may be well to refer to a very clear and precise statement of the law by Dr. Lushington, in the case of The Princess Alice (3 W. Rob. 138), in which he says, "without attempting any definition which may be universally applied, towage services may be described as the employment of one vessel to expedite the voyage of another when nothing more is required than the accelerating her progress." It is contended on behalf of the appellants that something more was required than the acceleration of her progress, and that she was still in danger after the pilot had given the order to port the helm, and to brace the yards on the starboard tack, and to put the head of the vessel exactly in the opposite direction from what it had been, and to direct the course of the vessel eastward instead of north-westward upon the rock.

Now this is a question upon which the learned Judge had a variety of conflicting testimony before him, and after most maturely and carefully deliberating upon it—and, it may be observed, in passing, it would be difficult to conceive a more accurate and careful note than the learned Judge seems to have been at the pains of taking—after mature deliberation on the subject, he came to the conclusion that the Storm Bird was not engaged as a salvor, but merely to tow the vessel. The facts stand in this way; they are thus described in the evidence of the pilot. He says: "After the steamer passed she stopped. I thought she was going on her course. I had no thought of taking a steamer then. I then had a conversation with the captain"—that is, his own captain—"on the propriety of getting a steamer to tow us, not on account of danger, but on account of expedition." It may be observed, in passing, that this large vessel had a number of emigrants on board, who were naturally extremely anxious to arrive at the port. "I think the master of the steamer might have been deceived as to the position of our ship, because he came out on the bright light and saw the vessel under the red." In the lighthouse at Somes Island there are three lights, a green light, a white light, and a red light. The white light is the one which should be followed; it is the safe light leading to the central passage up the main entrance, and which ought to be followed. He goes on to say: "It might have appeared to him she was more to the west than she was. I know the position exactly from pulling from the Outer Rock to the ship. The captain hesitated about taking the steamer. I told the captain she belonged to a respectable firm. He asked the name and I told him. He said they corresponded with his owners or consignees. Something to that effect. I then hailed the steamboat." Now it is important to observe what he says passed. "I said 'Storm Bird ahoy!' He said, 'What is it?' I said, 'Will you give us a tow?' He said, 'Yes.' I said, "What will you give us a tow for?' He said 'Leave that to the agent,' or to that effect. That did not satisfy the captain till I told him about Mr. Turnbull. I then said, 'All right, I will give you a tow line.' I said, 'If you will only tow me inside the Steeple Rock that will do.' I do not know whether he heard or not." Now the evidence establishes both these facts, first, that the pilot proposed to engage him merely to tow the vessel; and secondly, that the captain of the Storm Bird never accepted the proposal as a mere service of towage. Therefore the question must be determined with reference to the necessity of the ship at this time, because the captain not having accepted the offer to tow, if the vessel was in a state of danger at that time, and he had towed her, he would be entitled to be considered as salvor; but it has been already stated that the court below was satisfied that at this time there was no danger to the vessel.

Their Lordships think they ought not to disturb this decision, but, inasmuch as the learned Judge has used the words "actual danger" very often, although probably it received a restriction in his own mind which was not stated, it may be useful to state what is really the law with respect to services rendered to a vessel in danger, or apparent danger. The law is laid down in the case of The Charlotte (3 W. Rob. 71) by Dr. Lushington. He says, "It is not necessary, I conceive, that the distress should be actual or immediate, or that the danger should be imminent and absolute." Their Lordships are of opinion there was neither actual nor imminent probable danger at the time these services were rendered. The finding of the Judge to this effect, no doubt, depended upon his giving preference to the witnesses who were produced on behalf of the respondents over those who were produced on behalf of the appellants. If indeed the judge had been satisfied that what the appellants' witnesses asserted was true, namely, that the pilot said to them, "Will you tow her off this reef?" the case would have assumed a very different aspect, and it might have been fairly urged in that case that what the Storm Bird did was an act of salvage and not an act of towage. But in the circumstances which have been stated, the learned judge came to a different conclusion upon the facts before him, and their Lordships, on the whole, decline to set aside that decision. Therefore, upon that part of the case, their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment.

There is another portion of the judgment, by no means immaterial, to which I must now advert. It appears that the learned Judge of the court below was of opinion that he could entertain in this case a claim for demurrage. The property was valuable, and worth in all about 40,000*l*. The action I think had been entered for 12,000*l*. The learned judge upon the whole thought he was justified in decreeing to the respondents damage to the amount of 600*l*. in the shape of demurrage.

Now it is to be observed that the learned judge himself more than once in the course of his judgment expressed his opinion that those on board the Storm Bird, and especially the captain of the Storm Bird conducted themselves bonâ fide throughout, and he ascribes no misconduct to him of any sort or kind, but simply an error in judgment in bringing the suit. Their Lordships think that the learned judge was well founded in that opinion. In this state of things their Lordships are at a loss to understand why any damages at all should have been granted against the appellants.

The law upon this was very carefully considered in the decision in the case of The Evangelismos (12 Moore P. C. C. 352; Swab. 378), by the very eminent judge who delivered their Lordships' opinion, Mr. Pemberton Leigh. In that case (as appears from the head note of the report) "the collision took place at sea. The vessel causing the damage got away. From the appearance of a vessel in port the owners of the damaged vessel caused her to be arrested to answer an action for damages. The vessel seized was a foreign vessel, and in consequence of the owner having no funds in this country, she was detained for some months before she was released on bail. The plaintiffs failed to identify the vessel seized as being the one causing the damage, and the Admiralty Court dismissed the action with costs, refusing to award damages." Then there was an appeal to their Lordships, and Mr. Pemberton Leigh in delivering the judgment of their Lordships said—"It is also said that it is the established rule of the Admiralty Court where a party brings an action and succeeds in upholding it, that he is entitled, unless there are circumstances to take it out of the ordinary rule, to have compensation for the loss he has suffered, which in some cases is very inadequate, but it is the only compensation the court can award. Their Lordships think there is no reason for distinguishing this case or giving damages. Undoubtedly there may be the cases in which there is either mala fides or that crassa negligentia which implies malice, which would justify a court of admiralty giving damages, as in an action brought at common law damages may be obtained. In the Court of Admiralty the proceedings are however more convenient, because in the action in which the main question is disposed of, damages may be awarded," Their Lordships came to the conclusion, though the case was certainly a very strong one, inasmuch as the wrong vessel had been seized, that in the absence of proof of mala fides or malicious negligence, they ought not to give damages against the parties arresting the ship.

It appears to their Lordships that the general principles at law are correctly laid down in that judgment, and it is their intention to adhere to them. They will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that that part of the learned judge's sentence be reversed.

Their Lordships think that inasmuch as the appellants have succeeded in part of their case, and as they have appealed from the whole judgment, they will follow the rule which they have usually adopted on these occasions, and leave both parties to pay their own costs of the appeal. But their Lordships think the appellants are entitled to have their costs in the court below, strictly confined to the costs incident to the decree as to demurrage, and that they must pay the costs of the salvage suit in the court below.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, Jan. 19, 1876.

(Before Lord Coleridge, C.J., Mellish, L.J., Baggallay, J.A., and Cleasby, B.)

Eastman v. Harry.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Stevedore—Liability of shipowner to charter-party—Agent—Disclosed principal—Election.

The owner of a ship had chartered her to A. for the purpose of being loaded: the charter-party provided that the stevedore was to be nominated by the charterer, and be under the control of the captain, and was to be paid by the owner. A. sub-chartered the ship to B., entering into a charter-party with a similar clause. B. employed the plaintiff, who was a stevedore, to load the ship, and introduced him to the defendant as the person who was to load the ship. The defendant frequently came on board while the ship was being loaded, and superintended and gave certain instructions relative to the stowage of the cargo. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for non-payment of his charges.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench), that there was evidence of a contract between the plaintiff and defendant.

On completion of the loading the plaintiff sent in his account to B., headed "To captain and owners," and pressed B. for payment. B. had sent in his account to A., and A. had sent in his account to the defendant, with the item "Stevedore's account" charged. The defendant had paid A.'s account, and A. had paid B.'s account. B. became bankrupt, and did not pay the plaintiff.

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench) that the defendant was liable to pay the plaintiff's account.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, a stevedore. to recover from the defendant, a shipowner, a sum of 57*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, for the "stowage" of a ship called the Caroline, belonging to the defendant.

The facts, which were taken as they appeared from the Judge's notes at the trial, were as follows:

The defendant, who was owner of the ship Caroline, chartered the ship to one Adams, for the purpose of providing a cargo, and entered with him into a charter-party, which contained the following clause:

> The stevedore to be nominated by the charterers, but to be under the control of the captain and paid by the owners (charterers not being responsible for bad stowage); dunnage and ballast, if required, to be provided by the owners; 5*l.* 5*s.* gratuity to master.

Adams sub-chartered the ship to one Beckley. The charter-party entered into by Adams and Beckley contained a clause relating to the nomination and payment of the stevedore, similar to the former charter-party. Beckley, who was a ship and insurance broker, and who was in the habit of chartering ships, for which he usually employed the plaintiff as stevedore, thereupon engaged the plaintiff as stevedore to load the Caroline. Beckley had no communication with the defendant or Adams as to employing a stevedore, but employed his own stevedore in the usual way, by handing him a card with the barque Caroline on it, and afterwards introduced the plaintiff to defendant as the man to stow his ship. The plaintiff thereupon proceeded with the loading, and while so employed used to see the defendant three or four times a day, on occasions when the defendant used to come on board. This the defendant did every day, and on those occasions he superintended the loading of the ship, and gave directions regarding the stowing of the cargo The vessel was loaded, and the plaintiff sent in his account to Beckley, headed, "To captain and owners," and made several applications to him for payment. In the meantime Beckley sent in his account to Adams, and Adams forwarded his account to the defendant, stowage being charged 53*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* The defendant, who did not know of the sub-charter to Beckley, paid Adams's account, and Adams paid Beckley's account shortly afterwards, and before paying the plaintiff Beckley became insolvent, whereupon the plaintiff sought to recover his charges from the defendant.

The action came on to be tried before Quain, J., at Westminster, on 17th April 1875; at the conclusion of the evidence the learned judge directed a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there was no liability on the part of the defendant to discharge the plaintiff's claim, and leave was reserved for the plaintiff to enter the verdict for him in case the court was of opinion that there was such liability. The plaintiff moved accordingly, and obtained a rule, which came on to be argued before Blackburn, Quain, and Field, JJ., when the ruling of Quain, J. was upheld, and the rule was discharged.

Gates, Q.C. (Ingham with him), for the plaintiff, the appellant.—The stevedore is by the charter-party to be nominated by the charterer, but he is to be under the control of the captain, and to be paid by the owners; the charterer is only the agent of the owner: (Sandemann v. Scurr, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608; L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 86.) The point as to privity, which is the only point at issue between the parties, has been decided by the court below in favour of the plaintiff, but the court gave judgment against him on the ground that he had elected to give credit to Beckley, and had never applied to the defendant until Beckley failed.

The counsel for the plaintiff were here stopped by the court, and R. E. Webster and Johnstone for the defendant were called on. — The plaintiff was employed by Beckley, and there is no evidence that the defendant ever employed Beckley. The plaintiff gave credit to Beckley, and never sought to charge the defendant until after Beckley had failed. There is no privity between the plaintiff and defendant, nor is there any implied liability on the part of the owner to pay the stevedore. True, the charter-party says that the stevedore is to be paid by the owners, but he has no knowledge of the charter-party, and he cannot rely upon a clause of which he has no knowledge: (See Blakie v. Stembridge, 6 C. B., N. S., 894; 28 L. J. 329, C. P.). Then again, Beckley, though sometimes acting as broker, in this case acted as charterer, and the disputed liability on the part of the owner is rebutted. Assuming that the defendant appointed Beckley, who in turn appointed the plaintiff, then the defendant would be, as regards the plaintiff, in the position of an undisclosed principal. The plaintiff having elected to give credit to the agent after the principal was disclosed, must be bound by his election: (Thompson v. Davenport, 3 Sm. Lead Cases, 327).

Lord Coleridge, C. J.—The action in this case is brought by the plaintiff, a stevedore, who has been employed to load a ship, which ship was the ship of the defendant, and had been chartered by one Adams. In the charter-party which was entered into between the defendant and Adams was a clause by which the stevedore was to be nominated by the charterer, but was to be under the control of the captain and was to be paid by the owners, and the charterers were not to be responsible for bad stowage. Then a subsequent charter was entered into between Adams, the original charterer, and a person named Beckley, and in that charter-party the same clause relative to the nomination and employment of the stevedore occurs. This being the state of affairs, Harry, the defendant, having chartered the ship to Adams, and Adams having sub-chartered the ship to Beckley, Beckley then employed the plaintiff to load the ship; and while the plaintiff was loading the ship, Harry, the defendant, comes on board, and is on board several times a day, superintending the loading, and giving instructions respecting the stowage of the cargo. The cargo is loaded, and a bill for 57*l*., the amount of the stevedore's charges, is sent early in November, headed "To captains and owners," to Thomas Eastman, &c. That bill is given to Beckley, who was the sub-charterer, and the person who had been originally instrumental in putting the plaintiff on the ship. That being the case and the money not being paid, application is made by the plaintiff, and made several times, to Beckley to pay the amount. Beckley put him off repeatedly, and on the 7th Nov., not many days after, the plaintiff came to Beckley and applied for the money; a conversation ensued, in which Beckley said he had settled with the owner, that he had no money, and could not pay. Beckley next became a bankrupt, but before he was so, the account headed, "To captain and owners," had been sent in to the defendant; defendant does not pay, and the question is, is he liable?

Two questions arise. The first is, was there a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant? Upon that point the Court of Queen's Bench have decided that there was, though Quain, J., appears to have hesitated. We are of opinion that that decision was correct, upon principles which have several times been explained in the course of the argument. If Beckley stood in such relation to the defendant that Beckley was agent for the employment of the plaintiff, then the work was done by the plaintiff for the defendant, and the defendant must pay. Is there evidence of that? The Court of Queen's Bench have held that there was. It has been contended there was not, but I should think it difficult to contend that upon that point the conclusion of the Queen's Bench should be impeached. This was the plaintiff's evidence on that point: "I saw the defendant three or four times a day on board the Caroline; he was there seeing to the loading of the ship and superintending the loading, and he gave me instructions to put particular cargo here or there in the ship as we went on." There is no evidence in contradiction of this; and there is further the evidence of Beckley, who says, "I introduced plaintiff to Harry as the man to stow his ship." The evidence of the plaintiff that he looked to the owner is confirmed by two documents, namely, two accounts which he made out headed, "To captain and owner;" and this again is strengthened by the course of dealing which plaintiff always pursued, which was that the loading was paid for by the owners, and the stevedore is the person employed by the owners; therefore I should have thought, if the matter had stood upon the evidence in the case, that there was abundant evidence to warrant the Queen's Bench in coming to the conclusion they have come to on this point—a conclusion in which we concur.

But then arises the question on the two important documents in the case, namely, the two charter-parties, and the operation of the clause in those charter-parties relating to the employment of the stevedore. Now the importance of the passages in those two charter-parties is not so much in favour of the plaintiff as it is against the defendant, inasmuch as the plaintiff knew nothing about this proviso. The question whether Beckley was the agent of the defendant here becomes most important, because provision is that the stevedore is to be nominated by the charterer. It is so in the first charter from the defendant to Adams, as also in the second charter-party from Adams to Beckley; the stevedore is to be nominated by the charterer, and therefore he is to be nominated by the agent of the defendant; he is to be under the control of the captain, who is the owner's representative, and he is to be paid by the owner. The effect of this shortly is that the charterer was to have the nomination of the stevedore; he was but the agent of the shipowner to nominate the stevedore, who was to be the servant of the owner, for he was to be under the control of the captain, and the owner was to pay. Therefore, whether this matter is considered by oral evidence or by the two charter-parties, still by both the liability to pay the stevedore is thrown on the owner of the ship. The owner in the second charter-party is the same as the owner in the first charter-party, and what to my mind is more important is that Beckley was the agent of the owner to appoint the stevedore; and, therefore, I am of opinion that, both from the two charter-parties and the evidence in the case, there is a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant.

On the second question, if I understand rightly from the judge's notes, the action was decided in favour of the defendant, because, this is a case of principal and agent, and within the case of Thonpson v. Davenport (ubi sup.); that, I understand, to have been the ground on which the Court of Queen's Bench decided in favour of the defendant. But, with unfeigned respect for their decision I am unable to see any facts here which bring the case within that principle.

As I understand the facts, the disclosure of the principal was at a very early period; the relation of the defendant as owner of the ship was disclosed to the plaintiff while the loading was going on; and directly the loading was over, the intention of the plaintiff to sue him was manifested by sending in an account to him through Beckley, the agent. If that was at once done, and the principal then disclosed was charged, I am at a loss to see how the principle of Thompson v. Davenport can apply. The plaintiff made his charge against the defendant as early as he could through the broker; applications were made through the agent—not directly to the owner, but to the well-known agent—with the object of first getting the money from the agent if he could; and failing that, then the plantiff does what his intention all along was to do, that is, holds defendant liable and sends in his account; and also does, what all along he had indirectly done, namely, sent his account to the defendant through the agent. The facts then do not raise the principle laid down in Thompson v. Davenport, and that case has no application. The plaintiff did all he could be expected to do; he knew that defendant was the principal, and he charged him as principal. Assume that the defendant has paid Adams, it is his own fault; if when he receives Adams' account he pays this item inter alia, it is his own fault; therefore, whether on the facts or on the principle, or on the substantial justice of the case, though agreeing on the first point with the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, I cannot come to the same conclusion as they have done on the second point, and the judgment must therefore be reversed.

Mellish, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

In substance three questions arise: First, was Beckley the agent of the defendant to engage the stevedore? secondly, did the stevedore give credit to the defendant? and thirdly, if he did give credit to the defendant, is he discharged?

The first question turns upon the charter-party. No doubt the stevedore was ordinarily appointed by the shipowner; still there may be a contract between the shipowner and the charterer, by which the stevedore is to be appointed by the charterer. Now has the present charter-party that effect? "The stevedore is to be nominated by the charterers, but is to be under the control of the captain and paid by the owners." In the first place, he is to be "nominated" by the charterer, the charterer does not bind himself to employ. He might have fulfilled the clause by sending a letter to the defendant nominating the plaintiff. Then the plaintiff is to be under the control of the captain; how can he be under the control of the captain unless he is appointed by the owner. The real contract is, that the stevedore is engaged by the owner, and only nominated by the charterer. What the construction of the second charter would amount to might be doubtful if "the owner" meant Adams; but Adams is only the charterer, and clearly the owner is the shipowner. By the second charter Adams substituted Beckley for himself, who was to nominate the stevedore, and therefore I come to the conclusion that Beckley was agent to employ the stevedore.

Then on the second question, did the plaintiff give credit to the defendant (because he might have given credit to Beckley), and then Beckley would be liable; but he did nothing of the kind, he says, the ordinary practice is to trust the shipowner, and in order to do that I head all my bills "To captain and owners." In the course of the employment he finds out who the owner was. Having found who he was, he sends his bill to Beckley, heading it "To captain and owners:" that was an election to sue the owners. It amounts to this: I will endeavour to get payment of the account from Beckley, but if I cannot I will apply to the owner, and he thereby elects to sue the defendant.

Then comes the third question: Is the defendant discharged by any conduct on the plaintiff's part? The account is sent in November, and payment is requested, and on the 7th Nov. the account between Adams and Harry is settled. The defendant had done nothing which could discharge the plaintiff; how can the defendant discharge himself because he has paid Adams without seeing that Adams has paid the stevedore? Adams sends in an account to the defendant, without seeing if the stevedore is paid or not, and the defendant settles it. The plaintiff then goes on pressing Beckley; he gives no credit to Beckley, but he is willing to get payment if he can. The effect of the evidence is, not that the defendant allows Beckley to settle—and I do not think the Court of Queen's Bench thought that—But that on general grounds he was entitled to settle.

Baggallay, J.A.—Primâ facie the owner is liable to the stevedore, but this primâ facie liability can be modified by surrounding circumstances. In this case there were two charter-parties. Beckley acted as the broker, and "did the ship's business." The stevedore was employed by Beckley, and was introduced by Beckley to the owner as owner. The owner was often on board, superintending; he was there not only as actual owner, but as ostensible owner. There is nothing in the charter-parties themselves inconsistent with the defendant being the owner; on the contrary, the charter-parties are quite consistent with that fact. It has been suggested that, as the charterer was to provide the stevedore, therefore the charterer was to pay; that is to say, that the stevedore was to be nominated by the charterer and paid by the captain. But there is nothing in this to take away the primâ facie liability of the owner. Then it is said that the plaintiff is charged by the payment by the defendant to Adams; but if A. owes money to B. and pays C., relying on the fact that C. has paid B., he must take the consequences. I think that the short statement on the judge's notes shows the nature of the transaction. No settlement has ever taken place which amounts to a payment of the plaintiff's claim, and there cannot be said to be any payment.

Cleasby, B.—Two questions have been stated. The first is the relation between the plaintiff and the defendant, and on this the evidence shows that the stevedore always looks to the owner and sends in the account to him, and independently of the charter-parties this would be proof of the plaintiff's case. It appears to me that the language of the charter-parties is immaterial, for the plaintiff might take no notice of them, and it would be a strong thing to hold that the effect of that clause was to alter the position of the parties; and the only remaining question then is, has the plaintiff elected to give credit to Beckley? If he has, the debtor under such circumstances is discharged, but there was no election to give credit to Beckley, and there was nothing to discharge the owner.

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH.

Discovery—Compromise of suit between defendant and third party—Plaintiff's right to inspect terms of compromise.

In an action by owner of cargo against shipowner, the plaintiff alleged damage in consequence of a collision with another ship, caused by defendant's negligent navigation. A compromise of cross-suits in the Admiralty Court in respect of the collision had been entered into by the respective owners of the two ships.

Held (affirming the decision of the Queen's Bench) that the plaintiff had a right to inspect the terms of this compromise.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, affirming an order made by Quain, J., at judge's chambers, reported ante p. 85.

The plaintiffs were owners of certain bales of hemp, laden on board the ship Burlington, belonging to the defendants. The cargo had been damaged on the voyage, and the plaintiffs now sued in respect of such damage. The cause of damage was that the Burlington had come into collision with another vessel called the Hakon Adelsteen, and had sunk. After the collision cross suits between the owners of the two vessels were commenced in the Admiralty Court, which were finally settled by a compromise. The terms of compromise had been drawn up and settled by the parties, and the plaintiff now sought to obtain inspection of the document embodying this compromise. It appeared, however, that in the present case the former suit in the Admiralty Court was by the owner of the same ship for the damage to the goods as well as the ship. This was not mentioned in the court below before their decision, the decision did not proceed upon it, and the fact was now brought before the court upon an affidavit.

Butt, Q.C., Clarkson, and Witt, for the defendants.—The question is whether it is desirable to enforce production of this document. The original suit was brought for damage to ship and cargo. [Mellish, L.J.—The production of this document will not prevent you from objecting at nisi prius to its being evidence against you.] True, but it is undesirable to allow A. to produce to C. a compromise between A. and B. [Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I do not see how you are to get over the fact that the original suit was brought for damage to the ship as well as to the goods, which is the substance of this action.] Butt, Q.C.—I do not see how I am to argue against that fact.

Gambles and others v. The Ocean Marine Insurance Company of Bombay.

Shipping—Policy of Insurance—Insurance of ship and cargo to port, "and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival"—Construction of—Deviation.

G. and others effected with the O. company a policy of insurance for 600l. on a ship. By this policy the ship was insured from the port of "Pomaron to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival." The stamp was sufficient to cover a voyage and time policy.

Having arrived safely at Newcastle-on-Tyne the ship discharged her cargo, and being chartered to carry a cargo of coals to Gibraltar, she received a small quantity as stiffening, and was moved to another place within the port of Newcastle in order to complete her loading; whilst there and within the fifteen days after her arrival at Newcastle she was seriously damaged in a storm.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Division), that the defendants were liable, as the policy was a time as well as a voyage policy, and that the loss sustained was within the risks covered by the policy.

Appeal from Exchequer Division.

The action was upon a policy of insurance, effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants, for a sum of 600*l.*, upon a ship of the plaintiffs', from "Pomaron to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival,"

A case was stated, without pleadings, for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, and was argued in Nov. 1875.

The question for the opinion of the court below was, whether the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the policy for damage sustained by the ship within the fifteen days after arrival at Newcastle, but after discharge of her cargo, and whilst loading another cargo in another part of the port.

The court below (Kelly, C. B. and Amphlett, B.) gave judgment for the defendants (Cleasby, B. dissenting), and from this judgment the plaintiffs now appealed.

The case below, with the arguments and judgments, will be found fully reported ante, p. 92.

Herschell, Q.C. (with him Rolland), for the appellants, the plaintiffs below.—There is nothing in the case to cut down the plain meaning of the words the parties used. The very object of in-serting the words "and for fifteen days whilst there after arrival" was to cover what really happened. There is nothing to show that the ship carried cargo at all. She might have been in ballast. He cited

The cases on deviation referred to by the Lord Chief Baron below do not apply to the present case.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Crawford) for respondents, defendants below.—The policy contains words which show clearly that cargo was to be on board. Words referring to general average necessarily imply cargo. The usual policy covers the voyage, and twenty-four hours after, and this additional period of fifteen days, which has been added in this case, was intended to apply "whilst there," which means, whilst at the place where she was discharging her cargo. She must remain there until she has discharged her cargo, or she may move from place to place in that port, and discharge her cargo in parcels; but she must not undertake any new adventure, or do anything, as she did here, unconnected with the voyage for which she is insured: (Arnould on Insurance, 3rd edit. 472: The Company of African Merchants (Limited) v. The British and Foreign, &c., Company, ante, vol. 1 p. 558; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 233; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 154; 42 L. J. 6, Ex.) Suppose an ordinary Lloyd's policy, making it "lawful for the ship to stay at any port." It is settled that she must stay for a purpose connected with the voyage to be within the policy, add fifteen days, and the maxim that the accessory follows the principal applies.

Herschell, Q.C. replied.

The Lord Chancellor (Cairns).—In this case there is a policy of insurance upon a ship "from Pomaron to Newcastle, and for fifteen days whilst there, after arrival." The ship arrived at Newcastle, unloaded her cargo, and, having moved afterwards to another part of the harbour, took in stiffening for her fresh voyage, and was lost in the harbour. The question for our consideration is, are the underwriters liable? This ship was unquestionably lost whilst at the port of Newcastle within the fifteen days, and under circumstances within the words of the policy. But it is contended for the defendants, and the grounds of the decision of the learned judges below are, that this was a voyage policy, and therefore everything in the policy must be construed so that the risk may be considered to cover all that is done with reference to the voyage and nothing more, and that the fifteen days must be construed with reference to the voyage only; and if during those fifteen days the ship was doing anything with reference to the voyage, the underwriters are liable, otherwise not. Now that I think is assuming the whole case. Is this purely a voyage policy? Undoubtedly, so far as the voyage from Pomaron to Newcastle is concerned, it is a voyage policy; but unless the words immediately following, "and for fifteen days, whilst there, after arrival," have obtained some peculiar mercantile meaning, the addition of these words carries the persons interested in the policy over a further period of fifteen days, and then as to that period it is not a voyage policy, but a time policy. It appears to me that there is no authority for the view of the judges below, and that their judgment was founded upon no hypothesis except that of this being a voyage policy only. Unless that hypothesis is conceded, the authorities to which the Chief Baron referred do not apply, and I think the hypothesis cannot be conceded. The case of the Mercantile Marine Insurance Company v. Etherington (ubi sup.), where the ship was insured "at and from Liverpool to any port or ports in the North and South Pacific Oceans, and during thirty days' stay in her last port of discharge," with a clause that the insurance should continue until "she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety"—is much more applicable to the present case than the other authorities, because there the voyage was treated as one separate thing to this extent, that the twenty-fours, the usual time, was added after the arrival of the ship at the termination of her voyage, and then upon that was engrafted the stipulation her safety for thirty days. Surely in that case the two things must be treated as being separate, and I think so here. I am of opinion that the appellants are entitled to recover.

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument of Mr. Cohen impressed me at first that the case of The Company of African Merchants v. The Bristol and Foreign, &c., Co. (ubi sup.), where the words "stay and trade," were in a policy, and it was held to be a deviation to undertake any adventure unconnected with the trade of the African coast, applied here, and that, on that principle, in the present case any risk unconnected with the object of the voyage is a deviation from the risks covered by the policy; but that view assumes this to be a voyage policy, and a voyage policy only. Another point is that the usage, as to policies covering the risks incurred twenty-four hours after the ship's arrival in port, should be extended to the fifteen days in this case. I do not take this view. We must give the ordinary meaning to words unless it is shown that there is some usage which has deprived those words of their ordinary sense. Here the words are that the insurance is to last "for fifteen days whilst there after arrival," and there is no usage to restrict their meaning. The loss happened within the fifteen days in the port, and hence was within the policy. I am of opinion that the risk was covered by the policy.

Mellish, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think there is no sufficient reason to depart from the plain meaning of the words used in the policy. If the words had been simply "for fifteen days after arrival" it might be necessary to limit the construction to be put upon them, because the underwriters could hardly have intended to be liable for a ship going out to sea within that time; but the express words, "whilst there," show that the stipulation is that the underwriter is to run the risk of what may happen to the ship whilst in the port. If we held otherwise, we should defeat the object of the shipowner in insuring in these terms, because what he wants is that his ship may be always covered. In the usual way a shipowner insures until a ship arrives and twenty-four hours afterwards, and then insures "at and from for the next voyage," and so keeps his ship always insured. But to do this he must know what his next voyage will be. If he does not know it may be convenient to him to insure so that his ship may be covered for a time certain, so that he may know when the risk will terminate. If we should make that time uncertain by deciding that it meant that it terminated on the completion of the delivery of the cargo, the shipowner's object would be defeated. I think the words used here were intended to meet this particular case.

Collision—Appeal—Nautical assessors—Credibility of witnesses—Contributory negligence—Act causing collision—Must be negligent.

On an appeal from the Admiralty Division, the Court of Appeal, when unassisted by nautical assessors, will not reverse a finding of the court below upon a question of fact depending upon the credibility of witnesses regarded from a nautical point of view, provided that there is evidence in support of that finding.

Before a plaintiff in a collision cause can be deprived of his right of recovery against a negligent defendant by reason of an act done by the plaintiff, without which the collision would not have occurred, it must be shown that such an act of the plaintiff was negligent.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Right Hon. Sir R. Phillimore, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, in a cause instituted on behalf of the respondents, the owners of the sailing barge Alfreda, against the sailing barge Sisters, belonging to the appellants, for the recovery of damages arising from a collision which occurred between a screw steamship called the Thames and the barge Alfreda.

The collision occurred at about noon on the 15th Oct. 1874, off Jenning-tree Point, in the river Thames.

The respondents in their petition stated that the Alfreda, a sailing barge of 40 tons registrar, was proceeding from Elmley, in Kent, to Millwall, with a cargo of cement, and was at the entrance of Halfway Reach; that the wind was about S.W., blowing a fresh breeze; that the weather was fine and the tide nearly half flood, and of the force of about three to four knots per hour; that the Alfreda was under sail, and was making about six knots an hour, heading about north; that another sailing barge, called the Volunteer, was also sailing up, and was on the starboard side of the Alfreda, and a short distance from her; and that the Sisters was also sailing up ahead of and distant three or four lengths of the Alfreda; that at such time the Sisters improperly starboarded her helm, and threw herself across the bows of the Thames, which was coming down the river near the south shore, and compelled the Thames to starboard her helm, in order to avoid running over the Sisters; that thereby immediate danger of collision between the Thames and the Alfreda was occasioned, and although the helm of the Alfreda was put hard a port, the Thames with her stern struck the Alfreda on her port quarter, causing her to sink.

The appellants in their answer alleged the same facts as to the time, speed, wind, and as to the relative position of the barges, and that the Sisters, the Alfreda, and the Volunteer, were all keeping as close to the south side of the river as they could get, and the Sisters had her head looking in towards the south shore, to counteract the effect of the flood tide, which sets strong from off Jenning-tree Point over towards the north side of the river; that there was some barges at anchor on the south side of the river near Jenning-tree point; that the Thames was seen by those on board the Sisters on the starboard bow of the Sisters, rounding the point on the south side of the river; that the Thames approached the Sisters rapidly, and in a direction to run into the Sisters on her starboard side, and rendered a collision inevitable, when the master of the Sisters, as the only means of saving his vessel from being sunk by the Thames, put his helm hard to starboard; that this caused the Sisters to strike the sand barge Emma, one of the barges at anchor before mentioned, and drove the Emma a short distance in shore; that the head of the Sisters being held by the Emma, the Sisters swung round with her stem towards the north, and as she was swinging round the steamship Thames passed astern of her, slightly touching her rudder and carrying away her boat, which was towing astern. The answer then denied the allegations of the petition, and alleged that even if there was negligent navigation on the part of the Sisters, it was not such as to cause the collision between the Thames and the Alfreda; that the collision was caused by the improper navigation of the Thames, which neglected to keep out of the way of the Sisters; that the Thames, by the exercise of reasonable skill and care, might have avoided the collision with the Alfreda; that the Alfreda improperly ported her helm; that the Alfreda, by the exercise of reasonable skill and care, might have avoided the collision with the Thames.

The main questions of fact at the hearing were, whether the Thames was coming down on the port or the starboard bow of the Sisters; whether there was room for the Thames to go between the Sisters and the south shore; and whether the Alfreda in any way contributed to the collision. These questions had been before the court in another action brought by the owners of the barge Volunteer against the Thames, in which the latter vessel had been held not to blame for the collision. (See ante, Vol. 2, p. 512; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 343)

The findings of the court below on the questions of fact will be found in the following judgment of

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a case of collision which happened on the afternoon of the 15th Oct. 1874, in the entrance to Half-way Reach, in the river Thames, and off that point that is called Jenning-tree Point. The tide at the time was running about half flood, and from three to four knots an hour. The vessel who brings the action on the present occasion is a sailing barge called the Alfreda, of 40 tons register. She had three persons on board; two of them unfortunately were drowned at the time of this collision. The wind, I should observe, was about S., or S. by W. Now there is a peculiarity in this case which I will mention. The suit is not brought against the actual wrong-doer, but it is brought against the vessel which caused the actual wrong-doer to do the wrong, and that vessel is the Sisters, a sailing barge of about 42 tons. Now I must observe that this is not the first time that this case has been before the court, because on the 29th Jan. a vessel called the Volunteer—which was side by side with the Alfreda, and practically considered by the court then and now as being almost one vessel—brought her action against the Thames, and the Thames was dismissed, on the ground that the wrong that she did she was forced to do—namely, that she was compelled to starboard, and that starboarding caused her to run into the Volunteer after cutting through the Alfreda. It has been very truly remarked by Dr. Spinks, who appears on behalf of the Sisters, to-day, that the Sisters is not concluded by that judgment. She was not heard then; she had no witnesses produced; she was neither plaintiff nor defendant, and she has a right to be heard to-day. The first question which the court has to decide is, whether the steamer was compelled by the Sisters to starboard. Now in this case there were a great many barges, a small fleet of barges, going up the river, round Jenning-tree Point when the steamer was coming down, and I am satisfied upon the evidence that the steamer did not pass Jenning-tree Point rashly; but I think, as I thought on a former occasion, with the advice of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that she was in her right in what she did. She was on the south side of the river—she was going down—she had a clear eye, as sailors say, before her at the time, and there was a considerable distance, having regard especially to the steamer herself, which was not a very large one; there was sufficient space for her between the barge and the land to go without danger of collision. The point of the greatest importance to decide in this case, as I must say it was on the former occasion, is, whether on the present state of the evidence, and taking duly into my consideration the further testimony produced on behalf of the Sisters, whether the conclusion be that the steamer was on her starboard or on her port side. Now I am satisfied myself that the witness who was the mate of the steamer, namely, Smith, has given a truthful account to the court. I thought so on the last occasion, and I think so now. He was forward at the time of the collision. He says he expected the vessels to pass port to port, and there was in his judgment no danger if they had so done, and he says that the Sisters starboarded when two points on the port bow. That is the evidence which, after examining the testimony given by the other witnesses, I rely upon; and not the less so, because I think it is confirmed by some of the witnesses produced on behalf of the Sisters, more especially by the witness Bailey, who was master of the barge Christiana which was sailing up—and this is a fact which never came to the knowledge of the court before—which was sailing up ahead of the Sisters, as several other barges were. He said that if both vessels had kept their course the Thames would not have touched the Sisters; and he said that he passed her himself on the outside—that is, on her port hand; and that there were other barges between him and the Sisters, all of whom passed on the port side and outside the steamer. Now, the defence of the Sisters is as follows:—It comes, I think, under three categories. The first appears to me this category—that there is evidence which negatives her having caused the collision. She says, "I was not on the port bow, I was on the starboard bow; and if I had not starboarded and run into this other vessel, I should have been run into and cut to pieces." I do not believe that evidence, and that disbelief is the necessary consequence of my belief in what I have already stated, namely, the evidence of the mate and the other witnesses who support him, that she was on the port bow and not on the starboard bow at the time she starboarded. I believe that in the hurry and alarm she starboarded her helm and threw herself across the bows of the steamer. Well, the next defence is that the Thames herself, the steamer, was improperly navigated. I have already expressed my opinion upon that point. I do not think she was, nor do the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House think she was, improperly navigated. The third category of the defence is that the Alfreda herself, by improper conduct either caused entirely or contributed to this collision. When it is remembered that from the time the Thames had put her helm a-starboard, as compelled to do by the action of the Sisters, to the time of her running into the Alfreda, not more than two or three minutes elapsed at the very most, the Elder Brethren agree with me in thinking that whether the Alfreda's manœuvre was proper or improper in porting instead of starboarding (we by no means say it was the latter), but whether it was proper or improper, it cannot be holden in any fair sense to have contributed to this collision. I therefore am of opinion that the collision was caused by the starboarding of the steamer; that the starboarding of the steamer was caused by the improper manœuvre of the Sisters in crossing the bows of the steamer; and, therefore, that the real wrong-doer in this case is not the steamer, which dealt the blow, but the barge, the Sisters, which caused that blow to be dealt; and therefore I must pronounce that the Alfreda has made out her case, and that this collision was owing to the improper navigation of the Sisters.

From this judgment the owners of the Sisters appealed.

Dr. Spinks, Q.C., Butt, Q.C. (G. Bruce with them) for the appellants.—The evidence shows that the Sisters was obliged to starboard to avoid collision with the Thames. But even if there was negligence on the part of the Sisters, there is not liability because the Alfreda's act brought about the collision. If but for the act of the Alfreda in porting no collision would have occurred, then there can be no liability on the part of the Sisters; and this would be the case although the Alfreda was doing nothing wrong or negligent because, as her porting brought about the collision, the negligent act of the Sisters was not the proximate cause of the damage. If the Alfreda could have avoided the collision by starboarding she ought to have done so or at least to have kept her course; it must have been wrong to port; there was no danger until she did port, and she therefore brought about the collision, and, as matter of law, we submit that the Sisters cannot be made responsible for the ensuing damage. Further we submit that the Thames is not absolved from liability, because in order to avoid sinking one vessel she takes a step by which she avoids that one and sinks another.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents, were not called upon.

JAMES, L.J.—I am of opinion that no sufficient ground has been shown for supporting this appeal. The question is whether the Sisters was the actual cause of the mischief done? There is abundant evidence in support of the contention that she did cause that mischief. There is, no doubt, counter evidence; and, although I cannot say what I might have decided if I had tried the action in the first instance, I can see no sufficient ground for disturbing the finding of the court below. The case was heard by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court assisted by nautical assessors, and they, proceeding very much upon the ground of the credibility of witnesses regarded from a nautical point of view, arrived at the conclusion that the cause of this collision was the improper starboarding of the Sisters, and there is nothing to show that the finding was against the evidence.

The other question raised before us is whether, it having been found that the Sisters was the cause of the collision, there was any contributory negligence on the part of the Alfreda. To disentitle the Alfreda to her right of recovery there must have been contributory negligence, that is to say, an act of negligence on her part contributing to the collision. Therefore the question is whether there was any act on the part of the Alfreda which would come within the meaning of the word "negligence?" It is not enough to show that the Alfreda did some act or did not do some act by reason of the commission or omission of which the collision actually occurred. It is impossible to hold that the Alfreda is guilty of negligence, because she might have avoided the collision if she had done something other than she actually did unless that omission was negligent, and I am of opinion that she has been shown to be guilty of no negligence. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

MELLISH, L.J. and BAGGALLY, J.A. concurred.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I feel the greatest difficulty sitting here in the Court of Appeal in dealing with a mere question of evidence. We are not assisted by nautical assessors, and cannot therefore judge whether the evidence as it stands ought from a nautical point of view to have led to a different conclusion. I do not see how the court can in such a case upset a judgment where the matter has been fully dealt with with reference to the credibility of witnesses in the court below. Appeal dismissed.

THE POLYMEDE.

Proceeding in rem by default—Rules in force—Supreme Court Rules, Order XIII., r. 10*—Supreme Court Rules, Dec.* 1875*—Admiralty Court additional rules,* 1871.

Order XIII., rule 10 of the rules of the Supreme Court as to proceedings in rem by default being annulled by the rules of the Supreme Court, Dec. 1875, the effect of such annulment is to bring into force, under and by virtue of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, sect. 18, the Admiralty Court additional rules, 1871, as to proceedings in rem by default.

THIS was an action commenced on 3rd Nov. 1875, on behalf of the mortgagees of eight sixty-fourth shares of the Polymede against the owner of those shares. The action was in rem, and a writ was issued under Order II., rule 7, of the rules of the Supreme Court, and was duly served upon the vessel, and the vessel was arrested. No appearance was entered by any person. After the time limited for appearance had expired, the plaintiff's solicitors, on 17th Nov. 1875, filed in the registry an affidavit of service of the writ, a statement of the particulars of the plaintiffs' claim, and on 28th Dec. 1875, entered final judgment for the amount of the plaintiffs' claim, and taxed costs in accordance with the provisions of Order XIII., rule 5 of the rules of the Supreme Court. The cause now came before the court upon motion on behalf of the plaintiffs for a decree for the appraisement and sale of the eight sixty-fourth shares.

By the rules of the Supreme Court (in the schedule to the Judicature Act 1875), Order XIII., rule 10, it was in effect provided that the practice in existence under the Admiralty Court Rules 1859, in respect of proceedings by default, should be in force under the Judicature Act (see Admiralty Court Rules 1859, rr. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, Williams and Bruce, Admiralty practice, pp. xxix., xxx.) By the rules of the Supreme Court, December 1875, made on the 1st Dec. 1875, Order XIII., r. 10 of the rules of the Supreme Court, was annulled, without any rule being expressly substituted for it. By the 18th section of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1875, it is provided that "all rules and orders in force at the time of the commencement of this Act in . . . . the Admiralty Court . . . . except so far as they are expressly varied by the first schedule hereto or by rules of court made by Order in Council before the commencement of this Act, shall remain and be in force in the High Court of Justice and in the Court of Appeal respectively, until they shall respectively be altered or annulled by any rules of court made after the commencement of this Act." The rules as to proceedings by default in the Admiralty Court Rules 1859, were repealed by the Admiralty Court additional rules 1871 (see L. Rep. Adm. and Ecc. 612), and the following rules were thereby substituted:

4. If within twelve days after service of a warrant or citation no appearance shall have been entered in the cause, the proctor for the plaintiff may file his petition; and if within twelve days from the filing of the petition no appearance shall have been entered, the plaintiff's proctor may, on bringing in his proofs, set the cause down for hearing.

5. If, when the cause comes before the judge, he is satisfied that the plaintiff's claim is well founded, he may pronounce for the claim with or without a reference to the Registrar, or to the Registrar assisted by merchants, and may at the same time order the property to be appraised and sold, with or without previous notice, and the proceeds to be paid into court, or may make such order in the premises as to him shall seem just.

E. C. Clarkson in support of the motion.—Order XIII., rule 10 having been annulled, there is no special mode of procedure provided by the Judicature Acts for proceedings in rem by default. Hence the general rules of Order XIII. are applicable, and as the writ in the case is not specially indorsed, and the demand is liquidated, the plaintiff has complied with the provisions of Order XIII., rule 5, and was in consequence entitled to sign judgment. Having judgment, the plaintiff asks the court to enforce it according to the ordinary process of the court in proceedings in rem, namely, by appraisement and sale. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE—Is not the effect of the annulment of Order XIII., rule 10, to revive the practice of the Admiralty Court under the rules of 1871?] I submit not, as the mode of proceeding is sufficiently provided for in the other parts of the order.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 12.—Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE—This is the first case in which the question has had to be considered by the court whether the rules of court, which form part of the Judicature Act 1875, apply to an action in rem when the proceedings are by default. What the court really has to decide is this: Are the rules of Order XIII., in the schedule annexed to the Judicature Act 1875, applicable to a cause in rem in default; or ought the practice prevailing in the Court of Admiralty immediately before the coming into operation of the Judicature Acts, still to be enforced in such cases?

Now Order XIII. in the schedule of the Judicature Act 1875, is headed "default of appearance," and consists of ten divisions or paragraphs, of which the tenth, or last, is subdivided into a great many sections relating exclusively to the proceedings in Admiralty actions in rem in which an appearance has not been entered. It is to be presumed, therefore, that the framers of the rules were of opinion that the first nine paragraphs of this order were not to be applied to Admiralty proceedings in rem. Now, at a meeting of the judges of the Supreme Court, held on the 1st December last, in pursuance of the Judicature Act 1875, the tenth paragraph of Order III. was annulled, and no other rule was substituted for it. In these circumstances it has been suggested to me that the fifth paragraph of the order, being sufficient on its face to apply to a judgment by default in an Admiralty action similar to that before me, has been rightly followed in this case, but I am of opinion that that is a position which cannot be successfully maintained.

In the first place, as I have already said, the insertion of the paragraph which has now been annulled shows that the framers of the rules did not consider that the previous paragraphs of the order were sufficient for the purpose of laying down any rules with regard to proceedings in rem, and, in fact, it was admitted by Mr. Clarkson that neither the fifth paragraph, nor any other of the paragraphs which remain unannulled, could be said to apply to all cases of proceedings in rem by default; and, in the second place, the 18th section of the Judicature Act 1875, provides that "All rules and orders of Court in force at the time of the commencement of this Act in the Court of Probate, the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, and the Admiralty Court, or in relation to appeals from the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, or from the Court of Appeal in bankruptcy matters, except so far as they are expressly varied by the first schedule hereto, or by rules of court made by Order in Council before the commencement of this Act, shall remain and be in force in the High Court of Justice and in the Court of Appeal respectively, until they shall be respectively altered or annulled by any rules of court made after the commencement of this Act." In my judgment, the effect of the annulment of the tenth paragraph of the order as to default of appearance, Order XIII. is to revive the practice previously existing in the High Court of Admiralty with regard to proceedings by default in rem, and I must, therefore, pronounce that such practice must be followed in the present case.

I shall make no order on the motion, but I shall direct the costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

THE BIOLA.

Discovery — Interrogatories — Collision—Preliminary acts.

In an action of damage by collision in the Admiralty Division, interrogatories which seek to obtain information given in the preliminary act of the party interrogated are inadmissible, and will be struck out on the application of the party sought to be interrogated.

THIS was an action of collision, instituted on behalf of the owner of the brigantine Carthagenian against the Swedish barque Biola and her owners intervening, and preliminary acts had been filed as usual. The plaintiff had delivered his statement of claim, and the defendant had delivered his statement of defence and counter claim, and before the close of the pleadings the plaintiff delivered to the defendants, under the provisions of the rules of the Supreme Court, Order XXXI., rule 1, the following interrogatories:—

1. Were you, in the month of November, 1874, acting as master of the Swedish vessel Biola?

2. Did you, on the morning of the 30th November, come into collision with any ship or vessel; if yea, what was the state of the weather and tide at such time?

3. Did you, at that or any other time, send away any boats, or do any and what other acts to ascertain the damage sustained by the other vessel?

4. What was done on board your vessel when the other vessel was first seen? On what tack was your vessel when the other vessel was first seen, and state whether your vessel held her course or whether her course was altered? If it was so altered, say how it was altered, and to what extent, and how soon after the other vessel was first seen?

5. Did you see the other vessel before the collision, and if you did for how long a time, and at what distance from you was she when you first saw her, and did you see any lights on board the other vessel, and if you did, say what lights you first saw, and whether any other lights on board the said vessel were afterwards seen by you and when?

6. What lights had you (if any) burning on board the Biola at the time of the collision, or at any time shortly previously to the collision, or shortly subsequent thereto; state accurately two positions and colours of the set lights, and the dimensions of the lanterns (if any) in which they were contained. Had you any white or bright lights exhibited on board the Biola shortly before the collision?

7. If any damage was done to the Biola by the collision, state to what extent, and say what part of the Biola was damaged by the collision.

8. Were you, at the time of the said collision, on a voyage to Fleetwood and off the coast of Wales, and if so, state how far off the coast you were at the time, and what course you had been steering immediately before the collision, and before you saw the vessel with which you came into collision.

9. Did you, at the time of the collision, or shortly before, or after that time, take any and what steps to ascertain the exact position of the Biola. If so, state by means of crossbearings or otherwise what such position was, and did you take any and what steps between the time of the collision and the time of sunrise to ascertain what had become of the other vessel. Did you see her after the collision, and if so say in what direction you saw her, both as to bearing by compass and relating to your own vessel?

The said John Bergland, one of the defendants, is required to answer all the above interrogatories.

The defendants thereupon took out a summons calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause before the Registrar why the interrogatories should not be struck out. On the summons coming on, the Registrar referred it to the court.(a)

Clarkson, for the defendants, now moved to strike out the interrogatories, contending that before the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts they would not have been allowed in this court, and that there was nothing to alter the practice in those Acts or the rules thereto; every question asked was answered by the defendant's preliminary act or his statement of defence. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Before I can allow these interrogatories the plaintiff must show me some good reason; I shall, therefore, not trouble you further until I have heard your opponent.]

Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiffs.—By the rules of the Supreme Court a party acquires a right to deliver interrogatories; formerly the parties had to obtain leave, now it may be done without leave. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is not an absolute right to deliver any interrogatories a party chooses.] Subject to rule 5 of the same order, by which any party may apply to strike out any interrogatory "on the ground that it is scandalous or irrelevant, or is not put bonâ fide for the purpose of the action, or that the matter inquired after is not sufficiently material at that stage of the action, or on any other ground." These are the only grounds upon which interrogatories can be struck out. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If I can strike them out upon "any other ground," that surely gives me the widest discretion.] "Any other ground" must be some similar ground to those mentioned before, and no such ground can be suggested. If we do not get these interrogatories answered, we may be compelled to call evidence on points which would be admitted in the answers. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—All the facts you interrogate about will appear stated upon the defendant's preliminary act, and this will be the strongest admission against the defendants.] But the preliminary act would not in itself be evidence on which we could go to trial. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It certainly would as against the defendants, and you can get no more information out of these interrogatories.] These are interrogatories which would be allowed in any other division. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Has there been any instance since parties were bound to file preliminary acts in all the divisions?] I know of no instance, but in the other divisions interrogatories supporting the plaintiff's case are always allowed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Exercising the discretion I have under Order XXXI. rule 5, I shall certainly strike out these interrogatories. The plaintiff has the information sought in the defendant's preliminary act.

(a) It is questionable whether the Registrar of the Admiralty Division can hear summonses relating to interrogatories except by consent; nevertheless it constantly happens that such matters are brought before him. His powers are mainly derived from the Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LIV., rule 2; but it is also contended that he can exercise all the powers of a judge of this division because he was a surrogate of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty.—ED.

HINGSTON v. WENDT.

Shipping—Average—Services to cargo only—Lien for charges—Agent's promise to pay.

Plaintiff, a shipping agent, was put into possession of a stranded vessel by the master, and by his order rendered services to, and paid money for the cargo, placing it in a warehouse under lock and key. The vessel broke up and was sold as a wreck. Defendant obtained the bill of lading, and through his agent claimed the cargo. Plaintiff, upon a promise of the agent that defendant would pay all his costs and charges, delivered up possession; but defendant afterwards refused to pay more than his general average of discharging expenses, and plaintiff brought this action in the County Court for the balance.

Held, upon appeal, that, under the circumstances, just as in general average and salvage, the plaintiff had a lien on the cargo for his charges, and that therefore the defendant was liable upon his agent's promise to pay the whole of plaintiff's claim.

APPEAL from Devon County Court, holden at Kingsbridge.

This was an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover 48*l.* 1*s.*, being the balance of the following particulars of work done and payments made in respect of the cargo of the German brigantine Theodor, which went ashore at Hope Cove, between Dartmouth and Plymouth, on the 14th Feb. 1874.

It was proved, on behalf of the plaintiff, a ship agent, living at Dartmouth, Devon:

1. That the plaintiff was put into possession of the vessel and cargo by the master of the said vessel, Theodor, almost immediately after she was stranded.

2. That whilst in such possession the plaintiff rendered the services to the cargo and paid, by order of the master, such moneys in respect thereof as is stated in the said particulars, and the plaintiff placed the cargo in a warehouse in safety under lock and key.

3. That the defendant afterwards, as the holder of the bill of lading of the said cargo, claimed to be entitled thereto, and presented such bill of lading to the said plaintiff, and demanded possession thereof by his agent, Julian Slight, R.N.

4. That the said Julian Slight, by a verbal promise, expressly promised the said plaintiff that he should be paid his costs and charges for the services so rendered to the cargo, whereupon the said plaintiff delivered up the possession of the said cargo to the said Julian Slight.

5. That the charges of the plaintiff were fair and reasonable.

6. That the plaintiff, having subsequently forwarded the particulars of his charges as above stated to the said Julian Slight, received from him a letter, dated 26th May, 1874, of which the following is an extract:—

I forwarded your letter to London the same day I received it. Mr. Wendt came to Plymouth the next day, when I particularly asked him to settle your account, and he promised me he would give it his best attention immediately he arrived in town; so I was in hopes you had received your money.

7. Subsequently the defendant wrote to the plaintiff on the 16th June 1874, as follows:—

I have now before me your note of charges, and in the first place must at once say that I have no funds out of which to pay you agency or commission. I need not, therefore discuss the question as to whether you could, under the circumstance, have been entitled to charge such. From your account of:

Of the discharging I credit you				11	8	0

The receipt of which please acknowledge. The latter figure, 11*l.* 8*s.*, I arrive at by treating the discharging expenses as general average, which they undoubtedly are, and as you hold net proceeds of ship, 64*l.*, while I hold net proceeds of cargo, 30*l.*, it follows that my contribution to the 35*l.* 12*s.*, is the sum herewith paid to you.

8. To which the plaintiff, on the 17th June 1874, replied,

We have your favour of 16th instant, enclosing cheque, 21*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, for which we thank you. We must regret the view you take of our disbursements re Theodor, with which, of course, we do not agree. We trust that you and Captain Slight will reconsider your determination, as we did everything in our power to meet his and your wishes, which we think he is bound to confirm. As the matter stands at present, without speaking of agency and interest, we are actually 28*l.* 8*s.* out of pocket in preserving the cargo of Theodor.

And in a subsequent letter, dated 26th June 1874, the plaintiff further wrote to the defendant,

We hope and believe that, after your getting full particulars from Captain Slight, the matter will be amicably settled. The stores were landed before the cargo, and the vessel, after discharge, was sold for 95*l.* or 100*l.*, and she broke up where she lay.

And the correspondence terminated by the two further letters from defendant to plaintiff, dated 3th June 1874, and 4th July, 1874, respectively, as follows:—

Theodor. Your letter of the 26th inst. is to hand, and in reply I may mention that the buyer of the hull would evidently in the first instance have been obliged to discharge the cargo. Still, your information as to the fate of the vessel makes the case appear in a somewhat different light, and although I cannot meet you in the way you desire, I will, to cut the matter short, make you the following offer. The proceeds in hand are 19*l.* 1*s.* 9*d.*, and I am prepared to pay you one half thereof, viz., 9*l.* 10*s.*, in full, taking for my trouble in the case no remuneration whatever. Beyond this I cannot go, and I shall be glad if you will accept this proposal.

Your letter of yesterday is to hand, and I hasten to say in reply that if you do not choose in course of post to accept the ultimatum transmitted to you in my previous one, I shall remit the balance to my clients, and leave you to take any further course you please.

9. It was proved on behalf of defendant that the said Julian Slight had no general authority from him to undertake for the payment of expenses, and that he had no special authority to do so in this case.

10. It was contended by the plaintiff's attorney that the plaintiff had a lien upon the cargo for the said costs and payments, and that the defendant was bound by the verbal promise of the said Julian Slight for the payment thereof, and also that the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs on the letters above set out.

11. It was contended by the defendant's attorney that the plaintiff had no lien upon the cargo for the expenses of discharging the same, and that the work was done and money paid by the plaintiff without any request or authority from the defendant, and that the plaintiff's charges were payable by the master or owner of the vessel, and that the defendant had not rendered himself liable to say the same by his letters above set out, because such letters were not a promise to pay the plaintiff's charges, but admitted only the defendant's liability to contribute to the same as a general average charge.

12. The learned judge gave a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed, 41*l.* 18*s.*

Plaintiff's attorney asked his Honour whether he gave his judgment on a question of fact or on the point of law.

His HONOUR.—My judgment is that there was a contract not merely implied, but expressed, to pay the charges on the delivery of the cargo; and that, whatever private rights the parties may have had, it was their duty to have given notice of them.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench is whether the learned judge of the County Court was right in point of law in deciding for the plaintiff.

Phillimore argued for defendant, the appellant.

Bullen, contra.

The arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court, Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8.—BLACKBURN, J., delivered the judgment of himself and Lush, J.—The case is not stated so explicitly as we could wish, but the material facts as we understand them are as follows: The German brigantine Theodor had gone ashore near Dartmouth, with cargo on board of her. The plaintiff, a ship agent at Dartmouth, was put in possession of the wrecked vessel and cargo, by the captain, with, as we understand the case, authority from the captain as his agent, to do what was for the benefit of all concerned. The plaintiff did the work and expended the money sued for in discharging the cargo, and he brought it to a place of safety where he kept possession of it. The hull remained on shore and ultimately broke up, and was sold as a wreck.

We think we must take it on the statement to be fact that this expenditure was not incurred on behalf of the master as agent of the shipowner performing his contract to carry on the cargo to its destination and earn freight, but was an extraordinary expenditure for the purpose of saving the property at risk, and had the expenditure been for the purpose of saving the whole venture, ship as well as cargo, it would have constituted a general average to which the owners of each part of the property saved must have contributed rateably, and the captain, and the plaintiff, as his agent, would have had a lien or right to retain each part of the property saved till the amount of the contribution due in respect of it was paid or secured. But this right would have been only in respect of the contribution due in respect of that part. He would have had no lien on the cargo for the contribution due, if any, in respect of the hull.

But as we understand the facts, there was in this case no contribution due in respect of the hull, for the expenditure was not for the purpose of saving, nor did it save, the vessel. It was an extraordinary expenditure for the purpose of saving the cargo alone, and which did save the whole cargo. And the question—the answer to which will decide this appeal—is, whether the captain and the plaintiff, as his agent, had a right to detain the whole cargo if it belonged to one owner, till the whole was paid or secured, or if the cargo belonged to several owners, to detain each part of the goods so saved till the contribution in respect of that part was paid or secured?

This is the point on which the case turns, for the defendant was not the owner of any part of the cargo at the time when the expenditure was made, and cannot therefore be made liable as having his credit pledged by the captain as his agent of necessity. He appears to have been a mercantile agent to whom the owner of the cargo had transmitted the bill of lading to enable him to obtain the cargo on his behalf, and he did so obtain the whole of it. The defendant did not become liable to pay any contribution merely by the receipt of the goods, unless there was a promise express or implied to pay it in consideration of the person who had a right to detain the goods till it was paid or secured, parting with the possession: (Scaife v. Tobin, 3 B. & Ad. 523.) In the present case there was an express promise by Capt. Slight, the agent of the defendant, who obtained possession of the goods for the defendant from the plaintiff, that the plaintiff's charges should be paid, and though it was proved that Capt. Slight had no special authority to make this promise, we think the County Court Judge was right in holding that his employment to obtain possession of the goods gave him authority to give security for any charges for which there was a lien on the goods. But we do not think his authority would extend to bind the defendant further than there was a lien.

As to the question whether there was a lien on the cargo for the expenses successfully incurred for the purpose of saving it alone, there is, considering how often the case must have occurred, a remarkable dearth of authority. In insurance law the phrase "general average" is commonly used to express what is chargeable on all, ship, cargo, and freight, and "particular average" to express a charge against some one thing. In Phillips on Insurance, § 1273, it is said, "General averages are usually cases of sacrifice for the entire interest at risk in ship, freight, and cargo, and hence called general. But a contribution may be by a part of those interests, where only a part is in peril, and benefited by the expenses and sacrifices;" and again in § 1470, "Where expense is incurred on divers articles in common, the adjustment is made by an average on the respective articles according to their value." In Moran v. Jones (7 E. & B. 523), this court held that the cargo, ship, and freight, were in that case all saved by one continuous operation, but they expressed a decided opinion that if the expense had been incurred after the cargo was safe for the benefit of ship and freight alone, they would as between the two, have been general average to which the ship and freight were to contribute rateably. This, we think, confirms the opinion expressed in Phillips. It may be said that these are only authorities that expenses of this kind are so far in the nature of general average that they can be charged against the articles saved, and must be paid for by the underwriters, and that it does not follow that the lien which is given for general average, strictly so called, also exists for the particular average chargeable against several articles in common, and so in the nature of general average. That may be true, but every reason for giving a lien for the contribution, when all are to contribute, exists for giving it where several articles are to contribute, and if where the cargo belongs to several owners there would be a lien on each part of the cargo for contribution from the owners of that part, it follows that there must be a lien on the whole cargo where it belongs to one only. The captain is entitled in case of need to incur extraordinary expenses for the protection of a particular article, and in some cases he is compellable to do so; see Notara v. Henderson (1 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. p. 278; L. Rep. 5 Q B. 346; Id. 7 Q.B. 225). In practice such expenses are always in this country charged on the adjustment against the articles in respect of which they are incurred, and in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in the case just mentioned, delivered by Willes, J., at p. 233, there are authorities cited to show that such is the law in many foreign states. It is not expressly said that there is a lien on the goods for such a particular average, but the hardship would be very great, if a master was bound to make a disbursement for the benefit of the goods and had no remedy if the goods owner transferred the property and then became insolvent. And as Willes, J., cites those authorities with a view to show that there was no hardship in holding the master bound to make such disbursements, we think it not too much to infer that this very learned judge thought there was such a lien, though it certainly was not decided that there was one. The case is very analogous to general average and to salvage, in both of which there is a lien. It is just and convenient that there should be such a lien, and what scanty authority we can find all points in the direction of there being a lien, and we think we must hold that there is one. We could have wished that the necessity for the first time, as far as we can find, of expressly deciding this point had arisen in a case of more importance in order that our opinion might be reviewed on appeal.

Two cases were referred to in the argument which have no bearing on the point, and we mention them only to show that we have not overlooked them. They are Nicholson v. Chapman (2 H. Bl. 254), and Castellian v. Thompson (13 C. B., N. S., 105). In the former case the plaintiff was a mere volunteer in saving the goods, in the latter the defendant was employed by a third person who had no authority to incur expense for the owner.

Judgment affirmed.

MEIKLEREID (app.) v. WEST (resp.).

Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 169 — Allotment note — Registered owner — Demise of ship.

The respondent was wife of a sailor serving abroad on board a ship of which appellant was sole registered owner. The appellant had demised the ship to a charterer for his sole use by a charter which required the charterer to find stores, pay crew's wages, and do repairs, the appellant paying his insurance on the vessel only, but having a lien upon cargo and freight for arrears of hire. The charterer appointed the master of the ship, who engaged respondent's husband as one of the crew. Respondent received an allotment note signed by the master and her husband, requiring the charterer to pay her 6l. a month during the voyage, and three monthly instalments were duly paid. Upon liquidation of the charterer's affairs, however, the respondent obtained a summary order for payment, under sects. 169 and 188 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, against the appellant.

Held, upon a case stated, that appellant was not, under the circumstances, the owner or any agent who had authorised the drawing of the note; and that he could not be liable upon the allotment note.

THIS was a case stated by Sir Robert Walter Carden, Knight, one of the aldermen of the City of London, being one of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the said City.

Upon the hearing of a certain complaint preferred by the respondent, the wife of Henry James West, a seaman lawfully engaged and serving on the British ship Sydney Hall, and the holder of the allotment note (hereinafter referred to) against the appellant, the owner of the said ship, under sect. 169 of 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104 (The Merchant Shipping Act 1854) for non-payment of arrears due under such allotment note, the said justice (having, by virtue of the statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 34, the authority of two or more justices, as required by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854), ordered the appellant to pay to the said respondent the sum of 18*l.*, being the amount due to her at the time of his adjudication under such allotment, and including the sum of 6*l.* for which the summons originally issued, and 12*l.* which had accrued due since the issuing of the summons, and which the said appellant consented to being included in such order.

The 169th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, is as follows:

The wife, or the father or mother, or the grandfather, or grandmother, or any child or grandchild, or any brother or sister of any seaman, in whose favour an allotment note of part of the wages of such seaman is made, may, unless the seaman is shown in manner hereinafter mentioned, to have forfeited or ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid, and subject, as to the wife, to the provision hereinafter contained, sue for and recover the sums allotted by the note when and as the same are made payable, with costs, from the owner or any agent who has authorised the drawing of the note, either in the County Court or in the summary manner in which seamen are by this Act enabled to sue for and recover wages not exceeding 50*l.*; and in any such proceeding it shall be sufficient for the claimant to prove that he or she is the person mentioned in the note, and that the note was given by the owner or by the master or some other authorised agent; and the seaman shall be presumed to be duly earning his wages, unless the contrary is shown to the satisfaction of the court, either by the official statement of the change in the crew caused by his absence, made and signed by the master, as by this Act is required, or by a duly certified copy of some entry in the official log book to the effect that he has left the ship, or by a credible letter from the master of the ship to the same effect, or by such other evidence, of whatever description, as the court in its absolute discretion considers sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid. Provided that the wife of any seaman who deserts her children, or so misconducts herself as to be undeserving of support from her husband, shall thereupon forfeit all right to further payments of any allotment of his wages which has been made in her favour.

It was proved or admitted that the appellant was, at the date of the signing of the said allotment note, and at the time of the said justice's adjudication, the sole registered owner of the British ship Sydney Hall; that the said Sarah West was the wife of the said Henry James West, a seaman, who had lawfully entered into articles of agreement to serve on board the said ship and who was then, as last aforesaid, serving on board such ship; and that in the said agreement was inserted and allotted to the said respondent Sarah West, as the wife of the said seaman, the sum of 6*l.* monthly of the wages of the said seaman; that an allotment note, in the form sanctioned by law, was given to her the said Sarah West, upon which there became due the said sum of 18*l.*, so by the said justices ordered to be paid.

The said allotment note is in the words and figures following:—

Notice to owners or agents. Seamen's allotments of wages may be remitted from port to port, free of expense, by means of seamen's money orders, to be obtained at the Mercantile Marine Offices.

It was further proved or admitted that the said W. T. Henley had chartered the said ship from the said appellant, the owner, on a time charter-party, a copy of which said charter-party was annexed, and that the said W. T. Henley as such charterer had appointed the captain of the said ship, who subsequently engaged the crew thereof and issued the said allotment note, and that he the said W. T. Henley had paid several of the amounts due on the said allotment notes.

It was further proved or admitted that all payments due on the said allotment note to the said Sarah West had been paid by the said W. T. Henley up to the 13th May 1875, and that the affairs of the said W. T. Henley are in liquidation.

It was stated on the part of the appellant that the said ship was then in the possession of his mortgagees, and that he then had no pecuniary or beneficial interest in the said ship, and had not had any interest in her since the month of February 1875, beyond his interest under the said charter-party.

The appellant tendered his evidence and proved that he never authorised Mr. Henley or anyone else to issue this allotment note on his behalf.

It was contended by the attorney for the appellant, that although the appellant was the sole registered owner, yet as he had (as was alleged) no beneficial interest in the ship, and had not authorised the issuing of the said note, therefore he was not liable as owner to pay such allotment note under sect. 169; but that the respondent's remedy was against Mr. Henley, the charterer, whose captain had issued the said allotment note, and who it was alleged was now under the said charter-party the "owner," within the meaning of the statute.

The said justice over-ruled these objections, and held, that under sect. 169 the respondent was entitled to two remedies, "one enabling her to sue for and recover the sum allotted by the note from the owner," or at her option "from any agent who had authorised the drawing of the note."

It being proved that the appellant was the sole registered owner, and the respondent having elected (the agent who authorised the "drawing of the note" being insolvent) to sue the appellant as such owner, the said justice held that the appellant was the only person who could be sued as owner, and that he could not avoid his statutory liability by chartering or mortgaging his vessel to a third party, and he made an order against him accordingly.

The question of law for the opinion of this honourable court is, was the appellant the owner within the meaning of sect. 169 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and had the respondent a right to recover from him as such owner?

The following, with the exception of an immaterial clause in the margin, was the charter-party appended to the case:

London, 29th October, 1874.
Steam Charter-party.

It is this day mutually agreed between G. B. Meiklereid and Co., owners of the good steamship or vessel called the Sydney Hall, of the measurement of 514 tons gross and 376 tons net, and carrying 700 tons dead weight, or thereabouts, inclusive of fuel and stores, now at Lisbon, and W. T. Henley, Esq., of 110, Fenchurch-street, charterer.

Witnesseth, that the said vessel or steamer, being tight, staunch, and strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage or service, shall be placed under the directions of the said charterer or merchant, or his assigns, not later than the 10th Nov., at his works at North Woolwich, to be by him or them employed for the conveyance of lawful merchandise or on cable service between good and safe ports in the United Kingdom and Continent of South America (no salt or injurious cargoes to be shipped), as ordered by the charterer, the cargo to be laden in any dock or discharged in any dock the charterer may order, provided the vessel is always afloat.

The said steamer is let for the sole use of the said charterer, and for his benefit, for the space of three or more calendar months, at charterer's option, commencing from the date the vessel is placed at the disposal of the charterer, at London, as above, he having the whole reach and burthen of the vessel; and she is not to be required to load more than she can reasonably stow and carry, over and above her tackle, provisions, and stores, &c.

The freight for the hire of the said steamer shall be as follows:—

At and after the rate of 350*l.* per calendar month, payable bi-monthly as due, until the vessel is again returned by the charterer, of which seven days' notice in writing is to be given to the owners.

The coals for the steam engines shall be supplied by and at the cost of the charterer, who shall also pay all port and dock charges, pilotages, delivery as well as labourage and other duties, &c., also finding all ship's stores, paying crew's wages, repairs of engines and boilers, if required, and necessary stores for the engine room—that is oil, tallow, and waste, owners paying insurance on the vessel only.

Should any difference arise between the parties to this contract, either in principle or detail, the same shall be referred for arbitration at London to two persons, one to be chosen by each contracting party, with power for them to call in a third, and the decision of a majority shall be final and binding. The acts of God, Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, navigation, of whatever nature and kind, always excepted.

The owners to have a lien upon the cargo and freight for arrears of hire, and the charterers to have a lien on the ship for the monthly freight paid in advance.

The vessel to be delivered up to the owners on the termination of this charter-party, at London, in the same good order and condition as when delivered, fair wear and tear excepted.

All derelicts, towages, and salvage, for owner's and charterer's equal benefit.

Failing the payment of the monthly hire as stipulated, the owners to be at liberty to withdraw the vessel from the service of the charterer, and claim the penalty, with any hire that may be due.

Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, estimated freight.

A. L. Smith argued for the appellant.—The appellant does not come within either of the descriptions of persons from whom these notes may be sued or recovered; the words are "from the owner or any agent who has authorised the drawing of the note." The case finds that he did not authorise the note; unless, by effect of the statute, the law is clear that a registered owner, merely as such, is not liable for charges incurred about a ship. Reeve v. Davies (1 A. & E. 312), decided that no action lay in respect of repairs against registered owners, where under a time charter-party, the charterers bound themselves to do repairs. So in Hibbs v. Ross (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 534; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 397), although the majority of the court held the register to be primâ facie evidence of the persons who employed the shipkeeper, it does not seem to have been suggested that they could have been on any other ground liable for damage incurred by the plaintiff who was lawfully on board. In the same way, where the owner absolutely demises the ship, and thus parts with the possession of her and her cargo, he can have no lien for her earnings: Maude and Pollock's Law of Merchant Shipping, 3rd edit., p. 296. [FIELD, J.—Sandemann v. Scurr 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86, discussed all those authorities.] The result is that the charterer, upon such a charter as this, is the owner for all purposes.

Poland, contra.—The word "owner" in sect. 169 has no limitation, the words "who has authorised the drawing of the note," applying only to the agent who is made responsible. Throughout the provisions of the Act concerning registry, the register is made primâ facie the proof of ownership. By sect 70 it is expressly provided that a mortgagor of a ship shall not cease to be owner by reason of his mortgage. And as by the charter the owners are to have a lien upon the cargo and freight for arrears of hire, it is reasonable that they should be liable for wages which produce the freight. This is a liability imposed by statute upon the owner, and he has a remedy over against the charterer, and it can be no greater hardship upon the owner than upon the agent who authorised the note. Both can protect themselves [FIELD, J.—Could West, the sailor, sue the appellant for his wages?] No, but the statute alters the common law with respect to his wife's remedy whilst the ship is abroad. The sailor has a lien upon the ship for his wages (sect. 182), and the law has created this security of a similar nature for the recovery upon allotment notes.

A. L. Smith in reply.

Feb. 21.—FIELD, J., delivered the judgment of Mellor, J., and himself.—This was an appeal from an order of Sir Robert Carden made under the 169th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, whereby he ordered the appellant to pay to the respondent the sum of 18*l.*, being the amount of three monthly instalments due under an allotment note of the 13th Feb. 1875, by which the master of the Sydney Hall, and the respondent's husband Henry West (who was a seaman serving on board), directed Mr. W. T. Henley, to pay to the respondent a monthly sum of 6*l.*, as part of wages agreed to be paid to her husband for his services.

Upon the facts of the case it appeared that the appellant was the registered owner of the ship Sydney Hall, and that in Oct. 1874 (she then being at Lisbon), he entered into a charter-party with Mr. Henley, to whom the allotment note was directed, for her hire at a lump payment of 350*l.* per month. By the terms of the charter the ship was to be placed under the direction of the charterer to be employed by him for the conveyance of merchandise or cable service. By another clause of the charter, the steamer was let for the sole use of the charterer for three or more calendar months at his option, and he was to pay the stipulated freight until the ship was returned by him; the charterer was farther to find all ship's stores, to pay crew's wages, repairs of engines and boilers, &c., the appellant paying his insurance on the vessel only. The vessel was to be delivered up by the charterer to the appellant on the termination of the charter, fair wear and tear excepted. The charterer, having taken possession of the ship under the charter, appointed one Fawcus as master, and the latter engaged the respondent's husband as one of the crew. In the articles of agreement entered into between them the sum of 6*l.* monthly of his wages was allotted to the respondent, and the allotment note in question was thereupon given to her, by which the master and the seaman required the charterer to pay to her the allotted sum. The note having been presented to Mr. Henley, he acted upon it, and paid the respondent several of the instalments due under it, but in or after May 1874, his affairs went into liquidation, and some of the subsequent instalments having fallen into arrear, the respondent commenced summary proceedings under the 169th section against the appellant, as registered owner to recover the arrears. Upon the hearing of the summons the magistrate held in accordance with the contention before him, that the appellant, being the de facto registered owner of the Sydney Hall, was liable to the respondent for these instalments; and it is the appeal from that order which we have now to decide.

We are of opinion that the order cannot be supported. Nothing can be clearer than that for the whole amount of wages, of which these allotted sums formed part, the respondent's husband had no remedy against the appellant. It was not and could not be reasonably contended that he by himself or by any authorised agent had entered into any contract with the respondent's husband, or given any authority, expressed or implied, for the drawing of the note in question. The only serious contention upon which his liability was sought to be rested before us was that, inasmuch as he was the de facto registered owner of the Sydney Hall, he was the owner within the meaning of the 169th section; and it was urged that by that section a special and peculiar right and remedy are given to the wife to sue and recover against the appellant under her husband's contract with the master, although the husband could not himself have recovered as against the appellant.

Now, in order to dispose of this question, we must consider what were the respective positions of the appellant and of Mr. Henley, the charterer and the master, in order to see whether the appellant can be truly said to have been such "owner" within the meaning of the section in question. The object of the section is to enable a seaman when about to leave home on a voyage to make provision for his wife during his temporary absence. The mode by which this is done is by enabling him to set apart in the hands of his employer a portion of the wages which he is earning on board, and to give his wife the power of receiving them.

Now, in the present case, although the appellant was in every sense before the execution of the charter-party the "owner" of the ship, he had by the execution of that instrument entirely divested himself not only of the possession of but also of all control over her. The charter-party, as is already stated, contains not only words of demise, which by themselves passed the possession of the ship for the stipulated time to the charterer, but also contained the other stipulations above set out carrying out the same object. The charterer, in fact, appointed the master, and the master so appointed paid the wages as the charterer's agent. The appellant had no control over either the ship, or the master, or the voyage, or the crew. Indeed, his rights in respect of the ship were limited to the bare right to receive the stipulated hire, and to take her back into his possession when the charter should come to an end. The appellant not only made no contract with the respondent's husband either himself or by any authorised agent, but the articles of agreement are made by the master, and the allotment is, by the express direction of the respondent's husband and the master, directed to the charterer, who acted upon it until his failure.

Under these circumstances, we cannot think that it was the intention of the Legislature to impose a liability upon a shipowner through the contract of third parties, and without any act or contract of his own, merely because he is registered as owner. The authorities are numerous which point to the distinction between those cases in which the effect of the charter is to retain the ownership in the owner, and those in which he parts with all possession and control, and they are vested in the charterer as temporary owner. The present case falls clearly within the latter branch, and we think that the meaning of the word "owner" in the 169th section at least must be restrained to such actual owner for the time being of the ship as either himself or by his master or other authorised agent manages and controls her, and enters into the agreement for the wages of which the allotment note is part. Mr. Poland was unable to point out any satisfactory reason for the alleged distinction between the rights of the seaman in respect of the wages themselves, and that of his wife in respect of the part advanced by means of the allotment note. It was urged before us that, as the appellant had the benefit under the charter of his time freight, which could not have been earned without the services of the seaman, it was not unjust to make him liable. It might as well have been said that because a person contracts with and pays a responsible builder for building a house, and the builder omits to pay his joiner or bricklayer, the person contracting has the benefit of their work, and ought to pay them for it.

Upon these grounds we come to the conclusion that the appellant is not liable for the arrears of the advance note, and that the order of Sir Robert Carden attempting to make him so must be quashed.

SAUNDERS AND ANOTHER v. BARING AND ANOTHER.

Marine insurance—Total loss—Sale of cargo—Notice of abandonment—Election by assured—Pro rata freight.

In an action against underwriters on a policy of insurance upon a cargo of coals to Yokohama, it was proved that the ship received such damage as to render it necessary to put into Hong Kong; and that when there competent persons decided that the cargo should be sold, as there would be great danger of spontaneous combustion if it were conveyed to its original destination. No notice of the abandonment of the cargo was given to the underwriters, until the claim was made for the total loss, but the coals had been publicly sold at Hong Kong. The proceeds of the sale had been handed over to the shipowners, and they had offered them to the charterers, less a considerable sum which they withheld in payment of pro rata freight, on condition that they should receive a receipt in full of all demands. This the charterers declined to give. The underwriters now refused to pay, upon the ground that the charterers had not abandoned the cargo.

Held, that the public sale, per se, vested the proceeds of the sale in the underwriters, and that the charterers had done nothing subsequently which showed an election on their part to take the proceeds.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance tried before Lord Coleridge and a special jury, at Guildhall, on the 16th Dec. 1875, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, but leave was reserved for the defendants to move to have the verdict entered for themselves.

Defendants now moved in accordance with the leave reserved.

The facts as they appeared at the trial were as follows: The plaintiffs were merchants, carrying on business in Liverpool and London, and the defendants were directors of a marine insurance company. On the 19th Dec. 1872, the plaintiffs entered into a charter-party with the owners of a German ship, the Mary Anna, for the conveyance of a cargo of coals from Cardiff to Yokohama. On the 6th Feb. 1873, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants the policy which is the subject of this action, for the sum of 1650*l.* on the said cargo of coals.

The Mary Anna sailed from Cardiff on the 20th Feb. 1873. In the June, and again in the September following, the ship experienced very severe weather, lost her masts, and it became necessary to jettison a portion of the cargo. As she was in great danger the captain made for Hong Kong, which was the nearest port of refuge, and arrived there on the 5th Oct. He then made the usual protest, and the ship was surveyed and condemned

When the cargo was unshipped it was found to be so much damaged that there would be very great danger of spontaneous combustion if it were taken on to Yokohama, and the surveyor recommended that they should be sold by public auction. This was done, and the sum realised was considerably over the insured value, but the average adjusters at Hong Kong deducted a sum for pro ratâ freight, on the ground that the vessel was a German one, which reduced the net proceeds of the cargo to 583*l*. This was sent to the shipowners, and they offered it to the plaintiffs on condition that they should give a receipt stating that it was on settlement of all questions with the owners of the ship. This would have precluded any future question as to the pro ratâ freight, and was in consequence declined by the plaintiffs though without consulting the underwriters, and the plaintiffs then sent in a claim to the defendants for a total loss. This the defendants declined to pay.

Butt, Q.C. and C. J. Mathew for the defendants.—The first substantial question is, Who is to bear the loss caused by the deduction of the pro ratâ freight? [BLACKBURN, J.—If it is proved to be a total loss, you must decide that question with the shipowners.] In reality this question will turn upon the effect of the sale of the cargo at Hong Kong; and as to this the decision in the Common Pleas in the case of Farnworth v. Hyde (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 187, 429; 18 C. B., N. S., 835; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 231) is against us, for there it is stated that the sale having been properly made was an actual total loss. But in the present case we must go a step further than that, and consider whether the sale itself without anything more whatever vests the proceeds immediately in the underwriter, or must there be some election on the part of the assured to do so? It is admitted that notice of abandonment could not be given before the sale, but does the sale per se vest at once the proceeds in the underwriter? [BLACKBURN, J.—The party insured is never obliged to claim indemnity; but the act of claiming the indemnity at once vests the proceeds in the insurers.] Suppose the property sold for a considerable sum more than the insured value, it is evident that in that case the sale will not per se vest the proceeds in the insurers. [LUSH, J.—Supposing that some election is necessary, surely the presentation of the claim is sufficient.] It appears from the correspondence that the plaintiffs were offered a sum of 583*l*. for the loss they had sustained, but they declined to receive it because the form of receipt was not satisfactory to themselves; they gave us no opportunity of accepting or rejecting this lump sum, and that clearly indicates that they never did any act which amounted to an election to consider the proceeds not their own; and it is sufficient that they did not elect to say that the proceeds were ours. There are authorities to show that some act was necessary on the part of the assured to divest themselves of the proceeds. The judgment of Lord Chancellor Cottenham in Fleming v. Smith (1 H. of L. Cas. 513), commented on by Blackburn, J., in Rankin v. Potter (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; L. Rep. 4 Eng. & Ir. App. 123), says, "They were sufficiently informed of what had taken place to enable them, if they thought proper, to take upon themselves the chance of the benefit of retaining the ownership of the property, instead of taking the sum which was secured to them by the policy effected with the underwriters on the vessel; and if they acted upon that opportunity of election they surely cannot afterwards turn round and go against the underwriters as for a total loss." No doubt the point at issue in that case was as to whether formal notice of abandonment was necessary, but the passage cited shows that there must be some election on the part of the assured. That being so the question arises on whom does the burden of proof lie to show that the proceeds are treated by the assured as their own and not as belonging to the underwriters. [LUSH, J.—That is, are they to be considered as belonging to the assured until they repudiate them, or do they belong to the underwriters until the assured elect to take them? Farnworth v. Hyde (ubi sup.) seems to settle the point that the sale immediately vests the proceeds in the underwriters. BLACKBURN, J.—The question of election was discussed in Stringer v. English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 676), but the question as to the time of election or which side must prove it did not there arise; the decision was that the assured having elected was bound by such election.] It is clear from the cases cited that notice of abandonment is not necessary, still the mere sale does not divest the proceeds from the owner. In Roux v. Salvador (3 Bingham N. C. 266) Lord Abinger, in giving judgment, says, "The assured may preclude himself from recovering a total loss if, by any view to his own interest, he voluntarily does, or permits to be done, any act whereby the underwriter may be prejudiced in the recovery of that money. Suppose, for example, that the money received upon the sale should be greater than, or equal to, the sum insured; if the insured allows it to remain in the hands of his agent, or of the party making the sale, and treats it as his own, he must take upon himself the consequence of any subsequent loss that may arise of that money, and cannot throw upon the underwriter a peril of that nature" (p. 288). This case implies clearly that it rests with the assured to make an election after the sale. In the present case it is contended that the plaintiff has voluntarily left the proceeds in the hands of another party. Then as to the question of pro ratâ freight, that it is entirely a matter for the assured—with that the underwriters have nothing to do. Baillie v. Mondigliani (Park on Insur., vol. 1 p. 116; 6 T. R. 421). [BLACKBURN, J.: If the goods have increased in value by being carried to Hong Kong and the shipowner has a lien upon them, surely the underwriters cannot avail themselves of the increased value and not pay pro ratâ freight.]

Knight v. Faith, 15 Q. B., 649;
Lloyd v. Guibert, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115; 13, L. T. Rep. N. S. 602; Arnould Mar. Insur. vol. 2, pp. 878, 884.

Cohen, Q.C., and F. W. Hollams, for the plaintiff, were not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—The mere fact that this cargo of coals had been so damaged by the perils of the seas as to render an immediate sale necessary, and that they were so sold, sufficient to constitute a total loss. See Roux v. Salvador (ubi sup.). It is not necessary to say more on the point than is there said by Lord Abinger, "When the subject matter insured, has by a peril of the sea lost its form and species, where a ship, for example, has become a wreck, or a mere congeries of planks, and has been bonâ fide sold in that state for a sum of money, the assured may recover a total loss without any abandonment. In fact, when such a sale takes place, and in the opinion of the jury is justified by necessity, and a due regard to the interests of all parties, it is made for the benefit of the party who is to sustain the loss; and if there be an insurance the net amount of the sale after deducting the charges, becomes money had and received to the use of the underwriter, upon the payment by him of the total loss." The goods in this case having of necessity been turned into money, there is a total loss; and for this the underwriters are liable, with, however, the right to receive the money from the hands of those who received it. If the assured had possession of it, it would be deducted from the total loss, but where the money is in the hands of a third party, the assured is entitled to be paid the total loss, and they may treat the amount as a debt due to them, but subject, of course, to a liability in case they have done any act which would lessen the chance of its recovery by the underwriters. This becomes extremely important where the holder of the money becomes bankrupt, and Lord Abinger rightly explains the law in commenting on Mitchell v. Eadie (3 Bing. N. C. 290) that "even when a total loss has occurred by a sale of the goods, the assured may, by his own conduct in electing to take the proceeds instead of making his claim on the underwriter, if he thereby alters the facts so as to affect the interest of the underwriter, forfeit his claim to recover a total loss." That clearly shows that if anything in this case justified us in inferring that the insured had said, "We prefer to keep the proceeds" (and it has been shown that they amounted to 1900*l.*, whereas the insured value was 1650*l.*), they would be bound by their election. And the fact of this balance arising would have inclined us to think that the plaintiffs might have wished to claim the proceeds, but we find no trace of anything of the kind. They heard of the value realised by the sale, and of the claim for pro ratâ freight at the same time; then they were offered a sum of 583*l.* in full satisfaction, but this they declined. At that time they were evidently fully aware that if they took the proceeds they would be most probably involved in a law suit, and so they would be less inclined to elect to take the proceeds. However that may be, we find no trace whatever of such an election on their part. If in declining the 583*l.* they were acting as agents of the underwriters, their refusal may have raised the question of negligence, but I feel absolutely certain the insurance company would have told them to do what they did. The underwriters must pay the total loss, and they will then be entitled to take all such steps to get all the proceeds from the hands of third parties, as the plaintiffs themselves could have taken.

STRIBLEY v. IMPERIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Concealment of material facts—Average loss—Non-communication by captain—Fraud—Principal and agent.

On the 11th Feb. 1874, two policies were effected upon a ship and freight "at and from Mazagan to a port or ports in the United Kingdom." The ship arrived at Mazagan on the 27th Dec. 1873. On the last night of the year a gale sprang up, and the ship lost an anchor. On the 1st Jan. the captain went before a notary and made a protest as to the loss of the anchor by reason of boisterous weather. On the 9th Jan. he wrote to his owners, but did not mention the loss of the anchor. In an action to recover for the subsequent total loss of the ship.

Held, that as the captain did not wilfully or fraudulently conceal the fact of the loss of the anchor for the purpose of enabling him to insure, the policies were not avoided.

THIS was an action on two policies of insurance brought to recover for the loss of the ship Jessie, and was tried before Grove, J., at Guildhall, on the 4th Dec. 1875, when a verdict was given for the plaintiff with damages 850*l.*

It was now moved to enter judgment for the defendant.

The facts of the case, which appeared from the evidence at the trial, were as follows:—

On the 11th Feb. 1874, the plaintiffs effected an insurance with the defendants upon the ship Jessie, at and from Mazagan, a port in Africa, to a port or ports in the United Kingdom. The Jessie arrived at Mazagan on the 27th Dec. 1873, and anchored in the roadstead. On the night of the 31st a gale sprung up, and the Jessie lost her starboard anchor, but was otherwise not materially damaged. On the 1st Jan. 1874, the captain made a protest of the fact, and on the 3rd the loading of the vessel commenced. On the 9th Jan. the captain wrote to his owners a letter that was received on the 21st Jan., and this was the only communication they received from the captain. This letter was lost. Plaintiff swore that no mention had been made in it of the loss of the anchor, although the captain did say that the weather had been boisterous. This letter was not communicated to the underwriters. The loss of the anchor and cable, it was admitted, would be a material fact, but the question was whether the plaintiff could be said to have concealed a thing not within his knowledge. The ship was subsequently lost, and this action brought to recover for such loss. The defendants disputed their liability on the ground that the plaintiff had concealed from them the loss of the anchor, which was a material fact.

Russell, Q.C. and French, for the defendants.—It is clear from the case of Fitzherbert v. Mather (1 T. Rep. 12), that if the captain does not disclose a material fact, the owner must be held not to have disclosed it. In his judgment Lord Mansfield says: "Now whether this happened by fraud or negligence (of the agent) it makes no difference, for in either case the policy is void." But the present case is much stronger than that, for there "the agent acted honestly when he wrote the letter" (see 1 Term Rep. 15), but here the captain, writing on the 9th, deliberately suppresses any mention of the cable and anchor. [BLACKBURN, J.—You are not entitled to say deliberately.] At all events he considered it of so much importance that he made a protest on the subject on the 1st Jan. Again, the case of Proudfoot v. Montefiore (L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 511; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 572) recognises the same principle. There Cockburn, C.J., quoting Buller, J., says: "It is the common question every day at Guildhall, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the fraud or negligence of a third, which of the two gave credit. Here it appears that the plaintiff trusted Thomas (the agent), and he must, therefore, take the consequences." And, further on, he says: "If an agent, whose duty it is, in the ordinary course of business, to communicate information to his principal as to the state of a ship and cargo, omits to discharge such duty, and the owner, in the absence of any information as to any fact material to be communicated to the underwriter, effects an insurance, such insurance will be void, on the ground of concealment or misrepresentation." The case of Gladstone v. King (1 M. & S. 35), is also in point. There the master of a ship had omitted to communicate to his owners the fact of the ship having been driven on a rock, and they, in ignorance of the accident, had effected an insurance. It was held that the captain was bound to communicate the fact, and, for want of such communication, the antecedent damage was an implied exception from the insurance. [BLACKBURN, J.—That only amounts to this, that plaintiffs cannot recover the value of the anchor. In both Proudfoot v. Montefiore, and Gladstone v. King, the information was intentionally kept back.] The cases were not decided on that ground, and in Fitzherbert v. Mather (ubi sup.), Lord Mansfield expressly says, "it makes no difference whether this happened by fraud or negligence." [LUSH, J.—In Proudfoot v. Montefiore there was fraud as a fact.] No doubt, but the judgment does not proceed on that ground. Duer, in commenting on these cases (Duer on Insurance, vol. II., p. 420), says, "it certainly appears that the weight of authority is greatly in favour of the doctrine that the omission of an agent, whether proceeding from fraud or neglect, to give intelligence of a loss which he is bound to communicate, may operate as a fatal concealment." Again, "the concealment by an agent of material facts which he is bound to communicate, is alone sufficient to avoid the insurance, which it alone enabled his principle to procure. It is the wrongful act, or omission of the person, whom he trusted and employed." In the present case, then, as a material fact known to his agent has been concealed by the owner, the verdict should be entered for the defendants.

Aspland (with him Day, Q.C. and Benjamin, Q.C.), was proceeding to argue this point when he was stopped by the court.

BLACKBURN, J.—On the first point it certainly would be very difficult for us to say that the verdict should be entered for the defendants. Mr. Russell says that the captain of the vessel was aware that she had lost an anchor and cable, and did not communicate that fact to the plaintiff, and upon this bare statement he argues that the judgment should be entered for the defendant—that as policy was "at and from" Mazagan, the loss of the anchor and the boisterous weather were material facts, and they must be held to be known to the plaintiff under the rule laid down in Proudfoot v. Montefiore, and Fitzherbert v. Mather. These two cases, however, only go so far as to say that where the agent with a view to enable his principal to insure, conceals a material fact, then the policy is avoided; but whether gross negligence on the agents' part would do it they don't say. In Gladstone v. King (ubi sup.), where the intention was not to enable the owner to insure, it was held that the policy was not avoided, but only that there was an exception out of the policy. I cannot think that every concealment by a captain, of however slight a matter, would prevent an owner effecting a good insurance. I should much prefer the doctrine laid down in Phillips on Insurance (vol. 1, p. 299 s. 564, 5th edit.), that where the concealment is fraudulent then the policy is avoided. We cannot, therefore, enter a verdict for the defendant.

LUSH, J.—The first question we have to dispose of is a most important one, and one on which we have had no case in this country to guide us. It is evident that the ship did not suffer from the loss of her anchor so as to affect the risk, as she must have had another before sailing homeward. She subsequently sailed, and was lost; are we to say that the underwriters are not responsible for the total loss because of the omission to make known the fact of the loss of the anchor? That decision would be so startling that I shrink from it. It would be obviously unjust to make the underwriter liable for the anchor, but it would be equally unjust that he should not be liable for the total loss. Where a master of a ship, or other responsible agent, wilfully withholds any information, or by culpable negligence withholds any material fact, it is quite right to hold the owner to be so far identified with his agent as to forfeit the policy. In Fitzherbert v. Mather and in Proudfoot v. Montefiore there was a total loss in each case, and the agent had wilfully withheld information from the owner to enable him to insure. But in Gladstone v. King the decision was only as to a partial loss. The owner sought to make the underwriter liable for damage which had been done to the ship before the policy was effected, and the court held that quoad that damage the policy was void; but not so with regard to the whole risk. In this case the underwriter is not responsible for the cable and anchor, but the loss of the cable had nothing to do with the loss of the ship, and that loss is the one both parties contemplated when the insurance was entered into. Following the decision in Gladstone v. King the policy here remains good, as there has been no fraudulent or wilful concealment of a material fact.

QUAIN, J. concurred. Motion refused.

A rule nisi had also been obtained to show cause why there should not be a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and also that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, which was made absolute on both grounds.

COMMON PLEAS DIVISION.

Lewis v. Gray.

Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, secs. 12, 13, 14)—Detention of ship by Board of Trade—Board of Trade—Ship and shipping.

It is not necessary that the complaint made to the Board of Trade, as to the condition of a ship under sect. 12 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), should state that the ship "cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life," but it is sufficient if by reasonable inference it can be ascertained from the wording of the complaint that this in fact is the case. Neither is it necessary that the report made upon a survey ordered by the Board should so state, but it is sufficient if it can be ascertained by reasonable inference therefrom that this is in fact the case.

Semble.—If the first survey held by the Board under this Act is unsatisfactory or insufficient a second survey may be held.

Semble, also, that the Board cannot upon an order for the detention of a ship for the purpose of holding a survey, justify a detention beyond what is reasonably necessary for that purpose.

This was an action brought to recover damages from the Board of Trade by reason of the detention by the officials of the Board of the plaintiff's vessel. It had been agreed (before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1875, which has a provision to that effect) that the principal secretary (Mr. Gray) of the Board should represent the Board, and be sued in the action as a nominal defendant.

In November 1873, the plaintiff's vessel the Mary Ann arrived at Hull with barley from St. Malo.

On the 7th Nov. 1873, the Board of Trade received the following letter relative to the plaintiff's vessel from their surveyor at Hull:

Board of Trade Surveyor's Office, Customs House, Hull, 6/11/73.

Sir,—Mr. McKenzie having called my attention to the brigantine Mary Ann, of Maldon, official No. 2817, we have examined her lights, &c., and from the defective state of her decks, and the general appearance of the vessel, I am of opinion that she should be examined with the cargo out before being allowed to proceed to sea. She is at present loaded with grain which she is about to discharge.

From the Mercantile Navy List it appears that this vessel was built at Walker's Northumberland, in 1831.

The Board in reply ordered the vessel to be detained for the purposes of survey, and on the same day wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

7th Nov. 1873.

Sir,—I am directed by the Board of Trade to inform you that they have reason to believe that the British ship named at the foot hereof now or recently lying at the place named is, for the reasons stated, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. The Board of Trade have, therefore, ordered her detention by the proper authority, until she can be surveyed. . . . A copy of the surveyor's report will be sent you on the completion of the survey. Your obedient servant,

(Signed) Thomas Gray.

The owner or master of the Mary Ann, of Maldon.

Ship Referred to in the above Letter.

Name and Port of Registry.	Where Lying.	Here insert whether by reason (1) of the defective condition of her hull, equipments, or machinery, or (2) of overloading, or (3) of improper loading.
Mary Ann, of Maldon.		Hull, &c.

On the 12th Nov. 1873, the surveyors appointed by the Board of Trade inspected the vessel and reported as follows to the Board:

Sir,—I have the honour to report that we have examined the vessel to-day, and find that thorough repair will be required to render her seaworthy. The decks are quite worn out, the deck beams and knees are defective, and the timbers, where we had the ceiling removed, are found to be rotten.

As the vessel belongs to Sunderland the owner wishes to take her there for repairs, and we see no objection to her being towed there for that purpose.

The plaintiff, on the same day, the 12th Nov. 1873, telegraphed to the defendant asking him to allow the Mary Ann to proceed to Sunderland in ballast and be repaired there, according to the report. On the 15th Nov. the defendant wrote to the plaintiff the following letter, enclosing a copy of the above-mentioned report:

Sir,—I am directed by the Board of Trade to inclose for your information the accompanying copy of a report of the survey of the Mary Ann, of Maldon, and to state that they are prepared to allow her to be towed round to Sunderland for the necessary repairs provided she starts early on a fine morning, and that the crew knowing the case are willing to go in her. Upon hearing from you that the repairs indicated in the accompanying report have been sufficiently and completely carried out they will direct a re-survey of the vessel to be made, and will inform you of the result. All expenses will have to be defrayed prior to the vessel leaving Hull.

(Signed) Thomas Gray.

On the 14th Nov. 1873, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant the following letter:

Sir,—I take the liberty in writing you respecting my vessel the Mary Ann. The captain sent you a telegram to be allowed to proceed to Sunderland in ballast to have the necessary repairs done as ordered by your surveyors. Being a stranger here I cannot get the credit I require here, as I can at my place of residence, Sunderland. The ship loaded a cargo of barley at St. Malo, and we have discharged it here, and had not a single bushel damaged, as such I trust you will grant permission for her to proceed.

On the 9th Dec. 1873, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant the following letter:

Sir,—Since my return from Hull, in which port the above-named ship now lies, I regret that my circumstances compel me to request of your Board of Trade to allow me to sail the ship in ballast about sixteen or eighteen hours sailing from there to here to have the repairs done in accordance with your survey. The Mary Ann recently had heavy repairs to her hull, a new keel, and in ballast makes no water, or if any, only a few inches when in dock, and has delivered 900 quarters of wheat without a bushel of it being damaged by water, bringing it 600 miles, during the voyage, by the log book, encountering severe gales until she reached Hull. I believe if you can or will take this into consideration when I inform you I cannot afford to have her towed down under your restrictions as stated in yours of the 15th Nov., viz., "that you are prepared to allow her to be towed round to Sunderland for the necessary repairs provided she starts early on a fine morning, and that the crew are willing to go in her"—had her deck proved faulty in discharging her cargo. I think at present she would not wet half a ton of her ballast. She was built near Sunderland, &c. I now leave it to your consideration to decide this my application.

On the 17th, the defendant replied as follows:

Sir,—I am to inform you that the Board are unable to depart from the conditions laid down in their letter of the 15th ulto.

On the 29th Dec. 1873, the solicitors to the plaintiff (Messrs. Oliver and Botterill of Hull) wrote to the Board of Trade on behalf of their client, the plaintiff.

On the 1st Jan. 1874, the defendant or the Board of Trade telegraphed to Messrs. Oliver and Botterill, the plaintiff's solicitors, as follows:

The Board of Trade will allow the Mary Ann to sail to Sunderland on certain conditions, which will be sent to you by post.

On the same day, the 1st Jan., the following letter was sent by the Board to the plaintiff containing as will be seen, the conditions referred to in the telegram.

Unseaworthiness.

Gentlemen,—In reply to your letter of the 29th, in which you request that the Mary Ann, of Maldon, may be permitted to sail from Hull to Sunderland instead of being towed to the latter port, I am requested to state that this Board will accede to your request on the condition that both master and owner sail in her; that she carries a boat fitted after the manner of a life-boat to the satisfaction of this Board's surveyor; that she proceeds direct to Sunderland, and that a bond with two sureties in the sum of 200*l*., conditioned as above, be handed to the collector of customs at Sunderland before the vessel starts.

To this Messrs. Oliver and Botterill replied, repudiating the right of the Board to impose conditions, and stating that the plaintiff claimed damages for the detention of his vessel.

On the 7th Jan. 1874, the defendant wrote to Messrs. Oliver and Botterell setting out his view of the facts, and then continuing as follows:

The Board of Trade could only accept and act on the report which stated that the decks were quite worn out, and that where the ceiling was removed the surveyor found timbers to be rotten, as a report showing that the ship was unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. . . . The fact remains that the ship is detained, that a partial survey only has been held on her, and the negotiations with the owner for removing her to Sunderland have fallen through. The Board of Trade now withdraw the modification of their order by which she could have been allowed to proceed to Sunderland, and under the powers given by the Act they vary their orders as follows viz.: that as in their opinion the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life she shall be detained at Hull for further survey and repairs.

(Signed) Thomas Gray.

The plaintiff's solicitors then write and protest. The surveyors of the Board of Trade in spite of the protests of the plaintiff then survey the vessel, and on the 14th Jan. report to the Board as follows:

It is very evident from what we saw during our survey that for a long time this vessel has been in a very unsatisfactory condition. There was scarcely a crevice in the ceiling, pump, well, or chain locker, but that was crammed or covered with pieces of old sail cloth to prevent the corn from getting between the timbers and into the timbers. . . . We find that many of the rough trees are rotten . . . the deck is much worn in some places, it is not much more than one inch thick, in fact it is quite done for, the oakum is generally through the seams, the port knight head is rotten . . . there are indications of considerable leakage . . . We are unable to ascertain the extent of the decay on board this vessel, but from what we have seen and tested we are of opinion that at the time of survey this ship was, having regard to the nature of the service for which she was intended, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life.

This report was sent to the plaintiff by the Board of Trade accompanied with the following:

The order made by this Board thereon is that the vessel be detained at Hull until repaired to the satisfaction of this Board's surveyors.

The plaintiff, after several further letters had passed, instituted the present proceedings:

As nothing turned upon the form of the declaration or of the pleas it is unnecessary to set them out here.

The action was tried before Brett, J., in Middlesex, at the sittings after Hilary term 1875, who directed a verdict to be taken for the plaintiff for the damages claimed in the declaration, giving to the defendant leave to move to enter the verdict for him, or to reduce the damages to whatever amount the court should direct.

The case depended mainly on the construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873.

Sect. 12 of that Act is as follows:

Where the Board of Trade have received a complaint, or have reason to believe, that any British ship is by reason of the defective condition of her hull equipments or machinery, or by reason of overloading, or improper loading unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, they may if they think fit appoint some competent person or persons to survey such ship and the equipments, machinery and cargo thereof, and to report thereon to the Board . . . The Board of Trade may if they think fit order that any ship be detained for the purpose of being surveyed under the section, and thereupon any officer of customs may detain such ship until her release be ordered either by the Board of Trade or by any court to which an appeal is given under this Act.

Upon the receipt of the report of the person making any such survey, the Board may, if in their opinion the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, make such further order as they may think requisite as to the detention of the ship or as to her release, either absolutely or upon the performance of such conditions with respect to the execution of repairs and alterations, or the unloading or reloading of cargo, as the Board may impose. They may also from time to time vary, or add to, such order.

A copy of any such order and of the report upon which it was founded, and also of any variation of or addition to such order shall be delivered as soon as possible to the owner or master of the ship to which it relates . . .

Sect. 13, inter alia, provides that

If upon such survey the ship is not reported to have been unfit to proceed to sea, having regard to the nature of the service for which she was intended, the Board of Trade shall be liable to pay compensation to any person for any loss or damage which he may have sustained by reason of the detention of the ship for the purpose of survey, or otherwise in respect of such survey.

Sect. 14 provides that

If the owner of any ship surveyed under this Act is dissatisfied with any order of the Board of Trade made upon such survey, he may apply to any of the followin g courts having jurisdiction in the place where such shi p was surveyed, that is to say: In England to any court having Admiralty jurisdiction. In Ireland, &c. In Scotland, &c. The court may upon such application, if they think fit appoint one or more competent persons to survey the ship anew . . . The court to which such application is made may make such order as to the detention or release of the ship, as to the payment of any costs or damages which may have been occasioned by her detention, &c., as to the court may seem just . . .

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.), having moved for and obtained a rule nisi in the terms of the leave reserved.

C. Lanyon now showed cause.—The object of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 is the protection of human life not the preservation of cargo. As to the first survey, the board had no jurisdiction to make it, because they had received no complaint stating that the vessel was unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, neither could they have any ground for believing that there was such danger, as when they ordered the survey they had received nothing but the letter from the surveyor of the 6th Nov. 1873. Next, even if they had jurisdiction to order a survey, the survey resulted in a report of the 12th Nov., which does not state or show that the ship could not proceed to sea without serious damage to human life; it stated nothing more than that she was "unseaworthy," which means unfit to carry cargo. Therefore, the report, if it was a report made upon a proper survey, justified no further detention of the ship. If the survey was, either because not founded on a sufficient complaint, or for any other reason a bad survey, then it follows that the report consequent on it would be a bad report. If the report affords no justification for the detention the plaintiff is entitled to damages. It cannot be that the board can justify under sect. 12, sub-sect. 4, and say that there was no survey then made, for that sub-section must give a right only to detain for a reasonable time, and really for the purpose of having a survey made. As to the last report that was correct in point of form, but made, it is submitted, when the board was functus officio, either because they had already exhausted their powers, or because the reasonable time had elapsed. The board have no power to make two surveys, and have two reports, therefore they cannot justify the earlier detention under the earlier report, and the later detention under the later report. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Why should not the plaintiff have appealed under sect. 14? If he could have appealed, may it not be that he was bound to do so?] Because, as to the first order, it was not made "upon such survey;" it was made on an improper survey. The plaintiff's case is that no order was ever made, so that from that point of view there is nothing to appeal from. The words of the section giving the appeal are "he may apply," not "he must apply." In the case of a void act the party is not bound to appeal; although an appeal is given him he may treat the act as a nullity:

Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw, 10 Q. B. 880; 18 L. J. 89, Mag. Cas.;
Pedley v. Davis, 10 C. B., N. S., 492; 30 L. J. 379. C. P.

It is admitted by the board that on the first occasion only a partial survey was made, and it does not appear from the report that they had arrived at the conclusion that there was serious peril to life. The order made on the first survey and report was bad, there was no power to send the ship to Sunderland under certain conditions, there was no power to impose any condition, and the board have exceeded their powers, powers given in derogation of common law rights, and the plaintiff is by the words of the statute entitled to compensation. Summing up my points, they are these:—The complaint contained no information to justify the board in taking action; supposing the complaint did justify the board in taking action upon it, the survey then held was not in accordance with the provisions of the Act; even if the survey was properly held, it did not entitle the board to make an order for the detention of the ship; even if everything was correctly done up to the order, the order made upon the first survey was itself bad; and, lastly, they had no right to make any second survey.

The Attorney-General (with him Aspinall, Q.C., Herschel, Q.C., and Beasley).—The Board of Trade have by statute a duty imposed upon them to interfere for the protection of human life, when they have received a complaint, or have reason to believe that any British vessel, is, by reason of the defective condition of the hull, &c., unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—You need not argue the question of the sufficiency of their surveyor's letter to set them in motion; we are satisfied that the letter gave them reason to believe that there was danger to life.] That being so, it was the duty of the board to appoint competent persons to survey the ship. Then we come to the 3rd paragraph of the section, which provides that the board may order the detention of the ship for the purpose of being surveyed and thereupon any officer may detain such ship until her release be ordered. Here they did order the ship to be detained, and her release never has been ordered, either by the board, or by the court to which, by the provisions of the Act, the plaintiff might have gone if he objected to the action of the board. The order for the detention is still standing, and affords a justification. If it is necessary to go further, I can do so; the section goes on: "Upon the receipt of the report of the person making any such survey the board may, if in their opinion the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, make such further order as they may think fit as to the detention of the ship, as to her release either absolutely or upon the performance of such conditions with respect to the execution of repairs or alterations as the unloading or reloading of cargo as the board may impose. They may from time to time vary or add to such order." [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Is it not that they can detain only for a particular purpose?] No limit is put by the Act on the detention; the order stands until the ship is released. If the board acts unreasonably, there is an appeal given, but if a man does not appeal, but leaves the order to stand, the fault lies in him. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Surely, when the purpose of the detention for a survey has been satisfied by the holding of a survey, the order for detention is gone.] The officer who detained would have no authority to give up the ship. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Perhaps that might justify the officer, but afford no justification to the board, assuming that an action can lie against the board.] If the Board of Trade have acted wrongly in detaining the ship upon the order first made for detention, the plaintiff could have gone to the Court of Appeal created by the Act. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I doubt that the only appeal is from an order founded on a survey, and this would be a detention preliminary to the survey.] I have thought the point worthy of your Lordship's consideration, but as it is unnecessary in the present case to insist upon it, I will pass to the other branch of the section; first premising that it is competent for the board to add to and vary their orders, so that the ordering of two or more surveys seems perfectly legitimate; there is nothing that says that a survey once made is made once for all and for ever. The section goes on: "Upon the receipt of the report of the person making any such survey, the board may, if in their opinion the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life," make such further order as they may think requisite as to the detention of the ship, &c., so that the board are to act on their own opinion after they have received a report. Now, upon the facts, all the correspondence after the letter of the 7th Nov. formed a negotiation between the board and the owner of the ship, which came to an end about the 7th Jan., and then the board said, we will detain your ship, and upon that an order was made. There is another point of view in which the case may be looked at, and that is that the letter of Nov. 15 was an order. Then it is said that the board had no power to have the ship surveyed twice; but if a ship is legally detained, and there is a survey which, on the face of it, is only partial, and the detainer is never taken off, and in consequence of the request or representations of the owner a second and fuller survey is made, what is there to render this second survey illegal, or to allow the owner to find fault with the board for having done that which he invited them to do? [The Attorney-General was then stopped.]

Lord Coleridge, C.J.—This is an action brought by Mr. Lewis against Mr. Gray, who by agreement stands in the position of the Board of Trade, for damages said to have occurred to him in consequence of the board having detained his ship when not warranted in so doing. This case raises, I believe for the first time, the important question as to the true construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. 85).

Now several points have been taken in this case which are not necessary to be decided, and for my part, as at present advised (and I say no more than as at present advised) I am inclined to think that the wrong remedy has been pursued. I admit that there is a great deal to be said on both sides, and it is quite possible that on further consideration I might alter my mind upon it. I only say then that as my present impression stands the wrong remedy has been pursued.

The plaintiff was the owner of a merchant ship which traded between the French coast and the east coast of England, and, on the last voyage before these proceedings, had arrived in Hull from St. Malo with a cargo of grain. The Board of Trade then received from their own surveyor at Hull a notice, which, we are all of opinion, coming as it did from their surveyor, was sufficient to set them in motion under the Act of Parliament. It was sufficient to induce the board reasonably to believe that the ship was unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. The board thereupon ordered in the first instance the detention of the vessel for the purpose of being surveyed, and that they had power to do. The ship was so detained; so far the board acted clearly within their authority. The fact of the detention of the ship is notified to the owner by the letter of 7th Nov., and in it the Board of Trade inform him that they have reason to believe that his ship is unfit, for the reasons stated, to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. The board, therefore, order her detention until she shall be surveyed. On the 12th of Nov. the surveyors appointed survey the ship, and report as follows: [His Lordship read the report.] That report is communicated by the board to the owner. Now, the next document is a telegram which is followed by a letter substantially the same as the telegram. It is a telegram from the owner of the ship to the board asking that the ship may be allowed to go to Sunderland for repairs. Upon that the letter of the 15th Nov., upon which so much stress has been laid, was written to the owner. It is as follows: [His Lordship read the letter.] Now in continuing the summary of the facts it is not necessary to read the whole of the somewhat voluminous correspondence. I think, and indeed we all think, that the view presented by the Attorney General of that correspondence, as a whole, is correct. That is, that negotiations took place between the parties as to when, and where, and under what circumstances, the repairs required by the board to be executed should be executed. I think it correct to state that from the 15th Nov. there was a negotiation going on. In the result the Board of Trade sum up in a letter the whole case. They say, I think, in substance, "There is a duty cast upon us by Act of Parliament to prevent ships going to sea in such a state as to imperil human life; upon the 12th Nov. we had a report which justified us in our view, and you in fact agreed that certain necessary repairs should be done; we then got into correspondence and could not agree upon some minor points, and that matter fell through, you persisting that your ship was an extremely good one, and that the survey was a partial survey. Be it so, we said; whether we gave an order on the 15th or not we will not now seek to inquire; our duty is to prevent a ship going to sea which cannot go without imperilling human life; and as we cannot agree as to the terms on which she is to go to Sunderland, we will, as a final conclusion of the correspondence, order that, as in our opinion the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious peril to human life, she shall be detained at Hull for further survey and repairs." Now that is the letter of the 7th Jan. On the 14th there is a survey, and an order made afterwards upon that survey, against which, in point of form, Mr. Lanyon has nothing to urge.

These being the facts, we have to consider whether the board have acted in a manner justified by the Act of Parliament. It is an Act which creates a duty in the Board of Trade. The first duty of the board under this Act is, if they are satisfied that human life is in danger, to endeavour to protect it, so far as the statute gives them power to interfere. I am of opinion that in taking into account that which is ground for believing that a British ship cannot go to sea without serious danger to human life, it is by no means necessary that the complaint, or report, or letter, upon which the Board of Trade proceed should contain these words; it is sufficient if to ordinary men it conveys the idea that the ship is unfit to go to sea without serious peril to human life.

It has been suggested that there can but be one survey, that there must be one survey, and one only, and that the Board of Trade cannot supplement any imperfect or incorrect details. I think it would be utterly unreasonable to construe this Act of Parliament in any such way.

Then it is said that the report must in actual terms find that the ship is unfit to go to sea without danger to human life. Now I find nothing in the Act requiring this. The fair meaning of the Act of Parliament is this, that if by a fair and reasonable inference it can be derived from the report, that the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, the Board of Trade may, if they act bonâ fide, draw the inference and stop the ship.

I therefore come to the conclusion that the Board had upon the 12th Nov. received a report, which would quite warrant them in thinking that the ship could not proceed to sea without serious danger to human life.

The question then is, what in point of fact was the course adopted by the board? I am inclined to think that the letter of the 15th of Nov. was an order, but I do not think it is necessary to decide that question, because whether the letter of the 15th Nov. was an order or not, the letter of the 7th Jan. undoubtedly was an order, as it seems to me, and was an order which, for the reasons I have given, the board were perfectly competent to make. I think, therefore, that the board have acted well within their powers.

It is perhaps not necessary to say more, but I will add that, as at present advised, as the matter has been raised (though I quite feel that there are certain difficulties in the way of the opinion that I have formed by reason of the wording of the 4th sub-section) I do not assent to the interpretation suggested by the Attorney General of the 4th sub-section. I think the 4th sub-section must be confined to the object of the act, and that the board, having detained a ship for the purpose of being surveyed, cannot detain ad infinitum a ship originally detained merely for a survey. They cannot detain her after the purpose has been satisfied by a proper survey. This point, however, was not fully argued, as the learned Attorney-General, having a strong case on other grounds, did not think it necessary to press this upon us.

This is no doubt a very important matter to private persons. It is also a very important matter to the public, and I think we should not discharge our duty if we allowed it to be supposed that objection of a technical kind, or of a formal nature, can prevail when the power entrusted to the Board of Trade has been substantially well and properly used.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

I think that on the 7th Nov. a valid order was made by the Board of Trade, and that that order was in fact the order under which the vessel was detained. The statute enables the board when they have reason to believe that any British ship is by reason of the defective condition of her hull, or for other reasons, unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, to appoint a surveyor to survey such ship, and to order, if they think fit, that such ship shall be detained for the purpose of being surveyed, and, thereupon any officer of customs may detain such ship until her release be ordered, either by the board, or by any court to which an appeal is given by the Act. The Act goes on to enact that upon receipt of the surveyor's report, the board may, if in their opinion the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, make such further order as they may think requisite as to the detention of the ship or as to her release. The letter from Mr. Spear was ample justification for the holding by the Board of Trade of the opinion that this vessel could not proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. On the 7th Nov., acting upon their opinion, the Board write to the owner and inform him that they have reason to believe that the ship cannot proceed to sea without serious danger to human life, and that they have ordered her detention for the purpose of holding a survey. On the 12th a survey is made, and a report is made by the surveyors.

It is contended that this report was insufficient. Now what is the report? [His Lordship read it.] Looking to the very purpose for which the survey and the report were made, I think the report sufficiently shows that the ship was unfit to proceed to sea, and could not do so without serious danger to human life. Reports of this kind are not to be construed like special demurrers of former days, but sensibly and by the light of practical understanding. On the 15th Nov. the Board gave a notice in a letter to the plaintiff, which has been treated as an order, and to a certain extent it was so regarded by the plaintiff himself; but for myself I do not regard it as an order; it was, I think, rather a letter written in anticipation of an order which might at any moment be made. That letter is thoroughly informal, and contains terms which are of the character of a negotiation rather than of an order. I put upon it this construction, that it comes to this, "If you choose to come to our terms, we will make an order to such and such an effect." Then a negotiation takes place, and on the 7th Jan. a final order is made that the ship should be detained and a full survey made. I can find nothing to render that further and fuller survey illegal or improper. It is made, and it proves that the ship is in fact unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life.

LINDLEY, J.—I am of the same opinion.

I agree with Mr. Lanyon that the duty of the Board under this statute is to protect human life and not to see after cargoes. I do not think any one denies that a ship may be unseaworthy as to a particular cargo, or for a particular voyage, and yet fit to go to sea without danger to life. But with the rest of his argument I cannot agree. I think his criticism upon the form of complaint, and of the first survey, without warrant. I apprehend that it is sufficient if a report show upon the face of it by reasonable inference that the ship is unfit to proceed to sea without serious danger to human life. That being so, I am unable to see that the board have in any respect exceeded their powers. Now with reference to the question of whether the letter of the 15th Nov. is to be considered as an order or not, I am inclined to think it was not. I think it was part of the correspondence. Let us test it in this way. Supposing an appeal under the Act had been brought against that letter, it seems very doubtful whether such an appeal could be sustained. The answer would be, it is not an order against which an appeal lies. From the correspondence it is plain there was no unreasonable delay, the plaintiff has no one but himself to blame for the delay that took place.

With reference to the question raised by the Attorney-General as to the 4th clause of sect. 12, namely, that the short answer to their question would be to rely upon the words, "And thereupon any officer of the customs may detain such ship until her release be ordered either by the Board of Trade, or by any court to which the Act gives an appeal," I am of opinion that the construction he suggested is erroneous. I think the true construction is tolerably plain, if the whole of the words are looked at, and the whole of the language of the clauses. The power conferred by that clause is this, that the Board of Trade may order that any ship shall be detained for the purpose of being surveyed; then the language is changed, and, as I apprehend, not without reason. It is not the board may detain such ship, but that any officer of the customs may detain until, &c. It appears unreasonable to say that because the Board has power to detain for the purpose of holding a survey, they may detain as long as they please.

Upon the question whether this is a case in which an action will lie in this court for wrongful detention, it follows at once that if the board is not acting without jurisdiction no action can lie; but supposing all they did was in excess of jurisdiction, the common law remedy by action is not taken away, and though the plaintiff might have applied to the Appeal Court, he was not bound to do so. That point, however, does not arise in this case, nor is there any question for us as to whether a petition of right, or action against the board, is the proper form of proceeding.

DENMAN, J.—I expressed no opinion on any matters which I thought were not in question in this case, but it must not be supposed that I refrained because of any dissent from the opinions of the rest of the court.

ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE CAROLINA.

Seaman's wages—Wages earned after suit commenced—Right to and mode of recovery.

A seaman who commences a suit in rem for the recovery of his wages cannot have a decree for wages or subsistence money after the date of the commencement of his suit, although he is retained in the service of the ship by the master; but he will be entitled to an allowance in the way of costs for detention and subsistence money from the date of the institution of the suit to the date of decree.

THIS was a motion in objection to the registrar's report made in a cause of wages instituted on behalf of the first and second mates and a seaman of the American ship Carolina.

The plaintiffs had been engaged to serve on board the Carolina, on a voyage from Grimsby to Cardiff, and thence to Buenos Ayres; but whilst the ship was at Cardiff she was arrested in a cause of necessaries, and no appearance being entered on behalf of her owners or any other persons, the master dismissed the remainder of the crew, but retained the plaintiffs on board until he could have an opportunity of hearing from his owners, and they remained on board until 2nd Sept. 1875, when the master, without dismissing them, told them to board themselves ashore, as he had no credit, and could not provide them with food. They did so, remaining, however, on board the ship at other times and in her service until she was sold after the decree (2nd Nov. 1875). On 5th Sept. 1875 the plaintiffs instituted a cause of wages against the ship, and no appearance having been entered their petition was filed on 12th Oct., and a decree was obtained on 2nd Nov., 1875, pronouncing for the claims. The petition claimed wages and subsistence money up to the date of the decree, and the whole question of the amount due was referred to the registrar, who reported that the plaintiffs were entitled to their wages and subsistence money up to the date of the commencement of the suit, but disallowed all wages, &c., subsequent to that date. To this report the plaintiffs now objected.

W. G. F. Phillimore, in support of the objection.—The question is whether wages and subsistence money should be given up to Nov. 2 or only to Sept. 5. [THE REGISTRAR.—The claim from Sept 5 to Nov. 2 was disallowed, because it has always been the practice in the registry to give subsistence money and compensation for detention from the date of the institution of the suit in the way of costs; and because plaintiffs in wages suits cannot get wages for a period after they have left the service of the ship, which they practically do before instituting their suit.] There is no reason why a servant should not continue in a person's service, and yet sue that person for his wages; the commencement of the action does not terminate the contract of service. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Practically, however, the commencement of an action would operate as the termination of the contract.] Here, however, the plaintiffs actually remained on board and in the service of the ship after the institution of the suit, and did not terminate their contract. They remained in the service of the ship until she was sold. It is constantly the practice to allow wages to foreign seamen after the institution of their suit when they are sent home from this country: Williams and Bruce, Admiralty Pratice, p. 165. On taxation of costs the plaintiffs would not get the same amount as they would for wages.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I should be loth to alter the established practice of the court, which unquestionably does exist, without some very strong authority being shown to me. The practice of the registry in this respect is founded upon the principle that when a seaman institutes a suit for wages he ceases to have any claim for subsequent wages upon the ship, and that principle has been acted upon in a great variety of cases. It is said that there is a great hardship in the mariner being left without any claim for support after he has left the ship, in the interval between the institution of the suit and the hearing of the cause. But, substantially, he would receive a sum of money for his maintenance and detention when the question of costs came to be decided. It is said that these men stayed on board after the institution of the suit, and at the request of the master. Those are circumstances to be brought before the taxing officer, and I should surmise that the registrar would pay considerable attention to an affidavit with regard to the employment of seamen on board the vessel after the institution of the suit. There would be a ground of appeal if it were not given due weight to, and a proper allowance not made to the seamen. I decline to vary the registrar's report, as such a variation as that asked for would be a subversion of the practice of the court, which has existed for a very long period.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT WESTMINSTER.

Reported by W. Appleton, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, Feb. 2, 1876.

(Before the Lord Chancellor, Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Mellish, L.J.)

Hickox and another v. Adams and another.

Contract for sale of goods—Cost, freight, and insurance—Construction of—Policy of insurance—Delivery of to vendee—"Memorandum Articles."

The plaintiffs, at New York, contracted to sell and deliver 1000 quarters of wheat to the defendants at Bristol, upon the terms, "cost, freight, and insurance." Through a mistake the plaintiffs shipped, by a sailing vessel, a cargo of 2000 quarters of wheat to K. at Bristol. They also forwarded to K. by steamer a bill of lading and a policy of insurance of the whole cargo of wheat shipped. This policy was "free from particular average."

K., at the request of the plaintiffs, accepted a bill of exchange drawn upon him by them for the price of the 2000 quarters. The defendants afterwards refused to accept the 1000 quarters from K.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Division), that in an action against the defendants for breach of a contract to accept the 1000 quarters, the plaintiffs were not "ready and willing" to deliver the 1000 quarters to the defendants within the terms of their contract.

Appeal from Exchequer Division.

The action was brought to recover damages for breach of a contract by the defendants to accept goods which the plaintiffs alleged they had sold and were ready and willing to deliver to the defendants.

The first count of the plaintiffs' declaration was, "for that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants that the plaintiffs should sell and deliver to the defendants, and the defendants should buy and accept from the plaintiffs, 1000 quarters Millwaukie wheat, at the price of 2*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* per quarter; the said price for the said goods to be paid by the defendants' acceptance of the plaintiffs' bill of exchange for the price thereof, payable to the plaintiffs or order at sixty days."

Averment of fulfilment of conditions precedent.

Breach, that the defendants "did not nor would accept the said goods or any of them, and did not nor would pay the plaintiffs for the same goods by accepting the said bill of exchange as aforesaid, whereby," &c.

The second count set out an agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants that "the plaintiffs should sell to the defendants, and the defendants should buy from the plaintiffs, 1000 quarters Millwaukie wheat, at the price of 2*l.* 13*s* 6*d.* per quarter, upon the terms that the plaintiffs should deliver the said goods to the defendants, and the defendants should accept and pay for the same."

Averment of fulfilment of conditions precedent.

Breach: That the defendants would not accept the said goods from the plaintiffs, nor pay them for the same, whereby, &c.

There were also the usual money counts.

Pleas: 1. To the first and second counts of the declaration, denial of agreements as alleged. 2. As to the said first two counts, that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to deliver the said goods as alleged. 3. A denial of the breaches alleged. 4. Rescission of the contracts set out by the declaration. 5. To the money counts never indebted.

Issue was taken by the plaintiffs on these pleas.

The action was tried at the Bristol Spring Assizes in 1875, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff for the damages, 3000*l.*, claimed by the declaration, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, or nonsuit, or to reduce the damages. The court to have power to draw inferences of fact.

The following were the material facts given in evidence at the trial:

On the 22nd May 1874, the plaintiffs, Messrs. Hughes, Hickox, and Co., who are large commission merchants at New York, sent a cable message to the defendants, Messrs. Henery, Adams, and Co., who carry on their business at Gloucester, offering them a load (about 1000 quarters) of Millwaukie wheat, at 53*s.* 6*d.* per quarter. The plaintiffs also sent, at the same time, a cable message to Messrs. Kruger and Co., of Bristol, with whom they had been accustomed to do business largely, offering them two loads or 2000 quarters of the same wheat at "53*s.* 3*d.* per quarter, in bags direct to Bristol. C. F. I." (i.e., cost, freight, and insurance). The defendants in reply to the message they had received from the plaintiffs, sent back a reply, which was simply, "To Hickox, New York, accept," the sender's name being omitted in order to save expense.

The plaintiffs assumed that this reply came from Kruger and C., and they accordingly shipped the wheat by sailing vessel for Bristol; and on the 5th June 1874, they wrote to Messrs. Kruger and Co., informing them of the fact, and that the plaintiffs had drawn upon Kruger and Co. for 4597*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* (the price of the two loads of wheat), at three days' sight. The plaintiffs with this letter, forwarded by steamer an invoice of the wheat sold, and a certificate of insurance of the Oriental Mutual Insurance Company, which certified that the company had insured, under a policy made for the plaintiffs, "23,900 dollars in gold on 15,786 bushels of wheat, in 5311 bags, free of particular average (unless the vessel be stranded, sunk, burned, or in collision), valued at sum insured, shipped on board of the ship Thomas Baynes at and from New York to Bristol; and it is hereby understood and agreed, that in case of loss, such loss is payable to the order of Hughes, Hickox, and Co., on surrender of this certificate. This certificate represents and takes the place of the policy," &c.

The plaintiffs also forwarded the bill of lading of the wheat to Kruger and Co., and a bill of exchange signed by the plaintiffs, and drawn upon Kruger and Co. for 4597*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, payable three days after sight to the plaintiffs' order.

On the 23rd May 1874, the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs:

We have to acknowledge the receipt of your cable message of yesterday's date, as follows, "offer load Millwaukie fifty three six sail Bristol," to which we replied "accept," and which we now beg to confirm. We suppose terms are sixty days on bankers; however, no doubt you are writing fully on this point.

The plaintiffs received this letter at some time after the 5th, and before the 8th June.

On the 8th June the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants explaining the mistake which had been made, and saying:

We have therefore written Messrs. Kruger and Co., inclosing our draft on you at sixty days, for the amount of the inclosed invoice [for one load], say 2340*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, instructing them to attach bills of lading for property described therein, and present for your acceptance. We trust, with the above explanation, you will duly honour the same, &c.

The plaintiffs forwarded to the defendants, with this letter, an invoice for one load of wheat, consisting of 7994 bushels, at 53*s.* 6*d.* per bushel.

On the same day the plaintiffs wrote to Kruger and Co., explaining what had occurred, and going on to say:

Draft and documents having gone forward to you by steamer of the 6th, we shall request you by cable to honour same for our account. We now inclose our draft at sixty days on Messrs. Adams for 2340*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, which we request you to attach to bill of lading for 7994 bushels wheat, and present for acceptance, which, if duly honoured, as we trust it will be, will reimburse you for one load. The other parcel you will please to dispose of to best advantage, rendering account sales to us, &c.

The draft drawn upon the defendants by the plaintiffs for 2340*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, payable sixty days after date to the order of the plaintiffs, was forwarded to Kruger and Co. with this letter, and was endorsed "Pay Messrs. Kruger and Co. or order—Hughes, Hickox, and Co."

On the 10th June 1874, the plaintiffs sent the following telegram to Kruger and Co.: "Honour draft 5th June for our account, letter 8th explains answer."

On the 20th June the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs a letter beginning, "We have none of your favours to reply to," and after stating that the markets were dull, &c., the letter concluded, "Sorry an effort to do business in the Bristol wheat fell through."

On the 24th June the defendants wrote to Kruger and Co., "Without prejudice we will accept the boatload of wheat shipped per Thomas Bayne, if they, Messrs. Hughes, Hickox, and Co., will consign to our care the other boatload for sale on their account. If you are not in a position to make this arrangement we leave it in your hands to cable out this offer for their reply to-morrow."

On the same day the defendants refused to accept the bill of exchange which the plaintiffs had drawn upon them, and which was presented for their acceptance by Kruger and Co., and accordingly protested. Messrs. Kruger and Co. had duly accepted the bill of exchange drawn on them by the plaintiffs.

On the 27th June the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs expressing surprise that the plaintiffs had shipped wheat to them, and saying that, having heard nothing from the plaintiffs for a month, they had bought elsewhere; but that, in order to carry out the transaction, the defendants had offered Kruger and Co. to take one load of wheat on condition of having the other load consigned to them, but that the defendants had heard nothing more from Kruger and Co.

On 9th July 1874, immediately after the receipt of the last-mentioned letter, the plaintiffs telegraphed to the defendants, "Accept your proposition; have ordered Kruger to deliver your wheat."

On the 11th July 1874 the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs refusing to take the wheat. The price of wheat had fallen considerably between the date of the plaintiffs' first order of the 22nd May and the refusal of the defendants to accept the goods.

On the 19th April 1875, a rule was obtained by the defendants ordering the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict for them should not be set aside, and a verdict for the defendants or a nonsuit entered on the grounds that there was no memorandum of the contract within the Statute of Frauds, that the plaintiffs had not performed the contract on their side; that the tender was not one which the defendants were bound to accept, no policy of insurance having been tendered, or why the damages should not be reduced pursuant to leave reserved.

On the 16th November 1875, the Exchequer Division made an order that the damages found for the plaintiff on the trial be reduced to 150*l.*, and as to the residue of the rule that it be discharged.

It was against this order that the defendants now appealed.

Benjamin, Q.C. (with him Cole, Q.C. and Petheram) for the appellants.—The plaintiffs were never in a position to carry out their contract with the defendants. The letter of the 8th June from Hickox to Adams, announcing the mistake, reached Adams on the 23rd or 24th. The terms of the contract then were, "cost, freight, and insurance." The defendants were entitled to have a transfer of the policy of insurance at the same time that the bills were presented for their acceptance. The actual policy would have been no use to the defendants. It was of use to Kruger and Co., who had a lien upon it. It is true that it might have been endorsed with a notice that Kruger held it for the defendants: but that would have been of no service to the defendants, who could not have delivered it to a purchaser of the goods. Besides, the policy covered the whole quantity of wheat shipped in the Thomas Bayne, and was warranted "free of particular average," so that the defendants could not have recovered upon the policy if there had been a total loss of their load of wheat. The plaintiffs were never ready and willing to deliver the policy to the defendants.

Lopes, Q.C. (with him A. Collins), for the respondents, the plaintiffs below.—It is admitted that there was no actual delay in forwarding the goods, and there is no dispute as to the quality of them. We were ready and willing to deliver the policy within the terms of the contract. Those terms were "cost, freight, and insurance." The plaintiffs did insure—not the one load separately, but the two loads, one of which Kruger was to hand over to the defendants, and the other to sell and account for to the plaintiffs. Assume that Kruger and Co., when they offered the draft to the defendants for acceptance, had offered also the policy covering both the loads; the defendants could have then gone into the market with their policy, and no objection could be made by a purchaser that the policy covered more than the quantity offered. Kruger and Co. were the plaintiffs' sole agents in England, and it must be assumed that they would have done everything possible to help their principals. Kruger and Co. would not have been damnified if they had passed the policy on. If the excepted risk of particular average had been inserted, the defendants would have been entitled to complain that the goods had not been insured according to the contract. The Lord Chancellor. — A purchaser might be willing to take the goods upon having the policy covering the whole quantity handed over to him, and it may be that he then might have recovered upon a loss, but would Kruger and Co. have handed over the policy under these circumstances?] We were in a position to do it, and I ask your Lordships to infer that we would have done it.

Benjamin, Q.C. in reply.—It is now admitted that we had a right to have the policy of insurance delivered with the shipping documents, but the defendants could have recovered nothing upon the policy covering the two loads, if any part of them remained upon the ship's arrival in port. If all our load had been lost, we could not have recovered a penny. It is a peculiarity under policies to insure what are termed "memorandum articles" that no partial loss can be recovered, for wheat is one of those articles. It is asking the court to infer a violent improbability, that Kruger and Co, would have given up the policy—their only security whilst the goods were at sea—for the advance of 4597*l.* to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs assumed that Kruger and Co. would have given it up, but there is nothing to show that they would have done so.

The Lord Chancellor.—There are some of the questions in this case which I shall put aside. As to the question of whether there was a contract in writing in order to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, that has been given up. Both parties seem to be agreed that the case is to be taken as if there was a valid contract for sale "cost, freight, and insurance." and that the ordinary shipping documents were to be delivered to the purchaser. I also put aside the mistake as to the telegrams. It is immaterial to follow the history of it, because the mistake was found out in time to have had the 1000 quarters of wheat delivered to the defendants, if the plaintiffs could have carried out their contract in other respects.

Now, when the mistake was found out, Hickox and Co. had sent forward to Kruger and Co. a cargo consisting of two loads of wheat, the bill of lading and a policy of insurance upon the whole of the parcels. The ship, in which the wheat was, being still upon her voyage, Hickox and Co., the plaintiffs, wrote to Adams and Co., telling them of the mistake, and that Kruger and Co. would deliver to them (the defendants) 1000 quarters of wheat, and present a draft for the price of these 1000 quarters upon the defendants payable in sixty days. At that time the draft which the plaintiffs had drawn upon Kruger and Co. for the price of the whole shipment was just coming due. The defendants refused acceptance of the draft upon them when it was presented to them, and refused, in fact to accept the goods.

The question for us is, upon the whole facts of the case, are we to hold that Hickox and Co. were then ready and willing to fulfil their contract with Adams and Co.? In my opinion they were not. It is an essential element in their being ready and willing to fulfil their contract that they should be able to put Adams and Co. in a similar position, as to insurance of their own load, as Kruger and Co. were in respect of the whole quantity.

Now, the insurance of the goods, being what I have described it to be, assuming that the policy was a proper one, and would have been a good and sufficient one to satisfy a purchaser from the defendants of the one load, if that policy had been handed over to him, I cannot see anything from which to infer that Kruger and Co. would have been ready to hand over that which was their only security for the bill which they had accepted. Then, supposing that they had been willing to do so, would that have been a sufficient protection for Adams and Co.? I think not, for under the particular terms of the policy, unless there was a total loss of the goods, no loss could have been recovered upon it. It is, therefore, impossible to say that Adams and Co. would have been in the same position as if they had had a separate policy covering the 1000 quarters which they had purchased.

I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants.

Lord Coleridge, C.J. concurred.

Mellish, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case there was a contract to sell and deliver goods between a firm carrying on business at New York and a firm at Gloucester. Is the English firm bound to accept the bill of lading of the goods without the policy of insurance? I think they are certainly not so bound. It is clear that the goods could not be sold under the bill of lading without a security in case of their total loss at sea. Now there was, in fact, no policy on this wheat alone, but there was one on the whole quantity consigned to Kruger and Co. I am of opinion that we must find that Kruger and Co. were not ready and willing to deliver that policy to the defendants; and if Kruger and Co. had been, the plaintiffs would not have been carrying out their contract with Adams and Co., the defendants, in delivering to them a policy covering the whole quantity of wheat.

Charter-party—Undue detention in loading—Exemption of charterer—Lien of owner.

In an action by shipowner against charterer, there was a claim for undue detention in loading the ship. The charter-party contained a stipulation that as the defendant was acting on behalf of another party, his liability should cease as soon as the cargo was shipped, loading excepted, the owner and master of the vessel agreeing to rest solely on their lien on the cargo for freight, demurrage and all other claims; which lien it was thereby agreed they should have.

Held upon demurrer that, whether the owner's lien covered the claims in the action or not, the defendant was liable for all damage incurred before the cargo was completely shipped; and that the action was maintainable.

THIS was an action by shipowner against charterer upon a charter-party in the following words:—

Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 14th June, 1875.

It is this day mutually agreed between Mr. John Lister, owner of the British or privileged good ship or vessel called the Antias of Hartlepool, of the burden of 13½ keels or thereabouts, now in the river Tyne, and Messrs. Van Haansbergen and Usher of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, as agents to the freighters of the said ship, Messrs. A. Vander Leems, Son, and Co., for one voyage from the river Tyne to Rotterdam. That the said vessel, being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed as directed by the said freighters and there load from the factor of the said freighter a full and complete cargo, consisting of four to five keels firebrick, and load up with Ramsay's Garesfield coke not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed with the first opportunity and all possible dispatch to Rotterdam, and there deliver the same alongside any vessel, wharf, or warehouse as ordered, where she can safely deliver on being paid freight at and after the rate of 6*l.* 5*s.* sterling per keel of 16 tons for the coke, at 7*l.* 10*s.* sterling per keel of 21 tons for the bricks for the quantity taken on board as aforesaid, and 2*l.* 2*s.* gratuity; the freighter paying all dues and duties on the cargo, and the ship all other charges. As soon as the cargo is shipped, the master to sign the bills of lading as presented without prejudice to this charter. The charter being concluded by the said Messrs. Haansbergen and Usher for and on behalf of another party, it is agreed that all liability of the former shall cease as soon as the cargo is shipped, loading excepted, the owners and master of the vessel agreeing to rest solely on their lien on the cargo for freight demurrage, and all other claims, and which lien it is hereby agreed they shall have, and that the vessel is to be reported and cleared at the custom house at Newcastle by the said Messrs. Haansbergen and Usher, and all money for charges or otherwise due by the owners or master shall be paid on the captain receiving despatches (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage always excepted). The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash for ship's use, and the remainder by an approved bill on London at two months' date or all in cash equal thereto at master's option. Seven working days are to be allowed the said merchants for unloading (if the ship is not sooner despatched) and demurrage to be paid over and above the said lying days at 2*l.* per day penalty for non-performance of this agreement, amount of freight. The vessel to be addressed to the charterer's agent at port of discharge paying the usual brokerage only.

By authority of owner.

J. KNOTT,

As agents VAN HAANSBERGEN and USHER.

Witness, J. A. HAVELOCK.

The declaration set out the material parts of the charter-party, and averred that the plaintiff carried the said cargo in the said ship to Rotterdam aforesaid, and there delivered the same in accordance with the said agreement, and all conditions were fulfilled and all things happened and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said charter-party performed by the defendants on their part, and the defendants in loading the said ship unduly detained the same beyond the proper time provided for the loading thereof, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the use of the same, and incurred expense in keeping the same and maintaining the crew thereof. And for a second breach the defendant kept the said ship on demurrage fourteen days over and above the said periods so agreed upon for loading as aforesaid, and thereby became liable to pay to the plaintiff 28*l.* for demurrage as aforesaid, and has not paid the same.

In the 4th plea the defendant set out the charter-party verbatim, and said that at the time of the making of the said charter-party he, the defendant (therein described as Messrs. Van Haansbergen and Usher), was agent for the said Messrs. A. Vander Leems and Co., therein mentioned, and that he (the defendant) loaded the said agreed cargo on board the said ship.

The second breach of the charter-party alleged in the declaration was demurred to on the ground, amongst others, that no demurrage was chargeable for delay beyond the time for loading.

And the fourth plea was demurred to on the grounds, amongst others, that the exemption of liability clause in the charter-party did not apply to loading and liabilities incurred in respect thereto; and the plea, whilst affirming that the defendant loaded the said ship, did not allege that he loaded it within the proper time and without delay; and the fact that the defendant was acting as agent did not, under the wording of the charter-party set forth, release him from the above-mentioned liabilities.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (with him Wright), argued for the plaintiff.—The exemption of the charterer's liability is expressly barred with respect to loading; he must, therefore, be liable for all matters connected with the loading. It is not sufficient that he has completed the loading; he must have done it without delay and in reasonable time. Clauses of this kind have been discussed and interpreted in

Bannister v. Breslauer, L. Rep. 2 C.P. 497;
Gray v. Carr L. Rep. 6 Q.B. 522; ante, vol. 1, p. 115;
Francesco v. Massey, L. Rep. 8 Ex. 101: ante, vol. 2, p. 594;
Kish v. Cory, L. Rep. 10 Q.B. 553; ante, vol. 2, p. 593.

Herschell, Q.C. contra.—The charterer apon this agreement is responsible only for the loading of the cargo, so that the shipowner may have an effectual lien to cover all his claims. The owner may satisfy the claim based upon the alleged breach of the charter-party by recouping himself upon his lien, and the charterer is not liable for delay or demurrage in loading.

BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think we require a reply from the plaintiff. The words upon which this question is raised seem to me to have but one meaning. The defendant has engaged that the vessel shall be loaded with a full cargo within a reasonable time; or if a particular time be actually specified, then within that time. There is a two-fold obligation—first, to load a full cargo; secondly, to do so within the time agreed. It is contended on the defendant's behalf that the charter-party gives a lien to the shipowner for every kind of claim, both liquidated and unliquidated; the words are "the owners and master of the vessel agreeing to rest solely on their lien on the cargo for freight, demurrage, and all other claims, and which lien it is hereby agreed they shall have." I have some doubt whether "all other claims" can be held to cover the unliquidated claim for unreasonable delay; but whether they do or not, the previous words do not exempt the freighter from liability for such delay; they are, "This charter being concluded by the said Messrs. Haansbergen and Usher, for and on account of another party, it is agreed that all liability of the former shall cease as soon as the cargo is shipped, loading excepted." This means that, with respect to the loading, the freighter's liability remains as if there were no exemption, and it includes the delay which takes place before the cargo is completely shipped. It is not necessary to say whether this meant to exempt the freighter from liability for every claim which the owner can enforce upon his lien, for the simple and natural interpretation of the words clearly gives the owner a remedy against the freighter for loss incurred during the shipping of the cargo. The declaration, therefore is good, and the plea is not a sufficient answer to it. Our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

Ship and shipping—Sold note—Warranty—Condition precedent—"Ship now at Rangoon."

In an action brought by the vendors against their vendees for refusal to accept, evidence was given to show the circumstances under which the contract was made, and that it was of vital importance that the vessel should be in the port named at the time of making the contract. The jury found, that the condition "ship now at Rangoon," had not been fulfilled, and that it was a condition absolutely vital.

Held, that it was rightly left to the jury to say under what circumstances the contract was made, and that the words "ship now at Rangoon" amounted to a warranty justifying the defendant in saying that there had been a failure of performance of a condition precedent and in refusing to carry out the contract.

Held further, that the finding of the jury was rightly taken as an element in enabling the court to say that the words amounted to a condition precedent.

THIS was an action tried before Blackburn, J. and a special jury, at the Guildhall sittings after Trinity Term on the 26th Nov. 1875, for non-acceptance by the defendant of a cargo of rice according to contract, and brought by the plaintiffs as vendors. The contract was made on the 12th Dec. 1873 for the purchase of 1500 tons of rice. At this time intense anxiety prevailed in India, and in consequence of the famine in Bengal, and the expected prohibition of exports from Rangoon to Europe, merchants would only buy such cargoes as were then being landed in Rangoon, or were prepared with ships then at that port for the purpose of loading. So much of the contract as is material to this case was as follows:

London, 12 Dec., 1873.

Sold for account of Messrs. Oppenheim and Schrader to our principals, the cargo of rice consisting of about 1500 tons in bags, or such portion thereof as may arrive by the vessel, new crop, Rangoon per Coldinghame about——tons register———Captain, now at Rangoon, to be shipped during Dec. 1873, or Jan. 1874, on the following conditions, &c.

The Coldinghame was not at Rangoon at the time of the contract being entered into, but was then upon a voyage going to Rangoon. The defendants pleaded that it was a condition precedent that the ship should be at Rangoon on the date of the contract, and evidence was given on their behalf as to the then state of trade at Rangoon, as stated above.

The jury returned a verdict for the defendants, intimating that the condition as to the ship being at Rangoon at the date of the contract not having been fulfilled, and that being absolutely vital, the verdict must be for the defendants.

Blackburn, J. however gave the plaintiffs leave to move to enter judgment for them, taking the finding of the jury as one of the elements on which the motion was to be made.

J. C. Matthew (with him Sir H. James, Q.C., Watkin Williams, Q.C., and Myburgh), moved accordingly.—You are not entitled to incorporate the finding of the jury with the contract for the purpose of construing it. There is no authority for saying that what is found by the jury as to the importance of the vessel being at Rangoon can be so incorporated. The evidence tends to leave the construction of the contract with the jury, and however important it might be that the vessel should be at Rangoon, it is not that which indicates whether that is a condition precedent or not. The question is, what did the parties really agree upon according to the words of the contract apart from the evidence? [BLACKBURN, J. cited Graves v. Legg (23 L.J.228, Ex.; 9 Ex. 709.] The evidence does not bring the case within Graves v. Legg (ubi sup.), in which case the name of the ship was the condition precedent; and an averment of the fact of the materiality of the name of the ship appeared on the pleadings. Evidence to show that "ship now at Rangoon" was of special and specific significance at this particular juncture is inadmissible—it is purely a question of construction for the court, and there is no evidence of the purpose for which the contract was made. [LUSH, J.—Here there was express evidence of particular and exceptional circumstances; surely they could be brought forward to show the nature of the contract. [BLACKBURN, J. cited Behn v. Burness (3 B. & S. 751; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 207; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 178, 329; 32 L. J. 204, Q. B.)] There was no agreement between the parties that the words should be a condition precedent: (Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company, ante, vol. 2, p. 435; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 572; 31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 789; 44 L. J. 27, C. P.) If evidence was admitted to show the intention of the parties the document itself would be of no use, the same printed form of words between A. and B. would bear a different meaning than the same form between C. and D. The words themselves are not ambiguous, but the effect of them is. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is never a fact to go to the jury what the words of a contract mean, but it is a fact to go to them under what circumstances are they made, and to what do they relate.] You cannot, by evidence make words a condition precedent, and there being no ambiguity what evidence was admissible? If it were mere matter of description you could not admit such evidence; for instance if a ship were described as having a figure head painted red. [LUSH, J.—That would be a condition precedent if it were shown that she was going among pirates who had a superstition never to attack ships with a red figure head.] The contract must be read in the writing in which it is expressed, and you cannot have the writing plus parol evidence. The question, too, is independent of whether the words may or may not be a condition precedent; the parties would have gained advantage by the resale of the rice whether this particular ship was in a port or not, and if the price had not gone down these words would not have been material: (Corkling v. Massey, ante, vol. 2, p. 18; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 395; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 636; 42 L. J. 153, C. P.)

Benjamin, Q.C. (with him Cohen, Q.C. and Patchett) were not called upon for the plaintiffs.

BLACKBURN, J.—The judgment must stand.

In all cases we must consider the intention expressed by the words, and this must depend on circumstances. In construing a will you inquire into all the circumstances, and not what the testator means to say, but what does he mean under the circumstances. The same rule applies to contracts, with this difference: everything, all the circumstances of the testator's life, are relevant in the case of a will, but in a contract only those circumstances are relevant which both parties are speaking of at the time. The question is, what the facts are, of and concerning which they are speaking in using those words, and the question must be put what are the facts?

In this case the stipulation was made that the ship was "now at Rangoon." Now is this a mere stipulation or a condition precedent which would put an end to the contract? We must construe the contract according to the state of things known; we might differ as to whether there was reference to an ordinary state of things or not. I am not sure that I should have said under other circumstances that this was not a condition precedent; but, with the evidence and considering the state of the market, the prohibition expected against the import of rice, and other things, it is important to consider these. The ship being in the port at that time is all important; they wanted rice, they did not want a right of action.

In Graves v. Legg (ubi sup.) the question was raised by pleading the material circumstances, and the object with which the contract was entered into was in the knowledge of both parties. Baron Parke there said it was material and essential to the case. In Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.) Williams, J. says the "question appears to be properly raised by the averment in the plea that the time and situation of the vessel were essential and material parts of the contract. On the trial of the issue joined thereon, it was no part of the judge's duty to leave to the jury any question as to the construction of the contract, or the materiality of any of its statements. It was his function to construe the contract with the aid of the surrounding circumstances found by the jury, and to decide for himself whether the statement that the ship was in the port, supposing it to be untrue, was an essential part of the contract, or a mere representation, and to direct the jury to find for the defendant or plaintiff accordingly. The question it would seem might also be raised by pleading the material circumstances (as was done in Graves v. Legg, 9 Ex. 709), on which the defendant relies as leading to the construction which the plea seeks to put in the instrument. Unless one or other of these modes were adopted, the court, in case there should be a demurrer to the plea, or on an application for judgment non obstante veredicto, would be precluded from taking the surrounding circumstances into consideration in aid of the construction. It is plain that the court must be influenced in the construction not only by the language of the instrument, but also by the circumstances under which and the purposes for which the charter-party was entered into." The course taken in Graves v. Legg (ubi sup.) was not adopted here, the circumstances not having been pleaded; but it was left to the jury to find those circumstances, and they did find that it was absolutely vital that the ship should be at Rangoon on the 12th Dec. and that the defendants' evidence upon this point was true. Hence the verdict was entered for the defendants.

The case is governed by Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.); this is in point, and we can not overrule it.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion.

In this case Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.) is in point. Evidence is not admissible to show that the parties meant something not expressed, but the circumstances under which the contract was made must be known. We do not admit the evidence to show what the parties intended, but to show what the words mean in reference to the circumstances. I think the judgment must stand.

LUSH, J.—The words "now at Rangoon" are capable of being construed in two ways, but they must refer to the circumstances under which the contract was made. It was for the jury to say what they were, and they have done so, and said they were of the last importance. The selling value of the rice was much affected by the fact of the vessel being at Rangoon or not, and the words must apply to the particular circumstances. Sir H. James says different words receive different interpretations in different contracts. This is so, and Behn v. Burness shows it. The verdict must stand.

THIIS AND OTHERS v. BYERS.

Ship and shipping—Liability of charterer for delay in unloading caused by foul weather.

Where a given number of days is allowed to a charterer for unloading, a contract is implied on his part that from the time when the ship is at the usual place of discharge he will take the risk of any ordinary vicissitudes which may occur to prevent his releasing the ship at the expiration of the lay days.

By the terms of a charter-party a vessel was to proceed for a voyage from P. to a safe port in the United Kingdom with a cargo of timber, "sixteen working days to be allowed the merchants for loading the ship at P., and to be discharged at such wharf or dock as the charterer may direct, always afloat, in fourteen like days, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 10l. per day." The ship was loaded and ordered to M.; and, having arrived at the usual place of discharge, commenced the unloading. It was the duty of the master to put the timber over the ship, and form it into rafts, so that it might be conveyed away by the charterer. In the course of unloading bad weather came on, and as the rafts could not be formed, the charterer could not convey the timber away. A delay of four days was thus caused in discharging the ship, and the shipowners claimed 40l. for demurrage:

Held, that, as by the charter-party a given number of days was allowed for discharging the cargo, the charterer was, under the circumstances, liable for the delay in unloading the vessel, notwithstanding such delay was occasioned by bad weather.

THE declaration alleged that in consideration that the plaintiffs would deliver to the defendant certain timber forming the cargo of and carried by a certain ship of the plaintiffs then lying and being at a certain port, to wit, Stockton-on-Tees, and would allow the defendant fourteen laying days for the unloading of the same, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days; the defendant promised the plaintiffs to pay to the plaintiffs freight on the carriage of the first timber from Pensacola to Stockton-on-Tees aforesaid at certain dates agreed on between the plaintiffs and defendant, and to discharge and unload the said ship within fourteen days from the day on which the master of the said ship should signify his readiness and willingness to unload, and to pay 10*l.* per day demurrage for each demurrage day that the said ship should be detained by reason of the defendant not unloading the same over and above the said fourteen laying days.

Breach that the defendants did not unload and discharge the said ship within the time so agreed upon as aforesaid, but kept the same on demurrage over and above the said fourteen days for a long time, to wit ten days, on demurrage, and the defendant thereby became liable to pay, but has not paid, to the plaintiffs demurrage at the rate aforesaid for ten days, and the defendant also detained the said ship one day without any payment or satisfaction to the plaintiffs on that behalf, whereby the plaintiffs were deprived of the use of the said ship during that time, and incurred expense, &c.

There was also a count for money payable for demurrage of a ship.

Fourth plea to first count.—That defendant was prevented from unloading and discharging the ship solely by the acts and defaults of the plaintiffs and their agents on that behalf.

The case came on for trial before Grove, J., and a special jury, in London, during the Michaelmas Sittings, 1875, when the following facts were proved. The plaintiff was a shipowner, and the action was for eleven days' demurrage, and 1*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* for extra dock charges. By the charter-party dated Jan. 31st, 1874, the Norwegian vessel Singleton, chartered by Messrs. Price and Pierce as agents, was to proceed to Pensacola with all convenient speed to load a full cargo of timber, and being so loaded to proceed to any safe port in the United Kingdom; sixteen working days to be allowed for loading, "and to be discharged at such wharf or dock as the charterers may direct, always afloat, in fourteen like days. and ten days on demurrage, over and above the said laying days at 10*l.* per day." The bill of lading incorporated the terms of the charter-party, and was indorsed by the captain. In pursuance of the charter-party the vessel proceeded to Pensacola, and was there duly loaded (bills of lading being presented and signed by the captain), after which she proceeded by order of the defendants with the cargo to Middlesborough. She arrived at the usual place of discharge on Sunday, the 28th of June, 1874, and was ready to discharge her cargo to the defendants, by whom the freight was paid the following day—viz., the 29th. The time for discharging expired on the 14th of July, but the vessel was not in fact discharged till the 25th. The vessel was thus kept eleven days beyond the time; but, as the delay of three of these days was admitted to be due to default on the part of the plaintiff, a verdict was ultimately found for the plaintiff for 8l. 14*s.* 6*d.*, being eighty days' demurrage at 10*l.* per day, and 1*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* for extra dock charges. As regards four of these days it was admitted that the delay in unloading was occasioned by bad weather which prevented the master, as was his duty, from putting the timber over the ship and forming it into rafts, and that the charterer was in consequence unable to take the timber away. The learned judge accordingly gave leave to the defendant to move to reduce the verdict by 40*l.*, if the court should be of opinion that on the true construction of the charter-party the defendant was not responsible for delay occasioned by bad weather. The case now came on for argument.

Russell, Q.C. and E. Pollock for the defendant (the charterer).—There is not an absolute contract in the part of charterers or consignees to unload within a stipulated time where they are prevented therefrom by something beyond their control. Here the inability to unload arose from something which prevented the plaintiffs themselves from performing their duty of putting the timber over the ship's side.

Herschell, Q C. and Webster for the plaintiffs.—Where the number of lay days is fixed the discharge must take place within those days, or the consignee or charterer is responsible, unless the delay was occasioned by the default of the shipowner. The delay here was delay out of the control of either party, and for this the defendant must pay.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 6.—The judgment of the court (Blackburn, and Lush, JJ.) was delivered by

LUSH, J.—This is an action for demurrage. The verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 81*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, leave being reserved to the defendant to reduce the amount by 40*l.*, being for four days detention at the stipulated rate of 10*l.* per day; and the question is whether, when a charter party allows a given number of days for discharging the cargo, the charterer or the ship's owner takes the risks of casualties in the weather, which interrupt the process of unloading.

The charter-party was for a voyage from Pensacola to a safe port in the United Kingdom, as ordered, with a cargo of timber. The clause upon which the question turns is in these words: "Sixteen working days to be allowed the said merchants (if the ship is not sooner dispatched) for loading the ship at Pensacola; and to be discharged at such wharf or dock as the charterer may direct, always afloat, in fourteen like days, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days, at 10*l.* per day."

The ship having been ordered to Middlesborough, arrived at the usual place of discharge in the river, and commenced the unloading. It was the duty of the master to put the timber over the ship, and form it into rafts; and the charterer was to take the rafts away.

In the course of unloading bad weather came on, and though the ship did not leave her anchorage the rafts could not be formed, and the charterer could not consequently do his part in taking the timber away. The bad weather caused a delay of four days in discharging the ship; and the contention of the defendant was, that as he was not in default, but was ready to receive the timber, but the master was not ready to deliver it, the time lost in consequence of the bad weather ought not to be reckoned as part of the fourteen days.

We took time to look into the authorities, and are of opinion that where a given number of days is allowed to the charterer for unloading, a contract is implied on his part that, from the time when the ship is at the usual place of discharge, he will take the risk of any ordinary vicissitudes which may occur to prevent his releasing the ship at the expiration of the lay days. This is the doctrine laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Randall v. Lynch (ubi sup.), which was upheld by this court; and it has been accepted as the guiding principle ever since: (see Leek v. Yates, ubi sup.; Harper v. M'Carthy, 2 W. R. 258; Brown v. Johnstone, ubi sup., and the other cases cited in the argument.)

The obvious convenience of such a rule in preventing disputes about the state of the weather on particular days, or particular fractions of a day, and the time thereby lost to the charterer in the course of the discharge, makes it highly expedient that this construction should be adhered to whatever may be the form of words used in the particular charter.

The judgment of the court will therefore be for the plaintiffs for the full amount.

HOPPER v. BURNESS AND OTHERS.

Charter-party—Sale of cargo at intermediate port—Freight pro ratâ itineris.

Plaintiff chartered a ship to defendants to carry cargo for freight payable on delivery at the port of destination. The captain was obliged to sell part of the cargo at an intermediate port for necessary repairs. The price obtained was higher than it would have been at the port of destination. Plaintiff, having paid the proceeds of the sale to defendants under an average statement, claimed freight pro ratâ itineris on the cargo sold.

Held, that defendants were entitled either to demand an indemnity for the sale of the cargo, or to treat the transaction as a forced loan, and demand the proceeds of the sale, and that having treated it as a loan, they were not liable to pay freight pro ratâ itineris.

THE plaintiff's claim was for freight and money received. The plaintiff was the owner of the ship Verena, and he chartered her to the defendants to carry a cargo of coals from Cardiff to Point de Galle, in Ceylon. The freight was to be 21*s.* a ton on the quantity of coals delivered at Point de Galle, and if the quantity delivered should be less than the amount named in the bill of lading, the defendant might deduct the cost of the coals so deficient from the freight due. The defendants shipped a cargo of 704 tons of coal at Cardiff; the coals were by the bill of lading to be delivered to the order of the defendants. The invoice price was 1*l.* per ton. The ship sailed for Point de Galle, but met with bad weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and put in disabled. The captain, being unable to raise money on bottomry for the necessary repairs of the ship, sold 470 tons of coal at the Cape of Good Hope, which fetched 3*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* a ton, a considerably higher price than they would have fetched at Point de Galle. Forty-two tons of coal were jettisoned, and the ship, having been repaired, proceeded on her voyage, and the remainder of the cargo, 192 tons, was delivered at Point de Galle. The defendants afterwards employed Messrs. Davidson and Lindley, average staters, to draw up an average statement, and the plaintiff paid the amount which the average statement showed to be due from him to the defendants. The statement debited the plaintiff with the amount of the net proceeds of the coals sold at the Cape of Good Hope, but made no allowance to him for freight in respect of these coals. The plaintiff claimed to be entitled to freight pro ratâ itineris, in respect of the coals sold at the Cape of Good Hope, and sought to recover back from the defendants the amount of such freight, which, he contended, ought to have been allowed to him in the average statement, and also to recover the amount for which the coals sold at the Cape over the cost price. At the trial, before Huddleston, B., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1875, the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them or a nonsuit, on the ground that the defendants were not liable to pay the freight claimed. A rule nisi was obtained during the Michaelmas sittings.

Herschell, Q.C. and Crompton showed cause.—It cannot be that the defendants are entitled to keep all that was received as the price of the coal sold at the Cape of Good Hope, and pay nothing to the plaintiff, who took it there, for freight. The money was paid to the defendants under a mistake of fact, and can therefore be recovered as money received to the use of the plaintiff. If the charterer takes the goods from the shipowner at a point short of the port of destination he is bound to pay freight pro ratâ itineris, and if he takes the produce of the goods it comes to the same thing. Taking the money which the coal sold at the Cape of Good Hope produced is the same as if the defendants had taken the coal itself there. In Baillie v. Mondigliana (1 Park on Marine Insurance, 116, 8th edit.), there is an express opinion of Lord Mansfield in favour of the plaintiff's contention. He says, "In this case the value of the goods was restored in money, which is the same as the goods; and therefore freight was certainly due pro ratâ itineris." In 2 Arnould on Marine Insurance, 803, 4th edit., the law is stated as follows: "Goods sold for the general benefit are to be paid for in contribution, if the adventure reaches its destination, at the net value they would have fetched at the port of discharge, or at the sum they actually brought at the intermediate port, deducting freight, duty, and landing expenses. If the adventure does not reach its destination, the amount of contribution is the price obtained for the goods at the port of distress, less freight pro ratâ, duty, and landing expenses. The shipowner in the former case would seem to be entitled to full freight, and in the latter to freight pro ratâ to the port of sale." For this proposition Atkinson v. Stephens (7 Ex. 567) is cited.] [Benjamin, Q.C. for the defendants, referred to Campbell v. Thompson (1 Starkie, 490.)] That does not touch the present case, for the sale there was wrongful; there was no urgent necessity for it. ARCHIBALD, J., referred to Hunter v. Prinsep (10 East, 378).] In that case also the act of selling was tortious. [BRETT, J.—In Maclachlan on Merchant Shipping 449, second edition, it is stated that "where the master sells the cargo in the course of the voyage, although properly, and to prevent its entire loss in consequence of damage by perils of the sea, he is not entitled to freight for carriage to the port of sale," and Vlierbloom v. Chapman (13 M. & W. 230), and Hunter v. Prinsep (ubi sup.) are cited.] If the sale is justifiable, it is the same as if an express authority to sell had been given; there is an implied authority to sell if it is necessary for completing the adventure. It is reasonable to imply that the defendants are not to be benefited more under the existing circumstances than they would have been if the contract had been completed. [BRETT, J.—The shipowner would be entitled to recover on a policy of insurance on freight.] Lord Mansfield's doctrine in Baillie v. Mondigliana (ubi sup.) has only been overruled in the case of a wrongful sale, as in Hunter v. Prinsep (ubi sup.); Vlierbloom v. Chapman (ubi sup.) was a different kind of case from the present. It would seldom happen, as here, that the forced sale produced gain instead of loss, and this is a material element of difference between this case and most others. A contract to pay freight pro ratâ ought to be implied as against the defendants from their having taken the proceeds of the sale. As to the claim for money received, Kelly v. Solari (9 M. & W. 54) shows that money paid under bonâ fide forgetfulness of facts disentitling the other party to receive it, can be recovered. The average statement is not binding on the plaintiff. It does not amount to an award, and it is made with a different object from that of fixing the position of the parties, viz., to settle what claims should be made on the underwriters.

Benjamin, Q.C. (Myburgh with him) in support of the rule.—The correspondence shows that the plaintiff agreed to be bound by the average statement, and this was a voluntary payment made after full examination of the facts. The entire argument for the plaintiff is based on Lord Mansfield's dictum in Baillie v. Mondigliana (ubi sup.), which is shown not to be law by the later decisions which have been referred to. The true principle is that the master has a right to borrow money or goods from the owner of the cargo to repair the ship, and when he sells it is a forced loan by the owner of the cargo to the owner of the ship. The shipowner is only entitled to freight on the goods delivered, and the owner of the cargo is entitled to have the amount of the forced loan repaid. [BRETT, J.—But if the goods were sold for less than they would have fetched at the port of destination, he would not be content with that.] He has an option either to treat it as a loan or to demand an indemnity. Here the defendants asked for the proceeds of the sale, which is in effect asking for repayment of the money lent. In Atkinson v. Stephens (ubi sup.), Pollock, C.B., puts the right of the master to sell cargo on the ground of being "a lawful mode of borrowing money for the necessary purposes of the ship," and the same learned judge expresses the same view in Duncan v. Benson (1 Ex. 537, affirmed 3 Ex. 644), where he says, "To accomplish the object of repairing the vessel, the master is authorised to bind his owner . . . by selling a portion of the cargo, which is in effect borrowing from the shipper through the medium of a sale." (1 Ex. 555.) [BRETT, J. referred to Richardson v. Nourse, 3 B. & A. 237.] If the owner of the cargo asks for an indemnity, he must allow what he would have had to pay for freight if the goods had been carried on, but not if he asks for repayment of the loan. The principles applicable to the case are clearly explained by Lord Ellenborough, delivering the judgment of the court in Hunter v. Prinsep, 10 East, at p. 394. [He was then stopped by the court.]

BRETT, J.—In this case the plaintiff brought an action, first to recover freight, and secondly for money received. He says that the money was inadvertently paid, and claims to recover it back on the ground that he has paid the defendants without deducting payment for freight. It is obvious that he cannot recover, unless he is entitled to the freight, so the main question is as to the claim for freight.

The plaintiff is a shipowner, and he made a charter-party, by which he chartered his ship to the defendant for a voyage from Cardiff to Point de Galle; the freight was 21s. per ton of coals (of which the cargo consisted), payable upon the quantity delivered at Point de Galle. The rest of the charter-party is immaterial. The ship was disabled by perils of the sea, and put in at the Cape of Good Hope, and there the captain was unable to borrow money on bottomry or otherwise. Under these circumstances the maritime law gives a title to the captain to sell part of the charterer's cargo to realise money to repair the ship; and he can sell without doing a wrongful act, though it is the duty of the shipowner to repair the ship at his own expense. The captain sold a portion of the coal, and having expended the amount realised upon the repairs of the ship, he proceeded to Point de Galle, and delivered that part of the cargo which remained.

Now, it so happened that the coals which were sold at the Cape of Good Hope fetched more than those which were taken on and sold at Point de Galle, and it is suggested that, therefore, the plaintiff is not only entitled to freight on the coals delivered at Point de Galle, but also to other freight for the coals which were sold at the Cape of Good Hope.

According to the charter-party freight was obviously only to be paid on coals delivered at Point de Galle, and if the plaintiff is entitled to freight on the coals sold at the Cape of Good Hope, it must be on some other ground. If he is entitled on any ground it would be that he had become entitled to freight which was earned at the Cape of Good Hope. I know of no mode by which the shipowner can become entitled to freight on such a charter-party as this, where the goods are not delivered, unless he becomes entitled to freight pro ratâ. The principle of pro ratâ freight is, that it is payable where there is a mutual agreement to do certain things, on which the law will imply an undertaking to pay, not the stipulated freight, but freight pro ratâ. The only case in which it can become payable is where the captain is able and willing to carry on the cargo, but the charterer or shipper desires to have the goods at an intermediate port, and the captain gives them up at the owner's request, express or implied. There is an implied promise to pay freight. Here the captain sells the goods, and by that very act puts it out of his power to say that he was ready to carry them on to the port of destination, for he was not able to do so. Therefore one ground on which the liability to pay freight pro ratâ depends does not exist.

It has been said that the charterer has an option, and Mr. Crompton said that here the charterers have exercised that option, and therefore by implication they undertook to pay pro ratâ freight. It is said that the charterer has an option to treat the proceeds of the sale as a loan, or to say "you sold my goods against my will; I cannot say that you did wrong, because the law allows it under the circumstances, but I insist on an indemnity"—not treating it as a mere loan; in fact, that he has an option either to treat it as a loan or to require an indemnity. If it is treated as a loan, it does not come within the rule; it gives no claim to pro ratâ freight. If the charterer is of opinion that the goods have fetched more at the intermediate port than they would have fetched if they had been carried on to the port of destination, he may treat the transaction as a loan at once, and may sue for the amount of the proceeds of the sale before the ship has arrived at her port of destination. If the ship is lost between the intermediate port and the port of destination, he cannot ask for an indemnity on the footing that the goods would have fetched more at the port of destination. If the ship had been lost between the intermediate port and the port of destination, he never would have been able to insist—it would not have been in his power to insist—on an indemnity. He could say that it was a loan, and that as the shipowner had sold part of the cargo he must pay the price of it to the charterer. If the goods fetch more at the intermediate port than they would have fetched at the port of destination, the owner of the cargo insists upon treating the transaction as a loan, as is the case here. If he had insisted on an indemnity on the footing that if the goods had been carried on they would have fetched more, he would have been entitled to claim the difference between the price at the intermediate port and the price at the port of destination, but he would have had to allow for freight. But he has a right to treat it as a loan, and if it is treated as a loan the claim to pro ratâ freight cannot arise, and the shipowner cannot add pro ratâ freight to the charter-party freight.

It is a hardship arising from the form of the contract and from the nature of maritime perils. The proper remedy would be for the shipowner to insure the freight, and if he did I have no doubt that under such circumstances as these he could recover. The rule must be made absolute.

ARCHIBALD, J.—The question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to pro ratâ freight for the conveyance of goods to an intermediate port. I am of opinion that under the circumstances he is not.

The charter-party gives no right to freight unless the goods are delivered at the port of destination, or a new contract is made, or there are facts from which we should imply a new contract. We are asked to imply a new contract because the goods were sold and the proceeds of the sale was paid to the defendants, but this is not sufficient to make it right to imply such a contract. It is possible that there may sometimes be circumstances which would raise that implication but the facts here do not make it out. We have been referred to Baillie v. Mondigliani (ubi sup.), as establishing that the produce of the goods is equivalent to the goods themselves, but that view is corrected by Hunter v. Prinsep (ubi sup.), which shows that one can imply a contract in that way only where the captain is able and willing to carry on the cargo, but the charterer accepts it short of the port of destination.

There was no option in the charterer here. The shipowner has disposed of the charterer's property, and I think the true view is, as Mr. Benjamin contends, that it is a forced loan—that the money for which the goods were sold is to be regarded as a loan, which the charterer is entitled to recover, if he chooses to take it in that shape. The cases show that in the event of the ship reaching the port of destination the charterer could claim an indemnity, but he only would do so where the goods would have fetched more if they had been carried on to the port of destination and sold there. Receiving the money does not amount to the same thing as receiving the goods, or establish an implication that the charterer is bound to pay freight pro ratâ. On the other point, it is unnecessary to say more than that I agree with the views which Mr. Benjamin has put forward in his argument. The rule must be made absolute.

Lindley, J.—I am of the same opinion.

In the first place, the goods were never delivered to the defendants at all, but were dealt with in another way, being sold by the captain in order to provide for the cost of repairing the ship. If receiving the money by the captain amounted to a loan by the defendants to the plaintiff, the plaintiff's case fails. We cannot consider where the money came from; but if we get at the principle of the thing, the transaction is a loan, and there is an end of the plaintiff's case. I think this is the true view, and that the rule ought to be made absolute.

Stone and others v. The Ocean Marine Insurance Company (Limited) of Gothenburg.

Marine insurance—Voyage policy—Leave to go to—Change of destination—Termination of risk—Return of premium.

A ship was insured for a voyage from Liverpool to Philadelphia and the United Kingdom. Subsequently by a memorandum endorsed upon the policy, leave was given to proceed to Baltimore instead of Philadelphia. The ship discharged her cargo at Baltimore, and sailed with a fresh cargo for Antwerp. After she had so sailed a further memorandum was endorsed upon the policy, stating that in consideration of an additional premium it was agreed that the ship should go to Antwerp. Orders were received by the captain when in the outer dock, on her way to the inner dock, which is the usual place of discharge at Antwerp, ordering him to sail for Leith. Whilst on the latter voyage the ship was totally lost by perils of the sea.

Held, that under the policy and memorandum the ship had the option of going to Antwerp or the United Kingdom, or to the United Kingdom and then to Antwerp, and that the voyage from Antwerp to Leith was not within the risk.

Held, further, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any return of premium.

This was an action upon a policy of reinsurance, in which a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs for 300*l.* subject to the following special case.

The plaintiffs are underwriters in London, and the defendants an insurance company established at Gothenburg, but carrying on business in London.

On the 18th March 1873 the owners of a vessel called the Ravensworth Castle insured her with the plaintiffs for twelve months.

Subsequently the plaintiffs effected a policy of reinsurance with the defendant's agents in London of the same vessel for "300*l.*, at 30s. per cent., 4*l.* 10s. on hull and machinery, subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy, and to pay as may be paid thereon, including risk of craft to and from the vessel a sum of 300*l.* from Liverpool to Philadelphia and the United Kingdom against all risks which, according to Lloyd's rules, can fall upon the company, but subject to the conditions specially expressed and agreed upon in the policy."

After this policy of reinsurance had been made with the defendants' agents, the plaintiffs' agent heard that the ship was going to Baltimore instead of Philadelphia, and at his request the defendants' agents indorsed on the policy of reinsurance the following memorandum:—"It is hereby agreed to allow the vessel Ravensworth Castle to proceed to Baltimore instead of Philadelphia. London, 1st Nov. 1873."

After the making of the last mentioned indorsement the vessel sailed with a cargo for Baltimore. At the time she sailed her destination beyond Baltimore was not fixed. She duly arrived at Baltimore, and having discharged her cargo, she received from the charterer's agents a cargo of wheat.

The greater part of this cargo had been sold for Antwerp by the charterer, and was deliverable to his order at Antwerp.

On the 11th Dec. the vessel sailed from Baltimore to Antwerp without any intention on the part of the captain, owners, or charterers of proceeding to the United Kingdom on that voyage, and with the full intention of proceeding direct to Antwerp as her port of discharge in fulfilment of the charter-party. At the time she left Baltimore no destination further than Antwerp had been fixed upon, nor was any such destination fixed upon until the 1st Jan. 1874 when she had arrived at Antwerp, and while in the outer dock on her way into the inner dock the usual place for discharging her cargo.

On the 2nd Jan. the plaintiffs' agent learnt that the vessel and her cargo had sailed from Baltimore to Antwerp, and upon that same day the following memorandum was agreed upon between him and the defendants' agent, and indorsed on the policy of reinsurance, and initialled on behalf of the defendants.

"In consideration of an additional premium of 7s. 6d. per cent. being paid hereon, and which we acknowledge to have received, it is hereby agreed to allow the vessel the Ravenswerth Castle to go to Antwerp. 2nd Jan. 1874."

At the time of the making and initialling the memorandum, neither the defendants nor their agents had any knowledge of the destination of the vessel, or the route she had taken, except what they derived from the entries in Lloyd's lists, and the fact that they had learnt that the vessel might perhaps go to Antwerp, and the plaintiffs and their agents, and the defendants and their agents, believed that the vessel was then at sea. During the negotiation a conversation took place between the plaintiffs' and the defendants' agents which was tendered in evidence, but rejected subject to the opinion of the court as to its admissibility. The ordinary rates of insurance from American ports to Antwerp are the same as the rates from American ports to the United Kingdom.

The reception of this fact in evidence was objected to by the defendants' counsel, and the fact was inserted in the case subject to the opinion of the court as to its admissibility in evidence.

Upon the 3rd Jan. a telegram was sent to the captain ordering the ship to sail for Leith. The telegram was received by the captain when the vessel was in the outer dock on her way into the inner dock, the usual place of discharge at Antwerp. On account of the state of the river at Antwerp, the vessel was unable to leave the dock until the 7th Jan. On that day she sailed from Antwerp for Leith, and while on the voyage to that place was totally lost by the perils of the sea. The plaintiffs paid to the owners of the vessel their proportion of the loss under the original policy of insurance.

The first question for the opinion of the court is whether or not the defendants are liable to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 300*l.*

If the court should be of opinion that the defendants are not so liable, then a further question arises, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to a return of the premiums of 4*l.* 10*s.*, and 1*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* or either of them.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiffs, contended that the effect of the policy and memoranda was that the vessel might go from Baltimore to Antwerp and thence to the United Kingdom. The words "go to" are larger words than the words "touch at." If Antwerp is to be taken as the final port of discharge then the vessel had arrived there and was in the outer dock before the memorandum was made, and the risk had then terminated, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the additional premium. And the fact that the premiums between Baltimore and Antwerp, and Baltimore and the United Kingdom are the same is favourable to my view. He cited Duer on Insurance, vol. 1 p. 171.

Preston v. Greenwood, 4 Douglas, p. 28.

Butt, Q.C., Mansel Jones and Stubbs for the defendants, argued that the strict meaning of the policy was that the vessel might go to the United Kingdom or to Antwerp, or that it might possibly mean that she might go to Antwerp by way of the United Kingdom, but that it could not mean that she might go to Antwerp first and afterwards to the United Kingdom. Neither are they entitled to a return of the premium, for the voyage cannot be said to be at an end until the vessel has arrived at the usual place of discharge, which at Antwerp was in the inner dock. See Anonymous Case, Skinner, 343; Arnould on Insurance, 4th edit., p. 389.

Gainsford Bruce replied.

Bramwell, B.—I am of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants.

It was at first contended that under these words "from Liverpool to Philadelphia and the United Kingdom" the ship might go on some independent voyage which had nothing to do with Philadelphia, as, for instance, to the Cape of Good Hope; but that point has been given up. The case really turns on the construction to be put on the policy and the two memoranda indorsed upon it. These in my opinion must be read together without reference to the conversation set out in the case; and without reference to the fact of the premium being the same to England as to Antwerp, for the argument attempted to be founded upon that has been answered, one answer being that it was intended that there should be a positive increase of risk. I am also inclined to doubt whether we ought to consider the amount of the premium at all in order to see what was the risk. I think, therefore that we must construe these three documents without any reference to evidence of that description.

Now several constructions have been put upon them. One is that the parties meant that the vessel might go to Antwerp instead of to the United Kingdom; another, that she might go to Antwerp by way of the United Kingdom. It is not necessary to discuss here which of these interpretations is right, because neither of them would protect the plaintiff. According to the plaintiff's counsel the vessel might go to Antwerp and afterwards sail for England, either having previously discharged her cargo at Antwerp and taken in ballast, or with her cargo, and that the voyage to England would be within the risk. I am quite certain that no such thing was in the contemplation of the parties, nor is it the proper meaning of the words. Vessels that are intended to discharge in England, very rarely, I should say, go to Antwerp for orders. All we have to do is to construe the memorandum which allowed this vessel to go to Antwerp when it was already open to her to go to the United Kingdom. I think this allowed her the alternative of going to Antwerp or of going to the United Kingdom, or possibly of going first to the United Kingdom and afterwards to Antwerp, but not to permit her to go to Antwerp first and sail thence to the United Kingdom. I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover on the policy.

Then the question is whether they can recover back their additional premium, and that to my mind must depend upon whether the voyage was continuing or had come to an end at the time of making the memorandum. In my judgment the voyage was not ended. The vessel's voyage was from the port of departure to her moorings at the port of destination. What is the end of a voyage may differ under different circumstances, but here there is a statement in the case that on the 3rd Jan. when the telegram was received by the captain the vessel was in the outer dock on her way to the inner dock. This to my mind is conclusive. If the policy is treated as an insurance to Antwerp it must surely be treated as lasting up to the time when she came to a state of rest. If she had arrived at the terminus and was waiting her turn to unload, she might have finished her voyage, but in this particular case I think the voyage was not finished. Something remained to be done which was part of the voyage or certainly part of the adventure. The matter may be tested in this way. Supposing the sailors had been hired for the voyage would they have been entitled to leave the vessel in the outer dock? I should say decidedly not. I quite agree with the statement in Arnould on Insurance (4th edit. p. 389) that where there is no clause as to mooring in good safety for any given time, if a vessel got to her port and was in moorings waiting her turn to unload, she would have finished her voyage; but that is not the case here. Further than this even if the voyage had finished, I do not think the plaintiffs are entitled to a return of the premium. The vessel may have been damaged on her voyage; if the facts had been known, it would have been known that there was no risk, but they were not known, and therefore the underwriters took on themselves the hazard of an unknown matter.

I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are neither entitled to recover on the policy nor to a return of the premium.

Amphlett, B.—I am of the same opinion.

There was originally a time policy covering voyages to any part of the world subject to certain restrictions. Before the re-insurance was made the places to which the ship was not to go were altered. That no doubt increased the risk and the plaintiffs were minded to decrease it by re-insurance. They did not, however, take the re-insurance to cover the same risk, but the risk so insured against was to cover a voyage policy only. Then a memorandum is introduced in which is is said that the vessel is to proceed to Baltimore instead of to Philadelphia; it still, however, remained a re-insurance for a particular voyage. Then it appears that the vessel was intended to proceed to Antwerp, and the plaintiffs having learnt this, determined to make a corresponding alteration in the counter insurance and they went to the defendants and got this memorandum. "It is hereby agreed to allow the vessel to go to Antwerp," and it is upon this the question turns. This appears to me to be different from liberty to touch at Antwerp, as was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs, for in that case the vessel might go beyond that port. The intention of allowing the vessel to go to Antwerp might be either that she should go there direct from Baltimore, or by way of the United Kingdom; most probably the latter. Either way, Antwerp is substituted for a port of the United Kingdon as the place at which her arrival terminates the risk.

Then on the question whether the additional premium ought to be returned because the vessel had arrived at the port of discharge before the additional premium was paid (like the case of insuring the life of a man who was dead at the time, where there is an entire failure of consideration) Antwerp being the port of discharge, the vessel cannot be said to have safely arrived at her port of discharge till she is safely moored in the dock at Antwerp for the purpose of discharging her cargo. It is found in the case that the captain was, in fact, in the act of moving to the usual place of discharge, and there was, therefore, some risk still remaining which prevents the plaintiff recovering the return of the premium. In Phillips on Insurance paragraph 969 it is said that "the risk on a vessel under a policy of insurance to a place generally without any provision as to her safety there, terminates on the vessel being safely anchored at her port of destination, in the usual place for discharging her cargo." And this I think is the correct rule. The defendants are, therefore, entitled to our judgment on both points.

Huddleston, B.—I am of the same opinion.

I think the insurance was from America to the United Kingdom and from thence to Antwerp, where it ceased.

Now as to the other point, the case of Samuel v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (8 B. and C. 119), which has been handed up to me, is almost conclusive. The question there was whether the voyage had terminated under a policy by which the vessel was insured until she arrived at London and was moored at anchor twenty-four hours in safety. The evidence was that she arrived at Deptford and was moored alongside a king's ship, near the dock gates of the King's Dock, where she was to deliver her cargo. There was evidence that many vessels laden with timber discharged their cargoes at the place where the vessel was moored, and upon this it was contended that the place where she was moored must be considered as the place of her destination, in which case she had been in safety for twenty-four hours before the loss. Lord Tenterden, however, said it was manifest that there never was an intention to discharge the cargo there, and so that ground of defence failed. That seems to me to be an authority distinctly applicable to the present case, to show that the voyage had not come to an end when the vessel was in the outer dock at Antwerp, as there was no intention to discharge there.

Edwards v. Aberayron Mutual Ship Insurance Society (Limited).

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

*Policy of marine insurance—Risk or adventure—Time policy—Member of society by estoppel—Agreement to decide disputes—Condition precedent—*30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7.

Plaintiff had an equitable interest in a ship, and afterwards received a transfer of the legal interest from the registered owner, who was a member of the defendant's society. The owner insured the ship with the defendants in the plaintiff's name by a policy incorporating the rules of the society, and providing among other things that every insurance effected should be valid and binding from noon on that day until noon of the 1*st January then next following. By the rules persons became members only by signing the articles, and none but members could insure their ships. The rules also required certain notice upon sale of a ship or shares thereof. The plaintiff had never signed the articles nor given notice of the transfer to him of the legal interest, but had paid contributions claimed from him as owner by the society. It was also provided by the rules that the directors should decide claims and disputes of members, and that aggrieved members might appeal for reconsideration of decisions, first to the directors themselves, and then to the whole society; and also that no member should be allowed to bring or have any action, suit, or proceeding, or other remedy against the society for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as therein provided. Upon loss of the ship plaintiff was refused his claim upon this policy by the directors twice, but made no appeal to the whole society.*

Held, by the Exchequer Chamber (affirming the Queen's Bench), that the policy incorporated the rules so as to be a sufficient compliance with sect. 7 of the Stamp Act 1867; and that the defendants were estopped from disputing the plaintiff's interest in the policy, and his right as member to claim upon it.

Held, also, by the majority of the Exchequer Chamber (overruling the Queen's Bench), that the plaintiff was not bound by the decision of the directors; but that this action was maintainable.

This was an appeal from the unanimous decision in the defendants' favour of Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, J.J. on a special case stated by order of Nisi Prius.

The special case and the exhibits are fully set out in the report of the case before the court below: (ante, vol. 2, p. 469.)

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26, 1876. — Amphlett, B.—The facts are sufficiently stated in the case and exhibits.

Two points were relied upon in the argument before us on behalf of the defendants: First, that the plaintiff was insured, if at all, upon the terms of the articles; secondly, that under articles 39, 83, and 84, it was made a condition precedent to his right to bring an action that the amount of his claim should be determined by the directors.

On the first point, in my judgment, the defendants are right. The plaintiff knew that he was dealing with a registered society, and the articles are referred to in the contract signed by the directors in a manner which, I think, clearly shows that both parties intended to contract on the footing of the articles. In fact unless the articles are considered (as I think they ought to be) incorporated, the contract would be altogether invalid for (among other reasons) the omission therein of any enumeration of the perils insured against.

On the second point I think that, upon the true construction of the articles, it must be taken to have been the intention of the parties to give exclusive jurisdiction to the directors to settle all claims between the society and its members, and the question whether an agreement to that effect is void as being against the policy of the law is in my judgment concluded by the decision in the House of Lords in Scott v. Avery (5 H. L. Cas. 811). It is true that in the present case the directors are to decide not the mere amount of the claims, but also any dispute that might arise respecting insurances; but so they were in Scott v. Avery, and both the learned Lords who decided that case held such extension of the power of the directors to be immaterial. Under these circumstances it is not necessary to consider at length the subsequent decision of the inferior courts. I may, however, refer to Tredwen v. Holman (1 H. & C. 72), Elliott v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 237), and Dawson v. Fitzgerald (L. Rep. 9 Ex. 7), the first of which is, in my judgment, undistinguishable from the present case.

I think, therefore, that this action cannot be maintained, unless it can be shown that the conduct of the directors in the (so-called) arbitration has rendered it inequitable to compel the plaintiff to submit his claim to their determination. Hence the conduct of the directors in this respect has become very material, and requires a minute examination. The facts are to be found in paragraphs 11, 12, and 13 of the case, which are as follows: (11) "On the 2nd Dec. 1870, the plaintiff sent in to the defendants a claim for the amount of the insurance of the Hermione, viz., 1000*l*., and soon after Daniel Davies (who was the master of the ship when she was lost) was requested to attend a meeting of the board of directors on the 6th Jan. 1871. He attended accordingly, and was questioned as to the circumstances of the loss of the vessel. The directors expressed to Davies their opinion that his account of the wreck was not satisfactory, and that the loss was not shown to have been caused by perils of the seas. When he had withdrawn from the room, they came to the resolution 'That the owners of the Hermione had no claim upon the society.' (12.) The plaintiff had no notice of the meeting, and neither Davies nor the plaintiff had notice of this resolution, or was required to attend the directors on any subsequent occasion. (13.) On the 6th April 1871 a notice signed by ten members of the association, but not signed by the plaintiff or Davies, was sent to the defendants' office. This notice was submitted to the next quarterly meeting of the directors. No notice to attend was given either to the plaintiff or Davies, and in their absence the directors, without further inquiry, came to the same resolution as before, viz., that the owners of the Hermione had no claim upon the society." In my opinion, these proceedings of the directors were unjustifiable, and can only be accounted for, consistently with honesty and good faith, by supposing that they had mistaken their real position, and that being agents of the society, they supposed they had no duty to perform towards the plaintiff. It is beyond doubt, however, that when they undertook the delicate task of adjudicating between their own society and a member, their functions, if not strictly the same, were analogous to those of an arbitrator, and they were bound to act judicially and with perfect fairness and impartiality between the parties: M'Intosh v. Great Western Railway (2 De G. & Sm. 758). To come to a decision, under these circumstances, in favour of their own society and against the plaintiff, without hearing him or giving him an opportunity of being heard, was contrary to every principle of justice, and ought not I think to be held by any court of law or equity to be binding upon him.

Moreover, I think that it would be unreasonable to compel the plaintiff now to submit his claim again to the directors, they having already prejudged the case in his absence. It is hardly likely that, after what has occurred, the directors could now approach the subject with that even and unbiassed mind which is, as the Vice-Chancellor said in Kemp v. Rose (1 Giff. 264), "essential to the validity of every judicial proceeding." If the matter had rested only on the first meeting of the directors on the 6th Jan. 1871, it might have been suggested that the directors, having had no notice of the transfer of the vessel to the plaintiff, considered Davies as the owner, and thought it sufficient to have him before them; but it did not rest there, for no notice of that resolution was ever given either to Davies or to the plaintiff, nor was any notice given to either of them of the subsequent quarterly meeting to which the notice signed by ten members was submitted, and at which the same resolution was confirmed in the absence of both. I infer from these facts that the attendance of Davies, who, as I said before, was master of the lost vessel, was requested as a witness and not as the supposed owner, and his presence therefore at the first meeting does not alter the view I have taken of the directors' conduct in the matter.

But it is said that the determination of the directors having been made a condition precedent to bringing an action, a court of law at least cannot interfere, as that would be making a new contract for the parties. I think there is a fallacy in this argument. Courts of equity have no more power to make new contracts for parties than courts of law, and yet they could undoubtedly interfere when a contract is performed on one side, and the mode agreed upon for ascertaining the amount to be paid by the other has failed in any way without the plaintiff's fault. Put the simple case, which is in principle the same as that we are considering:—A. contracts to do work for B., the price to be determined by the engineer of B. The work is done, and before the price is determined, the engineer by some act of his own, not necessarily fraudulent, becomes incapacitated to act as arbitrator. I cannot persuade myself that courts of law are powerless to prevent the gross injustice of B. having the benefit of the work without compensation to A., except by the inconvenient and often ineffectual course of bringing an action for neglect of duty against the engineer and his employer. To give direct redress in such a case seems to me only another application of the well-known principle that a man shall not take advantage of his own wrong, under which even precedent conditions in their strictest sense have been held to be discharged where performance was prevented by the defendant himself. See Comyn's Digest, tit. "Condition," 1. 6, and the case of Hotham v. The East India Company (1 T. R. 638). Courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction, even in respect of legal contracts, with courts of law in cases of fraud, and they appear to have assumed jurisdiction in the sort of cases we are considering, on the ground that where the acts of the defendants, which prevented the amount of the plaintiff's claims being ascertained in the agreed mode, were not in themselves fraudulent, yet they would become fraudulent if used for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's rights. (See M'Intosh v. Great Western Railway (2 De G. & Sm. 758), and on appeal (2 Mac. & G. 74). It most frequently happens that the circumstances of these cases are complicated, and can be more conveniently investigated in a court of equity than a court of law; but in a case like the present, where a court of law can do complete justice by simply disallowing a defence founded on the failure of the agreed arbitration through the acts of the directors, the convenience is quite the other way; and I can see no reason why a court of law should not determine the matter themselves.

For these reasons, I think that the plaintiff can sustain his action, and there is no difficulty about the amount, as it is found in the case that the defendants now admit, contrary to what their directors had determined, a total loss of the vessel by perils of the sea. The decision of the court below is, therefore, in my opinion erroneous, and ought to be reversed; and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for 1000*l.* with interest and cost of suit.

Pollock, B. delivered the judgment of Archibald, J. and himself.—This action is brought by the plaintiff as owner of a vessel called the Hermione, against the defendants, who are a limited company for mutual insurance of ships, to recover upon an insurance effected with the defendants, whereby the Hermione was insured from the 24th Feb. 1870 to noon of the 1st Jan. following.

The defendants admit that the Hermione was insured, and also that there was a total loss as above stated; but they contend that the plaintiff can maintain no action against the company until he has complied with the company's articles which relate to the adjustment and settlement of losses. The plaintiff alleges that the document by which the insurance was effected gives him a right of action independently of these articles. The Hermione was bought by one Daniel Davies in 1868, to whom the plaintiff made advances to enable him to purchase her; and in Jan. 1869 she was insured with the defendants by Davies, who directed that the policy should be made out in the name of the plaintiff, and handed to him. In Jan. 1870, Davies being absent with the ship, the plaintiff applied for a renewal of the insurance, and on the 24th Feb. he paid the annual premium and duty, amounting to 17*l.* 15*s.*, and obtained the document usually issued to members insuring. This document is headed "Aberayron Mutual Ship Insurance Society (Limited), registered pursuant to the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89." It contains the rates for various insurances, rules as to periods of sailing, and other matters; and at the close of one relating to allowance for repairs is a reference, "vide article 70." It states also "That every insurance effected shall be valid and binding from twelve o'clock of the noon on that day on which the insurance shall be effected until twelve o'clock of the noon of the first day of Jan. next following." The document ends as follows:

This is to certify that Mr. Evan Edwards, as ship's husband for the Hermione, 162 tons, A 1 registered, whereof is master at the present time Daniel Davies, has this day paid 17*l.* 10*s.* for the insurance of 52 shares, 1000*l.*, on the said vessel. Value of whole ship, as per rule for this class, 17*l.* 10*s.* per ton, 12*l.* 15*s.* 1000*l.*

In March 1870 application was made to the plaintiff for a further sum of 17*l.* 10*s.*, being his contribution to the losses of the year 1869, payable in respect of the ship Hermione at the rate of 100 per cent. and this sum was paid by him; and in Oct. 1870 a further call was made, and paid by the plaintiff for losses of the year 1870. On the 14th May 1870 Davies, by bill of sale, duly registered, transferred the Hermione to the plaintiff, and notice of this transfer was given to the defendants. In Nov. 1870 the Hermione was wrecked and became a total loss. Except by the reference, "vide article 70," and the words "as per rule for this class," there is no allusion to any articles or rules other than those contained in the documents dated the 24th Feb. 1870, and the last-mentioned rule is contained in the articles and repeated in the document. The defendants' society was, however, governed by a memorandum of association, and by articles of association dated

Dec. 1864, which contained in all 98 articles. These provide for the constitution of the society, the duties of its directors, rates of insurance, and other matters usually found in the rules of a mutual insurance society; and many of those relating to the terms of insurance are repeated in the document which was given to the plaintiff on his paying his premium in Feb. 1870. Amongst those not so repeated are the following: Memorandum of Association, article 3 "The objects for which the company is established are the mutual insurance of ships belonging to members of the company, and the doing of all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects." Articles of Association, article 3: "Every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become a member of the company who insures any ship or share in a ship, in pursuance of the regulations hereinafter contained." Article 39: "That the directors shall have full power to enter into and execute, and also to modify, alter, or release any contract or agreement respecting any matter in which the society may be interested, and to adjust, settle, and decide all claims and demands upon the society by the members thereof, or to decide and determine all disputes, controversies, and matters arising between the society and members of the society concerning insurances or claims upon or liabilities by or to the society, and concerniug the laws, rules, regulations, and bye-laws of the society; and the decision of the directors shall be final and conclusive, as well upon the society as the members thereof; and no member of the society shall be allowed to bring or have any action, suit, or proceeding or other remedy against the society or the members thereof for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as is provided by these presents." Article 83: "That in all cases of any vessel or share thereof insured by the society being lost, wrecked, stranded, burnt, abandoned, captured, damaged, or injured by being run down or otherwise injured by any other vessel, the owner, master, or mate or some of the crew shall, as soon as circumstances will permit, give notice thereof to the secretary of the society, who shall thereupon by letter to the several directors summon a board of directors on the first convenient day, not exceeding seven days from the receipt of such notice, and the directors shall proceed to examine the owner, master, and mate, and such of the crew as they shall think necessary, as to the cause of such loss or damage, and shall make such further inquiries and take such measures and make such decisions and regulations thereon as in their judgment the case shall require; and the owner or master of any vessel so lost, wrecked, stranded, burnt, abandoned, captured, damaged, or injured, shall not commence any repairs except such as shall be deemed necessary for the immediate safety of such vessel, or settle or compromise any claims or disputes, or prosecute or defend any action or suit in relation thereto, without the previous consent of the directors." Article 84: "That if any member of the society shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the directors, as to the settlement of any loss or damage sustained by such member, or as to any claim or other matter settled, adjusted, or decided by the directors, and such member so dissatisfied shall procure ten other members of the society, not being directors, to join with him in a written requisition to the directors to reconsider and revise their decision, the directors shall thereupon call a board of directors of not less than ten, and reconsider and revise such decision; and in case such member shall be dissatisfied with the further decision of such board of directors, such member so dissatisfied, together with twenty other members of the society, may by writing under their hands require the secretary to summon a special general meeting of the society to be held at any time not exceeding fourteen days from the receipt of such writing by the secretary; and such special general meeting shall have full power to confirm or vary the decision of the directors, and whatever shall be decided by the special general meeting shall be final and binding as well upon the society as upon all the parties interested in the decision." No copy of these articles was furnished to the plaintiff; he had not read them, nor did he know their contents. It was contended for the defendants that this was immaterial, because, by the Companies Act 1862, s. 16, the articles of association, when registered, are binding on members as if each member had signed and sealed them, and there was a covenant contained in this on his part to conform to all the regulations contained in them. This contention in my judgment fails, for sect. 23 defines members to be persons who have agreed to be members, and whose names are entered on the register of members. The plaintiff's name was not so entered, and he is not made a member by the statute.

Under these circumstances the first question that arises is, what was the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants? and I will consider this at present apart from the Stamp Act. It appears to me to be extremely doubtful whether a complete contract of insurance could, under any circumstances, be gathered from the document dated 24th Feb. 1870, taken by itself. At best it is rather in the nature of a receipt for premium than a policy, and it contains no covenant or contract for payment. But, however this may be, it is, I think, clear that those who signed it had no authority to bind the company to any contract of insurance other than what is contemplated and provided for by the articles. If, therefore, the document in question stood alone, the result would be that there would be no contract with the company. The document is, however, headed "Aberayron Mutual Ship Insurance Society (Limited)," and, therefore, denotes that the object of the society is the mutual insurance of ships belonging to members. It has reference to one article not contained in it, and in its form it resembles rather a certificate that a contract exists than a contract itself. From what is expressed, and also from what is absent, the plaintiff must, I think, have been aware that it did not contain all the terms of the proposed insurance as to adjustment and settlement, and the defendants are entitled to present to the plaintiff the dilemma that either there is no contract, or the contract is that which they admit, viz., an insurance subject to the articles. We have power to draw inferences of fact, and the proper inference appears to me to be, that the plaintiff has entered into a contract, which is evidenced by the document dated the 24th Feb 1870, and the articles of association. When the latter are referred to, what is deficient in the certificate is supplied, for although there is no undertaking to pay to the assured upon a loss so as to give an immediate right of action, as indeed there never is by the rules of a mutual insurance society; Articles 39, 83, and 84, provide for a member who has any claim giving notice thereof, for the summoning of a board of directors to examine into it, and for their decision thereon; and, further, that if the member is dissatisfied, he may, if ten other members will join him, summon a second board of directors to reconsider their decision, and if he is dissatisfied with the decision on appeal, he may, if twenty members will join him, appeal to a special general meeting, who may confirm or vary the decision.

It was strongly argued on behalf of the plaintiff, that the effect of the decision of the court below would be to deprive the plaintiff of his right to resort to the courts of law to enforce his rights, and the well-known arguments against ousting their jurisdiction were resorted to. If, however, the view I take of the articles be correct, no such objection arises, because their effect is not to substitute a special tribunal to deal with an existing cause of action, but to provide by the contract between the parties, upon which alone any claim of the plaintiff is based, a mode by which that claim shall be established, and which must be pursued as a condition precedent to any right to payment arising. There is no more displacement of a cause of action or ousting of jurisdiction than there is when parties agree that a builder shall be paid such a sum as an architect shall name, and the case comes within the principle acted on in Scott v. Avery (5 H. L. Cas. 811), Tredwen v. Holman (1 H. & C. 72), and Elliott v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 237), and not within that by which the court was governed in Horton v. Sayer (4 H. & N. 643). The distinction between these cases is well pointed out by Bramwell, B., in Tredwen v. Holman, where he says: "If a tenant covenants that he will cultivate the devised land in a husbandlike manner, and also covenants that if any dispute shall arise in respect thereof, it shall be referred to arbitration, an action may nevertheless be maintained; but where the covenant is to pay such damages as shall be ascertained by an arbitrator, no action will lie until the arbitrators have given their decision." And, again, in similar language in Dawson v. Fitzgerald (L. Rep. 9 Ex. 10).

Before leaving this part of the subject, I must not omit, however, to notice the construction of article 39, that was pressed upon us by Mr. Cohen, as counsel for the plaintiff. The article provides that no member shall be allowed to bring any action, suit or proceeding, or other remedy against the society or the members thereof for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, "except as is provided by these presents." He argued that these words were intended to preclude a member from bringing any action against the society, even where his loss has been adjusted by the directors, and they decline to pay. It appears to me that, although the language used is not very clear or accurate, the intention of the parties is limited to requiring that members having claims on the society shall proceed according to the mode of proof pointed out by the articles, and that if all conditions precedent were fulfilled, and the decision of the directors was obtained in favour of the claimant for a specific amount, an action would well lie against the society if they refused to pay it.

I have hitherto dealt with the question apart from the Stamp Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. Section 7 of this Act provides that "no contract or agreement for sea insurance shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy, and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured." And by sect. 4 the word "policy" is declared to mean "any instrument whereby a contract or agreement for any sea insurance is made or entered into." The object of this enactment is to prevent persons obtaining the benefit of a marine insurance without paying stamp duty. It clearly does not make any particular form of policy compulsory, else it would have referred to as essential the form mentioned in sect. 5 and schedule E, which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue are thereby bound to provide; nor does it forbid companies or underwriters importing into their stamped policies, by reference or otherwise, terms which are not expressed in them, provided the risk and other matters mentioned in sect. 7 are contained in a stamped policy. It seems to me, therefore, that the document dated the 24th Feb. 1870, satisfies the requirements of and is sufficient as a policy within the Stamp Act, although terms exist relating to the adjustment and settlement of any loss that may arise under it which are not contained in it, and yet are binding on the plaintiff. To apply to this case the well-known principle acted on in Boydell v. Drummond (11 East, 142) would be, I think, unnecessary and unreasonable, for there is no such reason for the exclusion of parol evidence to connect the various documents which are intended together to constitute the contract or policy of insurance, as there is in the case of contracts within the Statute of Frauds.

Although, therefore, the inartificial manner in which the policy and rules are drawn creates some difficulty, I find it satisfactory to arrive at a conclusion which supports what was the substance of the transaction, and prevents the plaintiff setting up a contract which it is obvious he could not himself have contemplated, and which certainly could never have been intended by the defendants, as it would have been a departure from the fundamental principles and the daily practice of the company.

For these reasons the judgment of the Queen's Bench should, in my opinion, be affirmed.

Brett, J.—This was an action to recover a total loss on the vessel Hermione.

The vessel was originally purchased by Daniel Davies, the plaintiff's brother-in-law, in Dec. 1868. She was mortgaged to the plaintiff, who eventually, in May 1870, became the registered owner. In Jan. 1869, Davies effected an insurance on the vessel with the defendants, directing that the policy should be made out in the plaintiff's name and should be handed to him. The document sued on as a policy was forwarded by the defendants to the plaintiff. It was stated in the case to be "the usual form of policy issued by the defendants to their members." In Jan. 1870 the plaintiff applied for a renewal of the insurance, paid the premium, and received an acknowledgment in his own name. In March 1870, the defendants applied to the plaintiff by way of call for the contribution in respect of the Hermione to the losses of the year 1869, and the plaintiff paid the call. The same occurred in Oct. 1870. The vessel was registered in the plaintiff's name in May 1870. She was wrecked and became a total loss in Nov. 1870. In Dec. 1870 the plaintiff sent in his claim. On the 6th Jan. 1871, the directors of the defendants' company summoned Davies before them, who was captain of the vessel at the time of the wreck, and having heard his account, resolved that it was not shown that the vessel was lost by perils of the sea, and that the owners of the Hermione had no claim upon the society. No notice of this meeting or of the resolution was given to the plaintiff, and he was not heard, nor was anyone on his behalf, before the resolution was passed. In April 1871 ten members signed a notice as to this decision, which notice was referred to a quarterly meeting of the society. The meeting confirmed the resolution. No notice of this meeting or appeal was given to the plaintiff, and he was not heard upon it. The case then stated that the defendants now admitted the total loss of the vessel by perils of the seas, but contended that the document upon which the plaintiff brings the action does not specify the risk, and is therefore void as a policy of insurance under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7 and 9. They further, as the case stated, contended that the rules and articles of the association are to be treated as incorporated with the policy, and that under the rules the resolutions come to by the directors were a decision upon the plaintiff's claim, and that not having been appealed from in the manner pointed out by rule 84, the decision had become final and binding. The court was to have power to draw all such inferences of fact as should have been drawn by a jury, and to amend so as to enable the plaintiff to recover all or any of the moneys paid by him to the defendants.

Upon the argument before us, it was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that there was a valid contract of insurance, that the contract was to be found solely in the document of March 1869, that such document did not incorporate the articles and rules of the association; that whether it did or not, the plaintiff's right to maintain the action was not abrogated, for that rule 39 was no answer to the action, being an attempt to set up a private tribunal to try a right of action accrued, and that no such decision by the directors or the meeting as was relied upon could affect the plaintiff, who had not been summoned or heard when it was arrived at.

It was admitted on behalf of the defendants that there was a contract of insurance contained in a valid policy, and that there was a total loss, and that the plaintiff was a member of the association; but it was argued that the policy consisted not only of the document of March 1869—which, if it stood alone, was no policy at all, because in it the risk was not sufficiently specified—but of that document and the articles and rules; that by the rules the plaintiff was bound to submit his claim to the decision of the directors, subject to an appeal to a quarterly and a general meeting; that no right of action accrued to any member in respect of a loss unless he could obtain from the directors or the association a decision in his favour that his claim was valid and to a certain amount; that the plaintiff had not obtained such a decision; that the adverse decisions of the directors and the quarterly meeting were final; and that the plaintiff therefore never had a cause of action against the defendants.

Several points argued in the Court of Queen's Bench were not argued before us.

The questions before us are: First, is the document of March 1869 to stand alone as the policy, or are it and the articles and rules, or some of them, to be read together, and so to form a policy in writing? Secondly, if the document of March 1869 is to stand alone, is it a valid policy in writing? Thirdly, do the rules, if they are to be considered as no part of the policy, prevent the plaintiff from maintaining this action? Fourthly, do they prevent the plaintiff from maintaining the action, if they are to be considered as part of the policy?

As to the first question, it was argued that there is no contract of insurance here, unless it be formed by the document of March 1869; that such document contains no reference to the rules which are said to prevent the plaintiff from maintaining the action, and therefore does not incorporate them. And the case of Boydell v. Drummond (11 East, 142) was cited. That case was decided on the Statute of Frauds. The ground of decision was that separate documents in writing could not be joined together to make a memorandum in writing within that statute unless there was a sufficient reference from one writing to another contained in the documents themselves to show that they were intended to be jointly the memorandum, without being obliged to have recourse to parol evidence to show such intention; for otherwise the danger from parol evidence would arise, which it was the intention of the statute to obviate. That ground of decision is applicable only when the question is, whether there is or is not a sufficient memorandum within the Statute of Frauds. It does not seem to me to be applicable to a question whether there is a sufficient policy of insurance in writing, or as to what documents form that policy. I see no reason why parol evidence should not be admitted to show what documents were intended by the parties to form an alleged contract of insurance. It seems to me in the present case obvious, as an inference of fact from the whole relation between the parties (and we have power to draw inferences of fact), that the intention was that the contract of insurance should be found not alone in the document of March 1869, but in it and such of the rules as are applicable to a contract of insurance.

Such being my opinion, it is unnecessary to determine the second question. Still my opinion is, that there is nothing in the Stamp Act to prevent the document of March 1869 from being considered as a valid policy. I agree with the interpretation of the Stamp Act contained in the judgment of Blackburn, J. in this case in the Queen's Bench.

Neither is it necessary to determine the third question. Though here, again, I should think it plain that if the articles and rules are a separate contract from the policy, no agreement in them, however strong and absolute not to sue, could prevent the plaintiff from maintaining an action on the separate policy or contract of insurance.

The fourth is therefore the main question in this case. It seems to me to raise these questions: What is the contract as to payment in case of loss? What is the stipulation as to the assured suing in a court of law or equity? What is the limit of the rule of law established by the case of Scott v. Avery? Does it prevent the maintenance of the present action?

Now, as to the first there is no express stipulation as to any payment being due in case of loss in the document of March 1869. Neither is there any in the articles of association. Those articles contain rules for the management of the society, and rules as to the making of contracts of insurance, and rules which, as I have said, form, in my opinion, parts of the contract of insurance. With the rules which deal solely with the management of the society we are not concerned. Those which are applicable to the making of contracts of insurance are rule 28, which primarily gives the power of making such contracts to the directors; rule 40, which gives authority to the directors to delegate the power of signing policies to two directors and the chairman, and enacts that no policy but one so signed shall be binding on the society; and rule 53 which adds further restrictions. These rules show that there would be no valid insurance in this case without the document of March 1869, but do not, in my opinion, prevent the incorporation into or adjunction to that document as part of the contract of such rules as are applicable to the contract. Rules which thus form part of the contract are, amongst others, rule 61, which shows that the society insures not only against total loss, but also against partial loss or damage, if to a certain amount: and rule 83, which by a necessary implication discloses the perils insured against, including loss or damage by collision. I do not doubt that rules 39 and 84 are also included in the contract, and form part of the policy. What, in my opinion, is the true construction of them I will presently state. But for the present I observe that neither of them contains any express undertaking to pay in case of loss, or to pay at any specified time. There is no rule which has any express stipulation to pay anything in case of loss. But then there never is any such express stipulation in any policy of marine insurance in ordinary form. A Lloyd's policy contains no such express stipulation. It has always been implied that a liability to indemnify arises directly there is a loss or damage by a peril insured against, unless such liability is prevented by some stipulation or condition expressed or implied in the policy. In the policy, therefore, in this case, it is to be implied that such liability to indemnify arises directly a loss or damage is caused by a peril insured against unless the true construction of sect. 39 is that it postpones the attaching of liability to a later time, or makes it depend upon another event than a loss or damage caused by a peril insured against. The first rule applicable to events in order of time after an alleged loss or damage is rule 83. "In all cases of any vessel &c., being lost, &c., the owner, master, or mate, or some of the crew shall, as soon as circumstances will permit, give notice thereof to the secretary, &c.; and the directors shall proceed to examine the owner, master and mate, and such of the crew as they shall think necessary, as to the cause of such loss or damage, and shall make such further inquiries, and take such measures, and make such decision and regulations thereon as in their judgment the case shall require." There is to be inquiry and decision, not merely as to the amount of loss or damage, but as to the cause of loss or damage. This seems to me to assume to give power to decide whether the loss was or was not caused by a peril insured against, so as to decide whether the society is or is not liable for the loss or damage in respect of which a claim was made. By rule 84, "if any member shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the directors," amongst other things, "as to any claim or other matters decided by the directors," he may appeal to a special general meeting. And by rule 39 the directors shall have full power, amongst other things, "to decide and determine all disputes, controversies, and matters arising between the society and members of the society concerning insurances, or claims upon, or liabilities by the society." These confirm and strengthen the view that it was intended that the directors should decide and determine not only the amount for which the society should be liable if a liability could be proved, but the question whether there was or was not any liability. And it was upon the latter view that the directors in the present case assumed to decide and determine that the society was not liable to the plaintiff.

The next question is, what is the effect endeavoured to be given by the rules to the decision of the directors or of the general meeting of the society? By rule 39, "And the decision of the directors shall be final and conclusive, as well upon the society as the members thereof." That is to say, a decision as to whether the society is or is not liable at all, is to be final and conclusive. Then the rule continues, "And no member of the society shall be allowed to bring or have any action, suit, or proceeding, or other remedy against the society, or the members thereof, for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as is provided by these presents." The rule then provides that the directors may, if they think fit, cause "any of such claims"—i.e. any claim upon the society concerning insurance, i.e. the whole claim—to be referred to the decision of any person practising as an average adjuster. The powers given to this person are clearly to be exercised judicially, as if by a tribunal. "And the decision or award of such average adjuster shall be final and conclusive on the society and claimant, and no appeal shall be allowed therefrom." And so by rule 84, "Whatever shall be decided by the special general meeting shall be final and binding, as well upon the society as upon all the parties interested in the decision." These inquiries and decisions are not confined to the question of amount contingent on a liability being admitted or established. They may, so far as I can see, take place where the amount is not in dispute, if a liability be established; but where the liability is disputed, the terms are certainly wide enough to include every question which may arise upon any claim by a member for any alleged loss under a policy. They assume a claim in respect of an alleged right, a dispute as to the validity of such claim, an inquiry into such dispute, and a decision which shall be final and conclusive. If the decision ought to be arrived at after hearing evidence and the parties, it is a judicial decision. If so, it seems difficult, if not impossible to say that there is not an attempt and intention to form a private tribunal which is to replace the ordinary tribunals of the country. The stipulations as to the procedure before the average adjuster show that those who drew the rules intended that there should in all the inquiries be a judicial investigation before a tribunal, which is therefore a judicial tribunal. These rules do not seem to me to confine the inquiry and decision of which they treat to the amount to be paid, leaving the liability to pay to be established before the ordinary courts, or merely to postpone the liability to pay until the amount to be paid has been determined by the directors or an arbitrator; they do not affect the time of payment in respect of a loss; they do not therefore alter the implied contract to indemnify directly a loss arises; they leave that contract to be independent, they deal no more with that than with any other stipulation in the contract of insurance; but they are, as it seems to me, intended to create a tribunal to hear and determine every question which may arise in respect of a policy made with the society, and to determine everything finally and compulsorily, so as to prevent any application to the ordinary courts.

Then arises the question, what is the law? I agree with Martin, B. in Horton v. Sayers (4 H. & N. 650), that if the decision in Scott v. Avery in the House of Lords is to be interpreted according to the opinion expressed therein of Lord Campbell, the former cases are overruled, and the doctrine previously maintained with regard to ousting the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts is exploded. But I do not think it is possible to say that the decision of the House of Lords did overrule the former decisions. Baron Martin thought it did. He so stated in Horton v. Sayers, and so in terms ruled in Tredwen v. Holman (1 H. & C. 72). The facts in Scott v. Avery, as interpreted, did not make it necessary to decide more than this, that there may be a valid and binding contract that no action shall be maintained until the amount of damage, if any, has been ascertained in a specified mode. "It appears to me perfectly clear," said the Lord Chancellor, "that the language used indicates this to have been the intention of the parties: that, supposing there was a difference between the person who had suffered loss or damage, and the committe, as to what amount he should recover, that was to be ascertained in a particular mode, and that until that mode had been adopted, and the amount ascertained according to that mode, no right of action should exist. In other words that the right of action should be not for what a jury should say was the amount of the loss, but for what the persons designated in that particular form of agreement should so say." This ruling, as it seems to me, in no way conflicts with the right in either party to litigate before a court of law or equity any other question than the amount of damages which might arise under or in respect of the contract. The terms of the rules in that case were not the same as in this. They were, first, "that the sum to be paid to any suffering member for any loss or damage shall in the first instance be ascertained and settled by the committee." And then "that no member who refuses, &c., shall be entitled to maintain any action at law or suit in equity on his policy until the matters in dispute shall have been referred, &c., and then only for such sum as the said arbitrators shall award, and the obtaining the decision of such arbitrators on the matters and claims in dispute is hereby declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any such action or suit." These terms seem rather to assume than to forbid the possibility of an action or suit upon questions other than the amount. There is no dispute as to the principle, says Coleridge, J. in the Exchequer Chamber, 8 Ex. 500. "Both sides admit that it is not unlawful for parties to agree to impose a condition precedent with respect to the mode of settling the amount of damage, or the time of paying it, or any matter of that kind which do not go to the root of the action. On the other hand it is conceded that any agreement which is to prevent the suffering party from coming into a court of law, or in other words which ousts the courts of their jurisdiction cannot be supported." And in order to found or support the judgment the large terms in that case were by reference confined so as to be applied to a reference of the amount only and not of the liability. In Horton v. Sayer (4 H. & N. 643), the stipulations in the lease were "that if at any time during the said term, or at or after the expiration thereof, any difference should arise touching or concerning any covenant, &c., all and every the matters in difference should be finally settled by arbitrators, and every such award should be binding and conclusive, and that the parties should not commence or prosecute any action or suit, or seek any remedy either in law or equity, for relief in the premises without first submitting to such arbitration as aforesaid all matters in difference, &c." It is obvious that in those stipulations the arbitration was not confined to settling an amount of damages, but was general. "In this case," says Pollock, C.B., "the deed discloses nothing more than an agreement generally to refer all disputes to arbitration, and that does not prevent the plaintiff from maintaining this action." And Bramwell, B. says, "I think Scott v. Avery was rightly decided, though perhaps I may have some bias in consequence of having been counsel for the plaintiff. The principle of that decision is very intelligible. If a man covenants to do a particular act, and also covenants that if any dispute shall arise in respect thereof, it shall be referred to arbitration, that is the case with reference to which the courts have used the unfortunate expression that their jurisdiction is ousted by the agreement of the parties. On the other hand, if a man covenants to do a particular act, and that in the event of his not doing it the other party shall be entitled to receive such a sum of money as they shall agree upon, or if they cannot agree such an amount as shall be determined by an arbitrator, there is no debt which can be sued for until the arbitrator has ascertained what sum is to be paid." He then decides in favour of the plaintiff, because "there is a distinct and unqualified covenant by the defendant that he will do a particular act, and also a covenant that if any difference shall arise it shall be referred to arbitration." It is impossible, as it seems to me, to have a more clear statement that Scott v. Avery did not overrule the former decisions, and the case is an authority that the distinction is between an agreement to refer a particular point as a condition precedent to an action, and to refer all matters in dispute so as to have no action. In Roper v. Lendon (1 E. & E. 825), the 10th condition in a fire policy was, "the amount of every loss will be paid immediately after the same shall have been established to the satisfaction of the directors." The 15th condition was, "in case any difference or dispute shall arise between the insured and the company touching any loss, &c., or otherwise in respect of any insurance, such difference shall be submitted, &c., and the award shall be conclusive and binding on all parties." The 6th plea relied on the 15th condition; Mr. Lush arguing for the defendants admitted that the 6th plea was bad. This of itself is high authority. Lord Campbell giving judgment said, "the 6th plea is clearly bad. The agreement to refer contained in the 15th condition is merely collateral to the agreement to pay. The courts will not, therefore, treat the agreement to refer as ousting their jurisdiction until there has been a reference. The distinction between the present case and cases like Scott v. Avery is plainly pointed out in the judgment there delivered in the House of Lords: "The present case does not fall within that decision, &c." And Hill J.: "The 6th plea is bad. The case is clearly not within the decision in Scott v. Avery. Here the agreement to refer is collateral to the agreement to pay. There the agreement was to pay only such a sum as the arbitrators should award." This seems to me a conclusive statement by or with the assent of Lord Campbell, on whose judgment in the House of Lords reliance was placed for the proposition that the doctrine as to ousting the jurisdiction of the courts is abrogated, that Scott v. Avery did not overrule that doctrine, that it still exists, and that the test is whether the agreement to refer applies only to the ascertaining a particular fact, or to the decision of every dispute which may arise. In Cooke v. Cooke (L. Rep. 4 Eq. 77), Sir W. Page Wood, at p. 85, thus discusses Scott v. Avery: "These observations of Lord St. Leonards have been commented on by the present Lord Chancellor in Scott v. Corporation of Liverpool, which fell within the principle of Scott v. Avery, a simple case where a contractor had agreed that he should be paid only what the engineer should certify, and it was held that there was no right of action until the certificate was made. But the Lord Chancellor distinguishes that simple class of cases from the other, where a distinct right, such as a debt or an obligation to account, has arisen, and the parties have agreed upon a particular private tribunal, which shall adjust the right for them. Speaking of the latter class of cases the Lord Chancellor says, 'A right of action has accrued, and it would be against the policy of the law to give effect to an agreement that such a right should not be enforced through the medium of the ordinary tribunals.'" But the case of Tredwen v. Holman (1 H. & C. 72) is said to be contrary to these views. The stipulation in the policy was "and all other cases of dispute of whatever nature shall be referred in like manner, and no action at law shall be brought until the arbitrators have given their decision." The court decided in favour of the defendants. Martin, B. in delivering the judgment said, "The case of Scott v. Avery decided that the insurer and the underwriter may contract that no right of action (to be enforced in a court of law) shall accrue until an arbitrator has decided not merely as to the amount of damages to be recovered, but upon any dispute that may arise upon the policy. The agreement is clear and unambiguous, and the parties probably meant to act upon Scott v. Avery, and excluded the jurisdiction of the courts of law except for the purpose of enforcing the award to be made by the arbitrator." This judgment seems to me to be founded upon the view entertained by Martin, B. that the judgment in the House of Lords in Scott v. Avery, which was contrary to the opinion given by him in that case, overruled all the previous decisions on the subject. "It seems to me," he said, in Horton v. Sayers (4 H. & N. 650) "that Scott v. Avery has overruled all the previous decisions on the subject." As I cannot accede to this view I venture to say that Tredwen v. Holman cannot be supported. The true limitation of Scott v. Avery seems to me to be that which was expressed in it, and which, as I have pointed out, has so often been expressed about it, that if parties to a contract agree to a stipulation in it which imposes as a condition precedent to the maintenance of a suit of action for a breach of it, settling by arbitration the amount of damage or the time of paying it, or any matters of that kind which do not go to the root of the action, i.e., which do not prevent any action at all from being maintained, such stipulation prevents any action being maintained until the particular fact has been settled by arbitration; but a stipulation in a contract which in terms would submit every dispute arising on the contract to arbitration, and so would prevent the suffering or complaining party from maintaining any suit or action at all in respect of any breach of the contract, does not prevent an action from being maintained; it gives at most a right of action for not submitting to arbitration and for damages probably nominal. And the rule is founded on public policy. It in no way prevents parties from referring to arbitration disputes which have arisen, but it does prevent them from establishing as it were before they dispute a private tribunal which may from ignorance do what the invented tribunal here did, viz., act in contravention and insist on acting in contravention of the most elementary principle of the administration of justice.

In this case, upon a careful consideration of such of the rules in the articles of association as are in my opinion parts of the written contract of insurance, I come to the conclusion that there is nothing to postpone the attaching of the implied liability to indemnify for a loss to any time subsequent to the loss, that the stipulations as to arbitration by the committee or meetings would, if carried out according to their terms, prevent the assured under any policy of the society from maintaining any suit or action at all in the ordinary courts of the country in respect of any dispute arising on the policy; and therefore that such stipulations do not prevent the plaintiff from maintaining this action.

I am consequently of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should not be supported, and that judgment should be given for the plaintiff.

Kelly, C.B.—I agree in opinion with Mr. Justice Brett, and chiefly upon the grounds upon which he has delivered that opinion.

It seems to me impossible to deny that inasmuch as by the contract between the parties the defendants have agreed that an insurance has been effected, and as they now admit that a total loss has been sustained, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of that loss. If there be no policy and no insurance, for what can they pretend that they have received the different premiums and the contribution of the plaintiff to losses sustained by other members? This reduces the case to the single question whether the 39th and some other articles are a bar to the action on the ground that the decision of the directors is final and conclusive. If it be so, it can only be because the parties have contracted that there should be no remedy by action upon any claim upon any policy of insurance, and this would be not only to oust the courts of their jurisdiction to entertain an action upon a policy of insurance, but looking to the terms of the 39th article would be to hold that no action at all is maintainable under any circumstances by a member against the company. For we find that the directors "have full power (inter alia) to release any contract or agreement respecting any matter in which the society may be interested, and to decide all claims and demands upon the society by the members thereof, and all controversies and matters arising between the society and the members of the society, concerning insurances or claims upon or liabilities by or to the society: and the decision of the directors shall be final and conclusive, and no members of the society shall be allowed to bring any action suit or proceeding or other remedy against the society or the members thereof for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof except as therein provided." And no provision is to be found qualifying this part of the articles. If this provision be of legal validity, the effect would be that had the decision been in favour of the plaintiff that he was entitled to recover the sums insured, he could have maintained no action to enforce it.

The case of Scott v. Avery has been quoted, and undoubtedly there is much in the language of Lord Campbell in his judgment which, taken by itself, might seem to show, as Baron Martin (I think incorrectly) held, that it put an end to the doctrine against the ousting of the jurisdiction of the courts. But when we look to the facts of the case, and to the more cautious and I think accurate language of the Lord Chancellor, the decision may well be construed to amount to no more than that where the recovery upon a policy of insurance is made expressly dependent upon the amount of the loss having been ascertained by arbitration or upon the performance of some other legal condition, and when other subjects of controversy are also to be submitted to arbitration, no action lies until the amount of the loss is so ascertained, or that the condition upon which the action may be brought has been performed. The language also of the judges, on whichever side their opinions were pronounced, is uniformly to the effect that the jurisdiction of the courts cannot be ousted by the contract of the parties, though the maintaining of the action may be made conditional upon the amount of loss or damage being previously ascertained, or upon some other conditions not applicable to the present case. I must add that the resistance of the defendants to this demand appears to me so extremely unconscientious and unjust, that, speaking for myself, I should not hesitate to hold under the leave reserved for that purpose, if it be held that the plaintiff cannot recover upon the policy, that a count for money had and received should be introduced, under which he may recover the amount of premiums paid in respect of this policy, and possibly his contribution to the losses incurred by the society.

Here no question arose about the amount of the loss, nor was it ever required or proposed by the society or directors before whom the case was brought that the amount should be referred, but they decided at once, and without raising or suggesting any other question, that there was no loss at all by the perils of the sea.

As to the point upon the Stamp Act, it is well disposed of by my brother Blackburn, and indeed appears to have been abandoned.

KOPITOFF v. WILSON.

Shipping—Contract of carriage—Implied warranty of fitness of ship for voyage.

In whatever way a contract for the conveyance of merchandise be made, if there is no agreement to the contrary, the shipowner is by the nature of the contract impliedly and necessarily held to warrant that the ship is good and in a condition to perform the voyage then about to be undertaken, that is to say, that she is seaworthy or fit to meet and undergo the perils of the sea and other incidental risks to which she must of necessity be exposed in the course of the voyage.

Plaintiff delivered iron armour plates to be carried by the defendant's ship, and they were stowed on board by the defendant's servants. During rough weather one of the plates broke loose, and went through the ship's side, thereby causing her loss.

In an action to recover the value of the plates, the jury were told that a shipowner warrants the fitness of his ship when she sails, and not merely that he will honestly and bonâ fide endeavour to make her fit; and the two questions left to them were, whether the vessel at the time of sailing was in a state, as regards the stowing and receiving of these plates, reasonably fit to encounter the ordinary perils that might be expected on a voyage at that season; and whether, if she was not in a fit state, the loss was occasioned by her unfitness.

Held, that this was a proper direction concerning the liability of a shipowner, even though not holding himself out as a common carrier.

THIS was an action tried before Blackburn, J., at Guildhall during the Sittings after Hilary Term, 1875.

The plaintiff sought to recover for the loss of certain armour plates and bolts delivered by him, to be carried on board the defendant's ship Walamo, from Hull to Cronstadt.

At the trial the verdict was directed for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit.

The defendants accordingly obtained a rule nisi for this purpose, on the ground that the defendant was relieved from liability by the terms of the bill of lading. The rule also called upon the plaintiff to show cause why a new trial should not be had on the ground that the learned judge misdirected the jury by laying down that there was an absolute obligation on the shipowner to make his ship seaworthy as regards the stowage, and that he would be liable if, in consequence of the non-performance of that obligation, the goods should be lost.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—The judgment of the court (Blackburn, Quain, and Field, JJ.) was delivered by—

FIELD, J.—This is an action in which the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the loss of a large number of iron armour plates and bolts which were lost on board the defendants' ship Walamo, on a voyage from Hull to Cronstadt. The cause was tried before Blackburn, J. at Guildhall at the Sittings after Hilary Term 1875.

The declaration contained several counts, and amongst them was a count alleging that the defendants had warranted that the ship should be seaworthy and reasonably fit to carry the goods in question, and alleged that by reason of a breach of such warranty the goods were lost. There was also a count upon the bill of lading, alleging a promise to deliver, with the exception of certain perils, &c., and a loss not within any of the exceptions. The defendants denied the warranty, and also alleged that the cause of loss was within some of the exceptions.

On the trial it appeared that the plaintiff, who was an agent of the Russian Government, had entered into a contract with the defendants, who were shipowners at Hull, by which the defendants undertook to ship for Cronstadt from time to time large quantities of armour plates, which the plaintiff was having manufactured in this country, at agreed rates of freight, varying according to the season of the year. The other terms of the contract are not material to the points raised before us.

Three armour plates, of great weight, from eighteen to fifteen tons weight each, were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants for shipment, and were by them shipped on the 15th Sept. in the defendants' own steamship Walamo, under a bill of lading containing many exceptions. The defendants themselves, by their own servants, stowed the ship. The armour plates were by them placed on the top of a quantity of railway iron, and then secured there by wooden shores. There was a conflict of testimony as to whether this was or was not a proper mode of stowing them. It was not disputed that the steamship was in herself a good ship, but it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the mode of stowing these plates adopted by the defendants made her unseaworthy on this voyage. On getting out to sea she encountered bad weather, the wind being high and the sea rough, and she rolled heavily. There was conflicting evidence as to the degree of this bad weather, and the cause of this rolling; the plaintiff contending that the wind and sea were no more than at that season was to be expected, and that the rolling was owing to the improper stowage of the vessel; the defendants contending that there was an unusual storm, which would have made any ship, however well stowed, roll. After the ship had been out at sea for some hours one of the armour plates broke loose, and went through the side of the ship, which in consequence went down in deep water, and was totally lost, with all her cargo on board.

The plaintiff's contention was, that the breaking loose of the plate was because it was improperly stowed and secured; the defendants' that it was a direct consequence of the roughness of the sea, which was a peril excepted in the bill of lading. These contentions raised questions of fact for the jury. Leave was reserved at the close of the case to enter a nonsuit, if the exceptions in the bill of lading protected the defendants under the circumstances.

The case was thus left to the jury. The learned judge told the jury as a matter of law, and not as a question for them, that a shipowner warrants the fitness of his ship when she sails, and not merely that he will honestly and bonâ fide endeavour to make her fit; and after explaining to the jury what reasonably fit meant with reference to a North Sea voyage, and the other facts in the case, left the following questions to the jury:—

First, was the vessel at the time of her sailing in a state, as regards the stowing and securing of these plates, reasonably fit to encounter the ordinary perils that might be expected on a voyage at that season from Hull to Cronstadt?

Secondly, if she was not in a fit state, was the loss that happened caused by that unfitness?

These questions were put in writing, and handed to the jury, and on that paper the judge put in writing what he had previously stated in his summing up, that they were "to understand (in answering this second question) that though the disaster would not have happened had there not been considerable sea, yet it is to be considered as caused by the unfitness, if they (the jury) think that the plates would not have got adrift when they did, had the stowage been such as to put the ship in a fit state."

The jury answered the first question in the negative, and the second in the affirmative. No complaint has been made as to these findings not being justified by the evidence. Upon these findings the learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the plaintiff for the agreed amount, 655*l.*; and in Easter Term 1875, the defendants obtained a rule to show cause why a non-suit should not be entered pursuant to the leave reserved, or why there should not be a new trial on the ground "that the learned judge misdirected the jury, in directing them there was an absolute obligation on the shipowner to make his ship seaworthy as regards the stowage, and that he would be liable if, in consequence of the non-performance of that obligation the goods should be lost." That part of the rule which prayed for a non-suit, although not expressly abandoned for any future purpose, was not attempted to be supported before us; and with regard to the remaining portion of the rule, we took time to consider our judgment; not because we entertained any doubt as to the correctness of the direction of the learned judge, but because the case involved considerations which rendered it desirable that our reasons should be fully and explicitly stated.

We think that the rule must be discharged. We hold that, in whatever way a contract for the conveyance of merchandise be made, where there is no agreement to the contrary, the shipowner is by the nature of the contract impliedly and necessarily held to warrant that the ship is good, and is in a condition to perform the voyage then about to be undertaken, or in ordinary language is seaworthy, that is, fit to meet and undergo the perils of the sea and other incidental risks to which she must of necessity be exposed in the course of the voyage. For this proposition we have the high authority of Lord Tenterden, who lays it down in the first edition of his book published in 1802, and for the correctness of which he vouches Emerigon and other eminent writers or commentators upon the subject: (Abbot on Shipping, 1st edit. p. 146). The accuracy of the proposition thus stated in 1802 has not, that we are aware of, ever been brought into question in any of the subsequent editions, or of the numerous text books since published on the subject. In further support of the implication of such a warranty, we have the authority of Lord Ellenborough, who, in the case of Lyon v. Mells (5 East, 428), lays it down that it is a part of the contract on the part of the carrier or lighterman, implied by law, that his vessel is tight and fit for the purpose or employment for which he offers it; and although it is true, as was pointed out by Mr. Thesiger in his argument before us, that the warranty thus expressed by Lord Ellenborough is expressed in terms limiting it to a contract for the carriage of goods by a person holding himself forth as the owner of a lighter or vessel ready to carry goods for hire, the measure of liability thus laid down by him has been considered generally applicable to any contract for carriage (per Blackburn, J. in Readhead v. The Midland Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 434) and in the cases of Havelock v. Geddes (10 East. 536), Stanton v. Richardson (ante vol. 1, p. 449; vol. 2, p. 228, L. Rep. 7 C. P. 421; and in the Ex. Ch. 9, ib. 390); the judgment in which latter case has recently been affirmed in the House of Lords, was actually applied to contracts for carriage by charter-party.

In further support of this proposition, the existence of such a warranty as a general implication arising in all contracts of shipment was universally recognised or assumed in the opinions expressed in the case of Gibson v. Smith (4 H. of L. Cas. 353).

We further find that the same doctrine obtains in the American courts (1 Parsons on Shipping, 171). It appears to us, also, that there are good grounds in reason and common sense for holding such to be the law. It is well and firmly established that in every marine voyage policy the assured comes under an implied warranty of seaworthiness to his assurer. If we are to hold that he has not the benefit of a similar implication in the contract which he makes with a shipowner for the carriage of his goods, the consequence would be that he would lose that complete indemnity against risk and loss which it is the object and purpose to give him by the two contracts taken together. Holding as we now do, the result is that the merchant by his contract with the shipowner having become entitled to have a ship to carry his goods warranted fit for that purpose, and to meet and struggle against the perils of the sea, is by his contract of insurance protected against the damage arising from such perils acting upon a seaworthy ship.

The main argument addressed to us on the part of the defendants, however, was that it was not intended, by the propositions and authorities which we have above referred to, to assert the existence of an independent implication of warranty applicable to every contract of carriage by water, but that the doctrine thus asserted was a subordinate part of the more extensive liability attaching to carriers, and that inasmuch as the latter were bound to carry safely and securely, the act of God and the Queen's enemies only excepted, it was by virtue of that obligation, and not by any specific contract to be implied, that the duty arose. It was therefore said that the defendants not being common carriers, there was no room for any such implication in the present case.

But we have already pointed out that, although it is strictly true that Lord Ellenborough's proposition in Lyon v. Mells is in its terms confined to carriers or persons holding themselves forth as ready to carry, the principle itself has always received a wider application; and in the cases of the Liver Alkali Company v. Johnson (ante vol. 1, p, 380; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 267; and on appeal, ante vol. 2, p. 332; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 338); and Nugent v. Smith (L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 19), in the observations of the courts the existence of the warranty in question on the part of a shipowner is asserted with reference to his character as such, and not as existing only in those cases in which he is also acting as a public carrier.

Mr. Thesiger, however, in his able argument, mainly and very properly relied on the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber in Readhead v. Midland Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 381). The point decided in that case was that the obligation of the carrier of passengers by land did not extend so far as to warrant the roadworthiness of the carriage supplied by him against latent effects, and did not therefore directly decide anything as to the obligation of a carrier by sea of goods to warrant the seaworthiness of his ship even against latent defects; but we think Mr. Thesiger was justified in saying that the reasoning of the judgment threw doubt upon that position. The more recent case of Francis v. Cockerill (L. Rep. Q. B. 501) in the Exchequer Chamber) we think, establishes that the obligation or warranty even on land extends to everything except latent defects which could not by any reasonable diligence or skill be discovered. In the case now before us there was no necessity to consider the law as to latent defects, or to direct the jury on that point, for nothing of the sort was suggested.

We think that it is not a misdirection entitling the party against whom the verdict passes to a new trial, if the judges make an inaccurate statement of the law on some point not involved in the issue, and on which the jury required no direction, and consequently we need not express any opinion on this point. We are not, however, to be understood as intimating that the ruling in this respect was wrong.

SWANSEA SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED) v. DUNCAN.

Question between defendant and third party — Notice to third party—Determination of question —Judicature Act 1875, Order XVI., rules 17 and 18*—Shippers and consignees—Demurrage.*

Shipowners brought an action for demurrage against their charterers. Defendants by the charter-party had agreed to discharge the cargo as fast as the custom of the port should allow; and if the ship should be detained by the defendants or their agents beyond the time specified for discharging the cargo, demurrage was to be paid by the defendants at the rate of 12*l. or equivalent per day. Before arrival of the ship, the defendants sold the whole cargo to be delivered at the port of arrival; but the agreement for sale made no terms as to time of discharging cargo nor amount of demurrage. Defendants obtained an order from a master under Order XVI., rules* 17 and 18 of the Judicature Act, 1875, that notice be given to the purchasers of the cargo that the question in the action should be determined between them, the plaintiffs and the defendants.

Held, upon appeal, that the proceedings under these rules are only applicable where the question between the defendant and the third party is identical with that between the plaintiff and defendant; and that the master's order in this case could not be maintained.

THIS was an action for demurrage upon a charter-party entered into abroad, by which the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship Helen Burns, agreed with the defendants, Messrs. Duncan, Fox, and Co., the charterers, that the ship and cargo should go to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders, and thence to a specified port of discharge and deliver the whole of her cargo which the defendants agreed to discharge as fast as the custom of the port should allow; and if the said ship should be detained by the defendants or their agents beyond the time specified for discharging the said cargo, demurrage was to be paid by the defendants at the rate of 12*l.*, or equivalent per day for each day of detention afterwards. The defendants, through their brokers, sold the entire cargo expected to arrive by the Helen Burns to the British Agricultural Association carrying on business in Scotland. The sold-note to the said association stated that the cargo was to be delivered at a safe port in the United Kingdom, but made no terms as to the time to be allowed for discharging the cargo, nor as to the demurrage in case of detention of the vessel.

The Helen Burns, when she arrived at Falmouth for orders, was sent by the British Agricultural Association to discharge her cargo at Leith. She duly reached that port on the 8th Oct., but was kept there thirty-one days before her cargo was discharged. The defendant's answer to the claim for this demurrage was, that if the plaintiffs were entitled to it, the delay beyond the custom of the port was caused by the fault of the British Agricultural Association, whose business it was to discharge the cargo, and who would be liable to the defendants for the damages which the plaintiffs might obtain.

An order was accordingly obtained from a master at the instance of the defendants, by which the defendants were at liberty to serve notice on the British Agricultural Association under Order XVI., rules 17 and 18 of the rules of the Supreme Court. From this order the British Agricultural Association appealed to the judge in chambers (Archibald, J.), who referred the matter to the court.

By rule 17, "Where a defendant is, or claims to be, entitled to contribution or indemnity, or any other remedy or relief over against any other person, or where from any other cause it appears to the court or a judge that a question in the action should be determined not only as between the plaintiff and defendant, but as between the plaintiff, defendant, and any other person, or between any or either of them, the court or a judge may, on notice being given to such last-mentioned person, make such order as may be proper for having the question so determined." And by rule 18, "Where defendant claims to be entitled to contribution, indemnity or other remedy or relief over against any person not a party to the action, he may, by leave of the court or a judge, issue a notice to that effect, stamped with the seal with which writs of summons are sealed. A copy of such notice shall be filed with the proper officer, and served on such person according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summons. The notice shall state the nature and grounds of the claim, and shall, unless otherwise ordered by the court or a judge, be served within the time limited for delivering his statement of defence. Such notice may be in the form No. 1 in Appendix B. hereto, with such variations as circumstances may require, and therewith shall be served a copy of the statement of claim, or if there be no statement of claim then a copy of the writ of summons in the action."

Rules 20 and 21 of the same order relate to the point in dispute: by rule 20, "If a person not a party to the action, who is served as mentioned in rule 18, desires to dispute the plaintiff's claim in this action as against the defendant, on whose behalf the notice has been given, he must enter an appearance in the action within eight days from the service of the notice. In default of his so doing, he shall be deemed to admit the validity of the judgment obtained against such defendant, whether obtained by consent or otherwise. Provided always that a person so served and failing to appear within the said period of eight days may apply to the court or a judge for leave to appear, and such leave may be given upon such terms, if any, as the court or a judge shall think fit." And by rule 21, "If a person not a party to the action served under these rules appears pursuant to the notice, the party giving the notice may apply to the court or a judge for directions as to the mode of having the question in the action determined; and the court or judge upon the hearing of such application may, if it shall appear desirable so to do, give the person so served liberty to defend the action upon such terms as shall seem just, and may direct such pleadings to be delivered, or such amendments in any pleadings to be made, and generally may direct such proceedings to be taken, and give such directions as to the court or a judge shall appear proper for having the question most conveniently determined, and as to the mode and extent in or to which the the person so served shall be bound or made liable by the decision of the question."

Castle, on behalf of the British Agricultural Association, now moved by way of appeal from the master's order, that the notice of the defendants under Order XVI., rule 17, should be set aside on two grounds. First there is no provision in any of the Orders for service of a notice of this kind out of the jurisdiction. Rule 18 certainly provides for service of notice according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summons; but the service of such writs out of the jurisdiction is limited by Order XI., rule 1, to where the contract ought to be enforced or otherwise affected, or for the breach whereof damages or other relief are or is demanded, was made or entered into or broken within the jurisdiction. And even if this objection could be overcome, rule 4 of the same order provides that "Any order giving leave to effect such service or notice within which such defendant is to enter an appearance, such time to depend on the place or country where or within which the writ is to be served or the notice given." This is quite inconsistent with the provision in Order XVI., rule 18, that the person shall be served with notice by the defendant within the time limited for service of statement of defence; and, secondly, this is not a case in which the defendants claim to be entitled to contribution or indemnity or any other remedy or relief over against the British Agricultural Association, within the words of rules 17 and 18 of Order XVI. There is no privity of contract between the latter and the plaintiff, and the measure of damages between the defendants and the association is not the same as between the plaintiffs and defendants. Moreover, the same questions do not arise between the various parties, and the question determined between plaintiffs and defendants can be in no way binding upon this association:

Chappel v. Comfort, 10 C. B., N.S., 802;
Sims v. Bond, 5 B. & Ad. 389.

Sect. 24 sub-sect. 3 of the Judicature Act 1873 gives power to grant relief to a defendant against a plaintiff in respect of any equitable or legal right claimed in the pleadings, which might be granted in a separate suit; "and also all such relief relating to or connected with the original subject of the cause or matter, and in like manner claimed against any other person, whether already a party to the same cause, or matter, or not, who shall have been duly served with notice in writing of such claim pursuant to any rule of court, or any Order of the Court, as might properly have been granted against such persons if he had been made a defendant to a cause duly instituted by the same defendant for the like purpose; and every person served with any such notice shall thenceforth be deemed a party to such cause or matter, with the same rights in respect of his defence against such claim, as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by such defendant." In Treleaven v. Bray (45 L. J. 113, Ch.), Mellish, L.J., said, "The meaning of sect. 24, sub-sect. 3, was very carefully considered by the judges. We came to the conclusion that it was not advisable to make any rules which would enable one defendant to obtain relief against his co-defendant without an independent action against him. We considered that we had power to do so, but we thought that it would be intolerable that a plaintiff who might have a good case against the original defendant, should be compelled to wait for his remedy while the defendants were fighting inter se. The only object of the rules was to bind the third party conclusively by the judgment given as between the plaintiff and the original defendant, but if he wants to get an indemnity or other relief against the third party he must bring an action of his own."

J. C. Mathew showed cause for the defendants against this appeal motion. There is nothing in the facts of this case to prevent the writ of summons from being served upon the defendants if they were out of the jurisdiction, and Order XI., rule 1, is to be read together with and as part of Order XVI., rule 18. [QUAIN, J.—Order XI., rule 1, which allows service of a writ out of the jurisdiction, is applicable only when the original contract, upon which the action is brought, is made or broken within the jurisdiction. It does not follow from the words of Order XVI., rule 18, that service of a notice may be similarly performed upon a bye contract with which the plaintiff had nothing to do.] As to the second point, the main issue in the action is whether the cargo was discharged as fast as the custom of the port of Leith allowed, and that would be the issue in an action between the defendants and the British Agricultural Association. The association therefore ought to be bound by the determination of this action; this is "a question in the action," which, in the words of Order XVI., rule 17, "should be determined not only as between the plaintiff and defendant, but as between the plaintiff, defendant, and any other person, or between any or either of them."

Castle was not heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I have felt some hesitation, but I think the proceedings under Order XVI., rules 17-21, which were allowed to be taken by the master, are not in this case open to the defendant. I think it was the intention of the Legislature to limit the application of these rules to cases in which the claim of the defendant against the third person is identical with that of the plaintiff against the defendant. Unless that be so, the allowing of the introduction of such third person into the cause would be extremely embarrassing to the plaintiff and to the trial of the action, and it would also be hard on such third person if he could not, by refuting the claim of the plaintiff, put himself in a position not to be liable when the defendant's time should come to enforce his, the defendant's claim against him. I think there is great force in what has been said as to rules 20 and 21; they show that the question between the defendant and the third party should be the same as the question in the action, and on the whole I am of opinion that the proceedings under rules 17 and 18 are only applicable where the questions are identical. Then what we have to see is, whether they are so applicable in the present case. Now I am not satisfied that the question between the defendants and the British Agricultural Association would necessarily be the same as that between the defendants and the plaintiffs. The association might defend itself in an action by the defendants for some other reason than the discharging the cargo according to the custom of the port. That being so, the order of the master must be set aside, and it is unnecessary to give any opinion on the other point as to whether, being out of the jurisdiction, the association can be served with a notice.

Quain, J.—I am of the same opinion. With respect to the service of a notice under rule 18 out of the jurisdiction of the court, there is very great difficulty in applying rule 1 of Order XI., which relates to the service out of the jurisdiction of a writ of summons, and I think under the circumstances it is better to give no opinion on the subject. Now I agree with my Lord that in the present case there is a distinctly different question between the defendants and the Agricultural Association to that between the defendants and the plaintiffs, and I do not think that such a case as this is one to which it was ever intended rules 17 and 18 of Order XVI. should apply. They contemplate the case of an indemnity or suretyship where the only thing which the third party, who was liable to the defendants on the indemnity or suretyship, could do would be to fight out the original cause of action; and if the defendants were liable in the action, so he would be liable to the defendants. So far from this being the case here under this charter-party, the defendants are bound to discharge as fast as the custom of the port should allow, and it is agreed that the charge for demurrage is to be at the rate of 12*l.* for each day of detention of the vessel beyond the time there specified for discharging the cargo. Now that is the only question between the parties to the original action. The British Agricultural Association, who are the third parties, are not parties indemnifying the defendants from liability under that contract but are parties who have entered into a separate and distinct contract with the defendants for the cargo to be delivered at any safe port in the United Kingdom, and the only thing which they are bound to do is to take delivery of the cargo within a reasonable time. The measure of damages under the first contract is distinct from that under the second contract, and the causes of litigation was also distinct; and I think it never was intended to bring these together when there is no privity between the parties. Rules 20 and 21 of this same Order point to the matter in dispute in the original action, and evidently never contemplated a case in which the matter in dispute is under a separate and different contract from that in the original action, and to which the plaintiff is no party.

Pollock, B.—I also think that the order of the Master in this case should be set aside. The objection to the order which has been made is this, viz., that the case is not one contemplated by the rules 17 and 18 of Order XVI. My impression is, that it was intended to give to the Common Law Divisions the same advantage which the courts of equity alone possessed before the Judicature Acts, by which all the parties might be brought before the court who should be necessary for the purpose of having the contract completely worked out. Instances are given in form 1 in Appendix B to the Act, in which it would be for the benefit of the suitors that there should be this power of bringing in a third party, and in which there would be no difficulty in applying the Act; and there are other cases, where the same fact being in question between all the parties, it would be desirable to have the matter determined once for all. The present, however, is not one of those cases. The facts in dispute between the parties are different, and if the third party were brought in it would involve the necessity of various separate enquiries, as well to the evidence as to the damages arising out of these different contracts, with a separate direction as to each by the judge at the trial. Such a case was never contemplated by the rules, and this order of the Master must therefore be set aside.

Damage to cargo—Particulars—Practice.

In a cause of damage to cargo the court, contrary to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty, made an order for particulars of the plaintiff's claim so as to enable the defendants to pay into court in respect of those items of the claim for which he was prepared to admit liability.

This was a motion on appeal from an order of the registrar refusing an application made on summons on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the barque Wetterhorn, for particulars of the plaintiff's claim. The action was brought by the plaintiff as indorsee of a bill of lading of the cargo of the Wetterhorn for damage done to the cargo. The statement of claim alleged that the cargo consisting of 17,102 sacks of wheat was shipped in good order and condition on board the Wetterhorn at Astoria, Oregon, and that the master gave a bill of lading for the same, by which it was acknowledged that the wheat was in good order and condition and was to be delivered to the order of the consignees at a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg (the dangers of the seas and fire only excepted); that the bill of lading was duly indorsed and delivered to the plaintiff in whom the property in the wheat thereby became vested; that the barque arrived at the port of Hull, whither she had been ordered, on the 12th Oct. 1875; that the plaintiff was entitled to have the 17,102 sacks of wheat delivered to him in like good order and condition as the same were in when shipped as aforesaid on board the said barque at Astoria; that (par. 7) "the said 17,102 sacks of wheat were delivered to the plaintiff, but not in such like good order and condition, but in a wetted, damaged, and deteriorated condition; many of the said sacks had been cut open and the contents started, and thereby further damage and deterioration had been caused to the said cargo;" that the defendants were not prevented by the expected perils from delivering the cargo in good condition; that the barque was unseaworthy, and that (par. 10) the plaintiff had lost part of the value of the wheat, and had been put to great expense about taking care of and improving the same, and having the same surveyed and otherwise; and the plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was entitled to the damage proceeded for and a reference to the registrar and merchants to report the amount thereof.

The defendants' notice of motion asked for particulars (under par. 7) of the number of sacks alleged to be delivered, wetted, damaged, and deteriorated, and of the quantity of wheat delivered, wetted, damaged, and deteriorated, and the loss claimed by the plaintiffs in respect thereof; particulars of the number of sacks alleged to be cut open and their contents started and the further damage to the said cargo by reason thereof and the loss claimed by the plaintiffs in respect of such further damage; also particulars of the expenses referred to in the 10th paragraph of the statement of claim.

James P. Aspinall, in support of the motion, contended that the defendants were entitled to particulars in order to enable them to pay money into court if they should be so advised. Without knowing the items of the plaintiff's claim the defendants might try the cause, and, after incurring great expense, go before the registrars and merchant, and then for the first time discover that they had been contesting items, in respect of which they had no possible defence. By means of the particulars they would be able to judge whether they were liable in respect of any and what part of the plaintiff's claim. They were specially desirous of obtaining particulars of the number of sacks which had been cut open, and had had their contents started and the amount of damage sustained thereby and of the expense the plaintiff had sustained in respect of this portion of the cargo. For this damage the defendants would probably have to admit liability, and without particulars it was impossible for them to plead or to be prepared to pay into court.

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff, contra.—It is wholly contrary to the practice of this division to give particulars in these cases. The question of liability is determined first and the items of the plaintiff's claim are only delivered when the reference to the registrar and merchants is ordered. This naturally follows from the practice of the court itself in never assessing damages, and a defendant is always protected against costs by the practice of disallowing them unless a plaintiff recovers a certain proportion of his claim. The only case where a defendant is entitled to particulars is where he admits liability.

Aspinall in reply.—The defendants are prepared to admit liability in respect of the damage sustained by cutting open the sacks, &c., provided the plaintiff shows damage to have been sustained on his particulars; and they must admit it because it could only have been done by the negligence of their crew. As to the rest of the claim there is a good defence.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE considered that the defendants were entitled to be put into a position to admit liability and pay into court, and ordered the plaintiff to deliver to the defendants particulars in writing of the number of sacks alleged to have been cut open and their contents started, and of the amount of damage occasioned thereby and claimed by the plaintiff.

THE N. P. NEILSEN.

Collision — Damage — Particulars — Total loss — Practice.

Where a ship was totally lost in a collision, the court, contrary to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty, made an order, in an action by the shipowners against the vessel doing the damage, for particulars of the plaintiff's claim to be delivered to the defendants.

THIS was a motion on appeal from an order of the registrar refusing an application made on summons on behalf of the defendants for particulars of the plaintiff's claim. The action was instituted on behalf of the owner of the schooner Burfield Brothers against the N. P. Neilsen to recover damages for a collision. In the plaintiff's statement of claim it was alleged that the Burfield Brothers, in consequence of the collision, sustained so much damage that she sank almost immediately and was lost together with her cargo and everything on board of her.

R. E. Webster, for the defendants in support of the motion.—In the other divisions of the court this order would be made as a matter of course, so as to enable the defendant to pay into court, and such an order has been made here in the case of The Wetterhorn, ante, p. 168

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff, contra.—In the Wetterhorn special cause was shown for particulars because there were two heads of claim, and the defendants were prepared to admit liability and pay into court under one of the heads. The question here is whether the practice of the High Court of Admiralty or of other courts is to be followed? Hitherto liability and amount have been kept apart in this court. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE. Actions have always been instituted at once and before any repairs have been executed to damaged vessels and before expenses ascertained, and if this application were granted generally causes would be delayed and witnesses would disperse.] The defendants are attempting to tie the plaintiffs down as to the amount of their claim, but this is sufficiently provided for by the rule which disentitles the plaintiffs to their costs if they claim too much.

R. E. Webster in reply.—In this case the plaintiff's ship was totally lost; if she had been only damaged it might be said that particulars need not have been given because there had not been time to ascertain the extent of the damage till repairs were completed. But where a ship is lost her value must be within the knowledge of her owners as well at the commencement of the action as when the reference takes place.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 26.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This action is brought to recover damages for the total loss of an English schooner which has gone to the bottom with everything on board of her. Without interfering with the usual practice in causes of damage where a vessel is partially damaged only, I think I ought to make the order as prayed, subject to the power being reserved to the plaintiff to amend their values if necessary.

THE CATTARINA CHIAZZARO.

Collision — Lis alibi pendens — Irish Admiralty Court—Stay of proceedings—Practice.

Where a plaintiff in a cause of damage has commenced two actions; one, first in order of date, in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, and a second in the High Court of Justice in England, he would not be allowed to proceed with the latter until he has abandoned proceedings in the former. It is not sufficient that he is desirous of abandoning proceedings in the former, and that he is not allowed to do so by the Irish court; such refusal should be corrected by appeal.

THIS was an action of damage instituted on behalf of the owner of the British brigantine Harriett Williams against the Italian barque Cattarina Chiazzaro to recover damages for a collision between the two vessels, and the case now came before the court upon motion by the owner of the Cattarina Chiazzaro to dismiss the action with costs and condemn the plaintiff in costs.

The collision occurred on the 9th Dec, 1875, close to the harbour of Queenstown, in Ireland, and the owner of the Harriett Williams on Dec. 20 instituted a suit in rem in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland in the sum of 900*l.* against the Cattarina Chiazzaro. The latter vessel was arrested in this action by warrant under the seal of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland on 21st Dec. 1876; but an appearance was subsequently entered for her owner, and she was released on 24th Dec. on bail being given on their behalf. On Dec. 23 a cross cause was commenced by the owners of the Cattarina Chiazzaro against the Harriett Williams in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, and the owners of the latter vessel appeared in that suit and gave bail. On Jan. 26 the owner of the Harriett Williams commenced this admiralty action in rem in the sum of 1000*l.* against the Cattarina Chiazzaro in the High Court of Justice in England, and claimed damages for a collision on 9th Dec., being the same collision in respect of which they had proceeded against the Cattarina Chiazzaro in the Irish Admiralty Court. The Cattarina Chiazzaro was arrested in this action on 27th Jan. 1876 by the Marshal of the Admiralty Division. An appearance under protest was entered by her owners. The above facts appeared from an affidavit of the defendants' solicitor filed in support of the motion, which continued (so far as material) as follows:

7. The aforesaid action and cross-action are still outstanding and pending in the said High Court of Admiralty of Ireland, and the owners of the Cattarina Chiazzaro are desirous that the proceedings therein should be taken to judgment and conclusion in the said High Court of Admiralty of Ireland.

8. The High Court of Admiralty of Ireland is a court of competent jurisdiction to hear and determine the said action and cross-action.

10. The owners of the Cattarina Chiazzaro are advised that in actions in rem brought between the same parties and for the same cause of action in two different courts having co-ordinate jurisdiction, that the court which has possession of the case when the second action is commenced, and has powers adequate to the administration of justice therein, is entitled to retain jurisdiction in the action first commenced.

11. The High Court of Admiralty of Ireland has co-ordinate jurisdiction with the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice.

The owner of the Harriett Williams brought in an affidavit alleging that he had applied to the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland to dismiss the principal cause of damage instituted there against the Cattarina Chiazzaro but that the application had been refused; that the officials in the Registry of the Irish Admiralty Court had refused to file a declaration of the non-prosecution of the principal cause, and of the consent of the owner of the Harriett Williams to the dismissal of the bail given therein; that the owner of the Harriett Williams was desirous that the action commenced in the Admiralty Division should be heard out: that all possible means had been taken on his part to abandon and put an end to the action commenced by him in the Irish Admiralty Court, and that he was still willing that the same should be dismissed, and would pay the costs incurred therein.

R. E. Webster for the defendant under protest in support of the motion—I ask the court to dismiss the action and to stay proceedings. The point has already been decided.

Walsh v. The Bishop of Lincoln, L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 242.

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff.—It must be admitted that a plaintiff cannot keep up two actions at the same time, but where he is willing to abandon one, and pay all costs occasioned thereby, I submit that the court will not stay his proceeding in the action in which he elects to proceed. The plaintiffs have a right to choose their forum, and it is not because an action has been commenced elsewhere, that they can be debarred from the right of proceeding in this court even after verdict.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 4, 1876.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case an action has been entered on behalf of the owner of a vessel called the Harriett Williams. The facts of the case, which it is necessary to state, appear to be these. The Cattarina Chiazzaro is an Italian barque, and the owners reside at Genoa. The owner of the brigantine, Harriett Williams, resides in the city of Cork, in Ireland. On the 19th Dec. of last year, the two vessels came into collision near Roche's Point, near to the harbour of Cork, in Ireland; and the owner of the Harriett Williams instituted a suit in the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland against the Cattarina Chiazzaro, and the action was brought for 900*l*. A warrant under the seal of the court issued, and upon Dec. 21 the Cattarina Chiazzaro was arrested. An appearance was duly entered for her, and on Dec. 24 a bail bond was entered into on behalf of the owners in the sum of 900*l*.; and on Dec. 31 the vessel was released by the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland, and proceeded to her final port of discharge, Liverpool. On Dec. 23 a cross-action was entered into the High Court of Ireland on behalf of the Cattarina Chiazzaro against the Harriett Williams for the damages occasioned by the collision, and I think it was in the month of Feb. that the owner of the Harriett Williams, the first plaintiff in the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland, gave notice that no further proceedings be taken in the suit against the vessel, and that the plaintiff would be at the costs which at that time had been fixed. The court in Ireland had already stated that it was not competent to the plaintiff to abandon the action until he had first released the vessel from the English jurisdiction. Now, the suit in England was instituted on Jan. 26, and on March 14 an appearance, under protest, was entered on behalf of the owners of the Cattarina Chiazzaro, and the petition then produced was handed in.

Now, the objection and protest is to the effect that there is a lis alibi pendens between these two vessels in the court in Ireland; and it appears that an application has been made to the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland to dismiss the suit on behalf of the original suitor, the owner of the Harriett Williams, and the court refused to do so. Therefore the state of things is this: that there was a suit instituted in the High Court in Ireland by the same plaintiff who now institutes a suit in this court, there being a cross suit in Ireland; and the judge having refused to dismiss the plaintiff on his application from the suit, it is contended that it is competent to me to meet the matter by dismissing the proceedings instituted in the suit in this court.

I am of opinion that I ought not to allow this suit to be proceeded with at present. I think that it is shown that there is a case pending before the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland between the same parties, for the same object, and arising out of the same cause of action, and that, no doubt, apart from technical considerations, it would be a most inconvenient course of proceeding to allow the same case to be heard at the same time in two different courts.

What I have had to consider is, what the other courts have decided. The law as to lis alibi pendens is laid down in Walsh v. The Bishop of Lincoln (L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 242), and it is clear from that decision that a plaintiff bringing two actions in different courts for the same cause, and that if he does not elect he will be restrained from proceeding with the one which is last begun. I think that the plaintiff here has lost his way. I think that he should have applied to the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland to dismiss the suit as he did, and if that was refused, as it was refused, to have appealed from that refusal.

At all events, in the present state of things, I shall order the proceedings in this court to be stayed.

E. C. Clarkson.—We shall appeal, and I shall ask for stay of execution.

R. E. Webster.—It must be under terms.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall not allow the vessel to remain under arrest. I order the proceedings to be stayed in this court, and the ship to be released.

MORRIS v. LEVISON.

Charter-party—"Say about 1100 tons"—Construction of charter-party—Words of contract—Words of expectation.

By a charter-party the defendant agreed to load "a full and complete cargo, say about 1100 tons." The actual capacity of the chartered vessel was 1210 tons, the defendant loaded only 1080 tons:

Held by the court (Brett, Archibald, Lindley, JJ.), that the words "say about 1100 tons," were words of contract, and not merely words of expectation, and that the defendant did not undertake to load the vessel up to her full capacity, but only to load as fully as could be done by providing a cargo of "about 1100 tons."

Held also by the court, drawing inferences of fact, that if the defendant had provided a cargo of 1133 tons, he would have performed his contract, and that he was liable to pay damages for 53 tons short cargo, 3 per cent. being a reasonable excess to require over the 1100 tons.

THE facts in this case were stated for the opinion of the court in the form of a special case. It is not necessary to set out the whole of the facts for the purposes of this report, but so far as the facts were material to the determination of the point upon which the case is reported, they were as follows:

The defendant chartered from the plaintiff a vessel. The charter-party, so far as is material, was as follows, that the ship "should proceed with all possible despatch to Porman, and there load in the customary manner, where ordered by the shipper's agent, a full and complete cargo of iron ore, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry, over and above her ordinary tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, say about 1100 tons, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to West Hartlepool and there deliver the same."

The carrying capacity of the ship was 1210 tons. The cargo which the defendant provided was 1080 tons.

The court had power to draw inferences of fact, and the question was whether the defendant, in providing a cargo of 1080 tons had performed his contract, or if not what amount he was legally bound, under the circumstances, to have provided.

Butt, Q.C., (J. C. Mathew with him) for the plaintiff, contended that the defendant was bound to load a full and complete cargo, and that the words "say about 1100 tons" did not relieve him from his obligation to do so, that such words were not words of contract, but merely words expressing the opinion or the expectation of the parties, or that even if these words were words of contract, still the obligation was not fulfilled, since the obligation then would be to load a full and complete cargo, so far as it could be done by providing a quantity about 1100 tons, and that the contract meant that if anything like 1100 tons was required to fill the ship, the defendant was to provide it—he was not to hesitate about a few tons more or less. The case of Gwillim v. Daniel (2 C. M. & R. 61) he contended was an authority to show that words such as these are not treated in law as words of contract. Lord Abinger there said of the words "say from 1000 to 1200 gallons" that they mean merely that in all probability the quantity produced will amount to 1000 to 1200 gallons, and do not amount to a warranty. The most recent case was McConnell v. Murphy (L. Rep. 5 P. C. 202; 28 L. T. Rep. 713); the agreement there was for a sale of "all of the spars manufactured by McConnel, say about 600 red pine spars," and only 497 spars were tendered, no more being manufactured by McConnell of the agreed dimensions, yet the court held that the agreement had been complied with by the tender of the 497 spars, and that the words "say about 600," were words of expectation and estimate only, and did not amount to an undertaking. He also referred to Lieming v. Snaith (16 Q.B. 275)

Cohen, Q.C. (Wood Hill with him), for the defendant, contended that the words, "say about 1100 tons," were inserted to relieve the defendant from any obligation to load a full cargo, if it could not be done with about 1100 tons, and if the defendant put on board a quantity which was substantially about 1100 tons, he did all that he need do. That about 1100 tons meant something a little more than 1100 tons, or something a little less, and that whether the defendant put something a little more, or something a little less than 1100 tons on board, he fulfilled his contract. That, consequently, the contract was fulfilled by the defendant when he provided 1080 tons. The shipowner, who knew the capacity, or ought to know it, inserted those words in order to let the charterer know beforehand what quantity to provide, and to relieve him from the expense of providing a quantity that might turn out too great, or from the expense of having to obtain a further supply of ore, if what he had at first provided turned out too little. The word "about" was considered and commented on in the case of Croes v. Eglin (2 B. and Ad. 106), and there it was shown that it gives a very considerable latitude.

BRETT, J.—I have felt some difficulty in deciding the question now before us, but I do not think that any advantage will be gained by taking further time for the consideration of the matter. It is a question which depends upon the proper construction to be given the charter-party. The defendant undertook by the charter-party to load a "full and complete cargo of iron ore, say about 1100 tons." Now, the cargo actually loaded by the defendant upon the chartered vessel amounted only to 1080 tons, whilst the ship required a cargo of 1210 tons in order to be fully and completely laden. It is obvious, then, that the defendant did not load a "full and complete cargo of iron ore," according to the ordinary sense of those words. The plaintiff seeks to recover for the whole difference between what would constitute a full and complete cargo and the cargo actually shipped.

In order to construe this contract the relationship of the parties must be borne in mind. The shipowner undertakes to have the ship ready at the port of loading to receive the cargo by the specified time, he, rather than the charterer, ought to know the capacity of the ship which he lets out to the charterer. The charterer undertakes to have the cargo ready for loading at the specified time and place, and to pay demurrage if, by reason of his default in that respect, the ship is detained beyond the lay days.

Now, what is the law as laid down by the courts applicable to statements made as to the capacity of ships in charter-parties? for parties must be taken to make, as in fact they do make, their contracts with reference to the construction which has been put upon similar instruments in courts of justice. The cases of Thomas v. Clarke (2 Stark. 450) and Hunter v. Fry (2 B. & Ald. 421) decide that where, in the commencement of a charter-party, a ship is described as of the burden of so many tons, and in the body of the charter-party the charterer agrees to load a full and complete cargo, the description has no effect upon the agreement to load a full and complete cargo, and however much the actual capacity of the ship exceeds the capacity so stated, the charterer is bound to load a full and complete cargo. Instead of a statement similar to the one in the cases mentioned, made at the beginning of the charter-party, we find now that it is usual to insert in the clause itself, by which the charterer agrees to load a full and complete cargo, the words "say about" so many tons. This alteration in the form of charter-parties must be considered by the light of the cases I have mentioned, and so considering it, it is, in my opinion, plain that the words "say about" so many tons are intended to have some effect on the agreement to load a full and complete cargo, and are not mere "words of expectation." It seems to me that we give proper effect to these words if we hold the meaning to be that the shipowner will be content with a cargo of about 1100 tons if the ship will hold more than that quantity, and that if she will only hold less than that quantity, then a full cargo, whatever that may be, must be shipped. If the words are mere words of expectation they may have the effect of deluding charterers, by causing them to bring down for shipment cargoes of about the specified quantity, only to find that they have brought down much too small cargoes, and that they have to incur fresh expenses and bring down further quantities, paying, perhaps, demurrage on the ship the while.

Construing the words, then, as I have suggested, it becomes necessary in this case for us to determine what we will say is the quantity required to fulfil an agreement to provide about 1100 tons. If the present had been a case in which the jury had to decide upon this point, the proper direction to them would have been that the deviation from 1100 tons must not be a very large one, that they must say what deviation would ordinarily be understood as allowed by the word "about." There can, of course, be no exact rule of law as to this, but as we have to decide it we must do so, and we think that 3 per cent. above the 1100 tons is somewhere about a fair allowance. We, therefore, for the purpose of this particular case, find that the shipowner ought to have had a cargo of 1133 tons loaded, and that he is entitled to damages for the short loading, 1080 tons only having, in fact, been loaded. Then he will not be entitled to quite the full freight on these 53 tons, because it would have taken longer to load the ship if the additional quantity had been loaded, he will be entitled to the freight which he would have received on these 53 tons, had they been duly shipped, minus the cost of earning it.

Archibald, J.—I am of the same opinion, though I have during the course of the argument felt some difficulty in arriving at the true construction of this charter-party. The cases of Gwillim v. Daniell (2 C. M. & R. 61) and Lieming v. Snaith (16 Q. B. 275; 20 L. J. 164, Q. B.), which have been cited, were cases in which the contracts upon which the courts had to place a construction were contracts for the sale of goods. In the former of these cases the words "say from 1000 to 1200 gallons" were held to be words merely of expectation, whilst in the latter the words, "say not less than 100 packs," were held to be not mere words of expectation but words of contract. The subject-matter of each contract must be looked to in dealing with phrases of this kind, and the nature of each contract and the form and object of it. Cases relating to sales of goods do not throw much light on the present case. This is a case of a contract for the charter of a ship, and in considering its construction we must not forget the relative positions of the charterer and the shipowner. The charterer cannot be expected to know the capacity of the ship he is about to charter so well as the owner of the ship knows it. The words "say about 1100 tons" seem to me, when considered by the light of the relationship of the parties, and the nature of the contract, to be words of contract. We give, it seems to me, an effect to all the terms used by the parties by holding that the charterer's obligation was that he should load the ship up to her actual capacity, if it could be done by loading a quantity about 1100 tons, but that, if it required a greater quantity, then that the shipowner would be satisfied with about 1100 tons. He was bound, then, to load a full cargo of "about 1100 tons" in the present case. This he has not done. I agree with the rest of the court as to three per cent. being a reasonable percentage to allow, and also as to the damages to be awarded.

Lindley, J.—I am of the same opinion. The words "say about 1100 tons" were meant, I think, to guide the charterer as to the amount of cargo which he was to be prepared with. One construction sought to be given to them was that the words "full and complete cargo" governed them, and they were mere words of expectation, or, in other language, words which had no effect whatever. This cannot be so; it would be a construction giving no meaning to part of the language used. Another construction suggested was that the charterer could not be bound to load more than 1100 tons at the most. This seems to me to be a construction open also to the objection of giving no meaning to part of the language used. It gives no meaning to the words "full and complete cargo." The true construction must be one giving effect, if possible, to all the words used, and this I think the construction which we adopt does—that is, that the charterer is to load a full and complete cargo, provided that such cargo shall not exceed a quantity about 1100 tons. Then as to what cargo does not exceed a quantity "about 1100 tons," I think the suggested 3 per cent. is a fair amount to require.

Moore v. Harris.

Bill of lading—Exceptions—Place of destination—Latent and apparent damage—Removal of goods—Canadian law.

By a bill of lading it was agreed that certain goods were "to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, at the port of M., unto the G. Railway Company, and by them to be forwarded to T., and at the aforesaid station delivered to A. . . . . No damage that can be insured against will be paid for, nor will any claim whatever be admitted, unless made before the goods are removed."

The goods arrived in a damaged condition, but the damage was not discovered till they arrived at A.'s warehouse, though there was evidence that it might have been discovered by a careful examination on the wharf at M. or at the station at T. In an action brought by the consignee against the shipowner to recover such damage:

Held, that the "removal" contemplated by the bill of lading was removal from the railway at T., the ultimate destination, not only from the ship at M.; that the exception covered latent as well as apparent damage, and that the plaintiff could not recover.

Held further, that the bill of lading, having been made in England by the master of an English ship, was a contract to be governed and interpreted by English law, and that principles derived from the maritime law of France and the Canadian civil code could not be applied to it.

Judgment of the court below affirmed.

This was an appeal from the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, affirming a decree of Mackay, J. in favour of the respondent.

This was an action brought by Charles Moore and Berry Moore, of the city of Toronto, merchants, and co-partners, carrying on trade under the name or firm of "Charles Moore and Co.," against David Harris, of the city of Montreal, master of a certain screw steamship called the Medway, then lying in the port of Montreal to recover the sum of 9553 dollars and 5 cents. as the value of 306 packages of tea, shipped at London on board the said ship Medway, of which the respondent was then master. On the 12th April 1870, a writ of attachment on the said ship Medway was issued in the said superior court for the district of Lower Canada on the 6th July 1870, and annexed to the writ was the declaration, dated the same day. In the declaration the appellants alleged that certain persons named Torry, Paget, and Co., at London, had shipped on board the said ship Medway, in good order and condition, certain packages of tea, marked as per margin of bill of lading, to be delivered as per bill of lading, signed by the defendant, at the port of Montreal unto the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to be by the latter forwarded thence by railway to Toronto to the plaintiffs, the consignees of the said packages. That about the beginning of the month of May the Medway arrived at Montreal with the 306 packages on board, which were then delivered to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and by them forthwith conveyed to Toronto and delivered to the plaintiffs about the 15th May. The declaration further alleged that the said packages of tea on the voyage between London and Montreal, through the mere carelessness, negligence, and improper conduct of the said defendant and his mariners in scattering about chloride of lime and other substances, became so impregnated and affected by the smell and taste of chloride of lime as to be utterly valueless, and the plaintiffs claimed from the defendant for damages 9553 dollars 5 cents. as the value of the said packages.

The defendant by his plea denied the allegations in the declaration, and further set forth the exception clause and certain other conditions of the bill of lading, and alleged that the said bill of lading and the exception clause and conditions thereof relieved the defendant from liability.

1. Because no damage was caused to the said packages by any cause not excepted in the bill of lading.

2. Because the defendant delivered the said packages to the Grand Trunk Railway Company at Montreal, and no claim was then or before, or for a long time afterwards, made by the said railway company or by the plaintiffs or the defendant.

3. Because the plaintiffs accepted and received the said packages at Toronto, and for a long time made no claim on the defendant.

4. Because the invoice value of the said tea was equal only to 6132 dollars, and that even supposing the goods were damaged by a cause not excepted in the bill of lading, the defendant could not be held responsible or made liable for such damages to a greater extent than such invoice value.

The plaintiffs by their replication and answer took issue on the facts alleged in the defendants' plea, and the parties proceeded to evidence; and on the 30th Dec. 1872, the Superior Court gave judgment for the defendant and dismissed the case of the plaintiffs. The judgment of the court was delivered by Mackay, J., before whom the case was, as follows:

The court having heard the parties by their counsel, as well upon the motion by defendant to reject evidence in rebuttal of plaintiff's, and to which said motion due regard has been had as on the merits of this cause, having examined the proceedings, proofs of record, and evidence adduced, and having maturely deliberated.

Considering that plaintiffs have failed to establish right to a judgment against defendant in the present cause or action.

Considering that some of the material allegations of their declaration are unproved and some of them disproved:

Considering that the conduct of consignees of goods carried by common carriers ought to be frank and loyal towards the carriers in all cases in which it is claimed against them that goods carried have been lost or damaged during the carriage:

Considering that the defendant was bound to deliver all the teas he got to carry for plaintiffs in the condition in which he got them, and if they be damaged must pay damages according to their value, and that plaintiffs were bound to receive said teas if not totally unmerchantable and good for damages (proper indemnity), and if meaning to take the position that the teas were totally unmerchantable ought to have offered to give them up to defendant for his own account, and to have notified him to that effect, and thereafter charge him as in case of total loss:

Considering that plaintiffs by their declaration charge defendant as for total loss of the teas referred to, which are said to be lost and "utterly worthless," that the plaintiffs nevertheless received the teas which have not even yet been fairly enough examined to warrant plaintiffs charging defendants as they do:

Considering that plaintiffs have never abandoned said teas to defendant, nor notified him to that effect, but have actually refused to allow him (by his agents and servants in that behalf) to take samples of them as he wished, the plaintiffs so retaining (even after the institution of the present action) a possession of said teas adversely to defendant.

Considering it plain that the said teas, instead of being "utterly worthless" have a material value, and would sell for a large sum of money, probably over six thousand dollars.

Considering plaintiffs' treatment of defendant arbitrary, and that their present suit or action cannot be maintained, doth dismiss said plaintiffs' action, and doth declare the attachment in this cause dissolved, the whole with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed from the judgment to the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, and on the 22nd Sept. 1874, that court consisting of Mr. Chief Justice Dorion, Mr. Justice Monk, Mr. Justice Taschereau, Mr. Justice Ramsay, and Mr. Justice Sauborn, confirmed the decision of the court below, holding that the appellants had failed to establish by proof the allegations of their declaration, and particularly the quality of the tea when shipped, or that the said tea was damaged while on board the Medway, and, further, that the appellants did not use due diligence in notifying the defendant of the alleged damage to the said tea. They, therefore, confirmed the said judgment, with costs, and ordered remission of record to the court below. From this decision Mr. Justice Monk dissented.

From this judgment the consignees appealed.

The facts and arguments appear fully in their Lordships' judgment.

Cohn, Q.C. and R. Vaughan Williams appeared for the appellants.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and Lumley Smith for the respondent.

April 7.—Sir MONTAGUE SMITH delivered the judgment of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, affirming a decree of the Superior Court, which dismissed the plaintiff's action.

The appellants, who are merchants in Toronto, brought the action against the respondent, the owner of the steamship Medway, one of a line of steamers between London and Montreal, for the value of the damage alleged to have been done to 306 packages of tea on the voyage from London to Montreal.

By the bill of lading, signed in London by the master's agent on the 12th April 1870, the 306 packages were "to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, at the port of Montreal," . . . . "unto the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and by them to be forwarded thence per railway to the station nearest to Toronto, and at the aforesaid station delivered to Messrs. Charles Moore and Co., or to their assigns." The exception contains a long list of special risks, besides general perils of the sea, whether arising from negligence or otherwise. The instrument also contains the following condition, upon the last clause of which a material question arises:—

"No damage that can be insured against will be paid for, nor will any claim whatever be admitted unless made before the goods are removed."

The case of the plaintiffs as stated in their declaration, was that during the voyage the tea "had become impregnated and affected with the odour and taste of chloride of lime and other injurious substances," and that the damage so occasioned was not within any of the exceptions of the bill of lading. The defence, stating it generally, was first that the tea was not damaged on board the ship; and if it was, that in one way of accounting for it, the injury was within the excepted risks; and secondly, that the claim was barred by the delay which occurred in making it.

The evidence for the plaintiffs was to the effect that, during the voyage, scarlet fever broke out among the steerage passengers, and, under the advice of the surgeon, chloride of lime and carbolic acid were employed as disinfectants. That the chloride was thrown in large quantities about the fore cabin and other parts of the ship occupied by the passengers, and carbolic acid sometimes used in the same places, appears to have been satisfactorily proved. The plaintiffs' packages—how many of them did not appear—and packages of tea belonging to other consignees were stowed in the hold under this cabin, and the passengers' trunks were in a place near them. The passengers, it is said, suffered greatly during the voyage from the smell of the disinfectants, and when their trunks were opened on shore the clothes contained in them were found to be strongly impregnated with the same odour. The ship arrived at Montreal on the 2nd or 3rd May, having sailed from London on the 14th April.

There were, in all, 4000 or 5000 packages of tea on board dispersed in various parts of the ship. The plaintiffs' were landed with the others, and all were placed in shipping sheds, where they were sorted, and then taken to the freight sheds of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. From thence they were carried by railway to Toronto, and deposited in the railway company's bonded warehouses there. After lying a day or two in these warehouses the packages were carried in the railway company's wagons to the plaintiffs' own warehouse.

The unloading of the ship occupied several days, and the plaintiffs' packages were forwarded in three lots. These lots were removed from the shipping sheds to the railway freight sheds in Montreal on the 6th, 9th, and 12th May, and were respectively delivered at the plaintiffs' warehouse in Toronto on the 13th, 16th, and 17th May.

Much evidence was given as to to the storing and transport of the packages after they left the ship, to exclude the supposition that they were damaged in their transit from the ship to the plaintiffs' warehouse.

It appears that upon the arrival of some of the packages at the plaintiffs' warehouse, their shipping clerk and foreman (Macfarlane) perceived a peculiar smell in them, and called the attention of the carmen to it.

On the 18th May the plaintiffs called in four persons, viz., two grocers, a merchant, and a tea broker to examine the tea, and obtained from them the following report, which was sustained by their evidence given in the cause: "We find the entire lot damaged and unmerchantable. The damage appears to have been caused by chloride of lime, or some other chemical. We find the packages impregnated with the odour, as also the contents."

On the 27th May another survey of the tea was held for the purpose of obtaining a return of duty, and the surveyors then called in reported damage to the extent of 99 per cent.

No notice whatever of the damage or of these surveys was given to the captain or agent of the ship until the 30th May, when the solicitors of the plaintiffs wrote to Mr. Shaw, the agent of the ship at Montreal, informing him that "the tea upon its arrival was found to have been spoiled and rendered almost worthless by reason of its having been improperly carried," and inviting him to be present at a survey of the tea proposed to be held on the 9th June. To this letter, which was received by Mr. Shaw on the 3rd June, no answer was returned. The survey, however, took place, and a report, in substance the same as that of the 18th May, was made. Other evidence was given by the plaintiffs, but none as to the condition of the tea when shipped.

The defendant called witnesses to rebut the presumption that the damage was done in the ship, and among them stevedores and others who were present when the cargo was discharged, and say that as far as they observed, the floors over the hold were tight, and the packages undamaged; but it is remarkable that none of the officers or crew of the ship were examined.

Mr. Justice Mackay, the Judge of the Superior Court, who tried the cause, does not seem to have grappled with the question, whether the tea was damaged in the ship. The "considerants" of his judgment are principally directed to the conduct of the plaintiffs in delaying to make their claim, and in exaggerating the extent of the damage; and it can only, if at all, be inferred that this question was decided by him in the negative from the general "considerant," that some of the material allegations of the declaration are unproved, and some of them disproved.

Their Lordships, however, have had the advantage of seeing the reasons given by the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, and the majority certainly find the question of fact against the plaintiffs. But the judges, in dismissing the action, rest their decision principally upon other grounds, and their opinion on the question of fact is evidently not a firm one. It is based on what they consider the insufficiency of the evidence, and especially in the absence of proof of the condition of the tea when shipped.

Their Lordships cannot but think that the plaintiffs' evidence, although on some points open to unfavourable comment, does, on the whole, make out a strong primâ facie case that the damage was done in the ship, and that the presumption arising from it is greatly strengthened by the conduct of the defendant in declining to call any of the officers or crew of the ship to explain in what manner and under what conditions the chloride of lime and carbolic acid were used, and the state of the ship during the voyage.

They also think that the judges gave undue weight to the consideration that the plaintiffs offered no proof of the condition of the tea when it was shipped. There is not, and, in the nature of things, cannot be, any general rule of law or evidence on the subject. It must depend on the circumstances of each case, how far such proof is necessary, and the case is to be regarded as inconclusively proved without it. Where, for instance, a cargo of grain is found to be heated—a damage which may arise either from its bad condition when shipped, or from some cause existing in the ship—it may be essential to prove the state of the cargo before its shipment. But where, as in this case (supposing, of course, the evidence to be believed), noxious substances, calculated to produce the peculiar damage actually present, are found to have been used in close proximity to the tea, cause and effect are so nearly brought together that a conclusion can be reached without proof of its condition at the time of shipment.

Their Lordships would have thought it right to discuss the evidence with greater minuteness, if overruling the finding of the judges on the question of fact would have lead to the reversal of the judgment under appeal. But their opinion being adverse to the appellants on another part of the case, it is enough to say that they are not so satisfied of the correctness of the conclusions of the judges below on that question as to be able to advise Her Majesty to rest her affirmance of the judgment appealed from upon them.

It is also unnecessary, after what they have just intimated, for them to consider the point raised by Mr. Watkin Williams, that in one way of accounting for the damage, the injury, if done in the ship, would fall within the excepted points mentioned in the bill of lading.

Their Lordships will now proceed to the defence founded on the condition in the bill of lading, that no claim whatever for damage will be admitted unless made before the goods are removed.

It was not, and could not be denied, that this condition, stringent as it is, was binding on the consignees; but its application to the claim in question was disputed. It was contended that, "before the goods are removed" meant removal from the ship at Montreal, and not from the railway station at Toronto; and that the condition applied only to apparent damage, and the injury sustained by the tea was not such damage

There is undoubtedly difficulty, owing to the ambiguous language and inconsistent provisions of the bill of lading, in determining whether the removal referred to was that from the ship or the railway station. The construction most consistent with the rest of the instrument seems to point to the latter place. It was at the railway station that in express terms the goods were to be delivered to the plaintiffs, "freight being payable by the consignees as per margin;" this freight being, as it was admitted, a through freight from London to Toronto. By another clause it is provided that "goods must be taken away within twenty-four hours after arrival at the railway station to which they are destined." Again, freight is made due if payable by consignees, "on arrival at the place of destination." On the other hand it was pointed out that it is provided that the goods are to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility shall cease, and this delivery is to be to the railway company; but, although the liability of the ship for the subsequent damage then ceases, it would be the duty of the ship to contract with the railway company to carry on the goods to Toronto, and, as already observed, the railway station is spoken of as the place of destination, and it is there the goods are to be delivered to the plaintiffs.

The clause: "The goods to be taken from alongside by the consignee immediately the vessel is ready to discharge, or otherwise they will be landed and stored at the expense of the consignee, and at his risk"—is no doubt opposed to the above construction, but this clause is inconsistent with the engagement of the shipowner to send on by railway at a through freight to Toronto. It is evidently one of the printed clauses, and cannot control the specific undertaking to forward the goods to Toronto.

Mr. Cohen, in insisting that the condition referred to the removal from the ship, desired to assist his main contention that the condition should be confined to claims for apparent damage, since there being, as he said, little opportunity for examination on a delivery from the ship's side, it would be unreasonable to suppose the parties intended it to apply to claims other than for such damage. Supposing, however, removal from the ship was meant, that construction would not, in their Lordship's view, materially assist his contention; for in that case the railway company would be the agents of the plaintiffs to receive the goods from the ship, and if the plaintiffs, who had come under this stringent condition, were not content to leave the examination of the packages to the officers of the company, they should have taken care to employ a competent agent for that purpose. There were shipping sheds on the wharf alongside the ship in which the packages on being landed were placed, and where the goods remained in charge of the agents of the ship, who sorted and afterwards delivered them to the railway company's servants. There is no reason for supposing that opportunity would not have been afforded in these sheds for inspecting and examining the packages.

But the principal contention on behalf of the plaintiffs was that, whichsoever was the place of removal referred to, the condition should be confined to apparent damage. Now, its language is plain, and without any ambiguity. The first branch of it, "no damage that can be insured against will be paid for," although limited to insurable damage, clearly applies to such damage, whether apparent or latent. The words of the last branch are unlimited and universal, "any claim whatever." It was not, indeed, denied that these words would, in their natural sense, include all damage, but it was said they should be construed as the usual acknowledgment found in bills of lading, "shipped in good condition," has been, and confined to external and patent damage. It is to be observed, however, that, although the general understanding may have been so to limit the words of this acknowledgment, it is not an uncommon practice to qualify them by such expressions as "weight, value, and contents unknown."

But in truth the supposed analogy does not exist. This is a condition for the shipowners' benefit, and it may well be, that stale claims for latent damage were those against which he most desired to guard. Tea is an article peculiarly liable to such damage. It may be injured not only by contact with, but by the vapours or odours arising from, other substances, as in this case from chloride of lime. In the long voyage from China, even if sound when shipped, and in the removal and storage of it in England, it may have been subjected to noxious influences, which would spoil or deteriorate its condition without any external appearance of damage. Its susceptibility to similar injury would, of course, also exist after it was taken from the ship, and stored or otherwise dealt with by the merchant. A shipowner may choose to say, I will not be liable for any damage to an article of this kind, unless a claim is made so that it may be looked into and checked by my agents before the goods are removed from their control. And when a condition to this effect is found in a bill of lading, expressed in language which, in its ordinary and natural sense, includes all damage, whether latent or not, can the courts undertake to say it is so unreasonable that the parties could not have meant what they have said? No doubt this condition may bear hardly on consignees, but so also may the very large exceptions to the responsibility of the shipowner inserted in the body of this bill of lading. Certainly, no reasons for narrowing the scope of the condition can be gathered from the general tenor of the instrument, which is manifestly framed throughout with a view to exempt the shipowner (as far as could be foreseen) from liability for damage. It may be that this has been done to an unreasonable extent, but the plaintiffs are merchants and men of business, and cannot be relieved from an improvident contract, if it really be improvident. Possibly, in shipping under bills of lading thus framed, the merchant gets a corresponding advantage in a lower rate of freight.

None of the cases cited at the bar bear a close analogy to the present. The decisions relating to conditions common in the sales of horses, providing that the liability on the warranty shall cease at a certain date, were referred to, in which it has been held that latent defects are within them: (see Smart v. Hyde, 8 M. & W. 723; Chapman v. Gwyther, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 477; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 463.)

Reference was also made to a well-known class of decisions on policies of fire insurance, in which conditions, requiring claims to be sent in within specified periods, having been strictly construed. In a recent appeal before this tribunal from the Court of Queen's Bench in Canada (Whyte v. The Western Assurance Company, not reported) (a), in which a question arose, whether the period of thirty days for sending in proofs of the claim was a material part of the condition, Lord Justice Mellish, in delivering the opinion of the committee, observed: "It was said that, although it was a condition precedent that the proofs should be sent in, yet the period of thirty days was not material; but if that were so, then there would be no time at all appointed within which the proofs were to to be sent in, and the assured might wait one or more years before he sent in his proof, and still be entitled to recover, which would appear to be entirely contrary to the true meaning of the condition." Exactly the same consequences, if the plaintiff's construction of the condition were to prevail, might happen in this case, and would be equally opposed to its meaning.

But if any limitation of the condition could be implied, it could not reasonably go further than to exclude such damage only as could not on an examination of the packages, conducted with proper care and skill at the place of removal, have been discovered, and their Lordships think it appears upon the evidence that if such an examination had taken place, either at the shipping sheds at Montreal or the railway station at Toronto, the damage complained of might have been discovered. The odour of chloride of lime, even from the packages themselves, was very strong. A peculiar smell was perceived by MacFarlane, the plaintiffs' foreman, as soon as they were delivered, and he not only called the attention of the railway carmen to it, but made a memorandum on some of the receipts that the packages were damaged.

Again, Mr. Mills, a witness, whose tea formed part of the Medway's cargo, upon examining his packages on the wharf at Montreal on the day they were landed, discovered that they were damaged by chloride of lime and carbolic acid. He says the smell was quite perceptible.

The surveyors also, who examined the plaintiffs' tea on the 18th May, report that they found "the packages," as well as the contents, impregnated with the odour of chloride of lime. It is true the stevedores employed in unloading the ship say they did not observe any smell about the packages; but they do not appear to have examined or even handled them. Their Lordships cannot doubt that if a competent agent of the plaintiffs, like MacFarlane, had been ready to receive the packages, either at the shipping sheds or the railway station, the smell would have been at once detected by him, and, having detected it, he might, without difficulty, have further examined the tea by taking and testing samples from the packages in the simple and usual manner described by the surveyors. The damage would then have been fully disclosed, and a claim in respect of it might have been made before the packages were removed.

(a) This was an action on a policy of fire insurance. The appeal was heard in March 1875, before Sir James Colvile, James and Mellish, L.JJ., and Sir M. Smith, and dismissed with costs, on the ground that it was a condition precedent in the policy that proofs of the loss sustained should be sent in within thirty days, and this condition had not been complied with by the appellant, and there was no waiver by the respondents, as contended.

The opinion of their Lordships, whilst it sustains the second "considerant" of the judgment under appeal, rests entirely on the express condition in the bill of lading. Some of the learned judges below gave the same effect to it; but all of them found their decision, in part at least, upon the maritime law of France, and Article 1680 of the Canadian Civil Code, applying the principles derived from these sources to what, upon the evidence, they deem to be unreasonable and unfair delay on the part of the plaintiffs. It is often useful, especially in mercantile cases, to refer for illustration to the laws and usages of countries other than that whose law governs the particular case. But the judges seem to have gone further, and to have thought that a substantive defence arising from the delay might be founded upon their own law. Their Lordships, therefore, think it right to observe that, in their opinion, the bill of lading, having been made in England by the master of an English ship, is a contract to be governed and interpreted by English law, and that, whilst the presumptions arising from the conduct of the plaintiffs may properly be regarded in determining the question whether the damage was in fact done, as they assert, in the ship, neither their conduct, nor the delay in making the claim, would constitute, by English law, an answer to the action, apart from the express condition in the bill of lading: (See Peninsular and Oriental Company v. Shand, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 244; 3 Moo. P. C., N. S., 272; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809; Lloyd v. Guibert, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 26, 283; 4 B. & S. 100; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 602).

In the result their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

ALLISON v. THE BRISTOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER IN ENGLAND.

Marine Insurance—Policy on freight—Freight payable in advance—Total loss.

When by the terms of a charter-party a part of the freight is made payable and is paid in advance, the charterer has a right to deduct the whole amount so paid by him from any freight which may actually be earned, in case of a loss of part of the cargo, and not only a proportionate part of it.

The appellant, a shipowner, chartered his ship for a voyage from Greenock to Bombay. The charter-party provided that freight was to be paid on unloading, and right delivery of the cargo at the rate of 42s. per ton on the quantity delivered, "such freight to be paid one half in cash on signing bills of lading, the remainder on right delivery of the cargo." Half of the estimated amount of freight was paid on shipment, and the appellant insured the unpaid freight with the respondents. The ship was lost, but half the cargo was saved, and delivered without any additional payment by the charterer. The appellant then claimed as for a total loss of the unpaid half of the freight.

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below) that on the proper construction of the charter-party and policies he was entitled to recover as for a total loss of half the freight.

Dictum of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P. C. 361), explained.(a)

THE appellant in this case was the owner of the ship Merchant Prince, and he chartered her to one De Mattos for a voyage from Greenock to Bombay, with a cargo of coals, freight to be paid at the rate of 42s. a ton on the quantity delivered. The freight was to be paid one half in cash on signing bills of lading, and one half on delivery of the cargo at Bombay. A cargo of 2178 tons of coals was loaded, and bills of lading signed, and 2286*l.* was paid on account of freight. The appellant insured the freight under the charter-party with the respondents. The ship was lost within a short distance of Bombay, but about half the cargo was saved, and delivered to the consignees of the charter free of freight.

The appellant then brought this action on the policy seeking to recover as for a total loss of the unpaid half of the freight, but the respondents contended that he was only entitled to recover half of the unpaid freight, and they paid that amount into court.

(a) This decision firmly establishes the doctrine of English law that freight paid in advance cannot be recovered back by the consignee on the failure of the shipowner to perform his contract of carriage. Doubt has sometimes been thrown upon this doctrine, but after the present decision it will be impossible for our courts to hold otherwise. This, of course, applies only to those cases in which the advance by the charterer is in the nature of freight, and is not a mere loan. The decision also puts an end to the argument often raised that the word "freight" may bear different meanings in the same charter-party. It has long been a favourite contention that where an advance is made by the charterer to the shipowner before the sailing of the ship, such advance is not freight properly so called, nor a payment made in consideration of the carriage of the goods, but is a payment made in consideration of the taking of the goods on board. This contention their Lordships have refused to adopt, pointing out that there can be no reason for placing different meanings upon the same word in the same mercantile instrument, and that the time of payment cannot really affect the nature of the payment made. Hence an advance of freight must be considered as "freight" in the ordinary sense of that word, except in so far as it cannot be recovered back. Nor, unless there be an express stipulation to that effect, can an advance be treated as other than a part of the whole sum to be ultimately paid as freight, and consequently to be deducted from that whole sum, whatever it may be. An insurer or shipowner is not entitled to divide an advance into so many parts, and treat each part as a separate advance on each proportionate part of the cargo. This decision finally settles one or two points of considerable importance in mercantile law.—ED.

The case was tried before Brett, J. and a special jury in December 1872, when a verdict was found for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to set it aside, and to enter a verdict.

A rule was accordingly obtained, but it was discharged by the court of Common Pleas (Bovill, C.J., Brett and Grove, JJ.) as reported ante, vol. 2, p. 54.

The case was then taken on appeal to the Exchequer Chamber, where the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was reversed by Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, J. and Amphlett, B., Cleasby and Pollock, BB., dissenting (ante, vol. 2, p. 312).

This appeal was then brought to the House of Lords, 2nd July 1875. The judges were summoned, and Kelly, C.B., Mellor, Brett, and Grove, JJ., and Pollock B. attended.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and McLeod (Cohen, Q.C. with them) appeared for the appellant.

C. Russell, Q.C. Benjamin, Q.C., and Fullarton, for the respondents.

At the conclusion of the arguments the following question of law was left by their Lordships to the learned judges, "Whether upon the circumstances of the case, there was a total or only a partial loss of the subject matter of insurance?"

Feb. 25*th*, 1876.—The learned judges, having taken time to consider, delivered their opinions as follows:—

Kelly, C.B.—My Lords, I venture to think that some topics have been introduced into the discussions which have taken place in this cause which are either immaterial altogether or irrelevant. The substance of the whole case is this: The plaintiff having granted a charter-party of his ship the Merchant Prince, to carry a cargo of coals from Greenock to Bombay, the freight upon which was estimated at some 4000*l.* and upwards, received under a provision of the charter-party 2000*l.* and upwards in advance of the freight; and he insured by policies, before and after the date of the charter-party and advance, "freight payable abroad" valued at 2005*l.* He had thus secured to himself one-half the freight by the payment in advance, and he secured himself by thus insuring the other half by the policies in question. The ship was lost, but one-half of the cargo arrived at Bombay, and was landed in safety. The freight on this was met in the strict terms of the charter-party by the advance made at its execution; and the other half freight, the cargo not having reached Bombay, was lost. And the plaintiff now claims the loss as a total loss under the policies. It was only this unpaid half that he insured, and this he lost, and this I am of opinion is a total loss, and that the plaintiff is entitled to your Lordship's judgment.

Brett, J.—In this case the action was brought by the plaintiff, a shipowner, on two policies of insurance, to recover an alleged total loss of freight. The first policy described the subject matter insured as "freight valued at 2000*l.*"; the second described it as "freight payable abroad valued at 2000*l.*" The plaintiff claimed for the total loss of freight, which he alleged would, if there had been no loss, have been payable to him under a charter-party made between him as shipowner, and one De Mattos as charterer. By the charter-party, dated March 7th 1867, the ship was to load at Greenock a cargo of coals, and proceed forthwith to Bombay, and there deliver the same." "The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton on the quantity delivered," &c., and "such freight" is to be paid, say, one-half in cash on signing bills of lading, less four months interest, &c., 5 per cent. for insurance, and 2½ per cent. on the gross amount of freight in lieu of consignment at Bombay, and "the remainder" on delivery of the cargo agreeably to bills of lading, less cost of coal short delivered, in cash, &c. The vessel to be addressed to the freighter's agent abroad, free of commission, owners to have an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, &c. Under this charter-party the charterer loaded about 2000 tons of coal on board the ship, and paid the plaintiff about 2000*l.* The bills of lading were dated April 15th, 1867. A receipt was given by the plaintiff on the same date endorsed on the bills of lading, for the sum received, in the following terms, "being advance of half freight on within shipment, &c." The dates of the policies sued on were April 13th and April 22nd, 1867. There were four policies in all effected by the plaintiff, by which collectively the amount insured was 2000*l.* Upon the case as stated the court had power to draw inferences of fact. Half the cargo was lost, and half was delivered at Bombay.

In the Court of Common Pleas it was argued on behalf of the defendants that they had a right to treat the policies as insurances of the whole freight to be earned by the ship; because the policies were in general terms "on freight," and there was no notice of any other than the whole freight. Upon this it was answered on behalf of the plaintiff, and determined by the court, that, as a matter of law, the policy in general terms must be held to take effect either upon such freight as the assured had at risk on the voyage insured, or as he had at risk, and intended to insure, and as matter of fact, by deduction, that in this case the assured intended to insure the freight which he supposed he had at risk, namely, about 2000*l.*, the amount which he would have to receive at Bombay if the cargo arrived safely, and which he supposed he would lose if the cargo was lost. This decision was founded on the facts in this case, and on the cases of Irving v. Richardson (2 B. & Ad. 193), and Stephens v. The Australasian Insurance Company (ante, vol. 1, p. 458; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 18; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585). Those cases seem to me to justify a decision that by reason of the general understanding of merchants, which has been sufficiently made known to the courts, it is to be held as matter of law, without further proof, that wherever the subject-matter of a policy is described in it in general terms, it is to be taken to cover the interest which is within its terms, which the assured has at risk, unless the contrary appear to have been the intention of the assured from other parts of the policy, or other proof.

In this case, if the matter be not one of law, it seems to me clear upon the facts that the plaintiff intended to insure not the whole charter-party freight but the part which had not been paid to him when the ship sailed, and which he evidently estimated at 2000*l.* It will be observed that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber assumes that this was so, and that this point was not pressed before your Lordships. For it was admitted in argument by the counsel for the respondents that the whole question must ultimately depend upon the construction of the charter-party, whether the shipowner could by virtue of it claim under the circumstances anything from the charterer. "I admit," he said, "that if he could claim nothing, there was a total loss." The question, therefore, is whether, upon the proper construction of the charter-party, the shipowner, could or could not have maintained a claim against the charterer for any amount of freight beyond the sum paid to him when the bills of lading were signed.

The first observation I will venture to make is that this question should be determined upon a consideration of the charter-party alone, that is to say, as if no policy had been effected. And, secondly, that the construction of it, as of any other mercantile document, should not be made to depend on its strict grammatical form, or on the apparent meaning of any one phrase in it taken by itself but on the apparent expressed meaning as to practical results of the whole. It should be construed by considering the terms of it, and the decisions in former cases of terms similar, though perhaps not identical. Upon charter-parties and bills of lading similarly framed, the disputes found in the books to have been raised have been whether the money advanced should be treated as a loan or as an advance of freight; if the first, whether it should be deducted from freight, if freight should be earned, or be paid back wholly or in part to the charterer, if no freight, or not a sufficient amount of freight should be earned by delivery at the port of discharge; if the second whether if in fact paid, it, or any part of it should be paid back; or, if not paid, whether it could be claimed by the shipowner where, in either case, by perils of the sea the cargo should not be delivered at the port of discharge. The first case on the subject is the Anonymous case (2 Show. 283): "Advance money paid before, if in part of freight, and named so in the charter-party, although the ship be lost before it came to a delivering port, yet wages are due according to the proportion of the freight paid before; for the freighters cannot have their money." As the terms of the charter-party are not given the case is of little assistance as to the construction of the present charter-party, but it suggests a distinction between charter-parties, namely, that by some the advanced payment is a payment in part of freight, and in others not, and if not the advance must be a loan; and it is an authority that in the reign of Charles II. the acknowledged understanding and rule was that money to be paid in advance of freight by the terms of the contract of carriage could not, if paid, be demanded back in consequence of the loss of the ship and cargo on the voyage. In Blakey v. Dixon (2 B. & P. 321), the declaration alleged a promise to pay the money due for freight, and a delivery of the bill of lading, and then alleged that "by reason thereof," the defendant was liable to pay the freight. There was no allegation of the arrival of the ship or of the delivery of the goods. Upon a special demurrer, Lord Eldon and others decided for the defendant; but the judgments obviously intimate that if the promise or contract to pay the freight on the delivery of the bill of lading had been set out with sufficient particularity, the claim might have been supported without alleging the arrival of the ship or the delivery of the cargo. Such intimation is authority for the proposition that if by the contract there is to be a prepayment of the freight, or part of it, an action may be maintained for such money before the cargo has arrived, or although it be lost. In Mashiter v. Buller 1 Camp. 84), the evidence consisted of the bills of lading, some of which stated that the goods were to be delivered at Lisbon, "freight for the said goods to be paid in London," and others "the shippers paying freight for the said goods in London." The ship sailed, but was lost in the Downs; and Lord Ellenborough held that the words in these bills of lading only meant that the freight should be paid in London instead of in Lisbon, and that they by no means dispensed with the performance of the voyage. He added that "if the defendants had paid the freight upon the shipment of the goods, they might have recovered every penny of it back again." The decision, it should be observed, is that by virtue of these bills of lading, expressed as they were, the only stipulation was that the freight should be paid in London instead of at Lisbon; that is to say that it did not alter the time of payment, but only the place. The freight, according to that construction, was not payable until after the ship had arrived at Lisbon, though it was to be paid in London instead of in Lisbon. The case is no authority upon any question of law arising where money to be paid for the carriage of goods in ships is by the contract to be paid before the delivery of the goods. In Andrew v. Moorhouse (5 Taunt. 435), the shipowners were held to be entitled to recover, after the loss of the ship on the voyage, the whole amount of freight for the whole cargo shipped, because the contract of carriage was found to be a contract to carry the goods to the Cape for 5*l.* per ton, and there to deliver them, "freight being paid," and also that "the 5*l.* was to be paid in London." The court held that if the true construction of the contract was that the freight was to be paid in London on the sailing of the ship, the shipowner was entitled to recover the whole of it, although none of the cargo had been carried to the port of delivery by reason of the whole having been lost at sea. No point was made of each party bearing half the loss; the charterer had to pay the whole of the freight after the loss, because he had agreed that the whole should be prepaid. In De Silvale v. Kendall (4 M. and S. 37). the action was brought by the charterer to recover money paid in advance. The charter-party was as near as possible in the same form as in the present case. It was, amongst other things, to convey cotton from Maranham to Liverpool, at and after the rate of 2½ annas per lb. weight, "for each and every pound of cotton which should be delivered at the King's Beam at Liverpool, such freight to be paid as follows," viz., as much cash as may be found necessary for the vessel's disbursements at Maranham to be advanced, &c., "free from interest and commission," &c., and the residue of such freight to be paid on the delivery of the cargo in Liverpool. The plaintiff advanced 192*l.* at Maranham for the ship's disbursements. A cargo was loaded, but the ship was captured on the voyage, and never arrived at Liverpool. It was argued that the advance was either a loan or an advance of part of the freight liable to be refunded if in the result no homeward freight should become due. It was held that the advance was a prepayment of freight, and that by the law of England prepaid freight is not to be returned because by accident the cargo is lost. In order to interpret the charter-party all the judges rely upon the phrases, "such freight to be paid as follows," and "the residue of such freight to be paid," &c., which are the words used in the present charter-party. They also rely upon the stipulation that the advance is to be "free from interest and commission." In Manfield v. Maitland (4 B. & Ald. 582), the action was on a policy to insure an acceptance of 219*l*. The acceptance had been given by the plaintiff, the assured, in pursuance of a charter-party by which he had chartered a ship to carry deals from Quebec to Bridgwater, and there deliver them, being paid freight for the deals 10*l*. 8*s*. per 100, one-half the freight to be paid in cash on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, and the remainder by bill in London at four months. The captain to be supplied with cash for the ship's use." The ship was lost. It was held that the plaintiff had no insurable interest under the policy, because, on a true construction of this charter-party the advance was not a prepayment of any part of the freight, but only a loan; and being a loan the plaintiff was entitled to deduct it from freight, if freight became payable, and to obtain its repayment if no freight became payable. In that charter-party the whole of the freight was made payable on unloading and right delivery, half of it in cash, and half by a bill to be then given. The stipulation as to the advance was not incorporated into a sentence headed "such freight to be paid," &c. There were no words such as "the residue of such freight to be paid on delivery," &c. In Saunders v. Drew (3 B. & Ad. 445), the action was brought to recover back money paid in advance. The charter-party was, in part, for the hire of the ship for an intermediate voyage at the rate of 1*l*. per ton per month for every ton of the ship's register tonnage, the charterer to pay four months "of such monthly hire" in advance, and the "balance that may be due at the termination of the period" for which she may be hired, in cash, at the port where she may be discharged. The ship was hired for the intermediate voyage, and the plaintiff paid in advance 1734*l*. for four months time. The ship was lost two months after the hiring. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover any part of the 1734*l*. because it was in terms a prepayment of part of the freight. There was no suggestion made in argument or judgment that the charterer and shipowner should each bear half the loss, and that, therefore, the plaintiff should recover the payment in respect of one of the two lost months. In Hall v. Janson (4 E & B. 500), a declaration on a policy was held good on general demurrer, because it alleged that the insurance was expressed in the policy to be on freight, and then alleged as a fact outside the policy "that E. S. was interested in the money so insured, as being money advanced to him as owner of the ship, on account of freight, and being subject to the risk of the said voyage." It was held that it was consistent with this allegation that although by the contract of carriage the advance was to be on account of freight, it was stipulated by the same contract that it should be returned if the ship were lost. The case suggests prepaid freight, but accompanied by an express stipulation that it should be repaid if the cargo should not arrive. It is, however, in truth, a case of pleading. In Hicks v. Shield (7 E. & B. 633; 26 L. J. 205, Q.B.), the charter-party was between the plaintiff as charterer, and the defendants as owners, to carry rice from Rangoon to London, and there deliver the same, on being paid freight as follows: 5*l*. 5*s*. per ton net rice delivered, &c., "cash for ship's disbursement to be advanced" to the extent of 300*l*., free of interest, but "subject to insurance." and 2½ per cent. commission in full of port and pilotage charges, &c. The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery, &c. The plaintiff advanced 300*l*.; the ship was lost. The question was whether the defendant was bound to repay the whole or any part. It was argued that the advance was a mere loan, but it was held otherwise, because of the indication arising from the stipulation that the advance might be insured. In this case the stipulation as to the insurance was relied on in the absence of such phrases as "such freight to be paid as follows," and "the residue of such freight to be paid on delivery." It is an authority as to the effect of the stipulation as to insurance, and shows that it indicates that the advance is an advance of freight, and is not by way of loan. Again, there was no allusion to the idea of each party bearing half the loss. In Jackson v. Isaacs (3 H. & N. 405) the declaration was on a charter-party between the plaintiff as owner, and the defendant as charterer, by which the ship was to carry a cargo of salt to Fernando Po, and there deliver the same on being paid freight at 20*s*. per ton on the quantity shipped, "payable by charterer's acceptance at four months on ship clearing at the custom house, Liverpool, subject to insurance." Breach for not giving the acceptance. Plea, that the freight was to be paid in advance "subject to insurance," and that the plaintiff never did insure for the benefit of the defendant, or otherwise, and that the ship and cargo were wholly lost. Demurrer. The plea was held to be bad. This case shows the true meaning of the stipulation that the charterer will advance freight, or part of it, "subject to insurance" or "less insurance." If there were no advance the shipowner would have to insure. If the charterer were to advance without deduction the shipowner would obtain the whole freight without the burden of having to insure, and the charterer would pay the full freight, and besides have to insure. In order to restore the position of both to what it would be if the freight were paid at the end instead of at the beginning of the voyage, the advance is paid less insurance. The shipowner gets the freight at the beginning, less what he would have had to pay for insurance if he were only to get the full freight at the end; the charterer pays the freight at the beginning less the amount which he must, for doing so, have to pay for insurance against the risk cast upon him by the prepayment. This is precisely the explanation of the present charter-party given by Cleasby, B. in the Exchequer Chamber. In Byrne v. Schiller (L. Rep. 6 Ex. 20; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 741; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 514) in error (ante, vol. 1, p. 511; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 319; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211) the action was on a charter-party between the plaintiff as owner and the defendant as charterer, to recover a sum of 737*l*., alleged to be due for advance freight, although the ship was lost on the voyage. In the Court of Error it was argued that a prepayment of freight is not final, but can be recovered if the goods are lost, and the freight, therefore, never earned. In answer, Cockburn, C.J., said: "We are all agreed that the law is too firmly settled for us to depart from it even in a court of appeal, that where freight is paid in advance it cannot be recovered." No one suggested that anything less than the whole advance freight was payable, although the whole cargo was lost. It becomes necessary in the next place to consider the true import of the often quoted words of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P. C. 361). In that case there was no dispute that the freight was payable by the shipper in advance. It was agreed that it should be paid by him in advance at Liverpool. The port of discharge was Sydney. The bills of lading were indorsed for value. The shipper did not make the stipulated payment in advance. The captain at Sydney, claiming a lien on the cargo for freight, refused to deliver to the assignee of the bill of lading. The Privy Council held that there was no lien. It was not necessary to say that advance freight was not freight at all, it was only necessary to say that the incident of lien did not attach to freight so to be paid, and I think that is all that is said by Lord Kingsdown. He does not say that the money payable in advance is not freight at all. The decision is that where the agreed time of payment of the freight is not contemporaneous with the time of delivery of the cargo, there is no implied right of lien. The observations of Lord Kingsdown are pointed to that question. The true meaning of them is, that so far as concerns a question of nothing being due until delivery, or a question of lien, it is the same in effect as if the money were to be paid for taking the goods on board, and as if it were not to be paid for carrying them. The case of Tamvaco v. Simpson (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 160; 2 Mar. Law Cas. C. S. 249), in the Exchequer Chamber (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 893; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 363; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 343), is in accordance with the case in the Privy Council. The case of Watson v. Shankland (ante, vol. 2. p. 115; L. Rep. 2 H. L. Sc. 304; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 349) was an appeal from Scotland. There is great doubt whether the English rule as to prepaid freight applies in Scotland. The decision, however, was that, assuming the advance to be a loan, it could not be recovered, If in the present case the advance could be treated as a loan, it might be necessary to consider that case with the utmost attention, but it would, as it seems to me, be impossible to hold that without overruling all the cases on this subject, or the doctrine assumed in them all, which have been decided since the time of Charles II.

I have drawn attention to all the cases in order to show how uniform the view has been as to what construction is to be put upon shipping documents in the form of the present charter-party, and as to the uniform, though perhaps anomalous rule, that the money to be paid in advance of freight must be paid though the goods are before payment lost by perils of the sea, and cannot be recovered if paid before the goods are so lost. Although this course of business may in theory be anomalous, I think its origin and existence are capable of a reasonable explanation. It arose in the case of the long Indian voyages. The length of voyage would keep the shipowner for too long a time out of money, and freight is much more difficult to pledge as security to third persons than goods represented by a bill of lading. Therefore the shipper agreed to make the advance on what he would ultimately have to pay, and for a consideration took the risk, in order to obviate a repayment which disarranges business transactions.

It seems to me that, on a review of all the cases, the true construction of the charter-party in this case is that the 2000*l.* which was to be paid, and was paid, in advance, was a prepayment of the freight payable under the charter-party, and that no part of it could be recovered by the charterer from the shipowner, and that the stipulation as to deduction for insurance did not alter this right. I do not understand that it is denied that the freight to be earned by the shipowner in this case was 2*l.* per ton on the amount of coal delivered at Bombay. Indeed, to hold otherwise would be flatly to contradict the charter-party. But it is suggested, and was held in the Exchequer Chamber, that the payment under such a contract is not in respect of the freight which is eventually earned, but of the freight which would be earned if the whole cargo should arrive and be delivered, so as to be a prepayment of so much per ton on every ton of cargo shipped. Let this be tested on the assumption that no part of the advance can be paid back, which, I submit, is conclusively proved to be a correct assumption by the cases I have cited, and that there is no insurance by either party. Taking the figures of the present case, the charterer must, upon the assumption, pay in effect more than 2*l.* per ton in every case, except where the whole cargo is delivered; and if the shipowner is to pay back a part, then either a part is mere loan, or money which as prepaid freight must be paid back, both of which views are contrary to all the cases. Whereas, on the contrary, if the amount of freight earned is set down according to the quantity of cargo delivered, and so debited to the charterer, and he is credited against it as a whole with the amount paid in advance, every word of the charter-party is satisfied, and nothing is done in conflict with any decided case. It follows that, in my opinion, the shipowner, the plaintiff in this case, could not have claimed anything more from the charterer than the 2000*l.* which had been prepaid; that the only freight which the plaintiff had at risk was the balance of freight, if any, to be received at Bombay if the ship with sufficient cargo arrived there; that the freight which was insured was that balance of freight which was to be received at Bombay if the cargo should arrive safely, and lost if it did not, and that there was a total loss of such insured freight.

I entirely agree with the judgment of Cleasby, B. in the Exchequer Chamber, and with the reasons given by him for it. I cannot agree with those judgments which seem to me to be rested on suggested equities between the charterer and shipowner which never existed, and on suggested equities between different underwriters, which, if they existed, should not be considered in this case.

I answer your Lordships' question by saying that, in my opinion, there was a total loss. In this opinion my brother Pollock agrees.

Grove, J.—I agree with the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, and that of Cleasby and Pollock, BB., in the Exchequer Chamber. I can add nothing to the reasons given. I answer your Lordships' question by saying that, in my opinion, there was a total loss.

Mellor, J.—My Lords in answer to the question propounded by your Lordships, I am of opinion that under the circumstances there was a partial loss only, and not a total loss of the subject matter of insurance. I expressed my opinion to that effect in the judgment which I delivered in the Exchequer Chamber, to which I venture to refer. I forbear to trouble your Lordships with any further observations on the case, especially as I entirely concur with the opinion of my brother Blackburn, expressed in the answer which he is prepared to give to the question propounded by your Lordships.

Blackburn, J.—My Lords, in my opinion there was only a partial loss of the subject matter of insurance. My reasons for this opinion are as follows:

Freight is the reward payable to the carrier for the safe carriage and delivery of goods; it is payable only on the safe carriage and delivery: if the goods are lost on the voyage nothing is payable, and in cases where the freight is made payable at so much per ton of the goods, and part of the goods only are delivered, a proportionate part only of the freight is payable. But a sum of money payable by the shippers of the goods at the port of shipment does not acquire the legal character of freight, because it is described under that name in a charter-party. It is, in effect, money to be paid for taking the goods on board, and undertaking to carry them, and not for carrying them. This, which I have taken with a slight alteration from the judgment of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P.C. 361), in my opinion is an accurate statement of the law. A sum of money may be advanced as a loan on the security of the freight to be earned, and in such a case may be recovered though the freight is lost; but I think it has always been held that a stipulation which shows that the merchant is to insure the amount, is almost conclusive to show that it is not a loan on the security of freight to be earned, but an advance of freight (Hicks v. Shield (7 E. & B. 633), Trayes v. Worms (19 C. B., N. S., 159; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 548; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 209); and if it is an advance of freight, then by our law it cannot be recovered in whole or in part, though the ship, or the goods, or part of them are lost, and consequently the freight is in whole or part unearned: (Byrne v. Schiller, ante, vol. 1, p .511.) Merchants, according to my experience, attach very great weight to a stipulation as to who is to insure, as showing who is to bear the risk of loss; and I cannot doubt that both the plaintiff and De Mattos, the charterer, perfectly understood that the sum paid on signing the bill of lading under this charter-party was an advance of freight, which was to be at the risk of the owner of the goods, and could not be recovered though the goods were all lost; that it was in effect, to use Lord Kingsdown's language, not freight for carrying the goods, but money paid for taking the goods on board, and undertaking to carry them. It might be insured by the owner of the goods either under the description of "prepaid freight," or as "the increased value of the goods by prepayment of freight," which latter form was adopted in this case. Had the charter-party been expressed "freight to be at 42*s*. per ton, one guinea to be paid on the right and true delivery, and one guinea in advance on signing bills of lading," there could have been no dispute about the matter. The loss of a certain number of tons would have caused the shipowner to lose a proportionate number of guineas, because his freight, pro tanto, was not earned; and would also have caused the owner of the goods to lose an equal number of guineas, because he had lost the benefit of the number of guineas he had paid for the undertaking to carry his coals. The loss of each individual ton would have occasioned the same loss to each, and in the event that has happened there would be a loss of 50 per cent. on this policy on the freight, and also a loss of 50 per cent on De Mattos' policy on "the coals, and increased value thereof by prepayment of freight."

The defendants contend, and I think rightly, that on the true construction of the charter-party, the effect is the same as if it had been expressly stated as above, But the plaintiff puts a different construction on it, he contends that it was intended that the advance was to be against whatever freight was ultimately earned, and at the end of the voyage to be deducted from whatever freight was earned, and, consequently, that though it was in one sense the risk of the owner of the goods, as it could not be recovered in any event, yet he was to lose nothing in respect of the prepaid freight, or the enhanced value of the goods, until half or more of the goods were lost: that the loss of the first ton of coals was a loss to the shipowners of two guineas of freight, and no loss at all of the money paid in advance, nor of the increased value of the goods, and that so it continued till half of the coals were lost, and then that the loss of each ton above the half would be no loss to the shipowner at all, but a loss to the owner of the goods of two guineas out of the money paid in advance. That, in short under this charter-party, the loss of the freight was total as soon as half the coals were lost, and the risk to the owner of the goods, as far as regards the prepaid freight or enhanced value of the goods, did not commence till half the coals were lost.

Had the underwriters pleaded and proved that the insured did not disclose this peculiar nature of the charter-party, making the risk double what in ordinary circumstances it would have been, that would have been a good defence. They have not so pleaded, and therefore we must act on the supposition that the charter-party was disclosed, in which case if the underwriters misconstrued it, it was their own fault. But, as already said, I do not think they have misconstrued it; and what is the true construction of the charter-party is really the matter in dispute in this cause. It is very difficult to argue on the construction of such instrument, or to do more than state one's views of what it means. The words are, "freight to be paid on unloading, and right delivery of the cargo at and after the rate of 42*s*., per ton on the quantity delivered," and had it stopped there I think there would be no room for doubt that it meant 42*s*. per ton for each ton delivered, and nothing for those not delivered, so that a partial loss of the goods would be a loss of a proportionate part of the freight. But it goes on, "such freight to be paid, say, one half in cash on signing bills of lading, less certain deductions, including 5 per cent. for insurance. That clearly expresses that 21*s*. less these deductions was to be paid for every ton put on board, without reference to whether it was all delivered or not, "and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo." I think that means the remainder of the 45*s*. per ton on the right delivery of each ton. Had the broker who drew up the charter-party adopted language similar to that used in Byrne v. Schiller (ante, vol. 1, p. 511), and said, "the amount paid on signing the bill of lading to be deducted from freight on settlement thereof," it would clearly have expressed what the appellants say was the intention. But in the absence of those or any similar words, I think that is not the meaning of the words used. The construction contended for by the appellant seems to me forced and unnatural, and not that which mercantile men would put upon such a contract. I do not like to make assertions as to what mercantile men would say, knowing as I do that other judges would make contrary assertions; and we have very little to assist us in ascertaining what merchants really would think. I see that my brother Cleasby, in his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, attaches weight to the conduct of the master in delivering up the coals without payment of the 21*s.* per ton, as evidence of the understanding of merchants on the construction of the charter-party; and this was repeated on the arguments at your Lordships' bar. I am not sure that a legitimate argument as to the mercantile understanding can be deduced from the conduct of parties after the dispute has arisen, and in no case do I attach much weight to the conduct of a captain seeking to charge underwriters, whom all captains are too apt to think their legitimate prey; I should myself attach more weight to the conduct of the insurance brokers, who worded both policies as if they believed that the risk as to the freight and as to the enhanced value of the goods was the ordinary risk, subject to a partial loss or the loss of any part of the goods. Had De Mattos and his brokers thought that no part of the prepaid freight, which formed more than half of the value which he insured was to be lost till more than one-half of the goods were lost, so as to render the risk as to this much less than the risk as to the goods themselves, he would, I should think not have shaped his policy so as to lump these two unequal risks together. He would, I think, have severed the two in his policy, and have required that the premium for the smaller risks should be less, instead of insuring as he did, as if his risk as to the enhanced value of the goods was the same as that on the goods themselves.

I have only further to observe that the terms of the charter-party, "42*s.* per ton delivered to be paid one half in cash on signing bills of lading," are exactly equivalent to saying, "21*s.* to be paid on every ton put on board." If no disaster happened the number of tons delivered would be the same as the number of tons put on board, but I do not think it an accurate statement to say that the payment was to be one-half of the estimated freight, which is the phrase used by each of the judges in the Court of Common Pleas, and I cannot but think that a fallacy lurks under this, to my mind, inappropriate expression.

I have only to add that where there has been such a difference of opinion on the question of what is the intention of the parties as expressed in this charter-party, it is impossible to say that the meaning is clear. It will appear different to different minds. I can only say that to me the intention appears to be to express that which the respondents say has been expressed.

And, such being my opinion, I answer your Lordships' question by saying that there was only a partial loss of the subject matter of insurance.

Their Lordships took time to consider, and on March 30.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, this appeal is from a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in an action brought by the plaintiff on two policies of insurance to recover a total loss of freight. The Court of Common Pleas unanimously gave judgment in his favour, but the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed that judgment by a majority of three to two, holding that there was only a partial loss of the subject matter of insurance, and the learned judges who have been summoned to assist your Lordships have differed in opinion; so that in the result there are five judges in favour of the plaintiff, and four in favour of the defendant. In this difference of opinion it is impossible not to feel that the question is one of some difficulty. It appears to me to depend altogether upon the proper construction of the charter-party. [His Lordship read the charter-party, and, after going through the facts of the case, continued:]

In considering the question it is necessary in the first place to determine the character of the payment which was made by the charterer at the time of signing the bills of lading. Was it an advance in the nature of a loan, or was it a prepayment of half the freight, the whole of which was to be earned by the unloading and delivery of the cargo at Bombay? It is unnecessary to consider the case of Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moo. P. C. 361), which was often referred to in the course of the argument, but which appears to me to have turned entirely upon the question of lien, so that the language used with respect to payments made by the shippers of goods at the port of discharge not acquiring the legal character of freight, must be received with some qualification. But this case is altogether removed from the authority of that case, because here the parties, by their charter-party, have agreed that the payment shall be the advance of half the freight, and that the shipowner shall have an absolute lien for freight. The charter-party contains a provision for the charterer to deduct from the payment of half freight five per cent. for insurance, and Blackburn, J. in his opinion delivered to the House, stated "that it had always been held that a stipulation that the merchant is to insure the amount, is almost conclusive to show that it is not a loan on security of freight to be earned, but an advance of freight." There can be no doubt, therefore that the sum paid by De Mattos was a prepayment of freight, and as such, according to settled authorities, could not be recovered again. That portion of the freight received by the plaintiff was, therefore, never at risk on the voyage insured.

But then the question arises, What was the portion of freight which was covered by this prepayment? On the part of the defendants it was contended that under the words of the charter-party the freight being payable not in a gross sum, but after the rate of 42*s.* per ton of coals on the quantity delivered, the freight must be distributed over the whole cargo at the rate of 42*s.* for each ton, which will be equivalent to the payment of 21*s.* on every ton of the cargo put on board, leaving 21*s.* to be paid for freight on the entire cargo delivered. If this mode of calculating the freight is adopted, the plaintiff's loss would, of course, be only a partial one. But I am not disposed to take this view of the stipulation as to payment of freight in the charter-party. I think that the freight payable is the freight upon the whole quantity of coals delivered at the rate of 42*s.* per ton, and the part which was prepaid was assumed upon an estimate of half of that quantity. If the parties had intended that the prepayment should be calculated upon the footing of one half of the cargo at so much per ton, nothing would have been easier than to have expressed this in words. The bill of lading was signed for 2178 tons, the half freight was to be paid on signing the bill of lading, and the receipt was indorsed on the bill of lading. If the prepayment was meant to be applied to half the rate of freight over the whole number of tons of coal shipped, the amount could have been easily ascertained, and the intention clearly expressed. The manner in which the half of the freight was agreed upon satisfies me that the sum paid was taken generally as representing one half of the freight of the entire cargo at the rate of 42*s.* per ton. This being my view of the case, it follows that the plaintiff never had more than half the freight as a gross sum at risk on the voyage insured. If all the coals had been delivered he would have had to receive the amount of the whole agreed freight, minus the 2236*l.* already paid. In the event which occurred he had secured himself against the loss of one half of the freight by the prepayment; the only insurable interest in the freight which remained to him was the unpaid half, the whole of which he lost by the perils of the seas, and, therefore, his loss was a total loss.

I think the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be reversed.

Lord HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I concur entirely in the view which has been taken of the case before us by my noble and learned friend who has preceded me in expressing his opinion upon it.

The two points to be considered are, first, what is the insurance that has been effected by the policy, and the subject matter thereby insured; and we are led in consideration of that point to the further question as to what was the contract between the insurer and the person with whom he bargained, as the charterer of the ship, in order to ascertain what were the perils of the sea against which the assured desired so to protect himself.

Now we must bear in mind in this inquiry, in the first instance, that if there be any question or doubt (I think in truth we shall find there is none) as to what the subject matter of insurance is, then on principle it is to be held in all cases that that in respect of which the insurance is made is that which is capable of being a subject matter of insurance, namely, that which is at risk; and that in regarding the contract of insurance, we must not assume, and we cannot in any way consistently with law assume, that the insured is endeavouring to effect a policy upon that which is at no risk whatever. Next, when we come to look at the contract itself, it being a contract of freight, we have to remember that for a very long time it has been settled in our maritime law that prepaid freight cannot be recovered. I think when we consider these two points we shall be led very easily and safely to the solution of the difficulty which appears to have arisen in the case before us. We have now had the advantage of hearing the opinions of several judges who, both in the court below and also in your Lordship's house, have expressed their opinions upon the matter; and we have had the benefit of hearing the arguments upon which these opinions were founded, as well as the arguments which were adduced at the bar. Therefore it may well be that a subject which has been one of considerable doubt, and has been supposed to be one of difficulty, before arriving at this stage of the argument, may, without presumption on my part, appear to me to be free from difficulty as regards the final conclusions we are bound to arrive at.

In the first place, the contract of insurance is an insurance of freight. The question is, what is that freight that was so insured? To answer that question we look at the charter-party which was entered into between the shipowner and the charterer; and that charter-party we find to be a contract or engagement on the part of the charterer with reference to a cargo of coals to be delivered at Bombay, that he will pay freight "on unloading and right delivery of the cargo at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton on the quantity delivered," neither more nor less. He is not to pay more freight than at that rate upon whatever is delivered. That is the sum and substance of his agreement. But then as to the mode of paying the freight, instead of waiting until the time of delivery as regards the whole cargo, he engages that he will pay "one half in cash on signing bills of lading, less four months interest." That is the discount on the payment in respect of its being made at once, and before the period of delivery at Bombay. "Less four months interest, and less 5 per cent. for insurance." Now what seems to have grown up to be the practice in shipping transactions of this character is founded very probably upon the determination of the courts of law that prepaid freight cannot be recovered. What seems to have happened is that the parties who are desirous of having the freight prepaid to a certain extent, in order to avoid being kept out of their money during a long voyage, have entered into an arrangement with the charterer to this effect: I shall wish to have my money in hand, to some amount at all events, upon this charter of freight, I therefore stipulate with you that some of this money shall be paid down (in this case one half), but I will give a rebate of interest, which is in effect discounting this prepayment; and I will give a further rebate of insurance, because, inasmuch as you are making this payment, and inasmuch as you cannot recover it in the event of there being a loss of the cargo, the risk becomes yours, not mine. What would ordinarily be the risk of the shipowner with regard to the freight so prepaid is transferred in this way to the charterer, and the shipowner has the money in his pocket; and having it in pocket, and seeing that it cannot be recovered, it is at no risk. Whatever loss happens at sea he retains that money, and therefore, if there be a total loss of the whole cargo, the loss in respect of this prepayment of freight falls upon the person who has so prepaid it. Consequently, a custom seems to have grown up of allowing a sum by way of insurance, in order to compensate the person making this prepayment for the risk he thereby runs, inasmuch as he cannot recover it if there be a total loss of the cargo. That being so, you find this state of things: as to a moiety of this freight the ship-owner is quite safe; he cannot want to insure it, he has got it. But as to the other moiety, he is not safe as regards the perils of the sea, because if there should be a total loss, and if he should not be able to deliver any part of the goods, then he would get no more freight. He has got one moiety safe in his pocket; the other moiety is that which is at risk, and that he can insure. Therefore, when you look at the contract of insurance in this case, and ask as to which of the moieties of freight the insurance is effected, the answer must be that the shipowner has effected the insurance upon the unpaid moiety, which may be lost entirely to him. He cannot effect an insurance upon that which is at no risk; therefore he must be taken to have done that which only he rightly could do, namely, to have insured against that which is at risk, the other moiety of the freight, which may be lost to him in consequence of the perils of the sea. On the other hand, what is the position of the charterer? It is this: he has agreed to pay 42*s.* per ton only on whatever is delivered to him; he has paid down to the extent of 21*s.* per ton; he can have only 21*s.* per ton more to pay, if the whole of the cargo is delivered to him; but supposing there is no more delivered to him than the 21*s.* per ton would cover, what is then to happen? Why, he is entitled to say, you have delivered to me half the cargo, I was only to pay you 4000*l.* for the 2000 tons of coal, if you delivered the whole quantity; you have delivered to me, instead of 2000 tons, only 1000 tons. I have paid you for 1000 tons already, and I am not to pay more. Otherwise, if you were to say that the charterer is to pay in respect of the half of the cargo saved, that is 1000 tons, he would be paying 3*l.* for every ton of coal delivered. Would he not have a right to say, you have delivered to me 1000 tons; I paid 2*l.* per ton on 1000 tons before the ship started, under the contract I entered into, and now you ask for another 1*l.* in respect of the portion of the coals which has been saved, there being only one-half saved altogether; in that way you are making me pay 3*l.* per ton for the coals delivered as to which I entered into an agreement to pay you 2*l.* per ton, and no more. When we look at the case in that simple way, it appears to me that the whole difficulty is at once solved. On the one hand you have the charterer saying, I am not to be compelled to pay more than I agreed to pay; On the other hand you have the other party insuring, not the freight he has got in his pocket, but freight that is still at risk, and which he may lose by the loss of half the cargo.

Having said this much, I have very little more to add upon the subject. But, with regard to the view taken by Blackburn, J., for whose opinion I have the highest respect, it appears to me that he is under error when, in advising your Lordships, he thus states the case. He says that the contention of the plaintiffs in the cause is this: "That in short, under this charter-party, the loss of the freight was total as soon as half the coals were lost, and the risk to the owner of the goods, as far as regards the prepaid freight, or enhanced value of the goods, did not commence till after the coals were lost." But, as I said before, instead of being a total loss of freight to him he has got half the freight in his pocket. No doubt, when half the coals were lost he lost half the freight, but he had got the other half already in his pocket. I cannot conceive how by any process of reasoning, on the one hand, the shipowner can be taken to have insured what he had already got, or, on the other hand, how the charterer should be called upon to pay a higher freight than he had contracted to pay, namely, 42*s.* per ton. I do not think that the case of Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P.C.C. 311) has any bearing upon the case before your Lordships. Of course, any opinion of Lord Kingsdown is always cited by those who can cite it as an authority at all for their proposition, and it certainly carries with it great weight. But Brett, J., whose opinion is of very great value, I think, in assisting your Lordships to arrive at a correct view of this case, dealt with Kirchner v. Venus in the mode in which, in my opinion, it ought to be dealt with, and in which all judgments should be dealt with, namely, by taking it as applied to the subject matter. What Lord Kingsdown there says is this: In the first place, it is not that prepayments are not freight, but that they are not the same thing as freight, having all the legal incidents of freight; and, in the second place, there is the case of lien. Applying Lord Kingsdown's opinion to the subject matter, you will not find him saying that prepaid freight is not freight, because it is freight to all intents and purposes. In settling the account you say, "That is part of the freight," in this case and in every other case where freight comes to be adjusted. And what you find to be the course of shipowners and merchants dealing in this way with regard to the affreightment of vessels is this, the real transaction takes this form, the risk of so much as is prepaid is transferred to the charterer, instead of being at the risk of the shipowner, the latter taking the money and keeping it in his pocket under all circumstances, whatever may happen. In respect of that an allowance is made for insurance. When you come to look at it in this point of view, you see how this course of proceeding has naturally arisen. And in truth, if we were to say that the plaintiff had not insured this freight, which he has entirely lost, on account of the total freight earned not amounting to more than a set-off to the half that has already been paid, if we were to say that that was the result, we should, as it appears to me, disturb the whole of those contracts which are made in the form of the one we have now before us in this case, and which seem to have become tolerably frequent—we should be in effect saddling the charterer before us with regard to what was the position between him and the shipowner, with a greater payment than any that he had contracted to make.

Some difficulty, no doubt, arose in the mind of one of the learned judges in the court below, Amphlett, B., in consequence of the charterer having himself effected an insurance on the cargo of coals in the form of an insurance of the coals, value increased by freight prepaid; so that he said it appeared to him that the result would be to make the different underwriters by whom the insurance had been effected pay twice over in respect of this loss. Whether or not the underwriters could have resisted the claim I will not stop to inquire, because I think there is another answer to the argument. Brett, J. has pointed out that answer also, as he has dealt with almost every part of the case, with great clearness. He says the insurance so effected was effected on a valued policy, and if there be any apparent lack of justice towards the underwriters with reference to recovering upon that policy, it arises from the law allowing these valued policies. This being taken as a valued policy payment had to be made, although it might possibly be that the insurer's interest was not such as, but for the law allowing valued policies, could have been made the subject of contract with the underwriter. We have nothing to do with that here. All we have to do in the present case is to consider what is the engagement which the assured (here the plaintiff) has entered into with those who accepted the risk, and for that purpose to look at the contract which was entered into between him and the charterer; and when we look at that contract the whole matter comes out plainly, that what was insured is exactly that which has been lost to him in consequence of the perils of the sea.

Lord PENZANCE.—My Lords, the appellant brings his action upon two policies of insurance, one on "freight valued at 2000*l*." the other on "freight payable abroad valued at 2000*l*.," and he claims a total loss. The answer of the underwriters is that the loss is only partial, as he might lawfully have claimed a part of the freight said to have been lost, from the charterer of his vessel, and whether he could do so or not depends on the terms of his charter-party. There is, therefore, in substance, but one question in this case, the proper construction of that charter-party as to the amount that became ultimately payable for freight in the events that happened.

It is admitted on both sides that freight was earned in respect of a quantity of coals delivered, to the extent of what may in round numbers be called half the cargo; but it is contended on the one side, that as freight to that amount had already been paid in advance there was nothing more for the merchant to pay; on the other, that the money so paid in advance was not all paid in discharge of such freight as might ultimately turn out to be earned, but was to the extent of a half only paid on that amount; and consequently that there still remained a quarter of the entire freight for the merchant to pay. This latter view has been upheld by the Exchequer Chamber in the judgment now under appeal, and I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained. I will test it in the first place by considering what results will flow from its adoption.

It is incontestable that if in accordance with this proposition the merchant should actually pay, in addition to the half freight previously advanced by him, another quarter of the entire freight, the result would be that the shipowner would have received three-quarters of the entire freight, though he had earned only half of that freight by carrying half the cargo safely to its destination. The result is so startling, and so irreconcilable, not only with apparent justice, but with all notions of freight as a payment earned and measured by the quantity of goods safely carried and delivered, that it challenges the closest attention to the proposition upon which it is based. But it is, moreover, directly opposed to the actual language of the charter-party itself. It is impossible that the shipowner should receive this three quarters of the entire freight for the carriage and delivery of half the cargo only, without doing violence to the express provision of the charter-party, by which the amount payable for freight is defined. That provision is in these words: "The freight is to be paid at and after the rate of 42*s*. a ton on the quantity delivered." There is no other provision in the charter-party defining the rate or amount of freight to be paid but this, and whatever time or times may have been by other provisions fixed for the payment of it, the amount itself is thus unquestionably fixed in plain language admitting of no two interpretations, at 42*s*. a ton, calculated not on the number of tons put on board, but on the number of tons actually delivered. If, therefore, the shipowner be really entitled to receive not 42*s*. but 63*s*. a ton on the quantity delivered, it cannot be as freight earned under the charter-party that he does so, but it must be under some other and different kind of obligation created by that instrument. And accordingly the learned counsel for the respondent, recognising the difficulty, ingeniously argued that though the advance of money made in this case was in the charter-party called "one-half of the freight," yet that it really was not freight at all, but something else, and cited expressions in other cases by which the sort of payment for which he was contending was variously described. I do not feel called upon to enter upon a review of those cases, because the decisions or expressions in them depended in each case upon the particular circumstances then existing, and because, whether those decisions were justified or not upon those circumstances, the language to be found in this charter-party excludes, in my opinion, the possibility of affirming that the word "freight," one-half of which was to be advanced, was intended to convey anything short of, or beyond, or different from, its ordinary meaning. In the first place it is, I think, difficult to maintain, when one and the same word is used several times within the short space of eight or ten consecutive lines of a written document, that it means one thing in one place, and a totally different thing in another. Nothing but the absence of any other reasonable construction ought to lead to such a result. But if, in any case, it could be permissible to deal with a word so used in such a manner, it is, I think, impossible to do so in this instance, because the expressions of this charter-party in relation to this word "freight" are so bound up and connected together as to make it plain that the "freight" spoken of is one and the same throughout. The mere grammatical construction, therefore, of the terms in which the charter-party is framed forbids the supposition that there are two sorts of freight spoken of, or that anything is intended by the word except that which is commonly known as "freight," which is to be earned only on safe delivery. It is not inconsistent with this that a part of what is thus to become due on delivery should, like any other payment due on a future day or event, be, by special arrangement, made payable by anticipation at an earlier period, and the effect of such a payment when made is simply to create a credit to that amount in favour of the person making it when the account is finally taken. The event upon which the right to freight is to accrue and its amount to be determined is one thing; the times at which it shall be paid is another. In this case a part of the payment is to be made by anticipation, but this is not inconsistent with the stipulation, in language perfectly unambiguous, that the entire amount of freight shall be calculated on the quantity delivered.

But then it is said a payment of freight in advance cannot be recovered if the goods do not arrive, and that this has been held good law in successive cases. This at least shows that such an advance is not unfamiliar either to the commercial community or the courts of law, and as to the injustice of it, the provisions of the present charter-party show how easily and simply any injustice is practically avoided. An advance of freight is nothing more than arrangement for the convenience of the shipowner who wants an advance, and if the merchant will make it, is willing to pay the cost of insuring the advance when made, thus practically taking upon himself in another form the risk which properly belongs to him of the freight never being earned at all. It is no doubt true that it is impossible to know until the voyage is completed, and the cargo, or such part of it as arrives in safety, is delivered, what the actual amount due for freight, calculated at the stipulated rate, will turn out to be; and it is consequently impossible to calculate with accuracy, for the purpose of making the advance, what the half of that freight will amount to. But it is, I think, obvious enough that in speaking of "half the freight" being paid in cash on signing bills of lading, the parties intended "half the estimated freight," calculated on the quantities in the bills of lading at the rate named in the charter-party. The above mode of interpreting the charter-party, while it gives effect to the main and leading provision, that the entire freight shall depend on the quantity of goods delivered, treats the provision for an advance as meaning what it says, namely, as "freight to be paid one-half in cash." There seems little therefore to justify the conclusion that the shipowner could lawfully have demanded from the merchant a further payment of freight, notwithstanding that an amount equal to all the freight which had actually been earned had been already paid to him.

But the most plausible form in which that proposition is maintained remains yet to be stated. It has been said that the true meaning of this charter-party is the same as if the words had run thus: "Freight to be at 42*s.* a ton, 21*s.* to be paid on right and true delivery, and 21*s.* in advance on signing bills of lading," thus splitting up the freight into separate sums of 21*s.* on each ton put on board, and 21*s.* on each ton delivered. But such a mode of translating the charter-party is only arrived at by omitting the particular provision upon which, in my opinion, the whole matter turns, namely, that the freight is to be calculated not at 42*s.* per ton as suggested, but at 42*s.* per ton delivered. This brings into a prominent light the real difference upon which the two opposite modes of reading the charter-party are based. The view now under discussion is based upon the proposition that the number of tons upon which the 42*s.* are to be paid is the number of tons put on board, half to be paid at once, and half on arrival, not the number of tons which are put out at the port of destination. The contention of the appellant, on the contrary, is that the measure of freight intended is not the number of tons which the cargo may weigh when shipped, but the actual weight of the goods when they are delivered; although for the purpose of making a money advance, a probable estimate of the latter must be made from the amount of the former. I have already pointed out that the appellant has the express words of the charter-party in his favour on this point: "42*s.* a ton on the quantity delivered.

But there is another consideration which appears to me to place the matter beyond doubt. It is very well known that after a long voyage, even though the ship has met with no disaster, and the cargo has suffered nothing from "perils of the sea," the weight of the cargo when delivered will frequently differ, and sometimes very considerably, from its weight when shipped. Whether the weight, therefore, which is to be the criterion for calculating freight is to be the weight when put on board, or the weight when delivered cannot fail to be a matter of much importance. It is also to be observed that a a partial loss of his advance, in consequence of the cargo having decreased in weight, could not be covered by the merchant under any policy of insurance, for losses arising from the cause supposed are not caused by any of the perils insured against, and are not the subjects of marine insurance. And yet it is obvious that the sum allowed by the shipowner as premium for insurance was intended to keep the merchant free from risk.

Another reason against the adoption of this reading of the charter-party is that it would establish a distinction between an aliquot part, such as a half or a third of the freight being paid in advance, and a lump sum of money, such as 500*l.* or 1000*l.* being advanced, as is frequently the case in a similar manner. For it could hardly be said in the latter case that any particular sum was paid in respect of any particular part of the cargo.

One other argument only remains to be noticed. It has been said that the merchant in this case has by the policy which he opened to protect his advances, entitled himself to recover £1 per ton in respect of the coal which was lost, over and above the value of such coal, and that if the appellant's view of the charter-party be correct, this £1 per ton must be a profit beyond anything he has lost, a result so inequitable that the appellant's view of the charter-party must, it is argued, be mistaken. The answer to this seems to me to be twofold; first, that the consequences of any contract entered into between the merchant and third persons can hardly affect the true construction of the contract previously entered into between him and the shipowner; secondly, that on the assumption of the appellant's view of the charter-party being correct, the merchant ought not, upon the common principles of insurance law, to be able to recover either £1 per ton or any other sum from the underwriters. For the first principle of insurance is indemnity, and when no loss of the subject of insurance has been sustained, there ought to be nothing to receive under a policy. If the merchant in this case has had the full value of his entire advance by setting it off against the freight actually earned, as the appellant contends that he is entitled to do, he has suffered no loss in respect of that advance, and ought to have no legal claim for indemnity. If, therefore, it be true that under the particular policy which has been effected in this case any such claim arises, it must be by reason of the special form of that policy, which I observe is a valued one, the result of which may be that the insured can obtain compensation beyond the amount of any loss which he has really suffered.

Upon the whole, therefore, I think it is clear that the appellant could not have lawfully demanded from the charterer any further freight beyond that which was covered by the previous advances; and, consequently, that he was entitled to claim of the respondents a total loss under their policy. The judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought, therefore, in my opinion, to be reversed.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, the question in this case is a short one; but the remarkable difference of opinion among the learned judges who have considered it, forbids us to regard it as free from serious difficulty. It arises really—extraneous and irrelevant matter being put out of account—on the construction of a single document, which is common and familar in its form. We have to decide on the effect of the charter-party, which was executed between the plaintiff, a shipowner and Mr. De Mattos, the charterer of the ship. And for that purpose we are not much assisted by authority, although many cases have been cited in the progress of the argument. We must deal with the document itself, having regard to the circumstances in which it originated, and the relation of the parties to it, and endeavouring to give a fair interpretation to its words in their natural and customary meaning.

The question arises, as I have said, on the construction of the charter-party, and not on the policy which is the direct foundation of the suit, but will be operative for the appellant or the respondent, according to the view we take of that construction. And for rightly ascertaining it I do not think your Lordships are at liberty to travel into considerations dehors itself, which have been pressed upon the House. For instance, we cannot properly consider the dealings of the charterer with other parties. Putting out of account all such irrelevant suggestions, I shall ask the attention of your Lordships for a very short time to the words of the charter-party. [His Lordship read the charter-party, and continued.]

The question is, half of the cargo having been lost by perils of the sea, and half duly delivered at Bombay, and the owner having received payment for the carriage of one half of it, had he any further claim upon the charterer, or was the money received in England applicable to discharge the freight which had been earned at Bombay? The captain thought it was, and delivered the cargo without claiming any further freight, and the plaintiff brought his action on his policy as for a total loss. I think he was warranted in doing so, and is entitled to recover. I should add, that in the receipt for the freight paid by the charterer it is described as "the sum of 2286*l.* 10*s.* being an advance of half freight on within shipment." It seems to me that the purpose of the charter-party is very clear. It was to secure to the owner an integral freight for the voyage, the amount of which was approximately fixed according to the value of the coals to be put on board, and intended to reach Bombay; but it was to be paid half in advance on signing bills of lading, and the remainder on right delivery of cargo.

What was the risk against which the owner insured? What was the purpose of his insurance? He received half of the freight, and having received it, it was his absolutely, and was irrecoverable under any circumstances by the charterer. The peculiar doctrine of the English law is abundantly established by De Silvale v. Kendall (4 M. & S. 37); Byrne v. Schiller (ante, vol. 1, p. 511; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 20, 319; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 741; 25 L. T. Rep, N. S. 211), and many other cases, to which full reference is made in the able opinion of Brett, J. The owner had thus got prepayment of a moiety of the entire debt which the charterer had contingently incurred for the hire of the ship or a portion of it, and which might be described, reversing our ordinary legal phrase, as "Debitum in futuro, solvendum in præsenti." That prepayment was applicable generally to the freight, which, although a single liability, had been divided for the purposes of convenience into two halves, to be dealt with in different ways and at different times. And when by the perils of the sea the owner has been disabled from fully completing his part of the contract, and failed to earn more than one-half by delivery at Bombay, that being the express and essential liability of the charterer's liability, the prepayment became applicable to answer the only demand he could maintain, the charterer owed him nothing, and he fell back properly on his policy for the remainder of his freight, which not having earned it according to his bargain, he was unable to demand from the charterer. This appears to me to be a reasonable view of the matter, and the terms of the charter-party justify, I think, no other. The only thing at risk was the unpaid balance, and when that was hopelessly and totally lost the liability of the insurer was complete. There has been much discussion as to the meaning of the word "freight" in the charter-party, and it has been represented as having been in the nature of a loan, or of a payment not for the carriage of the goods, but for taking them on board the vessel and agreeing to carry them. But I see nothing to warrant the adoption of such a view. "Freight" has a definite meaning. It is described by Phillips on Insurance, c. 3, s. 2, in a passage cited by Bovill, C.J., as signifying "the earnings or profit derived by the shipowner from the use of it himself, or by letting it to others to be used, or by carrying goods for others;" and by Lord Tenterden in Flint v. Flemyng (1 B. & Ad. 45), as importing "the benefit derived from the employment of the ship." In this charter-party "freight" surely means nothing else. It is "the profit to be derived by the shipowner," on the delivery of the cargo at the end of the voyage, "for the use of the ship" in conveying the coals of the charterer. I agree with the clear words of Cleasby, B. in the Exchequer Chamber: "We cannot depart from the settled meaning of the word 'freight,' and the meaning expressly given to it in this charter-party, namely the amount to be paid at the end of the voyage for what is ready for delivery at the stipulated rate. This had been wholly satisfied by the advance made, and so the shipowner was entitled to receive no more, and the captain was right in delivering the half cargo free of freight." The charter-party speaks first of "freight" generally as to be paid "on unloading and right delivery," and it is "such freight" which it afterwards divides into the "one-half" and the "remainder." Why should we strive to put an unnatural and unaccustomed meaning on an ordinary word, which is accepted by the parties as it is commonly understood, when they give and take a receipt for the money paid, not as a loan, or a payment for putting the cargo on board, or for accepting the goods without delivery, but asking "advance of half freight on within shipment," plainly pointing to an entire freight on the entire cargo to be fully or partially landed, and paid on the full or partial delivery of that cargo at Bombay. Reliance has been placed on some expressions of Lord Kingsdown in Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P.C.C. 361), in which he states that "freight is the reward payable to the owner for the safe carriage and delivery of goods," and that "a sum of money payable before the arrival of the ship at her port of discharge, and payable by the shippers of the goods at the port of shipment, does not acquire the legal character of freight because it is described by that name in a bill of lading." Any opinion of Lord Kingsdown, even an obiter dictum like this, is entitled to high consideration, and I do not think it at all necessary to impeach the correctness of his words for the purpose of sustaining the view I am submitting to your Lordships. Immediately after using them he goes on to recognise the right and power of those who enter into shipping agreements, "to supersede by a special contract the rights and obligations which the law attaches to freight in its legal sense," and that, even assuming the accuracy of its definition, seems to me exactly what the parties have done in the present case. They have made a contract which unmistakeably deals with the prepayment as of "freight" and nothing else; and whatever might have been the legal force of the term if it stood by itself, and without the specific directions as to the "one-half" and "the remainder," those directions equally to give to both the character of "freight," although the first half is to be paid before delivery. So that I do not conceive the dictum of Lord Kingsdown to be adverse in reality to the contention of the appellant. And that contention on this particular point is strongly sustained by several cases, to two of which I shall briefly advert. In De Silvale v. Kendall (4 M. & S. 37), a charter-party provided that the charterer should pay "for the freight and hire of the vessel" a specified sum in advance, and "the residue on the delivery of the cargo." The provision in that instrument was substantially the same as that with which we are dealing, and it was contended there as here, that the advance was not freight, but in the nature of a loan. And there Lord Ellenborough said, "If the charter-party be silent the law will demand a performance of the voyage, for no freight can be due until the voyage be completed. But if the parties have chosen to stipulate by express words, or by words sufficiently intelligible to that end, that part of the freight should be paid by anticipation, which should not depend on the performance of the voyage, may they not so stipulate?" Every word is applicable to the circumstances of this case; and, as Lord Ellenborough insisted on deciding on the terms of the charter-party before him, and declined to consider other cases, applying as he said, "to other forms of covenant," so I think your Lordships may safely found your judgment upon the express words of this particular contract. In that case also the judges held expressly that there is no doubt of the competency of parties to stipulate for part payment of the freight before it can be known whether any freight will accrue or not. So in Byrne v. Schiller (ante, vol. 1, p. 511), the last case bearing on the present, the charter-party provides that a vessel is to be sent on a voyage at a specific rate of freight, "such freight," as here, to be paid partly in advance, and "the remainder on right delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge." And then the court dealt with the payments as "on account of freight." The circumstances of those cases make the observations of the judges directly applicable to the case before us, and they and others also show that a stipulation to pay freight in advance, and before delivery, is not only legal, but of common use amongst commercial people.

I might have been supposed to dwell on the inconvenience possible to arise in a case like this from the adoption of the view of the respondents, but this point has been so well put by my noble and learned friend who last addressed the House that I shall not occupy time by dwelling upon it. I am satisfied, with much deference to the adverse view that has been so strongly supported, that on the construction of the charter-party alone the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and I prefer to base my opinion upon that sufficient ground.

I think the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber should be reversed.

LORD SELBORNE.—My Lords, the difficulty in this case—for I certainly felt some difficulty during the argument, and it has been the subject of much difference of opinion between judges of high authority—arises out of the peculiar rule of English mercantile law, that an advance on account of freight to be earned, made at the commencement of a voyage, is, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, an irrevocable payment at the risk of the shipper of the goods, and not a loan repayable by the borrower if freight to that amount be not earned. The authorities referred to by Brett, J. certainly establish this general rule, whether reasonable in the abstract or not; and it must be taken that payments in advance, such as that which was made by the charterer in the present case, are in this country generally made and received, as between the parties to contracts of affreightment, upon this understanding.

It is, however, remarkable that none of the authorities seem to touch the precise question in this case, namely, whether the charterer under a contract like that before your Lordships, has a right to deduct the whole amount paid by him in advance from any freight which may actually be earned in case of a loss of part of the cargo; or whether such advance ought to be apportioned over the whole cargo delivered on board, so that the loss of a proportionate part of it will fall upon the charterer if part of the cargo is lost. In that case it does not seem to me to be material, or to create any difficulty in the application of the principle, whether the advance is of an aliquot part of the estimated freight or of a gross sum of money. Blackburn, J., if I understand him rightly, thinks that on principle the latter view is that most consistent with the rule established by the authorities, and that there is nothing in the express contract between these parties to justify a different conclusion. The actual settlement between the shipowner and the charterer did indeed take place upon the opposite view; but the insurer was no party to that settlement, and what was done inter alios could not enlarge his liability. It may be that the principle on which that settlement proceeded was according to a general usage of trade, but of this I find no proof. I am by no means clear that the reasoning of Blackburn, J. is fully met by the observation of Brett, J., that if this be not the correct principle, "the charterer must in effect pay more than 2*l.* per ton in every case except where the whole cargo is delivered." If the whole cargo is lost he must in "effect" pay 1*l.* a ton on the goods put on board, though under the contract no freight whatever has been earned. The introduction of the words "in effect," when the question is as to the legal consequences of an anomalous rule not expressed in terms by the contract may perhaps be fallacious. On the other hand the conclusion of Blackburn, J., rests entirely upon the ground that in a contract so worded as the present, a stipulation tantamount to that expressed by the words, "the amount paid in signing the bill of lading to be deducted from freight in settlement thereof," ought not to be implied if it is not expressed. I am unable to adopt that opinion, and upon the whole case, though I should have thought it more satisfactory if there had been some authoritative source of information as to the usage of trade, I think that the view of the proper construction and effect of such a contract taken by the majority of the learned judges, and by your Lordships, is the more reasonable, and that which is most in accordance with the natural meaning of the words of the charter-party, and with the probable intention of the contracting parties.

If so, there was clearly, in the case, a total loss of the whole interest of the assured in the whole subject matter of the insurance; and the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought, therefore, to be reversed.

Judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed, and judgment of the Court of Common Pleas affirmed.

Damage done by ship to realty abroad—Governing law—Jurisdiction—Pleading—Demurrer.

The question of the liability of a shipowner, proceeded against in the English Admiralty Court, for an injury done by his ship to a pier projecting into the sea, but attached to the soil of a foreign country is governed by the lex loci, and not by English law.

Where an English ship, by the negligence of her master and crew, ran into and damaged a pier on the coast of Spain, and the owners of the pier proceeded against the ship for the damage in the Admiralty Court, and the shipowner pleaded that by the law of Spain a shipowner is not responsible for the damage occasioned by the negligence of his master and crew:

Held (reversing the decision of the High Court of Admiralty), that the plea is a good defence to the action.

Quære, can an English court entertain an action for damage to realty in a foreign country, apart from some agreement or contract of the parties?

This was an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the High Court of Admiralty on a motion to strike out certain paragraphs in an answer, filed by defendants in a cause of damage, instituted on behalf of the Marbella Iron Ore Company, Limited, against the steamship or vessel the M. Moxham, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the freight due for the transportation of the cargo now or lately laden on board thereof, and against the owners of the said steamship.

The plaintiffs' petition was, so far as material, as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are the Marbella Iron Ore Company, Limited, an English joint-stock company, established under the Companies' Act 1862, and the Acts incorporated therewith, for the purpose, among other things, of exporting iron ore from Marbella, in the country of Spain, to England and other places. The offices of the company are at No. 1, Crown-buildings, Queen Victoria-street, in the City of London. The plaintiffs were at the time of the grievances hereinafter mentioned, possessed of a pier, situate at Marbella aforesaid, for the purpose of shipping iron ore on board ships.

2. About 8.30 a.m. on the 5th Oct. 1874, the steamship M. Moxham came to Marbella for the purpose of loading iron ore from the said pier of the plaintiffs. There was scarcely any wind at the time, and the sea was perfectly smooth, and there was no current.

3. Those on board the M. Moxham, instead of keeping clear of the pier, as they could and might easily have done, so negligently navigated the said steamship that she approached and came into violent collision with the said pier, and carried away the whole head of the pier, causing enormous damage to it, and throwing several trucks laden with iron ore into the sea.

4. The aforesaid collision and the damages consequent thereon were occasioned by the negligence and improper navigation of those on board the M. Moxham.

5. The plaintiffs, in addition to the expense of repairing the pier, have sustained and will sustain considerable damages by reason of being called upon to pay demurrage to divers ships at the time of the said collision, under charter to load iron ore at the said pier, and by reason of extra expense incurred in the shipment of iron during the repair of the said pier, and extra freight in consequence of delay in loading vessels.

The answer filed on behalf of the owners of the M. Moxham, was as follows:

Parker and Clarke, solicitors for Ebenezer Cory, &c., the owners of the steamship or vessel M. Moxham, the defendants in this cause, say as follows:

1. They deny so much of the first article of the petition as alleges that the plaintiffs are possessed of the Marbella pier in the said petition mentioned.

2. They say that the said alleged collision was not a violent one, and that it took place owing to the current and the shallowness of the water near the said pier preventing the M. Moxham from answering her helm, as but for such matters she would have done, and that the said alleged collision was not occasioned by any negligent navigation of the M. Moxham, but was the result of inevitable accident.

3. They further say that the said pier was so weakly and insufficiently and improperly constructed and fastened, as not to be capable of sustaining contact from such ships as the M. Moxham necessarily incidental to their going alongside the said pier for the purposes in the said petition stated, and that the said alleged collision was a usual and ordinary contact necessarily incidental to the M. Moxham going alongside the said pier for the said purposes, and one which the said pier ought, if properly and sufficiently constructed and fastened, to have sustained without being damaged, and no more, and that the said alleged damage was wholly occasioned by the said pier having been so weakly and insufficiently and improperly constructed and fastened, and not otherwise.

4. They further say that the said alleged collision happened within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain, and that at the time of the said collision the said pier was annexed to and formed part of the land of Spain, and that if the said collision was occasioned by any negligence or improper navigation of those on board the M. Moxham it was solely occasioned by the negligence of the master or mariners of the M. Moxham, and not by the defendants or any of them; and that by the law of Spain in force at the time and place of the said collision the master and mariners of the ship, and not the ship or her owners, are liable in damages in respect of a collision occasioned as in the petition alleged, and by such law neither the M. Moxham nor the defendants nor any of them are or is liable in respect of the damages proceeded for in this cause.

5. They deny the truth of the fifth article of the said petition, and further say that the said article is irrelevant, as being matter only for the registrar in the event of a reference.

6. The defendants further say that by the law of Spain in force at the time and place of the said collision, whenever the owner of a ship has become liable in damages by reason of the act or default of the master of such ship, such owner is not liable in damages beyond the value of such ship and her freight being earned at the time of the commission of such act or default, and can fully discharge such liability by abandoning such ship and freight to the person claiming such damages, or by paying to such person the full value of such ship and freight; and the defendants say that if they are liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the collision in the said petition mentioned they have so become liable by the act or default of the master of the M. Moxham, and not otherwise, and that by the law of Spain in force as aforesaid they are not liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the said collision beyond the value of the M. Moxham and her freight being earned at the time of the said collision, and are entitled to fully discharge such liability by abandoning the M. Moxham and her said freight to the plaintiffs or by paying to the plaintiffs the full value of the M. Moxham and her freight being earned as aforesaid.

And the said Parker and Clarke pray the right honourable the judge to pronounce against the damage proceeded for, and to dismiss the defendants and their bail from all further observance of justice in this suit, and to condemn the plaintiffs in costs, or to pronounce that the defendants are not liable to the plaintiffs in respect of such damage beyond the value of the M. Moxham and her freight being earned at the time of the said collision, and that they are entitled to discharge such liability by abandoning the M. Moxham and her freight or by paying the full value thereof to the plaintiffs, and that further and otherwise right and justice may be administered to the defendants in the premises.

The plaintiff moved in the court below to strike out the fourth article of the answer upon the ground that the same formed no answer to the action. The defendants had originally pleaded that the court had no jurisdiction. on the ground that the injured property formed part of the land of Spain; but, it having been shown that the ship was arrested in Spain, and released by the plaintiff on the undertaking on the part of the defendants that liability of the defendants should be determined by the English courts, the defendants withdrew the plea as to the jurisdiction, and motion stood only to strike out the fourth paragraph of the answer.

The learned judge of the court below ordered the said fourth paragraph to be struck out, holding that English law governed the question: (See the report of the case in the court below, 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 463; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. p 95), and from this decree the defendant now appealed.

Watkin Williams, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson (J. C. Mathew with them), for the appellants.—It is well established that in the case of contracts the law of the place where they were made governs the construction. So in cases of tort the question of liability for a wrong done must be governed by the law of the place where that wrong was committed.

Scott v. Lord Seymour, 32 L. J. 61, Ex.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 511;
The General Steam Navigation Company v. Guillou, 11 M. & W. 877.

It is only where the lex loci sought to be applied is mere matter of procedure that the English courts set it aside and apply their own rules: (Bullock v. Caird, L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 276). Liability for a tort does not arise unless injury has been done to the person claiming; hence the act of negligence, in respect of which the plaintiff seeks to recover, is not the mere careless navigation which led to striking the pier, but the striking the pier resulting in damage; this act, for which the defendants are liable, was clearly done upon the soil of Spain, and not upon the high seas, and hence the liability of the defendants must be determined by the law of Spain; and if by the law of Spain the defendants are not responsible for negligence of the person doing the act occasioning the injury, the plea is good. Where the lex loci declares that a person is not responsible for an act done there, the English courts cannot hold him liable: (Phillips v. Eyre, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 225; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 1.) The ship in approaching and striking this pier was not using the sea as a public highway, but was within Spanish jurisdiction, and was coming alongside the pier for loading purposes, and as a matter of favour, and was hence amenable to the laws of the country within whose jurisdiction she then was.

The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon, 7 Cranch 116; Twiss's Rights of nations, 209.

In a case of collision between an English and a Spanish ship, in a Spanish river, it is clear that the Spaniard could plead the Spanish law; can it be contended that the British ship could not claim exemption from liability if given to him by the Spanish law? The law of the place must govern both parties; one cannot have a right in respect of such law which the other does not equally possess; if such a collision occurred upon the high seas it would be determined by such as was binding upon both parties.

The Zollverein, Swab. 96;
R. v. Coombe, 1 Leech C. C. R. 338.

Where a wrong not actionable in a foreign country is committed there, no remedy can be obtained in this country: there must be a tort by the laws of both countries to give a remedy here (1 Smith's Leading Cases, 7th edit., pp. 700, 701). Even in the case of a collision on the high seas, it has been held that the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, as to limitation of liability, does not apply where the collision is between a British and a foreign vessel.

Butt, Q.C. and Benjamin, Q.C. (R. E. Webster with them) for the respondents.—It is clear that in all questions of contract the English courts will apply the lex loci, but is this the case in questions of tort? By English law the master of an English ship is personally responsible for his own negligence in the navigation of his ship, but his owners are also responsible for his acts as their servant. The master's acts must be considered as done upon British soil, because a British ship is a portion of British territory: (Reg. v. Anderson, L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 161.) If, then, the master's acts are done upon British soil, the question of liability must be governed by British law. [Mellish, L.J.—Is there not a difference between an act done within the vessel and an act done by the vessel to an object external to it? In the criminal cases the tort committed has been done by one member of the crew to another.] The law which regulates the rights as between owner and crew and third parties is a personal statute, which is carried with the ship into whatever countries she may go. If it is the policy of the English law to render the owner responsible for the acts of his servant, the former cannot escape liability by alleging a foreign law which did not govern his relation to that servant. Lloyd v. Guibert (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 115), lays down the principle in cases of contract that the law of the flag determines the responsibility, and there is no sound reason why the principle should not also apply to cases of tort. The court below was right in saying that it had jurisdiction independently of any agreement between the parties; venue is the only ground for excluding jurisdiction, and in Admiralty there is no venue and no such thing as a local action.

Doulson v. Matthews, 4 T. R. 503;
Mostyn v. Fabrigas, Cowp. 161.

James, L.J.—This case is the case of the owner or occupier of a piece of the Spanish soil bringing an action against the owner of an English ship, for damage done by that ship in knocking down a pier attached to the Spanish land. In this respect it is a very novel action, and very grave difficulties indeed might have arisen as to the jurisdiction of this court to entertain any action or proceedings whatever with respect to an injury done to the land of a foreign state. The question of jurisdiction has probably been successfully got over by what has been done in this case, that is to say that the ship in question—the owner of which is sued, and which by a figure of speech may be called the delinquent ship—having been sued in Spain, was released, upon an agreement between the parties that all remedies against the ship and against the owners of that ship should be tried in this country. Such an agreement would give jurisdiction by contract, not only jurisdiction by consent; and it must be taken that the parties agreed that their ship should be liable here in the same way as she would have been liable according to the law of Spain. Possibly this would get rid of the question, and the Court of Admiralty would have jurisdiction to enforce against the ship an equitable right arising from this equitable contract by virtue of which the ship was released from its liability under the jurisdiction in Spain.

It was properly conceded by Mr. Benjamin, in his argument, that the question must be tried exactly in the same way as if it were being tried in Spain, and he admits that he could not successfully argue in support of the decision of the court below, unless he could make out that it would be the duty of the Spanish Court, if the action had proceeded there, to apply the principles of the English law to the case. The principle of the English law applicable to the case according to him, is that the master and crew of the vessel being the servants of an English owner, are by the English law themselves liable, and on the principle of respondeat superior, make their principals responsible for their negligence; and, further, that they carry with them this doctrine, so that it extends to every foreign country, and every foreigner who is brought in any way into contact, whether by way of contract or tort, with the master and crew as the agents of the owner.

No authority was cited for that proposition, and I am really unable to follow the principle. One can understand that a contract between master and servant, or relations between principal and agent, may affect the contracts made by the agent, qua agent, with foreign people, that is to say, may affect the nature and extent of the agency; but the liability of one man to answer for the acts of another in matters of tort seems a thing which at least cannot be carried by the agent into a foreign country. If I take my coachman to France, and through his negligence an accident occurs, and damage is done, the doctrine of respondeat superior does not apply if that doctrine is unknown in France, the place where the damage was done. It appears to me, therefore, that the contention that the personal status, arising from the fact that the shipowner and his servants were virtually in England, was carried into Spain, cannot avail, as the wrong is done absolutely, according to the allegation in the plea, on Spanish soil; it was done within the Spanish territory; it was done by a vessel to something which is in Spain. Now it is the law of Spain, according to the allegation here, that where the wrong act is done by a servant of this particular kind, when it is done by the master and crew of a ship, the owner of the ship has not that wrong imputed to him, and the rule respondeat superior does not make him answerable for that which is the actual wrong doing of his servants, If that is so, why is he not entitled to the benefit of the Spanish law?

It is settled in all the cases, that if the act is lawful, even if the act is excusable, or if the act has been legitimatised by a subsequent act of the Legislature, in that case this court would take into consideration that state of the law, that is to say, if by the law of the country a particular person is justified or excused for the thing done, he is not answerable here. Why is he answerable if by the law of the country he never was answerable for it?

I ventured to observe to Mr. Benjamin in the course of the argument, that you do not talk of the thing that is wrong: it is the man that is wrong, and if he is not a wrongdoer according to the law of the country where the wrong is done, that is to say, if he is not answerable for his servant, he is not answerable according to the Spanish law, and it is our duty to give him the benefit of the Spanish law in this case.

Mellish, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. A great many cases have been cited in the argument in this case, but they almost all relate to actions respecting either wrongs to personal property or to actual personal injuries, and the law respecting personal injuries and respecting wrongs to personal property appears to me, in the result of those cases, to be perfectly settled, and that is, that no action can be maintained in the courts of this country on account of a wrongful act either to a person or to personal property, committed within the jurisdiction of a foreign country, unless the act is wrongful by the law of the country where it is committed, and also wrongful by the law of this country. The two cases of The Halley (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193) and Phillips v. Eyre (L. Rep. 6 Q B.

1) seem to me, together with the other cases in conformity with them, to be conclusive upon the subject.

In the case of The Halley there was a collision with a ship in foreign waters. By the law of the foreign country the ship was liable; the owners were liable as owners of the ship; by the law of England the ship and owners were not liable, because there was a pilot on board, who was navigating the ship, and who was taken compulsorily on board, and the negligent act was his act. Beyond that it was held that, notwithstanding that the ship and the owners of the ship were liable according to the law of the country where the act was committed, yet, inasmuch as they were not liable by the law of England, no action could be maintained against them. Then in the case of Phillips v. Eyre (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 1), which was an action brought for a crime committed in a foreign country, it was decided that the liability of the defendant had been taken away by the law of the country where the act was committed, and, therefore, that no action could be brought in this country. Therefore, if that is the rule respecting personal wrongs, and respecting wrongs to personal property, it seems to me a fortiori it must be the rule respecting wrongful acts to real property in a foreign country; whether the rule respecting wrong to immovable property in a foreign country does not go still further, and prevent an action being brought at all is not a question which it is necessary to determine in this case, because, having regard to the consent of the parties and the agreement that has been entered into, I do not think it is pretended that any objection could be taken in this case with reference to the jurisdiction; but it appears to me beyond all question a fortiori if the rule before mentioned is applicable to personal property and wrongs, it must be applicable to damage done to real property in a foreign country.

But then it is said that though that is the general rule, yet here the act was not done in the foreign country, because the wrongful act was committed on board an English ship on the high seas. I agree that for acts on board a ship itself, no doubt the English ship carries the English law with it, but I am not convinced that it carries the English law with it with reference to wrongful acts done by guiding an English ship against a pier which is part of a foreign country. It is unnecessary to consider what would be the rule in a case—though I do not think it would present any more difficulty—what would be the rule if the ship was outside the three mile limit, and they had fired a gun and caused damage within the foreign territory. Here the ship itself was really within the Spanish dominions at the time it committed the wrong, as Mr. Clarkson put it, she was just coming into a Spanish port where she had no right to go, except by licence given to her by the law of Spain, and where she was bound to obey the law of the country while she was there. In that position she comes in contact with that which is stated in the plea to be part of the soil of Spain, and so renders it necessary to apply the general rule that no action can be brought in this country in respect of an alleged wrongful act committed in a foreign country which is not wrongful by the law of that country.

Then it is said by Mr. Benjamin that although that is perfectly true as a general rule, and although, as I understand, he admits that if the act itself was not considered a careless act by the law of Spain, no action could be brought in this country; yet, that inasmuch as it is considered a wrongful act by the law of Spain as far as the master is concerned, then when you come to the question whether the master alone is liable, or the ship and the owner also, that question, he says, is not to be governed by the law of Spain but by the law of England.

I do not think any sufficient authority has been cited for that proposition, and it appears to me it would make a further distinction in the law, which would be very inconvenient in the result. There is a well known distinction between substantive law and mere procedure. If it could be proved that this question of liability turned upon mere procedure by the law of Spain, then that law would not be regarded in this country. It appears to me that the rule that a particular person is not to be liable at all, although somebody else possibly may be liable, is a part of the substantive law of the country where the act is committed, and that, therefore, if by the law of the country where the act is committed, by the substantive law which is to govern the case—the defendant is not liable, then he would be discharged altogether. If there is any authority wanted for that proposition it is laid down by Park, J., in The General Steam Navigation Company v. Guillou (ubi sup.) That was a case of an injury done on the high seas by a French ship, and there he says: "The injury complained of is averred to have arisen on the high seas, and out of the jurisdiction of England, and not to have been committed by the defendant personally, but by a third person, who was master of the French vessel, the defendant being a French subject. So far the plea is free from obscurity; if the defendant was not liable for the act of that other by that law which is to govern this case he has a good defence to the action, and for the defendants it is contended that the plea means to aver that by the law of France he was not liable for those acts, but that a body established by the French law, and analogous to an English corporation, were the proprietors of the vessel, and alone liable for the acts of the master, who was their servant, and not the servant of the individual composing that body, and if such be the true construction of this plea, we all are strongly inclined to think that there is a good defence to this action."

I am of opinion that that rule applies to this case, and that if the defendant is not liable for the act of the master by the law which is to govern the case, he has a good defence to the action, and if, therefore, according to the true rule, the law which is to govern the case be Spanish law, the defendant is not liable by that law, and has a good defence to the action.

Baggallay, J.A.—I am of the same opinion. The learned judge of the court below seems to have relied very much in his judgment upon the decision in the case of Reg. v. Anderson (ubi sup.), but that case, it appears to me, was a very distinguishable one from the case with which we have to do now. In that case the argument proceeded much more upon the question whether Anderson was liable, inasmuch as he was a foreigner, upon a French ship, in French waters, than if he had been an Englishman, but their Lordships thought that having entered into articles to serve on board an English ship, so long as he remained on board that ship he was in the same position as an English subject would have been. Then the great difference is this, that in that case the offence was fully and entirely committed on the vessel upon which Anderson and the murdered man were. I am unable to see any analogy between that case and the present.

Then, the learned judge of the court below referred to several other cases, and amongst them to The Halley, which he said appeared to his view to follow the same course as Reg. v. Anderson (ubi sup.). There, again, I am unable to agree with the learned judge. Where a suit is instituted in an English court in respect of a tort committed in a foreign country, it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to show that there is a liability on the part of the defendant in respect of foreign law, but he must also show a liability in respect of the English law, and therefore in that case of The Halley (ubi sup.), inasmuch as by English law there is no liability on the owners by reason of their having engaged a pilot by compulsion, it was not open to the plaintiff to claim or receive damages, because, by the law of Belgium the owners were not relieved from responsibility because they did employ a pilot by compulsion.

The principles seem to be laid down much more clearly and distinctly, I think, in the case of Phillips v. Eyre—I am reading from the judgment of Willes, J.—they are laid down in these terms: "As a general rule, in order to found a suit in England for a wrong alleged to have been committed abroad, two conditions must be fufilled, first, the wrong must be of such a character that it would have been actionable if committed in England. Therefore, in The Halley, the Judicial Committee pronounced against a suit in the Admiralty, founded upon a liability by the law of Belgium, for collision caused by the act of a pilot whom the shipowner was compelled by that law to employ, for whom, therefore, as not being his agent, he was not responsible by English law; secondly, the act must not have been justifiable by the law of the place where it was done."

If English law alone is applicable to this case, there would have been an actionable wrong just as if the wrong had been committed in England; then the question remains would it have been justifiable by the law of the place where it was done. For the purpose of the present proceedings we are bound to presume that according to the law of Spain, there is no liability or responsibility on the part of the owners of the ship for the acts of the master and crew. It appears to me, therefore, by applying the principles so enunciated in Phillips v. Eyre (ubi sup.), we are able to arrive at the conclusion in the present case that the law of Spain, and not the law of England, applies.

I am reminded by my learned brother that the words "for action justifiable," must mean with regard to the particular defendant against whom the action is brought; we, therefore, think it is clear from that that the proceedings against the defendant must fail by reason of there being no liability under the Spanish law.

The Peter der Grosse.

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Weight, contents and value unknown—Onus of proof.

A master signing a bill of lading in which it is stated that the goods were "shipped in good order and condition," but which contained a memorandum of "weight, contents, and value unknown," admits that, as far as could be seen externally, the goods were shipped in good condition, and if they arrive damaged the onus lies upon the shipowner to excuse him from the damage.

This was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England in a cause of damage to cargo instituted on behalf of Schœtensack, Riecken, and Co., merchants of London, against the Russian steamship Peter der Grosse, and her owners intervening.

In June 1874, Scheumann and Spregel, of St. Petersburg, shipped on board the Peter der Grosse, then lying at St. Petersburg, seventeen bales of down and eight of feathers for delivery to the plaintiffs in London, and the master signed and gave to the shippers in respect of the said bales bills of lading, which were in the following words and figures:

Shipped in good order and well-conditioned, by Scheumann, Spregel, and Co., in and upon the good steamship, called the Peter der Grosse, whereof is master for the present voyage, H. Godtman, now lying at anchor in the harbour of St. Petersburgh, and bound for London:

W.D. 1180/1186,	7 bales,	down,	gross weight, 35p. 38lb.
G.D. 1336/1345,	10 bales,	,,	,, 51p. 15lb.
P. 1670/1674,	5 ,,	feathers	,, 25p. 27lb.
1104/1106,	3 ,,	,,	,, 15p. 16lb.

being marked and numbered as in the margin, which are to be delivered in the like good order, and well-conditioned at the aforesaid port of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted), unto Messrs. Schœtensack, Riecken, and Co., or to their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods, at 70s. sterling per ton, gross weight, in full with prisage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master and purser of the said ship hath signed five bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.

Not accountable for accidents from fire at sea or on shore. Weights, contents, and value unknown. These goods, if not taken out within twenty-four hours after the ship's arrival, the master to be at liberty to enter and land the same at the consignee's risk and expense.

Dated in St. Petersburg, the 8th June 1874.

H. Godtman.

The ship had a very long passage from St. Petersburg to London. On her arrival at the latter port, the bales were discharged from the ship by means of lighters, and were at once examined, and were found to be stained and damaged by some offensively smelling liquid, the exact character of which was not ascertained, some persons supposing it to be oil of tar, others some sort of spirit; portions of the feathers and down in the bales were wetted with the liquid and completely spoiled. When the bales were landed, they were marked on the outside so that the lighterman in giving his receipt for them made an entry therein of "bales dirty." The bales were sold at a loss of 156*l.* on their proper value of 840*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* Evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs to show that the bales could not have been damaged by internal heating or other inherent vice, and that they sustained no injury in the lighters. From the defendant's evidence it appeared that the damaged feathers and down were stowed in the forehold on the top of some bales of wool, and were covered with sail cloth; also that although there was some strong spirit in the afterhold, there was no part of the cargo in the forehold of the ship that could have produced the damage complained of. The ship on her voyage was compelled to put into Revel, having broken her propeller. Between Cronstadt and Revel the ship carried passengers who lived down in the forehold on the top of the feathers. Evidence was also given for the defendants that no other goods in the ship were in any way damaged, and that the feathers were no worse damaged than feathers arriving by steamer from Russia usually are. The defendants alleged that the damage was not occasioned by any negligence, breach of duty, or contract on the part of themselves or their servants, but by reason of inherent vice in the feathers and down and by reason of improper curing; and that the goods were properly stowed and preserved on board ship.

The cause was heard before the learned judge of the Admiralty Court on the 22nd July 1875, and he then delivered the following judgment:—

Sir R. Phillimore.—This suit relates to seventeen bales of down and eight bales of feathers which were placed on board the Russian vessel Peter der Grosse in the month of June 1874. There is no question whatever as to the fact that these bales were taken out of the ship in a bad condition—in what one of the witnesses has called "a not merchantable condition." The question which the court has to determine, upon the evidence before it, is, whether the plaintiff has succeeded in maintaining the position that he put these bales on board in good order, and that therefore the damage must have occurred from some cause with which he may not be acquainted, but which could not arise from the state of the cargo itself when put on board the vessel. Now, the bill of lading says, "Shipped in good order and well-conditioned by Scheumann and Spregel, in and upon the good steamship called the Peter der Grosse, whereof is master for this present voyage H. Godtmann, now lying at anchor in the harbour of St. Petersburg, and bound for London;" and then there follows the numbers of the bales of down and of feathers, and then the bill of lading goes on, "which are to be delivered in the like good order and well-conditioned at the aforesaid port of London:" then the usual exceptions, "unto Messrs. Schœtensack, Riecken, and Co., or to their assigns," and there is the freight, and in the margin is written, "Not accountable for accidents from fire at sea or on shore; weight, contents, and value unknown." Now the vessel made a very long voyage; she was six weeks before she reached the port of her destination, and she was detained by the necessity of repairs at Revel for 17 days. The evidence as to the state of these bales when they were taken out is important, not only with respect to the latter part of the case, but in respect to the former part. Soon after their arrival early intelligence was given by the consignees of their objection to the state of the cargo. I need not enter into the details of the letters which passed as to the state of these goods when they arrived. One fact is very clearly established by all the witnesses, and is indisputed in this case—that the feathers were of the very best class, and the down also, that could be imported. They were surveyed by two gentlemen experienced in the business, one appointed by the consignees and one by the ship-owners. Mr. Brookes was the person appointed by the consignees, and he surveyed the feathers and down in company with another gentleman whose name was Blumenthal, and he gives evidence that a clerk was present from Messrs. Bailey and Leetham, who were the representatives of the owners of the ship during the time, and he put in a report. The essential part of this report was that the bales emitted a very bad smell, which smell was, to use the expression of the witness, "foreign to the natural smell of feathers," and, in his opinion, also the damage to them must have come from the outside. He said there was no appearance of heat; the outside of the canvas in which these feathers were placed was more or less dirty. I think it was stated that they were bags 5ft. high, or thereabouts, and 3ft. broad. He said they were stained with a black stain, and they also smelt more or less. That is the substance of the evidence given by Mr. Brookes. Mr. Blumenthal, who, as I have said, was appointed on behalf of the shipowners, says that he deals in down and feathers, and he surveyed these bales, and that the outside was as if some liquid had been poured over them, while the inside had an offensive smell more or less through it; certainly not a natural smell, something quite strange to the article. And then another witness was examined, also conversant with what is called the feather business, a gentleman of the name of Worrall, who said he imported a great deal, and that he bought a parcel of the feathers from the plaintiff in this case by sample. He afterwards refused to take the feathers on account of the condition in which they were. He said that he got a notice that the goods were damaged; that he went down to the quay the next morning, and found every bag stained more or less, some in the side, and some in the middle; he put his hand nearly through, and he says the damage was from the outside decidedly; it certainly was not damaged by the inherent heating. He proceeded to say that the smell was a very bad one, and certainly one not natural to the feathers, and I think he said from 8in. to 12in. in the interior was quite wet, he refused to accept the feathers; he said that the smell of heat in feathers would be quite different. He said, in cross-examination, that he put his hand in, and that they were of an oily or greasy appearance. The next witness of importance is, I think, the lighterman who fetched the bales from the Peter der Grosse, and he, when he received these goods, called attention to their condition, because he said they looked as if they had lain in mud, and when he gave his receipt for them, it was in these words: "Received the within, in good condition, into barge Result, Number 1765, to be landed at the Custom House, bales dirty;" then he delivered them to Mr Mackenzie, at the Custom House quay, who was manager to Mr. Dudley Smith at the quay. Mr. Mackenzie said the goods were landed about the 27th of July; that the outside of the bales was dirty and damp, they looked as if they had been drawn across the deck; the cause of this condition was recent, and they were not externally in a merchantable condition. He did not examine the inside. It is clear, therefore, that these goods were taken out in an unmerchantable condition, and that they were damaged externally as well as internally, that the damage was recent, that the damage was not one which would be naturally inherent in any goods in the feathers themselves, and that the feathers and down themselves were of the very first quality. Now, these points being established, it becomes important to consider what evidence is furnished by the bill of lading, as to their condition when they are put on board, and I agree with the observation which has been made by Mr. Clarkson, that, fairly construed, and giving all due weight to the legal effect of the marginal note, the result must be that apparently, and so far as meet the eye, and externally, they were placed in good order on board this ship. Well, then, if that be so, if the plaintiff has shown by primâ facie evidence that, having put these bales and bags in good order on board the ship, and they were then taken out in bad order, both externally and internally, then I agree with the observation which was made that it is not incumbent on him to show either how or when the damage was done. It is for the defendant to displace the evidence, which certainly shows that it did not occur from any internal mischief inherent in the feathers or the down, and was not one which had any external appearance when they were put on board the ship. It has been asserted that the shipowner has proved the impossibility of the mischief having happened on board the ship; but it does not appear to me that the evidence goes to that length. There were spirits of strong smell on board this ship; there were passengers who, for a short time, were living in the vicinity of this cargo, in and amidst the cargo; the vessel was seventeen days at Revel, and the cargo was discharged, I think, according to the evidence, all about the same time, and there was a leaking cask, or casks, among the cargo. But whether these circumstances do or do not suggest any reason for the damage which unquestionably happened to these goods, I think that the plaintiffs have discharged the burthen of proof that lay upon them, and it was for the defendants, if they could, to displace that burthen of proof by showing that when the goods were put on board the vessel they were in a bad condition, internally, and that the bad condition showed itself at the time in the external state of the packages in which the goods were placed. I need not repeat what I have already said, that rebutting evidence has not been furnished, but that the evidence which has been given leads me to the conclusion, from the facts before me, that the plaintiffs have established their case, that these goods were put on board the vessel in good order and condition, and taken out of that vessel in bad order. I therefore pronounce for the prayer of the petition, and I must order the documents and vouchers to be left with the registrar and merchants to report the amount of damage done.

A decree was accordingly made in favour of the plaintiffs, and from this decree the defendants appealed.

A. L. Smith (C. Hall with him) for the appellants. — The master by inserting the words "weight, contents, and value unknown" in the bill of lading refuses to sign a clear bill, and asserts that he knows nothing of the condition of the goods. It is consistent with the evidence that the goods were damaged before shipment. When the consignee shows that the goods are delivered damaged he proves, no doubt, a primâ facie case, and the shipowner must show that nothing on board could have caused the injury which the consignee states the goods to have received; but on the shipowner giving such proof the onus goes back to the consignee, who must show that the shipowner did the damage. A shipowner is not estopped from showing that the goods carried by him are injured out of the ship, although his bill of lading states them to have been shipped in good condition, provided it contains the words "weight, contents, and value unknown."

Jessel v. Bath, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267;
Lebeau v. The General Steam Navigation Company, ante, vol. 1, p. 435; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 89; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 447.

The consignee has no better right than the shipper, who alone, before the Bills of Lading Act could have sued, and the master signing such a bill of lading would have been at liberty to show as against the shipper, that although the goods were shipped apparently clean they came in contact with nothing on board the ship that could account for the damage. It has been shown here that the injury to the goods was not of a nature which could have been caused on board the ship, more especially as these were the only goods damaged out of the whole cargo.

E. C. Clarkson and Lanyon for the respondents were not called upon.

James, L.J.—The judgment of the court below must be confirmed.

The appellants have sought to contend that because the master signed a bill of lading containing the words "weight, contents, and value unknown," it must be taken that he repudiated anything like an admission as to their condition when shipped, but I do not think that these words have such a meaning; the bill of lading taken together must be considered to admit that the goods when shipped were, as far as they could be seen, in good order, and by adding the words above quoted, the master does no more than say that he does not admit anything as to the contents of the packages, which he cannot see. He does admit, however, that the goods appear to be in good condition outside, and this throws upon the appellants the onus of proving that the damage did not arise whilst the goods were on board the ship or in their custody, or that it comes within the exceptions of the bills of lading. For the purpose of doing this they have attempted to show that there was nothing on board the ship that could have occasioned damage of the nature sustained, but looking to the evidence as to the passengers, I do not think that this is made out. Again, they contended that the damage could not have been done on board ship because only this consignment was damaged, whereas, if material of the nature causing the damage had been in the ship, other goods must likewise have been damaged. But there is no force in this argument, because these bales were all together, and it was most probable that the cause of the damage might affect a particular lot of bales. Many causes of damage are necessarily purely local, as in the case of ink spilt over books; it is true a whole cargo may be damaged by a leak, or by some portion rotting, and affecting the rest, but saturation by an oily substance may very well be local, and affect only a portion, especially if the amount of damaging matter has been small. I am of opinion that the appellants have failed to show that this damage was not done on board ship, and in fact the evidence satisfies me that it was done on board the ship and not outside of it. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

(Before Cockburn, C.J., James and Mellish, L.JJ., Mellor, J., and Cleasby, B.)

Nugent v. Smith.

Act of God—Carrier by water—Damage to mare—Accident caused partly by storm, partly by terror of animal—Liability of owner of ship not a general ship.

A loss occasioned by the act of God is a loss arising from and occasioned by the agency of nature which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence so as to prevent its effect.

The plaintiff delivered to the defendant in London a mare to be carried by the defendant by steamer from London to Aberdeen, between which places the defendant ran steamers as a common carrier. A storm arising during the voyage, the mare was so injured that she died. The jury found that the injury was caused partly by excessive bad weather and partly by the fright and struggling of the mare, and they negatived all negligence on the part of the defendant.

Held, reversing the decision of the Common Pleas, that upon these findings of the jury the defendant was not liable.

Per Cockburn, C.J.—There is no authority for the proposition, nor is there any trace of a special custom of the Realm, i.e., common law, that all carriers by sea are subject to the liability of a common carrier, whether by sea or land.

This was an action against the defendant as secretary of a steamboat company, who advertised and ran a line of steamers from London to Aberdeen. The plaintiff delivered to the company in London two horses to be carried to Aberdeen. The horses were shipped without any bill of lading. At a part of the voyage, during rough weather, one of the animals, a mare, was injured to such an extent that she died, and the plaintiff brought the action for damages occasioned by the loss.

The action was tried before Brett, J., at the sittings in London after Hilary Term 1874, when the following questions were left to the jury:

1. Was the injury to the mare caused by negligence of the defendant's servants, either in preparing for bad weather or in attempting to save the mare from the consequences of bad weather? Answer, No.

2. Or, was the injury caused solely by the conduct of the mare herself by reason of fright and consequent struggling, without any negligence of the defendant's servants? Answer, No.

3. Or was the injury caused solely by the perils of the sea, i.e., by more than ordinary rough weather, without any negligence of the defendant's servants, or any fright and consequent struggling of the mare?—Answer, No.

4. Or was it caused partly by more than ordinary bad weather, and partly by the conduct of the mare herself by reason of fright and consequent struggling, without any negligence of the defendant's servants?—Answer, Yes.

5. Were there any known means, though not ordinarily used in the carriage of horses by people of ordinary care and skill, by which the defendant could have prevented the injury to the mare? The jury were unable to agree upon this question.

Upon the answers to these questions the learned judge entered a verdict for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him. In Easter Term 1874, a rule nisi was granted, against which cause was shown in Easter Term 1875. The considered judgment of the court (Brett and Denman, JJ.) was, on 2nd Nov. 1875, delivered by Brett, J., in favour of the plaintiff (ante, p. 87; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 731; L. Rep. 1 C. P. D. 19).

Against this judgment the defendant now appealed.

Benjamin Q.C., Holl, and Douglas Walker for the defendant, the present appellant.—We do not appeal against that part of the judgment of the court below which decides that the defendant is liable as a common carrier, but we contend that by the act of God the defendant is excused from legal responsibility. In order to come within the legal definition of the act of God, the act must be one from which all human intervention is absent. The doctrine of the common law, that a common carrier by water is liable as an insurer, is founded on public policy, because if any human intervention, however irresistible, were allowed to be pleaded by him as an excuse for loss or injury, there would be no safety to the person entrusting him with goods; the doctrine does not extend to loss occasioned by the act of God or by the King's enemies, for the reason that such case would preclude the possibility of any collusion of the carrier's part. Such is the theory of the law. [Cockburn, C.J.—Only as confined to English law]. It is founded on the Roman law. [Cockburn, C.J.—The Roman law only contains nautæ, caupones, et stabularii; but must we not look at a cognate matter, and see how far a storm, however wild, is covered by the words "perils of the seas" in a policy of marine insurance?] There has been a distinction between perils of the sea and the act of God, in this way, that perils of the seas are what could be averted; for instance, if in ordinary bad weather a ship strains and water gets through her seams so that the goods get injured, the owner is liable; but if a wave, rushing on board, breaks into a hatchway, that is within the sense of the exception an act of God. The reason of the rule is that it does not apply where human collusion is possible, and if the carrier has not neglected every human precaution he is not liable. The leading case is Forward v. Pittard (1 Term Rep. 27), where judgment was delivered by Lord Mansfield. That case is followed by the case of The Trent and Mersey Navigation Company v. Wood (3 Esp. 127; 4 Doug. 287), also before Lord Mansfield. The result of the authorities is summed up by Story on Carriers, ss. 510, 511. [James, L.J.—Supposing the horse had been put in a padded box?] The duty of the carrier is not so to pack the goods that no harm can come to them; as, for instance, in order to prevent wet reaching goods, is he bound to pack them in waterproof coverings? He is not bound to use extraordinary means. His liability is only to use reasonable care. Even in the case of fine weather, such circumstances might be found as would amount to the act of God, and which would therefore exonerate the carrier from liability; as, for instance, if calm weather delays a ship so that fresh meat carried by her becomes corrupt, the carrier is excused: (Taylor v. Dunbar, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 206.) [Mellish, L.J.—If injury resulting from the act of God is an excuse, as well as injury resulting from the inherent character of the thing, the combined action of the two is an excuse.] Such is our contention here. The guiding rule in determining what is the act of God is that no human agency has been concerned with the act. If the moving cause has been from natural causes, and there has been no contributory negligence on the part of man, the carrier is excused. The following authorities were also on this point referred to in the argument:

Angell on Carriers, sect. 156, note;
Amies v. Stephens, 1 Strange 128;
Colt v. M'Mechen, 6 Johnson's Reports of the Supreme Court of New York, 159;

1 Parsons on Shipping, 253.

Secondly, the accident was owing to the inherent qualities of the animal. An insurer is not liable if injury is caused by the inherent quality of the thing:

Taylor v. Dunbar, (ubi sup.);
Kendall v. South-Western Railway Company, 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 735; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 373; 41 L. J. 184 Ex.;

Clark v. Rochester and Syracuse Railway Company, 4 Kernan's (American) Rep. 570;
Smith v. Newhaven Railway Company, 12 Allen 531.

Cohen Q.C. (Lanyon with him) for the plaintiff.—If the common law presses harshly on the carrier, he may protect himself by a bill of lading; he is not liable for injury occasioned by the act of God or the Queen's enemies, but the onus is on him to show that the loss was so occasioned, and unless he discharges himself from such onus, he is liable. The question is, what is the meaning of the phrase actus Dei? It is not sufficient to show that the intervention of man is absent. Here there was no more intervention than in a case where a bale of cotton catches fire by spontaneous combustion, and sets fire to adjoining bales; the carrier would be exonerated from liability for the original bale, but not for the others. Where damage was done to goods on board a ship by rats, the shipowner was held liable for such damage, although he had kept cats on board: (Laveroni v. Drury, 8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.) The tendency of rats to bite wood and the tendency of a bale on fire to set fire to other bales is not the intervention of the hand of man. The act must not only be the act of a higher power in order to exonerate the carrier, but it must be an act that is sudden, overwhelming, and extraordinary. The common law rule by which the carrier by sea is rendered an insurer was founded by the Roman law at a time when owners navigated their own ships, and therefore as the goods were entirely under the control of the shipowner and his servants, it was impossible for the owner of the goods to enter into any question of how injury was caused to the goods while under the care of the shipowner. Therefore it was in order to prevent litigation, not collusion, that the common law rule came to be what it is at the present day. That was before insurance. Now the shipowner can protect himself by exceptions in the bill of lading. He is not liable for perils of the sea: (Lawrence v. Aberdein, 5 B. & Ald. 107; Gabay v. Lloyd, 3 B. & C. 793.) All the American jurists and the greatest English judges have laid it down that it is not the act of God unless it is something unusual, sudden, and certain, and one that no care operating between the cause and the effect could provide against. [James, L. J.—If between the commencement of the storm and the happening of the injury, the placing of two men at the head of the horse could have prevented the accident, then you say that the act was not in a legal sense the act of God?] Quite so. Kent's Comm. 8th edit. pp. 784, 785. The evidence shows that there was plenty of human intervention—how difficult for the plaintiff to show whether such intervention was wise or not!

Benjamin, Q.C. in reply,—The act of God must first be established, then comes in the human intervention; the human intervention must not be practically impossible but physically impossible. The evidence shows that all care was taken.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 29.—The following judgments were delivered.

Cockburn, C.J.—This case involves a question of considerable importance as regards the law relating to carriers by sea, but the facts are few and simple.

The plaintiff being the owner of two horses, and having occasion to send them from London to Aberdeen, shipped them on board a steamship belonging to the company of which the defendant is the representative, plying regularly as a general ship between the two ports. The horses were shipped without any bill of lading. In the course of the voyage a storm of more than ordinary violence arose, and partly from the rolling of the vessel in the heavy sea, partly from struggling caused by excessive fright, one of the animals, a mare, received injuries from which she died. It is to recover damages in respect of her loss that this action is brought. The jury, in answer to a question specifically put to them have expressly negatived any want of due care on the part of the defendant either in taking proper measures beforehand to protect the horses from the effect of tempestuous weather, or in doing all that could be done to save them from the consequences of it after the storm had come on. A further question put to the jury was whether there were any known means, though not ordinarily used in the carriage of horses by people of ordinary care and skill, by which the defendant could have prevented the injury to the mare, but to this question the jury returned no answer.

The question is whether, on this state of facts, the shipowners are liable. For the defendant it was insisted that the storm, which was the primary and in a partial degree the proximate cause of the loss, must be taken to have been an "act of God" within the legal meaning of that term, so as to afford immunity to the defendants as carriers (all due care having been taken to convey the mare safely) from liability in respect of the loss complained of, and the question to be determined is whether this contention is well founded.

The judgment of the Common Pleas Division in favour of the plaintiff, as delivered by Brett, J., involves, if I rightly understand it, the following propositions: First, that the Roman law relating to bailments has been adopted by our courts as part of the common law of England; secondly, that by the Roman law all ships, whether common carriers or not, are equally liable for loss by inevitable accident; thirdly, that such is the rule of English law as derived from the Roman law, and as evidenced by English authorities; fourthly, that to bring the cause of damage or loss within the meaning of the term "act of God," so as to give immunity to the carrier, the damage or loss in question must have been caused directly and exclusively by such a direct, and violent, and sudden, and irresistible act of nature as the defendant could not, by any amount of ability, foresee would happen; or if he could foresee that it would happen, he could not by any amount of care and skill resist so as to prevent its effect; fifthly, that notwithstanding the inability of the jury to agree to an answer to the fifth question left to them, the defendant has in this case failed to satisfy the burden of proof cast upon him so as to bring himself clearly within the definition, as it is impossible to say that no human ability could foresee the reasonable probability of the happening of rough weather on the voyage, and that a horse at sea might be frightened by it, or that no human ability could prevent injury to a frightened horse in such weather as occurred. In no part of this reasoning am I able to concur.

In the first place, I think it right to observe, that as the vessel by which the mare was shipped was one of a line of steamers plying habitually between given ports, and carrying the goods of all comers as a general ship, and as from this it necessarily follows that the owners were common carriers, it was altogether unnecessary to the decision of the present case to determine the question so elaborately discussed in the judgment of Brett, J., as to the liability of the owner of a ship not being a general ship, but one hired to carry a specific cargo on a particular voyage, to make good loss or damage arising from inevitable accident.

The question being, however, one of considerable importance, though its importance is materially lessened by the general practice of ascertaining and limiting the liability of the ship owner by charter-party or bill of lading, and the question not having before presented itself for judicial decision, I think it right to express my dissent from the reasoning of the court below, the more so as for the opinion thus expressed I not only fail to discover any authority whatever, but find all jurists who treat of this form of bailment carefully distinguish between the common carrier and the private ship. Parsons, a writer of considerable authority on this subject, defines a common carrier to be "one who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini, and on a certain route." He is bound to carry for all who tender to him goods and the price of carriage, and insures these goods against all loss, but that arising from the act of God, or the public enemy, and has a lien on the goods for the price of the carriage." "If either of these elements is wanting we say the carrier is not a common carrier, either by land or by water. If we are right in this," he adds, "no vessel will be a common carrier that does not ply regularly, alone or in connection with others, on some definite route, or between two certain termini" (1 Parsons' Shipping 245). Story seems to be of a like opinion, "When it is said," he observes, "that the owners and masters of ships are deemed common carriers it is to be understood of such ships as are employed as general ships, or for the transportation of merchandise for persons in general, such as vessels employed in the coasting trade, or foreign trade, or on general freighting business for all persons offering goods on freight for the port of destination. But if the owner of a ship employs it on his own account generally, or if he lets the tonnage, with a small exception, to a single person, and then for the accommodation of a particular individual, he takes goods on board for freight, not receiving them for persons in general, he will not be deemed a common carrier, but a mere private carrier" (Story on Bailments, sect. 501). So Angell, speaking of shipowners as common carriers, says, "When it is said that the owners and masters of ships are treated as common carriers, it is to be understood of such ships as are employed for the transportation of merchandise for all persons indifferently. Should the owner of a ship employ it on his own account, and for the special accommodation of a particular individual take goods on board for freight not receiving them for all persons indifferently, he does not come within the definition of a common carrier, he not holding himself out as engaged in a public employment." But the learned author does not say what would be the case where a shipowner holds himself out as ready to send his vessel with cargo to any place that may be agreed on, but on a private bargain and not as a general ship.

In the absence of all common law authority for the proposition that by the law of England every carrier by sea is subject to the same liability as the common carrier, the authority of the Roman law is invoked, but this law on which so much stress is laid in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas affords no support to this doctrine. In the first place it is a misapprehension to suppose that the law of England relating to the liability of common carriers was derived from the Roman law, for the law relating to it was first established by our courts with reference to carriers by land on whom the Roman law, as is well known, imposed no liability in respect of loss beyond that of other bailees for reward. In the second place the Roman law made no distinction between inevitable accident arising from what in our law is termed the "act of God," and inevitable accident arising from other causes, but, on the contrary, afforded immunity to the carrier without distinction whenever the loss resulted from casus fortuitus, or as it is also called damnum fatale, or vis major, unforeseen and unavoidable accident. The language of the Prætorian Edict as given in the digest, might, indeed, if it stood alone, lead to the supposition that the liability of the carrier by sea was unlimited. "Ait prætor, nautæ, caupones, stabularii quod cujusque salvum fore receperint, nisi restituant, in eos judicium dabo." (Dig. IV., Lib. 9, pro.) But, Ulpian, who gives the words quoted in his treatise on the edict, explains this meaning: "Hoc edicto omnimodo qui recepit tenetur, etiam si sine culpâ ejus res periit vel damnum datum est nisi si quid damno fatali contingit. Inde labeo scribit si quid naufragio aut per vim piratarum perierit, non esse iniquum exceptionem ei dari. Idem erit dicendum si in stabulo aut in cauponâ vis major contigerit." In the one case the absence of culpa makes no difference. In the other it does. No difference of opinion exists among civilians as to the law on this subject. There is no doubt that inevitable accident, "damnum fatale," "casus fortuitus," "vis major," for these are synonomous terms, exempt the carrier from liability. "Casus fortuitus," says Averani, "appellatur vis major, vis divina, fatum, damnum fatale, fatalitas." Such is the Roman law, and such is the existing law of all the nations which have adopted the Roman law, France, Spain, Italy, Germany, Holland, and to come nearer home, Scotland. It is embodied in the Code Civile of France. Treating of carriers by land and by water, the Code says (art. 1754): "Ils sont responsable de la perte, et des avaries des choses qui leur sont confiées, à moins qu'ils ne prouvent qu'elles ont été perdues et avaries par cas fortuit ou force majeure." That such is the law of Scotland we learn from what is said in Erskine's Institutes (pp. 591, 592, n), from which it appears that not only storm and pirates, but also housebreaking and fire constitute damnum fatale, which will exonerate the innkeeper or carrier. See also the appendix to Stair's Institutes, by More (p. 57).

But not only does this essential difference between the Roman law and our own suffice to show that so far as the liability of carriers is concerned, our law has not been derived from the Roman; as matter of legal history we know that the more rigorous law of later times, first introduced during the reign of Elizabeth, was in the first instance established with reference to carriers by land, to whom by the Roman law no such liability attached. It was not till the ensuing reign, in the 11th of James I., that it was decided, in Rich v. Kneeland (3 Cro. Jac. 330, Hob. 17), that the common hoyman or carrier by water stood on the same footing as a common carrier by land, and rightly, for in principle there could be no difference between them. The next case in point of date (and it is the first case in the books) in which the liability of the owner of a seagoing ship comes in question, is the well-known case of Morse v. Slue (1 Ventris, 190, 238), in which it was held, after a trial at bar, that where a ship, lying in the Thames, was boarded by robbers, who took the plaintiff's goods, which had been loaded on board the vessel, out of her, in an action brought against the master, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. And it certainly surprises me that this case should be relied on as an authority for the position that the liabity of a common carrier attaches to the shipowner or master where the ship is not a general ship; for though it is not expressly said that the ship in question was a general ship, which has led to the somewhat hasty assumption that she was not, the internal evidence shows conclusively that she was so. In the first place the declaration is laid on the custom of the realm, and we know that the only custom to which effect had, up to that time, been given, and that quite in recent times, was in respect of common carriers by land, and still more recently in respect of common carriers by water. Secondly, Hale, C.J., in giving judgment, puts the case as on all fours with that of a common carrier or hoyman and nowhere says that it is to be treated as that of a private ship. "He who would take off the master from this action," says the Chief Justice, "must assign the difference between it and the case of a hoyman, common carrier, or inn holder." Doubtless the counsel for the defendant, if the case had been distinguishable on the ground that the vessel was not a common ship, would have pointed out the difference, and, at all events, taken the point; and in the corresponding report of the case in Levinz (2 Lev. 69), the case of Rich v. Kneeland having been referred to, the Chief Justice is reported to have said that the case "differed not from that of the hoyman." But in that case of Rich v. Kneeland we know that the barge or hoy was a common vessel, and it is obvious that if in Morse v. Slue the vessel had been a private one, instead of treating the case as identical with that of the common hoyman, the Chief Justice would have put it on the ground that all sea going vessels were subject to the larger liability. But, besides this, there is a circumstance which appears to have been overlooked, which is a decision to show that the ship must have been a general ship. It is mentioned in the report in Ventris that the ship was a vessel of 150 tons burden bound for Cadiz, while the goods shipped by the plaintiff consisted of three trunks, containing 400 pairs of silk stockings and 174lb. of silk. It seems idle to suppose that a ship of that size would have been hired on such a voyage for the purpose of carrying the plaintiff's three trunks as her entire cargo. There seems, therefore, no reasonable doubt that the ship was a general ship. In like manner in the case of Dale v. Hall (1 Wilson, 281), although the declaration was not upon the custom of the realm, but upon the implied obligation to carry safely, it appearing that the defendant was a shipmaster or keelman who carried goods from port to port, the court decided in favour of the plaintiff, expressly on the liability of the defendant as a common carrier (though the latter was prepared to show an absence of negligence on his part), on the ground that the allegation of the duty of a common carrier "to carry safely" was equivalent to a declaration on the custom of the realm. In the subsequent case of Barclay v. Cuculla y Guna (3 Doug. 389), which was a case where as in Morse v. Slue goods had been forcibly taken by thieves from a ship lying in the Thames on the objection being taken on behalf of the defendant that he was not charged in the declaration on the custom of the realm, while there was neither express undertaking or negligence to make him liable otherwise, the answer of the court is "that there was no question at the trial as to the ship being a general ship," and Lord Mansfield adds that it was impossible to distinguish the case from that of a common carrier. Thus far the reported cases as to carriers by sea have been cases of general vessels. The next case in point of time, that of Lyon v. Mells (5 East. 428), was one in which the defendant kept sloops for carrying other persons' goods for hire, and also lighters for carrying such goods to and from his sloops, as well as to and from the sloops of other owners. One of these lighters, in which goods of the plaintiff were being conveyed on board a sloop, proved leaky, and took in a quantity of water, and the goods became seriously damaged, and it was also found as a fact that the goods had been negligently stowed. The defendant relied on a notice that he would not be answerable for any loss or damage unless occasioned by want of ordinary care of the master and crew, in which case he would pay 10 per cent. on the loss or damage, but that persons desirous of having their goods carried free from any risk in respect of loss or damage, whether arising from the act of God, or otherwise, might have them so carried on entering into an agreement to pay extra freight in proportion to the risk. The question was whether, no extra freight having been paid, the defendant was protected by this notice from liability for more than 10 per cent. of damages. Nothing in reality turned upon his being a common carrier, or subject to the liability of a common carrier. Some discussion, it is true, took place on the argument as to whether the defendant was a common carrier or not; but Lord Ellenborough, in giving judgment, put the matter on the right footing, namely, that a carrier by water impliedly engages that his vessel should be water tight, an obligation obviously applicable to all carriers, whether common carriers or otherwise, and that the defendant could not be taken to have intended by such a notice to claim immunity in respect of his own breach of contract, but only immunity above 10 per cent. for loss or damage arising from the negligence of the master and crew, and total immunity in respect of loss or damage from the act of God or other cause unless extra freight was paid. The owner, no doubt, thought his liability that of a common carrier, and, as Lord Ellenborough points out, sought to protect himself accordingly; but Lord Ellenborough nowhere treats him as such, but decides the case on a general ground applicable to all carriers, whether common or private. Yet this case is relied on as showing that a man who lets out a lighter or ship not to carry the goods of general comers, but to a particular individual on a specific job or contract, if his business be to let out lighters or ships, is a common carrier, or is at all events subject to an equal degree of liability. The last case is that of the Liver Alkali Company v. Johnson (ante, vol. 1, p. 380; vol. 2, p. 332; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 95; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 338; 43 L. J., 216, Ex.), in which the defendant was a barge owner and let out his vessels for conveyance of goods to any customers who applied to him. Each voyage was made under a separate agreement, and a barge was not let to more than one person for the same voyage. The defendant did not ply within any fixed termini, but the customer fixed in each particular case the points of arrival and departure. In an action against the defendant by the plaintiffs for not safely and securely carrying certain goods, the Court of Exchequer Chamber held, affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, that the defendant was a common carrier, and liable as such. Mr. Justice Brett, differing from the majority, held that the defendant was not a common carrier, but asserting the same doctrine as in the judgment now appealed from, held him liable upon a special custom of the realm attaching to all carriers by sea—of which custom, however, as I have already intimated, I can find no trace whatever. We are, of course, bound by the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in the case referred to, as that of a court of appellate jurisdiction, and which therefore can only be reviewed by a court of ultimate appeal; but I cannot help seeing the difficulty which stands in the way of the ruling in that case, namely, that it is essential to the character of a common carrier that he is bound to carry the goods of all persons applying to him, while it never has been held, and, as it seems to me, could not be held, that a person who lets out vessels or vehicles to individual customers on their application was liable to an action for refusing the use of such vessel or vehicle if required to furnish it. At all events, it is obvious that the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber having proceeded on the ground that the defendant in that case was a common carrier, the decision is no authority for the position taken in the court below that all shipowners are equally liable for loss by inevitable accident. It is plain that the majority of the court did not adopt the view of Brett, J.

While it does not lie within our province to criticise the law we have to administer, or to question its policy, I cannot but think that we are not called upon to extend a principle of extreme rigour peculiar to our own law, and the absence of which in the law of other nations has not been found by experience to lead to the evils for the prevention of which our law was supposed to be necessary, further than it has hitherto been applied. I cannot, therefore, concur in the opinion expressed in the judgment delivered by Brett, J., that by the law of England all carriers by sea are subject to the liability which by that law undoubtedly attaches to the common carrier whether by sea or by land.

But there being no doubt that in the case before us the shipowner was a common carrier, we have now to deal with the question on which the decision turns, namely, whether the loss was occasioned by what can be properly called the "act of God."

The definition which is given by Brett, J. of what is termed in our law the "act of God" is that "it must be such a direct, and violent, and sudden and irresistible act of nature as could not by any amount of ability have been foreseen, or if foreseen, could not by any amount of human care and skill have been resisted." The judgment then proceeds, "We cannot say, notwithstanding the inability of the jury to agree to an answer to the fifth question left to them, that the defendant has in this case satisfied the burden of proof cast upon him so as to bring himself clearly within the definition. It seems to me impossible to say that no human ability could foresee the reasonable probability of the happening of rough weather on the voyage, and that a horse at sea might be frightened by it or that no human ability could prevent injury to a frightened horse in such weather as occurred." The exposition here given appears to me far too wide as regards the decree of care required of the shipowner, and as exacting more that can properly be expected of him. It is somewhat remarkable that previously to the present case no judicial exposition has occurred of the meaning of the term "act of God," as regards the degree of care to be applied by the carrier in order to entitle himself to the benefit of its protection. We must endeavour to lay down an intelligble rule.

That a storm at sea is included in the term "act of God" can admit of no doubt whatever. Storm and tempest have always been mentioned in dealing with this subject as among the instances of vis major coming under the denomination of "act of God." But it is equally true that it is not under all circumstances that inevitable accident arising from the so-called "act of God," will, any more than inevitable accident in general by the Roman and continental law, afford immunity to the carrier. This must depend on his ability to avert the effects of the vis major, and the degree of diligence which he is bound to apply to that end. It is at once obvious, as was pointed out by Lord Mansfield in Forward v. Pittard (1 T. R. 27) that all causes of inevitable accident, "casus fortuitus," may be divided into two classes, those which are occasioned by the elementary forces of nature unconnected with the agency of man or other cause, and those which have their origin either in the whole or in part in the agency of man whether in acts of commission or omission, of nonfeasance or of misfeasance, or in any other cause independent of the agency of natural forces. It is obvious that it would be altogether incongruous to apply the term "act of God" to the latter class of inevitable accident. It is equally clear that storm and tempest belong to the class to which the term "act of God" is properly applicable. On the other hand, it must be admitted that it is not because an accident is occasioned by the agency of nature and therefore by what may be termed the "act of God" that it necessarily follows that the carrier is entitled to immunity. The rain which fertilises the earth, and the wind which enables the ship to navigate the ocean are as much within the term "act of God" as the rainfall which causes a river to burst its banks and carry destruction over a whole district, or the cyclone that drives a ship against a rock or sends it to the bottom. Yet the carrier, who by the rule is entitled to protection in the latter case, would clearly not be able to claim it in the former. For here another principle comes into play. The carrier is bound to do his utmost to protect the goods committed to his charge from loss or damage, and if he fails herein becomes liable from the nature of his contract. In the one case he can protect the goods by proper care, in the other it is beyond his power to do so. If by his default in omitting to take the necessary care, loss or damage occurs, he remains responsible though the so-called "act of God" may have been the immediate cause of the mischief. If the ship is unseaworthy, and hence perishes from the storm which it otherwise would have weathered; if the carrier, by undue deviation or delay exposes himself to the danger which he would otherwise have avoided, or if, by his rashness, he unnecessarily encounters it by putting to sea in a raging storm, the loss cannot be said to be due to the act of God alone, and the carrier cannot have the benefit of it. This being granted the question arises as to the degree of care which is to be required of him to protect him from liability in respect of loss arising from the act of God.

Not only, as has been observed, has there been no judicial exposition of the meaning of the term "act of God," as regards the degree of care to be applied by the carrier in order to entitle himself to its protection, but the text writers, both English and American, are for the most part silent on the subject, and afford little or no assistance. As we are here on common ground with the civilians, so far as one head of inevitable accident is concerned, it may be of use while endeavouring more clearly to fix the limits of that class of inevitable accidents which comes under the head of "act of God," to turn to their views on that subject with reference to inevitable accidents in general. As the result of the different instances of casus fortuitus, which occur in the Digest, Viminius gives the following definition: "Casum fortuitum definimus omne quod humano cæptu prævideri non potest, nec cui proviso potest resisti:" (Instit. Juris. lib. 2, c. 66.) He enumerates various instances: "Casus fortuiti varii sunt, veluti a vi ventorum, turbinum, pluviarum, grandinum, fulminum, æstus, frigoris, et similium calamitatum quæ cælitus immittuntur. Nostri vim divinam dixerunt. Græci Θεου βίαν. Item naufragiæ, aquarum inundationes, incendia, mortes animalium, ruinæ ædium, fundorum, chasmata, incursus hostium, prædonum impetus. His adde damna omnia a privatis illata quæ quominus inferrentur, nullâ curâ caveri potuit." Baldus (Quæst. 12 No. 4) gives the following definition: "Casus fortuitus est accidens quod per custodiam curam vel diligentiam mentis humanæ non potest evitari ab eo qui patitur." In our own law on this subject judicial authority, as has been stated, is wanting, and the text writers, English and American, with one exception, afford little or no assistance. Story, however, in speaking of the perils of the sea, in which storm and tempest are, of course, included, and, consequently, to a great extent the instances of inevitable accident at sea, which come under the term, "act of God," uses the following language: "The phrase, 'perils of the sea' whether understood in its most limited sense as importing a loss by natural accidents peculiar to that element, or whether understood in its more extended sense as including inevitable accidents occurring upon that element, must still in either case be understood to include such losses only to the goods on board as are of an extraordinary nature, or arise from some irresistible force, or from inevitable accident, or from some overwhelming power which cannot be guarded against by the ordinary exertions of human skill and prudence. Hence it is that if the loss occurs by a peril of the sea, which might have been avoided by the exercise of any reasonable skill or diligence at the time when it occurred, it is not deemed to be in the sense of the phrase such a loss by the perils of the sea as will exempt the carrier from liability, but rather a loss by the gross negligence of the party." Story, it will be observed, here speaks only of "ordinary exertion of human skill and prudence and the exercise of reasonable skill and diligence." I am of opinion that this is the true view of the matter, and that what Story here says of perils of the sea applies equally to the perils of the sea coming within the designation of "acts of God." In other words, that all that can be required of the carrier is that he shall do all that is reasonably and practically possible to insure the safety of the goods. If he uses all the known means to which prudent and experienced carriers ordinarily have recourse he does all that can be reasonably required of him, and if under such circumstances he is overpowered by storm or other natural agency, he is within the rule which gives immunity from the effects of such vis major as the act of God. I do not think that because some one may have discovered some more efficient method of securing the goods which has not become generally known, or because it cannot be proved that if the skill and ingenuity of engineers or others were directed to the subject, something more efficient might not be produced, that the carrier can be made liable. I find no authority for saying that the vis major must be such as "no amount of human care or skill could have resisted," or the injury such as "no human ability could have prevented," and I think this construction of the rule erroneous.

That the defendants here took all the care that could reasonably be required of them to insure the safety of the mare, is, I think, involved in the finding of the jury directly negativing negligence, and I think it was not incumbent on the defendants to establish more than is implied by that finding. The matter becomes, however, somewhat complicated from the fact that the jury have found that the death of the mare is to be ascribed to injuries caused partly by the rolling of the vessel, partly by struggles of the animal occasioned by fright, leaving it doubtful whether the fright was the natural effect of the storm, or whether it arose from an unusual degree of timidity peculiar to the animal, and in excess of what would generally be displayed by horses. But the plaintiff is in this dilemma, if the fright which led to the struggling of the mare was in excess of what is usual in horses on ship board in a storm, then the rules applies that the carrier is not liable where the thing carried perishes or sustains damage by reason of some quality inherent in its nature, without any fault of his, and which it was not possible for him to guard against. If on the other hand the fright was the natural effect of the storm, and of the agitation of the ship, then it was the immediate consequence of the storm, and the injuries occasioned by the fright are sufficiently closely connected with the storm, in other words, with the act of God, to afford protection to the carrier.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and judgment entered for the defendant.

Mellish, L J.—I do not wish to give any opinion on the question whether the defendant if he had not been a common carrier would have been subject to the liability of common carriers. It is unnecessary to give any opinion on that question, because it was admitted in the argument before us that the defendant was a common carrier.

I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that the judgment of the Common Pleas Division ought to be reversed, and generally with the reasons he has given in his judgment. If the jury had found that the injury to the mare was caused solely by more than ordinary bad weather without any negligence of the defendant's servants, or any fright and consequent struggling of the mare, I am of opinion that a plea that the injury to the mare was caused by the act of God would have been proved. It is obvious that if a horse is properly secured on deck, and properly attended to by the carrier's servants, and is quiet, and nevertheless is so injured as to be killed by the pitching of the vessel, the violence of the storm must be very great indeed, and the whole accident would be of such an extraordinary character as plainly to amount to the act of God within the authorities. So, also, if the jury had found that the injury was caused solely by the conduct of the mare herself by reason of fright and consequent struggling without any negligence on the part of the defendant's servants, I am of opinion that a plea that the injury to the mare was caused by the vice of the mare herself would have been proved. The cases of Kendal v. London and South-Western Railway Company (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 735; 41 L. J. Rep. 184, Ex.; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 373) and Blower v. The Great Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 7 C.P. 655) are direct authorities to this effect. Now, if these conclusions are correct, it seems to me it would be absurd to hold that, although the injury to the mare was occasioned by two causes combined, for neither of which the carrier was responsible, nevertheless he was liable. It may, no doubt, be true that as the injury of the mare was not solely occasioned by more than ordinary bad weather, the bad weather may not have been so bad as to deserve the description of a direct and violent and sudden and irresistible act of nature, which, in the court below, it was said it must amount to, in order to amount to an act of God. The bad weather may not have been irresistible, because, if it had not been for the conduct of the mare herself, it might have been resisted. So, also, the conduct of the mare herself may not have been the sole and irresistible cause of the injury, because, if it had not been for the bad weather any injurious effect from the fright and struggling of the mare might, by reasonable precautions, have been prevented. Still it may be perfectly true, and I think the jury must be taken to have found it was true, that the more than ordinary bad weather, and the fright and struggling of the mare herself, did together form a direct and violent and irresistible cause of the damage which the mare suffered:

In the court below the learned judges first consider the question whether the loss in this case can be considered to have occurred by the act of God; and because the bad weather did not, in their opinion, amount to a direct and violent and sudden and irresistible act of nature, they came to the conclusion that the loss was not occasioned by the act of God. They then consider whether the loss was occasioned by the vice of the mare herself, and because they think that the fright and struggling of the mare was occasioned principally by the bad weather they hold that the loss was not occasioned by the vice of the mare herself. The objection to this mode of considering the case seems to me to be that the two causes of loss are considered separately, and because neither, taken separately, affords an answer to the plaintiff's claim, it is assumed that both, taken together, cannot afford an answer.

Now, I am of opinion we ought to hold that notwithstanding neither the more than ordinary bad weather, nor the fright and struggling of the mare herself, each taken separately were sufficient to account for the loss, yet if both taken together formed an irresistible cause of the loss in this sense, that by no reasonable precaution on the part of the carrier could the damage resulting from them have been prevented, the carrier is protected. It being a clear rule of law that if the loss of the goods carried is occasioned by an irresistible act of nature the carrier is protected, and another clear rule of law that if the loss of the goods is solely occasioned by a defect in the thing itself the carrier is also protected, it seems to me to follow that if a loss is occasioned partly by an act of nature, although one not by itself irresistible, and partly by a defect in the thing itself, although that defect is not the sole cause of the loss, and the carrier has no means of preventing the combined effect of the two causes, he ought to be held to be protected. The principle seems to me to be that a carrier does not insure against acts of nature, and does not insure against defects in the thing carried itself; but in order to make out a defence the carrier must be able to prove that either cause taken separately or both taken together formed the sole and direct and irresistible cause of the loss. I think, however, that in order to prove that the cause of the loss was irresistible it is not necessary to prove that it was absolutely impossible for the carrier to prevent it, but that it is sufficient to prove that by no reasonable precaution under the circumstances could it have been prevented.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed, and the rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff discharged.

Cleasby, B.—I should hesitate to decide this case upon the general ground much insisted on during the argument that where there is a loss or destruction of anything intrusted to a carrier from natural causes without the intervention of any human agency the carrier is discharged. In other words, that the exception of "the act of God" from the carrier's responsibility applied to every condition of things resulting from natural causes. The words "act of God" as applied to the carrier's exemption comprehend no doubt such events as earthquakes and all other convulsions of nature. Violent storms and tempests have always been considered as coming within the words, and men have thought they could avert them by prayers and offerings. Mr. Wallace, the American editor of Smith's Leading Cases, as cited in the note to Angell on Carriers, sect. 155, p. 153, attempts a definition, "Upon the whole it would seem that the act of God signifies the extraordinary violence of nature." This entirely disapproves of those American cases referred to in the argument, Colt v. M'Meeher and Williams v. Grant (ubi sup.), which appeared to go to the extent of showing that "act of God" and "act of nature" meant the same thing. I mean, of course, "act of God" as applied to the carrier's exception. I would not adopt this or any definition as exact and including all cases; but wherever there is that unusual violence of nature against which, in the opinion of the jury, precautions would be considered unavailing, and could not be expected to be taken, I should say the case would come within the exception.

Now how does the present case stand as regards this? I should have been better satisfied if the note of the case had shown more distinctly that there had been in this case the intervention of the act of God in the sense which I have mentioned. Still, looking at the language of the questions put to the jury, and the answers, it is a fair conclusion, I think, that the weather was of such a nature "more than ordinary bad weather," as to come within the meaning of "act of God." It seems to have been argued in that way, and if that be so, the judgment of the Court below is subject to this criticism, that though the carrier is excused by the "act of God," he is yet bound to use precautions against the "act of God." This seems an inconsistency, and I should feel fully justified in saying that if the "act of God" and the nature of the animal combined to produce the injury, the defendants would be discharged. The fifth question asks: "Were there known means not ordinarily used in the carriage of horses by sea by people of ordinary care and skill, by which the injury might be prevented?" It is not surprising that the jury could not agree upon an answer to this question. Some would say it must be possible to use means to attain this end, and of course they could not be unknown contrivances, but known to persons of skill, and this would lead to one answer; others would say, the only known means, in the proper sense of the words, were means in use, that is in ordinary use, and this would lead to an opposite answer. It does not appear to me that an answer to that question was essential to determine the case, because, whichever way it was answered, the answers to the other questions, particularly the fourth, determine the case in favour of the defendants. I consider it expressly found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendants in any way contributing to the injury. If the second question had been answered in the affirmative the case would have come within the authority of decided cases. Carriers of live animals are not, as such, without negligence responsible for injury to or death of the animals carried by themselves: (Blower v. Great Western Railway Company, Kendall v. London and South-Western Railway Company, ubi sup.) But in the present case it appears that the injuries were due to two causes together, the rough weather and the nature of the animal. If the extraordinary rough weather can be regarded as the act of God within the meaning of those words in the exception then, as I have before stated, the case appears clear; but if it be not, still as the jury have negatived negligence in their answer to the fourth question, it amounts to this—that the defendants took all reasonable and proper precautions against rough weather, but still the extraordinary bad weather and nature of the animal caused the injury. This, in my opinion, is sufficient to absolve the carriers, because, all negligence being negatived, they cannot be said in any way to have contributed to the injury, and so far as being carriers they are insurers, this liability does not extend to injuries caused by the animals themselves, and even though the extraordinary rough weather may have contributed directly, yet no direct conclusion could be founded upon the joint operation of the two causes, as no division could be made of the result caused by each. The third finding negatives the injury being caused by the rough weather alone, and as it follows that the character and conduct of the animal must have been an effective cause the sounder conclusion seems to be that the plaintiff fails in making out a case to recover anything rather than that the defendants are to be made responsible for the whole consequences of both causes combined.

The effect of this opinion is that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

Mellish, L.J. stated that James, L.J. concurred that the decision of the court below must be reversed, and desired to add the following observation:—The act of God is a mere short way of expressing this proposition: A common carrier is not liable for any accident as to which he can show that it is due to natural causes directly and exclusively, without human intervention, and that it could not have been prevented by any amount of foresight and pains and care reasonably to be expected from him. In this case the defendant has made this out.

Mellor, J. agreed that the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Reported by James P. Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, May 3, 1876.

(Before James L.J., Baggallay, J.A., and Lush, J.)

The Limerick.

Master's wages and disbursements—Shipwright's claim—Collision—Bond given by master—Liability.

Where shipwrights execute repairs to a ship at the order of the master given under circumstances by which the shipwrights acquire a right to claim against either the owners or the master, and they elect to claim against the master, the latter may, in an action for wages and disbursements, proceed against the ship and recover for the amount of such shipwright's claim as a disbursement made on ship's account.

Where a ship through the default of her master has run into and damaged another ship, and the master of the former has in respect of such collision given a bond for the amount of the damage binding himself and his owners and the ship, he, being himself a wrongdoer, cannot, in an action for wages and disbursements, claim the amount of such bond or to be indemnified against any claim to be made against him thereunder in respect of the collision.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Right Hon. Sir R. Phillimore in a cause of wages and disbursements instituted in the High Court of Admiralty of England on behalf of Sheriff Hopkins, master of the steamship Limerick against that vessel, and against James Jutson, mortgagee of the vessel, intervening.

The cause was instituted by the plaintiff—in consequence of the failure of the owner of the vessel, Mr. Ireland, and of the arrest and sale of the ship in other suits—to recover his own wages and disbursements made on account of crew's wages and provisioning, fitting, and repairing the ship. The defendant did not oppose the claim altogether, but claimed a reference, and in consequence the judge on the 14th July 1875 made a decree for the plaintiff's claim, and referred the same to the registrar and merchants to report the amount due. The claim was heard before the registrar (Mr. Rothery), assisted by merchants, on the 13th Dec. 1875, the 12th and 14th Feb. 1876. The plaintiff then claimed amongst other things 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* the amount of an account due for repairs of the ship to Messrs. Dowson and Worth, shipwrights, but which had not been paid to them; and also 200*l.* in respect of a "bond given by the master in respect of a collision between the Limerick and the schooner Skitty Belle."

In reference to Dowson and Worth's claim it appeared that the Limerick was in need of some repairs in 1875, and the master was taken to Dowson and Worth by Messrs. Breslauer and Co., who were the managing agents of the ship, and he then engaged them to effect the repairs. Breslauer and Co. had many ships under their control, and were in the habit of employing Dowson and Worth. The master's evidence on this point was as follows:

Messrs. Dowson and Worth are known to Messrs. Breslauer, but they were not employed by him. Mr. Port (their clerk) took me and introduced me to Messrs. Dowson and Worth, telling them that the Limerick was not one of their ships, they only managed her. I cannot account for the bill being made out only to the owners. I, in the first place, sent to Messrs. Dowson and Worth for their account; I did not know whether I was liable or not, and wished to have all the accounts. I should say that this is the account they sent me (account produced). They did not at the time make any demand on me. I did not hear personally from them until two months ago. They have not sued me nor threatened me with a suit.

The account referred to in the evidence was headed "The owners of the steamship Limerick" and not "captain and owners," as is usual. On the 13th March 1876, Dowson and Worth wrote to the plaintiff saying:

We are sorry to have to trouble you again with regard to our account against the Limerick, but as Mr. Jutson denies his ownership, and Mr. Ireland has failed, we must apply to you for payment. Our contract was made with you, and you are equally liable as master of the vessel.

Yours faithfully (Signed) Dowson and Worth.

As to the claim on the bond given for the collision with the Skitty Belle, it appeared that the collision occurred on the last voyage of the Limerick whilst in charge of the plaintiff in the port of Huelva in Spain. The Limerick was leaving the port in charge of the plaintiff, and by his default ran into and damaged the Skitty Belle. The plaintiff admitted in cross-examination that if anybody on board his ship was wrong, he was wrong. The plaintiff did not communicate with his owners before giving the bond. The material parts of the bond were as follows:—

British Consulate, Huelva.

Agreement between Sheriff Hopkins, master of the S.S. Limerick on behalf of the owners, underwriters, and all others concerned in the said vessel, and Mr. William Rees, master of the brigantine Skitty Belle, of Swansea, for and on behalf of the owner and all others concerned in the said brigantine.

Mr. Sheriff Hopkins acknowledging, as he does by these presents, the liability of the said steamship Limerick to the payment of the damages, losses, detentions, costs, and expenses sustained by the brigantine Skitty Belle, in consequence of her being run into by the said steamship Limerick under his command, hereby binds himself, owners, underwriters, and all others concerned in his said vessel to the payment of the said damages, losses, costs, detentions, and expenses in the manner and with the conditions hereinafter stated, viz.:

1. Mr. William Rees, master of the Skitty Belle, will cause such temporary repairs to be done to this vessel at this port as to put her, in the opinion of surveyors, in a seaworthy state to proceed on her intended voyage to the port of Liverpool. (Then followed various provisions as to the full repairs and payment therefor.) . . .

6. On signing these presents, Mr. Sheriff Hopkins will be at liberty to proceed with the said steamship Limerick on her intended voyage without any further hindrance or detention on the part of the owners, masters, or others, concerned in the Skitty Belle.

For the faithful performance of the foregoing agreement, Mr. Sheriff Hopkins binds himself, the owners of the steamship Limerick, and all others concerned, in the penal sum of 200*l.* to be paid unto the owner or owners of the said Skitty Belle, his or their executors, administrators, or assigns.

This done, sealed, and executed at Huelva, on this 6th day of April 1875. (Signed) S. Hopkins.
W. Rees.

Before me (Signed) Edward Diaz, British Vice-Consul.

The registrar made his report on the 16th Feb. 1876, and found that the said sum of 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* was recoverable by the plaintiff, and allowed that amount in the schedule to the report, and as to the bond for 200*l.* and the right of the plaintiff to priority, he found as follows:

"I am also of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to have the sum of 200*l.* retained in court to answer any claim that may be established against him under the bond given by him in respect of the collision between the Limerick and the Skitty Belle. I am further of opinion that the plaintiff in this cause is entitled to payment of the amount found due to him out of the proceeds of sale of the vessel Limerick that may be now remaining in court in priority to all other claims."

On the 23rd Feb. 1876, the defendant gave notice of objection to this report, and in due course filed his petition in objection to the report, and amongst other things alleged as follows:—

4. The defendant objects to the said report in so far as it finds that the plaintiff is entitled to have the sum of 200*l.* retained in court to answer any claim that may be established against the plaintiff under the bond given by him in respect of the collision between the Limerick and the Skitty Belle, upon the grounds that such bond was given by the plaintiff without authority from or due communication with the owner of the Limerick, that the plaintiff himself was at the time of the collision conducting the navigation of the Limerick, and that he was personally liable in respect of the damage done to the Skitty Belle by reason of the said collision at the time when he executed the said bond.

5. And the defendant also objects to the said report in so far as the same allows to the plaintiff by item fifty-four of the schedule thereto the sum of 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, in respect of a claim by Dowson and Worth, shipwrights, upon the ground that such sum never was claimed of the plaintiff by the said Dowson and Worth, and that the plaintiff never was liable to the said Dowson and Worth in respect of the said claim.

The plaintiff's solicitor, in the answer to this petition, alleged, among other things:—

2. The bond referred to in the fourth article of the petition was given on behalf of the owners of the Limerick by the plaintiff, acting under the advice of the British Consul at Huelva, in Spain, where the collision occurred, and for the best interests of the owner of the Limerick, in order to prevent her arrest and detention in the port of Huelva, and consequent losses and expenses, and loss of freight, and was, as they submit, within the scope of the plaintiff's authority. The act of the plaintiff in giving this bond was approved and ratified by Frederick Ireland, the then managing owner of the Limerick. Insurances had been effected by the said Frederick Ireland for and on behalf of the owners of the Limerick against loss by collision, and the amount of the said bond has been or might have been recovered from the underwriters of the said insurances for the benefit of those interested in the Limerick.

3. They deny the plaintiff was personally liable in respect of the damage done to the Skitty Belle by reason of the collision referred to in the fourth article of the petition.

4. They say that Dowson and Worth have claimed of the plaintiff the sum allowed in item fifty-four of the Registrar's report, and they submit to the court whether the plaintiff is liable or not in respect of the said claim.

The defendants denied the allegations of the answer, and the pleadings were concluded.

March 21, 1876.—E. C. Clarkson for the defendant, in objection.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the plaintiff.

Sir R. Phillimore.—I am asked to overrule the decision of the Registrar on two points in this case. One is as to a sum of money due to Messrs. Dowson and Worth of 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, which the registrar has allowed, I understand, on the ground that it is at least doubtful whether the master be not liable to those who furnished the articles for the benefit of the ship, and I think it doubtful in spite of the argument which has been addressed to me. I think it is very possible myself that the master may be found liable for the 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, to Dowson and Worth; at all events it is a question as to which I should be sorry to give an off-hand opinion upon. But I think the justice and equity of the case will be answered by allowing the mortgagee to have the 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, upon his giving security that if the master be found liable for this sum he will be repaid. That seems to me to be a fair proposition, and I think the same principle applies to the other item. The bond given by the master for 200*l.* in respect of the collision between the Limerick and the Skitty Belle falls under the category of those cases decided in this court, where a master, acting bonâ fide for the purpose of getting his ship out of arrest in a foreign country, has always been upheld. He may or may not be personally liable under this bond, but I think that what he did was for the benefit of the owners, and I think it would be a harsh thing to compel him to pay, although the bond was given in his name as well as in that of the owners; it would be a harsh thing to deprive him of a lien he would otherwise have on the ship. But I do not see what harm will happen if the 200*l.* is paid out of court upon security being given to cover it if he should be made liable.

The minute of the order made upon this judgment as entered in the registry was as follows:—

The judge, having heard counsel on both sides, adjourned for a fortnight for further consideration of the objection to the registrar's report in this cause, for the purpose of allowing the defendant to give within fourteen days if he shall think fit a valid guarantee to secure the plaintiff in respect of the sum of 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, claimed by Messrs. Dowson and Worth, being item No. 54 in the schedule annexed to the said report, and in respect of costs, if he shall be sued for the same, and also in respect of any claim that may be established against the plaintiff under or in consequence of the bond for 200*l.* given by him, and referred to in item No. 50 of the schedule to the said report.

The defendant, however, declined to give security, and was desirous of appealing, whereupon the judge, on the 4th April 1876, made an order confirming the registrar's report as to the two items above mentioned, as well as other matters not material, and pronounced the sum found by the report to be due to the plaintiff, and condemned the proceeds of the vessel Limerick therein.

May 3, 1876.—From this order the defendant now appealed.

E. C. Clarkson, for the appellant.—The master was himself a wrongdoer in respect of this collision, and cannot claim contribution from his owners in respect of his own wrongful act. Moreover, he was bound himself personally by the bond, and is in consequence a principal. As to Dowson and Worth's claim, credit was not given to the master, and he is not liable.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondent.—The bond was given bonâ fide by the master to release the ship when there was urgent necessity to do so, therefore the master must be taken to have acted with authority and on behalf of his owners. If he did so act his owners cannot, we submit, set up that he was personally liable, and if they cannot, how can the mortgagee do it? The act of the master in giving the bond was the best thing he could do for his owners. As to the claim of Dowson and Worth, the master having given the order, was jointly liable with the owners, and the material men had an option as to whom they might sue, and they have elected to claim from the master. The master possibly had no implied authority to charge his owners for necessaries supplied in a home port, but here there was express authority, because he was taken to the shipwrights by the managing agent of the ship:

Mitcheson v. Oliver, 5 Ell. & Bl. 419.

James, L.J.—On the first point the objection must fail as to the allowance of 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* in respect of the repairs. The Judge of the Admiralty Division came to a right conclusion with regard to that. The plaintiff is liable to Dowson and Worth if it was a debt contracted under such circumstances as to enable the shipwrights to elect whom they would sue, the owners or the master; and I am of opinion that it was such a debt.

With regard to the other point it stands upon the evidence and the statement of the captain and in the bond itself, that it was entirely due to his own negligence that the collision happened, and that he was the wrongdoer. It is impossible upon any principle to say that an agent can charge as a disbursement against his principal the money which he has made himself liable to pay by reason of his own wrong. It was his duty to remedy the mischief, and if he does pay the money under a bond it is impossible to allow him to recover the sum against his principal as a disbursement for the ship in order to cure a mischief which he himself has brought about.

Baggallay, J.A.—I am of the same opinion.

Lush, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with my lords on the first point. As to the second point contended for by the plaintiff, that the giving the bond was the best thing to do for the owners, as it extricated the ship from a difficulty, the master was bound to do the best for the owners, and he would have incurred greater liability the longer he kept the ship there; but although it was done for the benefit of his owners that does not give him a charge against them for money paid in respect of any liability he incurred in consequence of his own wrongful acts. The negligence is an admission by the master himself, and he might have been re-examined on the matter: but it is left nakedly as he gave it on his cross-examination. It is clear that the master cannot charge as a disbursement against his principal an expense which he incurred by his own wrongful act.

Appeal allowed as to the 200*l.*, and disallowed as to the 102*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.*, and without costs.

Consignment to be shipped in one of two months—Material part shipped in neither of the two months—Refusing to accept—Whether refusal to accept justified—Time for delivery.

The plaintiff agreed to sell, and the defendant to buy, 600 tons of rice, "to be shipped in the months of March and/or April." About 8000 bags were put on board in February, and about 50 bags in March, whereupon the defendant refused to accept:

Held, that the shipment was not a March shipment, and that the defendant's refusal to accept was justified.

Alexander v. Vandersee (L. Rep., C. P., 530.) distinguished.

This was an action for the non-acceptance of 600 tons of rice. The rice had been sold by the plaintiffs to the defendants by two contracts, dated March 17 and March 24 respectively. Both these contracts stipulated that the rice was to be "shipped at Madras or coast for this port during the months of March and/or April 1874, per Rajah of Cochin." The rice was shipped in 8200 bags, all of which, except about 50, were put on board before the 1st March. Bills of lading were given as follows:

February	23	1780 bags.
,,	24	1780 bags.
,,	28	3560 bags.
March	3	1080 bags.

The ship sailed on the 10th March, but the defendants having refused to accept the cargo, this action was brought.

The case was tried before Brett, J. and a special jury, at the Michaelmas Sittings 1875, when the jury found that the cargo was a shipment in March and/or April, in the ordinary business sense of the terms.

April 25.—Benjamin, Q.C. (with him Gainsford Bruce), moved to enter judgment for the defendants, pursuant to leave reserved. He cited

Alexander v. Vandersee, L. Rep. 7 C. P. 530.

Cohen, Q.C. and J. C. Matthew, argued for the plaintiffs. Cur. adv. vult.

April 26.—The court delivered oral judgment as follows:

Blackburn, J.—We have considered this case since the argument, and have come to the conclusion that judgment ought to be entered for the defendants. It appears that the defendants had entered into two contracts to take 600 tons of rice, to be shipped during march or April. The result of that contract is, that if the rice had been shipped during either of the agreed months, the defendant would have been bound to accept it, otherwise not. The question therefore is, whether or not there was a shipment during those months. Now we are met at the outset by Alexander v. Vandersee (L. Rep. 7 C. P. 530), decided by the Exchequer Chamber. This case, of course, is binding on us here, but I take it to be distinguishable. The facts of it were these: The defendant contracted for the purchase of a large quantity of Danubian maize for shipment in June $\frac{\text{and}}{\text{or}}$ July 1869. In fulfilment of this contract, two cargoes of maize were tendered to the defendant, the bills of lading for which were dated the 4th and 6th June 1869. The loading of these two cargoes was commenced on the 12th and 16th May, and completed on the 4th and 6th June. More than half of each cargo was put on board in May. It was left to the jury to say whether the cargoes were "June shipments" in the ordinary sense of the term, and they found that they were. The majority of the court held, affirming the decision below, that the verdict was rightly entered for the plaintiff, and also that the question was one for the jury. Now what are the undisputed facts here? Three parcels, amounting in the whole to nine-tenths of the cargo, were shipped in February, and the bill of lading in respect of those parcels was signed in February. So far as these parcels are concerned, there was in every sense a complete shipment. With respect to the remaining parcel, the shipment of that was not completed till the 3rd March. If all the parcels had been dealt with in a manner similar to this last a question might have arisen how far Vandersee v. Alexander (ubi sup.), would apply. But it does not become necessary to consider this question. The defendant agreed to take 600 tons in March or April; such a contract is not answered by the delivery of 15 tons in March and 185 in February.

Lutscher v. Comptoir D'Escompte de Paris.

Advances upon cargoes to be shipped—Bills drawn and documents hypothecated—Equitable title of agent of sale.

Plaintiff had arranged with a merchant in Africa that the latter should purchase articles of produce and ship them for sale in this country by the plaintiff upon commission, plaintiff allowing the African merchant to draw upon him in order to purchase the articles, and the documents of title of the shipments being hypothecated to the plaintiff so as to enable him to provide funds to meet the bills drawn upon him. The day after the shipment of a cargo under this arrangement, the African merchant stopped payment, and his liquidator gave the bill of lading to the defendants with instructions not to part with it unless paid the value of the cargo. On action brought to recover back the value paid by the plaintiff under protest, and damages for the detention of the bill of lading:

Held, upon demurrer that the plaintiff had an equitable title to the bill of lading under the arrangement, and that the action was maintainable.

This was a demurrer to the following statement of claim:

1. The plaintiff is a merchant and carries on business at 8, Austin Friars, London.

2. The defendants are bankers carrying on business at 144, Leadenhall-street, London.

3. During and since the month of April 1875, the plaintiff has had consigned to him by Mr. Louis Levy, a merchant, carrying on business at Oran, in Africa, cargoes of palm leaves and other produce, upon the terms mentioned in the next paragraph.

4. In order to place the said Mr. Levy in funds for the purchase of the said produce, the plaintiff agreed to allow him to draw upon the plaintiff's said firm. The said Mr. Levy was to make purchases in Africa of the said produce and ship the same to the plaintiff. The plaintiff agreed to effect sales in this country of such shipments, charging a commission thereupon. The documents of title of such shipments were hypothecated to the plaintiff so as to enable him to provide funds to meet the bills drawn by the said Mr. Levy.

5. On the 27th May 1875, the plaintiff, at the request of the said Mr. Levy, and in pursuance of the said agreement set out in the 4th paragraph, contracted with the Tovil Paper Company (Limited) carrying on business at Maidstone, in Kent, to sell to them 250 tons of palm leaves at 3*l.* per ton free on board in Oran, payment to be by acceptance of the buyers at three months on delivery of the bill of lading. The cargo to be shipped by vessel chartered by the buyers to arrive at Oran aforesaid not latter than 31st Oct. 1875.

6. The said Mr. Levy having drawn upon the plaintiff in pursuance of the said agreement set out in the 4th paragraph was enabled to purchase, and did, in fact, purchase 250 tons of palm leaves, and the same were shipped on board the steamship Sydenham, chartered by the said Tovil Paper Company (Limited), the loading of the cargo being entirely completed on the 22nd Oct. 1875.

7. The bill of lading was, on the 22nd Oct. 1875, duly signed and handed by the captain of the steamship Sydenham to the said Mr. Levy, and the plaintiff alleges that the same should have been transmitted to the plaintiff by the said Mr. Levy in order to put the plaintiff in funds to meet drafts of the said Mr. Levy upon the plaintiff under the agreement aforesaid.

8. Upon the 23rd Oct. 1875, the said Mr. Levy stopped payment and his affairs were placed in liquidation. The liquidator having obtained possession of the said bill of lading instructed the Bank of Algiers to transmit it to their correspondents in London, who are the defendants, with directions not to part with the same until they were paid the sum of 538*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*, the alleged value of the cargo of 250 tons of palm leaves.

9. Upon the 4th Nov. 1875, the plaintiff, having paid the drafts of the said Mr. Levy to a large amount, which amount is still due to the plaintiff, applied to the defendants for the bill of lading, but was informed of the instructions they had received. The plaintiff claimed the bill of lading under his said agreement with the said Mr. Levy, but the defendants refused to part with same unless they were paid the sum of 538*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*

10. The plaintiff, on the 8th Nov. 1875 under protest paid to the defendants the sum of 538*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*, and obtained the said bill of lading.

They then handed over the bill of lading to the said Tovil Paper Company (Limited) in performance of the contract aforesaid.

11. The plaintiff alleges that the defendants improperly withheld from the plaintiff the said bill of lading to which the plaintiff was entitled under the said agreement with the said Mr. Levy.

The plaintiff claims: First, the payment of 538*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* and interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. from the 8th Nov. 1875 until judgment; secondly, 250*l.* damages for the detention of the bill of lading; thirdly, such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

The following was the second paragraph of the statement of defence:

The defendants demur to the plaintiff's statement of claim and say that the same is bad in law on the ground that it shows no legal title in the plaintiff to the bill of lading in question, and that the mere breach of an agreement on the part of Mr. Levy (assuming that it applied to the cargo in question, which is not alleged) gave no legal title to the bill of lading as against the liquidator or the defendants under the circumstances mentioned in the plaintiff's statement of claim, so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover the money claimed; and on other grounds in law sufficient to sustain the demurrer.

The following were the plaintiff's points of argument: First, the statement of claim shows a legal title in the plaintiff to the bill of lading; secondly, the statement of claim shows an equitable title in the plaintiff to the bill of lading; thirdly, the statement of claim shows that the assignee of Mr. Levy took the bill of lading subject to its previous hypothecation to the plaintiff, and the defendants as agents of the assignee can have no better title; fourthly, the plaintiff has a legal title to the 538*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*; fifthly, the plaintiff has an equitable title to the 538*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.*

The following were the defendants' points: The defendants contend that the statement of claim does not show such a title in the plaintiff to the bill of lading and such a wrongful detention thereof by the defendants from him as entitles him to recover back the money paid to obtain possession of the document. That there was no hypothecation of the document by Mr. Levy so as to pass the property in it to the plaintiff. That the mere breach of an agreement on the part of Mr. Levy, assuming that it applied to the cargo in question (which is not alleged), gave no title to the plaintiff, after Levy's affairs were placed in liquidation, to have the bill of lading delivered up to him without payment of the value of the cargo. That the mere fact of the plaintiff having paid the drafts of Mr. Levy, and Mr. Levy having become indebted to the plaintiff, gave him no legal right to the bill of lading so as to support this action.

Holl argued for the defendants.—The facts stated put the plaintiff's claim within the decision of Chinnock v. Sainsbury (6 Jur. N. S. 1318). That was a demurrer to a bill in equity which prayed substantially, as was held by the Master of the Rolls, for the specific performance of a contract of agency; in consideration of the plaintiffs (auctioneers) having advanced to the defendant a sum of money, the defendant agreed in writing to deposit with them for sale the whole of his collection of pictures, &c., upon the understanding that the amount of advances and the commission were to be deducted from the proceeds of the sale. The defendant deposited only a portion of the collection which, however, the plaintiffs proceeded to sell, but it realised a very much smaller sum than was anticipated; in fact not more than half the amount of the advances. The defendant refused to deposit for sale the remaining portion of the collection, and the plaintiffs filed their bill for specific performance of the agreement. The demurrer to this bill was allowed. The Master of the Rolls considered that "the object of the bill was to have it declared that the property not delivered to the plaintiffs is a security for the amount advanced upon the property which was handed over to them. On the facts of the case, I am of opinion that the 1500*l.* was not advanced on the security of the property not deposited with the plaintiffs; the property was handed over at different times, and there was no refusal on the part of the plaintiffs to advance the money until the whole collection was deposited. It must therefore be assumed that they were satisfied with the security offered by the amount deposited with them. I am of opinion, therefore, that no case has been made out for enforcing the contract in this court. The plaintiffs must proceed at law to ascertain what is due to them on account of the loan and commission, and for the damages which they have sustained." The plaintiff has the same remedy in this case, but he cannot be held to have met the bills drawn by Levy on the security of this cargo of which the bill of lading had not been deposited with him.

Benjamin, Q.C. (with him Anderson), for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff had a sufficient equitable title to this bill of lading, on the agreement alleged, to support his claim in this action. Chinnock v. Sainsbury is cited and discussed in Fisher on Mortgages. The effect of it is stated in these words (sect. 3): "A mere contract to deposit property for sale, and out of the proceeds to pay advances made by the intended depositee will not amount to a security, if it appear that the advances were not in fact made on the security of the property, but will be treated only as a contract to make a deposit." Here, however, it appears that plaintiff's advances were in fact made on the security of these hypothecations, and that the agreement was to give plaintiff a lien upon each cargo shipped. Mr. Fisher, in treating of Agency Liens, says in sect. 201: "An agent who has advanced money or incurred liability on account of his principal is protected by a lien on the property in respect of which the advances were made, or on the produce of the sale of it. An army agent, therefore, in respect of his advances to an officer for his outfit, has a lien on the purchase-money of his commission; and a person who has carried on trade for another, upon the stock and debts, of which he may restrain the assignees in bankruptcy of his principal from taking possession. An agreement that the lender of money shall be employed to sell, and shall be repaid out of the proceeds of goods expected to be purchased, there being no contract for the purchase of such goods, will not however give him a lien upon goods which are afterwards purchased and sent, but were not paid for with the money advanced." The authority for the last-mentioned instance, Deane v. Byrnes (13 W. R. 299), does not apply to this case, for here the purchase was completed with the money drawn by Levy upon the plaintiff. This is a case within the application of Bristow v. Whitmore (9 H. of L. Cas. 391). [Cockburn, C.J.—How can the defendants contend that this is not an equitable lien which the plaintiff possesses over the bill of lading?]

Holl, in reply.—The statement of claim does not make it clear that the cargo was purchased by plaintiff's advances, nor that this bill of lading would have been hypothecated to the plaintiff if Levy had not stopped payment. [Cockburn, C.J.—The facts may be loosely stated, but the effect is to make the case in my opinion too clear for argument]. At all events Chinnock v. Sainsbury is an authority distinctly in the defendants' favour.

Cockburn, J,—I think upon the statement of claim there can be no question that this cargo of 250 tons of palm leaves was shipped under the agreement stated between Levy and the plaintiff, that Levy had drawn upon plaintiff for the funds to purchase the cargo, and that in pursuance of the agreement the bill of lading ought to have been hypothecated to plaintiff as the security upon which he allowed Levy to draw upon him. This being so, the plaintiff was entitled at least in equity to be paid his advances out of the value of the cargo shipped under his agreement with Levy.

Fisher v. Smith.

Marine insurance — Shipowner and insurance broker—Broker employing a sub-agent—Lien of sub-agent for premiums paid by him—Principal and agent—Notice.

The plaintiff, a shipowner, who had, on several occasions during three years previously, employed S. and Co. as insurance brokers, to effect marine insurances for him, authorised them to effect an insurance for him on a cargo by a ship of his, which they accordingly did through the sub-agency of the defendant, also an insurance broker, who paid the premiums on the policies, and who had on previous occasions, by the instructions of S. and Co., effected policies for the plaintiff and other persons. The defendant had notice throughout that S. and Co. were acting as brokers, and that the plaintiff was their principal; but the plaintiff did not know, until after the policies had been effected, that they had been effected through the defendant, or by any other person than S. and Co. The plaintiff, who had monthly accounts with S. and Co. in such matters, paid them, in due and usual course of business between them, their monthly accounts, in which, in usual course, they debited him with the amount of the premiums on the policies in question, but he neither asked for nor received the policies at that time. The defendant, who was aware of the course of dealing between the plaintiff and Skinner and Co., paid the premiums in usual course to the underwriters on effecting the policies, and, in accordance with the usual course of business between him and S. and Co., sent a debit note of such premiums to S. and Co., with whom he had monthly accounts for insurances effected by him under their instructions for the plaintiff and other persons; but he kept the policies in his own hands, as was his usual practice, until the premiums should be repaid him by S. and Co. He subsequently delivered his monthly account to S. and Co., which included, among other items, the premiums on the policies in question, but S. and Co. never settled such account, or repaid him the premiums paid by him as above mentioned.

A loss having occurred, the plaintiff brought an action of detinue for the policies against the defendant, who, in answer thereto, set up a lien on the policies for the premiums paid by him upon them, and it was Held by the Exchequer Division (Kelly, C.B., and Cleasby, B.), that the defendant had no such lien, the relation and course of dealing between the parties creating no liability as between the plaintiff and the defendant, and that the contract between S. and Co. and the defendant and the liability arising therefrom were confined to themselves alone, and its effect clearly was that the defendant should look to S. & Co. alone for repayment of the premiums advanced by him to the underwriters.

Westwood v. Bell and another (4 Camp. 349) distinguished.

This is an action of detinue to recover four policies of marine insurance effected upon a cargo of steel rails, per steamer E. S. Milligan, and money payable upon accounts, for money lent and money received for the use of the plaintiff, and for interest, and for moneys due on accounts stated, and the amount claimed as damages is 3200*l.*

The defendant pleaded a denial of the detinue of the said policies, or any of them; and, secondly, a denial of the plaintiff's property in the policies; and, thirdly, that he had a lien on them for premiums paid by him as an insurance broker upon and for the said policies respectively of the plaintiff, and at his request, which premiums remained due and payable by the plaintiff to the defendant during the said detention; and, fourthly, a general lien of the defendant for money due by the plaintiff to the defendant as insurance broker for effecting the said policies and other policies as such broker, and for money paid for premiums on the said policies, and other policies effected by the defendant as such insurance broker for the plaintiff; and fifthly, sixthly, and seventhly, to the remaining counts, never indebted, payment, and set-off.

The plaintiff replied by taking and joining issue on the above several pleas.

The cause came on to be tried before Archibald, J. and a common jury at the last spring assizes for Gloucestershire, held at Gloucester, when a verdict was taken by consent for the plaintiff for the damages in the declaration and 40*s.* costs of suit, subject to the opinion of the court upon the following Case.

1. The plaintiff is a shipowner and merchant at Barrow-in-Furness, at Lancashire, and sole shipper at that place for the steel rails of the Barrow Hematite Steel Company, which company carries on its business also in Barrow-in-Furness, and are the only manufacturers of steel rails there.

The defendant is an insurance broker carrying on business at Liverpool in connection with W. H. Brand.

2. On or about the 19th July 1874, the plaintiff authorised Messrs. Skinner and Co., who are insurance brokers at Barrow-in-Furness, to effect marine insurances to the amount of 4000*l.* on part of a cargo of steel rails from Barrow to St. John's, New Brunswick, per ship Eliza S. Milligan, provided they could effect such insurances at 40*s.* per centum.

3. On the 1st Aug. 1874, the plaintiff received from Messrs. Skinner and Co. a covering note, of which the following is a copy:

W. J. SKINNER AND CO.
FREDERICK EVANS.

The letters "f. p. a.," "f. g. a.," and "f. c. and s.," meaning "from particular average," "foreign general average," and "free from capture and seizure," refer to known clauses or conditions which were to be among the terms of the policies. The deduction of 10 per cent. in the amount of the premium represents the annual underwriter's discount, and the signature "Frederick Evans" to the said note is the signature of the clerk in the employ of Skinner and Co., who made out the note.

4. The plaintiff had employed Skinner and Co., as insurance brokers, to effect policies of marine insurance on cargoes of steel rails for about three years. There are no underwriters in Barrow, and Skinner and Co. effected such insurances in Liverpool or London, either directly with the underwriters or through other insurance brokers in those towns.

5. The plaintiff generally knew the name of any insurance office with which Skinner and Co. effected policies without the intervention of any broker, and in the present case had been informed, before receiving the covering note, that the policies which Skinner and Co. were authorised to effect, as above stated, had been effected through Brand and the defendant.

6. The course of business between the plaintiff and Skinner and Co., which was the usual course of business in the trade, was for that firm to make out and deliver to the plaintiff, on the 8th day of each month, an account, debiting him with the sums of money due and payable by him to Skinner and Co. in respect of premiums, brokerage, and other charges in relation to policies of insurance effected by Skinner and Co. for the plaintiff in the course of the month then preceding, and for the plaintiff thereupon to pay the amount of such account by his bills of exchange for the amount at one month's date; and such course of business had been regularly followed, and all such monthly accounts had been duly paid and settled up to and including that for July 1874, which was delivered and paid early in August.

7. Of this account the first two items of the date of 4th Aug. were in respect of premiums for policies of insurance to the amount of 3750*l.*, in respect of the before-mentioned cargo per ship Eliza S. Milligan. On the 5th Sept. 1874, the plaintiff paid and settled such account with Skinner and Co., by his bill at one month, which said bill was duly honoured and paid. And the plaintiff is in no way indebted to Skinner and Co. on such or any other account, and all accounts between them have been long since settled.

8. The plaintiff did not demand of Skinner and Co. the policies of insurance until after the 13th Aug. 1874, when an average loss accrued in respect of the said cargo of the Eliza S. Milligan, and thereupon the plaintiff required possession of the said policies for the purpose of recovering the amount due in respect thereof. Three of these policies were at that time in the possession of the defendant, under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned. The fourth policy has never been in the defendant's hands, and as to that policy no question arises.

9. No communication had, up to that time, passed between the plaintiff and the defendant, or Brand, nor did the plaintiff know that Skinner and Co. had not paid the premium on the policies, but when the plaintiff required the policies he found that the three above mentioned were in the possession of the defendant. He thereupon demanded them from him, but the defendant refused to give them up, on the ground of a lien for unpaid premiums, he having effected the policies under the circumstances hereinafter mentioned.

10. Skinner and Co., immediately upon receiving instructions from the plaintiff to procure insurances upon the cargo of the Eliza S. Milligan, as before set forth, communicated by letter, addressed to W. H. Brand, at Liverpool, requesting him to procure the said insurances. The defendant answered the letter in his own name, and Skinner and Co. continued the correspondence, sometimes addressing Brand and sometimes addressing the defendant by name. Ultimately the insurances in question were effected by the defendant at the request of Skinner and Co.

11. The defendant sent debit notes of the premiums paid in respect of such policies to Skinner and Co., and also forwarded to Skinner and Co. copies of the said policies, and such copies were received from the defendant on the 5th Aug. 1874. A duplicate of one of such copies accompanies and forms part of this case. The 2½ per cent. mentioned in the note at the foot of the copies of the policies represents one moiety of the brokerage of 5*l.* per cent. allowed by the underwriters, and the 10 per cent. represents the usual discount allowed by all underwriters to brokers, and the brokers to merchants. (a)

12. Skinner and Co. have effected various policies of marine insurance through the said W. H. Brand and the defendant during the course of six months, or thereabouts, upon the terms of sharing equally the brokerage fee of 5*l.* per cent. in respect of the premiums payable on such policies; and the course of business was for the said W. H. Brand, or the defendant, to effect the policy with the underwriters, and procure and deliver to Skinner and Co. copies of the policies, and also to send to Skinner and Co. a debit note of the premiums paid, and at the commencement of each month to make out and deliver to Skinner and Co. an account debiting them with the money due in respect of the premiums paid on the several insurances effected for them during the month then preceding, and on the 10th of each month the account of premiums paid on the preceding month was paid.

13. It was not the usual practice for the defendant or Brand to part with the original stamped policies to Skinner and Co. until the premiums were received from Skinner and Co.

14. The defendant sent to Skinner and Co. during the first week in August the usual monthly account for such premiums due for the month of July 1874, and inserted in such account, as the two last items in point of date, 26*l.* 7*s.* and 26*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.*, premiums due and payable in respect of the policies effected upon the said cargo of the Eliza S. Milligan. Upon examination of such account Skinner and Co. objected to such account as incorrect, on the ground that such last items ought not to have been introduced until the account for the next month (August). The defendant admitted such objection to be valid; the account for the month of July was corrected accordingly, and paid.

15. Early in September, 1874, the defendant delivered the usual monthly account of the sums due and payable in respect of premiums paid during the month of August, including the two items mentioned in the last paragraph, and transferred from the prior account as before mentioned, but Skinner and Co. have not paid such account. The defendant detains the three policies in dispute; first, on the ground of a lien for the unpaid premiums on the policies; secondly, on the ground of a general lien for unpaid premiums on other policies effected under similar circumstances for the benefit of the plaintiff, upon instructions received from Skinner and Co.

16. The defendant had notice throughout the transaction that Skinner and Co. were acting as brokers, and that the plaintiff was their principal.

17. The premiums paid by the defendant on the three policies detained by him and still owing to him, amount to 52*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* The premiums paid by the defendant on other policies effected by him for the benefit of the plaintiff on the instructions of Skinner and Co., under similar circumstances to those stated above, and still owing to him, amount to a much larger sum.

It is agreed between the parties that the pleadings in this action on both sides shall form part of the special case, also that the court be at liberty to draw any inferences or find any fact which in the opinion of the court a jury ought to have drawn or found.

The questions for the opinion of the court are, first, whether the defendant was entitled to retain the said policies of insurance as against the plaintiff in respect of a lien for the premiums on those policies; secondly, whether he was entitled to retain the said policies in respect of a general lien for the unpaid premiums upon the other policies mentioned in the 15th paragraph of this case.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative on both questions, the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendant generally, with costs. If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative on the first question only, a verdict is to be entered for the defendant with costs, except on the 1st, 2nd, and 10th pleas, on which a verdict is to be entered for the plaintiff. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative on both questions, the verdict entered for the plaintiff is to stand for 3000*l.* with costs, to be reduced to 40*s.* upon the three policies in the defendant's possession being given up to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff's points for argument:—First, that there was no privity of contract between the plaintiff and the defendant under the circumstances stated in the case out of which any lien, either general or specific, could arise in respect of the premiums on the policies effected through the defendant, by Skinner and Co. Secondly, that Skinner and Co. were the defendant's agents to receive the amount of the premiums, and the plaintiff has paid Skinner and Co. the whole of such amount. Thirdly, that the defendant, with a knowledge that Skinner and Co. were only brokers, and were acting for the plaintiff, allowed the plaintiff to pay the premiums to them, and settle his accounts with them on that footing. Fourthly, that the defendant has waved his lien as against the plaintiff. Fifthly, that the defendant elected to take the exclusive liability of Skinner and Co. for the premiums. Sixthly, that Skinner and Co. have paid the defendants the premiums in respect of the policies claimed.

The defendant's points for argument:—First, that the defendant, having effected the policies sued for in this action, and paid the premiums thereon in his business of an insurance broker, has a lien upon such policies for the premiums so paid, as against everybody otherwise having a right to the possession of such policies. Secondly, that the defendant has such a lien, notwithstanding that the policies were effected through the instructions of Messrs. Skinner and Co., also insurance brokers, particularly as they knew that the policies were effected by the defendant as an insurance broker. Thirdly, that the first and second questions for the opinion of the court, and each of them, ought to be answered and decided in the affirmative.

Powell, Q C. (with whom was Pritchard), for the plaintiff.—The question in substance is whether the plaintiff having employed Skinner and Co., as his brokers, and paid them every penny they were entitled to, and Skinner and Co. having employed the defendant as their agent in the matter, and not having paid him, the defendant as such sub-agent, and knowing all the facts at the time, can recover from the plaintiffs the moneys which Skinner and Co. ought to have paid, but failed to pay him. The principle with regard to the employment of a sub-agent is clearly laid down in Story on Agency, paragraphs 387 and 388 (8th edit., p. 474). The case is defective in not stating whether or not the plaintiff knew of the employment of the sub-agent, before or at the time the policies were effected. The case of Power and another v. Butcher and another (10 B. and C. 329), is an authority for the proposition that if a merchant directs a broker to insure and the broker does not pay the premium and the principal does, the broker can nevertheless recover it. This agrees with the rule as laid down in Arnould on Insurance, pp. 194-5-6, 4th edit., by Machlachlan.

H. Matthews, Q.C. (with him was J. O. Griffits, Q.C.) for the defendant, contra.—The first point is that the defendant had a lien on the policies for the amount of premiums paid by him upon them. In the face of the authorities a general lien is not here claimed or contended for; but as against the plaintiff a lien for all premiums paid in respect of these particular policies. The defendant here is within the rule of law stated and assigned and laid down in Maans v. Henderson and others (1 East, 336), and having paid these premiums, he has a lien for them on the policies on which they were so paid. [KELLY, C.B.—Is there not a distinction that in that case the third person was not, as here, a broker?] It is contended that no such distinction is known to the law: (Mann v. Forrester, 4 Campb. 60; Olive v. Smith (per Gibbs, C.J.), 5 Taunt. 56; 2 Rose 122.) The point is, not whether or not the plaintiff knew that the defendant acted as the broker, but it is that the defendant expended money on the policy the benefit of which the plaintiff claims, and can only claim with the burden of the lien on it: (Westwood v. Bell, 4 Campb. 349.) Had the defendant done anything to induce the plaintiff to pay Skinner and Co. it might have been considered a payment to the defendant, whose lien can only be so discharged: (Heald and others v. Kenworthy, 10 Ex. 739; 24 L.J. 76 Ex.) A sub-agent effecting an insurance has a lien on the policy for the premiums paid by him, even although he has no authority from the principal:

Westwood v. Bell, ubi sup.;
Lanyon v. Blanchard, 2 Camp. 597;
Story on Agency, s. 389;
1 Arnould Marine Insurance, p. 197.

The lien accrues for work done, whether he has the authority of the original principal or not. If he has none, the plaintiff is not entitled to the policy; if he takes up the policy, the principal ratifies his acts (per Gibbs, C.J. in Westwood v. Bell). The lien once attaching, attaches against all the world, and continues until it is discharged:

KELLY, C.B.—It is essentially necessary to look at the precise facts of the case when we are about to pronounce a decision upon it, because it will be found that they differ entirely from those in any of the cases which have been cited and so ably dealt with and relied on in the course of this argument by Mr. Matthews on behalf of the defendant.

Now, we find in the present case, as in every other case in which he had any dealings with Skinner and Co., with respect to their effecting policies of insurance for him, that the plaintiff contracted with them, and with them alone, and gave them no authority to employ a sub-agent or otherwise to act in the transactions which took place between them than on his behalf alone, and for themselves alone, to act, and alone to do the acts which they were employed by him to do in the matter. Moreover, it is perfectly clear that at the time of their employment, and at the time of the making of the policies, and indeed up to the time when the defendant actually effected them, and so, as between himself and the underwriters, entitled himself to the receipt and possession of the policies, the plaintiff had no knowledge that the defendant had been employed, and had given no authority, express or implied, to Skinner and Co., to employ him or any other person whatever, or, by delegating the authority conferred upon them by their contracts with the plaintiff, to compromise the latter's rights in any way, such, for instance, as his right to the possession of the policies.

And, in considering the employment of the defendant by Skinner and Co., it becomes a question, to which I will advert hereafter, what was the actual contract between them and the defendant?—whether, as between him and Skinner and Co., it conferred upon the defendant, either in its terms or its legal effect, any right whatever to claim a lien upon the policies which he should effect under that employment? And, as we are entitled to draw inferences from the facts stated in the case, I own the inference appears to me to be such as put an end to the lien which the defendant claims, and upon the grounds which I will afterwards state. To revert, however, at present to the facts.

It appears that the plaintiff, who was a shipowner, had on many occasions employed Skinner and Co. to effect policies of marine insurance on his behalf, and it likewise appears in paragraph 2 of the case that Skinner and Co., who were insurance brokers, were authorised by the plaintiff to effect insurances to the amount of 4000*l.* on the cargo in question; and it appears, moreover, that down to that time, although other transactions had taken place between them, the plaintiff had no knowledge that any of the many insurances effected for him by Skinner and Co. had been effected through the agency of any other persons or otherwise than by Skinner and Co. themselves. Then, it further appears by paragraph 3 that on the 1st Aug. 1874, Skinner and Co. having been authorised to effect these policies according to the usual course of business between them and the plaintiff, sent to the plaintiff the account of their claim in respect of the premiums thereon, amounting, less the usual discount of ten per cent., to 72*l.* 18*s.* (I need not go further into the account, which has been called the covering note); and this account was paid and settled by the plaintiff in the usual course by means of a bill payable at a month's date, which was duly met and paid at maturity. Now, thus far it appears that in this, as in numerous other transactions which had previously taken place, the plaintiff never directly or indirectly conferred any authority upon Skinner and Co. to employ any sub-agents, or to do otherwise than effect these insurances themselves. And, further, that until the insurances in question had been actually effected, the plaintiff did not even know that Skinner and Co. had employed the defendant or any other person in any one of these transactions.

Now, the contract between Skinner and Co. and the plaintiff, under which these insurances were effected by Skinner and Co. as insurance brokers, must be regulated and interpreted according to the course of dealing between the parties, which, and also the usual course of business in the trade, appears from paragraph 6 of the case to have been for Skinner and Co. to make out and deliver to the plaintiff on the 8th of each month an account debiting the latter with the sum of money due and payable by him to them in respect of premium, brokerage, and other charges in relation to policies effected by or through them for the plaintiff in the course of the then preceding month, and for the plaintiff to pay the amount of such account by bills at one month's date. And it is here that, exercising our power to draw inferences, when we find that this course of dealing was not only the course of business between Skinner and Co. and the plaintiff, but was the usual course of business in the trade, I draw the inference, and I entertain no doubt that the defendant perfectly well knew that that was the course of business between the parties, and that he therefore not only knew that the plaintiff was the principal in all these transactions, but that he also knew from the course of business between him and Skinner and Co., who were to effect the policies, that, whether Skinner and Co. should obtain them or not, or whether they should have effected the policies themselves, or through any other person, the premiums would be paid to them by the plaintiff on the 8th of the month succeeding that in which the policies should be effected. Then what follows? Such being the contract between the plaintiff and Skinner and Co, there was nothing pointing to any sub-agency, or to Skinner and Co. taking upon themselves to delegate the power received by them under their contract to any other person. Under these circumstances, without any authority from the plaintiff, or any knowledge on his part, Skinner and Co. effect the insurances through the medium and agency of the defendant. Then comes the question, what was the relation and what the contract between the defendant and Skinner and Co? If we look at the case, and bear in mind that it was (as appears by paragraph 6) the same course of dealing which prevails in the trade, then on looking at paragraphs 9, 10, and 11, we find, not merely that the same course of dealing existed between them, but that the defendant actually sent in his monthly account under this course of dealing to Skinner and Co, including, among other claims, claims for the premiums in question. I do not advert to the circumstances which may or may not bear materially upon any question arising in this case, that the plaintiff did not demand the policies until he had learned that a loss had taken place. It appears, and we know independently of any finding in the case before us, that it is the practice in many cases for the merchant to leave the policies in the hands of the insurance broker until the event of the voyage is known. If the ship arrives in safety the policy becomes of no value; but if a loss takes place the merchant applies for and obtains the policy from the insurance broker

We now come to the course of dealing between Skinner and Co. and the defendant, and the question is, what was the contract which we are to infer to have been made between Skinner and Co. and the defendant, with respect to any claim by the defendant as against Skinner and Co., or any body else, with respect to the amount of the premiums paid on effecting these policies? I do not hesitate to say that I find, as a fact, that the contract between Skinner and Co. and the defendant was confined to transactions between themselves and themselves alone, and that the effect of it was that the defendant should look to Skinner and Co. and to them alone for the repayment of the premiums which he should advance to the underwriters. If that be so it would be the common course, as between principal and factor, and sometimes between principal and insurance brokers, and, when the latter employ sub-agents, between them and such sub-agents, that the broker employed by the principal, looks to the principal, and to the principal only, for the amount of the premiums which he would be entitled to, and which would be paid upon the effecting of the policies, and that the sub-agent in any transaction of this nature looks solely and exclusively to the insurance broker who has employed him. Consequently, therefore, applying that course of dealing, and drawing the inferences therefrom, and from the facts of the case which we are entitled and authorised to draw, I am of opinion that the contract between Skinner and Co. and the defendant was that the defendant should look to Skinner and Co. alone for the repayment of any premiums advanced by him on effecting the policies. If that be so, then it is the not unusual case of a merchant or shipowner employing an insurance broker, and a contract being made between them, the liability arising out of that contract is confined to themselves, the two parties to the contract, the employment on the one side and the definitive execution of the work to be done on the other, and no question arises or can arise between the merchant and the sub-agent.

We have been referred to many cases and various authorities, and there may be general propositions stated in several of them which may seem to apply to a case like the present; but I do not see one of them in which the facts are the same or analogous to those in the present case. The only case at all like it, and on which Mr. Matthews, in his able argument, placed his principal reliance, is that of Westwood v. Bell and another (4 Camp. 349). There undoubtedly a sub-agent was held to be entitled to a lien as against the principal in respect of certain premiums which he had paid. But a distinction, and a marked and obvious one, between that case and the case now before the court is that in Westwood v. Bell and another the party there, the sub-agent, in the situation of the present defendant, did not know that there was any principal at all behind the person who had actually employed him in the business. The marginal note in that case is as follows: "If A. employs B. to effect a policy of insurance for his benefit, and B. without A.'s knowledge employs C. to effect the policy, representing himself, to C. as the principal, C. has a lien on the policy as against A, for the general balance due to him from B." The marginal note does not notice that the defendant not only was unaware that there was any principal behind his immediate employer, but believed that his immediate employer was himself the principal. It thus became the common case of one employing another to do a certain act in respect of which a liability arises, and when it turns out that the person who acted as and was believed to be the principal was only acting as the agent of another, then, if that other, the real original principal, adopts the act that has been done, he adopts the employment and takes the benefit of it, and must of course take it cum onere, and treat the sub-agent as an agent of his own. That rule was the ground of the decision, or rather it was that which pervaded the summing-up to the jury of the learned judge, Gibbs, C J.; in that case his Lordship (at p. 352 of 4 Campb.) said, "I am of opinion that the action cannot be maintained. I hold that if a policy of insurance is effected by a broker, in ignorance that it does not belong to the persons by whom he is employed, he has a lien upon it for the amount of the balance which they owe him." And so if the policies here had been effected by the defendant in ignorance that they were being effected for the plaintiff, and he had believed that his immediate employers, Skinner and Co., were themselves the principals in the transaction, no doubt Westwood v. Bell would then have applied. Gibbs, C.J., then proceeds: "In this case Clarkson" (now Clarkson in that case is the Skinner and Co. of the present one). "Clarkson misconducted himself, and is liable for not disclosing that he was a mere agent in the transaction; but the defendants, who had every reason to believe that he was the principal, are entitled to hold the policy, If goods are sold by a factor in his own name the purchaser has a right to set-off a debt due from him in an action by the principal, for the price of the goods. The factor may be liable to his employer for holding himself out as the principal; but that is not to prejudice the purchaser, who bonâ fide dealt with him as the owner of the goods, and gave him credit in that capacity." Now, is that so here? Did the defendant ever deal with the plaintiff as "the owner of the goods, and give him credit in that capacity?" The very reverse is the fact as it appears to me. The learned Chief Justice then goes on, "The lien of the policy broker rests on the same foundation. The only question is whether he knew, or had reason to believe that the person by whom he was employed was only an agent; and the party who seeks to deprive him of his lien must make out the affirmative. The employer is to be taken to be the principal until the contrary is proved. If the plaintiff's assent to the employment of Clarkson is denied, then he can have no right to the policy, and there is no privity between the parties. The argument about pledging the policy is fallacious. This never was a policy of the plaintiff's, which he held unencumbered and handed over to his agent. In its very origin and creation it was burthened with the lien." That would be so in the present case if the defendant had not known that the plaintiff was his principal, but had believed that Skinner and Co. were and had so dealt with them. "It never," Gibbs' C.J., goes on to say, "has been the plaintiff's for an instant, but subject to the lien which is now claimed. The rights of the parties do not stand on the same footing as if Clarkson had said he had authority to pledge the policy, but as if he had said; the goods to be insured are mine, the policy is for my benefit alone, and I agree that when it is effected it shall remain in your hands till the whole of the balance I owe you is satisfied; and on the strength of it you will continue to trust me.' If that had passed, can I say that the defendants are to be stripped of their right on account of a fact of which they had no knowledge, and that they are to deliver up to a stranger the policy which they have effected under a contract that they should hold it as a security for the balance due to them from their employer? Nor do the cases cited on the part of the plaintiff at all contradict the doctrine I am laying down. In Snook v. Davidson (2 Campb. 218), the person who employed the defendants to effect the policy, said that it was for a correspondent in the country. In Lanyon v. Blanchard (2 Camp. 519) likewise, the defendant must be taken to have had notice that the person who employed him was not the principal The representation made by Crowgy that he had authority to endorse the bill of lading was abundantly sufficient to show that he was only an agent, and I entirely subscribe to what Lord Ellenborough is there supposed to have laid down respecting the risk which the defendant ran in giving faith to that representation. The subsequent case of Mann v. Forrester (4 Campb. 60) is quite decisive. The doctrine stands upon authority as well as upon principle. I should have had no difficulty in determining the question were it entirely new; and I find myself strongly fortified by the opinions of other judges."

Now, in the case before us, this defendant had clear and express notice from beginning to end that Skinner and Co., who employed him, were not principals, but that, on the contrary, they were acting only for the plaintiff, and that the latter was the principal, with whom the defendant had no communication, and to whom he gave no notice of any claim, and with whom in fact he had no dealings at all until the present question arose upon, what we must assume to have taken place, the insolvency of Skinner and Co. Now the very foundation of the ruling of Gibbs, C.J., which I have quoted at length, and to which I entirely accede, was that the defendants there, the sub-agents, believed that they were dealing with the intermediate parties as principals, and had no knowledge that there was a real principal behind.

Under these circumstances, without adverting to the other cases which have been cited, on the one side or the other, no one of which is parallel in its circumstances with, or lays down any principle applicable to, this particular case, it appears to me that the present is not a case in which the sub-agent, the defendant, is entitled to the lien which he claims, and that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain an action for the policies, and that these policies were his, and that it makes no difference that they were procured, not by Skinner and Co. alone, but through the sub-agency of the defendant.

Upon these grounds, therefore, I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be in favour of the plaintiff.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion.

I do not think that it is intended at all to question the lien in general of an insurance broker actually effecting a policy and paying the premiums, as against any person desiring to avail himself of that policy by obtaining possession of it. It is, no doubt, as has been stated, a common practice for the broker who has actually communicated with the underwriters to retain the policy, and simply to settle for the matter and deduct his premium in that particular case, and any other premiums that he may have paid. The authorities seem to show that that is so, and we have to consider how far in the present case that course is modified by the circumstances.

Now here we have one transaction as between Skinner and Co. and the plaintiff, the amount insured being 4000*l.*, but as between Skinner and Co. and the defendant there were three separate transactions. In this case, therefore, we are asked to make the plaintiff, who was a party to only one transaction with Skinner and Co., a party to three different transactions with the defendant, so as to establish an account with him. And we are also asked to go further, and, although there is this one transaction between Skinner and Co. and the plaintiff, and, although that one transaction was settled by him according to the usual course of business, we are asked to say that he was unable to close it by a settlement with Skinner and Co. on the 5th Sept., according to the usual course of trade, and that he must be a party to I know not what number of other transactions.

Now the facts may be stated very shortly as follows: The plaintiff, a merchant, had a cargo on his hands, and he instructed Skinner and Co., insurance brokers, in his own town, to effect an insurance for him on such cargo, and thereupon Skinner and Co., employed the defendant, who was an insurance broker to do it, and he did it accordingly. The defendant knew that the policies were effected through him for Skinner and Co. for the benefit of the plaintiff; and the plaintiff knew, soon after the policies of insurance were effected, that Skinner and Co. had employed the defendant to effect them. Now the usual course of the business, and the usual course between Skinner and Co. and the plaintiff, was for a monthly account of premiums to be sent in by them to be settled by the plaintiff. It appears that in all previous transactions of the same nature—and there seems to have been several—the plaintiff had always paid Skinner and Co., and Skinner and Co. had always paid the defendant. There never had been a transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant.

The real transaction then is that the defendant knew that the policies were the property of the plaintiff, and not of Skinner and Co., and he knew that the plaintiff settled for the premiums with Skinner and Co. That I take to be a fact, and a decisive fact in the case. In other words, he knew that the plaintiff settled with Skinner and Co. and not with him for these premiums, which he, the defendant, had advanced. I cannot see how to escape from that conclusion. If they were to be paid in that way, then whatever money the defendant advanced was to be paid to Skinner and Co., and not to the defendant, and it follows thence that the lien of the defendant is not in respect of the premiums unpaid to him, but of the premiums unpaid by the owner of the policies to Skinner and Co. It is in reality a sort of joint transaction between Skinner and Co. and the defendant, and they divide the brokerage. Of course it follows that the lien was one subject to be discharged and intended to be discharged in the usual way by payment to Skinner and Co. I do not consider it necessary to advert to the fact that the plaintiff paid on the 5th instead of the 8th of the month. There seems on both sides to have been some deviation, and for doubtless a sufficient reason, from the ordinary course, but it would be monstrous that the case should be decided upon the fact that the payment being made on the 5th instead of the 8th of the month. I take it to be a fact quite clear that when the plaintiff paid on the 5th Sept. no claim whatever had been made by the defendant, nor had the plaintiff any knowledge that the defendant had not been paid. That is not quite clearly or distinctly stated, but I think it is an inference which we may reasonably draw from the case, and particularly from paragraph 9.

I quite concur with my Lord, and for the reasons he has adduced, that our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

The Juno.

Collision —Compulsory pilotage— Falmouth Harbour—Costs.

Falmouth Harbour being within a Trinity outport district for which pilots were licensed by the Trinity House prior to 1854, pilotage is, by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, compulsory there for a vessel bound from a Mediterranean port to the port of Falmouth.

Where defendants in an action of collision raise the defence of compulsory pilotage only and succeed therein they are entitled to their costs.

This was an action brought by the owners of the British barque Indus against the Swedish barque Juno to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two vessels.

The plaintiffs alleged that the Indus was lying at anchor in a proper berth off St. Mawe's Castle, in the harbour of Falmouth on the 13th Dec. 1875, at about 8 p.m. with her regulation anchor light duly exhibited and burning brightly; that the Juno entered the harbour under sail, and instead of keeping clear of the Indus improperly let go her anchor at a short distance from the Indus,, and come into collision with her and did her considerable damage.

The defendants admitted the plaintiffs' allegations, but alleged that the Juno was on a voyage from Alexandria to Falmouth with wheat, and whilst entering the harbour as alleged the Juno was in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot named E. W. Chard, and that "before and at the time of the collision aforesaid the Juno was by compulsion of law in charge of the said Elias W. Chard, who was a pilot duly licensed for the district in which she was being navigated, and the said collision and the damage proceeded for in this action were caused by the negligence of the said Elias W. Chard and not by any fault of the Juno, her master and crew."

In support of this defence the master and crew of the Juno gave evidence to the effect that the pilot was in charge of the Juno, and that he gave the order to let go the anchor, and the order was obeyed. As to the pilotage being compulsory, James Henry Hart proved that he had been a clerk in the Trinity House for thirty-three years, that Chard was duly licensed at the time of the collision for the Falmouth district, including the harbour of Falmouth (the license was produced and read); and that prior to the year 1854 the Trinity House had been in the habit of licensing pilots for the Falmouth district and the harbour of Falmouth. By the licence Chard appeared to have been duly examined and licensed by the sub-commissioners of pilotage for the Falmouth district.

The defendants called evidence to show that the order to let go the anchor was not given by the pilot of the Juno.

Butt, Q.C. (W. G. F. Phillimore, and Stubbs), for the defendants contended that the facts showed that the pilot alone was to blame for the collision. Assuming that to be the case the pilotage was compulsory. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 369), "The Trinity House shall continue to appoint sub-commissioners . . . . for the purpose of examining pilots in all districts in which they have been used to make such appointments," &c.; sect. 370, "The Trinity House shall continue, after due examination by themselves or their sub-commissioners, to appoint and licence under the common seal pilots for the purpose of conducting ships within the limits following, or any portion of such limits—that is to say . . . 'The Trinity House outport districts' comprising any pilotage district for the appointment of pilots within which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter;" sect. 376, "Subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, and to the exemptions hereinafter contained, the pilotage districts of the Trinity House within which the employment of pilots is compulsory are the London district and the Trinity outport districts, as hereinbefore defined," &c. There is no exemption in the Act which would excuse a foreign vessel coming from Alexandria from taking a pilot. Hence pilotage is compulsory.

Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff, contended that the evidence showed the pilot did not give the orders which brought about the collision. The defendants have not shown that there is no particular provision made by Act of Parliament or charter; hence it cannot be held to be a Trinity outport district.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The evidence satisfies me that the orders were given by the pilot, and that the collision was occasioned by his sole default. And I am also satisfied that the defendants have shown that the Falmouth district is a Trinity outport district, and that pilotage at Falmouth is compulsory for vessels of the class of the Juno. I must, therefore, give judgment for the defendants.

Butt, Q.C. applied for costs against the plaintiffs upon the ground that the only issue raised being compulsory pilotage, and the defendants having succeeded thereon, they were entitled to costs on the authority of The Royal Charter (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 362; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 109; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 262).

Clarkson contended that the allowing of costs in these cases were purely discretionary, and that as the plaintiff's case was brought forward bonâ fide, and there was a great conflict of evidence, the plaintiff ought not to be condemned in costs.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I look upon it as an established rule that where compulsory pilotage is within the knowledge of the plaintiffs the only defence, and the defendants come into court and prove that the collision was occasioned by the pilot's sole default, the plaintiff disputing this fact and failing must pay the costs.

THE FYENOORD.

County Court Appeal—Salvage—Tender—Amount awarded under 50*l.—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act*, 1868, sects. 26, 31.

No appeal lies from the decision of a County Court in a salvage cause where there is a tender of less than 50*l. and that tender is upheld, the amount tendered being the amount "decreed or ordered" within the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act* 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), sect. 31.

THIS was a motion for leave to appeal in a cause of salvage, which was instituted in the City of London Court (Admiralty jurisdiction) to recover reward for salvage services alleged to have been rendered by a pilot to the foreign ship Fyenoord. The defendants had tendered 5*l.* for the services, and the learned judge of the City of London Court upheld the tender.

Myburgh, for the plaintiff, now moved for leave to appeal against the award as insufficient.

E. C. Clarkson opposed the motion, contending that there was no jurisdiction because the amount decreed or ordered was under 50*l.*, and in such case there was no appeal by the provisions of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, sect. 31).

Myburgh, in reply, submitted that the section did not apply because the decree in effect was a decree for the defendant, and the section clearly did not apply to cases where the plaintiff recovered nothing. If the plaintiff could not appeal here a defendant could always stop appeals by tendering a small sum where he had any prospect of their being upheld.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If there had been no tender, and the court had awarded 5*l.* or any other sum less than 50*l.* there would have been no appeal. In effect the court has said that 5*l.* is enough, and that that sum is the award it would have made if there had been no tender. How is the upholding of a tender different from the making of an award? 5*l.* is the amount decreed or ordered. The application must be dismissed with costs.

Discovery—Action in rem—Foreign ship—Practice.

In an action in rem against a foreign ship whose owners are resident abroad, the court will make an order for discovery of documents against such owners, but will always allow a reasonable time for making the affidavit of documents.

THIS was an action instituted in rem against the American ship Emma, and her freight, on behalf of Messrs. De Wolf, of Liverpool, the owners of the barque City of Halifax, to recover damages in respect of a collision between the two ships.

An appearance was entered on the 22nd March 1876, on behalf of the owners of the Emma, and on the 31st March, the solicitors for the plaintiffs took out a summons calling upon the defendants to show cause why the defendants should not answer within three days stating what documents were in their, or either of their custody, possession, or power, relating to matters in question in the action, or what they or either of them knew as to the custody they or any of them were in, and whether he or they objected, and, if so, on what ground, to the production of such as were in his or their possession or power. This summons was taken out before the delivery of pleadings, and came on to be heard before the judge in court.

E. C. Clarkson, on behalf of the plaintiffs.—By the rules of the Supreme Court, Ord. XXXI. r. 12, plaintiffs are entitled to an order directing the defendants to make the discovery asked for by the summons on oath.

R. E. Webster for the defendants.—The defendants are resident abroad, and I submit that the court has no jurisdiction to make any order for the discovery of documents against them, having in effect no power to enforce such an order. The defendants are willing to produce the log book, protests, and other documents material to the case, which are in the control of their master. Even if the court makes the order, the defendants ought to have more than three days to file an affidavit of documents. Three days is insufficient.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall make the order directing the defendants to make discovery on oath, but I wish it to be understood that in all cases where a similar order is made on the owners of foreign ships, I shall allow a reasonable time for them to obey the order.

THE MEDINA.

Salvage of life—Agreement—Exorbitancy—Setting aside.

Where the master of a vessel found passengers of another vessel (550 pilgrims) wrecked on a rock on the Red Sea in fine weather, and refused to carry them to Jeddah for a less sum than 4000*l.*. and the master of the wrecked vessel was by such refusal compelled to sign an agreement for that amount, and the service was performed without difficulty or danger, the agreement was held inequitable and set aside. 1800*l. awarded in the place thereof.*

THIS was an action brought by the owners of the Timor against the Singapore Steamship Company (Limited) to recover an amount alleged to be due to the plaintiffs under an agreement for services rendered to the passengers on board the defendants' ship Medina. The action was originally commenced in the Exchequer Division, but was by order transferred to the Admiralty Division. No statement of claim was delivered by the plaintiffs, but the endorsement on their writ was as follows :

The plaintiffs claim £4000 due from the defendants to the plaintiffs under an agreement dated 1st Oct. 1875, between Captain J. Brown, master of the plaintiffs' ship Timor, for and on behalf of the plaintiffs and Captain Charles Black, master of the defendants' ship Medina, for and on behalf of the defendants for the conveyance at defendants' request of passengers by the plaintiffs' ship Timor from Parkin Rock, Harnish Island, to Jeddah, with interest at £5 per cent. per annum from the date of the said agreement until payment, and £4 4*s.* for costs, and if the amount claimed be paid to the plaintiffs or their solicitors within fifty days from the service hereof further proceedings will be stayed.

The defendants' statement of defence was so far as material as follows :

1. On the 30th Sept. 1875 the Medina while on a voyage from Singapore to Jeddah with a general cargo and having on board 550 passengers (pilgrims) who had embarked at Penang for Jeddah was wrecked on the Parkin Rock in the Red Sea and the pilgrims were landed by the Medina's boats on the rock.

2. The Parkin Rock is a small sharp rock about thirty miles from the mainland and about 240 miles from Aden and from two or three days' voyages from Jeddah.

3. The Medina's boats were so knocked about in landing the pilgrims on the rock as to be useless and the lives of the pilgrims for whom there was scarcely standing room on the rock were exposed to danger.

4. About 10 a.m. of the 1st Oct. the master of the Medina observed a steamer which proved to be the Timor bound on a voyage from Kurrachee to Liverpool, and made signals of distress which were observed by the Timor and she altered her course and bore down to the rock.

5. When the Timor approached the rock the master of the Medina went on board of her and told the master of the Timor the position of the pilgrims and asked him to render assistance.

6. Thereupon negotiations took place between the master of the Timor and the master of the Medina. The master of the Timor refused to take the pilgrims from the rock to Jeddah for less than £4000 and the master of the Medina who offered £1500 and subsequently £2000 to the master of the Timor for his services and after these offers had been refused proposed to refer the amount to arbitration which proposal was rejected was ultimately forced to acquiesce in the demand of the master of the Timor and to sign the agreement sued on. The Medina was totally lost on the said rock.

7. The said sum of £4000 was not a reasonable amount for the services to be rendered by the Timor, but was an exorbitantly excessive amount for such services and the master of the Timor in procuring the master of the Medina to sign the said agreement took undue advantage of the position in which the master of the Medina and the pilgrims were placed and the defendants further say that the master of the Medina had not any authority to enter into the said agreement on behalf of the defendants, and that the said agreement was extorted and improperly obtained from the master of the Medina and is wholly unjust and inequitable and is not binding on the defendants.

8. The defendants are ready and willing to pay to the plaintiffs such reasonable amount for their services as the court may think just.

The plaintiffs replied as follows :

1. Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the statement of defence are admitted.

2. The plaintiffs join issue upon paragraphs 6 and 7 of the statement of defence except the averments that negotiations took place between the master of the Medina and the master of the Timor, and the latter refused to take the pilgrims from the rock to Jeddah for less than £4000.

3. As to the 8th paragraph of the statement of defence the plaintiffs submit that the agreement of the 1st Oct. 1875 is a valid and subsisting agreement and binding upon the defendants, and that the defendants are liable to pay to the plaintiffs the said sum of £4000 and no less.

At the hearing it appeared that the Medina being on a voyage from Singapore to Jeddah with a general cargo took on board at Penang 550 pilgrims bound for Mecca. On the 1st Oct. 1875 in the morning she struck on the Parkin Rock in the Red Sea, nearly 200 miles from Aden and thirty miles from the mainland. The Parkin Rock is about 400ft. long the highest part of it being 6ft. out of the water, and some of it level with the water. All the passengers were landed on this island by means of the Medina's boats. At about 11.30 a.m. on the same day the Timor was passing the rock on a voyage from Singapore to Liverpool, when her assistance was requested by the master of the Medina, who came off in a boat. The master of the Medina boarded the Timor without difficulty and asked the master of the Timor to remove the pilgrims from the rock and take them to Jeddah. There was a considerable discussion between the masters as to the terms upon which the service should be rendered. The master of the Medina offered first 1500*l.* and then 2000*l.*, and finally offered to refer the amount to arbitration thereafter, but the master of the Timor refused to render the required service for any less sum than 4000*l.*, and ultimately the following agreement was made and signed by the master of the Medina.

Agreement made this 1st Oct. between Captain Brown of the Timor, of London, and Captain Black, of the steamer Medina, belonging to the Singapore Steamship Company (Limited), that the said Captain Brown agrees with Captain Black of the Medina to take the whole of his passengers (pilgrims) from off the Parkin Rock and take them to the port of Jeddah, and as near thereto as she can safely get, for the lump sum of £4000 sterling.

The master of the Timor duly performed this agreement. He also tried to get the Medina off the rock, but without success, and she became a total loss. The weather was and remained calm and fine during the whole service.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Myburgh, for the plaintiffs, contended that the service was not a mere life salvage, but was also a completion of the contract of the defendants to carry the pilgrims to Jeddah by which they were enabled to earn freight. There was risk on entering the port of Jeddah; and if any of the pilgrims had been ill, the Timor might have been put in quarantine, and have incurred great expense. The fact that no delay or danger did accrue is not a fact to be considered: (The Enchantress, Lush. 93.) This agreement was entered into between competent persons, and ought, therefore, to be upheld.

Wood Hill (Cohen, Q.C. with him), for the defendants.—Where a demand is exorbitant and a master improperly accedes to it, the court will not uphold an agreement made upon such a basis: (The Theodore, Swabey 351). Here the demand was outrageous, and forced upon the master of the Medina. The amount recoverable for life salvage is only a reasonable amount under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 458, and this amount is unreasonable, the services being unattended by either difficulty or danger.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—The circumstances of this case are very singular, but it is one in which the court really feels no doubt at all as to the judgment which it ought to give. It is not necessary that I should go into an examination of the authorities which I recently referred to in the case of Cargo ex Woosung (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cases 50). And which I also referred to in the case of The Waverley (3 L. Rep. A. & E. 369), but I may state the result of them to be this: that it is the practice of the court, partly for the protection of absent owners, and partly on the grounds of general policy, to control agreements made by captains, when an examination of the agreements shows that they are clearly inequitable.

In the present case there were upwards of 500 pilgrims on a rock which is just six feet above water, their ship had gone to pieces, and the plaintiffs' vessel, the Timor, came up close without any difficulty or danger at all, because the evidence is that the water was quite deep up to the rock; she came up and her captain in effect says, "I will not relieve you from this situation, which four hours of bad weather might convert into a most imminent danger, indeed it may be said into your total destruction; I will not take you away unless you give me 4000*l.*" Now what is 4000*l.* with regard to the matter saved, which is human life? On the other hand, however, that sum is the whole sum that was to be paid for conveying pilgrims to Jeddah. And in my opinion if the Timor had not taken these pilgrims off the rock in the circumstances stated, and bad weather had come on, and they had lost their lives in consequence, he would hardly have been in a better condition than that of a pirate. Nevertheless, it was certainly a valuable salvage service according to the principles upon which such services have always been considered in this court, but I am of opinion that 4000*l.* is a great deal too much, and I shall reduce it to 1800*l.*

As to the costs, there has been no tender, and I shall, therefore, leave each party to pay their own costs. If there had been a sufficient tender I should have given the defendants the costs. I shall not give costs to either side.

THE PARANA.

Objection to registrar's report—Damage to cargo—24 Vict. c. 10*—Measure of damages—Loss of market.*

Where, through the negligence of a carrier by sea, goods carried by him are not delivered in a reasonable time, the owner of the goods or assignee of the bill of lading for the goods is entitled to recover as damages from the shipowner the difference between the market value of the goods when they ought to have been delivered and the market value when they actually were delivered.

THIS was an objection to a report of the registrar (H. C. Rothery, Esq.) in a cause referred to him by the court.

The cause was instituted under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 6, on the 4th Dec. 1873, in the High Court of Admiralty, on behalf of Joseph Samuel, of London, the assignee of certain bills of lading for goods (sugar and hemp) forming part of the cargo of the steamship Parana, against that vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the freight due or payable for the transportation of the cargo, and against William Malcolmson, of Portland, in Ireland, her owner, intervening. After the pleadings in the cause had been concluded, and witnesses had been examined by commission at Manila and Hong Kong, the defendant, on the 14th April 1875, admitted his liability, and consented to a reference of the accounts to the registrar and merchants.

On the 14th Dec. 1875 the plaintiffs brought into the registry a claim containing three items: First, loss of market in respect of the hemp; secondly, loss of interest; and thirdly, loss by drainage of sugar by reason of the unusual length of the voyage. The defendant, before the registrar, admitted that there was some unreasonable delay, and that he was ready to make good any damages necessarily resulting therefrom. The facts of the case, which were not disputed, are detailed by the registrar in his report as follows:

"The Parana was a trading steam vessel of 1372 tons gross and 1027 net register, and she was of 180 horse power nominal, which the master stated was a small power for a vessel of her size. When she left England she was, according to the master, 'frightfully deep,' having from 1000 to 1300 tons of iron as dead weight, and she was filled up with light goods.

"She took ninety days to get to Hong Kong, and having there discharged her cargo was docked, surveyed, and repaired. She thence proceeded in ballast to Manila, where the master entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Engster and Co. to load a cargo at Manila and Ilo-Ilo, and to proceed therewith to London, passing through the Suez Canal.

"In pursuance of the charter-party she took on board some parcels of hemp and sugar at Manila, and having sailed to Ilo-Ilo she then took in further parcels of sugar, but as the charterers were not able to supply her with a full cargo it was agreed that she should be at liberty on the homeward voyage to call in at Singapore to fill up. She left Ilo-Ilo on the 24th July 1873, but owing to the defective state of the boilers she was obliged on the 30th of the same month to put into Labuan for repairs. Thence she proceeded to Singapore, where she took in some cargo and a large quantity of coals, and having effected some further repairs to the boilers she again proceeded on her voyage. On the 18th Aug., owing to the state of the boilers, she was obliged to put into Acheen, and after effecting repairs she again proceeded. On the 1st Sept. she had to alter her course for Point de Galle, it being found that she could only carry 11lb. steam. She arrived in Point de Galle on the 4th Sept., and, having completed her repairs, she left again on the 9th. On the 1st Oct. she arrived at Acheen, where further repairs were done to her boilers, and again at Port Said, at Malta, and at Gibraltar, so that it was not until the 28th Nov. 1873, 127 days after leaving Ilo-Ilo, that she arrived in the Port of London.

"As to the lamentable state in which this vessel's boilers were there can be no two opinions. It seems that after the vessel had discharged her cargo she proceeded to Greenock, where her boilers were taken out. We have no information as to what may have been the condition of one of the boilers, as it was broken up before the surveyors saw it; but the other was examined by two practical engineers, who reported that of the eighty-three tubes of which the boiler originally consisted, one had never been used, twenty-one others had been plugged up with either iron covers or wooden plugs, so that only sixty-one tubes were at all effective. It was found also that the backs of both furnaces had been patched with large patches, and that there were traces of considerable leakage on the crowns of the furnaces. There were also numerous patches on the shell of the boiler varying from 4ft. by 2ft. 3in. wide to 12in. long by 8in. wide. The rivets also were worn away by long use, so that they had but little hold of the plates, and some of the plates were worn away by corrosion to half their original thickness. They further said that although this boiler, when new, was constructed to bear a pressure of from 30lb. to 35lb. of steam to the square inch, they thought in that condition in which they found it she could not with safety have borne a pressure of more than 10lb. or 12lb. There is no reason to suppose that the boiler which had been broken up was in any better condition. A more lamentable state of affairs can hardly be imagined to anyone at all acquainted with the construction of steam engines. It is apparent that with engines originally of small power, with a tabular boiler, of which twenty-two out of eighty-three of the tubes were perfectly useless, of which the plates were so much worn away that they would bear only 10lb. or 12lb. instead of 30lb. to 35lb. to the square inch, and with the crowns of the furnaces leaking badly, the available power to contend with the S. W. monsoon must have been very small, and it can therefore hardly be wondered at that the vessel made on an average but four knots an hour, and that she had frequently to put into port for repairs, and to replenish her stock of coals."

The reference was concluded on the 27th Jan., the 14th Feb., and 13th April 1876. Evidence was taken both by affidavit and by oral examination, and the registrar, after hearing counsel on both sides, made a report and gave his reasons, saying, inter alia, "that the plaintiff would have had no reasonable grounds of complaint, if the voyage from Ilo-Ilo to London had lasted ninety days. But it did, as a fact, take 127 days. We think, therefore, that the ship's owner is, by his admission, liable for the excess of thirty-seven days, during which the voyage lasted, beyond what may be called a not unreasonable time. Taking thirty-seven days then as the measure of the unreasonable delay in the voyage, let us consider what damages may be said to have resulted directly from this delay." He then proceeded to discuss the three different items of the claim, and allowed, first, for extra loss occasioned by drainage of the sugar during the thirty-seven days 1½ per cent. in the original shipment of 500 tons equal to 7½ tons at 12*l.* 10*s.* per ton or 93*l.* 15*s.*; secondly, for interest 5 per cent. for thirty-seven days on the invoice value of the cargoes, 19,959*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* or 101*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.*

On the third point the registrar's report was as follows:

"There remains the last, and by far the most important question, namely, whether the plaintiff is entitled to any compensation for the alleged loss of market by reason of the non-delivery of the cargo within a 'reasonable' time. The question does not arise on the sugar, in regard to which no claim has been made for the loss of market, but on the hemp only."

It was said by the plaintiff that, had the vessel arrived by the middle of October, or even by the 22nd or 23rd Oct., which would be about ninety days after leaving Ilo-Ilo, the hemp could have been sold for about 41*l.* 10*s.* per ton, but that not having arrived until the 28th Nov., it was impossible to get the hemp landed and placed on the market before the middle of December, and that it was then impossible to get within 20*s.* a ton of that price. It was said that the owner continued to hold the hemp in hopes that the market would rally, but that it never did, and that ultimately he had to sell it at a considerable loss. He claimed, not, indeed, the difference between the price at which he might have sold it, had it arrived in October, and the price at which he ultimately did sell it; but the difference between the former, and the price which he might have got for it, immediately after it had been delivered. It was shown that during November and in the first week of December there was a fair demand for hemp at 41*l.* 10*s.* per ton, and that price might have been obtained for it. It was also shown that it would have taken about three weeks after the vessel's arrival to have got the hemp sampled and put upon the market; that by that time there was no demand for it, and that, although the prices current had not altered much, a seller forcing any quantity upon the market would have had to submit to a reduction of at least 20*s.* in the ton. It was proved, also, that after Christmas the market continued to fall, owing to large shipments of hemp brought to Liverpool, so that, as one of the brokers observed, the market was knocked all to pieces.

"Assuming, then, that by the delay in the delivery there was a loss of market, the question arises whether this is an item which can be properly allowed in a claim of this description; whether, in fact, a claim for loss of market can be allowed on account of an unreasonable delay in the delivery of the goods. The case must have frequently arisen in this court, as, for instance, when a vessel has been run into by another, and the delivery of the cargo has been delayed by the vessel having to put into port for repairs; and yet I think that I may say with certainty that no such claim has ever yet been preferred in this court, certainly not during the time I have held this office, now nearly twenty-three years. It may be, however, that we have hitherto proceeded on a wrong principle, and as the point has been very strongly urged in this case by a counsel who is not wont to maintain an untenable position, I propose to examine carefully all the authorities which have been cited in support of that position, as well as the grounds upon which it has hitherto been thought that a claim for loss of market cannot properly be allowed."

The Registrar then referred to and discussed the following cases:

The St. Cloud, Br. & Lush. p. 4;
Josling v. Irvine, 6 Hurl. & Nor. 512;
Collard v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 7 Hurl. & Nor. 79;
Fraser and others v. Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company, L. Rep. 7 Q.B. 566;
Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341;
Smeed v. Foord, 1 Ell. & Ell. 602;
Horne v. Midland Railway Company, L. Rep. 8, C.P. 131; and concluded his report as follows:

"It seems to me that the cases of Hadley v. Baxendale, Smeed v. Foord, and Irvine and another v. The Midland Railway Company (ubi sup.), are conclusive on the point; and that the practice of the Court of Admiralty, in refusing to entertain any claim for loss of market in such cases, is in entire accordance with that of the courts of common law, and I shall refuse to alter that practice until I am corrected by superior authority. I may add that the merchants by whom I am assisted, entirely concur with me in the conclusions to which I have come."

As to the costs of the reference, the report was as follows:

"The general rule in collision cases is that where more than one-third is taken off, the claimant shall pay the costs of the reference. But this rule does not apply to cases of this description. The defendant in the first instance denied altogether his liability, and set up several pleas, which he afterwards withdrew; the condition of the boilers of his vessel was most discreditable, and he entailed heavy losses on the plaintiff; he has, moreover, made no tender on account of the sums which the latter was undoubtedly entitled to recover. On the other hand, the plaintiff has failed in the main issue, the question of loss of market. On the whole, we think that justice will be done by leaving each party to pay his own costs of the reference, but the reference fees will have to be paid by them in moieties."

A motion was heard in court in objection to the report of the Registrar, "to modify and alter the same so far as it disallows the sum of 289*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, claimed as damages for the defendant's breach of contract in respect of the depreciation in value by loss of market on 2403 bales of hemp, weighing 5785 cwt., forming part of the cargo of the above-named steamship, because the disallowance of such damages is based upon a misapprehension of law, and is erroneous, and the plaintiff is legally entitled upon the facts of the case appearing by the Registrar's report to recover such damages, and also to alter the said report so far as it orders the plaintiff to bear his own costs of the reference, and to make such order as shall be meet and right in and about the premises, and to condemn the defendant in the costs of this motion."

Clarkson, in support of motion.—It is admitted that the speed of the Parana was defective, and the plaintiff claims 285*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* for the loss of market. The Registrar has allowed nothing in respect of this claim. The only cases in which loss of market has been disallowed as the measure of damages, are those in which it has been occasioned by a special sub-contract, unknown, and not in the consideration of both parties: In Smeed v. Foord (1 Ell. & Ell. 602) the wheat claimed for was not the subject matter of the contract, which was for the delivery of thrashing machines, not to deliver wheat; here the subject matter of the contract was the carriage and delivery of the hemp; the plaintiff could have recovered on the thrashing machines if he had procured others at a higher price. The Registrar relied also on Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. 341), but that case is in my favour, for the fluctuation of the market is a matter in the knowledge of both parties. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There are two criteria (1) Was it in contemplation of the parties? (2) Was it the natural result of the negligent delay of the defendant?] Fraser v. Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company (L. Rep. 7 Q.B. 566) lays down the law under which damages of this description may be recovered. The breach of contract there was in not supplying a vessel whose principal moving power was steam; here it is for delay in delivery of goods occasioned by defective power of ship, and the loss occasioned thereby is the difference of price caused by the delay. Horne v. Midland Railway Company (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 131) is really in favour of the plaintiff; the reason that the extra sum there claimed for loss upon the contract by delay could not be recovered was because the defendants had not notice of any special sub-contract which would increase the ordinary loss caused by non-delivery in time. In Borries v. Hutchinson (34 L. J. 169, C. P.) the question was what was the proper measure of damages where, from the delay of the carrier, the plaintiff lost his market altogether, and there, also Willes, J. says, "In ordinary cases, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price, and the market price." In O'Hanlan v. The Great-Western Railway Company (34 L. J. 154, Q. B.) the general principle is the same, and in The Great-Western Railway Company v. Redmayne (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 329) the court held that the market value of the goods at the time was the true test of the measure of damages. In Collard v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 410; 7 H. & N. 79) also, the plaintiff, a hopgrower, was held entitled to recover the difference between the market value and the contract price.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and G. Bruce, in support of the report. — The principle adopted by the Registrar is the only correct one. The shipowner cannot be taken to know the purpose for which the cargo is intended, and ought not to be involved in questions concerning the rise and fall of the market. The only questions are, whether the fall of market occasioning the loss was in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, and whether the goods have depreciated intrinsically. Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. 341) settled, at all events, that complete compensation for such a loss could not be claimed. There must also be some general principle applicable to all cases, and that the Registrar has correctly stated in his report. Cory v. Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 495; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 181), is not a question between carrier and sender, it is true, but I especially rely on the judgment delivered therein by the Lord Chief Justice. It is necessary to look at the nature of the contract and the circumstances under which it was made, to see if the damage resulting was such as was in contemplation of both parties. Here it was not in contemplation of shipowner that loss of market would ensue; some loss was contemplated, certainly, and that is fairly represented by the five per cent. on the value of the cargo allowed by Registrar. The British Columbia, &c., Saw Mills Company (Limited) v. Nettleship (L. Rep. 3 C. P. 499), is directly in point; there the non-delivery of a certain piece of machinery stopped the whole work, but the defendant was held not to be liable for the loss arising therefrom, but only of the price of replacing the goods which he had lost, and interest at the rate of five per cent. for the delay occasioned by his negligence, and this is the true principle to allow a rough mercantile profit. Any other rule would lead to complications practically insoluble by the court. The actual amount of damage cannot be looked to, as it is not and cannot be in the contemplation of the parties. The cases cited for the plaintiffs are all cases between vendor and purchaser, and therefore do not apply. The plaintiff's contention is opposed to the universal practice of this court and to the analogy of insurance law, by which underwriters in goods are never made responsible for loss of market. The plaintiff cannot recover such damages as these without notice to shipowner that he wanted the goods to be delivered for a particular market:

Wilson v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 30 L. J. 232, C. P.; 9 C. B. N. S., 632;

Cur. adv. vult.

June 13.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have taken time to consider my judgment in this case, partly on account of the great number of reported cases to which I was referred, but more especially because, unfortunately, I am unable to agree with the very elaborate and carefully reasoned opinion of the Registrar from whose ruling this appeal has been prosecuted.

It is admitted in this case that the carrier must make some compensation to the merchant for the loss sustained by him in consequence of the delay in the execution of the contract; the question is what are to be the items of that compensation. The registrar has found that these items are 93*l.* 15*s.* for deterioration in quality of a portion of the cargo and 101*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* for loss of the interest, during the detention in consequence of the delay, at five per cent. on the value of the cargo. The merchant also claims, in addition to these items, the ascertained difference between the market value of the goods at the time when they might have been sold, if the carrier had not unreasonably delayed the fulfilment of his contract, and their value at the time when they did actually arrive, and the justice of this claim is the sole subject of this appeal.

The law applicable to this question has apparently been difficult to ascertain and the application of it when ascertained more difficult. The general rule of law is stated with his usual clearness by M. Massè in the last edition of his Droit Commercial, vol. 3, p. 239, edit. 2, Lib. 5, Tit. I. Ch. 3, sect. iv., § 1. The principle of this rule is in different words expressed in the English and American judgments. In accordance with this principle the carrier has been holden liable to pay damages on the hypothesis that he contemplated payment of a certain kind of compensation in the event of his not executing, or his unreasonably delaying to execute his part of the contract. Another form of stating that proposition is to be found in the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron in the Exchequer Chamber in Horne

v. Midland Railway Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 135) decided in the year 1873. "The principle clearly to be declared for all the authorities is that the damages for a breach of contract must be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered as arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may be reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable results of the breach of it." The last English judgment which I have been able to find is one delivered by the Lord Chief Justice in 1876, in the case of Sampson v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. Div. 274). It is the only English case, I think, for the knowledge of which I am not indebted to the industry of counsel. "The law," the Lord Chief Justice says at p. 277, "as it is to be found in the reported cases, has fluctuated, but the principle is now settled, that whenever either the object of the sender is specially brought to the notice of the carrier, or circumstances are known to the carrier from which the object ought in reason to be inferred, so that the object may be taken to have been within the contemplation of both parties, damages may be recovered for the natural consequences of the future of that object. The latest American decision, I believe, is that of Ward v. The New York Central Railroad Company (48 N. Y. 29), it is thus stated in a note to the last edition of Sedgwick on damages (p. 430): "It is here held, that where a carrier from mere negligence, or plain violation of duty, omits to transport merchandise within a reasonable time, and its market value falls in the meantime, the true rule of damages is the difference in its value at the time and place it ought to have been delivered and the time of its actual delivery, the court observing that sagacious men rely upon their own ability to judge of the market in undertaking large commercial projects, and according to their views of the market send their merchandise by a quick or by a slow carrier, and make compensation accordingly. A contrary rule would deprive them of all benefit of a rapid transit. The court further remarked, had the goods been injured by reason of improper exposure by the carrier, and thus become depreciated in their market value, the carrier would be liable for the loss. Here his negligent delay caused the loss; the injury also is natural and direct; arriving later by the carrier's negligence, these goods, measured by the only standard that regulates value, were not worth as much as at the time when they should have arrived." I do not refer to other cases besides those two, but I have read them all with care; most of them will be found in the notes to Mr Sedgwick's valuable work on the Measure of Damages (6th edit., chap. 3, p. 81; chap. 13, p. 430), to which I have already referred.

The result of the reported decisions is, that this merchant may claim to be indemnified for the actual loss in the value of the goods shipped (perte qu'il a fait)—damnum emergen,—and from loss of profit, gain dont il a été privé)—lucrum cessans—when such loss is the direct consequence of the carrier's default. Why should not the ascertained difference between the market price, when the goods might have been sold had there been no delay, and the market price which they would fetch after the delay, be a reasonable measure of the loss of the merchant's profits; the depreciation is the direct consequence of the carrier's default; in other words, he must be taken to have known or contemplated that the merchant desired a safe and quick transport of marketable goods to their intended market. This is the ordinary knowledge with which a carrier receives goods, and it is on this principle, as it appears to me, that in Horne v. The Midland Railway Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 8 C. P. 135), already cited, the difference between two market prices was considered to be the proper measure of the damages.

The case before me is not one of a special private speculation or particular mercantile operation in which delay may inflict as much injury on the shipper with respect to the market value of the goods as their deterioration from want of requisite appliances or improper exposure during the passage. Upon the same principle the carrier is responsible for both injuries, the depreciation in the market value of these goods has been in my opinion the natural consequence of the carrier's unreasonable delay — Propter rem ipsam non habitam, as the civilians say—and for reasons already alleged, I think the shipper is entitled to have included in his damages the difference between the market price at the time when the goods did arrive and at the time when they ought to have arrived.

I must therefore direct that the registrar's report be varied by adding to the damages allowed the sum of 289*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, which represents the loss of market. I think that the justice of the case demands that the plaintiff's have their costs of appeal and of the reference.

Limitation of liability—Practice.

A vessel under arrest in a cause of damage was liberated on payment into court of the amount to which her liability was limited under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63. s. 54, together with a sum to cover costs and interest, and subsequently she was found solely to blame for the collision. The owners, who had instituted a suit for limitation of liability moved for a decree in that suit, and that the money in court should be transferred to the credit of that suit;

The court granted the prayer of the first part of the motion but not of the latter, holding it to be not necessary.

ON the 15th Oct. 1874, the Sisters, a barge, in company with two other barges, the Volunteer and the Alfreda, were cruising up Halfway Reach in the river Thames. A steamer called the Thames was going down the river, and after just avoiding doing serious damage to the Sisters, ran into and sank the other two barges with their cargoes, and caused the death by drowning of two of the three persons on board the Alfreda. The Volunteer instituted an action against the Thames, which was dismissed on the ground that the Thames had been obliged to adopt the course she had done to avoid the imminent danger of collision with the Sisters, which was occasioned by the improper navigation of that vessel. The Alfreda then, on the 2nd Feb.

1875, instituted an action against the Sisters and arrested her; the Volunteer also instituted an action against the Sisters; the owners of the Sisters on the 22nd Feb. 1875 instituted a cause of limitation of liability, and on the 2nd March 1875 moved the court to release that vessel on payment into court of 960*l.* 7*s.*, that being the amount at 15*l.* per ton, for which the owners were liable under 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54, and the court, after hearing counsel, permitted the release on that sum and a further sum of 329*l.* 8*s.* to cover interest and costs, being paid into court, and the Sisters was released accordingly. On the hearing of the cause of damage the Sisters was found alone to blame, and that decision was confirmed on appeal (ante p. 122; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 338).

F. W. Raikes. on behalf of the plaintiffs in the limitation of liability suit, the owners of the Sisters, now moved the court for a decree in that suit limiting the plaintiff's liability to 15*l.* per ton and the costs incurred in the causes of damage and limitation of liability, for a stay of proceedings in the cause of damage, and that the sums paid into court in that suit should be transferred to the credit of the suit for limitation of liability. He pointed out that as the jurisdiction in cases of limitation of liability was originally vested in the Court of Chancery, by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, § 514, and was only transferred to the Court of Admiralty in certain cases, by the Admiralty Court Act 1861, § 13, the payments out of court must be in the limitation of liability suit and not in the cause of damage, and that for that purpose the money in court should be transferred to that suit.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants in the limitation of liability suit only required that whatever course the court pursued with reference to the money in court, that the defendants' costs in the limitation of liability suit which had not yet been taxed should be secured.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE, after consultation with the registrar as to the practice, made the decree prayed for in the limitation of liability suit, the plaintiffs' solicitors undertaking that the costs in that suit should be paid, and ordered a stay of all further proceedings in the damage suit, but as to latter part of the motion made no order, on the ground that whatever might have been requisite had the cause for limitation of liability been in another division of the high court, the money being in this division it was immaterial which suit it stood to the credit of.

THE CLUTHA.

Pleadings—Limitation of liability—Counter claim.

Under the system of pleading established by the Judicature Act and rules, the defendant where he admits his liability for the damage done by a collision, but claims to have his liability limited to 8l. or 15l. per ton of his vessel under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63,) s. 54, can so claim by counter claim instead of by instituting a separate suit for limitation of liability:

Semble, when liability is not admitted a similar course may be adopted in the alternative.

IN this case actions were commenced against the Clutha and her owners by the owners of the Russian barque Tovernus, and of a portion of the cargo laden on board her, for damages sustained by a collision between the vessels whilst the Tovernus was at anchor in the river Clyde on the 23rd Dec. 1875. The Tovernus was sunk by the collision, and three of her crew drowned.

These actions were, by order of the court, consolidated and statement of claim in the consolidated action delivered on the 26th June 1876.

On the 14th July 1876, the defendants delivered a statement of defence and counter claim, which so far as material was as follows:

Between RICHARD JANSSEN, of Parga, and others, the owners of the Russian barque Tovernus (plaintiffs),

and

The owners of the steamship or vessel Clutha (defendants),

(by original action),

and

Between WILLIAM STOWELL AND OTHERS, the owners of the said steamship or vessel Clutha (plaintiffs),

and

RICHARD JANSSEN, of Parga, and others, the owners of the Russian barque Tovernus and the owners of the cargo lately laden on board the said barque, and the survivors of her crew, and the legal personal representatives of such of her crew as are deceased, and against all and every person or persons whomsoever claiming to be entitled to claim in respect of damage or loss to the said barque Tovernus or her boats, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things on board of her at the time of the collision, in the statement of claim mentioned, or in respect of any loss of life or personal injury occasioned by the said collision . . . (defendants)

(by counter claim).

Statement of defence and counter claim.

1. The defendants in the said original action admit the statements contained in the statement of claim, and that the said collision was occasioned by improper navigation of the said steamship or vessel Clutha, and by way of counter claim the said defendants say as follows:

2. The said defendants were before, and at the time of the said collision, the owners of the said steamship Clutha which is a duly registered British steamship.

3. On the 27th June 1876, another action, numbered 1876 O No. 330, was commenced against the said steamship Clutha by the said owners of cargo, laden on board the said barque and in the statement of claim mentioned, to recover damages for the loss of the said cargo in the said collision, and such action has by order of the court been consolidated herewith.

4. No other action or suit save as aforesaid has yet been brought against the said defendants or the said steamship Clutha or her freight in respect of the said collision, but the defendants apprehend other claims in respect of a damage to goods, merchandise, and other things on board the said barque Tovernus, and also in respect of loss of life and personal injury caused to persons on board of and carried in the said barque Tovernus at the time of the said collision.

5. The said collision took place without the actual fault or privity of the said defendants, or either or any of them, and the said defendants submit that they are entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 and the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act 1862, for limiting their liability in respect of the said collision.

6. The gross tonnage of the said steamship Clutha, without deduction on account of the engine room, is 514 $\frac{70}{100}$ tons.

7. The said defendants are willing, and they hereby offer to pay in such manner as the court shall direct, the amount to which they are liable in respect of the said collision, regard being had to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Acts 1862.

The said defendants claim

1. A declaration that the defendants are not answerable in respect of loss of life or personal injury caused by the said collision, together with loss or damage to ship's boats, goods, merchandise, or other things to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l.* for each ton of the gross tonnage of the said steamship Clutha, without deduction on account of the engine room, nor in respect of loss or damage to ship's goods, merchandise, or other things on board the said barque Tovernus, caused by the said collision to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l.* for each ton of the gross tonnage of the said steamship Clutha without deduction on account of the engine room.
2. That the said defendants may be at liberty to give bail for such an aggregate amount and for such interest as the court may think fit to award.
3. That upon the filing of the bail bond all further proceedings in the said actions, numbered 1875 J. No, 106, and 1876 O, No. 330 respectively, may be stayed, and the respective plaintiffs in the said actions, and all and every other person and persons claiming in respect of damage or loss to the said barque Tovernus, or to her boats, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things on board her, or in respect of loss of life or personal injury occasioned by the said collision, may be restrained from bringing any other action or actions in respect of these said losses or injuries.
4. That all proper directions may be given by the court for ascertaining the persons who have any just claim in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, and other things caused by the said collision, and in respect of loss of life and personal injury caused by the said collision, and for the exclusion of any claimants who shall not come in within a certain time to be fixed for that purpose.
5. That the amount of the said defendant's liability may be rateably distributed among the several persons who may establish a claim thereto.
6. Such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require.

On the 10th July the plaintiffs replied by not admitting the truth of the 5th and 6th paragraphs of the counter-claim, and on the 1st Aug. 1876 the case came on for hearing.

Clarkson, for owners of barque Tovernus.

Phillimore, for owners of part of cargo.

Aspinall for defendants, mentioned the matter to the court, as the pleadings were new to the practice of this division, but he submitted that under the Judicature Act and rules the defendant was entitled to raise the question of the limitation of his liability by counter claim to the original action, instead of instituting a special suit for the purpose, the affidavit and copy of register usual in such suits being filed in this. He referred to Order XIX., rule 9, Order XXII., rule 5, and Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, sect. 24, sub-sects. 4, 6, 7; Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 514; Common Law Procedure Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. ch. 126. sect. 35), and the Admiralty Court Act 1862 (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 13).

Clarkson and Phillimore agreed that it was now the proper course to pursue.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE said that there could be no doubt that course could now be pursued, and that under the circumstances it was the proper one to adopt, and ordered all proceedings in the actions to be stayed except for taxation and payment of costs, 8*l.* per ton, on the gross tonnage of the Clutha, to be paid into court, and bail to be given for the remainder up to 15*l.* per ton on the gross tonnage of the Clutha, with costs and interest.

CARGO ex SCHILLER.

Life salvage—Cargo—Separately salved—Liability to pay life salvage—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 458.

Where life salvage is performed, cargo, subsequently salved from the same vessel as the lives, but by persons wholly distinct from the life salvors, is liable to contribute towards the payment of the reward due to the life salvors under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 458.

THIS was an action in rem instituted on behalf of the owners, masters, and crews of the pilot cutter Rapid and the boats O. and M., Guinevre, and Swift, against the cargo of the late German steamship Schiller, to recover salvage reward for services rendered to the lives of the passengers of that vessel.

The Rapid was a pilot cutter belonging to the Island of Bryher, one of the Scilly Islands, was of the value of 500*l.*, and at the time of the services was manned by a crew of eight hands. The O. and M. was a six-oared gig belonging to the Island of St. Agnes, one of the Scilly Islands, and at the time of the services was manned by a crew of six hands, including a licensed Trinity pilot. The Guinevre was also a six-oared gig belonging to the Island of St. Agnes, and was manned by a crew of seven hands. The Swift was a boat also belonging to the Island of St. Agnes and was manned by a crew of four hands.

The Schiller went ashore on the Retarrier reef, which is about three miles and a quarter west of the Island of St. Agnes, and about two miles and three-quarters west and by south of the Island of Annett. The services were rendered during the morning of the 8th May, 1876, and during a dense fog. The Swift picked up one passenger from the Schiller's lifeboat which was discovered full of water in Smith's Sound; the Rapid picked up two men between the rocks of Minalto and Mincarlo; the O. and M. discovered the Schiller herself, and picked up from spars and wreckage five men; the Guinevre also got to the Schiller and picked up two men from among the wreckage; all these men were got ashore and saved. The O. and M., after taking the men she picked up ashore, got a steamboat that was going to Penzance to go to the wreck. The steamboat took the lifeboat and the O. and M. in tow, and proceeded to the Schiller, the Trinity pilot from the O. and M. being on board the steamboat. The O. and M. was damaged before getting to the Schiller the second time, and had to put back, but the steamboat and lifeboat went on and saved more lives. The Guinevre also sent some fishing boats to the Schiller, and these saved more lives. All the persons saved were taken ashore by the persons who picked them up, and were landed either in the Island of St. Agnes or St. Mary's. The plaintiffs alleged that during the services the weather was very bad, the sea running very high, and that the services were rendered at great risk to the plaintiffs. A small portion only of the stores and hull of the Schiller were saved, but large portions of her cargo, mainly specie, to the value of 40,000*l.*, were saved. The above facts and others appearing in the judgment were fully set out in the statement of claim in twenty-two paragraphs.

The cargo proceeded against was not nor was any part of it saved by the plaintiffs, nor was it saved for a considerable time after the services rendered by the plaintiffs. The defendants' (the owners of the specie saved) statement was as follows:

1. The defendants admit the statements of fact in Articles 1 to 22, inclusive of the statement of claim.

2. The services of the plaintiffs to the passengers of the Schiller were rendered at some risk to themselves, but not at great risk as alleged.

3. The said passengers were not the owners of the cargo proceeded against in this action, and the plaintiffs rendered no services to and did not attempt to save the said cargo or the owners thereof. Such cargo was saved under the circumstances in the next article mentioned.

4. Some time after the wreck of the Schiller, and after the vessel was partially broken up, and with her cargo had sunk in deep water, and had been abandoned by all concerned, the defendants determined to endeavour to raise six barrels of specie belonging to them, and which were known to be in the vessel's hold. The defendants thereupon engaged a staff of divers and workmen, and worked for many weeks at great expense, and with great uncertainty as to the success of their operations. During this time, and so long as it remained doubtful whether the operations would not be altogether unprofitable, the plaintiffs did not profess to be interested, or to have a claim against the cargo in respect of which the operations were proceeding.

5. After many weeks of unsuccessful and unremunerative operations, the defendants succeeded in raising four of the barrels of specie and a portion of the contents of another barrel, of the total value of 40,000*l.*, and the specie so saved was conveyed to Penzance. This specie is the cargo proceeded against in this action.

6. After the arrival of the specie at Penzance, the plaintiffs were induced by persons who had taken no part in the salvage services to put forward the claim made in this action, and they consented to do so upon being indemnified against liability for costs, and this action is being prosecuted in the plaintiffs' name under such indemnity.

7. Upon the arrival of the specie at Penzance, it was arrested in two distinct actions by or in the names of certain of the plaintiffs in the present consolidated actions, and a third action was afterwards instituted against it on behalf of the said plaintiffs. The said actions were all commenced by the instructions of the same person acting or professing to act as agent for the plaintiffs, and through the same solicitor, and the claim of the plaintiffs might or ought to have been put forward, if at all in one action.

8. Numerous portions of the Schiller, and of her tackle appparel, and furniture had been saved and recovered by persons other than the defendants prior to the commencement of these actions, but the plaintiffs made no attempt to enforce a claim against such property.

9. The plaintiffs respectively have received or are entitled to receive, and can upon application receive, from the passengers to whom they rendered the said services, and from the owners of the Schiller, and from the German Government, ample remuneration for their said services.

10. The Schiller at the time of her loss was a German ship, sailing under the German flag, and by the law of Germany the ship and the owners thereof, and the passengers themselves, are liable for the remuneration of the services in the statement of claim mentioned, and the defendants as owners of the cargo on board the ship are not in the circumstances aforesaid liable for such remuneration.

The plaintiff's reply was, so far as material, as follows:

1. It is not true, as stated in the fourth paragraph of the statement of defence, that during the time therein mentioned the plaintiffs did not profess to be interested in, or to have a claim against, the cargo therein mentioned.

2. The several allegations in the sixth paragraph are untrue. It is further untrue, as stated in the seventh paragraph, that the actions therein mentioned were all commenced by the instructions of the same person, or that the claim of the plaintiffs might or ought to have been put forward in one action. The costs of the separate institutions of the two suits and action are trifling, The several allegations in paragraphs 6 and 7 are immaterial.

3. It is not true that any portions of the Schiller, or of her tackle, apparel, or furniture, which were or are of any appreciable value, had or have been saved or recovered.

4. It is true, as stated in paragraph 10, that the Schiller was at the time of her loss a German ship, sailing under the German flag, but with this exception, the several allegations in paragraphs 9 and 10 are untrue.

5. At the time of the rendering of the services stated in the statement of claim, the Schiller was a ship stranded or in distress on the shore of a sea or tidal water situate within the limits of the United Kingdom, and the services so stated were rendered wholly or in part in British waters.

From an affidavit filed by the plaintiffs in answer to interrogatories administered to them on behalf of the defendants, it appeared that the crew of the O. and M. received 75*l.* from three out of the five persons saved by that boat; that none of the other persons saved paid the plaintiffs anything; no claim other than these actions had been made upon the persons saved or the owners of the Schiller; that the crews of O. and M. and Guinevre sent in a statement by way of petition to the German Government and also to the Board of Trade, but no reply thereto was received before the institution of these actions; that the crew of the Swift accepted as a present from the German Government the sum of 1*l.* per head without prejudice to their present claim; and that, save us aforesaid, no other sums had been received by the plaintiffs for the services proceeded for in these actions.

March 13, 1876.—The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiff.—The facts are admitted, and the only question in the case is whether the plaintiffs can by law recover reward for salvage of life. The right arises under the Merchant Shipping Acts. Even if the Schiller can be said to have been wrecked outside of British waters, the plaintiffs performed part of their service within British waters by taking the persons rescued to and landing them on the island of St. Agnes and St. Mary. The first case on the point is The Johannes (Lush. 182; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 757; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 24), where it was held in 1860 that the Court of Admiralty had no original jurisdiction over life salvage, and that the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 458 only gave jurisdiction over life salvage rendered within the limits of the United Kingdom. In the following year the Admiralty Court Act (24 Vict. c. 10) s. 9, extended the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act "to the salvage of life from any British ship or boat, wheresoever the services may have been rendered, and from any foreign ship or boat, where the services have been rendered wholly or in part in British waters." Hence there is clearly jurisdiction. In The Fusilier (Bro. & Lush. 341; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 39, 177) it was held that passengers must be taken as "belonging to such ship" within the 458th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. In The Willem III. (ante, vol. 1, p. 129; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 487; 25 L.T. Rep. N. S. 386) the services were rendered wholly outside British waters, and it was held that the plaintiffs could not recover for life salvage against the ship and cargo.

Butt, Q.C. and Lodge, for the defendants.—It is an admitted fact that the plaintiffs made no attempt to save the vessel or cargo. In The Fusilier (ubi sup.) there was a joint salvage of ship, cargo, and lives of crew and passengers by the same salvors. Here the services rendered were wholly separate from those subsequently rendered to ship and cargo. The cargo now proceeded against was got up some time afterwards by a wholly distinct set of persons, [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 458, salvage is payable for "assisting such ship or boat;" for "saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship or boat;" and for "saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat, or any portion thereof," and is made payable "by the owners of such ship or boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck, to the person by whom such services or any of them are rendered." Dr. Lushington, in The Fusilier (ubi sup.), says: "That section begins by defining what constitutes a salvage service; it states three special heads. . . . The section then goes on to declare, that payment shall be made by the owner of the ship or cargo of a reasonable amount of life salvage. If the statute ended there, I should say the effect of it was simply to constitute the saving of life to be per se a salvage service, and to leave the mode of payment to be according to former practice; for I cannot find any words in this section adequate to effect so serious a change in the law, as to introduce a new system of payment, in substitution of the ancient rule which, where life was saved together with ship and cargo by a single set of salvors, threw upon the cargo a part of the proportionate increase of the salvage reward. The existing grievance was not the mode of payment—charging the cargo in part—but the absence, in some cases, of all payment for life salvage." Does not that passage show that the Merchant Shipping Act makes life salvage chargeable upon the cargo, whether saved with the lives or not?] We submit that if such was the effect of the decision it must have been given without consideration of the 459th section which, provides that "salvage in respect of the preservation of life or lives of any person or persons belonging to any such ship or boat as aforesaid shall be payable by the owners of such ship or boat in priority to all other claims for salvage; and in cases where such ship or boat is destroyed, or where the value thereof is insufficient, after payment of the actual expenses incurred, to pay the amount of salvage due in respect of any life or lives, the Board of Trade may in its discretion, award to the salvors of such life or lives out of the Mercantile Marine Fund, such sum or sums as it deems fit." This clearly shows that the intention of the Act was that life salvage should only be payable where the persons saved are identified with the owners of the property saved. That is to say, that if the whole service to ship, cargo, and life is effected at once, the whole fund should contribute, but if only the lives are saved and no salvage to ship or cargo rendered until a later period, the ship only should be liable to pay the reward for the salvage of life. The cargo here was got up not by salvors, but by the owners of the cargo itself, and cannot be identified in any way with the salvage to life or the persons saved. If the ship was not sufficient, the plaintiffs should have obtained reward from the Board of Trade. The plaintiffs have accepted reward in respect of the services rendered.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.—In The Cairo (ante, vol. 2, p. 252; L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 58) reward for salvage to life was given, although no services were rendered to ship and cargo at the time of the life salvage.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 15, 1876. — Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—It appears that on the 7th May last year, shortly before midnight, the plaintiffs heard the whistle of a steamer and the report of a gun, at the Island of St. Agnes. At that time there was a very dense fog over the whole of the Scilly Islands. It appears that, nevertheless, suspecting some vessel might be in danger, the crew of the O. and M. started from the Island of St. Agnes towards the Western Rocks. The weather continued densely thick with fog, the wind was from the S.W. and a heavy sea was running through the rocks and breaking over the sunken ledges between which the boats had to pass before they could get outside, to such an extent as to greatly imperil the lives of those on board them. The facts, I should have said, are all admitted, except that the great danger to the lives of the salvors is not admitted; as to this, the admission is qualified, for it is said that at this time there was not great danger. At the same time, it is a fact that the fog had shut out all landmarks, and, although some of the plaintiffs were Trinity pilots, they found great difficulty in making their way. One of the men on the Island of Bryher saw three spars wash on shore where he then was, and about six a.m. he saw some broken deck planks floating in the water. He immediately summoned the crew of the Rapid, who got her under weigh and passed down the channel between the islands of Sampson and Bryher. The statement of claim goes on to state that the coxswain of the Swift, being on the look out above Smith's Sound, on the Island of St. Agnes, saw a broken ship's lifeboat drifting to the southward, through the Sound, with something dark in it, which he could not distinguish for the fog. He immediately, with the crew of the Swift launched that boat, and proceeded as fast as possible in the direction where he had seen the lifeboat. They saw her close to Buccaba, and rowing up to her found she belonged to the Schiller, and that there was lying in her a passenger from the Schiller, groaning, benumbed with cold, and in a very weak state. The lifeboat was very much damaged, one half of her port side being clean gone. She was floating on a level with the water, and the passenger was immersed in water, except his head and shoulders, and he had lost all power of speech. Having got him on board the Swift, they took every measure to restore him to animation. In the meanwhile, the other boats, Rapid, O. and M. and Guinevre, were making the best of their way to the wreck of the Schiller. They first went to the Reef of Meledgen, thence to Gorregan, Rosevean, Rosevere, and Crebawithen, at none of which reefs could they discover anything. Shortly before seven a.m. the crew of the Rapid, which was then reaching in towards Minalto, heard cries, but could see no one, owing to the fog. Their statement goes on to show that they went in the direction of the cries, between the rock of Mincarlo and Minalto, which is a dangerous channel, and there they saw a man floating in the water, whom they rescued, and, going on, they saw another man, whom they took on board. It appears that the Rapid made several tacks in order to see if there were more men in the water, and not seeing any, and finding the men they had got out required care, they rowed to St. Mary's for medical assistance, and whilst so proceeding, they passed quantities of boxes, clothes, and trunks, which they did not stop to pick up, being anxious to obtain assistance for the two men. I mention these facts because it is not disputed that the account of the men is accurate. On the whole, the plaintiffs saved ten lives, and must be considered as having indirectly saved more, because the O. and M. obtained a steamer which was going to Penzance, and the Guinevre sent word of the distress and danger that the Schiller was in, and some of the passengers were saved and got on board the steamer and some fishing smacks.

Now, a question of law has been raised with respect to these services; and it has been said, first of all, that the cargo is not liable to pay any salvage remuneration for saving the lives of these persons. It is admitted that no part of the cargo or ship was saved; but the claim was rested exclusively and entirely upon the preservation of human life. The question was, it was admitted, discussed in The Fusilier (ubi sup.), both in the High Court of Admiralty and in the Privy Council, and a conclusion favourable to the plaintiff was arrived at in both courts. The case is reported in 3 Moore's P. C. C., N. S. 55, where Dr. Lushington is reported to have said: "Several questions of law have arisen respecting what is called life salvage, and to these questions I will address my attention before considering the particular facts of the case. First, then, as to the old law respecting salvage of property—the law before any statute was passed on the subject. There is, I apprehend, no doubt that the law was, that where no ship or cargo had been salved, no property rescued from destruction, but life had been saved from the ship, no suit for salvage reward could be maintained. One reason for this state of the law was, that no property could be arrested applicable to the purpose. There could be no proceeding in rem, the ancient foundation of a salvage suit. It is true that sometimes an anomalous case did arise, where one set of salvors exclusively saved life, and another, wholly distinct, salved the ship and cargo; but, even in these circumstances, the salvors of life alone could not render the property amenable to their claim. Then, as to the case where life and property had both been salved by one set of salvors, it was the practice of the court to increase the amount of salvage which would have been given if property only had been saved, and such doctrine does, I think, rest on too high authority to be doubted. The practice, too, was that all the property salved should pay in such increased rate of salvage—the ship, the freight, and the cargo, each in proportion to its value. Such being the state of the law and the practice of the court, a question arises—what was the grievance which required the interposition of the Legislature? That grievance clearly was, that persons who had risked their own lives, perhaps, and salved life only, or with so little property as not to afford the payment of an adequate reward, could not be justly compensated. That was the grievance intended to be remedied. No doubt the leading motive for the legislative enactment to remedy this grievance was to encourage the saving of life; but there was a subsidiary ground—the encouragement of salvors generally, for the reward of life salvage operates as a further incentive to salvage exertions. This being so, it would be reasonable to suppose, à priori, that the remedy given by the Legislature would be commensurate to the evil, and effect no further change." Then the learned judge enters into a consideration of provisions in the Merchant Shipping Act (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 458 and 459, and he comes to a conclusion that the cargo was clearly liable to pay the life salvage. The matter was argued on the pleadings before the Privy Council, and I had the honour to appear for the appellants, and Dr. Deane for the respondents. The question was very fully gone into and considered in the Privy Council, and Lord Chelmsford delivered the judgment and said: "The general rule as to the parties liable to pay salvage is, that the property actually benefited is alone chargeable with the salvage recovered. But this rule is inapplicable in the case of life salvage, because it is difficult to imagine a case where the saving of the lives either of the crew or of the passengers of a vessel in distress would be any benefit either to the vessel or to the cargo. The Legislature, therefore, could not have intended to enact that the benefit to property should be the criterion of the liability to the payment of life salvage. All that seems to have been contemplated is, that there should be included in the entire sum payable for the salvage of ship and cargo a distinct award for the preservation of human life." Then he goes into the question of the 458th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, much discussed before me, and then says: "The Legislature seems merely to have had in view the rewarding at a higher rate persons whose services were more meritorious from having rescued human life as well as property from peril, and almost to have assumed that the liability to the salvage would attach, without any distinction, upon all the owners of property exposed to the common danger." And then, entering into a consideration of the 468th and 469th sections of the statute, which removed any doubt which the previous sections created upon this point, his Lordship concluded the judgment by saying: "The object of the Legislature in the different sections referred to seems to have been to give a legislative sanction to the practice of the Court of Admiralty of indirectly rewarding salvors for the preservation of human life by allowing the value of their services to be made the subject of a distinct estimate, but without intending to fix the responsibility of payment upon one class of owners of property involved in the common peril more than on another."

Now, it has been contended, as I have already observed, that these judgments are erroneous, and should be reconsidered, and would, perhaps, be reversed before another tribunal. I am not of that opinion myself, but I am clearly of the opinion that if I was, it would be improper in me to give a judgment in any way at variance with the decision of my predecessor and the Privy Council, and I decline to do so. It has been contended that there is a distinction between this case and The Fusilier—that in this case the cargo was saved afterwards by the owners, and no cargo at the time by the salvors, when the lives of these passengers were saved. I am unable to follow any distinction in principle between the two cases. The Fusilier I have before me, and the argument there, that it was not a salvage service, appears to me to be wholly untenable. The property here saved amounted to 40,000*l.* in specie. I think that the cargo so saved was liable under the statute to which I have referred, in accordance with the judgment to which I have adverted, and was liable to pay salvage remuneration to those who saved the lives, by whomsoever it was saved. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment in The Fusilier supports the present case.

It remains only to say what shall be the remuneration the court ought to award. The property is very large—40,000*l.*; and the services, though not very effective, were not long or attended with much danger to the parties concerned. They lasted between three and four hours, and there is no doubt whatever that the lives of these persons would have been irrecoverably lost but for the exertions of these men. I have already spoken of the praise which they deserve in their hastening to save human life, and, therefore, I need not refer to that again. It has been said that they have received 75*l.* But, on looking at the affidavit, it appears it must be really considered as not paid so as to cover the amount payable as its proportion by the cargo, but as paid by the passengers themselves, from their natural desire to give some reward out of their own pocket to those who saved their lives. There are four boats, and I think I shall make a fair award if I allow 500*l.* to all the boats, and that is the judgment which I deliver.

COURT OF APPEAL.

SITTINGS AT LINCOLN'S INN.

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Reported by J. P. Aspinall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, April 12, 1876.

The Victoria.

Appeal—Security for costs—Arrest of ship—Bail bond—Supreme Court Rules, Order LVIII., rules 15, 16.

The Court of Appeal will not order security for costs of an appeal except under special circumstances. A plaintiff arresting a ship which is released on bail and against which he obtains a decree is not entitled to security for the costs of appeal, merely because the bail bond only covers the costs of the court below and not of the Court of Appeal.

This was a cause instituted on behalf of the master of the Victoria against that vessel to recover his wages and disbursements. The ship was arrested and was subsequently released on the ordinary bail bond being given by the defendants in the month of Sept. 1875. The cause was tried in Dec. 1875, and a decree was given in favour of the plaintiff and the question of amount was referred to the registrar and merchants. From this decree the defendants appealed and obtained an order from the judge of the Admiralty Division staying proceedings pending the appeal under the rules of the Supreme Court Order LVIII., rule 16.

The plaintiff now applied to the Court of Appeal that the defendant might be ordered under Order LVIII., rule 15, to make or give a deposit or security for costs.

Maclachlan, for the plaintiff.—The ship has been released and the bail bond does not cover the costs of the appeal. It is the ordinary form in use before the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), and consequently does not cover the costs of appeal despite sect. 33 of that Act. (The Helene, B. & L. 425). The Privy Council has in certain cases enforced distinct security for costs of an appeal.

Macpherson, P.C. Practice, p. 156.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.

James, L.J.—It must not be considered to be the general practice to require security for the costs of an appeal. It will be required only where there are special circumstances, and such do not exist here. No form of bond covering the costs of an appeal has been shown to us, and the practice of Privy Council seems clear that except under special circumstances security for costs is not required. The same practice will be followed here, and this application dismissed with costs.

The City of Brooklyn.

Collision—Speed—Steamship—Lights—Showing signal astern—Regulations.

When a night is so dark that a steamer cannot make out other vessels until within her own length of them, she is not justified in running at such a speed that she cannot then avoid coming into collision with them.

A vessel is not bound to show a light or signal astern to a following vessel, unless there is apparent danger from that vessel.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Admiralty division of the High Court of Justice in an action brought by the owners of the Italian barque, I. Mille, against the owners of the screw steamer, City of Brooklyn, to recover damages caused by a collision between the two vessels.

The statement of claim on behalf of the plaintiff was as follows:

1. Shortly before 4 a.m. of 7th Jan. 1876, the Italian barque, I. Mille, of 376 tons register or thereabouts, of which some of the plaintiffs were the owners, manned by Guiseppi Burlando, her master, and a crew of eleven hands, was about thirty-five miles distant from the Old Head of Kinsale, proceeding on a voyage from Marianople to Queenstown for orders as to her port of discharge.

2. The wind at this time was about S.E. by E., the weather was cloudy but clear, and the I. Mille was under inner jib foretopmast staysail, foresail, lower foretopsail, main upper and lower topsails, and mizen stormsail close hauled on the starboard tack, heading N.E. by E., and making about three knots an hour, with a green light on the starboard side, and a red light on the port side, both duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look out was being kept from on board her.

3. At such time the bright white light of a vessel, which proved to be the steamship City of Brooklyn, was seen at the distance of about three or four miles, and on the port quarter of the I. Mille. Shortly afterwards the green light of the City of Brooklyn was also seen, and the I. Mille was kept on her course close hauled to the wind on the starboard tack, in the expectation that the City of Brooklyn would keep out of her way. The City of Brooklyn, however, notwithstanding that the bell of the I. Mille was rung, and those on board the I. Mille loudly hailed the City of Brooklyn to keep away, ran into and struck the I. Mille on the port side about the main hatch, and cut into her, and did her so much damage, that she sank shortly afterwards and three of her crew were drowned. The rest of the crew of the I. Mille succeeded in getting on board the City of Brooklyn, and were afterwards taken by her to Liverpool.

4. A good look-out was not kept on board the City of Brooklyn.

5. The City of Brooklyn improperly neglected to take in due time proper measures for keeping out of the way of the I. Mille, and improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the I. Mille.

6. The City of Brooklyn improperly neglected to comply with Article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The defendants' statement of defence was so far as material as follows:—

1. About 4.15 a.m. on the 7th Jan. 1876, the steamship City of Brooklyn, of 1978 tons register, 2911 tons gross measurement, of which the defendants were and are owners, whilst on a voyage from New York to Liverpool viâ Queenstown with a general cargo and passengers was about 25 miles east of the Fastnet.

2. The wind at such time was about south-east, a moderate breeze, the tide was ebb and of little force, the weather was cloudy and very dark, and the City of Brooklyn was under steam alone, proceeding at the rate of about ten knots and a half per hour. She had her proper masthead and side lights duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look out was being kept on board her.

3. At such time the red light of the I. Mille was seen at the distance of about from one to two ship's lengths from the City of Brooklyn, and bearing about from half a point to a point on her starboard bow. The engines of the City of Brooklyn were immediately stopped and reversed, and an order was given to put the helm hard-a-port, but such order was immediately countermanded, and an order was given to hard-a-starboard, and the helm was starboarded, but the City of Brooklyn, with the starboard side of her stem came into collision with the port side of the I. Mille, about abreast of the forehatch, and the I. Mille shortly afterwards sank, and although every effort was made by the master and the crew of the City of Brooklyn to save the master and crew of the I. Mille, several of the crew were drowned.

4. Before the said red light of the I. Mille was seen, the relative positions of the two ships were such that the City of Brooklyn was coming without any light of the I. Mille visible to those on board the City of Brooklyn, and owing to the darkness those on board the City of Brooklyn, although they kept a good look out, were unable to discover the I. Mille until her said light was seen as aforesaid.

5. Those on board the I. Mille acted negligently and improperly by omitting to show a light or make a signal, or otherwise to take proper measures to warn those on board the City of Brooklyn of the presence and position of the I. Mille.

6. Those on board the I. Mille neglected to observe and comply with the provisions of Articles 19 and 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

7. The collision was so far as regards the City of Brooklyn the result of inevitable accident.

The plaintiffs joined issue on this statement of defence, and also demurred to so much of the 5th paragraph thereof as alleged that the I. Mille acted negligently and improperly by omitting to show a light, and said that the said paragraph was bad in law, because it was not the duty of the I. Mille to show a light other than the regulation lights.

Feb. 15.—Gainsford Bruce in support of the demurrer contended that the duty as to exhibiting lights and signals was prescribed by the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, and that there are in such regulations no rule prescribing such a light or signal as that required by the defendants.

E. C. Clarkson contended that whether there was or was not such a duty depended upon the circumstances of each case. There might be circumstances where there was such a duty, and one of the questions of fact in the present was, whether such circumstances existed here. Hence the pleading was good.

Sir R. Phillimore.—As the circumstances may be such as to bring the case within the ruling of the Privy Council in the cases cited, and may show a duty to exhibit a light or signal as alleged, the defendant is entitled to judgment on the demurrer with costs. The question of law as to the duty will arise when the facts have been heard.

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a case of collision which happened shortly after four o'clock in the morning on 7th Jan. 1876, and I may observe, in passing, that it is satisfactory that a case may be brought into this court in such a short time after the accident happened. The direction of the wind is variously stated as S.E. by E. and S.E., and the weather, which is an important element in the decision of this case, is admitted on all hands to have been as follows:—There was an extremely dark night, in which lights were visible at the proper distance, but objects were not visible until within a shorter distance. The speed of both vessels is not contested in this case. There is no dispute that the City of Brooklyn was an overtaking vessel, and that the Italian barque was the vessel ahead. In my judgment the rule of law which applies to this case is in the 17th Article of the Sailing Rules, which says, "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel, shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel." Here it may be proper to observe that the evidence fully establishes that the sailing vessel kept her course, and, further, that at the time when the sailing vessel was discerned by the steamer, no manœuvre on the part of the steamer could have prevented the collision, either by porting or starboarding.

Now, the defence is this, that the collision so far as regards the City of Brooklyn, was the result of inevitable accident. On that I have had a careful conference with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, who are satisfied that the accident cannot be properly described as inevitable. Disposing of that part of the defence, I come to another, in which the I. Mille is charged with acting negligently or improperly by not showing another light to warn those on board the City of Brooklyn of her presence. The first question which I have had to consider with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House is this, whether the Italian barque carrying the canvas that is specified—inner jib, foretopmast staysail, foresail, lower foretopsail, main upper and lower topsails, and mizen stormsail—ought to have been visible at a sufficient distance, that is, between 300 and 400 yards, by a good look out on board the City of Brooklyn. The Elder Brethren have brought to the solution of this question their own personal knowledge and experience of the distance at which vessels are visible in such a state of the weather as is proved in this case, and they are of opinion that the I. Mille ought to have been seen at a distance which would have prevented the collision. Unfortunately the starboard look-out, who is an important person in this case, has not been produced. It is proved that search has been made for him, but that he cannot be found, and his absence is an important circumstance. The elder brethren are of opinion that the barque could be seen from the forecastle further off than from aft, and that she ought to have been visible in sufficient time to have enabled the steamer to have got out of her way. But I do not like to leave the case solely upon that issue.

The next question I have to put to them is whether the sailing vessel, seeing this green and white light—assuming it was her duty to exhibit some light or make some signal—was not justified in thinking that up to the last moment the steamer would pass clear of her to leeward. I think that she was so justified—that is, all along proceeding on the assumption that it was necessary for the sailing vessel to do some act by indicating her presence to the overtaking vessel.

The next question I have had to deal with is whether the speed of the steamer was or was not proper in the circumstances. Now she was going within four or five miles of the Irish coast, where the currents would be rapid, and she was going full speed, although it was so dark that she could not see another vessel ahead of her until she came absolutely alongside of her. Now in my opinion that speed, under the circumstances, was improper on the part of the City of Brooklyn, and that that has another bearing besides is proved in the result upon the facts of the case.

If it was the duty of the sailing vessel to give a signal to the vessel overtaking her at a time when she saw she could not pass her, she did make the attempt to do so, she caused the bell to be rung before the time of the collision, but this was for some reason or other never heard by any one on board the City of Brooklyn. The boatswain was also sent up to light the flare or flash light, but he was unable to do more than move about two or three lucifers, which did not take light, and he was then obliged to go away because the other vessel was advancing at a rate of about a quarter of a mile in a minute and a half, therefore the speed of the other vessel prevented the overtaken vessel from doing that which it is contended she ought to have done—i.e., making a signal to the other vessel. I am bound to say, as to the duty of the vessel ahead, that has been discussed in the cases of The Earl Spencer and The Anglo-Indian, and there is a decision of the Privy Council upon the point (ante, pp. 1, 4). Now their Lordships there say they are very far from saying that it is never the duty of a vessel ahead to look behind. There may undoubtedly be circumstances of an exceptional character which may throw upon the vessel ahead the duty of looking behind further than giving some signal, by way of a light or otherwise, to the vessel behind, whilst there are circumstances under which there is reason to suppose that the after vessel does not see the vessel in front, and where there is danger of collision. So far as the statute regulations are concerned, I went into the matter at considerable length in the case of The Earl Spencer (ubi sup.), and as far as they are concerned there is certainly no law binding upon the vessel ahead to exhibit a light astern, and if it had been the intention of the Legislature that she should be under that obligation, there are several rules in which one would expect to find an expression of that intention. But I am of opinion and the elder brethren agree with me, that in this case there are no exceptional circumstances which compelled this vessel to exhibit a stern light, at least at the time when she attempted to do so, and when the speed of the other vessel prevented her succeeding in the attempt.

Looking to all the circumstances of this case, I am of opinion that the City of Brooklyn is alone to blame for this collision, and I decree accordingly, with costs upon the higher scale. Execution stayed for a fortnight.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

May 16.—The appeal came on for hearing before James, L.J., Baggallay, J. A., and Lush, J., and two nautical assessors.

Butt, Q.C., E. C. Clarkson, and Myburgh, for the appellants.—The night being clear there was no reason why the steamer should not go at full speed. To condemn a vessel for going fast under ordinary circumstances is to interfere with the convenience of commerce and passengers, and unless there is apparent danger there ought to be no restriction. But even if the steamer was going at too high a speed the barque contributed to the accident by not showing a proper light in time to warn the steamer. She must have known the steamer could not see her, and that she must be overtaken. There is nothing in the regulations expressly compelling such a course, but it is an ordinary seamanlike precaution which ought to have been taken in this case:

Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the respondents, were not called upon.

James, L.J.—I am opinion that we cannot come to any conclusion different from that to which the learned judge below has come, that conclusion being in accordance with the opinion of the nautical assessors upon this matter, which is to a great extent a matter of nautical skill and science.

The learned judge was of opinion that the ship complained of was going at a speed not to be justified, having regard to the state of the night, the position of the coast, and the probability of there being other vessels coming in the way; and I am bound to say that however convenient it may be for commerce and travellers—however convenient it may be to be able to go to America at eleven or twelve miles an hour—it is still a speed which it does not seem to us to be reasonable for a steamer like this to go at when not far from the coast, and on a night so dark, according to the evidence of their own witnesses, that they could not see another vessel more than the length of a ship away. It is said a look out on such a night could not, with the steamer going at such a pace, have seen a vessel ahead in time to avoid her, and that consequently the steamer ought not to have gone at such a pace.

It is said on the other hand, on behalf of the steamer, that if the other ship did see the steamer she ought to have shown a light. Of course we cannot suppose that any captain would wantonly neglect to take the necessary precautions to save his own life and the lives of his men, which would necessarily be at risk if such a steamer as this ran into their own vessel. Therefore we must suppose that he formed the best judgment he could, and did everything that would help to avoid a collision. When he saw the danger, he did, apparently, what he could; he ordered the bell to be rung and a line to be got, but it was too late.

I am of opinion, therefore, that whatever may have occurred in other cases, where it was held to be the duty of a ship to warn another of the risk she was running, there were in this case no such circumstances as to show any neglect of duty upon the part of the crew of the Italian ship, or that they did anything to justify our charging them with contributory negligence. I am, upon the whole, of the same opinion as the court below.

Baggallay, J. A.—I am of the same opinion.

Lush, J.—I am also of the same opinion.

I think the rule of law, with regard to travelling at sea, is identical with the law of travelling on the high road. No one on a dark night has a right to go at such a rate of speed as not to be able to escape an accident if he happens to follow immediately in the wake of another, whether it be by sea or land. I think that the rate of speed was an unjustifiable rate for that vessel to run on such a dark night when she could not discern another vessel until within her own length of that vessel.

As to contributory negligence, I do not think there is any necessity for a ship ahead to look out for ships that are behind her unless the danger is apparent. It is only when there is an apparent danger that the necessity arises to do the best they can for their own safety. Here the persons on board the first ship did so, but when it was too late.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Collision—Appeal—Facts—Reversing dicision of court below—Lookout.

The Court of Appeal has great reluctance in reversing a decision of a judge of first instance where he has come to a conclusion of fact upon conflicting testimony and after hearing the witnesses, but where the court of first instance draws inferences from the facts proved before it, a decision founded upon such inferences will be reviewed, and if necessary reversed without great pressure by the Court of Appeal, if erroneous.

A steamship running through a roadstead should, in addition to her master on the bridge, carry a lookout man in the day time.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Admiralty Division in an action instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Glannibanta against the steamship Transit and her freight to recover damages occasioned by a collision between the two ships.

The plaintiffs' statement of claim in court below was so far as material as follows:

1. Shortly before 1 p.m. on the 23rd Jan. 1876, the three-masted iron screw steamer Glannibanta, of 534 tons register, and ninety-nine-horse power, of which the plaintiffs were owners, whilst proceeding from London to the Tyne ballast, had passed St. Nicholas' light-vessel for the purpose of entering and proceeding through Yarmouth Roads.

2. The wind at this time was about south west, a light breeze, the weather was fine, and the tide was in the last quarter ebb and of the force of about half a knot per hour, and the Glannibanta, under steam and sail, was steering about north, and proceeding at the rate of about nine knots per hour.

3. At such time those on board the Glannibanta observed an approaching steamer under steam and sail (which proved to be the steamship Transit proceeded against in this action) bearing about two points on the port bow of the Glannibanta, and at the distance of about one half to three quarters of a mile.

4. The helm of the Glannibanta was slightly ported, and she was kept on with a view to passing the Transit port side to port side. The Transit, instead of passing the Glannibanta on her port side as she should have done, starboarded her helm and caused danger of collision, and although the engines of the Glannibanta were immediately stopped and reversed, and her helm was starboarded, the Transit, with her starboard side abreast of the foremast, came into contact with the stem of the Glannibanta, and a great deal of damage was thereby done to the Glannibanta.

5. The Transit improperly neglected to take proper measures for passing the Glannibanta on her port side.

6. Those on board the Transit improperly starboarded the helm of the Transit.

7. Those on board the Transit did not duly observe and comply with the provisions of article 16 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea.

8. The said collision was occasioned by the negligent and improper navigation of the Transit.

9. The said collision was not occasioned by any negligence or default on the part of those on board the Glannibanta.

The defendants delivered a statement of defence and counter-clain which so far as material was as follows:

1. The Transit a screw steamship of 345 tons register and ninety-horse power with a crew of twenty-one hands left Grimsby about 2 a.m. of the 23rd Jan. 1876, with a general cargo bound for Dieppe.

2. Shortly before 1 a.m. of the same day the Transit in the course of her voyage was passing through Yarmouth-roads heading about S. by W. and keeping well over to the east side of the roads as is the practice with vessels southward bound. The wind was about S.W. The weather was fine. The tide was ebb about three knots an hour. The Transit under sail as well as steam was making about eight knots an hour. A good look out was kept on board her.

3. In these circumstances those on board the Transit observed the steamship Glannibanta about a mile off right ahead and drawing on to their starboard bow under steam and sail, having signals flying and apparently heading towards the town of Great Yarmouth. The helm of the Transit was starboarded about two points and then steadied, and the Transit kept on, those on board her expecting the Glannibanta, to pass starboard side to starboard side. The Glannibanta, however, as she drew near ported her helm and caused danger of collision and notwithstanding that the engines of the Transit were stopped and reversed the Glaanibanta came into collision with her striking her with the stem very violently on her starboard bow in the fore-rigging.

4. Save as hereinbefore appears the several allegations contained in the statement of claim are untrue.

5. A good lookout was not kept on board the Glannibanta.

6. The helm of the Glannibanta was improperly ported.

7. Those on board the Glannibanta improperly neglected or omitted to keep on her course.

8. Those on board the Glannibanta improperly neglected or omitted to ease, stop, and reverse her engines.

9. The collision was occasioned by some or all of the matters and things alleged in the 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th paragraphs hereof or otherwise by the default of the Glannibanta or those on board of her.

10. No blame in respect of the collision is attributable to the Transit or to any of those on board her.

The cause was heard in the court below on the 21st March 1876 before the judge (Sir R. Phillimore) and Trinity Masters; judgment was then given.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the plaintiff.

Benjamin, Q.C., Phillimore, and Stubbs, for the defendants.

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is an important case of collision which happened about one o'clock in the middle of the day on the 23rd Jan. this year, in Yarmouth Roads somewhere about the South Elbow Buoy and the South-west Scroby Buoy off the Scroby Sands; the state of the weather was fine and clear and the tide was ebb. The vessels that came together in this collision were the three-masted iron screw steamship the Glannibanta, of 534 tons register, and ninety-nine horse power, the plaintiff in this suit, going from London to the Tyne in ballast, and the Transit, a screw steamer of 345 tons register, and ninety-horse power, with a crew of twenty-one hands, bound from Grimsby to Dieppe with a general cargo. The parts of the vessels which came into contact were the stem of the Glannibanta and the starboard side of the Transit, just abreast of the foremast.

The case has been very well argued on both sides, and the importance of it well deserved such an argument. I have carefully considered the arguments and the evidence with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and it is with their entire concurrence that I pronounce the following judgment:

It appears that the Glannibanta, preceded (a very material fact in this case) by a steamer called the Paradox, came through Hewitt's Channel, and left the St. Nicholas light vessel on her port side and the Scroby S. Elbow Buoy on her starboard side. It is expedient in all these cases, if possible, to see what the natural and proper conduct of a vessel would be, before we consider the conduct she actually pursued. Now in this case the natural and proper conduct for the Glannibanta was to make a fair course under her starboard helm to the N.N.W., and to port when clear of the Scroby buoys, and alter her course as she passed the lightship to N. or N. half E., and having done that to straighten down the roads, keeping the buoys on her starboard hand. That is not denied to have been her natural course, but it has been contended, and with very great power, that her fault was this, that she went towards Yarmouth further than was necessary and proper and thereby brought her starboard side open to the Transit, which, on seeing her starboard side, was justified in starboarding, which it is admitted that she did. Amid a considerable conflict of evidence, we are opinion that we may safely rely upon the testimony given by those on board the Paradox—by the two witnesses produced from that steamer—and according to their evidence the Transit passed the Paradox port side to port side. At that time the Glannibanta was about a quarter of a mile astern, it might have been a little more or little less, and half a point on the port quarter of the Paradox, and as the witness described it "on the edge of her wake" on a north course. It is clear that the Transit did not alter her helm until she had passed the Paradox, and therefore, not until the Glannibanta had straightened down and consequently the Glannibanta must have been at that time on the Transit's port bow. It is admitted that the Transit starboarded about two points, and the great debate before me has been when she effected that manœuvre.

Now for the reasons alleged it appears to us that she must have done so when the Glannibanta was on her port side, and that therefore she is alone to blame.

From this judgment the owners of the Transit appealed, and the appeal came on for hearing before James, L.J., Baggallay, J.A, and Lush, J., assisted by nautical assessors.

The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

May 17 and 18.—Benjamin, Q.C., Phillimore, and Stubbs, for the appellants.

Milward, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Clarkson, for the respondents. Cur. adv. vult.

May 29.—The judgment of the court (James, L.J., Baggallay, J.A. and Lush, J., assisted by two nautical assessors) was delivered by Baggallay, J.A.—On the 23rd Jan. 1876, about one p.m., two iron screw steamships, the Glannibanta and the Transit, came into collision in Yarmouth Roads, and both vessels sustained considerable damage. The weather was fine and clear, the wind in the S.W., blowing a light breeze, with no sea, and the tide on the last quarter ebb, running to the northward. It does not appear that the roadstead was unusually crowded with vessels, and it is difficult to imagine a state of circumstances under which, with the use of reasonable precautions, a collision was less likely to occur.

On the 25th Jan. an action for damages in respect of this collision was commenced in the Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, by the owners of the Glannibanta, against the owners of the Transit, and was met by a counter claim for damages on the part of the latter.

The action came on for hearing before the judge of the Admiralty Division on the 20th and 21st March. On the latter day the learned Judge decided that the Transit was alone to blame, and made the usual order for assessing the damage sustained by the Glannibanta, and from that decision the present appeal is brought.

The Glannibanta was a vessel of 534 tons register, and was proceeding from London to the Tyne in ballast; the Transit was of 345 tons register, and was on a voyage from Grimsby to Dieppe with a general cargo. Shortly before the collision, the Glannibanta had come through Hewitt's Channel, and had passed the St. Nicholas lightship on her course northwards, and the Transit had passed the Belle Buoy on her course southwards; the collision took place between the South Elbow and the south-west Scroby buoys, at a distance from the Scroby Sands of from a quarter to half a mile.

The plaintiffs allege that, immediately after passing the St. Nicholas lightship, the Glannibanta, which had previously been steering N. by W., ported her helm so as to change her course to N. half E., and proceeded down the roads at the rate of about nine knots an hour, but shortly before one p.m., those on board her saw the Transit approaching, bearing about two points on the port bow, and at the distance of from a half to three quarters of a mile, that the helm of the Glannibanta was again slightly ported, and she was kept on her course, with the intention of passing the Transit, port side to port side; but that the Transit, instead of passing the Glannibanta on her port side, suddenly, and with the apparent intention of crossing the bows of the Glannibanta, starboarded her helm, and although the engines of the Glannibanta were immediately stopped and reversed, and her helm was starboarded, the starboard side of the Transit, abreast of her foremast, came into contact with the stern of the Glannibanta.

The defendants, on the other hand, allege that when the Transit first observed the Glannibanta, the latter was about a mile ahead, that the Transit was then heading about S. by W., well over to the east side of the roads, and proceeding at the rate of about eight knots an hour; that the Glannibanta was not then approaching so as to pass port side to port side, but was continuing on her N. by W. course, by which she had passed the lightship, and was apparently heading to the town of Yarmouth, and communicating with the shore by signals; that the Transit, in this belief, and expecting the Glannibanta to pass starboard to starboard, starboarded about two points, but the Glannibanta suddenly ported, then, for the first time, straightening down the roads, and the vessels were almost immediately in collision, notwithstanding the stoppage and reversal of the engines of the Transit. The defendants further allege that there was no proper or sufficient look-out on board the Glannibanta; and then, when she so ported, those on board her were not aware that the Transit was so close to them, and only discovered the fact after they had ported, and when the collision was inevitable. It is not immaterial to note that, having regard to the speed at which the two vessels were proceeding, they were nearing each other at the rate of about a mile in three minutes to three minutes and a half. Now, the substantial question which had to be decided in the court of the Admiralty Division, and which has to be decided by us in the present appeal, is as to the time at which the Glannibanta straightened her course from N. by W. to N. half E., whether she did so at the time of, or immediately after, passing the St. Nicholas lightship, as alleged by the plaintiffs, or whether, as alleged by the defendants, she continued on her N. by W. course for some half a mile or three quarters of a mile after she had passed the lightship, and then and not till then, straightened her course. If the former be the correct view of the case, it is clear, upon the evidence, that the Transit was in error in starboarding when she did, and if the latter is the correct view, it is equally clear upon the evidence, that the Glannibanta ought not to have ported when in such close proximity to the Transit. This question was decided by the learned Judge of the Admiralty Division, in accordance with the plaintiff's contention, and he appears to have been much influenced in arriving at this conclusion by the course taken by another steamer, the Paradox, which was at the same time proceeding to the north, and by the evidence given by persons who were on board the Paradox, respecting the movements of the Glannibanta and the Transit. The Paradox had passed the St. Nicholas lightship somewhat in advance of the Glannibanta, and had changed her course on passing the lightship from N. by W. to N. half E., so as to straighten down the roads, and on meeting the Transit had passed her port side to port side. From this the learned Judge very justly inferred that the course so made by the Paradox was the natural and proper course for any other ship similarly circumstanced, and having stated that in his opinion the natural course for the Glannibanta was to have ported immediately on passing the lightship, he proceeded to refer to the argument which had been addressed to him on the part of the defendants, and which was the same in substance as has been addressed to us here, in the following terms: "The porting or passing the lightship is not denied to have been her natural course, but it has been contended, and with very great power, that her fault was this, that she went towards Yarmouth further than was necessary or proper, and thereby brought her starboard side open to the Transit, which, on seeing the starboard side, was justified in starboarding."

To this argument, and the evidence upon the subject of it, the learned Judge next addressed himself, and having stated that in the conflict of evidence he and the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House were of opinion that they might safely rely upon the testimony of those who had been on board the Paradox, he acted upon the evidence of those witnesses; and considering it to be thereby established that the Glannibanta had followed in the wake of the Paradox, he held that the Transit had starboarded when the Glannibanta was on her port bow, and had thus caused the collision, for which she was alone to blame.

If this view be correct, it of course negatives the contention of the defendants that the Glannibanta continued on her course of N. by W. for some distance after she had passed the lightship. In the course of the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs we were much pressed with the language from time to time made use of by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Admiralty cases, and particularly in the cases of The Julia (Lush. 224; 14 Moore, P. C. C. 210), and The Alice (3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 103), to the effect that if in the court of Admiralty there was conflicting evidence, and the judge of that court, having had the opportunity of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, had come, on the balance of testimony, to a clear and decisive conclusion, the Judicial Committee would not be disposed to reverse such decision, except in cases of extreme and overwhelming pressure, and it was urged upon us that in the present case there was no such extreme and overwhelming pressure as should induce us to reverse the decision of the Admiralty as to the question of fact upon which its decision was based. Now we feel, as strongly as did the Lords of the Privy Council in the cases just referred to, the great weight that is due to the decision of a judge of first instance, whenever, in a conflict of testimony, the demeanour and manner of the witnesses who have been seen and heard by him are, as they were in the cases referred to, material elements in the consideration of the truthfulness of their statements.

But the parties to the cause are nevertheless entitled, as well on question of fact as on questions of law, to demand the decision of the Court of Appeal, and that court cannot excuse itself from the task of weighing conflicting evidence, and drawing its own inferences and conclusions, though it should always bear in mind that it has neither seen nor heard the witnesses, and should make due allowance in this respect.

In the present case, it does not appear from the judgment, nor is there any reason to suppose, that the learned judge at all proceeded upon the manner or demeanour of the witnesses; on the contrary, it would appear that his judgment in fact proceeded upon the inferences which he drew from the evidence before him, and which we have really the same means of considering that he had, and with this further advantage, that we have had his view of the inferences to be drawn from the evidence as well as the evidence itself made the subject of elaborate and able discussion on both sides.

Having given our best consideration to the evidence in this case, we are unable to arrive at the same conclusion as that arrived at by the learned judge of the Admiralty Division. It is quite true, as has been already stated that the evidence of the captain and helmsman of the Paradox is to the effect that in their opinion the Glannibanta ported her helm immediately after she had passed the lightship, and that such evidence is in accordance with the captain and helmsman of the Glannibanta, but it is in our opinion clear, from the circumstances to which we are about to advert, and to which the attention of the judge of the Admiralty Division does not appear to have been directed, that these witnesses must have been mistaken. The captain of the Glannibanta himself most distinctly states that he saw the Transit directly after he ported, and that she was then about half a mile or a little more from the Glannibanta; and this is supported by other persons who were on board the Glannibanta. Now, there is no dispute that the point at which the collision took place was upwards of a mile to the north of the lightship, though there is some slight difference of opinion as to the distance from Scroby Sands, and as the two vessels were approaching each other at about equal rates, the Transit must at the time when the Glannibanta passed the lightship have been at least a mile to the north of the point of collision, and at least two miles from the Glannibanta, and had the Glannibanta ported her helm immediately on passing the lightship, the Transit, when first seen from the Glannibanta, must have been at least two miles distant instead of half a mile or three-quarters of a mile, which most of the witnesses, except those who were on board the Paradox, agree in treating as about the distance between the two ships when the Glannibanta straightened her course. If, however, as is contended by the defendants, the Glannibanta did not port her helm until she had left the lightship more than half a mile behind her, she would have been when she ported about half a mile to three-quarters of a mile from the Transit, each being about a quarter of a mile from the eventual point of collision.

Under these circumstances, having given our best consideration to all the evidence in the case, and having had the benefit of the advice of the nautical assessors, by whom we have been assisted on the present occasion, we have arrived at the following conclusions, in which they entirely concur:

1. That the Glannibanta continued on her course for more than half a mile after she had passed the lightship, whether or not she did so for the purpose of interchanging signals with Yarmouth, as suggested by the defendants, it is immaterial for us to consider. The fact is proved to demonstration by the evidence of the captain of the Glannibanta, and it follows from this,

2. That by keeping on this course she led those on board the Transit to believe, and that they were justified in believing, that she was making for Yarmouth, and would pass them starboard to starboard.

3. That, having regard to these circumstances, the Transit was fully justified in starboarding when the Glannibanta was first seen from her deck, and that the Glannibanta was not justified in porting when in such close proximity to the Transit.

4. That the collision was occasioned by such improper porting of the Glannibanta, it being practically impossible to avoid a collision after the course of the Glannibanta had been changed.

In arriving at these conclusions, we are doubtless dissenting from the view expresssed by the captain and helmsman of the Paradox, upon which the Judge of the Admiralty Division relied, but we can well understand how in such a case persons desiring to speak with the most perfect honesty and accuracy, may have been mistaken. There was nothing in the surrounding circumstances prior to the collision to direct the attention of the people on board the Paradox to the movements of the Transit and the Glannibanta, so as to induce them to watch such movements with any particular nicety, and the want of accuracy in such casual notices as were taken is exemplified by the circumstance that the captain of the Paradox states that the Glannibanta, after she had straightened her course, was a quarter of a mile astern of him, whilst his helmsman makes the distance 200 yards only, and the captain of the Glannibanta says he was as much as half a mile, or nearly so, astern.

We cannot part with this case without expressing our surprise that there should have been no proper or sufficient look-out on board the Glannibanta, for had there been a proper look-out, and the Transit had been seen from the Glannibanta, as in such case she must have been before the latter ported, we cannot for a moment suppose that that change of course would have been made. The captain of the Glannibanta, in his examination, stated that it was not a customary thing to keep a man on the look-out in the daytime on board ships belonging to his owners, and, on the occasion in question, until after she had ported, the captain was the only person on the look-out, and he was on the bridge, with his view forward limited by reason of the sails on his own ship to four points on the starboard bow. A very different course was pursued by the Transit, on board of which an efficient look-out was kept by her captain and mate on the bridge, and by a seaman well forward in the bows. We have only further to remark, that having regard to the fact that the Transit had a proper and efficient look-out in every direction, the course pursued by her of starboarding when she first saw the Glannibanta would be quite inexplicable if the vessels had been approaching each other port side to port side, as contended for by the plaintiffs. It appears to us impossible to adopt the suggested explanation of the plaintiffs, that by crossing the bows of the Glannibanta the Transit might save a little distance in her course to the south, and that that was her object in starboarding. On the other hand, we can well understand that the Glannibanta, having no sufficient look-out, ported her helm in ignorance of the position of the Transit, and simply with the view of straightening her course down the roads.

The Transit was, in our opinion, very carefully and cautiously handled. The Glannibanta was carelessly and recklessly managed in changing her course in ignorance of the position of another vessel which was only half a mile off. It is possible, no doubt, that the careful ship may have blunderingly gone wrong, and that the careless ship may by accident have gone right, but the burthen of proof on the latter is then very heavy, and the Glannibanta has certainly not discharged it in this case.

It may be well to add, that having regard to the position of the Glannibanta and Paradox in passing the lightship, and their position when the Glannibanta sighted the Transit, the Glannibanta, the faster ship, must have lost instead of gaining ground, which can only be accounted for by the one having taken a straight and the other a devious course. Upon the whole we are of opinion that the Glannibanta was alone to blame, and that, consequently, the appeal must be allowed, the order of the court below discharged, and the usual order of reference made for assessing the damage sustained by the Transit. The costs both of the court below and of the appeal must follow the result. Judgment reversed.

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Thursday, May 18, 1876.

THE ANNA.

Necessaries—Jurisdiction—Foreign ship—Colonial port.

The Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice has jurisdiction to entertain an action brought for necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a British Colonial port. The Wataga (Swab. 165) followed.

Where a master in a colonial port unable to procure or pay for necessaries otherwise draws a bill of exchange upon a firm of shipbrokers in this country who accept and pay the bill, such shipbrokers can proceed against the ship as for necessaries supplied in default of payment of the amount due by the shipowners.

The Onni (Lush. 154) followed.

THIS was an action in rem brought by Lloyd, Lowe, and Co., shipbrokers, of London, against the Norwegian vessel Anna, her owners intervening, to recover an amount alleged to be due to the plaintiffs as appeared by the following:

STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

1. The said barque or vessel is a Norwegian vessel belonging to the defendants, and arrived in the port of Liverpool, in the month of Dec. A.D. 1875.

2. The plaintiffs are shipbrokers, carrying on business in co-partnership, in London.

3. About the end of Oct. or beginning of Nov. A.D. 1875, the said vessel was lying at the port of Quebec, bound for some safe port on the West Coast of Great Britain.

4. The master of the said vessel was at Quebec aforesaid, then and there obliged to make certain necessary disbursements to the extent of 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* for and on account of and for the use of the said vessel, and for the supply of necessaries thereto; and being himself without funds and without credit, procured the said sum of 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* for the said necessaries, by means of a bill of exchange for the said amount then and there drawn by him upon the plaintiffs; and the said master thereupon advised the plaintiffs of the same by a letter which was in the words and figures following:

"Quebec, 6th Nov. 1875.

Messrs. Lloyd, Lowe, and Co., London.

Dear Sirs,—I have this day taken the liberty to value on you at thirty days' sight for 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* sterling—Two hundred and ninety-three pounds eight shillings and two-pence—in favour of Mr. Francis Gunn, of Quebec, being for the necessary disbursements of my vessel, the barque Anna of Christiana, which I hope you will duly honour on presentation, and please charge to account of said vessel and owners. P. Hernandsen, Esq., of Christiana. Your obedient servant, H. W. HANSEN,

Master of the barque Anna.

P.S. The above amount is duly insured from Quebec to Liverpool. Policy enclosed.

5. The plaintiffs duly accepted and paid the said bill of exchange at maturity.

6. The said bill of exchange was accepted and paid by the plaintiffs as aforesaid in the necessary service of the said vessel as aforesaid, and upon the credit of the said vessel, and not on the personal credit of the said master; and the said sum of 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* still remains wholly due and owing to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs claim:

1. Judgment for the said sum of 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.*
2. The condemnation of the said vessel and the defendants and their bail therein, and in the costs of this suit.
3. A reference, if necessary, of the claim of the plaintiffs to the registrar, assisted by assessors, to report the amount thereof.
4. Such further or other relief as the nature of the case may require.

To this statement the defendants demurred upon the grounds that a foreign ship cannot be made answerable for a claim in respect of necessaries supplied in a foreign port, and that the plaintiffs were, under the circumstances stated in the statement of claim, in no better position than the persons who supplied or advanced the alleged necessaries at Quebec aforesaid.

March 7. — Myburgh for the defendants in support of the demurrer. — If The Wataga (Swab. 165) is still to be considered as of binding authority, where it decided that necessaries supplied in a colonial port are within the jurisdiction, this point must be taken against me. But that decision can be supported upon the ground alone that the ship was upon the high seas at the time of the supply. Moreover, that decision is not consistent with Dr. Lushington's decisions in The Ocean (2 W. Rob. 368), and The India (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 316; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 390), where it was held that the statute did not give jurisdiction over necessaries supplied to a foreign ship in a foreign port. There is nothing in the act to show any distinction between a colonial and a foreign port, and all the argument in the judgment of The India (ubi sup.) covers colonial as well as foreign ports. [Sir R. Phillimore.—No points for argument have been delivered. I consider that as this court now has demurrers before it, the practice prevailing in the Common Law Divisions should prevail here also, and that in all cases to be argued on demurrer, the points for argument should be delivered.] The second point is that there is no allegation in the statement of claim, that at the time the money advanced was expended for necessary supplies, the owners of the ship were without credit; thirdly, the plaintiffs accepted the bill of exchange on the personal credit of the owners of the ship, as appears by the master's letter set out. Hence there is no claim against the ship, the plaintiffs having elected to proceed against the owners.

E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiffs.—Since the decision in The Wataga (Swab. 165), acquiesced in since 1856, the Legislature has dealt with the whole question by the Admiralty Court Act 1861, (24 Vict. c. 10), and has not seen fit to enact anything with respect to necessaries supplied to foreign ships in colonial ports. Hence it must be taken that the Legislature left the law as defined by this court intentionally as it then stood; secondly, the plaintiffs are at liberty to show the circumstances under which the necessaries are supplied, and it is sufficient for them to allege in their statement of claim, that the supplies were necessary. The jurisdiction does not depend upon whether credit is given to the owner or to the ship. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, gives jurisdiction independently of the question of credit. It must be presumed that the ship is liable, inasmuch as the necessaries were for her use: (The Perla, Swab. 353.) He also referred to Myburgh in reply.

Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a discussion which relates to the admissiblity of a demurrer to a statement of claim.

The Norwegian vessel Anna arrived in the port of Liverpool in the month of December 1875, and the master, finding himself without funds, had carried on board goods to the amount of 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* for the purpose of supplying necessaries to the vessel, and had borrowed the money by means of a bill of exchange, which is in these words:

Quebec, 6th Nov. 1875.

Messrs. Lloyd, Lowe and Co., London.

Dear Sirs,—I have this day taken the liberty to draw on you at thirty days' sight for 293*l.* 8*s.* 2*d.* sterling (two hundred and ninety-three pounds eight shillings and two pence), in favour of Mr. Francis Gunn, of Quebec, being for the necessary disbursements of my vessel, the barque Anna, of Christiana, which I hope you will duly honour on presentation, and please charge to account of said vessel and owner, P. Hernandsen, Esq., of Christiana.—Your obedient servant,

H. W. Hansen, Master of the barque Anna.

P.S.—The above amount is duly insured from Quebec to Liverpool. Policy enclosed.

Now these points have been made in support of this demurrer, and it will be convenient to take the first point last, because it is one of the greatest importance. The first of the two latter points is that it appears upon the statement of claim the money which had been paid by the bill of exchange had been expended in necessaries, and was obtained on the captain's personal credit, he being without funds ready. I am of opinion that that point is untenable. The third point is that the bill was accepted on the credit of the owners. That depends on the construction in some measure of the letter I have read. It is said that there is no claim upon the ship, and that the master of the vessel supplied the necessaries, and has to look only to the owners. Now in the first place it is distinctly pleaded in the sixth article that "the bill of exchange was accepted and paid by the plaintiffs for the necessary supplies of the vessel, and not on the personal credit of the master." It is contended that this written document cannot receive any construction from the statement contained in the 6th paragraph. I am by no means certain that it would not be proper in this case, in order to understand the letter to which I have referred, to take into consideration the surrounding circumstances. But I do not think it necessary to place the rejection of the demurrer upon that ground. I consider the question that was raised by my learned predecessor in the case of The Onni (Lush. 154) is substantially the same as the point raised here to-day. In that case he says: "I must now consider my jurisdiction entirely governed by the 3rd and 4th of Vict. c. 65, sect. 6. That section merely says that the court shall be authorised to decide all cases for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or seagoing vessel, and to enforce payment thereof. It makes no distinction whether the necessaries were furnished on personal credit or not. I have held that the advance of money for the procuring of necessaries is within the equitable construction of the statute. Can the present case be considered as a case of that kind? I can only judge by the information afforded me, and according to that affidavit the master obtains the money to procure necessaries by means of this bill, and the money so procured was duly expended for the benefit of the ship. I think in these circumstances I am justified in allowing this claim."

In this case the money was obtained by means of a bill of exchange to provide necessaries for the benefit of the ship. I am unable to find any substantial distinction on the matter between the two cases. I consider that case, therefore, is a precedent for the court in the present case.

I have only to advert to the first point raised in the discussion to which I referred, namely, the question as to whether the court has any jurisdiction in the circumstances of this case, the circumstances of this case being briefly that a Norwegian vessel has obtained necessaries when lying in the port of Quebec, and the plaintiffs, the ship's brokers, bring this suit under the 6th sect. of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, which enacts that "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatever in the nature of salvage services rendered to a sea going vessel in the nature of tonnage, or for necessaries supplied to a foreign vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel may have been in the body of a county, or upon the high seas." It was very properly admitted by Mr. Myburgh in the course of the argument that this point as to the question of jurisdiction was in reality, so far as necessities are concerned, decided by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Wataga (Swa. 165). It is not necessary to read the whole of that case, but that learned judge considered fully the effect of the statute, and came to a distinct conclusion. There an American ship had been supplied with necessaries, and had been arrested. It was a question of jurisdiction when brought into this court. The judgment was given in 1856, and as far as I know the question was decided at that time. I think, also, that it has received confirmation from the subsequent statute, 24 Vict. c. 10, sect. 5. I think that the argument which has been addressed to me by Mr. Clarkson upon that point is a sound argument, but in any case I should not think it right if I entertained an opinion which I by no means express, that Dr. Lushington had erred in his judgment, and had not taken the right view, to take upon myself to reverse his judgment, which I understand he had long considered, and I should leave the parties to resort, if aggrieved by my adhering to his decision, to the Court of Appeal. I am therefore of opinion that I ought to overrule the demurrer, and I so do. I give leave to the defendants to appeal.

From this judgment the defendants appealed.

May 18.—Myburgh (Milward, Q.C. with him). —Has the court jurisdiction over claims for necessaries supplied to a foreign vessel in a colonial port? When the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 was passed the Admiralty Court had no jurisdiction over causes of necessaries supplied whether in an English or a foreign port, and the words of that Act by which jurisdiction is given, whether the supply was "within the body of a county or upon the high seas," can only give jurisdiction over claims where the necessaries are supplied either in this country or on the high seas. The Act does not cover supplies made in all parts of the world or in any port out of England. Dr. Lushington so decided in The Ocean (2 W. Rob. 368), and though The Wataga (Swab. 165) makes an exception from this ruling in favour of necessaries supplied in a colonial port that latter decision ought not to be followed by this court. There is no essential difference between a foreign and a colonial port, and neither are within the words of the statute:

The India 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 316; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 390;
The Ella A Clark B. & L. 32.

[James, L.J.—Would not foreign owners suffer if the defendants were to succeed? Their masters could not obtain the necessary supplies. They would have no security to give the merchants]. Masters have without this power too much facility for spending money.

E. C. Clarkson, for the respondent, was not called upon.

James, L.J.—This case does not require a ormal judgment. Dr. Lushington, twenty years ago, in a very elaborate judgment, decided upon the construction of the statute, and that judgment has been acted upon ever since. The Legislature has since that time continually dealt with the matter, and if there had been any notion that the decision was wrong they would have made an alteration accordingly. We have no hesitation in coming to the same decision to which Dr. Lushington came twenty years ago. It is too late to raise questions of jurisdiction after that lapse of time.

Upon the other points it is perfectly clear what the decision should be.

Baggallay, J.A., and Lush, J., concurred.

Cargo ex Woosung.

Salvage—Government ship as salvor—Agreement—Validity of—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 484.

Although the captains, officers, and crews, of Government ships are entitled to be remunerated for salvage services to the same extent as officers and crews of merchant vessels would be rewarded under similar circumstances, they are not entitled to impose terms upon the persons whose property they salve, and refuse to render assistance unless those terms are accepted.

An agreement so imposed by the captain of a Government ship upon the master of a ship in distress, by which the latter becomes bound to pay a fixed sum for services to be rendered, not merely by the officers and crew, but by the Government ship also, is invalid, as the services of the ship are not to be rewarded under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 484.

Semble, that the officers and crew of a Government ship, ordered by Government to render salvage assistance, have no right to make any agreement with the master of the distressed vessel as to the amount of their reward.

A vessel owned by the Bombay Government, and manned by uncovenanted servants of that Government, whose officers carry no Queen's commission, is a "ship belonging to Her Majesty," within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and no salvage reward is recoverable in respect of services rendered by such a vessel.

This was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of Capt. Elton and the officers and crew of the Kwangtung, of the Bombay Marine, against the cargo of the steamship Woosung.

Capt. Elton and the other plaintiffs were uncovenanted servants of the Bombay Government, the officers not holding a Queen's commission, but performing duties analogous to those of the officers and crews of despatch boats. The Woosung was wrecked in the Red Sea, and news of the wreck was sent to London, when application was made for assistance to the Indian Government. The Secretary of State for India telegraphed to the Resident at Aden to send a gunboat to protect the property, if he thought it necessary. In accordance with these instructions, the Resident at Aden directed the Kwangtung to proceed to the assistance of the Woosung, giving Capt. Elton the instructions contained in the following letter—

Sir,—I have the honour to annex for your information a note respecting the steamship Woosung, on the island of Kotama, and to request that you will proceed to the spot at full speed, after landing the relief detachment to Perim. You will notice the Woosung is said to be holed in several places, and to be full of water. If practicable, your stay at Kotama for salvage services should not exceed forty-eight hours, as your early return to Perim is desirable, to convey to Aden the released detachment of the 2nd Grenadiers, and other details. The Kwangtung can return to Kotama, if it should be considered advisable on the receipt of your report, but from the condition of the ship it seems doubtful whether much cargo can be saved.

The Kwangtung did proceed to the wreck, and rescued much of the cargo. Capt. Elton, however, declined to undertake the service except under an agreement, which was, after much discussion, signed by the master of the Woosung, by which the plaintiffs were to have half the proceeds of the property salved. This agreement was upheld by the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty (Sir R. Phillimore) and from his decree the owners of the cargo appealed.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the report of the case below: (ante, p. 50; 33 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394).

Sir H. James, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C., and Phillimore for the appellants.

Butt, Q.C., Herschell, Q.C., and Edwyn Jones for the respondents.

James, L.J.—I am of opinion that, having regard to the admitted circumstances of the case, this agreement cannot stand as a final measure of the amount to be paid as a remuneration to the captain, officers and crew of the ship Kwangtung.

The circumstances of the case seem very simple. The ship Woosung was wrecked on a reef in the Red Sea, and was in a position of imminent peril. The lives of the passengers and crew were saved, but as far as the ship itself is concerned, she was in such peril that she never was rescued, but went to pieces, and the cargo was got out of her when she was on the reef in this state of the most imminent peril. That being so, it so happened that in consequence of a passing ship coming up, a communication was made to London to certain persons interested in the ship and cargo, in the position in which she then was, and thereupon they wrote to the India Office, and the result of this communication was that the office gave directions to the proper authorities at Aden to send a ship to the rescue of the Woosung. A letter had been written by the agent of the Salvage Association, making offers to reimburse the expenditure for coal consumed on board the ship to be sent, and to make presents to her officers and crew.

It was contended by Sir Henry James that this amounted to an agreement which precluded any right to salvage afterwards. I do not think that it can be fairly said that it in any degree whatever interfered with what otherwise would be the right of the captain as to the salving of the ship. What was said was, "We will pay for coals, and make such present to the men as you may think fit." But it cannot be contended that by accepting that offer the men were not to have what they otherwise would be entitled to. They retain their rights as salvors notwithstanding.

It was settled in the case of The Azalea (a) that, having regard to the peculiar position of the captain and officers in the Bombay Marine, they are to receive such salvage as would be allotted to the officers and crew of a merchant vessel in similar circumstances. That must be considered as a rule to be applicable to all these vessels, and the men would be entitled to remuneration, like the officers and crew of a merchant vessel.

That being so, the Resident at Aden directs Captain Elton to go to the ship. He is to go, according to the letter, to the spot, to the reef, and he is told, "the Woosung is said to be holed in several places, and to be full of water. If practicable, your stay at Kotama for salvage services should not exceed forty-eight hours, as your early return to Perim is desirable, to convey to Aden the released detachment of the 2nd Grenadiers, and other details. The Kwangtung can return to Kotama, if it should be considered advisable, on receipt of your report, but from the condition of the ship, it seems doubtful whether much cargo can be saved."

Then the captain, under that direction, does proceed; and I think it was his duty to render his services—all reasonable services—upon the usual terms, that is to say, on receiving such a salvage reward as would be allotted to the officers and crew of a merchant vessel under similar circumstances. He was there to use his ship in a reasonable manner for the protection of the ship and cargo. When he states that he makes a bargain by which he is to give his services, and those of the officers and men of the ship, for the saving of the fittings of the disabled ship, and for the purpose of saving as much as possible of the cargo, in consideration for which salvage services one sum is to be given, and that is one-half of the salved property, that is an agreement which, upon the face of it, cannot stand. If it had been an agreement between the captains of ordinary merchant vessels, beyond all question it would have been for a salvage service to be performed by ship, captain, officers and crew—the price given being for the whole services to be performed. It appears that that alone would show that it would be entirely impossible that this can stand as the price to be paid for the services

(a) June 8, 1875.—The Azalea.—This was a cause of salvage instituted by the commanding officer, officers, and crew of the Dalhousie, another vessel belonging to the Bombay Marine, against the cargo of the steamship Azalea, which was also wrecked in the Red Sea on the 26th July 1873. The work was very great, owing to the decomposition of the cargo, which consisted of rice, seed, and hides.

The value of the cargo salved was 22,400*l*.

Milward, Q.C., E. C. Clarkson, and Goldney for the plaintiffs.

Brett, Q.C. and Myburgh for the owners of cargo.

Sir R. Phillimore said that although there was no danger from sea or weather, the service was of great merit, owing to the great heat and the state of the cargo, and the liability to sickness to which the salvors were exposed. It was, however, a circumstance that the court must bear in mind, that the Dalhousie, being a Government steamer, was not to be considered as a salvor, but, on the other hand, her officers and crew were entitled to salvage reward, and their services must be remunerated, excluding the ship, and that the captain and crew were entitled to 4500*l*.

of the officers and men alone. It is one entire consideration. We have no means of determining what proportion is to go to the ship, and what to the officers and crew. Therefore, we are driven to find some other mode of ascertaining how much the officers and crew are to receive.

Independently of that, I consider that it would be pessimi exempli if a person placed in the position in which Capt. Elton was, sent by the local Government to this ship to assist it, and not content to take the salvage upon the same footing as on merchant officers, could say to the master of the wrecked ship, "Well, if you do not agree to give me my terms, I will sail away, and leave you here to do whatever you can with such assistance as you can get, inadequate as it is; although I have been told to come here for the purpose of assisting you." It would be something odd if that could be said by any public servant who had a public duty to perform, and that he could say, "I will not render those services which I have been ordered to render with a public vessel, unless you come to my terms." Nobody, except under circumstances of enormous pressure, would think of agreeing to pay half the proceeds of the cargo.

For all these considerations, I think the agreement cannot stand, but that the captain and the crew are entitled to a full, adequate, and liberal remuneration, of which the amount will have to be considered.

Baggallay, J.A.—I am of the same opinion.

I concur with the Lord Justice in thinking Capt. Elton was in no way restricted as to what he might do under the circumstances in which he was placed, by what took place in London between the Salvage Association and the India Office.

But that brings me to the second question, which is the most important one in this case—namely, whether Capt. Elton was at liberty to enter into a salvage agreement such as that entered into by him on the 9th March. Now, he was at that time acting under the orders of the Bombay Government, commanding a ship belonging to her Majesty, and was sent to protect property which was on this reef in the Red Sea. Without actually deciding the question, I entertain a strong opinion that it was contrary to his duty as an officer in the service to enter into the agreement in question; and that is borne out by considering the 484th and 485th clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. The 484th section provides:—"In cases where any salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to her Majesty, or by the commander or crew thereof, no claim shall be allowed for any loss, damage, or risk thereby caused to such ship, or to the stores, tackle, or furniture thereof, or for the use of any stores or any other articles belonging to her Majesty supplied in order to effect such services, or for any expense or loss sustained by her Majesty by reason of such services." But the 485th section goes on to provide for a claim for salvage services rendered by the officers and crew of one of her Majesty's ships, and no proceedings are to be taken, and "no claim whatever on account of any salvage services rendered to any ship or cargo, or to any appurtenances of any ship, by the commander or crew, or part of the crew, of any of her Majesty's ships, shall be finally adjudicated upon, unless the consent of the Admiralty has first been obtained." That authorises the officers and crew to commence proceedings in the Court of Admiralty. Then the 486th clause relates to the various steps to be taken when salvage services have been rendered by her Majesty's ships abroad; and it provides that any officer entering into any port with salved property, is to make a statement on oath, specifying so far as he can the particulars of the property, and the place, condition, and circumstances in which the ship, cargo, and property was at the time when the services were rendered for which salvage is claimed; and the nature and duration of the services rendered, also the value of the property salved, and then the consular officer or a judge to fix the amount of the bond to be given by the owner or master of the salved property. That appears to negative the power of an officer commanding a ship belonging to her Majesty to enter into such an agreement as in question here. But it is unnecessary to decide that question, because it appears that the agreement was not one which could be allowed to stand.

Two cases have been referred to in the course of the argument. One is the case of The Helen and George (Swab. 368), where it was held, "That salvage would be upheld unless proved to be very exorbitant, or to have been obtained by compulsion or fraud." Therefore, the ground of exorbitancy of the agreement would be sufficient to set it aside. The case of The Inca (Swab. 370) laid down this rule, that a moiety of the property salved, with costs, is the maximum remuneration that should be allowed to the salvors. Here is, then, a moiety of the property saved not in the hands of those in whom it ought to be, but claimed for the services of the officers and crew, entirely omitting from consideration any services of the ship employed. That alone would be sufficient to show that this agreement was inequitable. But beyond this we have this fact, that at the same time services are rendered by a Greek trader, who was to receive one-third of the proceeds, and on whom was cast the obligation of providing boats and necessary appliances, and he had to pay a heavy price to secure the service of an interpreter. Therefore the case falls within that of The Helen and George, and the agreement cannot stand.

Lush, J.—I am of the same opinion. Even if Capt. Elton could have entered into any agreement, the agreement before us is not one which could stand. As the learned judges have already delivered their judgments, it is not necessary for me to do more than say that I think that Capt. Elton was precluded from entering into any such agreement. He was an officer sent on that special service, and it was not competent for him to stipulate for payment. Although he was not an officer in the navy, he was not in the position of a merchant captain. The provisions on this subject contained in the Merchant Shipping Act are entirely consistent with public policy, and are such as the Court would act upon without express legislation upon the subject.

Appeal allowed.

Their Lordships having expressed their opinion that the compensation ought to be on a liberal scale, it was agreed between the counsel for the plaintiffs and defendants that the amount to be paid to the India Office for the master and crew of the Kwantung should be 6000*l.*; the respondents to have their costs in the court below, the appellants theirs in the Court of Appeal.

River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson and others.

Harbours, &c., Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 74—Damage to pier by abandoned vessel—Liability of owner—Act of God.

Sect. 74 of the Harbours, &c., Clauses Act of 1847, enacts that "the owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the buoys or works connected therewith," &c.

Held, by the court (unanimously reversing the decision of the court below), that the damage contemplated by this section was damage such as human agency could avert, and not damage caused by the Act of God, or of the Queen's enemies.

Dennis v. Tovell (ante, Vol. 2, p. 402 n.; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 10; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 482; 42 L. J. 40, Q. B.) overruled.

The defendants' ship, The Natalian, whilst endeavouring to make the port of Sunderland for shelter during a storm, was driven ashore by the violence of the gale. The crew were saved and the ship necessarily abandoned. While the storm continued the vessel was driven by the force of the winds and waves against the pier of the plaintiffs and did damage to it to the amount of 1500*l.* The weather was such that nothing could be done by the crew or other persons to prevent the ship damaging the pier—in other words, the accident was inevitable.

The plaintiffs sought to make the defendants, the owners of the vessel, liable under sect. 74 of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 27 (The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Act 1847).

The cause was originally tried at the Durham Summer Assizes 1873, before Quain, J. and a special jury, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs, and leave reserved for the defendants to move to have the verdict entered for them on the ground that the damage was solely the result of the storm.

The Queen's Bench Division, on the authority of Dennis v. Tovell (ubi sup.) discharged the rule.

Against this decision the defendants appealed.

Gorst, Q.C. and Greenhow (with them the Attorney-General, Sir J. Holker, Q.C.), argued for the appellants.—This case is distinguishable from Dennis v. Tovell (ubi sup.). In that case there were still some of the crew on board. Here the ship was abandoned. If we make no exception the defendants might be liable for acts arising from the clear negligence of the plaintiff, or, again, in the case of salvors bringing in the ship, must the owner still be held liable for their negligence? The latter part of the section shows that some exception was contemplated. The law compels the employment of a pilot—here the owner is compelled by the act of God. This court is not bound by the decision in Dennis v. Tovell (ubi sup.).

Herschell, Q.C. and H. Shield (with them C. Russell, Q.C.), contra.—The first part of the section is general, and limited in no way—it starts with an absolute rule. The damage must fall somewhere; it should rather fall on the person whose property has done the damage, than on a person whose property has suffered the injury. It is somewhat dangerous to insert words into an Act of Parliament. Probably, by excluding the owner's liability when there was a plot on board, the Legislature showed they intended to include all other cases. [Mellish, L.J.—When the law imposes a duty does it not always except what happens by the act of God or the Queen's enemies?] The terms of the law are precise and plain. In either case an innocent party must suffer.

Jessel, M.R.—No doubt there are difficulties attending any proper construction of the section the meaning of which we are called upon to decide. It is equally indubitable that a mere literal construction would, on a consideration of the nature and objects of the statute, lead one to the conclusion that in every case the owner of the vessel was liable for any damage done by the vessel to the harbour, dock, or pier. But the conclusions to which such a construction would lead are so startling that I think we must consider that they could not have been in the contemplation of the Legislature.

The first proposition is this: that if a vessel is driven by stress of weather without the fault of anyone, and is shipwrecked against the pier, the unfortunate owner of the vessel must not only lose his vessel by shipwreck, but must also pay the damage done to the pier. It is something like the hospitality which in the long past was shown to vessels when they had the misfortune to be wrecked on the coast. That would be a very startling conclusion to arrive at; but the matter does not stop there, because, if the vessel were driven against the pier by the undertakers themselves, so that it was their wrongful act which caused the vessel to be driven against the pier, the damage would still be done by such vessel. Again, a literal construction would lead to this result—that the person who did the act might make the person who was wholly innocent pay for the damage done by such wrongful act. There are many other cases which might be put. One was put in argument perhaps not so probable as the first I have suggested, but perhaps not more improbable than the second, the vessel might be taken by the Queen's enemies, and before condemnation be used either as a battering ram or otherwise against the pier, and then, being recaptured, the unfortunate owner in whom the title would revest would be liable for damage done to the pier by the Queen's enemies. A great number of other cases equally startling might be put as the result of construing the section literally. If that leads to so absurd and revolting a conclusion, then I think it is the duty of a court when construing the section to give it what they may consider a fair interpretation. In the first place on reading the section we find that it contains a limitation—there is a proviso at the end of the section—"provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel which shall at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of." The reason, which appears tolerably obvious to my mind, for that proviso is this—the owner is compelled by law to put the vessel in charge of the pilot, and he ought not to be liable for the acts of the pilot when the State takes the charge of the vessel from him and puts it into the hands of somebody else. The pilot may be liable, but the pilot is only liable for negligence, so that if in the case I put of storm or tempest—or as we lawyers call it, by the act of God—the vessel is driven against the pier, the loss in that case would fall upon the pier owners. Therefore there is one case in which, at any rate, the pier owners are to take the chance, which every owner of a pier must know must result from the action of the weather, of damage in the same way as it might be damaged by a thunderstorm, or by any other accident, independently of any vessel being concerned in doing the damage. It appears to me, therefore, judging from that proviso, the Legislature did not intend to make the owner always liable where the matter happened from causes entirely beyond his control.

Therefore we are driven back on the familiar maxim of law—"That where there is a duty imposed or a liability incurred, as a general rule, there is no such duty required to be performed, and no such liability required to be made good where the event happens through the act of God or the Queen's enemies." Considering that that is the general rule of law, and looking at the general object and purview of this Act of Parliament, and considering the exceptions I have mentioned, I think we may well come to the conclusion that the act of God and the Queen's enemies were not intended to be comprised within the first words of the section, and consequently, in this case, the defendants ought not to be liable.

Therefore, I think the decision of the court below must be reversed.

Kelly, C.B.—I entirely agree with Mr. Herschell in the argument he has urged that we are not to disregard the express terms of an Act of Parliament because their literal construction does not provide against a possible case of inconvenience or even of injustice. But there are certain principles of law which, though not expressed either in the common law or in the judgments of judges, or in the language of Acts of Parliament, nevertheless must be held to qualify all that may fall from judges in expounding the common law and all that is to be found throughout the statutes in the various Acts of Parliament. Among those principles and maxims is this—that no man can be answerable, unless by express contract, for any mischief or injury occasioned to another by the act of God, and the justice of that maxim, and that it does apply to all cases, except where by express contract it is otherwise provided, is so clear that I think we ought to apply it to the present case, and though at first sight the Act seems to provide that the owner of the vessel shall be liable when it comes in contact with the pier, we must qualify that provision by introducing into it the maxim of the law that no man is to be answerable for the act of God. I think that is implied in the Act of Parliament, and we cannot hold the defendant liable here.

But I must say upon a technical consideration of the language of the Act, I go further, and think that reading the whole of it together, it contemplated the case of a vessel or float of timber which was in charge of some person or persons. The words are: "The owner of any vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same to any harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or wharves connected therewith"—if it had stopped there, no doubt the provision would have been general, absolute, and imperative; but it does not, there is a comma in the Act of Parliament after the word "therewith," and the section proceeds—"the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float," that is, continuing the same sentence, and, therefore, seems to imply that the sentence refers to a vessel of which some master or person has the charge; and then it goes on to say: "The master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber, through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done, shall also be liable to make good the same and the undertakers may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same." Then what is the meaning of the word "also?" It is to superadd to the liability of the master or person by whose wilful act or negligence the mischief is occasioned—the liability there enacted by the statute. It appears to me that it is a reasonable construction of the statute, even apart from the implication to which the Master of the Rolls has alluded (and in whose observations I entirely concur), as to anything arising from the act of God. In addition to that, I think upon the reasonable construction of the statute itself the defendants cannot be held liable.

I would only observe in regard to what has fallen from the Master of the Rolls, that it is clear it never was the intention of the Legislature to make the owner liable, except in the character of owner, for anything for which another is made expressly responsible, and which takes the power out of the owner's hands to prevent the act, whatever it may be, which may occasion the mischief. If it had been intended by the Legislature that from whatever cause, whether through the wilful act or negligence of the master or other persons, the pier had been injured, yet nevertheless the owner should be liable, they would never have introduced into the same section the provison that where there is a pilot whom the owner is bound to employ who takes the management of the vessel out of his hands, then he shall be no longer liable. It is to be observed upon this question, and that fortifies the construction which I must say, speaking for myself, I put upon the section taking it altogether, though this section exonerates the owner, it does not exonerate the master or any other person through whose wilful act or negligence the mischief is occasioned. It says the owner shall be liable where either the master or person in charge of the vessel, by wilful act or negligence occasions the mischief to the pier, or runs the vessel against the pier, save only in the case of the pilot; and it also goes on to provide, and that is the principal object of that part of the section, that in addition to the liability of the owner, which no doubt is specially enacte the individual who is the wrongdoer and who occasions the mischief in question, whether the master or the person in charge, who is the real origin of the mischief, shall be likewise liable as well as the owner.

I think, therefore, on all these grounds, the defendants are not liable, and consequently the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

Mellish, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

I think, taking the language of the section, it clearly was the intention of the Legislature to extend the liability of the owners of vessels in favour of the owners of piers and harbours, beyond the liability which is imposed on them by common law; because if that is not the intention it is not easy to see the objects of the section at all. Looking at the pointed language in which negligence is brought in, or "wilful act," and looking to the fact that the section goes on to speak of the master or the person having the charge of the vessel, it seems to show clearly that the owner is intended to be liable even in the case where neither the owner nor the crew had anything to do with it. But the question arises, because we may decide that the owner may be made liable where it is not proved that he or the master was guilty of negligence, are we bound to hold that in every case whatever where the vessel physically damages the wall, the owner is to be liable? I am of opinion the statute only contemplates the case where either directly or indirectly, through the act of man, the vessel is caused in some way or other to run against the pier. It is quite consistent with our law, that in certain cases a person may be made liable as insurer against the acts of all the men whom he may have under his control. And many examples of that may be put; but although that is the case with regard to the act of man, the act of God is in point of law opposed to that which may be said to be the act of man, and the act of God does not impose any liability upon anybody. Although, of course, the Legislature are not bound by any such rule, and may make a person liable for what is the consequence of the act of God if the Legislature so pleased, yet, in construing the words of the Act of Parliament, we are justified in assuming that the Legislature did not intend going against the ordinary rules of law, unless the language they have used obliges the court to come to the conclusion that they did so intend.

Then the question is, looking at the whole of the section, did the Legislature intend to make the owner of the ship liable only for the act of man, or did they intend to make him liable for the act of God, or where without his own fault, or the fault of anybody whatever, but through the violence of nature the vessel has been taken against the pier? Looking at it so, without going through the words of the section again, it appears to me that I am bound to agree with the remarks which have been made by the Master of the Rolls and by the Lord Chief Baron, and that the section points to something that is done by the act of man, or to the act of the person in charge; it looks as though the Legislature considered somehow or other through the act of man damage might be done to the pier, and then they say, to get the owner of the pier out of the difficulty of having to prove that it was owing to some particular person's negligence, and that that person was the servant of the owner, they say he shall be liable; but if it was the consequence of the negligence of somebody else, that person is not discharged, but you have your remedy over. Then they make one exception to that rule in the case of the pilot. They say, if a pilot is in charge of the vessel, even although it may be by his act, the owner will not be liable. I do not think it was intended by the Legislature to put upon the shipowner the absolute liability for damages occasioned by the ship being driven against the pier when she is really upon the high seas, and thence being driven from outside the harbour by the violence of the winds and waves against the pier; therefore I agree that the judgment should be reversed.

Denman, J.—I am of the same opinion.

No doubt, taking the words of sect. 74, it is possible to hold that they include an absolute liability on the part of the owner of the vessel to the dock-owner. The words are strong, intelligible, and grammatical; but I am of opinion that, taking the final words of the section, some qualification must be put on those words, not by introducing fresh words into the Act of Parliament, or supposing a clause to exist in it which does not exist, but by qualifying those words by well known principles of law which must be taken to override an Act of Parliament. I apprehend that there is no principle of law better established than this, that in every Act of Parliament words are not to be construed to impose a liability for an act or acts done, upon individuals, if those acts are not done by individuals, or not caused by their property or servants, but are acts which are substantially caused by a superior power, such as the law calls the act of God. In this case there can be no doubt, from the evidence, that the injury occasioned by the vessel was not the result of any neglect on the part of the owner, or on the part of any person having charge of the vessel, or indeed of any human being, but was really the effect of the violence of the winds and waves overcoming all control on the part of the master or owner of the vessel, and forcing the vessel against the pier. Under these circumstances I apprehend, upon the general principle, that every statute is to be so construed as to leave untouched a principle of common law which applies to all similar cases, we are not bound to hold, and ought not to hold in this case, that damage was done by the vessel within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, but that, on the contrary, it was damage that was occasioned by the act of God, and, therefore, no action lies.

With regard to the other words of the section, I think a strong argument arises from the words which contemplate the punishment of a person who had charge of the vessel. I do not myself, however, go so far as to think that there might not be a case where the owner of the vessel would be liable where no person was in charge. If there was a person appointed, although not on board, but who ought to have been controlling the vessel, and through his negligence the accident is occasioned, I think the section would apply. Therefore, I should put that qualification on the proposition that it must be the act of man. I think this section does not exclude the exception of the act of God, which, in my opinion, was the sole cause of the accident here; and, so thinking, I am of opinion the defendants are not responsible.

Pollock, B.—I am of the same opinion, although the process of reasoning by which I have arrived at that conclusion is not the one which has been adopted by the other members of the court. We are bound to put a reasonable construction upon the section. To put a reasonable construction is not to put a construction which might produce the result that may appear to the court reasonable, but it is to apply to the section that meaning which would seem to carry out the intention of the Legislature as applied to the subject matter with which they were dealing. I find the ordinary Dock Act Clause providing for the cleaning of the dock, the protection of things in the dock, and all the necessary provisions with regard to vessels and timber floats which may be placed in the dock, or which are going into the docks or going out of the docks. Looking at it in this aspect, one of the things the section intends to provide is that in the event of the structure of the dock being injured by vessels or floats of timber, the owners of the dock are not to be put to the proof of negligence or to the proof of showing how the injury was occasioned.

I am not prepared to say that if it was the case of damage done during the night to one of the dock gates by a float of timber that it would be any answer to say it arose from some unforeseen cause or accident against which human providence could not protect it. I do not know what would be meant in that case by the act of God. We know what is meant by the act of God in the case of lightning, &c. I do not know how it may be as to matters as to which the providence of mankind may or may not prevent a particular result. Therefore, if that were the case here, I should pause before I came to the conclusion at which my brothers have arrived; but this is a case in which the vessel was extraneous to the dock, entirely out on the high seas, she met with certain risks and injuries which compelled her crew to leave her, and she became derelict, and in that condition, being wholly extraneous of the dock, she is, by force of the elements, driven against it. That seems to me to be an event which the section did not intend to provide against, and there is nothing, looking to the subject matter, and the difficulty of providing against it, unjust or unreasonable in it. In all other respects I agree with all that has been said, and I think the judgment ought to be reversed.

Re ARTHUR AVERAGE ASSOCIATION (DE WINTON AND CO.'S CASE).

Marine insurance — Illegal company — Invalid policy—Consideration—Return of premium.

The association was not registered under the Companies Acts. Persons became members by effecting mutual policies, members were empowered also to effect "special rate policies." The applicants were not members, but had taken out a "special rate policy," signed per procuration by J. and S., the managers, who gave and accepted on their personal liability, a bill of exchange for the amount assured. In a similar case, the amount assured had been disallowed by the Appeal Court as a claim made on the association. J. and S. became insolvent, and their acceptance was dishonoured. De W. and Co. claimed that the amount of the premiums should be repaid them by the members of the association.

Held, that they were not entitled to have the premiums repaid, because, first, as they well knew, J. and S. had no power, as agents, to grant such a policy to non-members; and, secondly, there was no failure of consideration, as J. and S. had made themselves personally liable.

FURTHER consideration.

The constitution and history of this association are fully reported, ante, Vol. 2, pp. 530, 570.

This was a claim by Messrs. De Winton and Co., who were not members of the association, for a return of the premiums which they had paid in respect of a policy of insurance on one of their vessels which had been insured by the association. The policy of the applicants was a special rate policy, and had been signed by the managers, Messrs. Jackson and Sheppard, "per procuration of the several members of the Arthur Average Association." Jackson and Sheppard gave a bill of exchange, accepted by themselves personally for the amount of the claim; but the bill was dishonoured at maturity, and the managers had become insolvent.

The position of Messrs. De Winton and Co. was similar to that of Messrs. Hargrove and Co, who after the winding-up of the company, were found to be creditors to a large amount on special rate policies, but whose claim was disallowed by the Master of the Rolls, and subsequently by the Court of Appeal, on the ground that the association ought to have been registered, and not being so, was an illegal company, which ought never to have been wound-up; that the policies were void under 30 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, because they did not specify the names of subscribers or underwriters, and that the policies were ultra vires as, under the rules of the association, special rate policies could only be issued to those who were already members of the association by having taken mutual policies: (ante, Vol. 2, pp. 530, 570; L. Rep. 10 Ch. 542.)

In these circumstances Messrs. De Winton and Co. applied for a return of the premiums.

British and American Telegraph Company v. The Albion Bank, L. Rep. 7 Ex. 119; Tyrie v. Fletcher, 2 Cowper, 668.

JESSEL, M.R.—The first point, as to the claim of these gentlemen to be creditors of the association for the amount insured, has been already decided. They are not creditors for that amount.

This is a hard case, but if you consider all the circumstances, it is quite as hard upon the alleged members of this association as upon the present applicants. The only persons who are members are those who have taken out mutual policies. These gentlemen are not members. There is not a suggestion that they were not aware of the constitution of the association. So I must take it that they effected their insurance with a full knowledge of the rules: they must have had notice. That being so, if they had such notice, they must have had notice of the limited powers of the agents to enter into a contract which was beyond the scope of their authority. The policy was void on that ground alone wholly independently of the objections founded on the statute. The result, therefore, is that there is nothing binding on the association. Therefore the premium was paid for nothing. That is so far clear, and nothing more was done.

Then it is said that the premiums were paid to Jackson and Sheppard as managers, who were not entitled to receive the premiums, and consequently that there is an individual liability on the members. But this cannot be shown. The association was a shifting number of persons; nobody knew of whom it consisted. It varied as to its members every year in form, every day in fact. I do not know whether there was even a common council. The premiums were received by Jackson and Sheppard. There was no evidence in the winding-up that there ever was a common authority granted to Jackson and Sheppard.

Besides all this there is another difficulty. It is not quite true that there is a total failure of consideration. They had the personal security of the managers. If the policies had been valid, and the managers had themselves failed, the arrangement made was this—the managers were empowered to draw on each of the other members for contribution. The premiums were a personal debt to the managers. There is here the machinery of a quasi partnership. The present applicants were as much responsible for an insolvent manager as those who were members of the association. It is quite possible that if the policy had been a legal one, and the managers had ceased to pay, and the members were able to pay, that I could have made the members pay—that is, if the association had been legal and the members were liable to pay the manager. In that case the applicants might, through a court of equity, have obtained payment. There is no doubt that Jackson and Sheppard were liable to pay, and there is equally no doubt that if they had been partially insolvent, the present applicants would have been entitled to be paid the full amount of the dividend declared on their estate. De Winton and Co. got a security, which was valuable in this sense, and in that sense there is no total failure of consideration.

The present application must be refused, but as this is a representative case, the costs will be allowed.

On a bill by B. and Co. against S., to assert a lien on certain ships, and for an account:

Held, that in taking the accounts, B. and Co. were entitled to retain for themselves the 10 per cent. discount allowed them by underwriters in respect of insurances effected by them for S.

Held, also, that as the agency of B. and Co. in respect of the lost ship had been revoked they had no right to withhold the policies, and were not entitled to charge S. with the usual commission for collecting the policy moneys.

THE defendant, George Stanton, was a shipowner, and from the year 1861 to the year 1872 kept a current account with the plaintiffs, Baring Brothers and Company, a firm of bankers and merchants, through whom he transacted all his business.

The course of business between the defendant and the plaintiffs in respect of the current account was, that they charged interest on all debit transactions at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum, and allowed interest at the rate of 4*l.* per cent, per annum on all credit transactions, and charged also a commission of 1*l.* per cent. on the amount of what was called the "long leg of the account".—that is to say, that side of the account which showed the largest amount of transactions. They also obtained an advantage of 15*l.* per cent. on all premiums for insurances, and charged a separate commission of 2½*l.* per cent. for collecting moneys payable for losses under policies.

In May 1872, the plaintiffs filed their bill against the defendant, seeking to assert a lien on certain ships of the defendant for the balance due to them from him on his account current, and for consequential relief.

On the 24th Feb. 1875, a decree was made in the plaintiffs' favour, which directed an account to be taken of what was due to them for principal and interest. Under this order the plaintiffs carried in two accounts, one showing the current accounts from the year 1861 to the year 1871, the other showing the balance due from the defendant. Upon proceeding to take these accounts, two questions arose, first, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to retain the discount of 10*l.* per cent. allowed to them by the companies with whom insurances were effected; secondly, whether they were entitled to charge the defendant with a sum of 525*l.* for commission on receiving the policy moneys of the Knightsbridge, a ship which was never mortgaged to the plaintiffs.

As to the first point, the plaintiffs asserted that they were entitled to retain the discount in accordance with the well settled custom of London merchants. The defendant, however, denied that there was any such custom.

As to the second point, the facts were as follows: On the 24th Jan. 1870, the defendant received a telegram informing him of the destruction by fire of the Knightsbridge, which was insured with her freight for 21,000*l*. The policies on this ship were in the hands of the plaintiffs on the defendant's account. The same day the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs the following letter:

Gentlemen,—The policies on the ship Knightsbridge having been refused to be handed over to me this morning by your Mr. Theobald, with a reply that what I might require I had better inform you by letter, therefore beg to say that the ship Knightsbridge having been destroyed by fire at sea it is necessary for me to give notice of abandonment to the respective underwriters and for this purpose may I ask you to be good enough to cause them to be handed over to the bearer, as no time should be lost.—Your obedient servant,

GEO. STANTON.

The same day the plaintiffs wrote to the defendant the following reply:

Sir,—In reply to your letter of this date we beg to say that as the insurance on the Knightsbridge was effected by us and in our name, we will give the requisite notice of abandonment to the respective underwriters.—Your obedient servants, BARING BROTHERS & Co.

In answer to the last-mentioned letter the plaintiff, on the 25th Jan. 1870, wrote as follows:

Gentlemen,—I am this morning in receipt of your letter of yesterday's date as to the insurance on the Knightsbridge. In reply, I beg to repeat my request for the policies, and offer to pay you the premiums in respect of them. . . .

The plaintiffs did not give up the policies, but themselves collected the insurance moneys and charged their usual commission for so doing.

On the 10th Feb. 1876, the plaintiffs took out a summons, now adjourned into court, to the effect (1) that in taking the accounts directed by the decree the plaintiffs might be allowed the full amounts debited to the defendant in the accounts they had brought in for insurances on the defendants' ships, or their freights, or ship's stores, or disbursements, without giving credit to the defendant for the discount received by or allowed to them by underwriters in respect of such insurances as claimed by the defendant.

(2.) That the plaintiffs might be allowed to retain as their own moneys the sum of 525*l*., being the difference between the sum of 21,000*l*. (the sum for which the ship, the Knightsbridge, was insured by the plaintiffs), and the sum of 20,475*l*. (the sum for which credit was given by the plaintiffs, as mentioned in their claim for the total loss of the same ship), which sum of 525*l*. was claimed and retained by them as their commission (at the rate of 2*l*. 10*s*. per 100*l*.) for collecting the moneys payable for such loss, and that the defendant might be ordered to pay the costs of the summons.

Cotton, Q.C. and J. Kaye, in support of the summons.—On the first point they relied on Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe (ante, Vol. 2, p. 298; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661; L. Rep. 9 Ch. App. 525). They also cited

Xenos v. Wickham, 14 C.B., N.S., 435, 460;
Power v. Butcher, 10 B. & C. 329.

On the second point, they contended that as the insurance had been effected by the plaintiffs, not at the request of the defendant, but on their own interests, they were entitled to collect the insurance money and charge their commission.

Kay, Q.C. and Caldecott, for the defendant.—Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe (sup.) does not apply to this case at all. The distinction is, that the defendant in that case was employed as an insurance broker and nothing else; here the plaintiffs are general agents as merchants and not simply insurance brokers. They are general agents on terms of special remuneration, which does not include the right to charge specially as insurance brokers. Any profit, therefore, which they made over and above their commission as agents they must account for to their principal:

Turnbull v. Garden, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; 38 L. J. 331, Ch.;
Williams v. Stevens, L. Rep. 1 P.C. 352.

As to the second point. The plaintiffs had no interest in the ship and no claim whatever on the policies except for the premiums they had paid, and these the defendant offered to repay them. Neither was the defendant bound to the plaintiffs to employ them as his agents in any special manner. When, therefore, he demanded the policies on the Knightsbridge, there was a revocation of their authority as agents in their particular transaction, which in point of law they could not resist. Therefore, as they refused to comply with his demand, and insisted on collecting the policy moneys themselves, they are not entitled to charge him with the usual commission.

Cotton, Q.C., in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Upon the first point the case is conclusively covered by the decision in Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe (sup.), which makes it impossible for me to adhere to any opinion adverse to that decision. Lord Justice James there says (p. 300): "Whether you call him a broker or not, the person who is the agent for the merchant or anybody else, by a well established practice obtains the insurances, and receives a discount of 5 per cent., which he puts into his own pocket. He is paid by the underwriter instead of by his principal. And then, by a practice quite as well known, recognised by everybody connected with the business, recognised by the courts of law of this country, referred to over and over again, there is another thing—there is a gratuity which the broker receives upon the settlement of the accounts, being 12 per cent. upon the balance, if the balance should happen to be a favourable one, that is, if the underwriter finds it to be a profitable account he gives 12 per cent. upon it to the broker who brought the business to him. It is not, as I gather, upon the particular transaction, but it is upon the whole result of transactions which the broker has introduced to the particular underwriter, and is calculated upon all the business during the whole year. That is the established remuneration which a broker receives for effecting that business, and in my opinion that is as right a thing as the 5 per cent." Then the evidence of the plaintiffs, although it does not conclusively establish the custom for which they contend, yet it proves the system on which they carried on their business. I cannot, therefore, in the face of that evidence and of the decision in Great Western Insurance Company v. Cunliffe, come to any other conclusion than that the plaintiffs are entitled to the discount which they claim.

As to the second point, that also, in my opinion, is abundantly clear. I quite agree that the plaintiffs were general agents of the defendant, and that unless their authority was revoked they were entitled to carry on the transaction to a conclusion. The defendant, however, was not bound to them by any special agreement, and he was therefore entitled to revoke their authority in whole or in part. True, they might have refused to continue to act as his agents altogether when he demanded back the policies, unless he permitted them to collect the insurance money. They did not do this, however, but insisted in collecting the money, and paid themselves a commission. In my opinion that was an unreasonable and unlawful claim on their part. In my opinion, the defendant had a right to say, "don't you receive that insurance money; I am ready to receive it myself." They choose, however, to go on and collect it perforce, but that did not give them the right to receive that which the defendant would have received himself.

The defendant, therefore, is right on the second point and wrong on the first. I make no order as to costs.

Cohen v. The South Eastern Railway Company.

Carrier—Railway company—Carriers by rail and steam vessel—Passengers' luggage—Liability for loss of—Special contract—Signature of by passengers—Conditions limiting liability.

The luggage of a passenger by railway comes within sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), fixing the liability of railway companies for the loss of or injury to "any articles, goods, or things in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof," and no condition therefore limiting the company's liability in respect of such luggage is binding, unless it be a "just and reasonable one," and be embodied in a special contract, signed by the passengers or the person delivering such luggage to the company for carriage.

By sect. 16 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act is incorporated, and its provisions extended and made applicable to luggage conveyed by railway companies on board steam vessels used by them for the purpose of carrying on a communication between any towns or ports.

Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (19 L. T. Rep, N.S. 302) discussed and distinguished.

By the first count of his declaration the plaintiff charged that the defendants were carriers of passengers and their luggage by sea from Boulogne, in the Republic of France, to Folkestone, and thence by land from Folkestone to London; and in consideration that the plaintiff caused his wife to become and be a passenger, to be carried, with her luggage, by sea from Boulogne to Folkestone, and thence by land from Folkestone to London aforesaid, for reward then paid by the plaintiff to the defendants in that behalf, the defendants promised the plaintiff to use all due and reasonable care in so carrying the plaintiff's wife and her said luggage; and all conditions were fulfilled, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the defendants perform their said promise; yet the defendants did not use due and reasonable care in carrying the said luggage, but by the negligence of the defendants, while the said luggage was being carried by them by sea from Boulogne to Folkestone, a certain trunk, containing wearing apparel of the plaintiff's wife, and other things belonging to the plaintiff, being a part of the said luggage, fell into the sea, whereby the said trunk, and the contents thereof, were greatly injured, &c., and allegations of damage to the plaintiff.

By the second count the declaration charged that the defendants were carriers of passengers and their luggage, as in the first count mentioned for reward to the defendants, and the defendants, at the request of the plaintiff, received the plaintiff's wife as a passenger, with her luggage, including the trunk in the first count mentioned, to be by them, as such carriers, safely and securely carried by sea from Boulogne to Folkestone, and thence by land from Folkestone to London, for reward then paid by the plaintiff to the defendants; yet the defendants did not safely and securely carry the said trunk by sea from Boulogne to Folkestone aforesaid, but while the said trunk was being so carried by them as aforesaid, it fell into the sea and was injured, and the plaintiff suffered the damage in the first count mentioned, and the plaintiff claims 100*l.*

For a fifth plea (amongst others), to the whole of the declaration the defendants say, that they are a railway company incorporated for the conveyance of passengers with their luggage within the United Kingdom, and upon lines of railway situated therein, and that Boulogne in the declaration mentioned is a place or town in the Republic of France, and beyond the extent of the defendants' lines of railway; and that the said damage to the said luggage in the declaration mentioned, did not happen or occur whilst the said luggage was being carried or conveyed on the defendants' line or lines of railway; and that the plaintiff caused his said wife and her luggage to be received by the defendants, as the same were received by the defendants, to be carried as in the declaration mentioned; and under a special contract between the plaintiff's said wife, as agent for the plaintiff and the defendants, and subject to certain conditions contained in the said contract, and set out in a certain through ticket taken by the plaintiff's said wife, as agent for the plaintiff, from the defendants, one of which conditions was that the defendants would not be responsible for luggage if the value thereof exceeded 6*l.* And the defendants say that the said luggage of the plaintiff's wife, delivered to the defendants to be carried by them as in the declaration mentioned, exceeded the value of 6*l.*

Replication to the said fifth plea, that the defendants are a railway company authorised to build, or buy, or hire, and to use, maintain, and work, or to enter into arrangements for using, maintaining, and working steam vessels, for the purpose of carrying on a communication between the towns or ports, amongst others, of Folkestone and Boulogne aforesaid, and to take tolls in respect of such steam vessels, within the meaning of the 11th section of the Railways Regulation Act 1863; and that in carrying the plaintiff's wife and her luggage from Boulogne to Folkestone aforesaid the defendants were acting in pursuance of such authority, and the vessel on board of which the plaintiff's wife and her luggage was carried was a steam vessel, and the carrying of the plaintiff's wife and her luggage was a carrying of traffic within the meaning of the said section; and the matters and things in the declaration mentioned happened after the passing of the said Act, and all things were done and happened, and all times elapsed, so as to make the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act applicable to the matters and things in the declaration mentioned, and binding in all respects on the defendants. And that the alleged special contract in the said plea mentioned related to the receiving, forwarding, or delivering of articles, goods or things within the meaning of the 7th section of the said last-mentioned Act, and that such special contract was not signed by the plaintiff.

The third replication repeated the allegations in the last replication contained, except the allegation that the contract was not signed by the plaintiff; and further alleged that the condition in the plea mentioned was not just or reasonable.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the fifth plea, on the ground that the special contract was within sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, and was not alleged to have been signed by the plaintiff, and that the condition was not just and reasonable.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the second and third replications, on the ground that they did not show that the contract alleged in the fifth plea was within the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act.

The plaintiff's points.—First by virtue of the Railways Regulations Acts of 1868 and 1871, the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act are extended to goods and traffic carried by Railway companies by sea, whether by their own vessels or otherwise; secondly, the luggage, the loss of which is complained of, is within the provisions of the 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act as so extended; thirdly, the special contract alleged in the fifth plea is a special contract within the meaning of the said section, and was not signed by the plaintiff or anyone on his behalf, and the condition is therefore void; fourthly, the condition that the company will not be liable in any case if the value of the luggage exceeds 6*l.* is an unreasonable condition, and therefore void.

Points for the defendants.—First, the luggage, the loss of which is complained of, is not within the provisions of sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act; secondly, the provisions of the said section do not extend to the contract or duty declared upon; thirdly, that the special contract alleged in the fifth plea is not a special contract within the meaning of the said section; fourthly, the conditions of the said contract are reasonable.

The following sections of the several Acts of Parliament bearing on the question are material.

The Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31) enacts:

Sect. 7.—Every such company as aforesaid shall be liable for the loss of or for any injury done to any horse, cattle, or other animals, or to any articles goods, or things, in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration made and given by such company contrary thereto, every such notice, condition, or declaration being hereby declared to be null and void; provided always that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the said company from making such conditions with respect to the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of any of the said animals, articles, goods, or things, as shall be adjudged by the court or judge, before whom any question relating thereto shall be tried, to be just and reasonable. . . . Provided also that no special contract between such company and any other parties respecting the receiving, forwarding or delivering of any animals, articles, goods, or things as aforesaid, shall be binding upon or affect any such party unless the same be signed by him or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods, or things respectively for carriage, &c.

The Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119)

By sect. 16 provides for the securing equality of treatment in respect of tolls in cases "where the company is authorised to build, or buy, or hire, and to use maintain, and work, or to enter into any arrangements for using, maintaining or working steam vessels for the purpose of carrying on a communication between any towns or ports and to take tolls in respect of such steam vessels," &c., and enacts that "the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, so far as the same are applicable, shall extend to the steam vessels, and to the traffic carried on thereby."

The Railway Regulation Amendment Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 78) enacts:

Sect. 12.—Where a railway company under a contract for carrying persons, animals, or goods by sea, procure the same to be carried in a vessel not belonging to the railway company, the railway company shall be answerable in damages in respect of . . . loss of or damage to "goods" in like manner and to the same extent as the railway company would be answerable if the vessel had belonged to the railway company, provided that such . . . . loss or damage to such . . . . goods happens to the . . . , goods during the carriage of the same in such vessel, the proof to the contrary to lie upon the railway company.

Bray, for the plaintiff.—The question is whether passengers' luggage, when being conveyed by rail under the usual circumstances, does or not come within sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854; and it is contended on the part of the plaintiff, that it does. In the case of Zunz v. The South-Eastern Railway Company (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 873; 38 L. J. 209. Q. B.; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 539), the Court of Queen's Bench indirectly, as it were, so decided. No doubt in the case of Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 302; 3 H. & C. 135; 23 L. J. 109, Ex.; 10 Jur. N. S. 805), the Court of Exchequer held that the luggage of a passenger of an excursion train was not within the Act; but there a printed condition on the ticket stated that the luggage was "at passenger's own risk;" and it would appear from the judgments in the case that the decision would have been different in the case of passengers' luggage by an ordinary train. There can be no real difference in the company's liability with respect to the amount of luggage which they are bound and that which they agree to carry: (Macrow v. The Great Western Railway Company, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 618; L. Rep. 6, Q. B. 612; 40 L. J. 300, Q. B.) Sect. 7 is wide enough to comprise passengers' luggage under the words "articles, goods, or things," and such luggage is like other "goods" carried by the company of which they are common carriers. The case of Richards v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (7 C. B. 839; 18 L. J. 251), is conclusive for the plaintiff on that point. The proposition contended for is clearly put in Hodges' Law of Railways (5th edit., by Manley Smith), at p. 570; and Richards v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway is cited, with other cases, in support of the propositions there stated. [BRAMWELL, B.—It must be assumed, I think, that a passenger's luggage is in a position similar to goods sent for carriage alone.] Again, secondly, the provisions of sect. 7, and the liabilities of railway companies, have been extended by the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, s. 16, and 34 and 35 Vict. c, 78, s. 12, to traffic by steamboats, and, therefore, if luggage is included in the term "goods," it comes within sect. 7 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, even when carried on board a steamboat: (Moore v. The Midland Railway Company, Ir. Rep. 8 C. L. 232.) Again, the condition limiting the liability to the value of 6*l.* is unreasonable. He cited also

Aldridge v. The Great Western Railway Company, 15 C. B., N. S., 582; 33 L. J. 161, C. P.;

Willis, for the defendants, contra.—The common law liability of the company as common carriers of the luggage is not disputed, but sect. 7 of the Railway and Canals Traffic Act is restricted in its application to ordinary merchandise conveyed as "goods" apart from passengers. If that is not so, the liability of a railway company can only be limited by obtaining the signature of every individual passenger to a special contract with regard to his luggage, which would be practically impossible. [BRAMWELL, B.—I think this Act has been misconstrued occasionally; the intention of its framers was, I believe, that the company under the first proviso might give a general notice limiting their liability, if only such limitation were just and reasonable, independently of any contract being signed. I think it a mistake to hold (although it has been so held) that such a condition would be void if it were not signed. The Act plainly means that notice should not limit the company's liability unless the conditions were reasonable; but the framers of it should have added a clause that the companies might make any condition they pleased, reasonable or otherwise, so long as it was signed by the other party. That is my construction of the Act, and it is, I know, that which was intended.] The 7th section, and the words therein, "receiving, forwarding, and delivering," are inapplicable to a passenger's luggage, but strictly applicable, and intended to be so, to "articles, goods, and things" sent as ordinary merchandise. Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), cited contra, is a decision directly in favour of the defendants, for there is no distinction, as regards liability for luggage, between an excursion train and an ordinary train Pollock, C.B., in his judgment there, said the court were all of opinion that the case was not within the Act; but it cannot be said that the luggage there was not quite as much "received, forwarded, and delivered," as it was here. [BRAMWELL, B.—I am not over well satisfied with my judgment in that case. Not one of the judges there says directly that passengers' luggage is not within the Act.] In The Great Western Railway Company v. Tally (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 413; L. Rep. 6 C. P. 44; 40 L. J. 9, C. P.) the passenger took charge of his luggage in the carriage with himself, and the court held that the company were not liable. Further, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, and 34 & 35 Vict. 78, do not incorporate sect. 7, but only the first six sections of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act; and the word "traffic" does not occur in sect. 7. It was not intended that railway companies carrying by sea should be put on a different footing from other steamboat companies. Lastly, the contract was made in France, as stated in the declaration. [BRAMWELL, B.—The point does not arise, and it must be assumed, there being no allegation to the contrary, that the contract was made in England.]

Bray, in reply.—In Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) nothing is said as to passengers' luggage not being within sect. 7. The ground of the decision there was that it was not an ordinary journey at ordinary fares, and that there was a special contract between the company and the travellers.

BRAMWELL, B.—The second question raised by Mr. Willis in his argument on behalf of the defendants is whether the Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119) does or does not extend to and include the 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31). Mr. Willis contended that the first-mentioned Act of 1868 includes the first six sections, but does not include the 7th section of the last-mentioned Act of 1854. I think, however, that the best and short answer to that is that the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, by sect. 16 expressly says that "the provisions of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854, so far as the same are applicable, shall extend to steam vessels and to the traffic carried on thereby." Mr. Willis wants us to read that section as if it had said "some of the provisions" of that Act "minus sect. 7 shall extend, &c.," but that we cannot do. Indeed, it is very obvious that if the Legislature had intended what Mr. Willis suggests, they would have said so; and therefore, unless by necessity, arising from some absurdity and incongruity on the face of it, we are obliged to say otherwise, we must read the section as it stands, as extending to the railway company's steam vessels, and the traffic carried on thereby; and I can see no incongruity or absurdity in the matter at all, nor any reason why sect. 7 should not so extend. There is too, I think, good reason for saying that that view of the case is corroborated by sect. 14 of the Act of 1868 referred to; and therefore, on the short ground that, in the absence of any absolute necessity for so doing, we ought not to limit the operation of the express language of sect. 16, which incorporates sect. 7, we are bound to hold that that section is included in the provisions of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, and so therefore extends to the present case.

That being so, the next question is, whether sect. 7 of this Act of 1854 applies to passengers' luggage. Now the words of it are, "Every such company, as aforesaid, shall be liable for the loss of, or for any injury to, any horses, cattle or other animals, or to any articles, goods, or things in the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof, occasioned by the neglect or default of such company or its servants," and so forth. These things are goods—passengers' goods, or luggage; they are received by the company, forwarded by the company, and delivered by the company to the passenger at the termination of his journey. Again Mr. Willis wants us to put in certain words of exception, that is to say, "excepting passengers' luggage." The same reasoning, however, applies to this as to the former case. We ought not to put in an exception unless there would be an impossibility or some absurdity or incongruity in construing the section without it, or some inconvenience so great that we might be driven to suppose that the exception was intended by the Legislature. I do not, I confess, see that there is anything of the sort here. Mr. Willis says that it would be a very extraordinary thing if passengers were to be stopped and told by the company that their luggage could not be carried unless they signed a special contract. I do not myself see any insuperable difficulty in that—inasmuch as the result would probably be that if it were found to be inconvenient to the travelling public the matter would be very soon looked into and an Act of Parliament probably be passed for the purpose of relieving them from the inconvenience. But if the Act were construed as I think it ought to have been no difficulty at all would arise. I am of opinion, therefore, that we ought not to insert the proposed exception in sect. 7 excluding therefrom passengers' luggage.

I think it is very important that we have ascertained from the arguments and admissions of the learned counsel in this case that the railway company are insurers of the luggage of their passengers. That being so, there is only one matter which I need notice, and that is how to deal with the case of Stewart v. The London and North Western Railway Company (ubi sup.); and here let me observe that in the present case we have to deal with a plea setting up a special contract as to the carriage of these goods, to which there is a replication that such contract was not signed; and therefore that it is not a sufficiently signed contract under sect. 7. The question in Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company did not arise in that way. It arose upon a plea that the defendants did not contract with the plaintiff as alleged; and it appeared, upon going into the facts, that it was not the ordinary case of a person paying the ordinary fare charged to a passenger for carrying him, which, as it has been properly said, comprehends a remuneration for carrying his luggage as a common carrier; but it was a case of a special excursion train, where the parties made a bargain, of the terms of which the plaintiff might have informed himself if he had thought fit to do so, but which he did not do. That bargain was, that the passenger should be taken upon special terms, one of which was that the company would not be liable for his luggage. I see that it was there said by Pollock, C.B. "We are all of opinion that this case is not within the Railway and Canal Traffic Act." And, if I may cite my own judgment, I said: "the Railway and Canal Traffic Act does not apply, and no question arises as to the reasonableness of the condition." And further on I said: "There was thus a plain bargain entered into by virtue of which the plaintiff obtained his ticket at about one-fourth of the ordinary fare, and for this accommodation he was content to take the risk of his luggage on himself." And Pigott, B., also said: "This was a special contract, and it was competent for the parties to make it." I have no wish to cast any doubt upon that case, but there are, it may be, some questionable expressions in it; for if it was a special contract, it was not a sufficient special contract under the Act because it was not signed. But I find that Mr. (now Mr. Justice) Brett, who argued that case for the plaintiff, never put it upon that ground at all; neither do I see in either of the judgments that any allusion or observation was made with respect to the contract not being within the meaning of the statute by reason of its not being signed. The only way in which, as it seems to me, the judgment in that case can be supported (and, as I said before, I have no wish to cast a doubt upon it) is by saying that the Railway and Canal Traffic Act applies to the ordinary taking of a passenger and his luggage for the ordinary remuneration, and does not apply to the case of a special bargain as to the carriage of the passenger of a different character from that which he would have a right to make by going to the company and tendering his fare and saying, "I require you to take me upon such and such terms," in which case if they refused to take him, I rather think that he would have an action against them for such refusal. I think, therefore, that Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company was not within the Railway and Canal Traffic Act; not because it was the case of a passenger and his luggage, but because it was the case of a special bargain between the passenger and the company for a particular journey to and fro in a certain time, and not the ordinary case of a passenger going into a carriage and being conveyed from one station to another as a matter of right.

I think the present case is clear. Stewart's case, for the reasons I have mentioned, does not apply. I do not think, moreover, that any great injustice will be done to railway companies by our present decision. The companies, I have no doubt, will always guard themselves by making a condition that they will not be liable for passengers' luggage beyond the statutory weight unless it is weighed and paid for accordingly. But, as we all know, many people carry with them an amount of luggage in excess of the prescribed weight, and few people will ever weigh and pay for it. That would be a reasonable condition, and the consequence of it would be that the companies would be protected. However, be that so or not, I think the present case is clearly within the words of the Act, and that our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I shall not add anything to what my learned brother Bramwell has said with regard to these statutes of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, or the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 78. I also agree, whatever be the construction of the 7th section of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, that that section is made applicable by these later Acts to the case of steam packets and their traffic in the same way as to the company's ordinary trains running on their lines.

Then the question comes—and it is a very important one, and I am only surprised that up to this present time there has been no authoritative decision upon it—the question, I say, comes, whether ordinary passengers' luggage is included in the terms "articles, goods, or things," which are mentioned in the 7th section of the Act of 1854. It would be very important, of course, to have the question decided whether or not railway companies are common carriers, and subject to the liabilities of common carriers with respect to passengers' luggage. That has been, for the purposes of the argument, very properly admitted by Mr. Willis to be so, and it really would be almost impossible to contest it at this time of day; because there are two positive decisions on the point—namely, Richards v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (7 C. B. 829; 18 L. J. 251), and Le Conteur v. The London and South-Western Railway Company (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 325; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 54; 35 L. J. 40, Q.B.; 12 Jur. N. S. 266.) In both of these cases it was decided that with regard to passengers' luggage railway companies are common carriers. There were some very weighty observations made against that view of the case in Tally's case (L. Rep. 6 C. P. 44), by Mr. Justice Willes; but those observations were not really necessary for the decision of that case. The matter was again brought before the Court of Queen's Bench in Macrow v. The Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup), where Tally's case was cited and fully discussed; and Macrow's case is also another clear decision on the point in question. The railway company, therefore, being clearly common carriers, any subject to liability as such, the question is whether upon any fair construction of the 7th section, and distinction can be drawn between "goods" carried by the company as luggage and "goods" carried by them in the ordinary way as merchandise. I confess that I can see none.

Then Mr. Willis argued that the last proviso, which was that no special contract between the company and any other parties, as to the receiving, forwarding and delivering of any articles, &c, shall be binding upon or affect any such party, except the same be signed by him, or by the person delivering such articles, &c., meant and was only applicable to ordinary merchandise, or goods sent by commercial people in the ordinary way by goods trains; but, in my opinion, the words of this section apply equally to the case of luggage which we are now considering. Then we were pressed with the argument ab inconvenienti, that it would be excessively inconvenient and practically impossible for a passenger, at the moment of starting, to have to sign a special contract. I quite agree that it would be practically impossible; and that any company who insisted upon it would doubtless lose a vast deal of traffic, and would probably not long continue to insist on it. But is that really so? Parliament would say, "You, the railway company, practically have a monopoly in the carrying of passengers, and you must not be allowed to tell a passenger that you will not carry him unless he signs a special contract." Now, the Legislature has already said that if railway companies do not have a special contract with their passengers they shall be liable as common carriers; and although it may be as my learned brother has observed, that it is a slip in the Act of Parliament, and that it was never intended, I confess I cannot see that there is any very great hardship in a railway company being obliged to take a passenger's luggage as common carriers, or at all events that they should not be able to free themselves of a common carrier's liability unless they elect to do injury to their traffic by insisting upon their passengers signing a contract. I do not think, therefore, that the argument ab inconvenienti ought to prevail against the clear and distinct words of the statute; and we should be wrong to raise exceptions which really do not and never were intended to, exist upon such grounds.

Therefore our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

HUDDLESTON, B.—For the reasons stated by my learned brothers I hold the same opinion as they have expressed on the matter, and I think it obvious that the provision at the end of sect. 16 of the Act of 1868 refers to three sects. 14, 15, and 16.

If, then, that be so, what is the meaning of the 7th section of the Act of 1854? Now I find that that section has undergone a judicial decision in the house of Lords. In the case of Peek v. North Staffordshire Railway Company in the House of Lords (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768; 10 H. of L. Cas. 473; 32 L. J. 241, Q. B.; 9 Jur. N. S. 914), Lords Westbury and Wensleydale adopted the decision of Jervis, C.J. in the case of Simons v. The Great Western Railway Company 18 C. B. 805; 26 L. J. 55, C.P.) and of Williams, J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of McManus v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire, Railway Company (4 H. & N. 327; 28 L. J. 353, Ex.), and held that in fact "special contract" and "condition" in the statute were synonymous; whilst Lords Cranworth and Chelmsford, in the same case, held that they were two different things, and that a condition being a reasonable one need not be signed. Lord Westbury, L. C. there explained what he understood to be the meaning of the 7th section, and said (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 770): "I think that the true construction of that section may be expressed in a few words. I take it to be equivalent to a simple enactment that no general notice given by a railway company shall be valid in law for the purpose of limiting the common law liability of the company as carriers. Such common law liability may be limited to such conditions as the court or judge shall determine to be just and reasonable; but with this proviso, that any such condition so limiting the liability of the company shall be embodied in a special contract in writing between the company and the owner or person delivering the goods to the company, and which contract in writing shall be signed by such owner or person." (See 1 Smith's L. C. 7th edit., p. 236.) The words of the Act expressly state that any condition having for its object the relief of a railway company from liability for neglect or default of such company shall be null and void.

If that be so, the question arises whether passengers' luggage is "goods" within the meaning of the 7th section? Mr. Willis tried to draw some distinction, and said, that that Act merely applied to "goods" which were sent, and not to luggage which was carried by the passengers; and he urged that that was so not only upon the words of the section themselves but also from their collocation. Now the words themselves seem to me to be very general, and quite to include passengers' luggage; and, with reference to the collocation, it seems to me that the section deals with two classes of matters, namely, first, "horses, cattle, or other animals," and then takes another class, namely, "articles, goods, or things," and it speaks of "the receiving, forwarding, or delivering thereof." Now is not passengers' luggage

"goods" which are "received" at the company's station, and in the ordinary course of events "forwarded" thence by the company and "delivered" by them at the station of its destination? I apprehend that it clearly comes within the meaning of those words in the section in question. I find that in Macrow v. The Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), Cockburn, C.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in that case, deals with this question in the spirit in which my brother Amphlett has treated it on the present occasion. The learned Lord Chief Justice (at p. 619 of 24 L. T. Rep. N.S.) said, "The impossibility of travelling without the accompaniment of a certain quantity of luggage for the personal comfort and convenience of the traveller has led, from the earliest times, to the practice on the part of carriers of passengers for hire, of carrying, as a matter of course, a reasonable amount of luggage for the accommodation of the passenger, and of considering the remuneration for the carriage of such luggage as comprehended in the fare paid for the conveyance of the passengers. Under the older system of travelling by stage coaches, canal boats, or vessels, &c., the amount of luggage to be thus carried free of charge was commonly made part of the contract by express stipulation or notice from the carrier. Under the modern system of railway conveyance, it is fixed and regulated by the various Acts of Parliament under which railways have been established. The provision fixing the amount of luggage which the traveller shall be entitled to take with him free of charge, has a twofold object; first, that of securing to the traveller the conveyance of a reasonable amount of luggage; and, secondly, that of protecting the carrier from all dispute as to the amount of luggage which the passenger may claim to have carried, as well as of entitling the former to a proper remuneration for the carriage of luggage in excess of the quantity thus fixed by statute. Besides thus fixing the quantum of luggage which the passenger shall be entitled to have carried free of charge, the railway Acts have, in conformity with the practice of carriers under the old system, taken care expressly to limit the right of the passenger so carrying luggage, which must be taken to mean the personal luggage of the traveller. The conveyance of the personal luggage of the passenger being obviously for his convenience, and therefore a necessary, as it were, to his conveyance, it may be thought that the liability of the carrier in respect of the safe conveyance of passengers' luggage should have been co-extensive only with the liability in respect of the safety of the passenger. The law, however, is—now too firmly settled to admit of being shaken—that the liability of common carriers in respect of articles carried as passengers' luggage is that of carrying "goods," as distinguished from that of carrying of passengers; unless, indeed, where the passenger himself takes the personal charge of them, as in Tally v. The Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), in which case other considerations arise." I think that that is conclusive. As to Stewart v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, on which the defendants here rely, I think that my brother Bramwell has very clearly distinguished that case from the present one.

For these reasons I think that the replications are good, and that there must be judgment for the plaintiff.

Willis, for the defendants, applied for leave to add a plea to the effect that the contract was not made in England but in France, and was therefore not governed by English, but by French law.

BRAMWELL, B.—This is rather late, but it strikes me that the defendants ought to have the opportunity of doing it at their own cost, because, had they pleaded it before, it would have been argued now and at no greater expense. On payment, therefore, by the defendants, of all costs occasioned to the plaintiff by the plea not having been pleaded before, the defendants may add the desired plea, the plaintiff being at liberty to reply, take issue, and demur. The costs of the present demurrer to follow the event.

Judgment for the plaintiff accordingly.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Breach of contract to load—Detention of ship—Demurrage—Damages—Proximate cause—Remoteness.

The plaintiff's ship was chartered by the defendants under a charter-party, whereby it was agreed that the ship should go to a foreign port for a cargo, "and there in the usual and customary manner load in her regular turn," a cargo, &c. The ship went to the port but was not, owing to the defendants' default, ready to load when her turn came, and consequently had to wait for eleven days before her turn came again. When it did come round again the ship was ready, but the wind having meantime come on to blow hard, and the harbour being crowded with shipping, the harbour master would not allow the ship to move up to the loading berth, whereby she was detained for a period of three days further.

In an action on the charter-party for damages as demurrage for detention of the ship, it was Held by the Court (Cleasby and Amphlett, BB.), that, inasmuch as the default of the defendants in not being ready for the "first turn" was the proximate cause of the further detention of the ship during the three days, the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages as demurrage for the detention of his ship during the three days as well as during the eleven days.

THIS was an action by the plaintiff upon a charter-party to recover damages from the defendants as demurrage for the detention of the plaintiff's vessel at the port of loading.

The action came on for trial before Huddleston, B. at the summer assizes 1875, at Liverpool, upon which occasion it appeared that by a clause in the charter-party in question it was provided that the ship should go to a foreign port for a cargo of coals, and there "in the usual and customary manner load in her regular turn a cargo," &c. The ship went to the port named, but when her "turn" came she was not, through the default of the defendants, ready to load, and, consequently, she lost one turn, and had to wait eleven days before her "turn" came again. When that came round again she was ready. The wind, however, had in the meantime come on to blow hard, and the harbour being crowded with shipping, the harbour master would not permit the plaintiff's ship to be taken alongside the loading place in the harbour, for fear of an accident from collision, &c., and in consequence she was detained for a further period of three days. The plaintiff then claimed damages, as demurrage, in the present action for the detention of the ship and loss of time for the whole period of fourteen days. The jury found that the loss of the "first turn" to load was occasioned by the default of the defendants, and gave a verdict for the plaintiff, with damages for the detention of his vessel, such damages including the sum of 93*l.* 15*s.* as demurrage for the three days during which the vessel was prevented by the harbour master from moving up to the loading berth as before mentioned, and leave was reserved to the defendants, by the learned judge, to move to reduce the damages by such last-mentioned sum.

Benjamin, Q.C. (with whom was Foard), on the part of the defendants, now moved for a rule to that effect accordingly, and argued that the defendants were in no manner responsible for the delay and detention during the three days, such detention being the result entirely of "perils of the sea." It is not contended for a moment that the defendants are not liable for the delay in not being ready to load when the vessel's first turn came, whereby she had to wait till her regular turn came again; but when that second turn came she was ready, and it was by no act or omission of the defendants that she did not then proceed to load; but it was the act of the port authority, over which the defendants had no control, and they are not liable or responsible for the consequences resulting from it. The damages claimed for these three days are too remote, and arise from a cause and a state of things which the parties never contemplated. They are not the natural result of the first default of the defendants, and the damages, therefore, ought to be reduced by the amount mentioned, namely, 93*l.* 15*s.*

Cleasby, B.(a)—I am of opinion that in this case we ought not to grant a rule for the reduction of the damages on the ground on which it has been asked for by the learned counsel for the defendants. The detention of the plaintiff's vessel for the three days must properly be taken into consideration as part of the damages sustained by him. There were not two separate detentions, but only one. The defendants' contract was to "load in regular turn," and it was not a question of the first turn or the second turn. The defendants did not load the ship "in regular turn," and it was the breach of their contract in that respect that caused the delay and detention of the ship for fourteen days altogether. Mr. Benjamin has argued that the defendants are not to be held responsible for the three last days of the fourteen, because the detention of the vessel during that latter period was caused, not by any default on the part of the defendants, but by events and circumstances over which they had no control. I cannot agree with that argument. It seems to me that the proximate cause of the detention of the vessel during those three days was the default of the defendants in not being ready to load when the vessel's first or "regular" turn arrived, and so not performing their contract, and that it was not the result of any vis major, or any accident over which the defendants can be said to have had no control.

Amphlett, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion.

Creen v. Wright.

Shipowner and master—Reasonable notice of dismissal.

The master of a ship in the absence of express stipulation in the contract of hiring, is entitled to reasonable notice of dismissal from the shipowner.

This was an action for wrongful dismissal, brought by the plaintiff, who had been in the defendant's employment as captain of a ship, against the defendant, who was a shipowner. The plaintiff had entered into an agreement with the defendant to act in his service as captain of the ship City Camp, at a salary after the rate of 180*l.* a year; the wages were to begin when the plaintiff joined the ship. The question on which the decision turned was whether either party could determine the agreement without notice, and the clause in the agreement relating to this question was as follows: "Should owners require captain to leave the ship abroad, his wages to cease on the day he is required to give up the command, and the owners to have the option of paying or not paying his expenses travelling home." The defendant dismissed the plaintiff in Liverpool without notice, and without any reasonable cause, after the ship was partly loaded for an outward voyage, and it was for this dismissal that the present action was brought. The case was tried before Lush, J., at the Liverpool Winter Assizes 1875, and the verdict was directed to be entered for the defendant. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained for a new trial on the ground of misdirection by the learned judge, in ruling that the plaintiff, having agreed to the terms of the engagement, could be dismissed without notice.

T. H. James showed cause.—The agreement does not entitle the plaintiff to notice if he is discharged abroad, for if he is entitled to notice under such circumstances the provision that wages are to cease from the day when the captain is required to give up the command would have no meaning, and there is nothing in the agreement to show that he is entitled to notice if discharged in this country. Where there is no specific agreement as to notice, the question must be determined by custom: Manley Smith on Master and Servant, page 77, 3rd edition; but where there is no stipulation and no custom there is no right to notice. In the cases where it has been held that notice was necessary, there has always been evidence of custom, as in Hiscox v. Batchellor (15 L. T. Rep.

N. S. 543). In Foxall v. The International Land Credit Company (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 637), the jury found that the custom was proved. Here notice is excluded by the contract.

Herschell, Q.C. (M'Connell with him) in support of the rule. The ruling of the learned judge at the trial cannot be supported. It must be admitted that there is no inflexible rule, but an indefinite hiring is primâ facie a yearly hiring: (It. v. The Inhabitants of Hampreston, 5 T. R. 205.) If the plaintiff can be dismissed at any time without notice, he can leave the service at any time without notice, and this cannot have been the intention of the parties. The plaintiff was at least entitled to such notice as was reasonable under the circumstances. This view is consistent with the law as laid down by Pollock, C.B., in Fairman v. Oakford (5 H. & N. 635; 29 L.J. 459, Ex.), where he says, "there is no inflexible rule that a general hiring is a hiring for a year; each particular case must depend on its own circumstances. From much experience of juries I have come to the conclusion that usually the indefinite hiring of a clerk is not a hiring for a year absolutely, but rather one determinable by three months' notice."

Cur. adv. vult.

May 10.—The judgment of the court (Lord Coleridge C.J., and Archibald and Lindley JJ.), was delivered by Lord Coleridge C.J.—This was an action tried before my brother Lush, at Liverpool, in Dec. 1875, in which he directed a verdict to be entered for the defendant, and we have to determine whether that direction was correct.

The plaintiff had been the master of the ship City Camp, under a written contract dated the 28th March 1875, from that day until the 10th Aug. 1875, when he was dismissed, not for misconduct, but without notice, the defendant contending that by the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and himself, the plaintiff was not entitled to any notice before dismissal. Other points arose in the case, but were not discussed before us.

The action was brought for a dismissal, wrongful in being without notice, and the sole question argued was whether, under the contract, the plaintiff was entitled to notice before dismissal, and on this single point my brother Lush directed the verdict for the defendant.

The contract, so far as it is material to set it out, was as follows: "I hereby accept the command of the ship City Camp on the following terms: Salary to be at and after the rate of 180*l.* sterling per annum." Then followed certain other terms not material, and then—"Should owners require captain to leave the ship abroad, his wages to cease on the day he is required to give up the command, and the owners have the option of paying or not paying his expenses travelling home. Wages to begin when captain joins the ship. Francis Green, master City Camp."

It was contended for the plaintiff that under this contract he was entitled to a reasonable notice before dismissal, at any rate if dismissed in this country; but my brother Lush held that he was not; but upon consideration we are of opinion that he was.

The relation of the master of a ship to his employer, the shipowner, is not one in which, in the case of an indefinite hiring, the law has made, and there was no evidence of any custom making, the hiring a hiring for a year, or for any other definite time, nor the notice by which the service is to be determined certain. As to the hiring we adopt the language of Pollock, C.B. in delivering the judgment of the court in Fairman v. Oakford (5 H. & N. 635; 29 L. J. 450, Ex,): "There is no inflexible rule that an indefinite hiring is a hiring for a year. Each particular case must depend upon its own circumstances." As to the notice we think the sound construction of the contract before us is that, except in the single case provided for by its terms, there must be a reasonable notice before it can be put an end to by either party. The rule of construction must be the same for both parties to the contract. If the shipowner may dismiss the master without notice on the very eve of a voyage, the master may leave the ship without notice at the same point of time. But the great inconvenience and heavy loss which might be, and indeed in most cases would be, inflicted on the shipowner, without any remedy by such a construction of the contract, if acted on by the master, lead us to believe that such is not and could not be the meaning of the contract, nor the intention of the parties to it. The loss and inconvenience to the master following upon the construction contended for, though not positively so great, may be relatively very great indeed; and this consideration points to the same conclusion. The provision that the master's wages shall cease instantly upon dismissal abroad may well have been intended to prevent any question as to the shipowner being liable to the whole expense of bringing the master back to the United Kingdom; and does not appear to us to permit an argument for construing the contract so as to enable either party to put an end to it at any time without notice of any kind. Indeed, upon the construction of the contract contended for by the plaintiff, and if no notice before putting an end to it was required at any time on the part of either master or shipowner, it is not easy to assign a reason for the insertion of this particular provision into the contract. Nor was any satisfactory reason offered to us why the rule, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, should not apply to it.

We think, therefore, that under his contract, as the master could not, except under very unusual circumstances, be dismissed during the continuance of a voyage, and while the vessel was at sea, so he was entitled to some notice, and that is to reasonable notice, before dismissal in this country.

There is some authority for saying that as a proposition of general law reasonable notice is to be implied as a term of such a contract of hiring as this. Sir John Byles so laid down the law at Nisi Prius, in the case of Hiscox v. Batchellor (15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 543), and the case of Fairman v. Oakford (5 H. & N. 635; 29 L. J. 459, Ex.), already referred to, seems, if the facts of it be carefully considered, to be an authority to the same effect. For in the absence of stipulation for any notice, a month's notice was held reasonable to determine an indefinite hiring of a clerk, on the ground that the same clerk had accepted such a notice as sufficient to determine a former indefinite hiring, also without stipulation for notice of any kind. It is nowhere suggested that the absence of stipulation made no notice necessary in either of the hirings, which would have been a short and simple ground, if a sound one, for upholding the verdict in that case.

But without intending to throw any doubt whatever upon these cases, we decide the one before us upon its own circumstances, and upon considerations especially applicable to the contract on which the dispute arose. And we think that the order must be absolute for a new trial.

Order absolute.

THE DELTA.

Collision—Foreign judgment—Estoppel—Res judicata—Lis alibi pendens.

In an action of collision a judgment of a foreign court given in a cause between the same parties cannot be pleaded as an estoppel unless such judgment was obtained prior to the institution of the action in this country; there being no res judicata, but only lis alibi pendens, when the plaintiff instituted his action here, he can claim to proceed to judgment in this country if he chooses.

Semble a judgment in a foreign court against a person not subject to the jurisdiction of that court to be an estoppel, must be a judgment on the merits, and not merely by default.

THESE were cross causes of collision instituted respectively by the owners of the Italian barque Erminia Foscolo, and of her cargo against the French steamship Delta, and the French company of the Messageries Maritimes, her owners intervening, and by the owners of the Delta against the owners of the Erminia Foscolo.

The collision occurred in the Straits of Gibraltar on 11th Aug. 1871, and resulted in considerable damage being done to both vessels.

The petition (in the principal cause against the Delta) was in the ordinary form, alleging the facts charging negligence against the Delta.

The answer, after dealing with the facts, and charging negligence against the Erminia Foscolo, continued as follows:

7. The Erminia Foscolo, at the time of the collision, was an Italian ship, and her owner was then, and always since has been, and now is, resident in Italy, and an Italian subject.

8. In or about the month of Sept. 1871, the owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo commenced a suit against the said company, the owners of the said steamship Delta, and against the said steamship in the court of the Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles, in the republic of France, and prayed the said tribunal to declare the said owners of the Delta responsible for the consequences of the collision between the Erminia Foscolo and the Delta, on the night of the 11th Aug., as hereinbefore mentioned, and to condemn the said defendants, the owners of the Delta, to pay to the said plaintiffs in the said suit the amount of their damages and costs.

9. In or about the said month of September 1871, the master of the Delta and the company of the Messageries Maritimes, the owners of the said steamship, instituted proceedings against the master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo, and the said barque in the said Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles, and prayed the said tribunal to condemn the defendants in the said suit jointly and severally, the one as master and the other as owner of the Erminia Foscolo, to be civilly liable to pay to the said company the amount of the damage and losses occasioned to the Delta in the said collision between the Delta and the Erminia Foscolo, which had taken place in the Strait of Gibraltar, as hereinbefore mentioned, by the improper navigation of the captain of the Erminia Foscolo, together with costs.

10. At the time of the institution of the said respective suits and proceedings, and until and at the time of the judgments given in the same as hereinafter mentioned, the said Tribunal of Commerce was a court of competent jurisdiction to entertain the said suits and proceedings, and to adjudicate thereupon, and had jurisdiction over the said parties to the said suits and proceedings in and about the premises.

11. The master and owners of the Delta duly appeared as defendants in the suit brought against them by the said master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo, in the said Tribunal of Commerce as aforesaid, and the said master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo appeared and defended the suit brought by the said master and owners of the Delta. Subsequently to such appearances proceedings were duly had and taken in the said suits before the said tribunal in accordance with the laws of France.

12. After several adjournments, granted at the request of the master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo, the cause which they had brought against the said company of the Messageries Maritimes, the owners of the Delta, was definitely fixed for hearing by the said tribunal upon the 22nd Dec. 1871. Upon the said 22nd Dec., the said Tribunal of Commerce delivered judgment by default against the plaintiffs in the said suit, and rejected their claim against the said company, and dismissed the said company from the suit brought against them as aforesaid.

13. The cause brought by the owners of the Delta against the master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo was also appointed by the said Tribunal of Commerce to be heard upon the said 22nd Dec.; and upon the said day the plaintiffs in the said cause having proved their case to the satisfaction of the court, and the defendants in the said cause not appearing to contradict their evidence, the said Tribunal of Commerce delivered its judgment in the said cause, and condemned the master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo to pay to the said company the amount of the loss and damage sustained by the Delta by reason of the said collision, which was, by the said judgment, determined to have been occasioned by the improper navigation of the Erminia Foscolo.

14. Notice of the said decrees was duly given to the said owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo in accordance with the requirements of the law of France, and all things on the plaintiffs' part have been done to make, and the said judgments have now by the law of France become, and are valid and conclusive, and final judgments, and binding upon the plaintiffs, and are still in full force and effect.

15. The defendant's submit to this honourable court that by reason of the aforesaid judgments, the plaintiffs ought not to be allowed to further prosecute the suit against the Delta.

To this answer the plaintiffs' solicitor replied and, after dealing with the facts, averred as follows:

3. He denies the truth of the several allegations contained in the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 13th, and 14th articles of the said answer.

3*a*. He says that if any such suit as stated in the 8th article of the said answer was brought in the names of the master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo, the bringing of such suit was never authorised or ratified by the plaintiff, the owner of the cargo of the Erminia Foscolo.

4. He says that if any suit was commenced by the owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo, as in the said 8th article alleged, it was commenced against the owners of the Delta only and not against the Delta, and that it was subsequently, and before the 22nd Dec. 1871, and before the 18th Nov. 1871, the day of the institution of this suit, and before the 20th day of the same month, the day of the appearance of the defendants herein, abandoned by the master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo, and that the judgment in the 12th article of the said answer stated was and is a judgment of nonsuit only, and not a judgment on the merits.

5. If any such judgment, as in the said 13th article alleged, was delivered by the said Tribunal of Commerce, it was delivered in default of appearance of the said master and owner of the Erminia Foscolo, and without any evidence being previously given before the said tribunal, and was not and is not a judgment on the merits.

6. The said owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo, and the said owners of cargo respectively, were not, nor was or were any or either of them at the time of the happening of the said collision, or at any time afterwards, subjects or a subject of France, or resident or present therein.

7. The said owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo, and the said owners of cargo respectively, had not any notice of the said alleged decrees within the time allowed by the law of France for an appeal therefrom respectively.

To this reply the defendants' solicitors rejoined as follows:—

1. As to article 3*a* of the amended reply of the plaintiffs, the owners of the cargo of the Erminia Foscolo authorised and ratified the said suit.

1*a*. By the law of France, apart from any express authority or ratification, the plaintiffs, the owners of the cargo of the Erminia Foscolo, are under the circumstances bound and estopped by the said judgment, and the said defendants submit that the law of France is the law applicable to this case.

1*b*. As to the 4th article of the reply, they deny that at any time before the said 22nd Dec. 1871, the said owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo abandoned the said proceedings and suit instituted by them in the said Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles.

2. They deny the allegations contained in the 5th and 7th articles of the said reply.

3. They submit that the allegations contained in the 6th article of the reply are immaterial under the circumstances set forth in the 8th article of the answer.

4. By the law of the kingdom of Italy, and by treaties between France and Italy heretofore and now existing and in force, and particularly by the treaty between the said countries of the 24th March 1760, it is provided that the Supreme Courts of Italy should be guided by letters of request of the Supreme Courts of France in giving executory effect and force within the said kingdom of Italy to the sentences and judgments of the courts of France according to law.

5. On the 12th Feb. 1882, the defendants in this suit duly obtained from the Court of Appeal of Aix in the Republic of France, being a Supreme Court of France within the meaning of the said laws and treaties, a letter of request addressed to the Court of Appeal of Genoa in the said kingdom of Italy requiring executory force and execution within the said kingdom to be given to the sentences and judgments of the said Tribunal of Commerce of Marseilles alleged in the 12th and 13th articles of the answer, and the said owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo were duly cited to appear before the said Court of Appeal of Genoa to answer to the prayer and request that executory force should be given to the said judgments as aforesaid; the said owner of the Erminia Foscolo appeared, and opposed the said prayer and request.

6. On the 4th day of June, 1872, the said Court of Appeal of Genoa, being a Supreme Court of Italy within the meaning of the said laws and treaties, after hearing the pleadings and exceptions of the said owner of the Erminia Foscolo in opposition and contrary thereto, rejected every petition and exception of the said owner of the Erminia Foscolo, and decreed and declared that executory force must be and thereby was given to the said sentences and judgments delivered by the said Tribunal of Commerce of Marseilles in the suits respectively brought by the defendants and the said owner and master of the Erminia Foscolo as set forth in the answer filed herein, and declared the said judgments to be executory within the said kingdom of Italy.

7. The said judgments of the said Tribunal of Commerce of Marseilles set forth in the 12th and 13th articles of the answer, and the said judgment of Court of Appeal of Genoa are, by reason of the premises valid and binding, and conclusive upon the said owner of the Erminia Foscolo in Italy as well as in France, and by the law of Italy as well as by the law of France, the said owner of the Erminia Foscolo, one of the plaintiffs in this suit, is barred and precluded from recovering any damages from the defendants in respect of the collision between the Delta and the Erminia Foscolo, alleged in the petition.

8. The defendants repeat the submission contained in the 15th article of the answer.

The plaintiffs' solicitor concluded the pleadings by denying the allegations of the rejoinder, and alleging that the rejoinder was bad in substance.

The pleadings in the cross cause merely raised the question of the negligence of the two vessels, and made no mention of the point of law raised in the principal cause.

The causes were first called on for hearing in July 1874, before the judge (Sir R. Phillimore), assisted by Trinity Masters, but at that time the parties were not prepared to go into the defence raised upon the pleadings under the judgment of the French tribunal, and on that point the case was adjourned; but on the merits the judge determined to hear the cause de bene esse, and the cause was accordingly heard on the merits, and the Delta was found alone to blame for the collision, and the further hearing on the points of law was adjourned.

July 10 and 11.—The cause again came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore, in the Admiralty Division. It was then proved that the judgments stated in the pleadings had been given by the French tribunal at Marseilles, and that under the treaties mentioned in the fourth article of the rejoinder the Court of Appeal at Aix, the proper tribunal, addressed lettres rogatoires to the Court of Appeal at Genca, and that in consequence of such letters the Court of Appeal at Genoa declared the said judgments to be executory within the kingdom of Italy; and it was also proved that the plaintiff appeared and opposed such declaration by the Italian tribunal. The judgments mentioned were respectively, in the case against the owners of the Delta, a judgment for the owners of the Delta by reason of want of prosecution by the owners of the Erminia Foscolo; and in the case against the owners of the Erminia Foscolo, a judgment for the owners of the Delta by default of appearance by the owners of the Erminia Foscolo; and there was no decision on the merits of the case either in the French or Italian tribunal. Several French and Italian advocates were called to give evidence as to the foreign law. They stated that in a case of collision a judgment given against a ship and its owners was, by French and Italian law, also binding upon the owners of the cargo laden on board that ship, as the ship and its owners represented all the interests embarked in the ship at the same time. The owners of the cargo of the Erminia Foscolo had no notice of, and had never been summoned in the proceedings in the French and Italian tribunals, although they had a house at Marseilles. There was a difference of opinion between the French advocates as to the binding effect of a judgment by default, some asserting that a judgment by default not appealed from was as binding as a judgment on the merits, and prevented any further proceedings between the same parties; and others being of opinion that a party condemned by default might under certain circumstances renew proceedings against the same parties, as, for instance, where a judgment by default has not been executed within six months from its being pronounced, and it consequently becomes lapsed (non avenu: See Code de Procedure, sect. 156). Neither of the judgments before-mentioned has been executed either by the French or Italian tribunals. French and Italian law are the same upon these matters.

The remaining facts and dates are fully stated in the judgment.

Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the Erminia Foscolo.—We ask for judgment notwithstanding the defence made by the owners of the Delta. As far as relates to the owners of the cargo of the Erminia Foscolo, they never were summoned, and had no notice of the foreign proceedings, and hence cannot be bound by them. The present action was commenced (18th Nov. 1871) before they obtained judgment in the French actions (22nd Dec. 1871), and they appeared in this action without protest (20th Nov. 1871) and gave bail and then they subsequently (15th Jan. 1872) commence a cross action in this court against the Erminia Foscolo. In none of their proceedings do they mention the French judgments until the answer in the action against the Delta. In the petition against the Erminia Foscolo there is no mention of those proceedings. These judgments are a good answer to the action if they amount to an estoppel, and a judgment, to be an estoppel, must be a judgment on the merits of the case. There is no case which establishes that a judgment other than a judgment on the merits is an estoppel. Again, before a judgment can be pleaded by way of estoppel, such estoppel must have been operative at the time of the institution of the cause in which it is pleaded; it cannot become an estoppel during the process of the cause. There was no judgment in the French tribunals until after this cause was instituted in this court, and consequently there can be no estoppel. The owners of the Delta should have followed the course indicated in The Mali Ivo (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 356), and have put the owners to their election as to which action they would continue, and should have pleaded lis alibi pendens, not res judicata. There was no judgment in Italy until 4th June 1872, that is, after the defendants' answer was filed (22nd March 1872), and consequently at that time there was no judgment in Italy. An English court will examine into a foreign judgment before giving it effect: (Don v. Lippman, 5 C. & F. 1.)

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and R. E. Webster, for the Delta.—This is res judicata. There have been judgments by default against plaintiffs, and these are binding against them, and must be acted upon by English courts so long as they are in accordance with French law, and there is a duty upon the plaintiffs to obey those judgments: (Schibsby v. Westenholz, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 155.) That they are binding upon the plaintiffs in accordance with French law is clear from the evidence laid before the court. There was a duty upon the plaintiffs to obey the judgments, because they themselves were suing the defendants in respect of this same collision, and were constructively present in Marseilles by their agent or advocate when the actions in the Tribunal of Commerce were commenced and judgment was given. Moreover, in consequence of the treaties existing between France and Italy, the judgments became Italian judgments, and the plaintiffs were Italian subjects and resident in Italy, and hence there was a duty to obey those judgments. A judgment not appealed from, whether by default or not, passes into res judicata, and when once it is res judicata it bars further proceedings between the same parties, and is a good plea to an action brought by the party who has been condemned.

A judgment by default in a foreign court cannot be questioned by the party against whom it has passed, where he has subjected himself to the jurisdiction and has had notice of the proceedings, and even in some cases where he has had no notice:

Tarleton v. Tarleton, 4 M. & S. 20.

Vallee v. Dumergue, 4 Exch. 290.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It seems clear that a foreign judgment on the merits of a case may be an estoppel, but how can that be the case where there has been no decision on the merits?] Where there has been notice to the party in default he must answer for his own default.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.—No judgment can be an estoppel unless the case has been contested on the merits: (Langmead v. Maple, 17 C. B., N.S., 255.)

Cur. adv. vult.

July 25, 1876.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—These are cross causes of collision, brought originally in the High Court of Admiralty; the first by the owners of the barque Erminia Foscolo, and the owners of the cargo, against the steamship Delta; the second by the owners of the Delta against the Erminia Foscolo.

In the suit against the Delta the proceedings, besides narrating in the ordinary form the incidents of the collision, raise a further issue, or further issues, in the following manner. Articles 7 to 15, inclusive, of the answer as amended, are as follows: (The learned judge then read those articles of the answer as given above.) Articles 3 to 7, inclusive, of the reply, as also amended, are as follows: The truth of the allegations of the answer is denied, and it is further stated: (the learned judge then read the reply as given above.) A rejoinder was put in, which was as follows: (as given in the rejoinder set out above.) The pleadings in the Erminia Foscolo merely raise the issue as to the blameworthiness of the two vessels.

When the causes came on for hearing, by arrangement, the last question was determined first, and in the result I then found the Delta alone to blame for the collision. The point, however, remains—on which opinions of foreign jurists and others have been since taken, and which was finally argued on the 10th of this month—whether the question in dispute between the parties had not previously been determined by another competent court, so that the matter was in the category of res judicata.

The collision occurred on 11th Aug. 1870, off Gibraltar. On 9th Sept. 1871 the captain and owners of the Delta instituted a suit in the Court of Commerce at Marseilles against the captain and owners of the Erminia Foscolo. On 12th Sept. a suit was instituted in the same court by the owner of the Erminia Foscolo against the owners of the Delta. Some adjournments of the two suits were had, and on the 22nd Dec. the tribunal, in the suit brought against the captain and owners of the Erminia Foscolo, pronounced judgment against the defendants, for default of appearance, condemning them in the plaintiffs' damages and costs. On the same day the tribunal, in the suit brought against the owners of the Delta, pronounced judgment against the plaintiff for default of prosecution, condemning him in costs. By a treaty of 1760, between France and the kingdom of Sardinia, the Supreme Commercial Courts of either country were to execute the decrees of each other. A petition was presented by the owners of the Delta to the Court of Appeal at Aix, praying that court to put in force the provisions of this treaty by sending letters of request (requisitiones—lettres rogatoires) to the Court of Appeal at Genoa. Such letters were accordingly decreed by the court at Aix on 12th Feb. 1872. On 24th Feb. a citation out of the Court at Genoa was served on the owners of the Erminia Foscolo; a further citation seems to have been served on the 12th of the month, and on the 4th June the Court at Genoa, having heard arguments on both sides, decreed that executive justice must be given to the judgment of the Court of Commerce, and condemned the owners of the Erminia Foscolo in costs. Some attempt seems to have been made to execute this judgment, but ultimately it remained unexecuted. In the meantime the suits in the High Court of Admiralty had already been instituted. That against the Delta was instituted on the 18th Nov. 1871, and an appearance was entered by the owners of the Delta on the 20th, that appearance not being under protest, but absolute. The suit against the Erminia Foscolo was instituted on the 13th Jan. 1872, and an appearance was entered on the same day. The judgments in the Court of Commerce were not rendered till the 22nd Dec. 1871, so that at the time of the institution of the suit against the Delta and of the appearance of the owners of the Delta the suit in the Court of Commerce had not passed into res judicata, but was only a lis alibi pendens. After the judgment in the Court of Commerce the owners of the Delta instituted this suit here against the Erminia Foscolo, and filed pleadings in their suit, in which no mention is made of the judgment of the Court of Commerce.

On the question of foreign law, both French and Italian advocates were examined. Their evidence left it at last doubtful whether the judgment of the Court of Commerce, rendered as it was in default of appearance, never having been executed, would now have in France or Italy the force of a res judicata. But I think it unnecessary to go into their evidence in detail, as I am of opinion that this defence must fail for two reasons. The first is, that at the time when the suit against the Delta was begun here there was confessedly no res judicata, there was only a lis alibi pendens. If the owners of the Delta had wished to escape from having two suits against them for the same matter brought to a hearing, they should have put the owners of the Erminia Foscolo to their election, compelling them to abandon one or either of the suits, according to the rule laid down by me in The Mali Ivo (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 356), and quite recently applied in The Cattarina Chiazzaro: (L. Rep. 1 P. D. & A. 368; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 312; ante p. 170.) As regards the suit against the Erminia Foscolo, it was brought by the owner of the Delta while a foreign lis was pending. They cannot be heard, therefore, to object that that lis is a bar to the decision on the merits of the suit. The second reason is, that the foreign judgment not having been rendered on the merits of the case, but on matter of form only, cannot be set up as a bar to a decision on the merits. It is, however, upon the former ground that this judgment is principally founded.

I have already pronounced the Delta to be alone to blame for the collision. I must now pronounce that the further defence raised on behalf of the owners of the Delta is not sustained, and that they must be condemned in the damages occasioned by the collision, and in the costs of the suit, and I must dismiss the suit against the Erminia Foscolo with costs.

Re SMITH AND OTHERS.

Practice—Collision upon high seas—British and foreign ship—Jurisdiction—Service out of the jurisdiction—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order II. r. 4; Order XI. r. 1.

Where an English ship is damaged in collision upon the high seas, outside any territorial jurisdiction, by a ship owned by a foreign company established abroad, there is no power to issue a writ for service out of the jurisdiction upon, or of which notice is to be given out of the jurisdiction to, the foreign company, and claiming damage in respect of the collision.

Semble, that "within the jurisdiction" in Orders II. and XI. of the Supreme Court Rules, means within the territorial jurisdiction.

IN Jan. 1876 the British steamship City of Mecca, being about nine miles from the mouth of the river Tagus, and upon the high seas, came into collision with the steamship Insulana, belonging to the Empreza Insulana Company—a company owning steamships and carrying on their business at Lisbon. Considerable damage was done to the City of Mecca.

An application was made by summons in chambers, on behalf of the owners of the City of Mecca (Smith and others), under the Rules of the Supreme Court, Order II., rule 4, and Order XI., rule 1, that a writ endorsed with a claim for compensation for the damage so done might be issued for service out of the jurisdiction upon, or of which notice might be given out of the jurisdiction to, the Empreza Insulana Company.

In an affidavit used in support of the summons, it was stated that the Empreza Insulana Company carried on business at Lisbon, that the members of the company were not British subjects, and that the Insulana was registered at Lisbon as belonging to the directors of the company.

The judge having adjourned the summons into court.

E. C. Clarkson, on behalf of the owners of the City of Mecca, contended that the collision having occurred on the high seas, which is within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, the act done was done within the jurisdiction. Hence, under Order XI., rule 1, and Order II., rule 4, of the rules of the Supreme Court, the court has power to order the writ to issue, and can direct service of notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the court would, if the Insulana could have been arrested within the territorial jurisdiction, have exercised jurisdiction so far as the res was concerned, but it would under the old law, have possessed no jurisdiction in personam over the owners of the vessel, unless they could have been served with a citation within the territorial jurisdiction, I do not think that the Legislature, in enacting the 1st rule of the 11th order in the schedule to the Judicature Act, contemplated any alteration of the law in cases similar to the present, and, in the circumstances, I am not satisfied that I can grant the leave asked for. If I acceded to the application I should be exercising a jurisdiction in personam over persons for doing an act at a time when they were without the territorial jurisdiction of this country.

Motion refused.

THE THOMAS LEA.

Sailing rules — Regulations for preventing collisions at sea—Rule 20.

When a vessel is aground in a place where her ordinary riding light cannot be distinguished by approaching vessels, and where vessels are not expected to lie, it is her duty to exhibit a light on a mast or some elevated position, and to have a lookout to give warning to approaching vessels of her position by the best means in her power.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted by the owners of the screw steamer Belmont against the screw steamer Thomas Lea.

There was no cross cause.

The Belmont was a vessel of 576 tons register, belonging to the port of Sunderland, and the Thomas Lea was a vessel of 486 tons register, belonging to the port of London.

The collision occurred on the 19th Jan. 1876, about 8.15 p.m. The Belmont was then lying on the ground at the entrance of the tidal basin of the Sunderland Docks, and the Thomas Lea was about to enter the basin, inward bound from London.

It was alleged by the plaintiffs that those on board the Thomas Lea did not keep a proper lookout, and by the Thomas Lea that the Belmont neglected to give proper warning of her peculiar position, and that a light alleged to have been shown over her stern was either not exhibited at all or of insufficient power, and obscured and reddened by smoke on the glass of it.

Webster and Phillimore, for the plaintiffs.

Butt, Q.C. and Myburgh, for the defendants.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision between two steamships near the tidal basin in the river Wear, at the entrance of the Sunderland South Dock. The plaintiffs in this case, the owners of the Belmont, had finished loading her cargo, on the morning of the 19th Jan., and she drew 16ft. and 3 or 4 inches of water. She seems to have had two courses before her — either to have gone through the South Dock, or to have at once straightened down the river over the bar—she elected the former. It was a neap tide, and as the vessel was entering the basin she took the ground upon the eastern side of it; she remained fast, lying a little on her side, her head towards the dock gates, and her stern projecting into the river. She took the ground at 10 a.m., and remained fast till 10 p.m. The collision took place at 8.15 p.m. At this time a steamship, the Thomas Lea, was entering the river and going into the South Dock. The wind was blowing very hard from the S.W., and the night was dark and cloudy, though lights could be seen at some distance. The Thomas Lea had her proper lights up and burning, but there is a dispute as to whether she had a good lookout. Her own account is, that "whilst rounding to out of the river into the harbour, her engines were going easy astern, and they had but little headway on her," about half a knot, and she ran into the Belmont, striking her about 20ft. from the stern upon the port side.

Now, on the one hand, it is urged by the Belmont that the collision was in consequence of the want of a proper lookout on board the Thomas Lea; and, on the other, it is contended by the Thomas Lea that it was caused by the want of due notice being given, by proper signals, to vessels entering the harbour, of the position of the Belmont.

There can be no doubt that it was the duty of the Belmont, whilst she remained in this position at the entrance of the dock, to take every precaution in her power to warn other vessels entering of that position. She says she satisfied that requirement in the following way: she put up two lights, one in her starboard fore rigging, and the other 3ft. above the wheel at the stern, the wheel itself standing 2½ft. from the deck. It is admitted that the light in the fore rigging could have no effect in apprising vessels entering of the position of the Belmont; as it could not be seen by them in consequence of intervening objects on shore; it may, therefore, be left out of consideration. The only question then is, whether, if she had a light over the wheel or the stern, and if that light was of sufficient power in itself, and at the time in a proper condition, and if so, whether that was a sufficient precaution. Now the first duty of the Belmont, in the circumstances, was to have a good lookout. The mind of the court, assisted by the attention of the Elder Brethren, has been anxiously directed to an examination of that point. The mate was on shore, and his orders were to put up two lights, one aft and one in the starboard fore rigging; the anchor watch was kept by a sailor who has not been examined, and who is said to be on a foreign voyage. Where was the second mate? It seems that common prudence would have suggested that he should be at the stern looking out. He was not there. He was walking up and down the deck, forward and aft, and he gives this extraordinary evidence, that before he had taken a walk forward he saw the masthead light of a steamer coming up the river, five or six miles off; and when he returned from his walk he found the masthead light of a vessel pretty close, coming right into his port quarter. What did he do? Did he take any steps when he first saw the vessel coming up, and knew he was in an anomalous position where no one could expect a vessel to be? He did nothing whatever. In my judgment —and the Elder Brethren are of the same opinion —he ought to have blown the whistle, and taken every precaution to announce his position, instead of which, the converse is the case, and hence the result. What measures were taken to avoid the collision? None whatever; the only precaution alleged was the placing of the light aft, and it becomes important to consider the evidence with regard to that light. Assuming, in favour of the Belmont, that the light was there, it is extremely doubtful to me whether it was of sufficient quality and proper colour for the purposes for which it was intended. We are, moreover, of opinion that it was not placed in a proper position, as it ought to have been on a mast, or in some way elevated much higher above the deck than it was; and I have already said that even if the light were properly placed, there ought to have been a better lookout, and other modes adopted of warning an approaching vessel of the position in which the Belmont was lying.

The result at which I have arrived, with the advice and assistance of the Elder Brethren, is, that the Belmont has not shown that she used the precautions it was incumbent on her to adopt in her peculiar position, and that unquestionably she had a bad lookout, and, therefore, she cannot recover in this suit. I dismiss her petition with costs.

THE STAR OF INDIA.

Damage by collision—Measure of—Damages—Loss of charter-party.

In estimating the loss sustained by a ship in a collision, a charter-party previously entered into contingent on the arrival of the ship at a fixed date at another place and cancelled by the charterers by reason of the delay occasioned by the collision should be taken into consideration, the amount recoverable being the freight that would have been earned under the charter-party, less deductions for freight actually earned after repairs and for expenses and saving of wear and tear, &c., which would have been incurred in the performance of the charter-party.

In addition to such damages the shipowner is entitled to demurrage during the time he is detained for repairs at the usual rate allowed to ships.

A CAUSE of damage was instituted by the owners of the Cheviot against the Star of India, for damages sustained by the former vessel in a collision which took place in Madras Roads on the 1st May 1875, between the two vessels whilst the Cheviot was shortening in her cable to proceed to ports on the Coromandel Coast, from which she was chartered to London.

The defendants, the Merchant Shipping Company (Limited), the owners of the Star of India, admitted their liability for the damage sustained by the Cheviot, and on the 31st Dec. 1875, the amount thereof was referred to the registrar and merchants.

The registrar, after examination of witnesses on both sides, and hearing counsel, reported on the 27th March 1876, as follows:

I find there is due to the plaintiffs in respect of their said claim the sum of 577*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.*, together with interest thereon, as stated in the schedule hereto annexed. And I am also of opinion that each party ought to be left to pay his own costs of the reference, the reference fees to be paid by the plaintiffs.

The following schedule is that referred to:

	Claimed. £ s. d.	Allowed. £ s. d.
1. Demurrage of the barque Cheviot, of 494 tons, at 4*d.* per day from 1st May to 4th July 1875, viz., 65 days	535 3 4	535 3 4
2. Loss of charter-party	583 18 9	0 0 0
3. Surveyor's fees at Madras	15 16 3	15 16 3
4. Telegrams from Madras	16 15 3	16 15 3
5. Telegrams from Glasgow to Madras	6 10 0	6 10 0
6. Repairs to figure head	3 15 0	3 15 0
	£1161 18 7	577 19 10

With interest at 4 per cent. per annum from the 4th July 1875, until paid.

The plaintiffs, on the 12th April 1876, filed a petition in objection to this report, in so far as it disallowed the second item in the schedule and made the above order as to costs, for these reasons (among others):

(A.) At the time of collision the Cheviot, which was in Madras Roads, was under charter to take a cargo from the Coromandel Coasts to London, at the rate of 55*s.* per ton nett weight, delivered, and was heaving short in order to proceed to Gopalpore, the first or only port under the charter. The cargo which she would have carried would have been a dead weight cargo.

(B.) The collision occurred on the 1st May 1875, and as the Cheviot was so damaged that she could not possibly reach Gopalpore by the 10th May, the charterers, in accordance with a power given to them to that effect, cancelled the charter.

(C.) By the time the Cheviot was repaired, the season had nearly closed and freights had fallen.

(D.) The Cheviot was not sufficiently repaired to take in cargo till the 4th July, nor sufficiently repaired to proceed to sea till the 13th July.

(E.) On the 4th July, the Cheviot could have been chartered for a similar voyage to that which she had been chartered at the rate of 45*s.* per ton, but she could not have sailed for the ports of loading till on or after the 13th; instead thereof she was loaded at Madras on and after the 4th July, at the rate of 45*s.* per ton of measurement goods.

(F.) The plaintiffs' claim is for the difference between the freight of which the Cheviot would have earned under the cancelled charter-party and that which she earned under the loading at Madras.

The plaintiffs have not claimed or received demurrage for the detention of the Cheviot after the 4th July.

(G.) If the plaintiffs succeed wholly or partially in their claim, the cost of the reference ought to be awarded to them.

and prayed the court to order the report to be reformed by allowing to the plaintiffs the said sum of 583*l.* 18*s.* 9d., or such part thereof as to the court may seem just, and by condemning the defendants in the costs of the reference, and that the defendants might be condemned in the costs of the appeal.

On the 2nd May 1876, the defendants answered as follows:

1. They say that the respective reasons alleged in the said petition were not borne out by the charter-party and evidence produced before the registrar and merchants, and they crave leave to refer to such charter-party and evidence.

2. They say that the alleged damage claimed by the plaintiffs in respect of the loss of the said charter party was too uncertain and too remote, and that it was therefore properly disallowed by the registrar.

3 They say that, regard being had to the demurrage allowed to the plaintiffs and to the other facts and circumstances of the case, the plaintiffs failed to prove that they had in fact incurred any loss by reason of their not having fulfilled the said charter-party, and that on the contrary the profits actually earned by the plaintiffs were fully equal to the profits which they would have earned had the Cheviot performed the said voyage to Gopalpore and received her intended cargo and proceeded to London therewith and delivered the same there.

4. The defendants have always been ready and willing to settle the claims of the plaintiffs other than the said claim for loss of charter-party, from which latter claim alone the necessity for the reference arose.

and prayed the court to confirm the report of the registrar, and to condemn the plaintiff in costs.

June 13 and July 20.—The petition came on for hearing before the judge, when the facts stated in the petition were proved or admitted.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and Phillimore, for the plaintiffs.—The owners are entitled to recover the loss they have sustained by the tort of the defendants, and to be put in the same position exactly as that they would have occupied but for his misconduct. The question of remoteness does not arise here, as the charter-party was entered into and the plaintiffs were actually taking the first step to earn the money under the charter-party when they were prevented from doing so by the act of the defendants: (Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341; Jebsen v. East and West India Dock Company, L. Rep. 10 C.P. 300, 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 321; and the notes to Vicars v. Wilcocks, in Smith's Lead. Cas. 7th edit. vol. 2, p. 551, et seq.) The case is different from those in which damages are claimed for a breach of contract, where that only can be recovered the loss of which was in contemplation of both parties or which was the natural result of the breach of contract: (France v. Gaudet, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 199.) In Davis v. Garrett (6 Bing. 716) the owner of a barge was bound to make a restitution in integrum for damage done to a cargo through his wrongful deviation, and that is the proposed measure here; we should have earned all we asked for, and are entitled to recover it. Had the cargo been on board, and the delay occasioned a loss of market, that loss would have been recoverable, and this is really the same case. He also referred to The Frederick Warren (Pritchard's Ad. Digest, p. 708 n. 153), and The Gladiator (Pritchard's Ad. Digest, p. 707, n, 143).

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.—The damage claimed is too remote. Had the ship been at her loading port ready to load under a charter-party the amount might perhaps have been allowed, but here there is the chance, first, of the non-arrival at her loading port at all, and, second, of her non-arrival in time to prevent the charterers taking advantage of their option to cancel the charter party; she had only eight or ten days to reach Gopalpore in, and the ordinary chances of a sea voyage might well prevent her getting there in that time. The case is the same in principle as Portman v. Middleton (4 C. B., N.S., 322), and the notes to Vicars v. Wilcocks. [Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE referred to The Parana since reported, ante, p. 220.] This principle is further illustrated by Walker v. Goe and others (3 H. & N. 395; 4 H. & N. 350). The loss of the charter-party was not the necessary result of the damage, but of a clause in the charter-party itself, requiring the ship to be at Gopalpore by a certain date, and that is a matter which the defendants cannot be supposed to have had in contemplation. Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Exch. 341), so far as it is in point at all, favours my contention for the court says: "We think the proper rule is this—the damages should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, i.e., according to the usual course of things . . . or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties." But that case is one of the measure of damages for breach of contract, not for a tort; in the latter class of cases only that damage which is the natural and obvious result of the tort can be recovered, for nothing more can be considered to be in the contemplation of the parties at the time. At all events, they can only recover for the loss of the chance of being able to fulfil the charter-party, not for the loss of the charter-party. The vessel might have had another charter-party to come into operation on her arrival in England from Gopalpore; if so, could the plaintiffs recover for the loss of that? The claim is remote and hypothetical. Had the damage not been sustained at all she would have occupied much time and sustained loss by wear and tear in beating back again from Gopalpore, and the insurance for the voyage would have been higher, and all these things were in contemplation of the parties to the charter, and, therefore, the amount of freight was higher; besides, they have got demurrage at 4d. per ton per day, and this is equal to a profitable employment of the ship for the sixty-five days. [The Registrar, in reply to Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, explained that the practice was to allow demurrage at the rate of 2*d.* per ton per day for the actual costs of the employment of the ship, and another 2*d.* as representing a reasonable profit on her employment.] The plaintiff has not shown that he has suffered any real loss; he has lost 10*s.* per ton of freight, but he has saved a month's time on the voyage, and all the wear and tear entailed thereby, the extra premium on insurances, and has been paid demurrage representing the profitable employment of his ship for sixty-five days. Davis v. Garrett is different from this case. It was there said truly that a wrong-doer could not qualify his wrong, but the wrong was the direct cause of the damage; in fact, the Registrar, in allowing the demurrage, has gone further than any case at common law.

Phillimore, in reply, referred to France v. Gaudet (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 199), and admitted that some deduction must be allowed for the shortening of the voyage, and saving of wear and tear, but claimed to be entitled to the amount of chartered freight less such deductions, and less the freight actually earned on the voyage from Madras. There was an inception of the proceedings to earn freight, and the chance of not earning it was no greater than that of a person for whose death a claim is made under Lord Campbell's Act, not earning wages or making profits: (Rowley v. London and North-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 8 Ex. 221; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 180.) Fourpence per ton does not represent a profitable employment of the ship; that is stated in the charter-party to be 120 rupees per diem, and would in sixty-five days make a difference over and above what is allowed of 208*l.* 15*s.* We had an insurable interest in the freight, and had we insured it, could have recovered on the policy (Maude and Pollock on Merchant Shipping, 2nd edit. p. 305), and the defendants must indemnify us to the same extent.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 1.—Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—The Cheviot, a vessel of 494 tons, was run into on the 1st May 1875, while at anchor in Madras Roads, by the Star of India. This vessel admitted her liability, and the usual reference was ordered to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to ascertain the amount of damages. On the 27th March 1876, the registrar made his report, in which all the items of the plaintiffs' claim were allowed except one; each party to pay his own costs. The item not allowed was for the loss of a beneficial charter-party, estimated at 583*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*; the whole of this sum was disallowed. Against this ruling, and against that which left each party to pay his own costs, the owners of the Cheviot have appealed.

The case has been ably and carefully argued before me. The following averments in the petition are proved or admitted. [His Lordship then read the paragraphs (A to E) of the petition set out above.]—The clauses of the charter-party to which it is necessary to refer are the following: "Twenty-five working days are to be allowed the charterers or their agents, if the ship be not sooner despatched, for loading the said ship on the Coromandel Coast, to commence twenty-four hours after the captain has given notice in writing to the charterers' agent that he is ready to receive cargo, and ten days' demurrage over and above the said laying days at 120 rupees per day to be paid to the master day by day as due at his option. Time occupied in changing ports not to count as lay days. Lay days not to commence before 10th April 1875. Charterers to have the option of cancelling this charter-party if the vessel do not arrive at her first loading port, and be ready to take in cargo by 10th May."

The main ground upon which the registrar founded his rejection of the loss of the beneficial charter-party, and which has been insisted upon in the argument before me, was that the claim for damages on this account was too remote. This was the main ground, but the registrar appears also to have held that the proximate cause of the loss was the option given by the charter-party to the charterer, and which he exercised, of cancelling the agreement because the ship did not arrive so as to be ready to take in cargo by the 10th May. I may dispose of this latter question first. I am unable to see how the granting of this option which it was perfectly competent for the owners of the Cheviot to do, can be in any legal sense considered the real or proximate cause of the loss. But for the damage, there is every presumption that the Cheviot would have arrived in proper time, and that there would have been no opportunity given for the exercise of the option. With regard to the main objection of remoteness, it has been contended that the ordinary length of the voyage was six months and six days; it is admitted that the ship had eight days over the time necessary to enable her to get to her loading port in time to fulfil it, and that at the time the collision occurred, according to the evidence of the captain the Cheviot was ready to proceed to Gopalpore, which was the first port she had to proceed to on the Coromandel Coast to load, and indeed the crew were actually heaving short on board the Cheviot for the purpose of getting under weigh to proceed to the said port of Gopalpore. The voyage may therefore, be said to have begun, but it is contended that nevertheless the ship might have met with some perils before she arrived at her loading port, might have been lost, or at least delayed by bad weather, and that all the plaintiffs can be said to have lost was the chance of performing the charter-party, which is too remote an item to be taken into account in the consideration of compensation. The answer to these objections appears to me to be that though they may avail to show that the whole sum which represents the loss of the beneficial charter-party cannot be claimed, but that a certain deduction should be made from it, they do not avail to show that the item should be entirely struck out.

With respect to various decisions which were cited relating to cases of insurance contracts and the like, I must observe that this is the case of compensation demanded from a wrongdoer and governed by different principles of law. In the case of The Halley (L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 3; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 329; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 556), I said what I must again repeat: "I gladly avail myself of Dr. Lushington's language in this matter in a case in which he distinguishes—speaking of the duty of the registrar and merchants as referees of the High Court of Admiralty—between cases of collision and cases of insurances. 'One,' he says (The Gazelle, 2 W. Rob. p. 280), 'of the principal and more important objections to the report under consideration is this: that the registrar and merchants in fixing the amount to be paid for repairs and the supply of new articles in lieu of those which have been damaged or destroyed, have deducted one-third from the full amount which such repairs and new articles would cost. This reduction, it is said, has been made in consideration of new materials being substituted for old, and is justified upon the principle of a rule which is alleged to be invariably involved in cases of insurance. The first question then which I have to consider is the applicability of the rule in question to a case of the present description, and this question, it is obvious, involves principles of considerable importance, not only as regards the decision in this particular case, but as establishing a rule for assessing the damage in all other similar cases. Now in my apprehension a material distinction exists between cases of insurance leases of damages by collision and for the following reasons.' And then the learned judge explains the nature of an insurance contract, and he continues: 'With regard to cases of collision it is to be observed that they stand upon a totally different footing. The claim of the suffering party who has sustained the loss arises not ex contractu but ex delicto of the party by whom the damage has been done, and the measure of the indemnification is not limited by the terms of any contract, but is co-extensive with the amount of the damage. The right against the wrongdoer is for a restitutio in integrum, and this restitutio he is bound to make without calling upon the party injured to assist him in any way whatever. If the settlement of the indemnification be attended with any difficulty, and in these cases difficulties must and will frequently occur, the party in fault must bear the inconvenience. He has no right to fix this inconvenience upon the injured party, and if that party derives incidentally a greater benefit than mere indemnification, it arises only from the impossibility of otherwise affecting such indemnification without exposing him to some loss or burthen which the law will not place upon him.'" In the more recent case of France v. Gaudet (L, Rep. 6 Q. B. 190), the distinction between an action of contract for the recovery of damages, and an action against a wrongdoer, appears to have been very clearly taken.

Lastly, it has been contended that the grant of demurrage in this case of 4*d.* per ton per day from the 1st May to the 4th July (sixty-five days) puts an end to any claim founded on difference of freight, and includes the profitable employment of the ship during that time: that 2*d.* per ton covers the expenses, and the other 2*d.* per ton compensates the owner for the use of the capital. I am not of opinion that on those accounts the claim founded on the difference of freight is extinguished. It is not merely the beneficial charter-party which is lost, but also the sixty-five days during which the vessel has not been beneficially employed, and upon the whole I am of opinion that I must refer this matter again to the registrar, with the assistance of merchants, to report upon what may be in the circumstances, according to their opinion, a compensation for the loss of the beneficial charter-party.

The whole sum, viz., 583*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, ought not to be granted, and indeed is not claimed. Among the deductions from this sum will have to be considered the difference between a voyage from Madras to London and from the Coromandel Coast to London; the saving of what is called wear and tear to the vessel, and the uncertainties and perils incident to all sea voyages. Other circumstances justifying deductions will perhaps suggest themselves to the great experience of the registrar and merchants, as to which I have no desire to fetter their discretion. The judgment which I now deliver is that the items for the loss of the beneficial charter-party, which, as being too remote and uncertain has been disallowed, ought to be considered and allowed, subject to all just and reasonable deduction. The question of costs must stand over till the amended report is made.

THE JULIANA.

Wages—Cause by default—Waiver of proceedings—Intervention of foreign consul—Solicitor—Officer of court.

Where a ship has been sold in a cause in which no appearance has been entered, and the proceeds remain in the registry, all preliminary proceedings in a cause of wages may be waived, and the money due paid out of court.

The court will not pay the money to a foreign consul at his request, but will require the solicitor of the parties to satisfy any claims the consul may have before receiving the money.

IN this case the Juliana, which was a Russian vessel, had been sold by order of the court in another suit in which the proceedings had been in default of appearance, and the proceeds of the sale remained in the registry.

W. G. F. Phillimore replied on behalf of the master and a portion of the crew, that the wages due to them, and a sum of money by way of viaticum, as well as in respect of certain necessary expenses incurred by them, should be paid out of court at once without requiring them to file pleadings or take the other steps customary in a case of default of appearance.

The Registrar read a letter from the Russian consular officer stating that he had made advances of money to the crew for their expenses, and that by the law of Russia the money payable to the crew ought to be paid to him on their behalf.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE made an order waiving under the circumstances all the preliminary steps in a cause of default, and ordering the money to be paid out of court, on the solicitor of the parties before the court undertaking to pay the Russian consular officer the sums he had advanced for necessaries or producing his receipt.

THE EVANGELISTRIA.

Jurisdiction—Foreign vessel—Possession—Foreign mortgage—Decree of foreign court—Intervention of foreign consul—Practice.

The arrest necessary to found the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) over claims by mortgagees of foreign ships under 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, must be in a cause over which the court has jurisdiction; a mere de facto arrest is not sufficient.

The High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) has jurisdiction, independent of the Judicature Acts, to and will entertain, on the intervention of the representative of a foreign state, or by the consent of parties, a cause of possession or mortgage of a foreign ship belonging to such state, so far as to ascertain the true position of the claimants and the nature of their title, and will, where it is for the advantage of all parties, order a sale of the ship.

The See Reuter (1 Dods. 22) followed.

Where a defendant objects to the jurisdiction in a cause in rem, and appears under protest, the former practice of the High Court of Admiralty, as to proceedings under protest, must be observed throughout.

THIS was a cause of possession.

The Evangelistria, a Greek vessel, arrived at Falmouth in April, 1875, and whilst there the defendants, two brothers of the name of Piangos, who at that time had the control of the vessel, were by the authority of the Greek consul dismissed, and the plaintiff Empirikos substituted for them, on the ground that by the judgment of a Greek court at Syra the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the vessel. The vessel sailed under the control of the plaintiff to Swansea, and whilst there the plaintiff was forcibly dispossessed, and the master appointed by him expelled from her by the defendants. Whilst at Swansea the vessel was arrested in a cause of necessaries, in which cause the present plaintiff appeared under protest on the ground that the alleged necessaries had been supplied in a foreign port, and that the court had no jurisdiction. Whilst the vessel was still under arrest in that suit the plaintiff commenced a cause of possession by issuing the writ with the indorsement on it set out in the 8th paragraph of the petition on protest given below. The plaintiffs in the necessaries suit subsequently abandoned their suit, leaving the mortgage suit the only one existing against the ship.

The defendants appeared under protest, and on the 16th June 1876 delivered the following petition on protest to the jurisdiction of the court:

1. The plaintiffs and defendants are subjects of his Majesty the King of Greece, and are resident within the Kingdom of Greece.

2. The defendants are the owners of the ship or vessel Evangelistria which is a Greek vessel belonging to the Port of Syra, in Greece.

3. On or about the 4th Oct. 1874, at Syra aforesaid, by a certain agreement or instrument of mortgage, which was made at Syra aforesaid, the said vessel was mortgaged by the defendants to the plaintiffs to secure repayment to the plaintiffs of the sum of 54,450 drachmas, together with interest at the rate specified in the said agreement.

4. The said sum, as will appear on reference to the said agreement, was advanced as to one-third thereof, for a period of two years from the date of the said agreement, and it was a further condition of the said agreement that in case of default of payment of either interest or principal, the said ship should be brought by the plaintiffs to Syra to be there sold or otherwise dealt with. No default has been made in payment of interest pursuant to the said agreement, and no part of the said principal sum is due and payable.

5. The Evangelistria lately arrived at the Port of Swansea, laden with a cargo of grain from Lagos, and is now lying at the said Port of Swansea.

6. On or about the 10th May 1876, the Evangelistria was arrested in a suit for necessaries instituted in this honourable court by one John Petters.

7. The said necessaries in respect of which the said suit was instituted were supplied to the Evangelistria at Syra aforesaid whilst the said ship was building there. On her completion she was registered as a Greek ship, and has since continued so registered. The present plaintiff appeared under protest, and has since filed a petition on protest praying the court to pronounce against its jurisdiction on the ground that the claim of the plaintiff in that suit is not a claim for necessaries within the meaning of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, or 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 5.

8. The present suit was commenced by writ dated the 17th May 1876, after the said ship had been arrested in the said suit for necessaries. The endorsement on the said writ is in the words and figures following: "The plaintiff claims to be the sole owner or mortgagee of the ship Evangelistria, of the Port of Syra in Greece, and to be entitled to have possession of the said ship decreed to him or to have the said ship sold for the repayment of various sums of money now due and owing to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs claim 3500*l*.

9. This honourable court has no jurisdiction to entertain the said cause of necessaries, and by reason thereof the said arrest of the Evangelistria is, under the circumstances stated in this petition, irregular and void, and the defendants submit that the said proceedings in the said cause of necessaries being null and void, and by reason of the circumstances aforesaid, this honourable court has no jurisdiction to entertain this suit.

The petition then prayed the court to pronounce against its jurisdiction, and dismiss the suit with costs.

June 27.—E. C. Clarkson, on behalf of the plaintiffs, moved the court to reject the defendants' petition on protest.—The first question is, whether the arrest in the necessaries suit was such an arrest as will enable the court to entertain the present suit of the mortgagee? The court has jurisdiction in a cause of mortgage in the case of a foreign ship only where the ship is under the arrest of the court or the proceeds of the sale of the ship are in the registry: (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65 sect. 3.) Now this vessel was at the time of the institution of this suit bonâ fide under the arrest of the court, within the words of that section, and such an arrest is, I submit, sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction; it is only where an arrest is collusive or fraudulent that it can be of no avail to found further jurisdiction. If the court once gets hold of the corpus of the ship, it cannot be ousted of its jurisdiction because some party before it has made a mistake as to his rights. Secondly, this is not a mere mortgage suit; it is a claim for possession by the plaintiff, who claims in the alternative as sole owner or mortgagee (see indorsement on writ set out in 8th paragraph of the petition above); and over causes of possession the English Court of Admiralty has always exercised jurisdiction independently of statute.

Myburgh, for the defendants, in support of the protest.—It is clear that there is no jurisdiction over a claim for necessaries supplied in a foreign port: (The Anna (ante, p. 237; L. Rep. 1 P. D. & Adm. 253; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 895.) Can it be that the plaintiff can object to the jurisdiction in the necessaries suit and take advantage of that very suit to create jurisdiction on his own behalf? If there was no jurisdiction in that suit there was no power to arrest, and, consequently, there was no arrest in law. The indorsement on the writ clearly shows that the suit arises under a claim by a mortgagee, and over such claim the court has only jurisdiction in the case of foreign ships where the ship is under legal arrest.

Clarkson, in reply.—The defendant asks the court to introduce into the 3rd section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, words to the effect that before the court can have jurisdiction over a cause of mortgage the ship must be under arrest in a cause in which the court has jurisdiction. By the words of the section, a de facto arrest is sufficient.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There can be no doubt that the "arrest" contemplated by the 3rd section of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, is an arrest de jure, not a mere arrest de facto. The plaintiff's claim, as it appears in the petition on protest, must, for the present purpose be treated as the claim of a mortgagee. I am of opinion, after hearing the arguments on both sides, and considering the statute, that the petition on protest is admissible; and I must refer the motion to reject it.

July 4.—Myburgh, for the defendants, moved to dismiss the action, on the ground that the court having held that the petition on protest ought to be admitted, the court had decided that it had no jurisdiction. The plaintiffs had not obtained any leave to plead further, and the statements in the petitions must be taken as true, and by those statements it appeared that the jurisdiction was sought to be maintained by reason of the ship being under arrest in an action in which the court had no jurisdiction. Hence the action ought to be dismissed. A petition on protest is a demurrer to the jurisdiction, and there being no leave to plead further, the action is gone:

Rules of the Supreme Court, Order XXVIII., rules 5, 12.

E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiff.—The court has only admitted the petition on protest, and it is now the duty of the plaintiff to file his answer on protest. The court has held that in questions of jurisdiction the old practice still remains. [Sir R.

PHILLIMORE.—The old practice must be carried out entirely, and not merely partially.] I have to ask for time to file the answer on protest.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE dismissed the defendants' motion with costs, and gave the plaintiff a fortnight's time to file his answer on protest.

The petition on protest being admitted, on the 17th July 1876, the plaintiffs delivered their answer, which, after admitting the truth of the 1st, and denying the truth of the 2nd paragraphs of the petition on protest, proceeded as follows:

3. By an agreement or deed of sale, dated the 21st Sept. 1874, and duly made at Syra, in the Kingdom of Greece, before a notary public, with all the formalities required by the law of Greece, and numbered 15,742, the defendants being owners of the Evangelistria, sold to the plaintiff the Evangelistria, and delivered to him the possession thereof for the price of 54,450 drachmas of government tariff (Greek), paid to them by the plaintiff.

4. The said agreement was valid and effectual according to the law of Greece to pass the property, ownership, and right of possession of the said ship to the plaintiff in whom such property and ownership and right of possession have been ever since and are now vested.

5. Such sale to the plaintiff was duly registered on the 23rd Sept. 1874, at the Port of Syra aforesaid, by the proper authorities, and the plaintiff thereupon became and has ever since been, and still is the sole registered owner of the said ship.

6. On the 4th Oct. 1874, an agreement, being the agreement mentioned in the 4th paragraph of the said petition, was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants. Such an agreement was and is in the Greek language, and the following is a correct translation thereof:

It is this day agreed between the undersigned Constantine Empirikos of the one part, Gianuli N. Piangos and George N. Piangos of the other part, the following:

I. By an agreement made before the notary public, S. Bisti, dated the 22nd Sept. A.D. 1874, No. 15,742, Messrs. Gianuli N. Piangos and George N. Piangos, sold to Constantine Empirikos their ship called Evangelistria at the price of 54,450 drachmas of government tariff.

II. Right of repurchase of ship is conferred on the brothers Piangos, such right to be exercised within a period of three years commencing from the date of the sale document No. 15,742, within which time they have the right to pay to Mr. C. Empirikos in full or by any instalments, the above amount, with interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum; they will also pay the sum of 5381 drachmas government tariff, with interest thereon, which according to the particulars given below in Clause III., Mr Empirikos paid up to this day; and also any sum or sums which Mr. Empirikos may in future pay for accounts of Messrs. Piangos. After payment of all the above sums Messrs. Piangos will become the rightful owners of the ship.

III. M. Empirikos has this day paid to the brothers Gianuli N. Piangos and George N. Piangos 5381 10 per cent. drachmas government tariff, and is a loan for the settlement of the accounts for the purchase of ship, building material, and for the necessary expenses for dispatching the ship. On the above sum interest at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum will be charged from this date.

IV. The interest on the 54,450 drachmas, and 5381 10 per cent. drachmas must be paid down regularly every voyage, and at the port of discharge of the ship. At the end of the second year one-third of the whole sum at least must be repaid to Mr. Empirikos, and there must not be any default in the payment of interest, otherwise in case of the non regular payment of the interest, or in default of payment of one-third of the original sum at the end of two years, Mr. Empirikos has the right to sell the ship at public auction, hereafter giving notice to the Piangos brothers to be present at such auction. In such case Mr. Empirikos has the right of bidding for the ship at the auction.

V. After the ship is sold, according to the above clause, out of the price fetched M. Empirikos will be repaid the sum of 59,831 drachmas 10 per cent. government tariff, and interest thereon, and expenses incurred, and whatever other sums he may have paid for account of Messrs. Piangos, and if after deducting the above there is any balance left, such balance remains for the benefit of the brothers Piangos.

VI. The profits as well as the losses of the ship, for the period of three years, as well as all expenses, are for account of the brothers Piangos, whom they entirely concern, and who have a right to insure in their own name the sum of 15,000 drachmas on the value of the ship, but without any responsibility on the part of M. Empirikos for the payment of the insurance premiums thereon.

VII. After the expiration of the last day of the three years the right of re-purchase on the part of the brothers Piangos ceases, and the ship remains the indisputable property of M. Empirikos, fixing the value equal to the sums mentioned in the sale document No. 15,742. In addition to this all sums belonging to M. Empirikos that the Piangos' have in their hands at the time will be added to the value of the ship.

VIII. Captain of the ship for the period of three years will be one of the brothers Piangos, but M. Empirikos has the right to appoint a nautical superintendent on the ship, taking his meals with the captain. In case the captain is dismissed the brothers Piangos have the right of selling the ship through a court of law, and if the superintendent is dismissed M. Empirikos has the right of the sale of the ship. The expenses of the keeping of the superintendent are borne by the Piangos brothers.

Two similar documents were made and signed by the contracting parties.

7. In pursuance of the said agreement the Evangelistria proceeded upon several voyages in charge of and under the command of the defendants, or of one or other of them.

8. Before the Evangelistria could leave the Kingdom of Greece to proceed on such voyages the plaintiff was compelled by the law of Greece to give, and he did before she left the Kingdom of Greece give, with the knowledge of the defendants, a bond to the proper authorities in two-thirds of the value of the Evangelistria conditional for the return of the Evangelistria to the Kingdom of Greece within the period of two years from the date of her so leaving Greece. The said period of two years will expire in the month of September now next ensuing.

9. The plaintiff denies the allegations contained in the 4th paragraph of the said petition, and says that the sum of 54,450 drachmas and 5381, 10 per cent. drachmas are still owing to the plaintiffs, and the defendants have made default in the payments of interest due under the terms of the said agreement of the 4th Oct. 1874, and that large sums of money are now due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendants in respect of such interest.

10. On or about the 15th Oct. 1875 the plaintiff instituted a suit in the Commercial Division of the Court of First Instance at Syra aforesaid, being a court of competent jurisdiction in that behalf, against the defendants, and prayed the said court by reason of such default as aforesaid, and upon other grounds, to order that the defendants or such one of them as was acting as master of the Evangelistria should be substituted by a man of his (the plaintiff's) confidence, and that the said ship should be brought to Syra, and that a provisory execution of the decision should be ordered as well as the personal arrest of the defendants, and that the defendants should pay the costs.

11. The defendants were duly summoned to appear in the said suit in accordance with the law of Greece, but failed to appear therein.

12. On the 22nd April 1876, the said suit was heard before the said court, and the said court delivered judgment therein, and ordered expulsion of the defendants from the said ship, and that they should be substituted by a captain enjoying the plaintiff's confidence, and ordered the personal arrest of the defendants, and condemned them in costs, and requested the proper officers to execute or assist in executing the said judgment.

13. By order of such judgment the Greek consular authorities in this country, being the proper authorities in that behalf, dismissed the defendants from the said ship on her arrival at Falmouth on or about the 28th April 1876, and put on board her a person appointed by the plaintiff and enjoying his confidence, and put her into the possession of such person on behalf of the plaintiff, and such person took the said ship from Falmouth to Swansea to discharge her cargo.

14. On arrival of the said ship at Swansea, the defendants, against the will of the plaintiff and of the said consulate authorities, forcibly ejected the said master so appointed by the plaintiff from the said ship, and forcibly took possession of her, and they remained in possession of her against the will of the plaintiff and of the said consulate authorities.

15. By the law of Greece all persons in charge of any Greek vessel entering a foreign port are required to deposit all the ship's papers with the Greek consular officer at such port. On the arrival of the said ship at Swansea, the Vice-Consul of Greece at that port, being such consular officer as aforesaid, applied to the defendants, and required them to deposit such papers with him. Such papers include the libretto or certificate of registry showing the ownership of the said ship. The defendants have refused and still refuse so to deposit such papers, and the plaintiff is unable to obtain possession of the said papers, including the said libretto, although such libretto shows the plaintiff to be sole owner of the said ship.

16. The plaintiff admits the truth of the allegations contained in the 6th and 7th paragraphs of the said petition.

17. The defendants have threatened and intend, unless prevented by the court, to take the Evangelistria to South Africa, or to some other foreign port or place not being a Greek port or place, and to deprive the plaintiff of the power of taking the Evangelistria to Greece within the time allowed by the said bond, and of the power of selling the Evangelistria at Syra, under the said agreement of the 4th of Oct. 1874, and they refuse to give up possession of the said ship to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff cannot obtain possession of the said ship or of the papers, without the assistance of this honourable court.

The answer then prayed the court to pronounce for its jurisdiction, and to overrule the petition on protest, and to condemn the defendants in costs. On the 2nd Aug. the defendants replied by a simple denial of the answer and joinder of issue, and on 8th Aug. the question of jurisdiction came on for argument.

A discussion arose as to the mode in which the case was to be brought before the court for decision, the defendants contending that the court ought, as in the case of a demurrer, to decide on the pleadings as they stood, the plaintiffs maintaining that the defendants must prove by evidence the facts averred in the petition on protest. The court ruled that although on motion to reject a petition on protest the facts therein stated must be taken as true, yet at the hearing on protest it was different, and that the defendants must now produce evidence in support of their petition, and that the plaintiffs would then be at liberty to prove their answer, and that the former practice as to petitions on protest must prevail. The defendants were then called in support of their petition, and in their evidence claimed to be the owners of the ship, the plaintiffs by their cross-examination and the subsequent evidence setting up the same claim. The defendants stated that the plaintiffs were only mortgagees.

The judgment of the Greek Court, with the document (an ordinary bill of sale) referred to in the 3rd paragraph of the answer, attached to it, and also the document set out in the 4th paragraph of the answer, were put in in evidence, and the Greek Consul-General deposed that on the instructions of his government he was desirous that the court should if possible exercise jurisdiction.

Aug. 8.—Benjamin, Q. C. and W. G. Phillimore, for the defendants, in support of the petition.—The question is not one of ownership or possession, but of mortgage; the payment of interest is inconsistent with ownership. The court has no jurisdiction to entertain a question of mortgage except by statute. 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, ss. 3, 4, applies only to British ships, and to them only when under arrest; even if it could apply to a foreign vessel at all, it can plainly only do so when the vessel is under arrest, and this vessel cannot be considered to have been under arrest, as the arrest was not a lawful one, and consequently a mere nullity. 24 Vict. c. 10, ss. 8, 11, applies expressly only to British registered ships, and mortgages registered under the Merchant Shipping Acts, and therefore cannot include the case of a foreign ship and foreign mortgage: (The Innisfallen, L. Rep. 1 Ad. 72; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470) The judgment of the Greek court at Syra was given on an obviously defective knowledge of the facts. Only one document is annexed to it, and referred to in it, and that is a document apparently of sale, but the subsequent document which plainly shows the nature of the transaction to be a mortgage, was not shown to the court and is not referred to in the judgment. Besides, the judgment was obtained without any notice being given to the present defendant on protest, and in his absence: The Highlander, 2 W. Rob. 109.) In a matter of co-ownership the court might in virtue of its original jurisdiction entertain a cause by request of the parties or of their government (The See Reuter, 1 Dods. 22), but not in a case of mortgage where the authority given by the statute is limited by the statute to British vessels and mortgages under the Merchant Shipping Act. Even if the court could obtain jurisdiction the question must be decided by English law, as it is here a question of procedure and is governed by the lex fori. The court must dismiss the suit and allow us to take the ship and pay the mortgagees their interest. A mortgage is unknown to the law maritime, and if the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in this cause, the Judicature Acts have made no difference, for the High Court of Justice has only acquired the same jurisdiction in rem as the court of Admiralty had, and this is a suit in rem. They also referred to

The Cathcart, L. Rep. 1 Ad. & Ecc. 314; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211;
The Neptune, 3 Hagg. 132;
Simpson v. Fogo, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 312.

Clarkson, for plaintiffs.—Relief in rem may be obtained now in any division of the High Court (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, sect. 4, sub-sects. 6, 7), it is only a question of procedure, and each division and every judge has all the powers of any court (Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, sect 39), and, therefore, the court has jurisdiction to entertain the suit, whether in rem or in personam. Here the writ was in personam, but the warrant in rem was only a subsequent matter of procedure in the cause. The Greek judgment must be taken to be a good judgment. The absence of the defendant may be immaterial, as it frequently is in the practice of this and the divorce divisions of the High Court, and even supposing this to be a mortgage, the plaintiffs were mortgagees in possession both de facto and de jure until they were unlawfully ousted by the defendants, and, therefore, this is a suit of possession, and exactly similar to The See Reuter (1 Dods. 22).

Phillimore, in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This case has been very carefully and elaborately argued, and it raises a question by no means free from difficulty; but at the same time a careful examination of the matter results in this, that the only question is, whether the court has jurisdiction to examine into the claims of the respective parties or not. It is not a question whether the law of Greece is in favour of one party or the other, but whether, under the circumstances—and they are very peculiar—the court ought to decline jurisdiction to inquire into the matter at all. The contest is between two foreigners, each claiming possession of the vessel, one contending that he was the original possessor and that he has never parted with the property in the ship by sale or otherwise; the other, that the former had parted with the property in the ship, and that the right of possession had passed to him. One of the pieces of evidence which has been submitted to the court, and which has been gravely discussed, is the judgment of the Greek Court of First Instance at Syra, where the court pronounced in favour of the ownership of one of the defendants upon the question of the expulsion of one captain and the substitution of another. Against the judgment many objections have been taken, but it has been enforced by the Consul-General of Greece in this country so far as, in his opinion it was competent for him to do so, and he has expressed his desire that the court should, if possible, exercise jurisdiction in the matter.

It has been contended that this court had no original jurisdiction in questions of mortgage, and many authorities have been cited to establish that proposition, and to show that previously to the statute giving a limited authority over mortgages, the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction over mortgages even of British vessels, and that if they had none by English law, still less had they any in a case of foreign law. The question, upon the authorities cited, appears to be still an undecided one. But here the question is whether the plaintiff is not to all intents and purposes the owner of the vessel. The defendants have assumed by their protest, to maintain the position that the court is not competent to entertain a suit of this description.

Now this court has always been in the habit of entertaining suits between foreigners in matters of Admiralty law and jurisprudence. In The See Reuter (1 Dods. 22), Lord Stowell said: "The court has never entertained suits of this kind"—i.e, causes of possession between foreigners—"unless the cases had been referred to its decision by the consent of parties, or by the intervention of the representative of the foreign state devolving the jurisdiction of his own country on the court." He then proceeds to consider whether the authority in the case before him could be considered equivalent to the consent of an accredited agent of the state, and he said: "Here is a judicial order or decree by the burgomasters and councillors of the city of Rostock in senate assembled, and in whom the admiralty jurisdiction of that city is said to be vested, directing the master to deliver up possession of the ship to Mr. Martens. This document, officially subscribed by the prothonotary of Rostock, is given under the seal of that city, and its authenticity is not denied on the part of the master. I am of opinion that this instrument arms the court with sufficient authority."

What are the facts here? That there is primâ facie a judgment of a competent Greek court in a matter where two Greeks are concerned, pronouncing in favour of the plaintiff's right to this vessel, that that judgment, whatever its faults may be, has been acted upon by the Consul-General in this country, and that he has expressly said that he wishes this court to exercise jurisdiction.

Now, without entering into the argument based on sect. 38 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, and on the intention of the Legislature that every court should exercise the jurisdiction of any court in matters that come properly before it, which appears to deserve considerable attention whenever it becomes necessary to decide the point, I think, for the reasons I have stated, that I ought not to decline to exercise jurisdiction in this case so far as I am asked to do—that is, to inquire into the question between these two parties. The real owner is entitled to possession of the ship, and it may turn out that the parties in this case are neither of them mortgagees, or that the plaintiff in this case is not the owner. All that I am about to pronounce is that I will exercise jurisdiction so far as to inquire into the position of the respective parties, and no further.

I pronounce for my jurisdiction, and order ship to be sold, the money to be brought into court, and put out at the usual interest, both parties are entitled to bid at the sale, and all questions of costs to be reserved.

THE ST. OLAF.

Master—Dismissal—Ship's certificate of registry and papers—Refusal to deliver up—Lien—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, sect. 50—Jurisdiction. The High Court of Justice (Admiralty Division) has power, upon the application of the owners of a ship, to order a master who has been dismissed from their employment to deliver up the certificate of registry and other papers and property belonging to the ship where he refuses to surrender them. Semble a master, whether co-owner or not, can have no lien upon a certificate of registry or ship's papers in case of wrongful dismissal by the managing owners.

THIS was a motion made in an action of co-ownership instituted on behalf of James Bremner, John Bruce, John Cormack, and William Harper, part owners of the schooner St. Olaf, against James Cormack, part owner and also late master of the schooner, in order to procure a settlement of accounts of the earnings of the said vessel. The schooner had been purchased by the plaintiffs and defendant, and was worked by them under a written agreement, signed by all the part owners, by which James Bremner was managing owner, with power to appoint and dismiss the master. The defendant had been appointed master, and had sailed the schooner in several voyages. On the return of the schooner in April 1876, from a voyage from Tercera Bremner discharged defendant from his employment as master without notice, and took possession of the schooner. The alleged ground for such discharge was that the master had improperly given some of the cargo as food for the crew, the master stating that conduct was made necessary by the condition of the cargo and the delay of the voyage. The defendant left the schooner, but retained possession of her certificate and register and of the keys and papers belonging to her, alleging that he was wrongfully dismissed and that he was entitled to retain possession of these things.

The cause was commenced on or about May 10th 1876, and after the defendant had been served with the writ, and before any further proceedings were taken in the cause, the plaintiff moved the court for an order that the defendant might be ordered forthwith to deliver possession of the certificate and register of the schooner St. Olaf, of Wick, and the keys and all papers belonging to the said vessel to Mr. William Marshall, the plaintiffs' agent, and that he may be restrained from doing or suffering any matter or thing whereby the above named James Bremner may be prevented or hindered from performing or exercising his rights and duties as managing owner and ship's husband of the said vessel.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—This court has power to and will interfere to give possession of the certificate of registry. In The Frances (2 Dods. 420) Lord Stowell, after saying that justices have power by statute in certain cases to order the delivery of certificates, says: "But these statutes have nothing to do with the Admiralty jurisdiction upon such matters. If the Admiralty had no jurisdiction but what it derives from these statutes, it has no jurisdiction at all upon such subjects, for they do not refer to the jurisdiction of that court—they merely give new powers in certain cases to justices of peace. The jurisdiction of the Admiralty (if it exists) is of older date and of larger extent. We know that it is not uncommon for parties, after applications to justices, without effect, to resort to this court for its monition. This court would certainly not have hesitated to go the length of granting its monition, to show cause why the register should not be restored." By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 50, it is expressly enacted that "the certificate of registry shall be used only for the lawful navigation of the ship, and shall not be subject to detention by reason of any title, lien, charge, or interest whatsoever" by any person, and that justices or "any court capable of taking cognisance of such matter" may summon the person detaining the certificate before it and examine him in relation to the detention, and if there was no reasonable cause may inflict a penalty. This is a court capable of taking cognisance of such matter, and the master having no lien upon the certificate (Gibson v. Ingo, 6 Hare, 112) has no reasonable cause for detaining it.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendant. — The managing owner had no power to dismiss under the circumstances of the case. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The agreement between the owners expressly says he shall have power.] But it must be implied that such power can only be exercised upon due notice (Green v. Wright, p. 254; L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 591). [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the master has been wrongfully dismissed his remedy is to bring an action against the managing owner for damages. The power to dismiss has been exercised, and the remedy is not to detain the ship's papers.] Then, as we have a counterclaim for wages and damages, we ought to have security for the amount of our claims in this action to save the expense of arresting the ship.

W. G. F. Phillimore, in reply, undertook to give security for any damages which might accrue from the making of the order prayed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that I have authority to make the order asked for, and I shall do so. I direct the defendant forthwith to deliver to William Marshall the certificate and register, and all keys belonging to the St. Olaf, upon the plaintiffs undertaking to be answerable for any damage occasioned by such delivery. Costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

THE SCEPTRE.

Forfeiture—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 103—Concealing British character —Assuming foreign character.

Where a British subject, the owner of a British ship, by a representation to the collector of customs at the port of registry that his ship has been sold to foreigners procures the closing of the registry, and sails her under a foreign certificate of registry and under a foreign flag, whilst he continues to own her and to receive the profits of working her, doing such acts with the intent to conceal her British character from the officers of customs, and prevent her seizure as unseaworthy, he commits an offence against the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 103 by reason of which his ship is liable to, and will be condemned to forfeiture to Her Majesty.

THIS was an action instituted by Her Majesty's Procurator General on behalf of Henry Hallett, collector of customs, at Hartlepool, against the Sceptre, and her owner intervening, to obtain the forfeiture of the Sceptre to Her Majesty, for the commission of offences by her owner against the provisions of the 103rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which, so far as material, is as follows:

Sect. 103. The offences hereinafter mentioned shall be punishable as follows (that is to say): . . . .

(2) If the master or owner of any British ship does or permits to be done, any matter or thing, or carries or permits to be carried any papers or documents, with intent to conceal the British character of such ship from any person entitled by British law to inquire into the same, or to assume a foreign character, or with intent to deceive any such person as lastly hereinbefore mentioned, such ship shall be forfeited to her Majesty, and the master, if he commits or is privy to the commission of the offence, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor. . . . .

And in order that the above provisions as to forfeiture may be carried into effect, it shall be lawful for any commissioned officer on full pay in the military or naval service of her Majesty, or any British officer of customs, or any British consular officer, to seize and detain any ship which has, either wholly or as to any share therein, become subject to forfeiture as aforesaid, and to bring her for adjudication before the High Court of Admiralty in England or Ireland, or any court having Admiralty jurisdiction in her Majesty's dominions, and such court may thereupon make such order in the case as it may think fit, and may award to the officer bringing in the same for adjudication such portion of the proceeds of the, if any, forfeited ship or share as it may think right.

The plaintiffs' statement of claim setting out the offences charged was as follows:

1. The plaintiff was on and before the 10th Nov. 1874, and has ever since been and still is a British Officer of Customs, within the intent and meaning of the 103rd sect. of "The Merchant Shipping Act 1854."

2. Before and on the said 10th Nov., the ship or vessel Sceptre, proceeded against in this action was a British ship, registered at the Custom House of Sunderland, as a British ship, in the name of the defendant, James Saunders, as sole owner, and she then belonged to the defendant as sole owner. The said defendant is a natural born British subject.

3. On or about the 9th Nov., the defendant as such owner wrote and sent to the collector of customs, at the port of Sunderland, being the registrar of British ships at that port, and a person entitled by British law to inquire into the character of the said vessel, a letter informing the said collector that the said vessel was sold to foreigners, and inclosed and sent in the said letter to the said collector the certificate of registry of the said ship, for the purpose of the register of the said ship being cancelled by the said collector, and requested the said collector to forward to him, the defendant, a certified copy of the register of the said ship.

4. The said collector received the said letter on the 10th Nov., and acting upon the statements and representations contained therein, made an indorsement upon the register of the said vessel as follows, namely: "Certificate cancelled, register closed 10th Nov. 1874. Vessel sold to foreigners," and drew a line across the said register.

5. The said vessel was not on or before the 10th Nov. 1874, sold to any foreigner or foreigners, but she was on that day and she afterwards continued to be owned by the defendant as sole owner, and she then was and she subsequently continued to be a British ship within the true intent and meaning of the 103rd section of "The Merchant Shipping Act 1854."

6. On or about the 12th Jan. 1875, the defendant being still the sole owner of the said ship, produced and exhibited to one William Robert Arkless, the Superintendent of Customs and Mercantile Marine, at Seaham, a person entitled by British law to inquire into the character of the said ship, a document purporting to be a certificate of ownership of the said ship, and dated on or about the 28th Nov. 1874, by which document it was stated and represented that one Henry Thomas Watson, of Antwerp, Belgian citizen, having purchased the said ship, had by bill of sale become the owner of the said ship, and that the said ship was then Belgian property.

7. The said statements and representations in the said document lastly mentioned were respectively wholly untrue. The said ship, on the said 28th Nov. 1874, continued to be and was the property of the said James Saunders as sole owner thereof, and a British ship within the true intent and meaning of the said 103rd section.

8. On the 5th Feb. 1875, one James Farguson, the then master of the said ship, by and with permission of the defendant as sole owner of the said ship, applied at the Custom House, at Seaham, in the port of Sunderland, to one William Farrow, the officer of customs then on duty in that behalf, for a transire or clearance coastwise for the said ship, and the said master then and thereby, and with the permission of the defendant, declared to the said William Farrow the name of the nation to which the said master claimed that the said ship belonged as being the Belgian nation, and that her port of registry was the port of Antwerp, in the Kingdom of Belgium, and the said William Farrow then inscribed such port as the port of registry of the said ship on a clearance or transire, which he then granted, and the said master, by and with the permission of the defendant, then and there signed upon the said clearance or transire a declaration whereby he the said master certified that all the requirements of the said Act had been fully complied with.

9. The nationality of the said ship was not upon the said 5th Feb. 1875 Belgian, but the said ship then was and continued to be the sole property of the defendant as sole owner thereof, and a British ship within the true intent and meaning of the said 103rd section, and the said declarations respectively made and signed by the said master as in the last paragraph stated were wholly false.

10. On or about the 21st Aug. 1875, the defendant being then the sole owner of the said ship, applied as master thereof to the said William Robert Arkless, still being such superintendent of customs and mercantile marine as aforesaid, at the Custom House, at Seaham, aforesaid, for a clearance or transire of the said ship, and stated the name of the said ship to be the Cotopaxi, of Arca, and declared to the said William Robert Arkless the name of the nation to which he, the defendant, claimed that the ship belonged to be Uruguay, and the said William Robert Arkless thereupon inscribed the name of such nation upon a coasting clearance or transire which he then granted, and the defendant then and there signed a declaration upon the said clearance or transire whereby he certified that all the requirements of the said Act had been fully complied with.

11. The name of the said ship was not on the said 21st Aug. 1875, the Cotopaxi, of Arca, and the nationality of the said ship was not upon that day Uruguayan, but the said ship then was, and continued to be, the property of the defendant as sole owner thereof, and a British ship within the true intent and meaning of the said section, and the said declarations so made and signed respectively by the defendant were wholly false.

12. The said ship subsequently to the 10th Nov. 1874, and whilst she still continued to be the property of the defendant and a British ship within the true intent and meaning of the said 103rd section, was sailed by the defendant or by and with his permission under a foreign flag, to wit under the Belgian flag.

13. The several matters and things hereinbefore alleged to have been done or permitted to be done by the defendant, or some or one of such matters and things, were or was matters or things, or a matter or thing done by the defendant as owner of the said British ship Sceptre, with intent to conceal the British character of such ship from the said collector of customs at Sunderland, and from the said William Robert Arkless, and from the said William Farrow, and from others the collectors and officers of customs at divers British ports and from the officials of the Board of trade defined by the said Act, or from some or one of such persons all such persons being persons entitled by British law to inquire into such character, or with intent to assume a foreign character, or with intent to deceive such persons as aforesaid, or some or one of them, and thereby the said ship became and is forfeited to Her Majesty.

14. The said document or certificate in the 6th paragraph of this statement of claim, mentioned further, stated, and represented that the said document or certificate would remain in force for not exceeding one year from the date thereof, to wit, from the 28th Nov. 1874, and was issued for the purpose of proving the nationality of the said ship until her arrival in Belgium, and such document was carried by the defendant or by the master of the said ship, by and with the permission of the defendant as owner of the said ship, as a certificate of the nationality of the said ship. Such document or certificate was not according to the law of Belgium, a good or valid certificate of the nationality of the said ship, and the said ship was not on the 12th Jan. 1875 a Belgian ship or entitled to a certificate of nationality as a Belgian ship, but she then continued to be and was the property of the defendant as sole owner thereof, and a British ship within the true intent and meaning of the said section. Such document was carried by the defendant as sole owner of the said ship or by the master of the said ship by and with the permission of the defendant as sole owner of the said ship, with intent to conceal the British character of such from the said William Robert Arkless, and others, the collectors and officers of customs at divers British ports, and the officials of the Board of Trade defined as aforesaid, or from some or one of such persons, all such persons being persons entitled by British law to enquire into the same, or with intent to assume a foreign character, or with intent to deceive such persons or some or one of them, and thereby the said ship became as is forfeited to Her Majesty.

15 The plaintiff as a British officer of customs has seized and detained the said ship as having become subject to forfeiture to Her Majesty as aforesaid, and has brought her for adjudication before this court pursuant to the said section.

The plaintiff claims—

1. A declaration and judgment that the said ship or vessel Sceptre has become and is forfeited to Her Majesty.

2. A sale of the said ship Sceptre by the marshal of this court.

3. An award to the plaintiff of such portion of the proceeds of the sale of the said ship as the court may think right.

4. The condemnation of the defendant in the costs of this action.

5. Such further and other relief as the nature of the case may require.

The defendant, James Saunders, delivered an answer denying the statement of claim; but at the hearing the defendant himself was called as a witness for the plaintiff, and admitted that the allegations of the statement of claim were substantially accurate. He stated that he was, prior to 10th Nov. 1874, the sole owner of the Sceptre, which was then registered as a British ship; that on or about that date he was informed by some shipbrokers that they could procure the registration of his ship in Belgium on the payment of certain fees, and that by this means he would be enabled to avoid the then recent legislation relating to unseaworthy ships. He accordingly represented to the collector of customs at Sunderland, where the ship had been registered, that the ship was sold to foreigners, and requested the collector to send him a copy of the register of the ship. The shipbrokers before-mentioned procured for him the provisional certificate mentioned in the statement of claim, paragraphs 6 and 14, which represented the ship as being a Belgian ship, and she was sailed under the Belgian flag, but she never ceased to be the sole property of the defendant, and he had, after the closing of her British registry, worked her himself, and had received the freights and profits. The action was undefended at the hearing.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The facts stated in the statement of claim being admitted by the defendant, I must pronounce in this case that the owner of the ship was intending to conceal the British character of the ship from the person entitled to inquire into it, and that the vessel assumed a foreign character with intent to deceive the officer or customs, and is therefore liable to forfeiture under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 103), and therefore pronounce for the forfeiture of the vessel.

THE SFACTORIA.

Practice—Default in pleading—Signing judgment—Proceeding in rem — Supreme Court Rules: Order XXIX., rule 2.

Order XXIX., rule 2, of the Supreme Court Rules, as to signing judgment in default of pleading, does not apply to proceedings in rem.

Where in an action in rem for a liquidated sum for necessaries supplied, the defendant makes default in delivering his statement of defence, the plaintiff cannot at once sign final judgment, but must bring the case on for hearing before the judge upon affidavit.

THIS was an action of necessaries instituted on behalf of John Abbott and Francis Parny Adey, ship chandlers at Cardiff, in rem, against the Greek ship Sfactoria. The necessaries supplied were ship's stores, and were supplied by the order of the master of the ship.

The plaintiff, in the statement of claim, alleged that the goods were supplied on three several occasions, and that the amounts due for such supplies were 412*l.* 16*s.* 9*d.*, 61*l.*, and 84*l.* 17*s.*, making together 551*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*, and that the goods were supplied upon the credit of the ship and not of the master.

The owners of the ship duly appeared in the action, and the statement of claim was served upon them by special leave during the vacation.

The defendants, after obtaining several extensions of time for the purpose, made default in delivering their defence. The plaintiffs now brought the matter before the court on motion "for an order that, the defendants having failed to deliver their statement of defence within the time limited, the plaintiff be at liberty to sign final judgment for 551*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*, together with interest, as claimed in the statement of claim, and costs of suit, and for an order that a commission do issue for the sale and appraisement of the Sfactoria, and that the proceeds thereof be brought into the registry of the court."

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiff, in support of the motion.—Here the plaintiff's claim is for a liquidated demand, and consequently, under Order XXIX., rule 2, of the Supreme Court Rules, the defendant having made default in pleading the plaintiff becomes entitled to sign final judgment; that is to say, if the rule applies to proceedings in rem. It is true there may be grave objections to judgment being signed in such a manner in these cases; as, for instance, a friend of the plaintiff might collusively appear in the action and make default in pleading, and judgment go against a ship which had never been liable. As the decree would go against all the world, it is perhaps desirable that some proof of the validity of the claim should be given. This might be done either by giving final judgment subject to a reference, or by ordering the action to be set down for hearing on proof by affidavit, which the court would have power to do under Order XXXVII., rule 1, of the Supreme Court Rules. At the same time we are within the words of the rule before quoted.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I do not think that Order XXIX., rule 2, was ever intended to apply to proceedings in rem. To so apply it would be dangerous, as the court might condemn and sell the wrong ship. There ought to be some inquiry in such cases. I shall order the case to stand over for hearing on the next motion day, when proof of the plaintiff's claim can be given on affidavit. The court, according to the old practice of the Court of Admiralty, has power to order evidence to be taken on affidavit, independently of Order XXXVII., rule 1.

THE NORMA.

Collision—Practice—Vice-Admiralty Courts—Preliminary Acts—Examination of witnesses—Rule of the road—Regulations for preventing collisions at Sea, Arts. 15, 16, 18.

The form of preliminary Acts now in use in the High Court of Justice in collision cases should be used in similar cases in the Vice-Admiralty Courts.

In collision causes in the Vice-Admiralty Courts witnesses should, as far as possible, be examined viva voce before the court, not upon written interrogatories before an officer of the court prior to the hearing.

A sailing vessel, meeting a steamer, is bound to keep her course, and it is not the rule of the road that she should port her helm on nearing the steamer, such a deviation from the rules being allowed only under circumstances of immediate danger.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Canada, in a suit brought by the respondents against the appellant for damages sustained by them by reason of a collision between the James Seed, carrying a cargo of copper, of which the respondents were owners, and the Norma, of which the appellant is owner.

The collision in question occurred in the river St. Lawrence, between Bic and Quebec, and between 10 and 11 p.m. of the 11th Aug. 1874. The wind was S.W. or S.W. by W., a moderate breeze; the night was clear, and the tide was ebb. The James Seed, a three masted Schooner, of 156 tons, with a crew of eight hands and a pilot, was going down, and the Norma, a steamship, of 653 tons, with a crew of twenty hands and a pilot, was going up the river. Both vessels had their proper regulation lights. The parts of the two vessels which first came in collision were the port-bow of the James Seed and some part of the starboard-bow of the Norma. The James Seed sunk almost immediately, with the loss of five lives.

On these points both parties were agreed.

The remaining facts of the case as stated in the preliminary Act and libel filed on behalf of the respondents, were substantially as follows:

The James Seed, making about four knots an hour, was heading N.E. by E., when the bright and red lights of the Norma were observed from two or three miles off, about a point on the starboard-bow. The helm of the James Seed was put to port, and the lights were brought on the port-bow. The James Seed then steadied her helm and kept her course. After some time, the green light of the Norma came in sight. Those on board the James Seed then hailed the Norma (which was then coming directly upon them), to port her helm, and put their own helm hard-a-port. The Norma, however, starboarded her helm, and without stopping or reversing her engines, came into collision with the James Seed, with such violence, as to do the damage already mentioned.

The case of the Norma, as stated in the responsive allegation, filed on behalf of the appellants, was as follows:

5. That at about half-past 10 o'clock at night, of the said 11th Aug., the Norma, then going at the rate of about seven knots per hour, and being a few miles from Bic, the look-out man reported a light about two miles off, a little on the port bow, which was first supposed to be a white light, but which subsequently proved to be a green light of a vessel coming down the river, which said vessel was subsequently ascertained to be the James Seed.

7. That, immediately upon the said light being reported, the said pilot, Joseph Lavoie, perceiving the vessel coming down the river to be a sailing vessel, gave the order to put the helm hard-a-starboard, which order was obeyed, and the green light of the James Seed, was thereby brought about a point on the starboard-bow of the Norma, the Norma, as a steam vessel, giving way to the James Seed.

8. That the green light of the James Seed remained visible to the people of the Norma until a few minutes before the collision, when suddenly the James Seed put her helm hard aport, bringing herself right across the bows of the Norma, and disclosing her red light.

9. That the people on board the Norma shouted to those on board the James Seed to put her helm a-starboard, but the James Seed continued to pay off to starboard, keeping her helm hard-a-port.

10. That thereby a collision was rendered inevitable, the Norma striking the James Seed in her fore-rigging, the James Seed sinking immediately, and carrying with her the starboard anchor and sixty fathoms of chain of the Norma, and making an immense hole in the forward compartment of the Norma, which for some time threatened the safety of the ship.

11. That immediately that there appeared any danger of collision the engines of the Norma were stopped, and then reversed.

The cause came on for hearing before the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court, assisted by nautical assessors, the evidence of several witnesses, taken before the registrar of the court previously, was read, and the preliminary Acts were opened. The preliminary Acts were those ordinarily in use in the Vice-Admiralty Courts, and did not contain all the questions and answers contained in the preliminary Acts in use in the High Court of Justice of England. The following are wanting "VI. State and force of the tide;" "VIII. The lights, if any carried by her;" "X. The lights, if any, of the other vessel which were first seen;" "XI. Whether any lights of the other vessel other than those first seen came into view before the collision." The learned judge submitted certain questions to the nautical assessors, which, with the answers thereto, were as follows:

1st. Whether after the vessels sighted each other they had time to take the necessary precautions to prevent the collision which followed? Answer. Yes.

2nd. Whether the steamer at any time after seeing the schooner's light should have ported her helm and whether she pursued a proper course in putting it to starboard when she did? Answer. The steamer on seeing the schooner's green light a little on her port bow should have stopped her engines to ascertain the exact position of the schooner and then acted accordingly.

3rd. Whether the schooner was to blame in porting her helm instead of keeping her course? Answer. The schooner in porting her helm followed the rule of the road and was not to blame.

4th. Whether the schooner by porting foiled the manœuvre of the starboard helm of the steamer or the steamer by starboarding defeated that of the schooner's port helm? Answer. The steamer seeing that she was nearing the schooner so rapidly should have stopped and reversed full speed instead of starboarding her helm, which had the effect of showing her side lights to the schooner, and justified the latter in porting her helm.

5th. Whether the steamer was to blame for not having stopped her engines earlier than she did? Answer. Yes.

6th. Whether the collision was inevitable or was occasioned by the carelessness, mismanagement, or want of proper skill on the part of both vessels, or of either and which of them? Answer. The collision was occasioned by want of caution and experience on the part of the steamer, which could have avoided a collision by keeping to the northward or by stopping her engines in time, whereas the schooner in porting her helm, to shew her red light, was following the rule of the road, therefore we consider the Norma is alone to blame.

The learned judge then delivered judgment, which, after setting out the facts and the above questions and answers, was as follows:—

STUART, J.—It is beyond doubt that after sighting each other both vessels continued their course until within about half a mile of each other, and I may add that it appears to me that if neither had deviated from her course then they would have gone clear, though they might have passed nearer than it was prudent to do, the responsibility of the collision must therefore rest on the vessel which altered her course at the eleventh hour. The pilot and man at the helm of the Norma establish that they both saw the James Seed's green light two miles off, and the mate deposes that when the schooner's green light was seen on the Norma the people of the schooner must have seen the masthead and red lights of the steamer. This is proved to have been so by the pilot of the James Seed. The chief officer of the Norma says, "she (the schooner) would continue to see those lights until we starboarded and brought her on our starboard bow when she would lose our red and see our green light, and our green light must have remained visible from that time till the collision." Charles Dale, the man on the look-out on the Norma says, "Directly after the Norma began to answer her starboard helm the James Seed, which up to that time had shown her green light, then showed her red light." Thus the change in the lights which establishes the alteration of the course of these two vessels relatively to each other is attributed by the witnesses who were themselves executing the change in the course and observing its effect to the action of the Norma's starboard helm, and serves to relieve the persons in charge of the said James Seed of any imputation of having contributed to this altered and very dangerous condition of things. It is made certain by the evidence that the schooner, upon seeing the lights of the Norma, took her course and pursued it without deviation until the steamer, then a short distance off, opened up her coloured lights, and was seen coming end on the schooner, when, in pursuance of the rule, she ported her helm. It is equally certain from the evidence of the crew of the Norma that the steamer saw the schooner's green light at a distance of about two miles, and that she continued her course for a full half hour—so says the pilot—when she starboarded her helm and exhibited her coloured lights to the schooner. It does not appear to have been taken into calculation by the persons directing the course of the Norma that before the red light of the steamer was shut out and the green light substituted instead there would be an interval of time when both her coloured lights would appear to the persons on the schooner and show a condition involving the greatest danger of collision end on and making it a duty on the schooner to port her helm in compliance with the rule of the road. These, then, are all the circumstances influencing the relative positions of these two vessels immediately before the collision, which caused the schooner to sink on the spot, and the largest part of her crew to be drowned, to which the law is to be applied. The relative duties towards each other of these two vessels under the circumstances are to be found in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

Art. 15.—"If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing-ship."

Art. 16.—"Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision and shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop reverse."

It was held in the case of The Rose (2 Wm. Rob. 1) that the expression "giving way" in the Trinity House Regulations means not crossing a vessel's bows, but going under her stern. The term used in the 15th article, "Shall keep out of the way," appears to me to correspond in meaning with "giving way." In that case a steam vessel having three lights and proceeding at the rate of ten knots an hour came into a collision with a sailing vessel having no light, and proceeding at the rate of four knots an hour. On discovering each other the sailing vessel ported her helm, and the steamship starboarded. The steamer was condemned in damages and costs. In the case of The James Watt (2 Wm. Rob. 270) a steam vessel discovered a sailing vessel approaching her, which from the direction and state of the wind she was aware must be sailing closehauled, but from the darkness of the night was unable to make out upon what tack. It was held she should (in order to comply with the general rule which obliges a steamer to give way to a sailing vessel) have at once stopped her engines until she had ascertained the exact course of the other vessel, and should not by mere surmise put her helm one way or the other. The defence set up on behalf of the steamer that she had ported her helm was not deemed sufficient. The first of these decisions held the steamer answerable for the collision for putting her helm astarboard instead of aport. The second held the steamer answerable though she had ported her helm, because she had not stopped her engines. Both of these decisions militate against the Norma. With these decisions, and the opinion of the Assessors, in which I concur to the full, I should have no hesitation in coming to a conclusion, but I am confirmed in my views by a decision in the Privy Council in the case of The Velasquez (L. Rep. 1 P. C. Rep. 494). This last case in its important features is identical with the present one. The steamer Velasquez was sighted by the Star of Ceylon at a sufficient distance to have avoided a collision, the steamer took no steps until the vessels were very near each other, when she starboarded her helm, and the sailing vessel ported her helm to avoid the collision, which, notwithstanding, took place. It was held that the steamer was alone to blame, as it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel provided she could do it either by starboarding or porting her helm, and that on the other hand it was the duty of the sailing vessel to keep her course, and that she could only be excused from deviating from it by showing that it was necessary to do so to avoid immediate danger. The Norma kept her course though the danger of this proceeding was apparent to the apprentice pilot whose suggestions as to the propriety of porting her helm before she had got so near was disregarded by the pilot. The Norma then, as the Velasquez, is chargeable with approaching too close, and is answerable for a manœuvre which threatening a collision end on imposed it as a duty on the schooner to port her helm, and leaves the steamer with the whole burden of the occurrence. I cannot do better than reproduce the words of Lord Westbury in the case of The City of Antwerp (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 25), "It is undoubtedly true in cases of collision between a sailing ship and a steamer that although the sailing ship may be found to have been guilty of misconduct, or not to have observed the sailing regulations, yet the steamer will be held culpable if it appears that it was in her power to have avoided the collision. It cannot be too much insisted on that it is the duty of the steamer where there is risk of collision, whatever may be the conduct of the sailing vessel, to do everything in her power that can be done consistently with her own safety to avoid the collision." To this extent does the law make responsibility weigh upon steamers, and as they are independent of the wind and always under command, it seems humane and just it should be so. Applying these principles of law to the facts proved in these cases as the Norma saw the green light of the James Seed two miles off, when the combined speed at which they were approaching was twelve miles an hour, and a period of time of ten minutes only was afforded to take the precautions necessary to avoid collision, I am of opinion the Norma should then have slackened speed so as to be in a condition to stop or reverse her engines if upon the nearer approach of the vessels the safety of the sailing vessel required a resort to that expedient (The James Watt, ubi sup.). Instead of this the Norma proceeded at full speed down to the moment of collision. I am further of opinion that the attempt to cross the bows of the schooner at the last moment was unseamanlike and culpably hazardous, as the event has demonstrated, and lastly the Norma is answerable when so near the schooner as to involve risk of collision for having starboarded her helm when the rule required her to port. (The Rose, The Velasquez) (ubi sup.) For these acts of omission and commission the owner of the Norma is answerable to the promoters for the catastrophe. I decree against the owner of the Norma, and order the usual reference in both cases to the registrar and merchants to report on the damage.

From this judgment the owners of the Norma appealed, for the following, amongst other reasons:

1. Because the learned judge of the court below erroneously held that the steamer was bound to get out of the way of the James Seed by porting her helm, whereas she was entitled to do so either by porting, or starboarding, or keeping on as those on board her thought fit.

2. Because the steamer, by starboarding her helm, performed the duty imposed on her of keeping out of the way of the James Seed, and the evidence proved that there would not have been a collision if the James Seed had performed her duty by keeping her course.

3. Because the learned judge of the court below erroneously held that the James Seed was justified, according to a rule of the road, in porting and hard porting her helm, whereas there is not and was not any such rule.

4. Because the learned judge was wrong in holding that the steamer should have stopped or slackened speed at the time he holds in that behalf.

5. Because the evidence proved that the collision was not occasioned by any negligent or improper navigation on the part of the Norma.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a decree of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Quebec, in a suit for damages, the consequence of a collision between two vessels, the James Seed, a sailing vessel, and the Norma, steamship.

Before their Lordships approach the consideration of the merits of this case they desire to say a few words with respect to the pleadings and the mode of taking evidence in the court below. The "Preliminary Acts," the operation of which has been eminently conducive to the ascertainment of the truth in these cases, are in the same form as when first tried in the High Court of Admiralty. Since that time, sections 6, 8, 10, 11, which form a very important part of the present Preliminary Acts in the English Court of Admiralty, have been introduced, and their Lordships think that it would be expedient to introduce similar regulations into the practice of the Vice-Admiralty Courts; their Lordships must express a hope that in subsequent suits this defect will be remedied. The mode of taking the evidence before the Registrar alone, and the use of written interrogatories, would, in their Lordships' opinion, be advantageously exchanged for the practice of the viva voce examination of witnesses at the hearing before the judge who is to decide the case, in causes where it would be possible to obtain their attendance for that purpose without inconvenience or additional expense, a practice which has been for a long time prevalent in the English Court of Admiralty, and attended with very beneficial results.

The judge of the court below pronounced the Norma—the steamship—to be alone to blame for the collision. From this judgment the owners of the Norma have appealed to this court. The collision occurred in the river St. Lawrence, between ten and eleven o'clock of the night of the 11th August 1874, five or six miles from a place called Bic. The James Seed, a three-masted schooner of 156 tons, with a crew of eight hands, and a pilot, was going down, and the Norma, a steamship of 653 tons, with a crew of twenty hands and a pilot, was coming up the river; the two vessels were approaching each other, not exactly, but within about a point, on opposite courses. Both vessels had their proper regulation lights. The weather was fine and clear; it was a starlight night, and there was a moderate breeze from the south-west under the influence of which the schooner was approaching Bic—having previously taken in her foresail—at the rate of about four knots through the water. At a distance of about five miles from the Bicquette light, the pilot on board the schooner saw through his glass the masthead light, and the red light of the steamer about two miles off and about a point on his starboard bow. At the same distance the "look-out" on board the steamer reported a bright light ahead on her port bow. The schooner, under the pilot's orders, ported enough to bring the steamer's bright and red lights a little on her port bow; her helm was then steadied, and she kept her course until within half a mile of the steamer, when the three lights of that vessel came in sight; the schooner's helm was then ported and hard-aported, and the steamer was hailed to port; she did not do so, and struck with her stem and starboard bow the schooner's port bow so severe a blow that she sank directly, and five of her crew were unhappily drowned. To return to the steamer, the bright light which had been reported a little on her port bow proved, as the vessels approached each other, to be a green light; the steamer continued her course at a speed of seven knots an hour for some minutes, when, at a distance of about half a mile, her pilot gave the order to starboard and the collision took place in the way described.

The contention of the respondents (the plaintiffs in the court below) was that the collision was caused by the starboarding and the continuance of the speed of the steamer. The contention on the part of the appellants (the defendants in the court below) was that the collision was caused by the porting of the schooner.

The learned judge was assisted by nautical assessors, to whom he submitted various questions; their answer to which was, in substance, that the steamer should have stopped and reversed full speed instead of starboarding, and that the schooner followed what they called the rule of the road in porting her helm, and therefore was not to blame. The learned judge unfortunately adopted this latter premiss, and, as he supposed, supported it by reference to certain articles of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea. He cited Article 15, which is: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steam ship, are proceeding in such directions as to invoke risk of collision, the steam ship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship;" and Article 16, which says that, "every steam ship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse." The learned judge omitted to notice the 18th Article, which, so far as it concerns the present case, is, "where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course." It is an entire mistake as to the existing law to suppose that it is the duty of a sailing vessel when meeting a steamer to port her helm; it is her duty to keep her course. And if the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived could only be supported by adopting the grounds upon which he appears mainly to have founded it, it would be the duty of their Lordships to recommend Her Majesty to reverse the sentence; but their Lordships are of opinion in this case that though the reasoning is partially incorrect, the conclusion is, on the whole, right. Their Lordships, after conference with their nautical assessors, are of opinion, on the one hand, that the first porting of her helm by the schooner was, at the least, having regard to the distance and the degree, an innocent manœuvre; and, on the other hand, that it is not proved that the schooner's red light was seen on board the steamer. But their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the steamer is to blame for having approached too close to the schooner before she altered her helm; that she did wrong in continuing up to so late a period the position of danger and embarrassment which exists when the green light on one vessel is opposed to the red light on another. The steamer came so close that she had not time to go off more than a point and a half under her starboard helm. The nautical assessors think that if she had starboarded a quarter of a mile off she would have cleared the schooner; and with regard to the second porting of the schooner almost in the moment of collision, they think that in the circumstances it was the best manœuvre she could have adopted.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decision of the court below, and to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER CHAMBER IN ENGLAND.

Ship—Fire policy—Construction—Localization of policy.

A ship belonging to the appellant was insured against fire with the respondents by a time policy. In the policy the ship was described as "lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with liberty to go into dry dock." The ship went into dry dock, and after leaving the dry dock was moored for some time in the river in order that certain repairs might be done which were usually done in the river, but might have been done, though at a greater cost, in the Victoria Docks. While so moored the ship was completely destroyed by fire. Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the loss was not covered by the policy.

THE plaintiff had effected a policy of insurance against fire with the defendants on the steamship Indian Empire for three months from May 14th, 1862. The ship was described in the policy as "lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with liberty to go into dry dock, and light the boiler fires once or twice during the currency of the policy." The Indian Empire was a paddle steamer of very large size, of 2000 tons, 249ft. long, and 60ft. beam, and it was found that the only dry dock in the Thames capable of receiving a ship of that size was Lungley's dry dock at Deptford, two miles higher up the river than the Victoria Docks, and to enter this dock it was necessary to remove the lower part of the paddle wheels. This was done in the Victoria Docks, and the ship was towed up to Lungley's Dock, and after the repairs there were finished, she was towed down the river again to a point 600yds. or 700yds. from the entrance to the Victoria Docks, and moored there, in order that the halves of the paddle wheels might be replaced. While so moored she was burnt. The present action was brought on the policy. It was proved that it was usual to replace the paddles in such cases outside the docks, but that it might have been done inside at a much greater expense. The utmost despatch was used in replacing the paddles and the work was not quite finished when the fire happened. Evidence was given at the trial that great precautions were in force within the Victoria Docks to prevent accidents by fire.

The cause was tried before Erle, C.J., at the sittings in London after Trinity Term 1863, when the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount claimed, 10,000*l*.

This verdict was set aside by the Court of Common Pleas (Erle, C.J., Williams, and Keating, JJ.) as reported in 33 L. J. 85, C. P.; 9 L. T. Rep. N.S. 442; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 401, on the ground that on the true construction of the policy the ship was not covered at the time of the loss; and in June 1873 this decision was affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (Kelly, C.B., Martin and Cleasby, BB., Blackburn, Quain, and Archibald, JJ.) as reported in ante, vol. 2, p. 100; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 548, and 29 L. T. Rep. N.S. 279.

From this judgment error was brought to the House of Lords.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and Lanyon, for the plaintiff in error, argued that the ship was covered by the policy up to the 14th Aug., and that the "liberty" given by the policy must be taken to mean liberty to do what was usual under the circumstances, not only what was strictly necessary, and that underwriters are bound to know the circumstances of the trade to which their policy relates. They cited

Cohen, Q.C., J. C. Mathew (Benjamin, Q.C., with them), for the defendants in error, maintained that this was a localised fire policy, and that the analogy of voyage policies was false. The risk must be clearly present to the minds of both parties: (See Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21, p. 399; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 840; 31 ib., 239.) The policy only covered what was necessary for the transit to and from the dry dock. Usage may be resorted to for the purpose of explaining the terms of a policy, but not in express disregard of them; the risk must not be altered.

Watkin Williams, Q.C., in reply.

June 20.—Their Lordships gave judgment as follows:

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, the insurance in this case was an insurance against fire, effected by the appellants with the respondents on a large paddle-steamer called the Indian Empire, which so long ago as the year 1862 the appellant was proceeding to have repaired in the port of London.

The policy is a time policy for three months, from 14th May 1862 till 14th Aug. 1862. The insurance, however, does not protect the ship wherever it might be, or wherever it might be in the port of London. The ship is confined and localised for the purpose of the risk by these words, "lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with liberty to go into dry dock, and light the boiler fires once or twice during the currency of this policy."

The ship is, therefore, covered by the policy during the three months so long as it is lying in the Victoria docks, and so long as it is in a dry dock, or at all events in a dry dock in the port of London. Nothing is expressly said as to the insurance attaching while the ship goes from the Victoria Dock into dry dock, but the court below have held, and as it appears to me rightly held, that the liberty to go into dry dock necessarily carries with it the protection of the insurance while the ship should be in transit from the Victoria Docks to the dry dock and back again.

I think, further, there can be no doubt that in the transit to and from the dry dock the ship would be at liberty to do anything and everything usual under the circumstances for the accomplishment of the end in view, namely, the transit to and from the dry dock. Any delay usual under the circumstances, any deviation usually or conveniently made from the straight line, provided the delay and deviation are connected with, and tend to the attainment of the end in view, would in my opinion be justifiable under the words of the policy which I have read. A delay or deviation of this kind would fairly come within the words of Lord Mansfield in the case of Pelly v. The Royal Exchange Assurance (ubi sup.) "It is absurd to suppose that when the end is assured the usual means of attaining it are meant to be excluded." If on the other hand a delay in the transit to or from the dry docks were to occur, not as part of the usual and ordinary means or mode of effecting the transit, but for some collateral object or purpose, then, in my opinion, however usual and convenient a delay for the purpose of attaining that collateral object might be, the ship would not, during the delay, be covered by the policy.

It is unnecessary to speculate whether the risk would or would not be greater when the ship was in the river than when it was in the dock. There is, as it seems to me, evidence that the risk would be greater in the former case than in the latter, but it is sufficient to say that the respondents have defined the risk which they were willing to undertake, and that risk cannot be enlarged beyond the ordinary meaning of the words upon any theory that the difference of risk is immaterial.

Applying these observations to the facts of the present case, your lordships find that the dock called "Lungley's Dry Dock" was the only dry dock in the Thames which could take in the Indian Empire, and that even into this dock the ship could not be received without taking off the lower half of the paddle-wheels. Accordingly the lower halves of the paddle-wheels were taken off in the Victoria Docks, and having thus been made ready for the dry dock, it was towed two miles up the Thames from the Victoria Docks to Lungley's Dry Dock, and the repairs were proceeded with, and, so far as they were to be done in the dry dock, were completed there.

The ship was then taken out of the dry dock, and it being intended to take her back to the Victoria Docks, there was nothing to prevent her being taken back there at once, and the halves of the paddle-wheels might have been replaced, just as they had been removed, in that dock. In place, however, of being towed back to the Victoria Docks, it was towed still further up the river, and moored there; the paddle-wheels were brought from the Victoria Docks in a barge, and the work of replacing them was proceeded with in the river. While this was being done the repairs to the masts, riggings, and capstans of the ship, and other carpenters and joiners' work, were continued at the same time, and at the end of ten days, before the paddles were completely replaced, the ship was burnt.

It is found by the case that it is usual after a ship whose paddles have been removed is taken out of dry dock to moor it in the river, for the purpose of replacing the paddles. And it is also found that though the paddles could have been replaced equally well in the Victoria Docks, it would have cost four times as much as if done in the river. My Lords, I am clearly of opinion that the delay which was thus occasioned was a delay for a purpose altogether collateral. When the ship left the dry dock the course, if it was wished to maintain the insurance, was to bring her back to the Victoria Docks; and I assume that anything done in the usual course towards the attainment of this end would be within the insurance. But that which was done did not in any way contribute to that end. It may have been usual, and because it was economical it may have been convenient, but it did not in any way facilitate or conduce to the transit of the ship to the docks from which it had come.

My Lords, it was the unanimous opinion of the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer Chamber that the respondents, in the events which have happened, were not liable under this policy for the loss which occurred. I think there is no ground whatever for differing from their judgment, and I propose to your lordships that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, from the moment this case was fully opened it seemed to me impossible to doubt the propriety of the judgment in which no fewer than ten judges agreed. I can see no ground for the statement which was made to us on the part of the appellant, that the true point of the case was never submitted to the court. Everything which was urged in argument before us appears to me to have been brought under the consideration both of the Court of Common Pleas and of the Exchequer Chamber.

The question turns entirely on the construction of the policy, which is a localised time policy against fire upon the steamship Indian Empire, lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with "liberty to go into any dry dock." The place to which the insurance principally applies is the Victoria Docks. This place the vessel is to be at liberty to leave only for the purpose of going into a dry dock for repairs. That object being satisfied, the policy seems to require that it should return without delay to its original situation, and be again "lying in the Victoria Docks." Of course the policy impliedly covers the permitted transit to and from one dock to the other. But if the parties contemplated, as it is clear they did, that during the currency of the policy the vessel would be usually lying in the Victoria Docks, when the intended repairs in the dry dock were completed it was the duty of the assured to return without delay to the Victoria Docks. Instead of doing so the ship was towed to a part of the river about 600yds. or 700yds. from the Victoria Docks, and there moored for ten days, during which time it was while so moored totally destroyed by fire. The loss, therefore, did not occur in the actual passing from the dry dock to the Victoria Docks.

But it is said for the appellant that according to the usual course of proceeding in the repair of steam vessels of the size of the one in question, the mooring in the Thames for the purpose of replacing the half of her paddle-wheels must be regarded either as a necessary incident to the transit from the dry dock, or must be taken to have been intended to be included in the policy.

But it seems to me that the precise terms of the policy afford no ground for such an argument. An insurance against fire necessarily has regard to the locality of the subject-matter of the policy, the risk being probably different according to the place where the subject of the insurance happens to be. In the present case it appears that there was greater risk where the loss happened than there would have been in the Victoria Docks, to which place the policy principally applied.

The parties cannot be said to have contracted with reference to the usual practice of large paddle steamers going into dry dock to remove a portion of their paddle-wheels, because it is stated in the special case that neither party knew that the vessel was of a width too great to admit of its entering the dock adjoining the Victoria Docks, where it would be expected it would go under the liberty to go into dry dock. And therefore the argument of the appellant must go the length of asserting that as it was an implied term of the policy that if it should be necessary to remove a portion of the paddle-wheels for the purpose of enabling the vessel to enter the dry dock, its return to the Victoria Docks might be delayed during the mooring in the Thames for any time that was required to complete the work of replacing the wheels.

But I agree with what was said by Blackburn, J., in the Exchequer Chamber, that if the parties wished to cover the risk of the ship while so moored, they should have provided for it by appropriate words in the policy. Whether the underwriters would have undertaken this risk it is impossible to say; as they were not aware that it would arise, there was of course no provision applicable to it.

It would be a strong implication to raise against the underwriters, that they necessarily contracted by the policy to extend the locality to which the insurance against fire was expressly confined, upon the ground of a usual practice of dealing with large steam vessels under repair, which they did not know would have to be resorted to on the part of the assured. More especially is this the case when it appears that the whole work upon the paddle wheels might have been done in the Victoria Docks. In fact the halves of the wheels were taken off in the Victoria Docks, and it is stated in the special case that the work of replacing them might have been equally well done in those docks, but that it would have cost four times as much as if done in the river; a very good reason for the assured running the risk of performing the work beyond the limits of the policy, but no reason at all for imposing upon the underwriters, by implication, an undertaking to accept a risk different and more extensive than that to which they expressly agreed to be liable. The policy only attached while the vessel was in the Victoria Docks or the dry dock, or was passing directly to and from one dock to the other. It therefore did not extend to the time the ship was moored in the Thames, and the underwriters are not liable for the loss which then occurred.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment appealed from is right, and must be affirmed.

Lord PENZANCE.—My Lords, the protection intended to be given by this policy was limited expressly not only to a period of three months, but to a particular place, the Victoria Docks, in which the vessel was to lie. When lost it was not lying in that place, but was moored in the river, and the only question is whether, at the time of the loss, being moored in the river was a circumstance within the special liberty which had been reserved to the owner in the policy under the words "with liberty to go into dry dock."

The Court of Common Pleas held, as it seems to me very properly, that this liberty was not confined to any particular dry dock, and that the plaintiff might take the vessel to any convenient dry dock without losing the protection of the policy. The vessel therefore was justified within the limits of the liberty in proceeding to Lungley's Dry Dock, two miles away from the Victoria Docks, in which it was to lie, but it is contended that these limits were exceeded in the course taken with the vessel on its returning from the dry dock.

In construing the meaning and extent of this liberty, I think great latitude should be allowed. To state at length in writing all that the vessel might be intended to be allowed to do in going to the dry dock, in lying there while being repaired, and then returning, the length of time to be occupied, and all that was to be done in various alternative events, would be the work of a lawyer, and a work that could not be comprised in any but a very lengthy document. The convenience of mercantile transactions makes this impossible in many cases, and in this mercantile contract of insurance especially, it is always the custom to express the mutual bargain in short and convenient terms.

In construing such terms it is always to be borne in mind that the object of insurance is indemnity from the risks attending some commercial adventure or operation which the owner of the subject of insurance is engaged upon; and it is well understood by both parties that the desire and object of the assured is that the policy should extend to all such risks of the character insured against, as may arise by the adventure or operation being carried out in the usual and ordinary manner. The assured therefore is not intended to be bound to make his mode of carrying out the adventure conform to the words of the policy rigidly construed and confined to what is absolutely necessary, but the general words of the policy are intended to be construed so as to conform to the usual and ordinary method of pursuing his adventure.

This, as I understand it, is the principal pervading the cases on voyage policies which have been cited; they are all instances of a policy being extended to cover proceedings which were usual and ordinary in the course of performing the voyage assured, though the exact words of the policy did not extend to them, or were even adverse to them. To the extent, therefore, of the principle involved in these cases, I think they are applicable to the present case, although I do not think that this "liberty to go into dry dock" can be said to have all the incidents of a voyage policy.

It follows from this that the vessel in proceeding to Lungley's Dry Dock, in being repaired there, and in returning to the Victoria Docks, would be protected so long as it was engaged in doing not merely what was necessary, but what was ordinary and usual for these purposes. If, for instance, it was usual, though not necessary, to take off part of the paddle wheels, as is admitted to have been the case here before entering the dry dock; and further, if, in order to do that, it had been usual for the vessel to lie a certain time in the river outside the dock while it was being done, I should have thought that the vessel would have been protected in doing so, because it was taking the usual course for the purpose of going into dock and being repaired. But when the repairs were completed, or so far completed as they were intended to be in the dry dock, and the vessel was brought out of that dock again, all that remained to be done within the liberty contained in the policy was to return to the Victoria Docks. And here, again, if it had been usual to wait a tide in the river, or perform the passage in any particular way, thereby encountering a delay which was usual but not necessary, and the vessel had done so, I should still have thought that it would have been protected.

But what the vessel really did was to abandon for the time, returning to the Victoria Docks, and remaining for some days in the river for the purpose of a certain repair, namely, the putting on of the half paddle wheels which had been taken off, a purpose which had no connection with returning to the Victoria Docks, and was in no way even ancillary to getting there. It is admitted that it is usual for shipowners to have this species of work done in the river instead of in a dock, because it is cheaper; but it cannot be said that a delay for that purpose was within the usual course of vessels moving from one dock to the other.

It appears to me, therefore, that the delay in the river, during which the vessel was burnt, was created for a purpose apart from, and independent of, the liberty to go into dry dock, to be repaired there, and then to return, which had been conceded to the assured in the policy, and that the protection of the policy was consequently lost.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion.

The question is one of construction, and we must endeavour to ascertain from its terms the intentions of the parties to the policy of insurance upon this steamship, the Indian Empire. The facts are undisputed, and the words of the policy, if they are literally taken, import merely a contract to insure the ship for a period of three months against loss by fire whilst lying in the Victoria Docks, and whilst going into dry dock, according to the liberty specifically granted for that purpose. This is all that the words expressly convey, but I quite concur with the counsel for the appellant that they imply a liberty to return from the dry dock, and are an undertaking to insure during the transit back again. The real matter for decision is whether the ship when burnt was returning to the Victoria Docks, within the implied meaning of the policy, and according to the true contract of the parties.

Now it is found in the case that the vessel, having been taken out of the dry dock, was "towed up the river to the Government buoy off Deptford, about six or seven hundred yards off the Victoria Docks, and altogether out of the course from Lungley's Dock to the Victoria Docks, and there moored, for the purpose of having the lower parts of the paddle wheels replaced." So that we find the vessel removed to the place at which it was destroyed by a course altogether different from that to the Victoria Docks, and for a purpose wholly alien from that of returning thither. I feel it impossible to hold that in such circumstances it was covered by a policy which, even assuming that the doubt of one of the ablest judges of England (Blackburn, J.), whether the vessel was insured while passing from the dry dock to the Victoria Docks, should be, as I think it should be, disregarded, only assured the vessel during that passage. It had made, as I have said, a totally different passage, with a totally different object. I do not think the policy was ever designed to insure the ship in a condition of facts which it does not profess to contemplate, and which the parties to it could not have foreseen.

It is said that such contracts should be construed liberally, and for the interests of commerce; this view has not improperly been entertained in certain cases. But it can never justify indifference to the real purpose of a policy, or warrant the recognition of an obligation which was not directly, or by reasonable implication, imposed by its terms, when those terms are fairly interpreted according to their natural and ordinary meaning. Here the parties were vigilant to specify the risks they undertook, by providing for "liberty to go into dry dock, and light the boiler fires once or twice during the currency of the policy;" and we, in my opinion, are not free to add another material condition to their contract, and say that this carefully limited liberty could authorise the taking of the vessel wholly out of the course of passage to the dry dock and back again, with the manifest increase of danger of her destruction. The case, by setting forth the precautions taken in the Victoria docks to prevent or extinguish fires, shows the nature of this increase very clearly. Watchmen at all hours, policemen and other persons trained to the use of fire engines, and carpenters ready to scuttle ships on fire, with an ample supply of water, diminished the risks of fire in the Victoria Docks; while in the river those appliances were wanting, and in the particular case of the Indian Empire nearly an hour elapsed between the breaking out of the fire and the arrival of one of the three floating engines placed at considerable distances from each other, and alone available to control the conflagration, which probably from that delay resulted in the loss of the ship. Without discussing the question of the admissibility of evidence on the one side or the other, these facts are persuasive to show that the effect of the policy, according to the view of the appellant, must have been to burden the respondents with a liability for risks far more serious than those for which they would have had to answer on their own construction of it; and it is to my mind quite plain that when it was framed such larger risks were not in contemplation of either insurer or insured. Neither of them knew that the width of the Indian Empire was too great to allow it to go into the graving dock, which was close to the Victoria Docks, and both of them had in view the prompt passage to the "Thames Graving Dock," by pontoons and hydraulic pressure, which, if they could have been applied, would have obviated the necessity of taking off the lower half of the paddle wheels, and removing the ship to "Lungley's Dry Dock," and would have prevented the unfortunate transfer up the river to the place at which it was burned. They expected a prompt, quick, and safe exercise of the privilege of going into dry dock, and we may assume that the premium was arranged accordingly.

Can we say that if the size of the vessel, and the effect of that in inducing removal first to a distant dry dock, and then to an unguarded portion of the river, far from the Victoria Docks had been known, a heavier rate would not more properly have protected the insurer? He might not have accepted the risk at all, or he might have accepted it on terms more favourable to himself, and more onerous to the assured.

And on this point we should remember that the vessel might have been brought back immediately and directly to the Victoria Docks, and refitted there with an avoidance of the greater perils to which I have adverted; but that the appellant deviated from this proper course, took the ship to a place of danger, and delayed it long upon the river, not from any necessity or difficulty in doing otherwise, but simply to save himself the fourfold expense which would have been incurred by an immediate return to the safer Victoria Docks. If he chose to act in this way, and solely for his own apparent advantage, it does not seem unreasonable that the resulting loss should fall on him, rather than on the insurers, who never contracted to sustain it under such circumstances.

The authorities on the subject of usage have been already sufficiently discussed. They do not appear to me to apply to the circumstances before us. The analogy of voyage policies is not a true one, and we must deal with this case according to the contract of the parties. It may be right and reasonable that a usage known to exist, which affects directly the progress of a voyage, or the dealing with a mercantile venture, should be held to be contemplated by insurers, and to regulate more or less their liabilities; but it must be a usage not collateral to, and unconnected with the voyage which is the subject of insurance. Here the custom of merchants to save money by refitting a ship in the river rather than in the docks had nothing to do with the specific contract of the insurer to cover a vessel in the Victoria Docks, in the dry dock, and in the passage from one to the other; he did not cover it in a place different from any of these, to which it had been taken by the insured's own option, and for his own interest. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Judgment appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed with costs.

Feb. 10 and 21, and June 14, 1876.

KEITH AND ANOTHER v. BURROWS AND ANOTHER.

Mortgage of ship—Omission to register—Rights of mortgagee as against assignee of freight.

A mortgage of a ship transfers the ownership, so far as to entitle the mortgagee to the whole of the mortgagor's interest as security for his money.

The only effect of the omission to register a mortgage of a ship is to postpone it to a subsequently registered mortgage.

A mortgagee of the ship is entitled to freight as against an assignee of freight by an assignment made after the mortgage, but before its registration.

A ship was mortgaged to plaintiffs. Afterwards defendants advanced money on the security of the cargo without notice of plaintiffs' mortgage. Defendants and the mortgagor then sold the cargo to J., on the terms that 55*s. a ton freight should be paid. An assignment of freight was made to defendants as security for their advances. The ship was then mortgaged to H., who registered his mortgage. Afterwards plaintiffs registered their mortgage. Defendants, by arrangement, acquired J.'s rights. H. and plaintiffs took possession; H., being satisfied with the ship as security, made no claim to freight.*

Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to the freight of 55*s. a ton as against defendants, notwithstanding their omission to register their mortgage.*

THIS was a special case stated for the opinion of the court in an action brought by the plaintiffs as mortgagees of the ship Stonehouse, to recover money alleged to be due to them from the defendants in respect of freight.

1. The plaintiffs are merchants, carrying on business under the style or firm of James Wyllie and Co., in London. The defendants are corn-factors and brokers, carrying on business under the style or firm of Burrows and Perks, in London. The action is brought by the plaintiffs, who claim as mortgagees in possession of the ship Stonehouse, to recover moneys alleged to have become due and payable in respect of freight from the defendants under the circumstances hereinafter appearing.

2. Mr. John Morison, of Billiter-street, trading under the style or firm of John Morison and Co., was, during the period covered by this case, the registered owner of 60-64ths of the Stonehouse, Mr. Bley, the captain, being the registered owner of the remaining 4-64ths.

3. On the 1st Dec. 1874, Morison executed a mortgage of his 60-64ths of the ship in favour of the plaintiffs to secure 7500*l.* and interest in account current, and any further sum which might become due.

4. The Stonehouse was at this time at San Francisco seeking employment, and the freight market being disorganised owing to a recent commercial failure, her captain, Bley, determined, rather than accept the low offers of freight which were being made in the thick of the crisis, to load a cargo of wheat "on account of the ship," hoping by its sale in England to realise a better margin than what was available as freight at the port of loading.

5. Accordingly, a cargo of 23,644 sacks of wheat (being the cargo in respect of which the present claim arises), was obtained through Messrs. Parrott and Co., merchants at San Franscisco, and shipped on board the Stonehouse. The invoice, dated the 2nd Dec. 1874, stated that the wheat was shipped by Parrott and Co. on board the Stonehouse, bound to Falmouth or Downs for orders, consigned to order, that is, to the order of Parrott and Co. (they thus keeping control over the cargo until the money found by them for the purchase thereof should be paid), by order of John Morison and Co. for account and risk of whom it may concern.

6. Bills of lading were made out for the wheat, deliverable to the order of, and were handed to Parrott and Co., stating the freight payable on delivery to be 1*s.* per ton. Parrott and Co. simultaneously drew bills of exchange on Morison at sixty days' sight against the wheat, to recoup themselves for the price of the wheat, and their commission, and sold the bills of exchange with three bills of lading, indorsed by Parrott and Co., attached thereto, to the Bank of British North America.

7. It is a common practice in many places for foreign shippers, when a cargo is to be shipped "for the account of the ship," to draw bills of lading for a nominal instead of a blank freight, there being an opinion among merchants that a blank freight is not a desirable thing.

8. On or about the 3rd Dec. 1874, the Stonehouse sailed from San Francisco. The rate of freight general at this date at San Francisco was only 55*s.* per ton; but the plaintiffs were informed by Morison that they would receive 5000*l.* to 6000*l.* for the freight of the Stonehouse. The defendants, however, did not know that Morison had given the plaintiffs any information on the subject, or that they had any interest in the ship.

9. On the 21st Dec. 1874, Morison accepted the bills of exchange payable at the London and County Bank on the 22nd Feb. 1875.

10. On the 1st Jan. 1875, Morison effected two policies of insurance in respect of the Stonehouse, or freight valued at 4000*l.* and 1000*l.* respectively.

11. The sum necessary to meet the bills of exchange at maturity was 10,364*l.* 19*s.* 4*d.*; and at some time in Dec. or the beginning of Jan., it had been arranged between Morison and the defendants that the defendants should advance to Morison the moneys necessary for the purpose, that the defendants in return should be at liberty to sell the cargo and receive the proceeds of sale on Morison's account, and that the bills of lading and policies of insurance should be deposited with the defendants as security for their advances.

12. Before making and carrying out this arrangement with Morison, the defendants searched the ship's register at the Custom House, and found that 60-64ths were registered in Morison's name, and that there was no encumbrance whatever on the register. The defendants had no notice in any way that Morison had mortgaged his shares in the Stonehouse.

13. On the 4th Jan. 1875 the defendants advanced to Morison 3000*l.*, and shortly afterwards, in pursuance of the arrangements then made, received from him the former of the two policies, being the policy on freight valued at 4000*l.*

14. On the 2nd Feb. 1875 Morison executed another mortgage in similar terms of his interest in the ship to the plaintiffs, to secure 4000*l.* and further advances Morison subsequently, on the 2nd March 1875, further mortgaged his interest in the Stonehouse to Joseph Harrold, who registered his mortgage on the 3rd March 1875, and thus became the first mortgagee, the plaintiffs not having registered their mortgages until the 6th March 1875, as hereinafter mentioned.

15. On or about the 16th Feb. 1875 the defendants offered the cargo of wheat for sale to divers persons on cost freight and insurance terms, but did not succeed in obtaining a purchaser until on the 19th Feb. they effected a sale of the cargo on the terms hereinafter appearing.

16. On the 19th Feb. 1875 the defendants, on behalf of Morison, and on their own account to the extent of their advances, sold the cargo to Henry Jump and Sons, of Liverpool. The following is a copy of the contract signed by Harris Brothers and Co., brokers, on behalf of the buyers:

London, 19th Feb. 1875.

Bought of Messrs. John Morison and Co., through Messrs. Burrows and Perks, for Messrs. Henry Jump and Sons, Liverpool, a cargo of Californian wheat of fair average quality of the season's shipments when shipped.

Shipped per Stonehouse, first class, from San Francisco, bill of lading dated about 2nd Dec. 1874, say 23,644 bags, containing 3,089,775lb., at the price of 43s. 6d. per quarter of 500lb., shipped, bags weighed and paid for as wheat, including freight and insurance to any safe port of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, calling at Falmouth or the Downs for orders. Vessel to discharge afloat. No charge for damage or bags. Payment, cash in London within seven days, less discount for unexpired portion of two months from this date at 5 per cent. per annum in exchange for bill of lading and policies of insurance (free of war risk) effected with approved underwriters, but for whose solvency sellers are not responsible. Damage by sea, water, or otherwise (if any) to be taken as sound. Invoice quantity is to be final. Sellers to have our brokerage of half per cent. contract cancelled or not cancelled. Any average incurred before this date to be for account of and settled by sellers. Sellers to give policies of insurance for 2 per cent. over the invoice amount, including the half per cent., and any amount over this to be for seller's account; three days for awaiting orders at port of call. To discharge according to the custom of the port. Should any dispute arise, it is agreed by buyer and seller to leave the same to be settled by two London cornfactors respectively chosen, with power to call in an umpire, whose decision is to be final. As cargo is coming on ship's account, freight is to be computed at 55s. per ton of 2240lb., and invoice to be rendered accordingly.

HARRIS BROTHERS AND CO. Brokers.

17. The defendants would have had a difficulty in disposing of the cargo without allowing an amount equivalent to freight to remain unpaid until the vessel's arrival, and would not have obtained so large a price for it.

18. In accordance with the above contract an invoice was subsequently made out by Morison, of which the following is a copy:

Invoice of cargo of wheat, per Stonehouse, of San Francisco, sold to Messrs. Henry Jump and Sons, of Liverpool, as per contract of 19th Feb. 1875.

BURROWS AND PERKS.

London, 22nd Feb. 1875.

19. On the 22nd Feb. 1875, Morison obtained a further advance from the defendants of 9000*l.*, making with the sum of 3000*l.* previously advanced, the sum of 12,000*l.* With such advance he paid the said bills of exchange at maturity, and received the bills of exchange and the bills of lading thereto attached from the London and County Bank, as arranged with the defendants.

20. On the 23rd Feb. 1875, in pursuance of such last-mentioned arrangement. Morison handed the bills of exchange, with the three bills of lading attached, to the defendants, and the following memorandum was endorsed on the bills of lading, and signed by Morison:—

We assign our interest in the within freight to Messrs. Burrows and Perks, London, whose receipt or that of their appointed agents, will be sufficient discharge.

The freight assigned is at the rate of 55*s.* per ton, and not the nominal amount of 1*s.* per ton.

J. MORISON AND CO.
24/2 75.

Such indorsement, although dated the 24th Feb. 1875, was not really made and signed until about the 26th Feb.

21. At the same time Morison handed to the defendants the aforesaid invoice, made out in pursuance of the contract with Messrs. H. Jump and Sons for transmission to the buyers, together with a letter to the defendants themselves, dated the 25th Feb. 1875, and enclosing the policies therein referred to, which was as follows:—

21, Billiter street, 25th Feb. 1875.

Messrs. Burrows and Perks—

Dear Sirs,—We further give you, in security, policy of insurance on wheat 1500*l.*, and on freight 1000*l.*, both in the Stonehouse. Should this vessel be lost we trust you will give us the collection on them, as well as on the former policies. J. MORISON AND CO.

Both of the above policies are in the Marine Insurance Company.

22. The invoice was duly forwarded by the defendants to H. Jump and Sons, who thereupon paid the balance thereon appearing of 9511*l.* 16*s.* 7*d.*, in pursuance of their contract. The cargo was subsequently resold by Jump and Sons to Ross F. Smyth and Co., of Liverpool.

23. On the 6th March 1875, the plaintiffs duly registered their mortgages.

24. On the 13th April 1875, the Stonehouse arrived at Falmouth for orders. She was then taken possession of by Mr. Harrold and the plaintiffs, as first and second mortgagees respectively. Mr. Harrold's debt being more than secured by the ship he had no claim to the freight. The Stonehouse proceeded in the possession of Harrold and the plaintiffs to Liverpool, where she arrived on the 19th April 1875, on which day Messrs. Lowless and Co, on behalf of the defendants, wrote a letter to the plaintiff's attorney, Messrs. Freshfields and Williams, as follows:—

Dear Sirs,—We have a telegram that this vessel (Stonehouse) is now off the port, and that the market is a falling one. Should there, therefore, be any difficulty in obtaining delivery, the purchasers may repudiate their bargain, and a loss of 1000*l.* might easily be sustained, in addition to the charges for landing and warehousing. Will you, therefore, please let us have your determination instantly. We are obliged to give you notice that our clients will seek to recover all damages sustained from Messrs. Wyllie and Co., and we have given you special notice of the circumstances, in order that our clients may be entitled to recover. We hope, however, that there will be no necessity for this.—LOWLESS & Co.

25. The plaintiffs refused to allow Messrs. Ross F. Smythe and Co. to take delivery of the cargo, except on payment of freight at 55*s.* per ton, and were prepared to protect themselves in the manner in the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862; but to avoid such detention of the cargo, and the deterioration and expenses which would have been the result of it, the following agreement was made between the plaintiff and the defendants through their respective attorneys.

It is hereby agreed between Messrs. Freshfields and Williams, as representing Messrs. James Wyllie and Co., and Messrs. Lowless and Co., as representing Messrs. Burrows and Perks, that 3500*l.*, being the amount of freight on the cargo of the ship Stonehouse, claimed by Messrs. James Wyllie and Co, as second mortgagees in possession of the Stonehouse, shall be paid into the London and Westminster Bank in the joint names of Messrs. Freshfields and Williams and Messrs. Lowless and Co. to abide the result of an action to be brought by Messrs. James Wyllie and Co. against Messrs. Burrows and Perks, who hereby admit, for the purposes of the action, that they are the owners of the cargo under the bill of lading thereof, and liable to pay whatever freight may be due thereon. The action to be commenced within thirty days from this date, and duly prosecuted. In the event of no action being brought within the time aforesaid, or of Messrs. James Wyllie and Co. not obtaining a verdict in the said action, the amount so deposited, with any interest thereon, is to be paid to Messrs. Burrows and Perks or order; and, in the event of Messrs. James Wyllie and Co. recovering a verdict for the said sum of 3500*l.*, or any part thereof, the amount of such verdict is to be paid to them or order out of the sum deposited, and the balance (if any) to Messrs. Burrows and Perks or order.

It is admitted, for the purposes of the said action, that the amount of freight specified in the bill or bills of lading has been tendered, Messrs. James Wyllie and Co. to withdraw any stop which they may have put upon the goods on the money being deposited, Messrs. Burrows and Perks to have the same right of recovering interest on the sum to be deposited as if the money had been paid at the proper time into a wharfinger's hands under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act. Dated 19th April 1875.

FRESHFIELDS AND WILLIAMS.
LOWLESS AND CO.

26. It was subsequently found that freight at 55*s.* per ton amounted to 3577*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, and upon the execution of the agreement and the payment of the 3577*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.* as subsequently agreed, instead of 3500*l.*, into the London and Westminster Bank, the plaintiffs gave delivery of the cargo.

The question for the opinion of the court (who were to have liberty to draw all inferences of fact, was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to refuse delivery except on payment of freight at the rate of 55*s.* per ton, or whether any freight was due on the said cargo beyond freight at the rate of 1*s.* per ton. If the opinion of the court on either point should be in the affirmative, judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for 3577*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.* with costs; if in the negative, for the defendants.

Feb. 10.—The case was argued by Herschell, Q.C. (C. Bowen with him, for the plaintiffs, and by Webster (Thesiger, Q.C. with him), for the defendants.

The court took time to consider, but afterwards desired that the case should be reargued on the point whether any equity was created as between the plaintiffs and the defendants by the fact that the defendants had searched the register, and had found no incumbrance.

Feb. 21.—The case was accordingly reargued.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 14.—The judgment of the court (Brett, Archibald, and Lindley, JJ.) was delivered by LINDLEY, J.—The material facts are these:—1st Dec. 1874, mortgage by Morison to the plaintiffs of a ship for 7500*l.* and further advances. 4th Jan. 1875, defendants advanced Morison 3000*l.* on security of cargo, without notice of the plaintiffs' mortgage. 2nd Feb. 1875, Morison again mortgaged the ship to the plaintiffs for 4000*l.* and further advances. 19th Feb. 1875, sale of cargo by defendants and Morison to Jump and Co. on terms of freight, being paid at 55*s.* per ton. 22nd Feb. 1875, further advance by the defendants of 9000*l.* 26th Feb. 1875, assignment to them of the freight at 55*s.* per ton, as security for their advances. 2nd March 1875, Morison mortgages the ship to Harrold. 3rd March 1875, Harrold's mortgage was registered. 6th March 1875, the plaintiffs registered their mortgage. 13th April 1875, the ship arrived, and Harrold and the plaintiffs took possession; Harrold being satisfied with his security on the ship did not claim the freight; an arrangement was come to by which the defendants acquired Jump and Co.'s rights.

Consider, first, how the case would have stood if there had been no mortgage to Harrold. Two questions would then have arisen, viz., (1), would the freight payable to the plaintiffs as first mortgagees in possession have been 55*s.* per ton or only 1*s.*? (2), would the plaintiffs have been entitled to this freight as against the defendants.

(1.) With respect to the first of these questions, it is to be observed that although a nominal freight of 1*s.* was made payable by the bills of lading, the cargo being bought for the owner of the ship, in the contract with Jump and Co., the freight payable is agreed to be 55*s.* per ton, and the freight assigned to the defendants is likewise freight at 55*s.* per ton. The defendants, therefore, whether they claim through Jump and Co. or under the assignment to themselves are not in a position to deny that the sum payable as and for freight was to be 55*s.* per ton. It is true that this sum was not made payable when the cargo was put on board, nor when the defendants made their first advances on the cargo, and that it was made payable by an agreement entered into by the shipowner and the defendants and the purchasers of the cargo, after the date of the plaintiffs' mortgage. But there is no reason why the benefit of this agreement should not accrue to the mortgagee of the ship on his taking possession of her, on taking such possession he is entitled to all freight payable under charter-parties or bills of lading; and there is no difference material to the present case between freight payable under such documents and money payable as and for freight under such an agreement as that which is here to be considered. No authority on this point was referred to on either side, and, on principle, 55*s.* having been fixed by all parties interested in the cargo to be the freight, must be so treated for the purposes of the case.

(2.) The question whether the plaintiffs as mortgagees of the ship, or the defendants as assignees of the freight, would have had the better title to it but for the mortgage to Harrold turns on the true nature of a mortgage of a ship and on the effect of the omission of the plaintiffs to register their mortgage before the freight was assigned to the defendants.

The mortgage to the plaintiffs was in the statutory form, and by it the ship was mortgaged to them. The word mortgage is a well known word and signifies a transfer of property by way of security: See 2 Black. Com. 158; Termes de la Ley Mortgage.) A mortgage is a transfer of all the mortgagor's interest in the thing mortgaged, but such a transfer is not absolute; it is made only by way of security, or in other words it is subject to redemption. Unless, therefore, there is any statutory enactment to the contrary, the plaintiffs in this case acquired by their mortgage the whole of the mortgagor's interest in the ship, or in other words the legal title to the ship as security.

Such is primâ facie the effect of the instrument of mortgage. But the statutes relating to ships must be examined with a view to determine what the consequences of registration or non-registration may be.

Under the older statutes relating to merchant shipping all transfers and mortgages were made by a bill of sale, and such bill of sale had no effect whatever either at law or in equity until registration: (See the cases collected in The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner, 1 J. & H. 159; 2 De G. J. & J. 592; Maclachlan, on Shipping, p. 39, 2nd edit.) (a)

The Merchant Shipping Acts now in force, however, make a marked distinction between transfers of ships otherwise than by way of security and mortgages, and there are different groups of sections with distinct headings applicable to these two different subjects: (See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 55-65, which relate to transfers and transmissions, and ss. 66-75, which relate to mortgages.) Amongst other distinctions between these two modes of dealing with ships the following are the most noteworthy: A transfer (otherwise than by way of mortgage) must be by a bill of sale (sect. 55), and must be produced to the registrar for registration (sect. 57), and the transferee, if not a corporation, must make a declaration that he is a natural born British subject: (sect. 56, and schedule Form F.)

On the other hand a mortgage must be by a different kind of instrument (sect. 66), and there is no enactment requiring such instrument to be produced to the registrar (compare sect. 66 with sect. 57), and the mortgagee is not required to make any declaration as to his nationality.

It is true that in The Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner (ubi sup.), Wood, V.C., and Lord Campbell, held that an unregistered equitable mortgage of a ship could not be enforced. But in consequence of this decision, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 3, was passed, and the validity of an unregistered mortgage as against all persons except registered transferees or mortgagees (see sects. 43 and 69 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.) can hardly now be disputed: (See Stapleton v. Haymen, 2 H. & C. 918.)

It appears from the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 itself, that a mortgagee has an interest in the ship capable of transmission by bankruptcy, death, or marriage (sect. 74); and on payment off of the debt secured by a registered mortgage and entry of the payment in the registry, the estate, if any, which passed to the mortgagee vests in the person in whom the same would have vested if the mortgage had not been made (sect. 68).

The mortgagee, however, is not to be deemed the owner of the ship, except so far as may be necessary for making her a security for the mortgage debt (sect. 70). This section was inserted for his protection against liability which might have attached to him by reason of his interest in the ship (see Dickinson v. Kitchen, 8 E. & B. 789); and would have been quite unnecessary if the mortgage transferred no interest in the sense of ownership in her to him; or in other words if it created a mere charge on her in his favour,

Sect. 72, which protects registered mortgagees of ships from the operation of the reputed ownership clauses of the Bankruptcy Acts would also be unnecessary if a mortgagee had not such an interest in the ship as might render him her true owner within the meaning of those clauses.

Again, the right of a first registered mortgagee to take possession of the ship is too well settled

(a) Mortgages are still effected in the United States by bill of sale, and by the U. S. Statute of 1850, sect. 1; "No bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance of any vessel, or part of any vessel of the United States, shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless such bills of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance be recorded in the office of the Controlier of Customs where such vessel is registered or enrolled."—ED.

to be capable of dispute; but the statute confers no such right in express terms, and it only exists by reason of the ownership transferred to the mortgagee by the mortgage itself; a mere charge would confer no such right. (See Fisher on Mortgages, p. 197) But as a mortgagee, unless in possession, would have no power of sale if it were not expressly conferred upon him; and as the mortgage contains no such power, the statute itself expressly confers it on registered mortgagees (s. 71). But this affords no argument against the view that the mortgage itself confers on the mortgagee an interest in the sense of ownership in the ship herself.

The conclusion, then, to be drawn from the mortgage and the statute is that the mortgagee of a ship, like the mortgagee of any other property, acquires an ownership in the ship, viz., such ownership as the mortgagor has to give. A first mortgagee will thus acquire the whole ownership in the ship, but only of course as a security for his money. Second and other mortgagees will only acquire the interest left in the mortgagor, or in other words, his right to redeem. That right will be legal or equitable, according as the time for paying off the first mortgage has not yet arrived or has passed.

That this is the true nature of a mortgage of a ship appears not only from the above observations, but also from the following decisions: Dickenson v. Kitchen (8 E. & B 789); and Liverpool Marine Credit Co. v. Wilson (ante vol. 1, p. 323; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 507).

The plaintiffs in this case having acquired by their mortgage the ownership of the ship, and that title being prior in point of date to the equitable assignment of the freight to the defendants, such title must prevail against them unless there be some sufficient reason to the contrary (see Rice v. Rice; 23 L. J. 289, Ch.). The only reason alleged is the non-registration of the plaintiffs' mortgage before the date of the assignment to defendants. If an unregistered mortgage of a ship were null and void, or if it had no legal effect before the time of registration, then the title of the plaintiffs would have accrued after that of the defendants, and would have to be postponed to theirs (see Lindsay v. Gibbs, 22 Beav. 522). But the present Merchant Shipping Acts contain no enactment to this effect, and, as already observed, an unregistered mortgage is not now void; moreover sect. 69 of the Act of 1854 enacts in effect that if there is more than one registered mortgage the mortgagees shall be entitled in priority one over the other according to the dates of registration. So far, therefore, as the Act itself is concerned, the only consequence of not registering a mortgage is to postpone it to a subsequent mortgage or a transfer, (see sect. 43), which is registered before it.

But it was contended that upon general principles of equity, and apart from any statutory enactment, the plaintiffs had lost their priority by reason of their own negligence in omitting to register the mortgage. The case states that the defendants searched the register before they advanced their money on the freight, and they were therefore really misled by the non-registration of the plaintiffs' security, and it is contended that this is one of those cases which ought to be decided according to the rule that whenever one of two innocent parties must suffer by the acts of a third, the one who has enabled such third person to occasion the loss must sustain it. This rule is a well known rule both at law and in equity; but it is by no means easy of application, owing to the ambiguity of the word enabled. The plaintiffs did not register their mortgage, but they were not themselves party or privy to any fraud on the defendants. The plaintiffs did not know that money was being obtained on the security of the freight, and in truth there is nothing save the mere omission to register which can be urged against them. But the mere omission by a person to do something, which it is not his duty to do, but which if done would have prevented loss to another, is not sufficient to render such person liable for such loss nor to deprive him of any rights which he would otherwise have had against that other. There are decisions to this effect both at law and in equity; one at law, Arnold v. The Cheque Bank (L. Rep. 1 C. P. Div. 578; 45 L. J. 562, C. P.; 34 L. T. Rep. N. S. 729), decided by this court during last sittings, where the cases at law are fully considered. In equity it is settled now that the mere omission by a first mortgagee to obtain the title deeds from the mortgagor is not sufficient to postpone the first mortgage in favour of a subsequent mortgagee who bonâ fide advances his money in the belief that the property is unencumbered, and who obtains the deeds, see Evans v. Bicknell (6 Ves. 173, 183); Hewitt v. Loosemore 9 Hare, 449). To postpone the first mortgage in such cases there must be either fraud or such gross and wilful negligence as is equivalent to it.

In the present case but for Harrold's mortgage the plaintiffs would have had a clear prior legal title to the freight as against the defendants; and although if the plaintiffs had registered their mortgage when it was made the defendants would not have been misled, there was neither fraud nor such gross and wilful negligence imputable to the plaintiffs as is sufficient to deprive them of their prior legal rights.

It remains to consider the effect of Harrold's mortgage. This although subsequent in point of date to the plaintiffs' mortgage was registered before it, and by sect. 69 of 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, became entitled to priority over it. By reason of this statutory priority Harrold became first mortgagee of the ship and became entitled to take possession of her and to receive her freight. Having paid himself he would hold any surplus for the benefit of the subsequent incumbrancers according to their priorities, In point of fact Harrold was content to look to the ship only, and he laid no claim to the freight. But the plaintiffs had also taken possession of the ship, and they claim freight as second mortgagees. The priority gained by Harrold cannot affect the rights of the plaintiffs as against the defendants, and Harrold's claim being satisfied, his mortgage may, for all present purposes, be disregarded. The mortgage of the plaintiffs became as between them and Harrold a second mortgage instead of a first mortgage, but the plaintiffs' mortgage continued to be, as it always was, prior in point of date to the assignment of the defendants. Even therefore if the plaintiffs' mortgage became for all purposes and as against all persons an equitable as distinguished from a legal mortgage, its priority in point of date remained unaffected. It was, indeed, contended that by reason of Harrold's mortgage and its priority over the plaintiff's mortgage, this last could only be regarded as an equitable mortgage, dating from the time of registration. But this contention is based upon the erroneous supposition that an unregistered mortgage has no validity until it is registered.

It was further contended that the plaintiffs having became second mortgagees had no right to take possession of the ship, and that their right to freight was, therefore, never perfected. But although a second mortgagee has no legal as distinguished from equitable right to possession, and although he cannot take possession as against a first mortgagee, yet as against all other persons he has a right to take possession, and can enforce such right if necessary by obtaining the appointment of a receiver, see Liverpool Marine Credit Company v. Wilson, ante vol. 1, p. 323; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 507; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 717, where the rights of a second mortgagee of a ship are pointed out. In this particular case the plaintiffs took possession, and it was, therefore, unnecessary to apply for a receiver; if they had neither taken possession nor applied for a receiver, still as the first mortgagee did take possession, it was probably unnecessary for the plaintiffs to do more than give him notice of their claim, for he would, after paying himself, hold all surplus monies received by him in trust for the persons beneficially interested in them according to their priorities.

For these reasons our judgment is for the plaintiffs.

THE VIRGO.

Damage—Inevitable accident—Inherent defect in machine—Costs.

The owners of a vessel are not liable for damage caused to another vessel in a collision occasioned by the sudden breaking down of an apparatus in which there was an inherent latent defect, in the absence of any negligence in the user of the apparatus.

The William Lindsay (ante, vol. 2, p. 118; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 338; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355) followed.

Where the defence of inevitable accident is sustained, the plaintiff will not be ordered to pay the costs, unless he might have known that there was, apart from the merits, a good legal defence.

THIS was a cause arising out of a collision which took place in the River Thames at 10 a.m. on 17th June 1876, between the schooner Gem, which was lying at anchor, and the screw steamship Virgo, which was steaming down the river. There was no material difference between the parties as to the weather, which was described as fine and clear. The Virgo struck the Gem, which was lying across the river, and head to wind, nearly amidships, with such violence that she sank, and her cargo of ice floated out. It was alleged in the statement of claim, on behalf of the Gem, that the collision and damage were caused by, and were wholly attributable to, the neglect, default, or mismanagement of the Virgo, or of those on board her, and that no blame in respect of the said collision or damage was attributable to the Gem, or to any of those on board her.

The General Steam Navigation Company, owners of the Virgo, in their statement of defence, alleged that the Virgo was proceeding about six knots an hour, and that the Gem was seen at a distance of half a mile, and continued:

4. As the Virgo approached the Gem, proper measures were taken in due time by starboarding the helm of the Virgo, to steer the Virgo clear of the Gem without danger of collision; but as the helm of the Virgo was being starboarded, her steering gear broke, and she could not be made to answer a starboard helm, and although her engines were promptly stopped and reversed full speed, she with her stem came into contact with the starboard side of the Gem.

5. The said breaking of the steering gear of the Virgo happened without any neglect or breach of duty on the part of the defendants, or of those on board the Virgo, and the said collision was not occasioned by any neglect, default, or mismanagement on the part of those on board the Virgo, and the said collision was the result of inevitable accident.

On the defence issue was joined, and the case came on before the Judge and Trinity Masters, on the 6th Nov. 1876.

It was proved that the Virgo had some short time previously to the accident ported to go ahead of a ketch which was working up the river, and had steaded again after doing so, and that the order was just given to "starboard" to clear the Gem, when it was reported to the master that something was wrong with the steering apparatus (a patent one), which would not move; the engines were at once stopped, and the master went aft, before he got aft it was reported to him that the wheel was all right, and thereupon the pilot started the engines on again as before. Almost immediately, when the engines had only made three revolutions, the master observed that the movement of the wheel produced no corresponding movement of the tiller and rudder, and he at once ordered the engines to be stopped, and reversed full speed, but before the way of the ship was stopped, the collision had happened.

After hearing the evidence and argument on the facts the Judge retired with the Trinity Masters and put the four following questions to them, which he afterwards stated in the course of his judgment:

(1) Was the Virgo under the circumstances bound to keep her engines stopped?

(2) Was she bound to anchor?

(3) Was she wrong in crossing the bows of the ketch?

(4) Was she going too fast?

All of which they answered in the negative. The argument of the point of law whether under these circumstances the Virgo was liable for the damage was postponed till

Nov., 13, 1876.—Milward, Q.C. and Edward Pollock, for plaintiffs.—It is for the defendants to prove inevitable accident, and they have not done so. The screw of the steering apparatus was not sufficient for its purpose, or it would not have broken with an ordinary strain. If the strain was extraordinary there was negligence on board the Virgo in putting her in a position when it became necessary to put on such a strain. There is no evidence to show how it was broken, and therefore negl gence of some sort must be presumed to have broken it. After it was broken the accident might have been avoided if the Virgo had reversed her engines at once, or anchored, or even continued stopped, but notwithstanding distinct notice that something was wrong with the steering apparatus, the ship was allowed to proceed on a mere suggestion that it was all right again without any steps being taken to ascertain what had been wrong, and this in itself is negligence causing the collision. The cases where an inherent defect in a machine undiscoverable by ordinary means has been held to relieve the party using it from liability for damage done by it are cases of contract: Redhead v. Midland Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 379: 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628). There the passenger carried could not make the carrier of passengers liable for anything outside of the contract, which was to use reasonable care; here there is no contract, it is a tort or trespass, and the defendant is liable for any damage he does. There is no reason why the plaintiff should suffer loss because the defendant uses a machine insufficient for its purpose. It has been laid down by the Privy Council that a plaintiff to avail himself of the defence of inevitable accident, "must take all such precautions as a man of ordinary prudence, and skill, exercising reasonable foresight, would use to avert danger:" (The William Lindsay, ante, vol. 2. p. 118; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 338; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355.) And in that case it was held that those conditions were satisfied; here it has not been shown that they were. Where a machine is under the management of a person, and an accident happens out of the ordinary course by means of the machine, it affords reasonable evidence of negligence in the person using it (Scott v. London and St. Katharine Docks Company, 3 H. & C. 596; 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 148), and that is the present case.

Butt, Q.C., Aston, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.—This case cannot be distinguished from The William Lindsay (ante, vol. 2, p. 118; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 338; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355). That it was done by a jerk or undue strain is a new case entirely and cannot be raised now, it was a question for Trinity Masters: (The Marpesia, ante, vol. 1, p. 263.) We have satisfied the onus of proof by showing that we took reasonable care. To anchor would have been certainly dangerous and probably useless: (The C. M. Palmer, ante, vol. 2, p. 94; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 120.) The case is stronger than that of Readhead v. Midland Railway Company (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 379; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628). If a carrier of passengers has no liability in such a case to a person whom he has contracted to carry safely, à fortiori he has none to a third party. If we get judgment we are entitled to our costs; the plaintiffs knew our defence, and had every opportunity of ascertaining by inspection and otherwise its validity.

Nov. 17.—Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—In this case of collision, in which the plaintiffs are the owners of the vessel Gem, and the defendants the owners of the vessel Virgo, the case for the plaintiffs is that on the morning of the 17th June 1876, the Gem, a small schooner, was riding at anchor in a proper place near the Deptford buoys in the Thames, that the Virgo, a large screw ship, ran into her and sunk her.

The defence of the Virgo is that she was going up the river with a good look out, at the rate of six knots, that she saw the Gem about half a mile off, that having ported for a few barges, which she cleared, she then steadied and afterwards starboarded, which was the proper manœuvre to clear the Gem; that at this time there was no danger of collision, if she had answered her starboard helm, but the second mate came to the captain and told him there was something amiss with the wheel, and at the same time the man came from the wheel and reported to the captain that there was something wrong with the helm, the captain ascertained that the rudder and wheel were not acting together and gave, through the pilot, the order to stop and reverse It appears that very shortly before this time, something wrong had been discovered, but the mate having reported "all right," an unsuccessful attempt had been made to go on. That in consequence of this breaking of the steering gear the Virgo did not answer her starboard helm, and ran with her stem into the starboard side of the Gem. In these circumstances the contention is that the collision was the result of inevitable accident.

It was argued on the part of the Gem, first that the accident was not inevitable, and secondly that if inevitable the Virgo was still liable for the damages which she had inflicted on the Gem.

On the part of the Virgo evidence of the most conclusive character was produced to show that the steering gear was thoroughly good in every respect when it was put up in the vessel in the proper manner; and that it had been surveyed from time to time, and reported to be in perfect condition; that the accident had happened in consequence of the piston breaking off under the nut; that on examination of the piece of iron, which was produced in court, two small flaws were discovered in the centre of it which had caused the iron to break, that these flaws were latent, not to be detected by any means, probably formed in the course of use by some severe straining of the helm.

The grounds upon which the Gem contended that the accident was not inevitable were that it might have been avoided; first, by her stopping dead in the first instance, before the man came from the helm; secondly, by anchoring; thirdly, by having proceeded at a slower rate fourthly, by having gone astern of the barges, instead of crossing their bows. All these points I submitted to the Trinity Masters, and they advised me, upon a consideration of all the circumstances, that with respect to none of them was the Virgo to blame. The advice appeared to me to be sound, and I followed it.

There then remained these questions of law: First, Whether the Virgo had discharged the burden of proof which lay upon her of showing that the accident was inevitable? I was of opinion that she had. Second, though the Virgo was guilty of no negligence, and the accident was inevitable, whether she was not still liable for the damage to the Gem? I am of opinion that on this point the case falls within the principle of law laid down by this court, and by the Privy Council in the case of The William Lindsay (ante, vol. 2, p. 118; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 355; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 338), in aid of the authority of which might perhaps be cited the decision in the case of Readhead v. Midland Railway (L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 412), affirmed on appeal to the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 379; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628), and that the defence of inevitable accident must prevail.

With respect to costs I shall make no order. The cases referred to by the defendants' counsel were those in which the plaintiffs must or might certainly have known that the defendants had, apart from the merits, a good legal defence. I am of opinion that in this case the plaintiffs had a right to compel the defendants to prove the facts upon which they relied. The Virgo is dismissed from the suit, and no costs on either side.

THE DOLPHIN.

Marine insurance—Lien for premiums—United States law.

By United States law an underwriter upon ship has a maritime lien for the premiums due to him upon marine policies upon the ship underwritten by him, and can enforce payment by proceeding in rem in Admiralty against the ship insured.

A libel claiming payment of premiums against ship should set out the dates and amounts of the policies, and also the name of the parties insured, and the character and extent of their interest.

THIS was an exception to a libel of the Oriental Mutual Insurance Company. The libellants, in their libel, stated that they were a New York Corporation, that the Dolphin was a vessel of more than twenty tons burden, and was used in navigating the great lakes and waters connecting the same, and the waters of the State of Michigan; that on the 6th March, 1875, the master and owners of the Dolphin represented to the libellants that the vessel stood in need of insurance, and that, in pursuance of their representations and request, it furnished insurance in the amount of 4000 dols.; and that there was due to libellant for premiums the sum of 277 38 dols., for which libellant claimed a lien upon the vessel.

To this libel, Stephen B. Grummond, who also filed a libel against the schooner for salvage, excepted; for the reason that the matters set up therein were not within the Admiralty jurisdiction of this court; that a claim for premiums was not a lien upon the schooner, such as this court ought to enforce by proceedings in rem.

The Dolphin had been sold upon other claims, and the proceeds were in court awaiting distribution.

BROWN, J.—The question presented by the exceptions to the libel is one of great novelty and importance; and it is believed that no direct adjudication upon the point can be found either in this country or in England. After years of doubt in the minds of the profession, and some conflict of opinion in the courts, it was finally settled by the Supreme Court in the case of The Insurance Company v. Dunham (21 Wall., 1) that the contract of marine insurance is maritime in its character, and that in case of loss a libel may be sustained by the insured against the underwriter. It seems to me to follow as a necessary corollary that the underwriter may maintain a suit in admiralty for the premium, as it would be at war with established principles to say that the maritime character of a contract could be invoked by one party and not by the other.

The more serious question, however, remains to be decided, namely, whether the underwriter has a lien upon the vessel for the payment of his premium. The question is not discussed in this case nor in any other where actions have been sustained in the Admiralty, upon contracts of insurance. If the analogies of the contract of affreightment are to govern, as indicated by the Supreme Court in the opinion above cited (11 Wall. 30), the lien would follow as a necessary consequence. It is described in the opinion as "a contract or guaranty, on the part of the insurer, that the ship or goods shall pass safely over the sea, and through its storms and its many casualties to the port of its destination, and if they do not pass safely, but meet with disaster from any of the misadventures insured against, the insurer will pay the loss sustained. So, in the contract of affreightment, the master guarantees that the goods shall be safely transported (dangers of the sea excepted), from the port of shipment to the port of delivery and there delivered. The contract of the one guarantees against loss from the dangers of the sea, the contract of the other against loss from all other dangers. . . . The object of the two contracts is in the one case maritime service and in the other maritime casualties." If in the one case the skipper has a lien upon the vessel for a breach of the contract of affreightment, and the ship has a lien upon the cargo for the payment of the freight (though for reasons applicable to the character of this property this lien is dependent upon possession), it is difficult to see why upon principle the underwriter should not have a lien upon the ship for the payment of his premium.

It is true the general sentiment of the profession is adverse to the existence of such a lien, but no more so, perhaps, than it was to the jurisdiction of the admiralty in actions upon policies of insurance.

In the case of The Williams (Brown's Admiralty Reports, 208), perhaps the most exhaustive disquisition upon maritime liens to be found in the books, the judge remarked, page 215: "Without any very thorough examination at the time, but drawing mainly upon what we had ever assumed to be the law, we ruled that all maritime contracts, made within the scope of the master's usual authority, did per se, hypothecate the ship; and that those of affreightment, insurance, towage, the fitting out and discharge of vessels, and for aiding them in distress, were instances only of the application of the rule." I should have no hesitation in adopting the general principle there announced, that all contracts within the scope of the master's authority are binding upon the vessel, but in its application to the contract of insurance, I think the learned judge overlooked the fact that such contracts are not within the scope of the master's authority: General Interest Insurance Company v. Ruggles (12 Wheat., 408), Foster v. United States Insurance Company (11 Pick., 85).

Even a ship's husband, whose powers with regard to the fitting and equipment of a vessel are much more extensive than the master's, has no authority to bind the other part owners by a contract of insurance: Bell v. Humphries (2 Starkie, 345), Finney v. The Warren Insurance Company (1 Metcalf. 16).

The case of The Williams (ubi sup.) was that of a contract for services in the nature of salvage, made by a master whose power was unquestioned, and is a direct authority only for the proposition that all contracts, whether executed or executory, which he makes within the scope of his authority are binding upon the vessel. Obviously, however, the learned judge based his opinion upon a much broader principle. On page 217, referring to the case of The Pigs of Copper (1 Story, 314), he observes, "This judgment is referred to in this connection more particularly to illustrate the position that a denial of salvage is not a rejection of a proceeding in rem; but it quite as fully sustains the broader proposition, soon to be considered, that all authorised maritime contracts pledge the vessel for their performance." Again, on page 222, he says: "The wider principle, that every maritime agreement binds the ship as well as the owner, is that upon which we rest our decision. Although the authorities cited in support of this proposition refer to cases of salvage, or of contracts within the scope of the master's authority, and therefore do not sustain it to its fullest extent, yet I apprehend the principle is a safe one, and subject to two or three exceptions, which at an early day were imported into the maritime law of this country by the Supreme Court, following too closely the English authorities, one which may be acted upon without trenching upon the proper domain of the common law. So far as a dictum can be an authority it is certainly an authority for the lien of the underwriters.

The doctrine that the admiralty courts of this country are restricted to the jurisdiction exercised by the High Court of Admiralty in England at the time of the adoption of our constitution is now so completely overthrown that no argument can be properly deduced from it. The only exceptions believed to exist to the jurisdiction in rem of the admiralty over maritime contracts is that of supplies furnished to domestic vessels, established in the case of The Gen. Smith (4 Wheat. 434), and recently recognised in the case of The Lottawanna (21 Wall.), and that of masters' wages, held not to be the subject of a lien in the case of The Steamboat New Orleans v. Phœbus (11 Peters, 175). Contracts for the construction of vessels which are recognised as maritime by the continental codes and a lien given thereby, were also held by the Supreme Court in the case of Roach v. Chapman (22 How. 129) not to be subject to the admiralty jurisdiction in any form.

In determining whether a maritime lien exists in favour of the underwriter, it is well to consider the source of the doctrine that courts of admiralty have jurisdiction over policies of insurance. The subject is fully discussed in the case of The Insurance Company v. Dunham (pages 31-38), and the court remarks: "Perhaps the best criterion of the maritime character of a contract is the system of law from which it arises, and by which it is governed. And it is well known that the contract of insurance sprang from the law maritime, and derives all its material, rules, and incidents therefrom. . . . These facts go to show, demonstrably, that the contract of marine insurance is an exotic in the common law. And we know the fact historically that its first appearance in any code or system of laws was in the law maritime as promulgated by the various maritime states and cities of Europe." Mention is here made of the maritime laws of the ancient Rhodians, of the ordinances of Barcelona, Venice, Florence, and of Antwerp, and the court further observes: "But an additional argument is founded on the fact that in all other countries, except England, even in Scotland, suits and controversies arising upon the contract of maritime insurance are within the jurisdiction of the admiralty or other marine courts. . . . It is also clear that, originally, the English Admiralty had jurisdiction of these as well as of other maritime contracts." This last remark is corroborated not so much by positive adjudications to that effect as from the language of the commissions issued to the early Vice-Acmiralty courts which authorise them to take cognisance of marine policies. This would hardly have been done had such jurisdiction never been exercised by the High Court of Admiralty in England.

Tracing, then, the jurisdiction of the Admiralty over contracts of insurance to the continental law, it is pertinent in this connection to inquire whether that law gives to the underwriter a lien upon the vessel for the payment of his premiums.

Art. 16 of the marine ordinance of Louis XIV., title "Of Seizure of Vessels," in enumerating the persons entitled to liens upon ships, makes no mention of underwriters, but Valin, in commenting upon this ordinance, book 1, lib. 14, sect. 16, says: "If this article has not mentioned them (the underwriters), it is probably because the ordinance takes it for granted in many articles under the title of 'insurance,' that the premium is paid in cash at the time the policy is signed, while, by the custom of this place and of many others, it is paid after the arrival of the ship at a port of safety. However this may be, the insurer of a vessel has doubtless a lien (privilege) upon her for the payment of his premium as the insurer of a cargo has a lien upon it. This lien ranks with that of the lender upon bottomry and with material men."

A privilege is defined by Art. 2095 of the Civil Code as "a right which the character of the credit gives to a creditor to be preferred to other creditors even mortgagees (hypothécaires)." If not analagous in all respect to our "lien," it authorises the like preference in payment to claims within its scope from the proceeds in court.

Emerigon treats the contract of insurance as analogous to that of Maritime Loan or bottomry, and observes (Emer. on Maritime Loans, chap. 1, sect. 4): "In the one contract the lender bears the sea risks; in the other, the underwriter. In the one, the maritime interest is the price of the peril, and this term corresponds with the premium which is paid in the other. In either case it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that the condition has been fulfilled. In case of a suit it lies upon the lender, in order to render the contract of maritime loan executory, to show that the ship has arrived at her port of destination in safety; and in an action on a policy of insurance it lies upon the assured to prove the loss, capture, or shipwreck of the vessel. The policies of insurance made on loose sheets of paper create a lien on the property of the parties, provided they are executed before sworn brokers or notaries; but the other contracts do not create such a lien unless they are recorded by a notary in his public register, in the sworn form as ordinary contracts."

Again, in his work upon the contract of Insurance, ch. 3, sect. 9, Emergion says: "The ordinance having regarded the premium as paid in cash upon signing the policy, the insurer, who had not been paid, was not placed among creditors whose ranks and preferences are determined by articles 16 and 17. Title "Seizure of Vessels." From this silence it has been often concluded that the insurer had no privilege, because it is said the matter of privilege is stricti juris (droit étroit) it is necessary they be expressly bestowed (deferés) by law, and it is never permitted to extend them from one case to another, because of equal or superior equities. But it should be considered that the premium of insurance is comprised in the expense of the equipment or building; it becomes, then, in some measure, part of the thing insured, which by this means is presumed to have an increased value (valoir davantage). Consequently, the privilege which the ordinance accords to the seller or material man ought to be common to the insurer, a creditor to the amount of his premium."

In support of this doctrine the learned author cites several decrees of the tribunals of commerce.

So, also, Alauzet des Assurances, Pt. 2, Sect. 2, Ch. 15: "It is rare that maritime premiums are paid in cash; they are settled generally in notes called premium notes (billets de prime) the maturity of which varies with the length of the voyage and the usage of the place; the lien of the insurer is preserved for the payment of the notes; they are not considered as working a novation, provided always the discharge (quittance) be not absolute, and the origin of the notes not doubtful."

See also Cleisac, P. 237, 318, 323, and 363. Pothier des Assurances, Ch. 3, Art. 3, sect. 2. Boulay Paty, vol. 1, tit. 1, sect. 2.

If any doubts, however, ever existed in the law of France, with regard to this lien, they are put to rest by Article 191 of the commercial code, which reads as follows: "Privileged debts are the following, and in the order in which they are classed:

1. Judicial costs and other charges incurred in obtaining a sale of the vessel and a distribution of the price.

2. The charge for pilotage, tonnage, hold fees, mooring, and dockage.

3. The wages of the keeper, and the expenses of guarding the vessel from the time of her entrance to port to the sale.

4. The storage of her rigging, tackle, and apparel.

5. The expenses of repairing the vessel, rigging, and apparel since her entrance into port from her last voyage.

6. Wages and pay of the captain and crew employed in the last voyage.

7. The sums loaned to the captain for the necessary expenses of the vessel during the last voyage, and the reimbursements of the price of goods sold by him for the same purpose.

8. The sums due to the vendor, material men, and workmen employed in her construction, if she has not yet made a voyage, and those due to creditors for furnishing work, labour, and for refitting, victualling, outfits, and equipments before the departure of the vessel, if she has already made a voyage.

9. The sums loaned on bottomry, on the rigging, and apparel for repairs, victualling, outfit, equipment before the departure of the vessel.

10. The amounts of the premiums of insurance effected on the hull, rigging apparel, outfit and equipment of the vessel for her last voyage.

11. The indemnity due to the freighters for not delivering goods laden on board or for the losses which the goods may have sustained from the default of the captain or crew.

The creditors comprised in each of the numbers of the present article shall have a concurrent lien on the vessel for the amount of their demand, and in case of insufficiency, the price of the vessel shall be divided equally among them (i.e., those of the same class) in proportion to the amount due to each."

In a recent work upon the commercial code of France, by Edmond Dufour, (Paris, 1859,) in speaking of this article, sect. 215, the author observes, "We see that if the code has admitted this opinion (of Valin) as to the principle of the lien, it has largely modified the combinations. The underwriters are still paid before the shippers, but that is all. They are ranked after the material men, who are placed two degrees above them in the scale of liens. They are also distanced by tenders upon bottomry, who immediately precede them. This classification appears to me more rational than that of Valin. For, the truth is, insurance is only a private affair of the insured, it is a very proper act of prudence, it certainly merits, and it possesses, all the sympathies of the law, but it is, after all, only a passive element of navigation. It rather repairs disasters than comes directly in aid of them and its efforts. It is otherwise with the material men, as well as with tenders upon bottomry. It is the labour of the one, and the goods or the money of the other, which permit the vessel to undertake its voyage. There is then in their favour a reason for preference, which is not wholly arbitrary, and the code has done well in recognising it." The nature of this lien is discussed at length, and is applied as well to time policies, as well as to policies, or for a single voyage.

In a recent admirable dictionary of the maritime law of France, by Aldrick Caumont, Paris, 1867, under the head of marine insurance, sect. 141, the author observes: "A lien is attached to the premium for the last voyage, if it be that made during the life of the policy upon the hull. This lien for the last voyage, resulting from Articles 191 and 192 exists wherever there is a policy executed. The insured who, asserting his right to suit, has attached the proceeds of the ship for the amount of his premium, is not permitted to claim a lien for the increase of premium for the time during which navigation is closed. Any number of voyages made during the time fixed for the duration of the insurance are considered as one and the same voyage. The broker has a lien upon the sum assured for the premium which he has paid. The liens for premiums of insurance upon property rank only after that accorded to contracts of bottomry. They constitute an expense made for the preservation of the res. In case where an insurance upon the hull has been made for a limited time, the underwriters have a lien upon the ship, not only for the premiums of the last voyage, but also for the entire premium due under the policy." In support of these various constructions of Article 191, the author cites opinions of the Court of Cassation of the Imperial Court of Bordeaux, and Rouen, and Aix, and of the Tribunal of Commerce of Marseilles.

From these authorities I gather the following summary of French law upon this subject:

1. That the Marine Ordinance of Louis XIV. did not expressly recognise the lien of the underwriter, but in this regard it was held not to be exclusive, and the premium was generally (perhaps not universally) held by the courts as a privileged debt.

2. That the privilege of the underwriter for payment of the premium due upon the policy for the last voyage is expressly recognised by Art. 191 of the Code of Commerce, and that such privilege is also extended to time policies.

3. That this privilege is not waived by taking premium notes, unless it is thereby intended to be discharged. Now, if the Supreme Court adopted the Continental law in respect of jurisdiction over contracts of insurance, must it not be presumed logically to have adopted it as an entirety, and not by piecemeal. It certainly seems so to me, and it goes very far to justify the language used by the circuit judge in the case of The Williams (Brown's Adm. Rep. 208). It is claimed, however, that these contracts are made exclusively upon the credit of the owner. If this were so, it might be presumed in a particular case that the lien was thereby waived, but with the exception of supplies, repairs, and materials furnished in the home port, the mere fact that the contract is made by the owner does not import a waver of lien. There is no doubt of the existence of such lien in favour of seamen, although hired by the owner in person; nor in favour of shippers, where the contract of affreightment is made with the owner. Nor is it, I believe, any objection to the lien of a lender upon bottomry, that the bond was made by the owner.

In the nature of the contract itself I see no reason forbidding such lien to the underwriter which does not apply with equal force to the salvor or material man. Their contracts differ mainly in the fact that the services of the underwriter are rendered only upon a contingency which may never happen. That the question has never before arisen is due, as before observed, solely to the fact that the contract of marine insurance was not generally recognised as maritime until the opinion was pronounced in The Insurance Company v. Durham (11 Wallace, 1). Under the ruling in this case, I feel constrained to hold that the contract of insurance being maritime in its character, the underwriter is entitled to a lien upon the ship for the payment of his premium, although, for the reason given by Dufour, I think it should rank in the lowest class of strictly maritime liens. I think, however, the libel is defective in this case, in failing to aver the names of the parties insured, and the character and extent of their interests in the vessel. I think it should also appear that the policy was a marine policy, or at least that it covered the vessel during the season of navigation. I regard it as very doubtful whether an ordinary fire policy covering a vessel while lying at the wharf during the winter, would be the subject of Admiralty jurisdiction. The above quotation, from Caumont, citing a judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles, apparently supports this opinion. The schedule annexed to the libel seems to indicate that the policies were issued covering separate moieties of the vessel. This, however, should be made distinctly to appear.

I think I see considerable difficulty in enforcing the lien of an underwriter upon an undivided interest of a part owner, especially if the proceeding were an original one, against the vessel itself, and not against its proceeds of sale. The same difficulty, however, frequently occurs in connection with the mortgages upon undivided interests, and I should not regard it as insuperable; and if it should appear that each moiety of his vessel was covered by a lien of the same amount, the question could be easily solved, as the effect would be practically the same as if the entire vessel was covered by a single policy. The difficulty with the libel in this case is, that it has been attempted to employ the ordinary blank libels for supplies in actions for premiums, for which they are badly adapted.

Upon this latter ground, the exceptions to the libels must be sustained, with leave to amend.
